But that there was no break-down soon became apparent. A boat put out from the cruiser's side in the stern of which a woman's form could be described. What on earth could be the meaning of such an extraordinary occurrence? But when it was seen that the young lady was exceedingly beautiful, and had, moreover, no luggage except the clothes she wore the mystification deepened. Where on earth had the Wasp picked up its beautiful cargo?

* * * * *

The members of The Good Samaritan Company were assembled on the stage of the Theatre Royal, Belfast. Consternation was depicted on every face save that of Miss Templeton Fane and her companion Juliet Fitzgerald, who were of course "in the know," to use a vulgarism.

Raymond Venables seemed beside himself. "It is a terrible thing," he was saying, "a terrible thing! And yet the performance must be got through somehow to-night. Miss Granville, as Miss Harlow's understudy, will take the part of Ruth to-night. I must ask you ladies and gentlemen to try and banish from your minds the remembrance of what happened last night. We must get to rehearsal at once." He gave vent to a deep sigh. Then something happened that was perhaps more dramatic than any scene in a play could ever be. A sound came from the wings, and the figure of a woman hurried to the centre of the stage. It was Harlow Hazel. For a moment the whole company stood as if spellbound. A cry from Miss Templeton Fane broke the silence. She dashed forward and flung herself at Hazel's feet. "Mercy ! mercy," she wailed. "I was tempted."

"Adventures of an Actress" still going strong.

Hazel took no notice of the prostrate figure. She had only eyes for the three whom she knew despite the differences of their characters were her true friends—Eric, Jenny, and Raymond Venables.

Jenny flung herself into her friend's arms. "Hazel, Hazel," she cried, "is it really you ? Where have you come from ?"

"I will tell you the story another time, dear Jenny," answered Hazel gravely. "Thank Heaven, I am really safe and sound."

She held out her hand to Eric. There were tears in the young man's eyes as he grasped it fervently, tears of unutterable joy and devotion.

That evening Hazel related to Jenny and Eric the full story of how she had been induced to enter the Mystic's jolly-boat ; how Miss Fane had lowered her and her unknown captor into the sea ; how she had been taken on board the Mermaid, and how she had finally been confronted by the agreement that bound her to become Horace Caldecott's wife. "Half beside myself," she said, "I took the pen in my hand and was about to sign the hateful document, at my wits' end to know what else to do, when suddenly through the one half-opened port-hole of the cabin my straining ears caught the faint sound as of a ship's engines near at hand. In a moment I had leapt to the port-hole and flung it open. 'Help ! help ! help ! I screamed with all the strength of my lungs. The woman who had been put in charge of me flung herself upon me ; but I was stronger than she and overpowered her. Then suddenly Horace Caldecott came into the cabin ; his face was livid with rage. He made a step towards me, and for a moment I thought he was going to kill me, but just at that moment I heard the sound of a man's voice hailing the yacht. Caldecott turned, and, with an oath, dashed up the stairway that led on to the deck. In an incredibly short space of time two bluejackets burst into the cabin. I at once begged them to take me away, which they did." The rest of the story my readers already know.

In the theatre that night a large audience witnessed the first performance of The Good Samaritan in Belfast. Most of the warmhearted Irish people who applauded Hazel's performance had got some inkling of the romance of the night before in which Hazel had been involved. She met with a reception that eclipsed any of her previous triumphs, and few who beheld her passing through all the scenes in which the heroine of the play took part could understand what a strain it was to the young girl whose nerves had been so sorely tried by such a harrowing adventure as that which she had experienced.

As for H.M.S. Wasp, what looked at first sight a calamity turned out to be a blessing, for a glorious calm day followed the dense fog of the night before. The cruiser made a record run to Liverpool, and her boilers proved themselves capable of being worked at high pressure without fear of accident.

And on board the Wasp was a lovelorn first lieutenant. Styles had succumbed, as so many others had done, to the wonderful charms of Hazel Harlow, and near his heart lay a cabinet photograph of the young actress which had been taken in Sheffield. On the back of this was written, "To Lieutenant Styles, in grateful remembrance, from Hazel Harlow."

Thus ended what might have been, but for the merest chance, an end to all Hazel Harlow's hopes for the future. Once more by the aid of Providence she had baulked the man she hated of his fell desires.

THE OPAL STUD.

"Hang the key! Why does it always stick when I'm in a hurry?"

The speaker was a girl about twenty-two, struggling to unlock a portmanteau. The exigencies of the situation take her at a disadvantage, and prohibit a description of her costume. On a chair hung a dripping coat and skirt, and a pair of neat boots set upside down within the fender suggested water draining out. Miss Clare West, while sight-seeing at Quebec, had been caught and drenched in a storm of rain and was now returning to the hotel Château Frontenac to dress for dinner, due in twenty minutes.

As she stood petulantly fumbling with the keys, uttering impatient masculine imprecations, she might almost have been mistaken for a boy, with her tall, athletic figure and short curly hair.

"The confounded thing!" she spluttered, and tried another key. This time it turned, and she flung the lid back.

"Great Scott! What's this? Who put this here?" she demanded, drawing out an embroglio of bands and buttonholes, and holding it up gingerly between her finger and thumb.

"Stocking suspenders? No! By Jupiter, it's braces or I'm a Dutchwoman!"

The next shock was a pair of trousers.

"It's not mine at all," she cried, in indignant dismay, "it's some beastly man's trunk."

Slamming down the lid angrily, she examined the surface. Sure enough there were her initials, "C.W."

"That's me. And so is the trunk to look at. But the contents aren't," she declared, with a wholesale massacre of grammar. "And now how the mischief am I to scuttle down to table d'hôte in seventeen minutes?"

She strode toward the bell to summon the chambermaid, when a vagrant fancy brought her to a halt, with a merry but daring expression in her handsome Irish blue eyes.

"By Jupiter! What fun it would be!" broke from her lips irresistibly. "What an ecstatic lark! Not a soul knows me here, and this time to-morrow I shall be a hundred miles on my way home by the Dominion. Why should I not chance it? Who's to find out? And oh! what copy it would make!"

* * * * *

The great function of dinner was in full progress in the magnificent table d'hôte salon of the Chateau Frontenac, as a handsome but foppish looking boy entered and stood vaguely gazing round the crowded tables with a cool self-assurance. He gave the impression of being one of stiff-starched, ultra-conceited masher youths, whom the average man of the world feels inclined to kick at sight. Fastidiously stuffing his silk handkerchief into his sleeve, and with his chin very high in the air, he strolled towards a vacant seat and was about to appropriate it, when the head waiter interposed with the notification that it was engaged and conducted him to a small, remote table, where, to his obvious disgust, he was placed next to the only occupant, an individual in tweed travelling suit, who looked like a sparrow amidst swallows.

The boy frowned, flicked out his coat tails, drew his chair under him and leisurely proceeded to unfold his serviette, craning his head as he did so to survey the visitors. Then he ran his hand daintily through his hair, cast a haughty glance at his neighbour, elevated his eyebrows in marked disapproval of his unconventional costume and applied himself with an ineffable expression to a study of the menu card.

"Aw—any sort of soup," was his order, "and—aw—bottle of champagne."

The man in tweed glanced at him, and resumed the section of his mullet with the freezing air of insularity Englishmen affect among strangers.

The bumptious boy absorbed his soup with exaggerated precaution against soiling his immaculate and expansive shirt-front and ostentatious applications of his serviette to his upper lip—a quite superfluous ceremony.

Then he revived himself with a critical sip at his champagne, scowled, filled up his glass, and turning to the man in tweed, so far descended from his pedestal of conceit as to observe:

"Beastly day."

"Foggy," was the laconic reply. He was a good-looking man, with a large moustache, and pleasant grey eyes.

"Stopping long?" drawled the boy.

"Can't say."

"Shocking bad cooking I call it," complained the boy, pushing his plate away peevishly.

"Do you? I call it uncommonly good," contradicted the man, with imperturbable calm.

The boy elevated his chin stiffly over his cut-throat collar, turned his head like an automaton, and regarded the man with supercilious surprise. "By jove, you're jolly easy to please. It's the worst I've tasted in my voyage round the world!"

The man looked up, a rebuke evidently hovering on his lips. But it dissolved as his glance fell on the conceited youngster, who apparently unconscious of his impertinence, was picking at an imaginary moustache, and spoiling his good looks with his abominable affectation. There was nothing to be gained by breaking this butterfly on a wheel, and the man contented himself with a survey of contemptuous pity, until his eyes happened to be arrested by the boy's opal shirt stud.

"Wine rank gooseberry," criticised the boy, choking over a too hasty gulp of his champagne.

You won't forget to get a new reader, will you?

"Did you get a better brand at school?" asked the man, with quiet sarcasm.

"I do not follow the drift of your observation," replied the boy haughtily, presenting the full and overpowering expanse of his shirt front to crush his neighbour.

The man was not intimidated. "No drift in it," he said coolly, as he bent forward and stared critically into the white field of linen, which caused the boy to repeat the ceremony of using his serviette.

There was a pause, and the boy leant languidly back, his hands buried deep in his pockets, and on his face a blasé air of being profoundly bored.

A couple of courses passed without remark. The boy sipped constantly at his champagne, and investigated all the people within view. At last he spoke.

"Not a bad-looking girl over there. The one in pink crêpon. Next the old ruin in grey."

The man glanced in the direction and grunted.

"Pity mothers are such fools as to parade daughters themselves. Ought to hire decent-looking women to show them off. Such a handicap to a girl when a fellow can tot up what she is likely to total. Puts a fellow off, don't you know. Now that girl, by herself——"

"Yes."

"Well—she's tolerably decent. Crumby, I call her. But I bet my boots she'll bake into crust, like the old mother."

"Supposing the elder lady is not her mother."

"Suppose rubbish! Look at the faces."

"Look at the facts."

"Hullo! Do you know them?"

"Slightly."

"Oh, I say, sorry I spoke. Awfully mortified, old chap. Hope I said nothing to wound your feelings."

"Don't distress yourself."

The boy puckered his handsome face. "But I really am awfully sorry. Wouldn't have done it for worlds. Makes a man feel such an accidental cad, don't you know."

Beneath the surface of conceit he was genuinely distressed.

"The best way to avoid that unenviable misfortune," hinted the man gravely, "is to treat every strange lady with the respect due to her sex—as if she were your mother or sister."

"Or your fiancée," sniggered the incorrigible youth.

"Or your——" The man stopped suddenly, his eyes focussed on the boy's shirt front, which was again presented with an air of patronising condescension.

The scrutiny seemed to disconcert the boy, who lifted his glass of champagne hurriedly and drained it at a gulp. By the way it made his cheeks flush and his eyes wink he seemed susceptible to the influence of what he had so disparagingly condemned as "rank gooseberry." With a sort of bravado he turned boldly to the man and laughed out:

"Well, luck to the ladies, anyhow! 'Pon my word, this fizz is a better tipple than I gave it credit for at first."

"I see you're a judge of champagne," said the man, with an amused twinkle.

"So, so," admitted the boy, falling back into his languid conceit. "Every fellow knows what suits him best. The best judge is the man who judges best—for himself. Let me choose my own wine, my own weed, and my own wife, and, by Jupiter, I won't go far wrong. But I say"—he branched off a little hilariously—"if you know that pretty girl, why the dickens didn't you get planted next to her at dinner? Hang me, if I'd only had such a chance——" and he shot his cuff and fondled his chin with the self-satisfied air of a coxcomb.

"I'm not exactly dressed to dine with ladies."

"No, by gad—no more you are! Rather wondered how you could face the music in that slump," assented the boy, impudently. "Makes a fellow feel so beastly out of it."

"No one notices a traveller," said the man, "and I hope to be off by the Dominion to-morrow."

The boy paused, hastily poured himself out another glass of champagne, gulped it down, and pushed his chair back.

"Confound it, I can't stand these long, dull dinners," he ejaculated, with unabashed effrontery. "So insipid and slow! I'm off to whiff a cigarette. Ta, ta!" and with a cool nod of his head he rose and sauntered out.

No sooner had he reached the hall than he quickened his pace, when, to his surprise, an arm was slipped through his.

It was the man in tweed.

"I think I'll join you, my young friend," and without more ado he gently but firmly guided the boy into the smoking-room. "Try one of my cigars," he added, as he closed the door.

"Oh, thanks. You're awfully kind. But I never whiff anything except a cigarette after dinner. Where's my case, I wonder?" He was diving awkwardly into his tail pocket with a single hand. "Hang it. I must have left it in my room. I'll go and fetch it."

"No, no," interposed the man. "I insist upon your trying one of my cigars. I should like to have your opinion. 'Wine, weeds, and a wife'—wasn't it?—you don't go wrong about?"—and with a good-natured perseverance the man forced a cigar into the boy's unwilling hand and held a lighted match for him.

"Come, there's a comfortable lounge over there," went on the man, linking his arm into the boy's again and leading him to one of the big bay windows; "ah—and here's the coffee."

"What number, sir?" asked the waiter.

"What number? Oh, I say. I never remember numbers, you know," declared the boy.

"What name, sir?"

The boy blew a hasty cloud of smoke from his cigar and plunging his hand into his pocket drew out—a lady's purse.

"I'll pay for the coffee," he said, handing the waiter a dollar. "Never mind the change," and he flurriedly crammed the purse back into his pocket.

The incident was not lost on the man in tweed, whose grey eyes were fixed curiously on the boy, in whom conceit had given way to a certain air of confusion.

"So you never remember numbers?" observed the man.

"Never could—except, ha, ha—Number One," answered the boy with a sickly grin.

"Ever find yourself in the wrong box?" asked the man.

The boy had no reply for this, but fidgetting about, crossing and recrossing his legs nervously, and continually shifting his position. To add to his discomfiture his socks had wrinkled down over his shoes, and he had to stoop and pull them up, displaying a rather uncommon orange and grey pattern. The man in tweed took deliberate observation of them, and then bent forward, and fixing his gaze on the boy's shirt front, asked him casually:

"How do you find the cigar?"

"Oh, uncommonly good," declared the boy, his pale cheeks contradicting his commendation, as he held it out at arm's length and pretended to admire the ash. "But it's a little too strong for me. In fact, I think I'll run up and fetch my own cigarette case. I'll be back directly." And he rose rather unsteadily to his feet.

The man rose, too, with a purpose in his features.

"Pardon me, but that's an unusually fine opal stud you are wearing," and he suddenly hooked his finger into the boy's shirt front to better expose the stone.

The boy sprang back, his face aflame.

"I only wanted to examine the stud," said the man quietly.

"Oh! All right. But hold on half a minute, old fellow. Fact is, that strong cigar you pressed on me has rather upset me. I can't wait. Feel queer and foggy. I'll send you down the stud to examine at your leisure. Sorry to have to leave you so unceremoniously, but—but——"

"Enough," said the man, in a low, meaning voice. "No more of this acting. Follow me."

"Follow you?" cried the boy, indignantly, drawing back and raising his voice. "I'll—I'll see you hung first." And he quickly whipped round for the door.

"Don't make a scene," whispered the man, catching him up. "It's no good. You are fairly caught. Be sensible and come along quietly."

"You brute!" hissed the boy between his teeth, "you must be drunk to behave like this. Hands off! I'll call the manager if you attempt to molest me."

"Excellent. We'll both call on the manager," said the man, as without further ceremony he gripped the boy's arm and marched him to the office.

"Where are you taking me to?" faltered the boy.

"To be searched."

"Searched, you scoundrel? How can you suggest such an awful thing?" choked the boy, struggling to free himself.

"Nothing awful about it—except your cheek. Come —in you go."

The manager jumped up from the table where he was writing. "Major Wargrave! Anything wrong, sir?"

"Yes," said the major sternly; "I've tracked the thief. With a lady's purse in his pocket, into the bargain. Search him and you'll see for yourself."

"Oh, you brute!" burst out the boy, blushing scarlet and retreating into a corner. "You cowardly, ungentlemanly cad to suggest such a thing."

"See here, you rogue," said the manager curtly. "Better own up and shell out and go off quietly to the police-station. We don't want any fuss in the hotel."

"What have I done?" demanded the boy. "How dare you treat me like this? Let me go at once!" and he made a frantic dash for the door.

"What have you done? Well, I never!" cried the manager, and he slipped in front of the door and bolted it.

"The lady's purse," observed Major Wargrave, "is in his right hand trousers pocket."

The manager approached the boy with the evident intention of abstracting it, when a blow, delivered with excellent aim and considerable force, sent him back.

Major Wargrave closed with the boy. "Is that how the cock fights! Well, you've only yourself to blame, you young cub, if you get roughly handled." And seizing one of the boy's wrists he twisted the arm behind his back. "Now, Mr. Moore, get the purse from his pocket, and slip the opal stud out of his shirt front."

The boy gave a shriek. "Don't touch me—don't touch me!" he implored piteously. "There is a mistake. I'll confess all!" The ring of abject terror and horror in his voice induced the major to loosen his hold.

"Well, then—confess," he said briefly. "And be quick about it."

The boy turned pale and panting. When at last he did speak his whole manner had changed, and with it his character.

"And you call yourself a gentleman to take advantage of a girl like this?"

"A girl!" cried the major, falling back confounded.

"As if you didn't know!"

"I never dreamt of such a thing."

"You staring brute! You did know. Or you would not have stared at me as you did."

"Stared at you!" protested the major, blushing now as badly as the quondam boy. "I was not staring at you. I was staring at my opal stud. It was in my portmanteau, which is missing. I saw you wearing it. You wouldn't give your number. You wouldn't give your name. You grew white and uncomfortable——"

"White and uncomfortable!" cried the quondam boy with a stamp of his foot. "Were not your eyes enough to make me so? Not to mention that vile cigar. But I wasn't going to be out-tricked by you."

"Oh—ah—yes—the cigar. Of course. But the socks. I recognised them. Indeed, I seem to recognise the whole outfit now. That was why I asked you to let me examine the stud—a trinket I value very much."

"There! Take your stud! Do you think I wanted to steal it? Do I look like a thief?"

A pair of handsome eyes flashed sparks of fire at the major as with agitated fingers the stud was torn out, and flung down on the table. "And now, sir, be pleased to make way for me."

"Oh, no. Not just yet," interposed the manager. "I've come across many hotel sharps, but this is something quite new in hotel sniping. We must have an explanation. Why are you dressed in man's clothes? Are they Major Wargrave's?"

The quondam boy shrank back with face hidden.

"Who are you? How came you to sneak into the hotel?"

"Sneak into the hotel, you wretch! I am staying here. I am Miss West. Your porter brought the wrong trunk to my room, and left it there in my absence. A black one, with the initials 'C. W.' on it—the facsimile of mine. And one of my keys fitted it."

The manager glanced at the ledger. "Yes. There's a Clare West in No. 46. Are you Clare West?"

"Brute! I'm Miss West. Haven't I told you so?"

"Telling is not enough. You must explain this extraordinary conduct. And, if your story is satisfactory, leave the hotel instantly. We can't have women masquerading in men's clothes in the Chateau Frontenac."

Clare West gave a shudder. "I am not humiliated enough, but you must insult me. Oh, sir" (to the major) "you are very chivalrous, who preached chivalry to me at dinner!" Then a sudden resolution stormed and animated her features. Drawing herself erect she faced the two men. "You shall have your explanation. I only arrived this afternoon late. There was an hour to spare, and I went out, but was caught in the storm and soaked through. When I returned to my room there was a trunk there exactly like mine. I opened it in the belief it was. When I found out the mistake that had been made I was going to ring for the chambermaid when a—a mad freak entered my head to go down to table d'hôte as a man, and get copy for a letter. I am the round-the-world correspondent of the Go-Ahead Girl, and I thought—I thought it would make such a—a striking and o-original article, and be such—such—fun!" At which juncture, to illustrate humour of the situation, Clare West broke down and abandoned herself to tears.

The manager whistled incredulously, but a grim look from Major Wargrave silenced him.

"Miss West," said the major in a grave, kind voice, "I beg your pardon. Believe me, I laboured under an entire misapprehension. You acted your part so cleverly I mistook you for a boy. And now, if you'll slip quietly back to your room, I will cover your return, if—if you will let me."

* * * * *

It was inevitable they should meet on the Royal mail steamer Dominion, on which they had both booked passages. Most girls would have forfeited theirs a thousand times rather than subjected themselves to such a meeting, but Clare West (except perhaps for one swift glance of gratitude from her tear-washed eyes on the stairs) had not thanked Major Wargrave, and she persuaded herself that to sail in the same steamer, much as she dreaded it, would be a proper act of penance on her part. He had no suspicion she was to be a fellow passenger, and when, as the ship was passing the island of Anticosti, a lady addressed him by name, he was at a loss for a moment to recognise her.

"I am Miss West," she said, "and I want to apologise and say how sorry I am, and—and to thank you for your chivalry."

"Don't—please don't," he said, with a pained look in his face. "I haven't forgiven myself yet for being such a brute as to twist your arm."

"And so I really took you in?" she returned, with a little gleam of satisfaction.

"You took Mr. Moore in, who is as sharp as I'm stupid."

"And as cruel as you are kind," added Clare emphatically.

Somehow that audaciously conceived letter, "At Table d'hôte in Trousers," never made its appearance in the Go-Ahead Girl. In point of fact, it was never written, although there was an abundance of crisp material for copy. The article that took its place was headed "Nearing Home." It was voted sickly sentimental by the more robust readers of the journal, who wondered what had happened to "C. W."—generally so smart and cynical with her pen.

When it appeared in print, however, the familiar initials no longer stood for Clare West, and Major Wargrave's opal guarded a wedding ring on her finger.

CHAPTER I.

IN THE WELLAM WOODS.

"CAN you tell me the way to the Mains, my good fellow—Mrs. Brabazon's place, I mean; it's on the river somewhere, isn't it?"

The person addressed was a tall servant in a quiet livery, who, aided by a subordinate, was setting forth, on a smooth stretch of greensward, the conveniences for a substantial cold lunch—knives, forks, serviettes, and wine-glasses. On the top of the large wicker basket which had contained these accessories was displayed, under a protecting gauze, an inviting array of viands—galantine of chicken, salad, bear's ham, oyster patties, and a seductive Strasbourg pie, flanked by a dish of trifle and an assortment of jellies. Close by a magnum of champagne poked its neck from the depths of a cooler, and some bottles of hock and claret kept it in countenance.

The man who had spoken twitched his cuffs nervously under the sleeves of his coat; his linen was soiled and ragged. Nor was the rest of his costume less suggestive of poverty. He wore a silk hat, it is true, but the once rakish shape of that article was sorely battered, and its brim saturated with grease. A dingy four-in-hand tie, a "flash" diamond pin, and a threadbare morning suit completed the querist's attire. His face was purple and bloated, and his mouth betrayed both impudence and astuteness.

The smart servant looked suspiciously at his questioner. "I'm Mrs. Brabazon's first footman," he said with lofty self-possession; "and these here woods is her private property. The road from the station leads to the lodge gates, as anyone could have told you."

The other smiled deprecatingly. "So I believe," he admitted; "I was trying for a short cut. But I find I've forgotten the lie of the land—I was ten years younger when I was last in these regions. How is Mrs. Brabazon—and—and the girls?"

"They enjoy excellent 'ealth," was the dignified reply; "but you'll excuse me, this is the luncheon place for the shooting party, and, being her own estate, Mrs. Brabazon won't expect to see strangers hanging around. If you cross the bridge yonder and keep the straight path, you'll get into the high road near the Mains."

"All right," said the wearer of the shabby garments and the disreputable hat; "I'm off. But may I ask if—if Miss Chisholm will be among those partaking of this—ahem!—elegant refection?"

"She will," retorted the footman; "she come up with us in the launch just now, not being, you may say, a sportswoman like Miss Olive and Mrs. Brabazon, as have been out with the guns all the morning, and shooting themselves. And nice and sharp-set the lot of them'll be; so I'll thank you to leave me to my work."

Shrugging his shoulders the inquirer lounged away and disappeared over the indicated bridge, a rustic structure of poles and split boughs. On the further side he swerved suddenly and crouched down, behind a mass of willows on the upper bank of the stream. In front of him was the edge of the Wellam Woods and the glade on whose carpet of emerald turf there gleamed the white damask and shining cutlery of Mrs. Brabazon's shooting luncheon.

Between, the brown waters of the Wellam slipped by, carrying on their ruffled surface the withered leaves of yet another summer. Warm as was the air, splendid as were the rustling forest trees, the month was September. A day of swift and ruthless reckoning had dawned for the partridges in the rolling turnip-fields that bordered for a full mile the south bank of the river.

While he gazed, a twig crackled hard by, and he shrank into his species of bower, to see saunter past a youthful Briton, handsome, bronzed, muscular, his gun under his arm and his eyes bent upon his companion, a girl in a simple flowered muslin and a big straw piled with roses. They moved on towards the bridge, laughing and chattering.

"You are an incorrigible sentimentalist, Miss Chisholm," reached the ear of the man behind the willows; "but there, I confess it is an unfashionable quality that seems to belong to a certain kind of girl."

"What sort of girl, Captain Lane?" was the gay inquiry; "'a certain kind' is terribly vague, it may hide a compliment or disguise an—well, the reverse."

Captain Lane bent his head and his firm tenor trembled a little as he murmured: "The sort of girl one's mother might have been, Miss Chisholm; the sort of girl that makes a fellow wish he'd tried to run straighter all his life; the sort of girl one can't chaff; the sort of girl that—that kiddies like to play with. Oh, Miss Chisholm, I'm a bad hand at stringing words together, but you know what I mean; the sort of girl that ought to have a sweet old name such—such as Nora."

They had stepped on the bridge now and were out of hearing, so far as the tenant of the willow copse was concerned. Nora Chisholm blushed and was about to descend in silence the wooden stairs at the extremity of the single rustic span, when her escort leapt down and offered her his strong palm for support. Nora leaned on it momentarily, but the warm colour grew in her cheeks.

"What a deal of flattery," she cried, "because I can't bear to kill the poor partridges and pheasants! Other people call me a coward and don't trouble to invent excuses for me."

"You need no better excuse than your own gentle heart," was the response; "why, I have been quite reluctant to pull a trigger this morning, just through your bringing me out yesterday and showing me that you knew more of the poor partridges than we who delight in slaughtering them. You are a born naturalist, Miss Chisholm."

"Indeed, I am no such thing," Nora assured him;

"I have only talked to the keepers, and crept about with a field-glass when all was quiet. But the birds and beasts got not to be afraid of me at last. That's why it hurts me to think of your cruel guns and dogs—no, the dogs aren't cruel, you teach them to hunt. But see, there is Mrs. Brabazon and Olive and Fanshawe with the lunch waiting to be popped into our mouths. Yes, and after come Sir George and the Admiral."

Captain Lane sighed as he broke off his tête-à-tête with Miss Chisholm to pass his gun to a keeper. Nora patted the dogs as they fawned upon her, whining with pleasure at the encounter.

"Ah, here you are, Nora!" exclaimed a good-humoured voice, whose owner was a plump, active woman of medium height and florid complexion. She was clad in a tweed shooting costume, and had that instant relinquished a double-barrelled sporting gun to an attendant. By her walked, or rather lounged, a fair girl with a proud, almost disdainful, cast of countenance and a fine figure, set off by her piquant dress, short skirt, and many-buttoned gaiters.

"Hope you enjoyed your dawdle, Nora," added the latter personage; "next time you can keep mamma with you. She's in shocking form—only got a couple of brace, and one bird the Admiral shot, for a thousand, though he says his got away, and, of course, mother swallowed the fib."

Mrs. Brabazon laughed jollily. "We can't all manage our twenty brace, my dear Olive," she retorted; "but if I can't shoot, I can eat, and I feel as famishing as the Admiral looks."

"I'll go and find you a comfortable seat," said Nora quickly, and ran off, glad to escape from the piercing scrutiny that Olive Brabazon had been levelling alternately at Captain Lane and herself. The gallant officer followed, intent on securing a position next her at lunch.

"My dear lady," observed the broad-chested, rubicund member of the shooting party whose expression Mrs. Brabazon had commented on. "I may or may not look hungry, but there is no question that I am. And so would Millard be, if Miss Olive hadn't spoiled his appetite by letting Lane load for her."

"S-s-sh!" pleaded Mrs. Brabazon, glancing at her daughter, who had left them to join the subject of this jovial reference. "Olive doesn't comprehend banter, Admiral, and really Sir George is most sensitive where she is involved. But Fanshawe is opening the wine, and Captain Lane has paired off with Nora, so Sir George will be happy for a while."

"But—will—will Olive?" queried Admiral Vallis, as he escorted Mrs. Brabazon towards the luncheon cloth; "she is quite smitten with Ernest Lane, though he is in tow of Miss Nora, if I'm not losing my eyesight."

"Don't!—don't spoil my lunch, Admiral!" cried his hostess, "the girls are trouble enough as it is, for Olive has a temper and Nora is as high-spirited as you please. Olive will make my life a burden if she thinks she has reason to be jealous of Nora, though why she should beats me, for Sir George is a fine figure of a man, and has twice Lane's fortune. But there's an end of it, Admiral, for I'm ravenous, and one can't talk family affairs at an al fresco lunch."

She reached the impromptu table, flung herself down on a convenient hillock, and called for a glass of claret. The Admiral devoted himself to providing for her comfort with the ardour of a boy. Sir George Millard studied him frequently from where he sat with Olive Brabazon; he was a stalwart country gentleman, to whose chivalrous character his blue orbs and grave yet kindly mouth bore witness.

"The Admiral retains his old tenderness for your mother," he said at length; "forgive the question, but do you suppose anything will come of it. It would be, in all respects, a most suitable match, except that it might divert your mother's attention somewhat from you. But you will be leaving the Mains one of these days. Flowers such as you must be plucked and worn, Miss Brabazon." And the speaker's tone was full of meaning.

"Mamma likes her liberty," snapped Olive evasively, picking a wishbone with her white teeth; "the Admiral has been her friend and confidant for years. I believe he is the only one besides her who—who knows all about Nora."

"Is there some secret, then?" asked Sir George, his blue eyes lingering affectionately upon Olive, too affectionately to fathom the grimace of irritation that had distorted it when she mentioned the name of Nora Chisholm.

"Certainly there is," he was told; "she isn't any relation to us—we have no Chisholms in our family. Ten years ago she came to the school where I was being educated. Mamma had sent her. From that day to this she has been treated as my sister. This is everything I know, and everything Nora will confess to knowing. She says that mamma forbade her to speak of her childhood to anyone, even me. Nora promised and she is the sort of girl that holds to her promises. As for me, I hate secrets."

Sir George raised his brows, heavy and slightly grey, like his moustaches. "Poor little Nora!" he reflected, "then she is alone in the world, and yet so bright, so gentle, and, I should imagine, so proud."

Olive tossed off her glass of champagne. "If I must listen to Nora's praises," she declared, "I shall talk to Captain Lane, he is the chief of her worshippers."

She changed her position with sullen grace, to interrupt the conversation between Ernest Lane and the girl at whom she had been sneering.

"I have been telling Sir George," she said, "what a mystery you are, Nora." There was a spiteful ring in her clear tones—Captain Lane detected it.

"Surely gossip must have done that long ago, Miss Brabazon," he answered sternly; "was it worth while to revive a problem which cannot but be painful to Miss Chisholm, though it is of no importance to those who value her for herself alone."

Olive drew back, her dark pupils blazing with anger. Under her vicious though smiling thrust Nora Chisholm had raised her head as if in resentment. But at Ernest Lane's reply she coloured and her bosom rose and fell tempestuously. Discomfited, Olive turned away, and Nora stole a grateful glance at her defender.

"Thank you," she murmured, "I didn't think you knew. And yet I—I hoped you did."

Captain Ernest Lane started. "You hoped," he repeated, beneath his breath. "Nora, you don't mean you were afraid it might make any diff—oh, I've no right to say that. But you must have seen that I care for you. I'm a fool to choose this place for speaking out, but mystery or no mystery, whatever you may be or whatever you have been, I love you, Nora, love you for what you are, the sweetest, cleverest, prettiest, dearest girl in the world."

Nora was pretending to be busy with her plate. But she flashed a look up at him that set the Captain's pulses beating like hammers. One of her small brown palms lay within Ernest Lane's reach, his fingers crept to it and clasped it. Nora Chisholm returned the clasp ever so lightly.

Neither of the lovers who had so impulsively arrived at an understanding evinced any further interest in the subject of luncheon. Their absorption in each other was remarked by all—by Mrs. Brabazon with anxiety, by Sir George Millard with satisfaction, by the Admiral with sly malice, by the servants with inquisitive sympathy, by Olive with a burning jealousy. Only she had observed that eager clasp which had revealed so much. She gnawed her lips in the bitterness of her misery; she had conceived an unreasoning passion for the young officer, a passion which he suspected as little as he reciprocated it.

Finally she sprang up, unable any further to endure the spectacle of Nora's happiness.

"Why do we ever lunch out!" she cried, "it is horribly uncomfortable, Admiral, mamma, Sir George, haven't you finished? It's no use asking Captain Lane and Nora—they have too much to talk about."

Mrs. Brabazon sighed, and, aided by the Admiral, abandoned her seat. "We go back with the launch, girls," she said, "and the men can have an hour or two of serious shooting, without a couple of amateurs to plague them. Though I suppose I oughtn't to call Olive an amateur after that twenty brace."

Colouring under Olive's direct attack, Nora had sprung lightly to her feet, avoiding Ernest Lane's offer to assist her. But her eyes met those of her lover and compensated him for her apparent coldness. The Admiral hallooed for the dogs and consulted with the keepers, while the other two men of the party loaded their guns.

Their hostess beckoned abruptly to her ally, the Admiral. "Take yourselves off," she ordered, "Olive is in a perfectly desperate mood about Lane and Nora—I must deal with her at once. The servants have to pack before the launch can leave, and we shall only waste your afternoon."

The Admiral bowed and bore off his companions tactfully. The three raised their hats, as they left the glade, followed by the dogs and the keepers.

Mrs. Brabazon turned to Nora. "Go and get a wrap from the launch, child," she said, "that muslin is far too thin for a north wind and an autumn day."

"You forget, mamma," intervened Olive bitterly, "Captain Lane admired it, and it must be worn at all costs."

Nora laughed. "Captain Lane only said," she retorted, "that it was charmingly old-fashioned. Would you be satisfied with a compliment of that sort?" And she ran down, singing, to the launch and the neighbouring back water. Mrs. Brabazon faced her daughter.

"Olive," she gasped, "have you lost all self-respect? Nora and you have grown up together, and yet because Captain Lane, who is nothing to you, chooses to show a fancy for her, you act like a tigress, or, what is the same species of animal, a jealous woman. Have you no dignity, no self-control?"

A twig cracked hard by, and he shrank into his species of bower to see saunter past a youthful Briton, his gun under his arm and his eyes bent upon his companion.

"Adventures of an Actress" still going strong.

Olive Brabazon's answer was anticipated. A hand was laid arrestingly on her mother's shoulder, and the owner of the Mains beheld, standing at her side, the broken-down silk-hatted personage whom at an earlier juncture her first footman had warned off out of the glade. During the last few seconds he had been descending, with circumspect steps, from his willow screen on the farther bank of the river.

Mrs. Brabazon stared at him astonished. "You," she faltered, "I thought you were dead."

"Dead be——!" swore the other. "I'm alive right enough, and I want my child—my child Nora. She's in her minority and you can't keep her from me, Mrs. Brabazon. I can prove I never deserted her; you as good as stole her, you know you did, and I could prosecute you for it. Now am I going to have her back, am I going to be offered terms, or am I going to be nasty and consult my solicitor?"

The woman presented with this problem looked round—the servants had left the glade and were carrying the provision basket to the launch. "Why—why do you claim her," she stammered, shrinking from his menace, "what use can Nora be to you?"

Her threatener grinned. "She can help to support her loving father," he said; "she's the very thing for the stage. I've been watching her while the lot of you fed. A pretty face, a bright eye, a fetching smile, and thoroughbred manners. Come on, am I to have her, or am I to be bought off?"

Olive interrupted the debate—a fierce exultation in her young countenance. "So this is Nora's father!" she whispered, "I'm glad of it. But what reason could you possibly have for adopting her—for stealing her, if he speaks the truth. Of course you'll let her go; we can't have a scandal."

Mrs. Brabazon made an undecided gesture. "You don't know what you ask," she muttered. "I must have time to think. See, the servants are returning; what shall I do?"

The shabby stranger answered her query. "I'll look you up at the Mains to-night," he said; "you can have five or six hours to make up your mind, which, being a woman's, it'll probably need. I don't want a wrestling match with your—ahem!—your menials. Au revoir."

He strolled away and crossed the bridge; the two footmen had seen him in parley with Mrs. Brabazon and surveyed his departing shape in utter amazement. Their mistress was wiping her fingers—moist with sudden perspiration—upon her lace handkerchief.

"The launch is ready, ma'am," she was informed. Mrs. Brabazon collected her scattered senses and linked her arm in that of her daughter.

"If you were different, Olive," she murmured, "my task would be easier, much easier." Then she added aloud, "tell the engineer we must reach home as quickly as possible."

"Yes, ma'am," answered Fanshawe, and, exchanging curious glances, the two servants followed her down to the waiting vessel.

CHAPTER II.

What Happened after Dark.

"Nora, dear, ask Captain Lane to spare you for a moment, I—I want your advice upon a little matter."

Ernest Lane rose from the palm-shaded corner where he sat with Nora Chisholm. Mrs. Brabazon—for it was she who had spoken—laid a plump white hand, the wrist of which was glittering with bracelets, upon the Captain's arm.

"You think me a nuisance, don't you, my dear fellow," she said, "but I don't suppose you are talking anything more important than natural history to Nora, and there is a choice which she must make at once if it is to be made at all. So you must pardon my carrying her off for a while."

"Certainly," answered the Captain, a trifle puzzled, and with a covert glance at Nora's bright face he sauntered off across the floor of the conservatory.

Mrs. Brabazon, too, looked at Nora—her own usually cheerful countenance was flushed and anxious, and she swept her black silk skirts round out of her way, to step closer to the girl who had been for so long her nominal daughter.

"You—you want me to make a choice. Mrs. Brabazon," ventured Nora; "what sort of choice—about a frock or—or a party?"

"You shall see," was the reply, "perhaps I ought to break it to you gently, but I haven't the heart. You've got a lot of pluck, Nora, though it's like mine—it won't keep. So I'm going to give you a shock, which I know you'll be equal to, providing I don't let you have time to think about it."

Thus chattering, as if to prevent any further questions on Nora's part, Mrs. Brabazon led her—a slender form in a gauzy evening gown of blue, through the winter garden to a small apartment between the conservatory and the hall, an apartment used both as a lounge and a museum. The Mains was a historic house, and in glass cases against the walls were pikes, swords, lances, daggers—armour and arms of a dozen periods.

The electric switches had been turned on, and in the glare of the pendants, his hat by him on a settee, lolled the person who, that morning, had accosted Mrs. Brabazon in the Wellam Woods.

Nora gazed at him, doubtful of his identity, yet vaguely alarmed. Suddenly the shabby figure started to its full height and with a melodramatic gesture, cried out: "Don't you know me, Nora, I am your father, Godfrey Chisholm!"

A frightened expression leapt into Nora's blue eyes, and she shrank towards Mrs. Brabazon. "I—I do remember you," she faltered, "years and years ago in a great dark house and up a lot of stairs, where I stayed with some poor people, you used to come and drink and swear, and—and say you wished I was dead."

Mrs. Brabazon drew the shivering girl into a protecting embrace, for Nora's cheeks were pale and her young tones strangely hesitating.

"Don't you be worried, dear," urged the elder woman, "he can do you no great harm now. But you're barely twenty, and the law allows him control of you till your majority. I'd fight him for you, but the truth is I didn't come by you quite straightforwardly. To forego his right to order you about for a year—until you're twenty-one—he asks ten thousand pounds, and as it happens I've put by ten thousand pounds for your dowry."

She patted Nora's fingers with tender sympathy, and regarded scornfully the other party to the interview.

"I needn't tell you that I'm not going to have you beggared by a piece of impudent bluff," pursued Mrs. Brabazon, "and as a law-suit would render you notorious, my advice is to go with him. If he neglects to maintain you or if he dares to treat you unkindly, communicate with my solicitors, and we will see how he appreciates the legal noose into which he has popped his head. Were I to bribe him into leaving you alone for the present, he could reappear in six months and repeat the process. So we will surrender you to him for a year, and much good may it do him. You shall meet with no harm, I'll take care of that."

Godfrey Chisholm scowled. "Don't think to stall me off that road, Mrs. Brabazon," he growled, "I'll give you the slip with the girl and see if you can discover our trail. You'll hardly expect me to believe you're fond of her when you won't stump up a little ready cash to keep her with you."

"Believe what you choose," he was advised, "you won't get me to part with Nora's dowry. Only the income from the estates is mine, and I'm a lavish spender. Olive is all right; she will step into the entail, so what I've saved I've saved for Nora. And she, and not you, shall have it. That's my decision."

"As you please," retorted Godfrey Chisholm; "so, Nora, you are my property at last. And, with Mrs. B.'s permission, we'll have a cosy talk—a pleasant tête-à-tête while your trunks are being packed."

He opened the door for Mrs. Brabazon to pass out, which she did, pausing to kiss Nora and whisper a sentence of consolation. The girl clung to her.

"I don't understand," murmured Nora bewilderingly, "why has he come back, and why, oh, why did you ever take me away from that terrible world if I must return to it again?"

The elder woman coloured. "Tut," she said under her breath, "a year is nothing, and I'll see you're comfortable. Credit me, darling, it is for the best." And, snatching another embrace, she slipped from the room.

Godfrey Chisholm put his hands in his trousers-pockets and confronted his daughter. "So you remember me," he snarled; "that's as well, you'll realise that I'm not to be played with. When you leave here to-night bring any jewellery and fal-lals you may have. We're going to be hard-up, deucedly hard-up. But I'll soon put you in the way of earning your own living and a trifle of mine, too."

Horrified by the savage determination of the visage that was thrust towards her, Nora recoiled, and, dropping into a seat, began to weep convulsively. At the height of her grief a voice reached her ear—it was that of Captain Ernest Lane. Another moment and he had entered the apartment.

"Well," he exclaimed, "and has Mrs. Brabazon finished with you. I saw that you had chosen this spot for your mysterious consultation—my darling!" he broke off, "what is the matter?" He stopped abruptly, to survey the insolent figure of Godfrey Chisholm.

"I—I beg your pardon," he said, addressing himself to Nora, "I thought you were alone. Shall I—shall I retire?"

Nora shook her head and brushed the blinding tears from her eyes. "No," she sobbed, "you had better know at once. Ernest, Captain Lane, this is my father—he was the terror of my childish life till Mrs. Brabazon rescued me, why she did so I never understood. But before that I did not guess what happiness meant. And now he demands that he shall resume his legal authority over me. I must go away with him. You see what he is; I am not fit for the great honour you offered me—you are free. I—I release you from your promise."

A change had come over Godfrey Chisholm, he had clapped his hat on, pulled it over his brows, and assumed the most slouching attitude he could contrive to evolve from his long limbs and square shoulders.

Ernest Lane looked at him and a light sprang into the young officer's countenance; it grew stern and commanding. He took a stride to Godfrey Chisholm and seized him by the collar.

"I see," he said harshly, "you want your legal rights over this innocent girl. Since you wish for law, you shall have it—military law. Godfrey Chisholm, I recognise you as James Seymour, otherwise 'Gentleman Jim,' of B Company, in the first battalion of the Wessex Regiment, who deserted in South Africa at the beginning of the war, after treacherously killing his senior major, whom he bore a grudge. What rights have you, Godfrey Chisholm, alias Seymour, except to be tried by court-martial, and—"

Ernest Lane stopped; after all, he was in the presence of the woman he loved, and the man before him was her father. He could not complete his question by indicating the dread fate of the soldier who murders his comrade or his superior officer.

Godfrey Chisholm turned to bay. "Curse you," he hissed, "it's a trap. But I'll break through it. Stand back, Captain Lane, or I shall do you a mischief."

The Captain hesitated; what would Nora think of him if he were the means of bringing her father to the fate which he so richly deserved. While he meditated, dragged one way by duty and another by affection, the deserter darted past him towards the window. There was a rattle of curtain-rings, a click as he unhasped the French casement, a footstep on the veranda, and Godfrey Chisholm was gone.

Not sorry to be saved the trouble of a decision, and willing to allow the deserter time to make good his escape, Ernest Lane turned to Nora and would have taken her into his arms. But she repulsed him tremulously.

"All is over between us, Ernest," she said, putting her hand to her throbbing bosom; "I was a nobody before—I am worse than a nobody now. I am the daughter of a deserter from your own regiment—a deserter, and, if I understood your terrible words, worse than a deserter. I wish I had never crossed your path."

"I won't give you up, Nora," answered her lover whitely. "I can't lose you, you are mine for ever."

"In heart, yes," murmured Nora pitifully, "but nothing more. Don't be cruel, dear," she begged. "I am doing what is right. You saved me from him; thank heaven you were able to save me. And I must save you, your position, your reputation."

She would have slipped by him but there was an interruption. A figure sprang in at the window—the figure of Godfrey Chisholm.

"A constable is guarding the gate," he gasped, closing the curtains behind him, "and there are others round the house. I've been spotted by the local police—curse my luck; who'd have thought it in this sleepy hole? But I won't be taken—I won't be taken!"

He was unnerved and his teeth were chattering. Ernest Lane glanced irresolutely from the deserter to his daughter, and back again from the girl to the man. Godfrey Chisholm's gaze was wandering about the room as if seeking a chance to escape; his eyes rested on one of the glass cases. It was full of small steel weapons—short swords and daggers of twenty patterns. The deserter—galvanised into life—bounded to it, dashed his foot through the protecting pane and caught down a dagger of the Tudor period, heavy-handled, razor-edged. Nora screamed and Ernest Lane flung himself upon the ex-soldier.

"Let me be, Captain," whispered Godfrey Chisholm; "it's for myself I want it. It's easier than the rope or the bullet, and less fuss. Don't grip me like that, you fool—curse you, I will do it."

Nora's cry had brought a group from the conservatory, Olive and Sir George, the Admiral and Mrs. Brabazon. Olive smiled ferociously; she recognised Godfrey Chisholm in the Captain's antagonist, and, satisfied that the exposure which she had so keenly desired was in progress, drew her yellow silk gown about her and studied the scene from the door.

The Admiral had leapt to Ernest Lane's assistance and, in the same moment, the window-curtains were flung wide, and a police-sergeant appeared, escorted by a couple of constables.

They were too late. The deserter, forcing himself free of his captor, poised the dagger and buried it in his heart. Nora covered her face and fainted—in Ernest Lane's arms.

* * * * *

That night, while the servants sat up to gossip nervously, while the Admiral and Sir George Millard smoked innumerable cigars in the conservatory, while Olive Brabazon brooded gloomily in her room—Godfrey Chisholm slept the last sleep in the apartment where he had so unexpectedly found means to take his own life. Upstairs, in her boudoir, Mrs. Brabazon was revealing to Nora and Ernest Lane the mystery which had united the dead man and her.

"My mother, poor soul, married again soon after my wedding," she said, "and this dangerous wastrel was your father, Nora. Not that you've a drop of his blood in your body, dear, you're my precious mother every inch of you. When you were a few years old she died—impoverished and miserable and in hiding, even from me. I lost sight of you and your father, and not till you were ten years old did I discover and practically kidnap you. As your father was paying for your maintenance—doubtless hoping to profit by you when you grew up—I was breaking the law, and so had to keep my conduct secret. Your father did suspect me and came down here on a furlough—he had joined the army by then; but I sent you away and put him off the scent. How he got on to it at last is more than I can tell. But you see, the truth of the mystery is this—that you are really my own dear little step-sister."

"And my future wife," added Captain Ernest Lane. Nora blushed and smiled, for the cloud had lifted from her sun and the sky of her young life was blue once more.

"By the way," remarked Mrs. Brabazon casually, some months after, "Sir George asked my permission this evening to put a certain question to Olive. You may be sure she will say 'Yes' when I tell her that Nora is to be Mrs. Lane so soon."

"And you will be left alone at the Mains," said Nora softly, stroking her newly-found sister's hand.

"Dear me!" exclaimed Mrs. Brabazon, "I shall actually have to marry the Admiral!"

BUDDAH'S RUBY.

The fact of the matter is, Herbert, that I daren't propose to your sister."

"Why, not, Charlie, old man?" queried Herbert Langdale. "Why not? Take my tip, old boy, and do; for—mark you, I am giving away a confidence—she loves you."

Charlie Woodleigh's face flushed with pleasure.

"Let us see if Frascati's champagne rivals that of the Savoy or 'Jimmy's,' and let us drink the health of yours cheerily on the strength of your statement. Waiter! Roederer '87, if you please." Then, as the waiter vanished to execute his order, he turned his head wearily to his friend, exclaiming: "It is useless for me to tell you how I love your sister. But, to be candid with you, Bert, there is an impediment in the way which debars my proposing."

"An impediment? What the dickens do you mean, man?" exclaimed Langdale in surprise, stopping eating to look scrutinisingly at his friend. "Explain yourself, Charlie. By jove, if you have been trifling with Ethel's feelings towards——. Sorry, old chap, I forgot that you are not a cad, for you love her every whit as much as she does you. Is——"

"Hush, old man. I'll tell you what the impediment is," interrupted Woodleigh hastily, glancing round the spacious hall. "Here comes the waiter with the champagne."

Frascati's was nearly empty, it being only just seven-thirty; thus it came about that Charlie Woodleigh, the reticent, came to talk of his private affairs in such a public place.

"You are perfectly right, old boy, when you say I am not such a cad as to trifle with Ethel's love," he said in a low voice, after the waiter had retired. "I am not. Yet at times I almost curse the day when you first introduced me to her. For her sake, old man, not for mine. Were I sure of living over this month, I——"

"Is there anything, save natural disease, to prevent your doing so?" queried Langdale in surprise.

"I am a marked man, I fear," muttered Woodleigh gloomily. "I am one of six, under ban of death."

"How the dickens did you get so?" exclaimed Herbert in amazement. "What arrant cant you're talking."

"It is neither cant nor bosh," replied Woodleigh gloomily; then he added a short laugh, "I wish to Heaven it were. Five years ago, as you know, I was with the 53rd out in the Punjaub, and I belonged to a click of six, comprising four lieutenants and two captains, viz., Wilson, Luic, myself, Anstruther, and Seymore-Leyton. A rowdier crew than us six it is difficult to imagine. We got into hot water at Madras, brought the regiment into bad odour at Lucknow, and our final freak at Simla caused me to sell my commission. Luic was the head of our clique, being ably seconded by Seymore-Leyton, and it was owing to the latter's suggestion that we determined to appropriate Buddah's ruby, and thus shatter the priest's boast for ever."

"What boast?"

"Ah, true, I forgot to tell you. In the environs of Simla there is a Buddist chapel, or rather temple, and on the idol's finger was a massive ring of rudely chased gold, in which a gigantic ruby was set. The boast was that two thousand years ago Buddah descended from the Heavens and placed this ring on the image's finger as a proof of his good favour, leaving a note to the effect that it should never be stolen. It was a mad freak, for the temple was always guarded by priests, but the said freak was proposed under the influence of fizz at mess one night. Someone dared us, and we carried the thing through, replacing the ring the following night.

"We thought we had managed the thing very cutely, for beyond the shindy which lasted for a day when the ring was discovered to be missing, nothing more of the matter was heard for some time. We divided the stakes, and talked big of daring anything. The ring business was forgotten till a year passed; then on the very night our escapade occurred Seymore-Leyton was discovered transfixed to the heart, with a dagh bearing the legend, 'Buddah the outraged needs him!'

"Detectives tried a year to elucidate the matter, but in vain. Once more the fatal date came round, and Anstruther failed to turn up at mess. Going to his bungalow, we found him lying on the verandah, his throat discoloured by purple finger marks. He was quite dead, a scroll pinned on his jacket by a thorn detailed enigmatically that:

"'Buddah the outraged needs him!'

"A gloom fell over our mess, bets were taken as to who next was doomed. I was the favourite, but Luic was discovered in the jungle killed by a tiger, the fatal scroll being tightly held in his hand. Wilson died by snake bite on the fatal day, Branstone expired from black jack at Aden also on the 8th of November, and each had a scroll beside them detailing that Buddah required their presence. Are you then surprised that I am superstitious enough to consider myself a doomed man?"

Langdale smiled awkwardly, then drank his champagne.

"Quite a romantic tale," he remarked at length.

"A sight too romantic to please me," muttered Woodleigh moodily.

"What is this mysterious date?"

"The 8th of November."

"To-day, in fact?"

"Precisely. If I live past twelve to night I may consider myself safe for a year, who knows, perhaps for life, for the emissary of death will only strike on the fatal date," replied Langdale gloomily. "You might do me a favour, old man, and stay the evening with me."

"Certainly. Buck up, old man, and be like me, not believing odd coincidences. You're nervous; pay the waiter, and let's go."

A few minutes later the two men found themselves on the pavement of Oxford Street. A drizzle had just commenced to fall, causing a dank feeling in the atmosphere. Woodleigh shivered as he glanced at the dripping pavement and the moisture-soaked mackintosh of the policeman, who stood beside one of the restaurant's electric lamp-posts.

"Cab!" cried Charlie peremptorily; and in obedience to the command the porter hailed a hansom from the neighbouring cab rank.

"Where to, sir?" queried the man.

"Gaiety!" replied Langdale.

A few moments later they were bowling rapidly towards the theatre.

"Beastly night!" muttered Woodleigh, lighting a cigarette and offering his companion one. "Somewhat rough having to wind up one's affairs at twenty-eight, but there's one consolation, the night is a fitting one in which to make my exit from the world."

"Nonsense!" murmured Langdale softly, endeavouring to light his cigarette and failing. "If you are going to be so pessimistical, I shall regret having come with you. Give me a light off yours. Thanks, awfully!"

The rest of the drive was passed in silence, broken once only by a smothered curse from Woodleigh, as the horse slipped on the greasy pavement in the Charing Cross Road.

The "Circus Girl" had commenced when they arrived as the Gaiety, a fact which did not trouble Charlie in the slightest. He was not comic operatically inclined that evening, his mind continually wandering to a certain Buddist temple in the environs of Simla.

He saw the piece from beginning to end with unseeing eyes, and at its close glanced at his watch. It was a quarter-past eleven.

"Three-quarters of an hour will decide my fate."

"Judge! Come to the bar and have a sherry cobler to steady your nerves before going home," replied Langton, gaily.

Woodleigh assented, and together they adjourned next door for the required refreshment.

At a quarter to twelve Langton suggested a move.

"All right, I'm game!" replied Woodleigh, with a ghost of a smile. "I'm somewhat peckish. I think I shall drop in at 'Jimmy's' for a snack. Will you come?"

"Certainly!" answered Herbert, flinging down a coin, then linking his arm through Woodleigh's he left the building, and hailed a passing hansom.

"Ten minutes more to safety!" exclaimed Woodleigh, leaning back in the cab. "By Jove, I am beginning to breathe again."

The rain was commencing to fall fairly fast, dropping with angry splashes against the roof and windows of the cab.

Suddenly the cab halted, and Langdale poked his stick up through the trap to enquire the cause.

"There's a horse down," replied the cabby. "One of Pickford's and the cart has bursted its axle. We shan't be a moment, sir, before we get on."

He civilly raised the glass in front to show his passengers the cause of the stoppage.

Langdale leaned out to get a clearer view, when suddenly he felt his arm gripped by Woodleigh.

"For God's sake, man, look at the off-side window!"

Langdale did as he was bid, and beheld the face of a Hindoo flattened against the window pane. The side lamp illumined its sinister features, the eyes danced with triumphant hate, its lips being drawn over its fang-like, betel-stained teeth in a kind of wolfish grin. It was an evil face, of a truly diabolical cast.

Involuntarily Langdale cowered back; the same instant a lank arm darted into the cab, to be instantly withdrawn, a smothered groan following the action.

"Done, by Jove!" gasped Woodleigh, sinking back into the cab. "Love——"

A shuddering gasp, and all was over. Horror-struck Langdale swung open the doors, and, indicating the Hindoo who was wriggling through the crowd, dashed into the road, shouting:

"Stop him!"

But like an eel he evaded all his would-be captors, and darted like a shot down Wellington Street.

"What is the matter, sir?" queried a constable, pushing his way toward the infuriated Langdale "Has he robbed you?"

"Robbed? No, worse than that; he has murdered my friend!"

A few constables by chance were luckily at hand to keep back the surging crowd, while the first policeman entered the hansom.

Langdale was right. The tiny hilt of a small dagger stuck out from Woodleigh's shirt front, whilst tied to its handle was a tiny scroll, on which ran the legend in Hindoo characters:

"Buddah the outraged needs him."

The GOLDEN DWARF

A Sensational Romance of To-Day.

By R. NORMAN SILVER.

Author of "A Keeper of Secrets," "Hate, the Destroyer," "A Daughter of Mystery," etc.

SYNOPSIS OF PREVIOUS CHAPTERS OF "GOLDEN DWARF."

"It is the body of Sir Christopher Dering!"

The words are spoken by a pretty girl—fair-haired, blue-eyed. She stands, horrified, by a grass-grown ditch in a country lane, out of which a great mastiff is climbing. The ditch contains the corpse of a stalwart man—a handkerchief bound over his mouth and nostrils.

Close to there is a strange figure, graceful, well-dressed, even handsome, but with the stature of a boy and the face of an adult. He carries a heavy dog-whip, and stares, fixedly, at the dead body just discovered by his mastiff, Cerberus.

The girl is Esther Carew; the dwarf, Otto Hare, the richest landowner in Derbyshire, and the mystery of Wyresdale, a village in that county. For the first time in fifteen years he has set foot in a public thoroughfare, to attract the attention of Esther, whom he has watched from his park.

Sir Christopher Dering was alive at seven o'clock the preceding day. He and his nephew, Felix, had quarrelled over the latter's love for Esther. Sir Christopher wanted Felix to make a good marriage—the birth of his little cousin Brian has put him out of the succession to the baronetcy. Felix is faithful to the penniless Esther Carew.

Much turns on the whereabouts of Felix on the night before. It appears that he was in Duchester, some miles off, whither he went on business, and spent a night at the theatre. Could he have killed the squire?

Felix in vain protests his innocence.

But the cloud of suspicion gathers around him. Meantime, the child Brian has been kidnapped, and Felix is suspected of this too. He discovers a riding whip with some peculiar marks upon it.

One day an old sailor named Foley is attacked by Otto Hare's dogs.

Kraft is summoned to dress the wound, and gives Foley a draught, which results in his death.

Judith Garland resumes her threats against Dering, who replies by saying he knows the guilty parties.

Geddes discovers from analysis that Kraft poisoned Foley, but is trapped and captured by unknown gaolers.

CHAPTER XXXVI.

THE LIGHT IN THE CRIMSON GLOBE.

ARCHIBALD GEDDES, launched into sudden darkness, and clutched, neck and elbows, by two pairs of powerful hands, remained passive, awaiting events. The great dogs on the further side of the small strong portal howled and bellowed alternately. His captors paid no heed to them, but exchanged a few rapid sentences in an alien tongue, which, from its guttural tones and half-familiar syllables, Geddes took to be German.

A moment elapsed while this council was being held, the chemist's assistant lying meantime, practically strangled, against a couple of tall bodies, one soft and bulky, the other hard and lean. Then a soft bandage was slipped across his eyes and Geddes felt himself thrust forward.

A few seconds later he experienced a curious sensation, as if he were being half hauled, half pushed, down some well-like aperture. This achieved, with the sound of disengaging locks and bars, he was thrust forward again.

As he went he contrived to swing an arm, as if accidentally—his fingers encountered an upright surface—it was rough, irregular, and cold to the touch. The Scotchman knew it for hewn rock.

Presently his guides halted and Geddes heard the click of a latch. Again he was urged on and sent staggering by a vigorous push, just as the noise of the latch came once more. He lurched, and fell on to some smooth, slightly warm, level. With a quick movement he dragged off the wrapping which blindfolded him—it seemed to be a silk handkerchief.

Archibald Geddes stared about him—he was in a black gloom, profound and apparently impenetrable, through which there yet stole, from a distant quarter, the dim throbbing he had heard on the exterior of the tower. In it was mingled an odd sound, resembling the hiss of an angry serpent, combined with the spitting of a fretful cat.

As he gazed into vacuity, the nothingness about him was flooded with light and he saw that he was in a narrow, yet high apartment, evidently a species of dungeon, rock-hewn, concreted, windowless, but heated by some invisible agency, and lighted by a single electric lamp in the centre of the high ceiling.

This lamp was not an incandescent—the variety usually employed in illuminating rooms of moderate size—but an arc, of rather diminutive proportions, yet considerable intensity. Its occasional sigh and splutter was the snake-like murmur he had noticed. But the globe that enclosed it was neither transparent nor opaline—as are generally the glass containers of electric lamps, it was clouded, and red, blood red. Archibald Geddes found himself in an atmosphere of crimson.

On either side of the lamp, which was quite out of reach, opened a couple of apertures, doubtless those of ventilators. The room was unfurnished, save for a shallow metal box, filled with soiled cotton-wool.

From this the Scotchman shrank instinctively—feeling as if it might contain some noxious animal or venomous serpent, to gratify whose deadly appetite he had been flung into that strange cell. But the peculiar receptacle was motionless and Geddes satisfied himself, by a rapid inspection, of its emptiness.

He was occupied by his investigations when the whine of a hinge brought him to the right-about. An elephantine figure had entered the place, a figure with small yellow eyes and spectacles which glittered in the crimson flare. Archibald Geddes' visitor was the foreign physician, Dr. Joseph Kraft.

The German surveyed his captive, pursing his thin lips and folding his arms. Almost concealed by his pink palms, Geddes caught the ominous glint of a revolver. Joseph Kraft was on his guard.

You won't forget to get a new reader, will you?

"So, my friend," he observed, "you are cursed with an instinct for prowling, and you come to me to be cured. Your confidence flatters my professional ability."

Geddes twisted his moustache. "They laugh best that laugh last," he retorted drily; "but allow me, as I am here, to compliment you on the skill and address with which you—ahem!—cured Foley, of his inquisitiveness."

Kraft grinned a satanic grin. "I did not guess you had probed me that deeply," he retorted; "you are an antagonist worthy of my steel."

"Of your bullet, you mean," corrected Geddes; "as for your poison—the one which finished Foley—I showed its effects to Inspector Brasher. A little white precipitate—a dead mouse; he was most interested. You see I sampled the poisoned mixture before it was too late."

The German's saffron pupils flashed. "You try my patience, Mr. Geddes," he said, "but I will do you the justice to make my proposition formally. It can be put into five words—a truce or a grave. Choose, my friend, the blue sky is a pretty thing and the little Fräulein at the High Street has lips like a freshly-blown rose. You are young, and death is for the old. Will you swear, in terms I shall dictate, to persecute me no more, and to pluck up any seeds of suspicion you have sown in the bull-mind of Brasher, or will you meet a fate which I promise you shall be no easy one?"

His teeth bared themselves to the gums as he spoke, and the red shimmer on his glasses lent his orbs the dilated fury of a wild beast's.

Archibald Geddes retreated to the wall. "I will not swear any such thing," he declared; "you are a dangerous villain, Dr. Kraft, and, to my knowledge, a callous murderer. Keep your distance from me, I, too, am armed!" And the Scotchman thrust a hand into his jacket-pocket.

Alarmed by the gesture, Joseph Kraft recoiled. Darting to the door, he drew it ajar and slid through it with surprising agility. The chemist's assistant laughed—in spite of himself.

The next second the smile faded from his face—the light in the crimson globe was dying away.

CHAPTER XXXVII.

"YOU SHALL SEE THE CHILD."

"You might send my horse to the Duchester Arms, Mr. Tarporley; tell them I am called to London, and ask them to keep him for a day or two. I must catch this train."

The station-master at the somnolent Duchester depôt looked inquiringly at Felix Dering's boots and spurs, and at the riding-whip he held.

"With pleasure, sir," was his answer; "have you a bag?—she'll be away in a minute."

"No, thanks," said Felix, "I'm taking an unexpected run up—on business." He spoke inattentively, his gaze—as he stood within the shelter of the tiny booking-hall—was fixed upon a couple conversing at some distance. One of the figures was tall and stout, the other spare and of medium height. They were Kraft and Neal Garland.

Mr. Tarporley, a trifle puzzled by Felix Dering's abstraction, returned to his professional duties, and shouted a word of stimulus to the porters at the luggage vans. The guard hurried to and fro, bustling the passengers into their compartments. Neal Garland entered a third, Joseph Kraft hovering about him with vigilant politeness.

"Hadn't you better step aboard, sir?" suggested the station-master, deferentially; "she's as good as off."

Felix nodded—he noticed that at the moment the clumsy frame of the German presented to him a view of its rear elevation. He pulled his hat over his brows, strode across the platform, and waving a farewell to the curious Mr. Tarporley, leapt into a carriage.

A discordant shriek rent the air, the guard was signalling to the driver of the engine. Felix drew the curtain a few inches and leant into the corner. The motion was scarcely completed when the train bore him—thus screened—past the bland and meditative visage of Joseph Kraft; it was wrinkled by a satisfied smile.

The express cleared the platform and traversed a bend; Felix Dering could see the front of the drowsy depôt, where his chestnut fidgeted in charge of a porter. Then the growing velocity of the train whisked him out of the line of sight, and the express, swerving to the south, the little town of Duchester disappeared.

At Derby Felix got out and stole along the crowded platform to the neighbourhood of the compartment tenanted by Neal Garland. Not till the train, with a volley of coughs, began to move, did Felix Dering stride to the door, near which he was lounging, and gain the compartment at a bound. Save for Neal it was empty, and that gentleman, feet up and hat off, lolled full-length on a seat.

Felix deposited himself unconcernedly on the opposite cushions; the express was settling to its monotonous clank and roar. For a second Neal did not abandon his newspaper. When he did it was to stare, astounded, at the vision before him.

"Mr. Neal Garland," said Felix; "I am, as you may or may not know, Felix Dering. I have tracked you from Wyresdale, which you left about three o'clock this afternoon, for the purpose of obtaining some sort of interview. As it happens, we find ourselves alone, and need not defer our talk until we reach London."

"You—you are in error," was the sullen retort; "I am not the person you name. You are misled by some fancied resemblance."

"Am I?" said Felix, "you shall be the judge. You were at Dering House several hours ago, and had a private consultation with Miss Judith Garland. From Dering House you proceeded to Wyresdale Park. Thence you were driven, by Mr. Otto Hare, to the Rosery, Mrs. Carew's residence. Dr. Kraft accompanied you. From the Rosery Dr. Kraft and you came on to Duchester in Mr. Hare's dog-cart, driven by his groom. En route you paid a visit to the Wheatsheaf Hotel. Twenty minutes back you bade adieu to Dr. Kraft at Duchester station."

"Spy!" hissed Neal Garland, and swinging round, darted his lean fingers towards his right boot. An instant more and Felix beheld a dark-blue, pointed rod of steel, the thickness of a stout straw, and having a slender wooden haft. It was a true stiletto, and Neal grasped it in practised fashion—the top of the haft in his palm, the cruel spike inclined upward and forward. A prick from it in liver or heart, and the recipient, though he may live for hours, is a dead man.

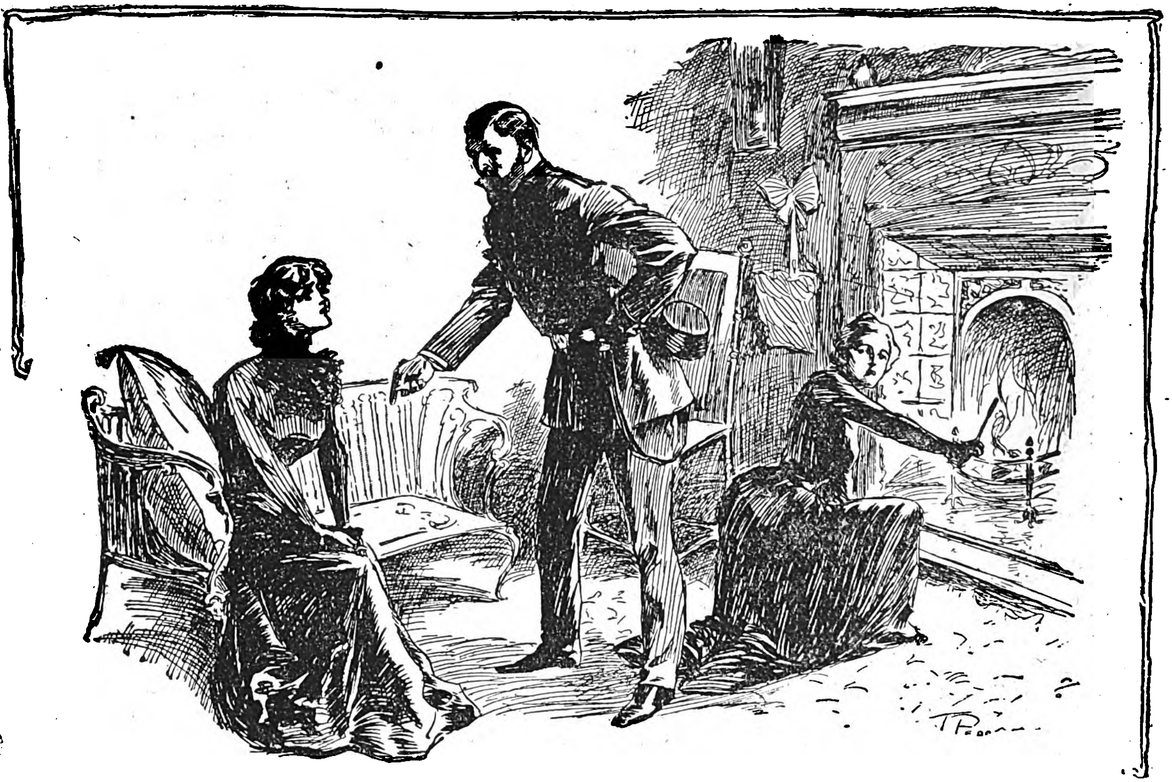
Felix lashed out with his riding-whip. All the force of a trained athlete went to the blow, and it fell upon Neal Garland's wrist. The stiletto tinkled to the floor of the compartment, and Felix planted a foot on it.

"Curse you, curse you, curse you!" yelped Neal, under his breath, and a flood of blasphemy poured form his lips as he clutched his injured arm. Felix kicked the stiletto under the bench and towered over his vanquished enemy.

"Sit down," he ordered, "and hear what I have to say to you. Rebel by speech or action and I will pull the communication-cord, show the guard your dastardly weapon, and give you in charge at St. Pancras."

Neal gnashed his teeth, but obeyed, his black orbs blazing, and his face livid. Felix mounted guard—a watchful sentinel, for much in addition to his own safety was at stake.

Try for our guinea post-card competition.



"I—I have a slight clue to report to your ladyship," he said, "not a great deal, but hopeful so far as it goes. It may ultimately get us on the track of poor little Sir Brian."

"What have you done with the child Brian?" he demanded, abruptly.

His prisoner sneered. "So you were eavesdropping, you low hound!" he commented.

"Chance brought me to the library," said Felix; "a happy chance, as it proved. Answer my question, if you do not wish to inspect an English gaol. What did you do with Sir Brian Dering after you took him from your sister?"

Neal smote his right fist angrily into his left hand. "A thousand furies tear her," he muttered; "so she has split! But I'll pay her, ay, and you, too, Dering—murderer as you are. I saw you at the cross-roads that night—my evidence may serve to give you a taste of gaol, if not of something worse."

"You saw me," retorted Felix Dering; "because I was there. Nor are you the single witness to the fact, which I have never specifically denied. I was not asked at the inquest if I had returned to Wyresdale that evening. The thought of—of others prevented my volunteering the information. But do not imagine I defend myself to you—you who were there, also, since you claim to have seen me."

"Perhaps," rejoined Neal, with a frightened grin, "perhaps you mean to insinuate that I committed the murder?"

"Not I," declared Felix; "I am aware that you did not—for I know who did. Though my knowledge does not exclude your having been an accessory. That, however, I am willing to waive. My uncle's death and its mysteries apart, will you tell me, or will you not, the whereabouts of the child Brian?"

The meagre features of Neal Garland contracted reflectively. He was in a tight place and he perceived it. "On terms, yes," he said.

Felix frowned. "I am not able to offer you any considerable bribe," was his objection; "yet if you can produce the child without delay, I will raise you by hook or by crook, a couple of hundred."

Neal gesticulated irritably. "I haven't time to wait for the bill-discounters," he replied; "I want nothing from you but an opportunity to sling my hook, to get out of England."

"Once I have the child," said Felix, "you shall be given that opportunity. But either I learn its whereabouts before we leave this carriage or, at the next station, I instruct the guard to wire for police to meet the train at St. Pancras. Your stiletto and that bruise made by my whip will be evidence enough to justify an arrest for inquiries. You should be best able to decide if those inquiries will be satisfactory, or the reverse."

A grimmer scowl than ever distorted Neal's countenance. "I can't tell you where the kid is," Felix was informed, "but when we reach London I'll take you to a party that can. And if that isn't sufficient you'll have to go without the brat till the stroke of doom. For you won't ever spot it on your own."

Felix weighed the proposition. He might be risking his life in accepting the ultimatum stated by Neal. He did not like the ring of the phrase "I'll take you." But there seemed no alternative—he fathomed the depth of the void which had swallowed up Brian. It might well be that neither professional nor amateur detective would trace the child unaided. Also it was worth venturing much to solve the enigma of his baby cousin's abduction—the abduction that slung so blightingly a shadow over his own honour. He sprang to a resolution.

"Adventures of an Actress" still going strong.

"Convince me I am at least on the track of the child," said Felix; "and that you have told me all you can and I will allow you twenty-four hours' grace before calling in the aid of the police."

Neal threw himself back at his ease. "Good!" he exclaimed; "so we're agreed." And he commenced to roll and light a cigarette.

Amazed, Felix contemplated the lolling form of the man who had passed so cooly from attempted violence to cynical indifference. He began to comprehend the singular blend of weakness, cunning, and ferocity that represented Neal Garland's character. Forewarned, he fell to weaving plans which might protect him against the treachery which he felt sure Neal was designing. Yet he determined to run every risk for the sake of the hapless child who—it was only too probable—had been delivered to some heartless or brutal custodian.

Not for an hour did he break the silence, and then it was to put a question. "Why did you take the child away?" he asked.

"Part of the game," snapped Neal; "we wanted to milk you of the Dering shekels, and we knew they wouldn't be yours while the kid was round. So we nipped the brat off to let you slip into the cash. When the cry had died down we should have provided proofs of its death and forced you to go to the courts for your inheritance. Then we'd have squared accounts. It was Judith's idea—pretty, don't you think?"

"Forced me, how?" inquired Felix Dering, with a shudder. He had evidently not been mistaken in his view of the woman who had pursued him so desperately, driven by an affection as fierce as it was unfeminine. She had lied to him throughout, subtly, ingeniously, temptingly. Thank heaven he had never wavered in his allegiance to Esther. Her girlish love and loyalty lent a terrible contrast to Judith's duplicity and passion.

Neal chuckled. "By threatening to accuse you of Sir Christopher's murder," was his reply: "I'd seen you at the cross-roads, and besides, we'd found that bit of your chain—a nasty piece of evidence, Mr. D., in spite of your 'I know who committed the crime.' But you've out-bluffed me, and I don't wish to deny it."

The speaker's mouth quivered, and his nostrils dilated. It was hard to say if his mood were the more humorous or vindictive. He devoted his attention to the rolling of countless cigarettes, and thus, with tobacco and occasional bursts of noiseless laughter, he beguiled the journey to the Metropolis.

At St. Pancras Felix instructed him to descend first and was thereby enabled to pick up the stiletto, which he had secured under his foot in readiness for the move. He slid it unobserved into his sleeve.

Neal evinced no desire to escape, but hailed a four-wheeler, entered it, thrust his hand out to give the driver an address in Pimlico, and sat back for Felix to join him in the vehicle.

When they were opposite one another, and the cab in motion, Neal prepared his twentieth cigarette.

"Excuse my chartering a four-wheel," he said, "but I knew it would be more soothing to you if you could keep me under observation—a hansom, in that respect, is less convenient than a growler."

As he lit the finished cigarette his shoulders shook with the species of suppressed merriment which had agitated him on the way south. Felix studied him, sombrely.

The cab drew up at the lodging-house of Mrs. Schwartz while the quarter after ten o'clock was still chiming from Westminster. The small servant opened to them. Neal paused on the pavement till Felix had paid the fare, then stalked up the steps, pushed the girl aside, and led Felix to the upper floor where Joseph Kraft had parleyed so effectively with Keturah Schwartz and her privileged lodger.

At the top of the flight Neal halted. "I've to talk over rather a shrewd sort of woman," he said, "and you'll have to let me tackle the job alone. This is the only exit to the room, as you can assure yourself by a peep in, and we're on the first storey, so I can't jump out. I suppose you would just as soon do sentry-go here and fix your eye on the mouse-trap."

He threw wide the door, and Felix, glancing in, beheld, dozing in a padded chair near a smoky lamp, an enormously fat woman, whose double chin caressed her ample bosom, and whose red cheeks glowed with perspiration. Neal had evidently been truthful—there were no further doors to the chamber. With a lifted finger, Neal himself tip-toed over the threshold and shut Felix Dering out.

For some while Felix listened to the murmur of voices, Neal's soft and persuasive, a second one fretful yet husky. The house above and beneath the landing where he stood was quiet, and the rattle of an infrequent cab without penetrated dimly to his ear. He clutched the stiletto that was hidden in his sleeve and waited.

At length the door swung inwards, and the fat woman rolled out. Not deigning to cast a glance upon him, she swept by and vanished into a room on the rear of the landing. Neal had followed her to the threshold of the parlour.

"Come in, Mr Dering," he said; "I've won—after a fight. If you'll make yourself comfortable in here for an hour or so, you shall see not only the child but the person in whose charge it is. When we have had a clear two days' grace, the kid shall be formally delivered to you—in Wyresdale; you yourself will leave London to-night. Those are the lowest terms Keturah will agree to, and I can't blame her caution."

Felix walked into the apartment, looking keenly about him for possible dangers, and noting casually the shabby comfort and close odour of the room. He chose his seat in a corner that commanded the whole chamber, and settled himself to watch every movement of his companion.

"As for me," went on Neal, "I've a letter or two to write. I shall skip as soon as you're satisfied. No more England for me. Hark!"

He raised his hand; the sound of a heavy and descending tread shook the stairs near to.

"Yes," he added; "that is Keturah—she's off to fetch Sir Brian Dering and his—his temporary guardian. There is a late Star, I see, and it may beguile your leisure while I work."

Neal's tone was polite, his bearing oddly sarcastic. He peered from the window as the shrill call of a cab-whistle sounded in the street.

"Keturah is taking a hansom," he announced; "now we shan't be long, and I must get to my correspondence."

He brought pen, ink, and paper and sat down to write busily. From time to time his shoulders were shaken by the species of restrained merriment that had so perplexed Felix in the train.

Felix Dering, ignoring the offer of an evening journal, maintained upon Neal Garland the determined scrutiny of a hawk. A finger and a thumb, thrust into his sleeve, kept the stiletto at hand. So the moments crept by.

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

"Of Course, the Scent is Cold."

"Will you step this way, please; her ladyship will see you in a moment."

Inspector Brasher removed his stiff peaked cap and crossed the hall towards the flight of carved oak stairs which led to the smaller rooms of Dering House. Keeping at the footman's heels, he reached a dainty boudoir, upholstered in blue and white, and looking on the quaint old terrace with its stone bulustrades. A bright fire cooed on the wide hearth, and a Persian kitten dozed in its basket at the end of the brass kerb. The prospect outside was brown and desolate—the autumn had set in still and raw.

Michael Brasher glanced about him, appreciating with characteristic deliberation, the elegance of his unwonted surroundings. As he gazed a pair of folding-doors at the further extremity of the apartment were opened, and Judith Garland appeared, supporting the unsteady figure and slow steps of Lady Dering.

Clad in black, deeply bordered with crape, Stella Dering seemed to have attained, in the last few months, a premature middle-age. She wore the widow's cap and bands, but even without them she would have been stamped by the impress of her crushing sorrow. Her cheeks were thin and her eyes dilated, while the dark hair on her temples was sown with silver threads that answered to the lines on her brow.

Mr. Brasher saluted respectfully. Judith aided her charge to a sofa near the hearth, and then passed, as though to fetch a cushion, before the stalwart inspector.

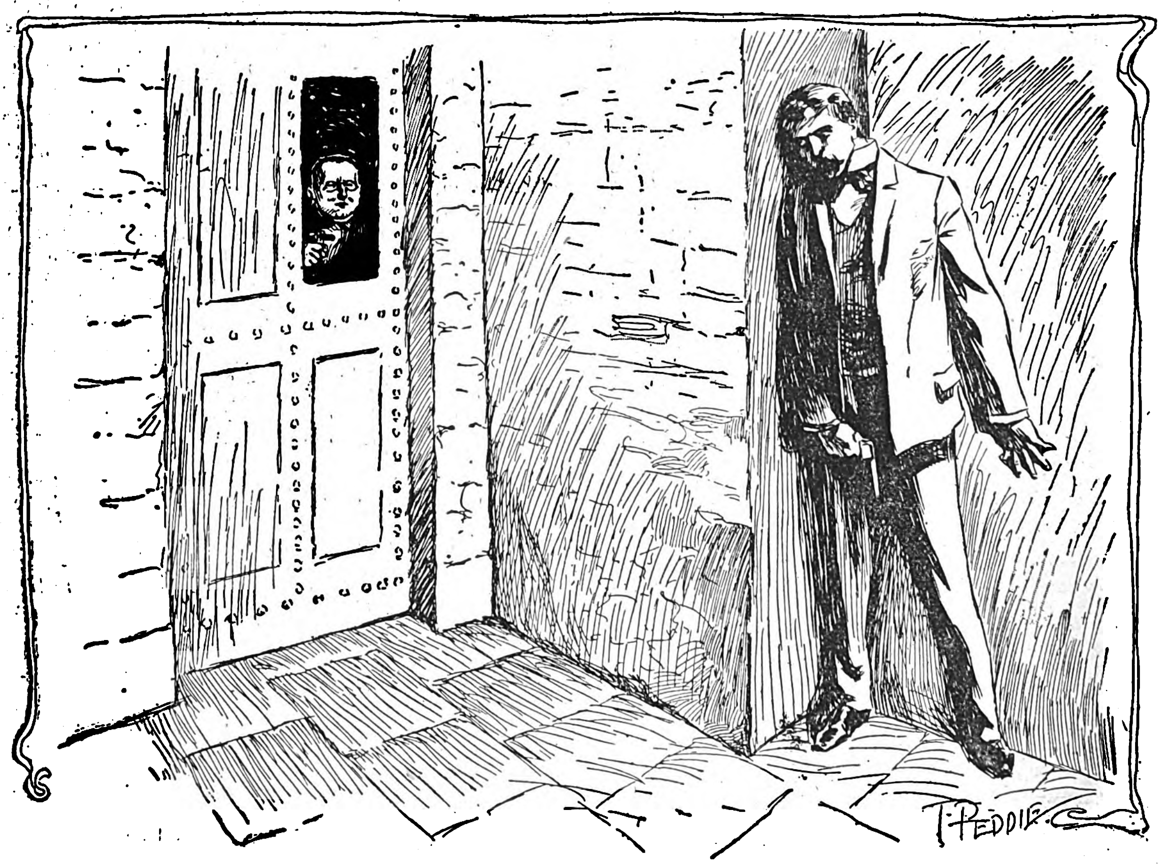
"Lady Dering is very hysterical," she murmured; "you will endeavour not to excite her?"

Michael Brasher's black pupils rested for a second upon Judith Garland, as if to take an inventory of her personal qualities. But he accepted silently her tacit hint, and drew close to Lady Dering's couch with a gentle stride and much gravity.

"I—I have a slight clue to report to your ladyship," he said; "not a great deal, but hopeful, so far as it goes. It may ultimately get us on the track of poor little Sir Brian."

Judith had stooped as though to poke the fire; she started almost imperceptibly and turned to hear the better. The Inspector had pulled out his fat note-book and referred to a page.

"You know, my lady," he pursued, "that for long enough, in adition to your own private detectives from London, we had a Scotland Yarder on the job. It's a remarkable thing, but no sooner does their hue and cry die down, than there develops a clue that would have been worth hundreds had we only stumbled upon it two months back."



At last there was a click at the door, and Geddes guessed that the panel had been opened. (See next week's instalment.)

You won't forget to get a new reader, will you?

Stella Dering sat up to listen, her fingers lacing themselves feverishly. "Yes, yes," she gasped, "what is it—what have you ascertained? Be quick, oh, be quick; you said it was hopeful."

Mr. Brasher assented. "So far as it carries us," he allowed, "but no more. This is it: Early on the morning of the day that Sir Brien was missed, a teamster from a distant farm, going to Derby with a load of turnips, noticed a man sitting in a hedgerow and feeding a child from a bag of biscuits. The child was pretty and genteel, its hair was fair, and its eyes, the teamster thought, blue. He distinctly heard it say, 'I do want to go home to mother.'"

Judith rose. "Upon my word, Inspector," she observed, "I cannot compliment you on your clue. Nor should I advise Lady Dering to build upon it."

Michael Brasher regarded her coolly and proceeded with his relation. "The teamster," he continued, "had a stone in his boot and had stopped to get it out. While thus engaged he also heard the child ask for a drink, and then add, 'Waters always brings me my milk when I wake.'"

Stella Dering fell on her knees at the feet of the Inspector. "It is my boy," he cried: "Waters was his nursery-maid. Take me to him, oh, take me to him! He asked for me, my little loving child. He may be hungry and thirsty now; let me go to him; it is killing me to think of it."

Brasher coughed and loosened his collar about his burly throat. Judith had hurried to soothe the distracted Lady Dering—her own face was blanched and her heart beating wildly.

"I can't tell you the rest, my lady," protested the Inspector, with rough kindness, "if you fluster yourself so. Not that there is much to tell. It's needed all this time for that idiot of a teamster to mention his experience to someone who was sufficiently smart to see that it might have a bearing on the disappearance of Sir Brian. Of course, the scent's cold, but I've circulated the description of the man—who was a thin, dark, shabby fellow, according to my teamster. The child was badly dressed in patched garments, but that was only to be expected, after our finding Sir Brian's nightgown in the Black Pool. It showed that his abductor was on the watch against any simple forms of identification."

Mr. Brasher closed his note-book and put it away. "The most irritating part of the business is that the ass of a teamster thinks he saw the same man in Wyresdale a day or two ago, but can't be certain. You must not be too sanguine, encouraging as it is to happen on a clue of any sort."

Stella Dering covered her face. "I can't bear the suspense," she moaned; "it's horrible, horrible!" She began to laugh. "How ridiculous," she cried; "I'm his mother and can't go to him. I will go to him; he wants me—do you understand?" Her laughter became a shrill scream, and she commenced to tremble. Judith rang the bell.

"You must leave us, Mr. Brasher," she said coldly; "Lady Dering is subject to these attacks."

Brasher bowed and went to the door. A maid met him, responding to the bell; Judith gave a rapid order, and the Inspector was piloted downstairs, through the hall, and ushered out into the grey September morning.

With a stolid official gait, Michael Brasher bent his course to the police depôt off the High Street. At Caleb Forester's shop he paused and walked in. Connie was behind the counter—a melancholy sentinel.

"Father is having his breakfast," she told her visitor; "he got up late. Do you want to see him?"

An Australian Marvel.

A discovery which was made a few years ago in Australia by an eminent scientist, Mr. Charles Forde, is now gradually revolutionising the old methods of dealing with liver and kidney ailments and disorders of the digestive system. After overcoming apparently insurmountable difficulties, he succeeded in obtaining a purely vegetable substance which has the peculiar property of acting on the human system in exactly the same way as nature's animal substance, bile. After much careful study he combined this substance with some eight other vegetable ingredients, and then concentrated the product so obtained until a suitable dose could be compressed into the space offered by a small bean. This medicine, made up in the form of a "bean for the bile," soon became widely known as "Bile Beans." Its effect on long-standing cases of indigestion, loss of appetite, weakness, nervous debility, palpitation, headache, constipation, piles, and female ailments and irregularities, is so wonderfully satisfactory that in Australia at the present time Charles Forde's Bile Beans for Biliousness is not only a household term, but is synonymous with the best home medicine known. For some time now, laboratories have been open in England, and already the power of this medicine has been so well proved that the public confidence in it is daily increasing. No less than 250,000 doses are taken daily in the provinces alone—a fact which of itself is adequate proof of the excellence of this medicine as a household remedy. Charles Forde's Bile Beans for Biliousness are not only a certain cure for the disorders mentioned above, but will be found invaluable in all cases of dizziness, bad breath, rheumatism, the weakening effects of influenza, and the numerous ailments which always attend a bad condition of the blood and digestive organs. For female ailments and irregularities they are a perfect boon. They are sold by all chemists at thirteenpence halfpenny and two shillings and ninepence per box. Should you be in ill-health and in doubt whether or not Bile Beans are suitable to your case, you may write, giving full particulars of your condition, to the Bile Bean Manufacturing Co., 119 London Wall, London, E.C., and you will be honestly answered, free of charge, whether or not Bile Beans have ever cured a case similar to your own. In order to allow all to test Bile Beans without being put to any expense, the proprietors will forward to all who write for same a free sample. The only conditions are that a penny stamp shall be enclosed to pay postage, and the name of this paper mentioned.

Short Stories That . . . . . . Make You Laugh.

We devote every week space in Short Stories to pithy, humorous anecdotes similar to those which appear in these columns. A prize of £1 1s. will be sent to the reader who submits the best storyette this week, and a Stereoscope to each of those whose attempts are used. The anecdotes may be either original or selected; in the latter case, the source MUST be stated. Attempts must reach the Storyette Editor, Short Stories Office, Henrietta Street, Strand, London, W.C., by Monday, September 23rd. Post-cards only, please. The prize of £1 1s. has been awarded this week to S. Chorlton, 227 Spa Road, Bolton, whose contribution is denoted by a star thus.*

JOBSON: "I have a claim against the Government. What lawyer would you advise me to retain?" Friend: "It doesn't matter whom you select, as long as he's young."

STUDENT under examination in physics. "What planets were known to the ancients?" "Well, sir, there were Venus and Jupiter, and"—after a pause—"I think the earth, but I'm not quite certain."

HE: "Get you a real sealskin? Really, my dear, you are asking too much." She: "Yes, that is so. This makes the third time I have asked you, when once ought to have been enough."

TYRO: "Well, now that you have heard my voice what do you think of it?" Teacher: "Wait, my dear sir, till I have had you bound over to keep the peace, and I shall be pleased to tell you."

AT a harvest home in Berkshire a dinner was given to the labourers on the farm. Opposite to one of the guests was a dish of green peas, which he took possession of, and with his knife, "shot" the entire contents on to his plate. One of his neighbours, who had watched the appropriation of the vegetables very carefully, picked up the pepper-box, screwed off the top, and emptied the whole of the pepper on to the peas, saying, "There, Bill, them what has the peas has the pepper."

IN a certain regiment at Aldershot, whilst falling in for commanding officer's parade, the colour-sergeant, who was an Irishman, proceeded to call the roll of his company prior to the officer inspecting it. Having done so, Pat, casting his eyes up and down the ranks, noticed a blank space in the supernumerary rank. Marching up to the officer and saluting, Pat exclaimed: "One N.C.O. absent, sorr." "Who is it?" inquired the officer. Pat then called the roll of N.C.O.'s and, having found them all present except himself, turned to the officer and smiling, said, "Shure, it's meshelf that is abshent, sorr."

* AN African millionaire recently invited to his Scotch shooting a party of friends whose familiarity with the gun was not excessive. He met his guests after they had been out for an hour or two, and asked them what sport they had had. "Oh, we have shot twenty brace," was the reply. "Twenty brace is not much," he said, "considering that I was assured that this was the best shooting in Scotland." "Well," was the answer, "we didn't exactly shoot anything, but Larkins, the game-keeper, did." He met his friends again an hour or two later, and asked them how they had got on. "Oh, we have shot nothing further," he was told. "How is that? Didn't Larkins shoot anything?" "No, but one of our party shot Larkins," was the response.

GRIMSBY: "So you are going to make a pianist of your son? Has he an ear for music?" Flimsby: "I don't know anything about his ear, but see what a head of hair he's got."

"WHY don't you go to our old restaurant any more?" "I left my overcoat there." "Well is that any reason why you should keep away?" "Ah, but I took a better one with me."

"ISABEL, I told you particularly not to tell Blanche that secret. and you went right off and told her." "Well, it's all your own fault, Eleanor; you put it into my head by telling me not to tell her."

"DOES your wife do much fancy work?" "Fancy work? She won't even let a porous plaster come into the house without crotcheting a border round it, and running a yellow ribbon through the holes."

"WHO'S this man who has grown so suddenly rich in your neighbourhood?" "Oh, that's Skayte, an ignorant sort of a fellow." "And the man who's bankrupt?" "That's Mazzles, the eminent authority on finance."

"TOMMY, how did you get all the back of your neck sunburnt?" "Pulling weeds in the garden." "But your hair is all wet, my son." "That's perspiration." "Your vest is wrong side out, too." "Put it on that way a-purpose." "And how does it happen, Tommy, dear, that you have got Jacky Howard's trousers on?" Tommy (after a long pause): "Mother, I cannot tell a lie! I've been a-swimming!"

A FATHER and mother, with six children, paid a visit to Margate recently. Wishing to spend a few days there they set about looking for lodgings. At length they came to a "Furnished room to let" notice. "Oh, yes," said the landlady, in answer to the father's inquiry, "it's here the room is to let, but there is only one bed in it." "Oh, that's all right," replied the father, "we are used to roughing it, the wife and children can sleep on the floor."

OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES enjoyed nothing so much as a clever retort, even if it happened to be at his own expense. One day, at an entertainment, he was seated near the refreshment table, and observed a little girl looking with longing eyes at the good things. With his invariable fondness for children he said, kindly: "Are you hungry, little girl?" "Yes, sir," was the reply: "Then why don't you take a sandwich?" "Because I haven't any fork." "Fingers were made before forks," said the doctor smilingly. The little girl looked up at him and replied to his delight: "Not my fingers."

A GOOD story comes from South Africa by the last mail, says a correspondent. It is related that after a recent engagement an Irish sergeant and a squad of men were told off to bury the dead, amongst whom were some of the enemy. As they were about to lift the body of a Boer the supposed corpse raised its head and assured the burial party that it was not dead. "Not dead, is it?" said the sergeant. "Well, I've got me orders to bury yez, and, be lad, it's buried yez shall be. Put him in, bhoys." Just at that moment the Colonel rode up, and, seeing what was going on, said: "Sergeant, what the devil do you mean by burying that man? He's not dead." "So he says," replied the sergeant, "but, colonel, ye knows that these Boers is sich blaggar-rdly liars that, be my sowl, yez can't belave a wor-rd they says."

How To Win a Fortune

Ambition, purpose, perseverance, and common sense are qualities essential to money-making, but there is a subtle influence which underlies them all, and which is bounded only by the limits of the world. It is Personal Magnetism. Money comes easily to those who possess Personal Magnetism. They never lack for friends and influence. They accomplish exactly what they start out to do. You can become personally magnetic if you will.

will tell you the quickest and best way. It will teach you how to get full control of yourself, and make the most of your natural abilities; how to influence and control others and make them act and think as you wish them to. It fully explains the hidden secrets of Personal Magnetism, Hypnotism, Magnetic Healing, etc., and shows how all diseases and bad habits may be quickly cured without the aid of drugs or medicines.

If you send for our free book to-day you will have taken one step towards the goal of success. If you follow its directions you will never want for a position; on the contrary, you will be sought after, courted, and admired; you will be able to win love and friendship; to advance along the highway of life with the firm tread of a master and attain a position where you can dictate and make the world acknowledge your inherent genius. The book we speak of we will send you absolutely free. Address a penny postal-card to

Mr. GEO. R. SIMS'
HAIR RENEWER

Called by him "TATCHO"

(Romany: "Genuine," "Good," "True.")

And why, pray, is the successful poet, playwright, and journalist an eminent authority on hair restorer? Eager for an explanation a Daily Mail representative sought out Mr. Sims. . . .

Now Mr. G. R. Sims, as many people know, is one of the busiest men in the kingdom, but hastily affixing his signature to a letter, he looked up and extended a characteristically cordial welcome. Then he said, "I will explain. I found that I was rapidly going bald. Not seriously, you understand, but the thinning out was sufficiently marked to set me thinking out a remedy. I went to two specialists, both of whom cheerfully assured me that I should be absolutely bald in two years.

"Then I discovered the preparation which is now placed upon the market. I found that I had hit upon a remedy capable of working wonders. Look at my hair now, isn't that convincing evidence of the value of my preparation?

"Ladies confirm my good opinion of it as a dressing for daily use. Mrs. Brown-Potter, whose beautiful hair is the admiration of the entire lady world, writes that she uses nothing but 'Tatcho.' There is nothing to prevent every woman from making her hair silken in texture and bountiful in volume, for she can obtain a bottle of 'Tatcho' now in every town or even village."

In order that the public may be able to test the superlative value of Mr. George R. Sims' discovery, the Company is issuing large 4/6 size test bottles post free for 1/10, under plain cover, one of which may be had on application. Please cut off the corner of this advertisement where marked and send with name and address, legibly written to the—

THE EDITOR'S PAGE.

I HAVE another pleasant surprise in store for you. By the greatest of good luck I have managed to secure a splendid serial story by Mr. Henry T. Johnson—perhaps the most enthralling that that extremely popular writer has ever written. You are doubtless all familiar with Mr. Johnson's work. He has written some of the best sensational novels of the past decade. Among the many stories that he has written are "The Pride of the Ring," "Found Guilty," and "Cruce Vincit."

Popular as these stories have been, I venture to think that which is the novel he has written for Short Stories, will eclipse them all in fascinating interest. The story will begin in a few weeks, and before it starts I shall have an opportunity of telling you more about it.

WEEK by week the adventures of Hazel Harlow increase in interest. This week the famous actress is in Belfast. Next week, Dublin will be the scene of her adventures.

ADVICE ON LOVE AND OTHER MATTERS.

(Replies to Correspondents.)

"PHYLLIS" has a young man that she does not love, but says if she parts with him she is bound to flirt about, as flirting is a weak point with her, and asks me to give her advice on the matter? Shame on you, "Phyllis"! It is girls like you who do more harm in the world than enough. The only advice I can give you is to stop flirting. As to its being a weak point with you, that is mere nonsense. How can girls expect men to respect and look up to them if they behave in so senseless a manner? Try and control yourself; be as happy and bright as you like, but know where to draw the line between flirting and fun.

"THELMA" says that she never manages to keep a friend for long, on account of her curt manner, which she feels sure arises mainly from the fear of being thought bold or forward. She knows a man, and both he and she are lonely, and yet they do not seem to get any further in their friendship. What can she do to make herself agreeable, and would it be forward on her part if she stopped and spoke to him when they were alone? Try and cultivate a pleasant manner, "Thelma." People always are apt to take offence at an abrupt way of speaking. I see no reason why you should not stop and speak to him; perhaps he feels awkward and, too, is reserved. Men like girls to take an interest in their pursuits, so try and find out what his are, and you will find it very easy to get on with him.

"ALINE" is nervous, and blushes painfully when addressed by a gentleman. There is one young fellow whom she really cares for, but when he speaks to her she behaves in a manner which she knows to be foolish. What is she to do? You are not often enough in the company of the other sex, "Aline." If you were to go out more your nervousness would soon wear off. Make a determined effort to keep up a conversation with him, and do not refuse to dance with him again.

"ADA" is very miserable and lonely, and wants to know what she can do to become friends again with a girl whom she is very fond of indeed. Four months ago they quarrelled, and ever since have behaved as mere acquaintances when they meet. Why do you hesitate to tell her how lonely you feel, "Ada"? She would surely be glad enough to be friends again. If you do not like to speak to her about it, write a nice letter, and she is sure to answer it. A friendship of years' standing is not a thing to be lightly broken. I am glad you like Short Stories.

"EVA" asks whether a girl sixteen years of age is too young to keep company with a young man two years older, and are four nights a week too often to go out with him? Sixteen is not very old, "Eva," but if you know your own mind and are old for your age I should not say it is too young. As to going out four nights a week, it would depend on what your circumstances are. If you are independent and live at home, and your duties do not interfere, I do not think seven times a week too often; but if you are in service you may think yourself lucky if you are allowed out twice a week. I am glad you like Short Stories.

THE ADVENTURES OF AN ACTRESS.

VIII.—The Queen of the Beggars.

By DONOVAN MART.

CHAPTER I.

It was a lovely autumn morning. Sackville Street, Dublin, the most beautiful thoroughfare of—as every patriotic Irishman avows—the most beautiful city in the world, was crowded with pedestrians of all sorts and conditions.

Among these were three persons, a man and two ladies, who attracted no small amount of attention from the other foot-passengers.

The reason for this was to be found in the fact that one of them was a woman pre-eminently beautiful, even in a city renowned for its types of feminine beauty as Dublin assuredly is.

Tall, graceful, with the complexion of a Hebe, it was small wonder that men and women turned to look admiringly at the wondrous charms of Hazel Harlow.

On either side of the young actress were her two friends and fellow-actors, Eric Monteith and Jenny Lovelace.

The Good Samaritan Company had duly arrived in Dublin and Belfast, and had already given their opening performance at the Queen's Theatre in Great Brunswick Street.

"What a beautiful city Dublin is," Hazel was saying. "I thought it always rained in Ireland, but to-day it is lovely, and the sky so blue it doesn't look as if it could ever rain again."

Eric laughed.

"I remember staying at a village called Malahide some years ago," he said, "and it rained twelve days out of sixteen. It was a pretty little place not far from here on the coast, and I had gone there for golf and boating. I think I had a good sample of Ireland's reputation for moisture."

They had just come opposite the Hotel Metropole. On the steps of the hotel portico two men were standing, the one a short, rather portly man, with a thick gold watch-chain and beringed fingers, who cast a leering glance at Hazel as she passed.

"That's the famous actress, Miss Harlow," he said in an audible aside to his companion, following up his remark by words too brutally coarse to be set down here in print.

The colour rushed to Hazel's face. She winced as though she had been struck. Eric heard the words too. A terrible expression came into his face. Without a moment's hesitation he wheeled round and walking up to the fellow said in tones that he endeavoured to keep calm:

"Apologise instantly for what you have said, you hound, or I'll thrash you here in the public street."

The man laughed.

"Who the dickens are you?" he said sneeringly, "I'll see myself in Jericho first. Actresses are public property——"

But he got no further. Monteith seized him by the collar and swung him on to the pavement with a grip of iron. The next moment he had raised a light cane he was carrying and began to belabour the ruffian's broad back with terrible blows. In vain the man writhed and struggled. He was in the grasp of a trained athlete.

At last he bellowed out in accents of mingled rage and pain. "I apologise! I apologise!"

Eric let go of the man's collar and the fellow staggered back. Then the young man turned and faced the crowd that had gathered round.

"That ruffian insulted this lady most grossly," he said, "I have given him the punishment he deserved."

"Bedad! and that's thrue," said a man who was standing near. "I heard what he said, the spalpeen got what he deserved, bad cess to him."

But "the spalpeen," had slunk off into the hotel like a dog into his kennel. The crowd slowly dispersed and Eric hurried his two fair companions away from the scene of the unpleasant episode.

Inside the vestibule of the Metropole—an observer of what had taken place outside—was a tall dark man of a somewhat saturnine cast of countenance. As the fellow who had felt the strength of Eric's hand sought the shelter of the hotel the stranger approached him.

"I should like a word with you," he said in a low voice.

The other rapped out an oath. "But I don't want one with you," he snarled, his pent up rage and mortification finding vent at the first opportunity.

But the other was not to be put off so easily. "Come to my room and have a bottle of champagne," he said easily, "I assure you it will be to your advantage." So saying he took the man by the arm and led him to the elevator. "Second floor," he said to the lift-boy. In a minute or so the two men were alone in a comfortable private sitting room.

"Allow me," said the stranger, "to give you my card." He handed a slip of pasteboard to his still surly comrade upon which was written, "Mr. Horace Caldecott."

"Good morning, Mr. Caldecott" he said gruffly. "Joshua Randell is my name, of Mark Lane, City. Perhaps you'll be so good as to tell me why you dragged me up here."

"Certainly," answered the other with a smile, "Because we are both in the same boat."

"Both in the same boat? What do you mean?"

"Why that we both of us have a pretty good-sized grudge against Mr. Eric Monteith, the gentleman who objected to your saying what you did about Miss Hazel Harlow."

Randell broke out into a torrent of abuse. His back was still smarting sorely from the effect of his chastisement.

"I'll get even with the young blackguard somehow," he said vindictively.

"Yes, but how?" put in the other. "It strikes me from what I have just seen Mr. Monteith is perfectly well able to look after himself."

Randell took a long draught at the champagne glass that had been set before him, then he sat down somewhat heavily and looked long and earnestly into Caldecott's face.

"See, here," he said, "if you've got an idea, out with it. I'm your man through thick and thin."

Caldecott hesitated for a moment.

"Well," he said suddenly, "there's one way by which you can get at Mr. Monteith, and that's through Hazel Harlow. He's dead gone on her"—a look of horrid vindictiveness came into the speaker's face—"and he'd do anything to look after her interests. Once get Hazel Harlow into your power, and you can use her as the candle-flame that lures the moth Monteith to his undoing."

"Yes, that's all very well," broke in the other, "but we're in the twentieth century, now, and you can't go about kidnapping young girls as you used to in the old days. How do you propose to get hold of Miss Harlow?"

"Well, I know Dublin pretty well," answered the other, "and there are some places at the back of the Rotunda where men and women live who would do anything; aye, even to murder, for a few shillings. Now, I'll be frank with you. I want Miss Harlow for my own. I also owe Mr. Eric Monteith a grudge, which is no less insistent than your own, though he never tried to horsewhip me in the public streets, and if I work ou the details, will you stand by me when it comes to business?"

"There's my hand on it," answered Randell.

"Then let's get to business," said Caldecott, "there is a lot to be done."

CHAPTER II.

Hazel and Jenny had taken quiet apartments in Wicklow Street. They had just finished their lunch on the same day that had seen the discomfiture of Mr. Joshua Randell.

"Isn't it horrible," Hazel was saying, "that the fact of a girl electing to take up the theatrical profession should lay her open to be a fair target for anyone to throw mud at?" She shuddered as the reminiscence of that scene opposite the Hotel Metropole came across her brain.

"You are quite right, dear," answered Jenny in a low voice, "and yet, Hazel, it is a sad fact that so many of the female members of our profession are much too lax in their behaviour in private life. In one travelling company that I was in, one day in Bournemouth, the company hired a waggonette and drove through the streets of the town, each one armed with a penny tin trumpet or some child's musical instrument, which they blew vigorously all the way. The ladies, too, had pea-shooters with which they peppered the passers-by. Small wonder that actresses in travelling companies lay themselves open to such insults as you received this morning."

Hazel sighed. "How women can unsex themselves so," she said, "is past all human comprehension." Then she rose. "I think you said you had a letter to write, Jenny. That being the case, I'll just go out and buy some hairpins. I shan't be long, and then we'll go out and get some tea later on at that nice confectioner's in Sackville Street."

Hazel left the house and walked quickly down Wicklow Street into Grafton Street. Where the two streets met, a miserable woman was standing on the kerb upon whose face was a look of such unutterable misery, that the actress paused involuntarily, her gentle heart touched by the sight of so much wretchedness.

"Give me a copper or so, miss," whined the woman, "I've three starving little ones at home crying out for bread."

Hazel paused. The story was a hackneyed one, yet she had not in her hitherto quiet life come into contact with all the misery and vice that flaunts itself in the streets of our great cities. The picture of the little starving children crying feebly for food in some miserable garret rose up before her eyes. Supposing if the woman's tale were true, surely the least that she could do would be to try and alleviate in some small way the sufferings of those who are unable to fight for themselves.

"If your story is true," she said, "I will willingly help you, but how am I to know that such is the case?"

"By coming with me to see for yourself," broke in the woman, eagerly. "Then you'll know that what I tell you is true."

Hazel hesitated. "Is it far from here?" she asked.

"Ten minutes' walk," answered the other.

"Then I'll come," said Hazel. Without another word the woman turned and shuffled off with the beautiful young actress at her side. The strangely assorted couple kept on until at last the beggar woman entered a narrow street the houses in which were of the poorest. She suddenly turned down a court of still meaner aspect. The woman paused before a door. Taking a rusty key from the pocket of her dress she inserted it in the lock. The door opened into an evil smelling passage way from which a flight of dirty wooden stairs led away to the upper part of the tenement. But the woman did not mount the stairs; she shuffled on down the passage way that led to the back regions of the house.

"In here, miss," she said in a low voice, throwing open a door.

Hazel entered to find herself in a long low room in which an old woman was seated. The sound of the door swinging back behind her caused her to wheel round in some surprise. From the far corner of the room another figure suddenly emerged, that of a squat, repulsive-looking man, but of children there was no sign.

"What is the meaning of this?" cried Hazel, turning round upon the woman who had brought her to this foul den. "Why have you brought me here?"

"To see Moll Malone," came the unexpected answer from an old hag whom Hazel had noticed on first entering the room.

A more repulsive-looking personage than this woman it would have been almost impossible to conceive. She must at one time have been tall, but age had bowed her figure. The skin of her face was yellow as parchment and seamed with innumerable wrinkles. Two beady black eyes of amazing brilliancy for one of her age peered forth from sunken eye-sockets. Her head was covered with short grey hair which protruded elfishly from a mobcap that had once been white. Her arms were long and skinny; her hands were veritable claws.

Hazel gazed at this repulsive apparition with horror.

"Who are you?" she said, "what do you want with me?"

"Do ye mane to say," came the shrill retort, "that ye have not heard of Moll Malone the Queen of the Beggars? Shure and yours is the purtiest face that's been inside Moll's house this many a long day."

"But what do you want with me?" cried Hazel again.

"What is it I'm wanting, darlin'," came the answer, "why that's soon told. Money is what I'm wanting and money I must have before you lave this house."

"Then the story that I heard about three little starving children is all a lie," cried Hazel hotly. "I've been trapped here to be blackmailed."

"Trapped," answered the hag, "did ye not come of yer own accord? Now don't be unreasonable. It's only a little money that Moll's asking of ye, just that and ye shall go free."

Hazel saw resistance would be useless. A wild desire came over her to escape from her loathsome surroundings at all hazards.

"How much do you want?" she asked.

"All that ye have," was the answer.

"That is not very much," said Hazel, stoutly. "Only a little silver in my purse, and no jewellery," as you can see for yourself. You have lured a very poor prize into your trap."

"May be," said the hag, coolly; "but if ye haven't money about ye, there'll be those ready to pay for your ransom."

"Yes, and the moment you communicate with my friends, they'll take steps to have you punished for your wickedness."

"Is it a foole you'll be taken be for entirely," croaked Moll, a horrid smile coming into her withered countenance. "Do you think that Moll Malone has not more ways than one of gaining her ends? No, no, acushla, it is here you'll stay until you'll give me your sacred word that if ye go free there's no word said of how Moll gave ye lodging."

"And if I refuse?" cried Hazel, with eyes ablaze.

"Ye'll not do that, mavourneen," answered the hag impassively.

Hazel cast a swift glance around her. Was there no means of escaping from her odious surroundings? Moll noted her action.

"It's not escaping ye'd be after trying?" she said, mockingly. "Ye're with Moll Malone, and Moll knows her business."

"How much ransom money do you want?" repeated Hazel, realising the futility of resistance.

At that moment there came a peculiar knock at the door by means of which Hazel had just entered. In a moment the expression on Moll's face changed. She made a sign to the man behind Hazel. Like a panther he sprang forward and flung open a door that led out of the apartment into what was apparently another room beyond.

"Step in here for a minute, miss," he said hoarsely. "No harm shall happen to ye—I swear it—if ye do as yer told. It'll only be for a few minutes. Mother Moll has visitors—visitors that ye mightn't like to see."

The last few words were uttered in a voice fraught with terrible significance, the meaning of which Hazel was at a loss to understand. Her blood ran cold. Into what haunt of devilry had she been enticed?

She hesitated. Should she scream aloud for help? The man beside her seemed to divine her intention instantaneously.

"If ye cry out," he said, "nothing can save ye. Quick! It's yer last chance!"

A thunderous knock came at the door. Hazel, at her wits' end to know what course to pursue, darted inside the room indicated by her captor. She found herself in a small chamber, little better than a cupboard, lit by a skylight from the roof. The door was shut behind her, and she heard a bolt shoot back into its socket.

Moll Malone threw open the door upon which the knocking had been so insistent, to admit two men, who were so closely muffled up that their features were unrecognisable.

"Hullo, Moll," said one of them. "So here you are just the same as ever. Why the dickens didn't you open when I knocked first?"

"The Squire," muttered Moll. "What may you be after wanting?"

Caldecott, for he it was, laughed.

"I'm not the first man," he said, "who's come to Dublin to get Mother Malone's help. I want a piece of business done, I and this gentleman here," indicating Randell, his companion, "and we don't want——"

"To dirty yer own hands," broke in Moll.

"Quite so," answered Caldecott. "As we understand one another so well there will not be the slightest reason to beat longer about the bush. You must know then," he continued, "that the Good Samaritan Travelling Company has come to Dublin. Among them are two people in whom this gentleman and myself are interested. The one is a man, named Mr. Eric Monteith, the other a lady, known as Miss Hazel Harlow. Now this gentleman here is willing to pay you the sum of one hundred pounds should Mr. Eric Monteith be so injured as to make his departure from Dublin exceedingly unlikely at least for a time. Now don't misunderstand me. We don't want him murdered. We merely want him to have good reason to remember his visit to Dublin. Both this gentleman and myself have a private grudge against him, and should like to interview him for ourselves. As for this Miss Harlow, I want to devise some scheme whereby I can have her for my own."

Caldecott spoke in a tone of quiet villainy with as much nonchalance as though he had been carying on an everyday conversation instead of planning the downfall of two people whose only crime had been their individual integrity.

The hag heard him without a sound. When he had finished she said: "And this Miss Harlow, what's she like?"

"The most beautiful woman that ever lived," cried Caldecott.

The hag gave vent to a hoarse chuckle. "So that's how the wind blows," she said, "is it?"

"Yes," broke in Caldecott angrily, "but that's neither here nor there; the question is, how are we going to waylay Mr. Eric Monteith?"

"Oh, that's easy enough," came the answer. "I'll guarantee to get him here to-night if you like. As for the girl, well, that's not such an easy matter."

"Not even if it's a question of money," said Caldecott eagerly. "Surely the Queen of the Beggars is never at a loss to know what to do when she's well paid."

"But you pay my price," said the hag, "and what's more, you pay it without fuss. Ye know me by this time, Squire. You know that Moll means what she says, and if I'm going to do anything for you there must be no half measures. Five hundred pounds is my price for Hazel Harlow."

"Done," cried Caldecott.

"And you'll swear to me to pay the five hundred pounds within a week after the day on which I deliver up Hazel Harlow to you?"

"Yes, yes," cried Caldecott hoarsely.

"What do ye intend doin' to the girl?" croaked the old woman after a moment's pause.

Caldecott uttered a mirthless laugh. "What business is that of yours, Moll?" he asked.

"I always like to know my client's business," answered the harridan.

"Then if you must know, I am going to make her my wife."

Moll made no comment to this statement. Her lips tightened for a moment. Then she went on: "And the hundred pounds for the other job?" she croaked.

"That's my affair," broke in Randell. "Money ain't tight with me, and you'll find the hundred quid easily earned, I should say."

Moll turned once more to Caldecott. "Your word on that, squire?" she said.

Caldecott nodded. "But how are you going to get Miss Harlow for me?" he said in a low voice.

The hag rose to her feet and went to the door into which Hazel had been shown some fifteen minutes before. She turned back the rusty bolt, and threw open the portal.

"Here's Miss Harlow for ye" she cried.

With a cry Caldecott sprang forward and bounded into the room. His eyes sought every corner of the chamber and then went back to the ghastly face of the old hag beside him.

"What do you mean, woman?" he roared. "This is no time for jesting."

For the room was empty. Of Hazel Harlow there was not the vestige of a sign.

The situation was eminently dramatic. At the open door that communicated with the inner chamber stood the hag Moll Malone; in the centre of the inner room itself stood Caldecott, livid with baffled fury; behind the old woman were grouped the beggar woman who had lured Hazel to this den of infamy, Joshua Randell and the man who seemed to be the old woman's tool. For a moment or so Moll stood motionless peering into the innermost recesses of the little chamber, with eyes full of fear, then she crossed herself in superstitious awe.

"Holy Mother!" she ejaculated, "the spirits must have taken the sweet colleen away, she was too beautiful for the Powers not have guarded their own."

Then she wheeled round and called out in a piercing voice; "Kathleen! Terence! Is it not with your own eyes that ye saw the lady walk in here?" And in fear-stricken voices the man and woman answered in the affirmative with one accord.

Horace Caldecott was a man in whose composition there was not a grain of superstition; "Have I lost my senses?" he muttered, "Or is everyone conspiring to send me out of my mind? Enough of this mystery, woman," he went on roughly, "for goodness sake explain what you mean. Am I to understand that you locked up Miss Hazel Harlow in this very room scarce half an hour ago?"

"If so be that Hazel Harlow is the most beautiful colleen that ever Moll Malone cast eyes on, then it's truth you're speaking. It was in that very room and there's ne'er a trap-door nor hiding place in it as you can see for yourself. As for the skylight above ye can see for yourselves that she could not have reached that. Ye can make what ye like out of what I've told ye."

"The woman's mad," broke in Randell coarsely. "They are all mad here in this God-forsaken country. And how does this get me any nearer my paying off old scores against this Monteith? I thought that was the business we had come here about."

"Mad, am I?" almost screamed Moll. "Then ye go elsewhere than to a madwoman to get yer dirty jobs done. I'll not move hand or foot for ye, ye omadhaun; not if ye were to pay me all the money there is in that cursed country of yours called England." And the hag spat upon the floor to emphasise her virulence.

"You see what your interference has done," said Caldecott, turning savagely to his confederate. "You've upset the whole apple-cart now, and we are both of us further than ever from getting what we want."

"It's the truth yer speaking," went on the incensed beldame. "I'll do no more for ye. Go and find Hazel Harlow for yerselves. Begone! Leave my house or I'll call the bhoys about yer ears! Molly Malone is in her own kingdom here. She's only to say the word and ther's hundreds who would be ready to prove whether they think her a madwoman or no!"

Caldecott saw that the hag was in earnest. He had during his career (one, it may be noted, that had led him into the innumerable byepaths of crime and vice) had great opportunity of rubbing shoulders with all the scum and riff-raff of most of the great cities of Europe, and he knew that Moll Malone, the queen of the Dublin beggars, did not speak idly. He knew what Randell's impatient pig-headedness had done for them, and the achievement of their ends by the means that he had anticipated.

"We'd better clear out of this," he muttered to his comrade, "before the place gets too hot to hold us."

Turning to the beldame, he pressed a sovereign into her hand.

"There Moll," he began, conciliatingly, but he got no further. The old woman, all her hot Irish blood seething with rage, flung the coin in his face.

"I'll have no money of yours," she screamed. "Get ye gone!"

An oath fell from Caldecott's lips. The coin had struck him on the forehead and had broken the skin. Randell seized him by the arm. "For Heaven's sake let's get out," he said in an access of terror. And thus the two men were forced to sink ingloriously away from the place from which Caldecott had hoped so much, and instead of being nearer to the achievement of their fell ends, they now seemed farther away than ever, for Caldecott felt in his heart that in some mysterious way Hazel had indeed been lured to Moll Malone's—for what object he was, of course, ignorant—and that she had somehow, equally mysteriously, disappeared. Perhaps the beggar queen knew more than she would ever say. Whatever the mystery was it would seem that Caldecott was to have no hand in the elucidation of it, yet the mad passion that he had conceived for Hazel Harlow that had been his spur in so many desperate ventures still served as a goad to urge him on. He was ready to sacrifice everything to become possessed of the woman for whom he felt so unholy a love.

But Caldecott and Randell were not to be allowed to escape scot-free from Moll's "bhoys." The old woman was roused to a tempest of fury by Randell's ill-timed remark. On the departure of the two confederates, she made a sign to her myrmidon, the man who had ushered Hazel into the adjoining chamber.

The fellow rushed to the door and gave vent to a piercing whistle, emitted four times. The cry was answered at once.

As Randell and Caldecott emerged from Moll's house into the squalid court into which it opened, four or five ruffians sprang upon them. They were knocked senseless, and borne away to be despoiled.

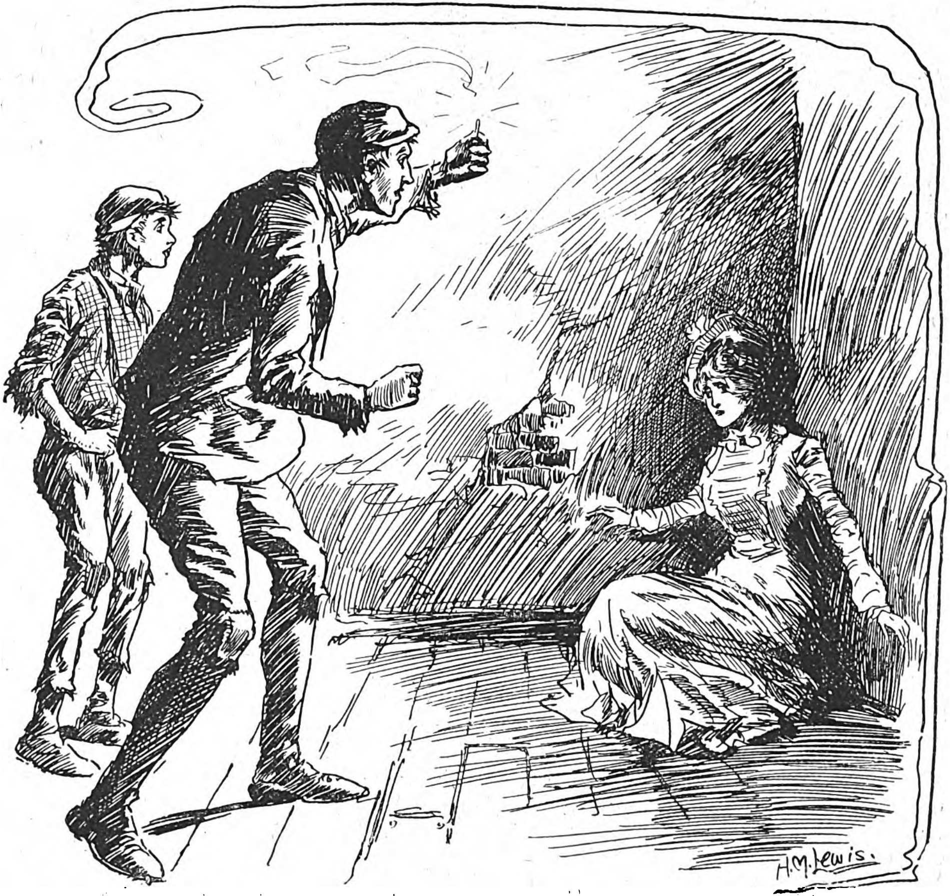
A week later, two wretched men, kept in durance vile by the orders of the despotic Queen of the Slums, whose sway was paramount in those regions, crept out into the streets of Dublin, to find what consolation they could in the resumption of their lives amongst their fellow men—sore, weak from their confinement, robbed of every penny they had had in their pockets, despoiled of every article of jewellery and value upon their persons.

As for Caldecott, he slunk away to his steam yacht, the Mermaid, lying in Dublin harbour, and gave orders to his amazed crew to leave the, for him, inhospitable city.

CHAPTER III.

Eric Monteith and Raymond Venables, the manager of the Good Samaritan Company, were strolling side by side down Sackville Street. The two men, although they had but little in common, had nevertheless become more or less intimate friends as they had learnt to know one another better, and besides they had one bond in common that had gone a great way to counteract the discrepancy in their respective natures, each of them was genuinely and sincerely in love with Hazel Harlow. As was natural, perhaps, under the circumstances both men were at that moment—it was early in the afternoon—talking about Hazel herself.

"It seems to me, Monteith," Venables was saying, "as though there was some terrible conspiracy afoot to ruin Miss Harlow's chances both off the stage and on. It seems incredible that a girl so beautiful, so noble-minded, so spotless, should have any enemies. And yet it must be so. At every town we have been to, Newcastle, Scarborough, Rugby, Sheffield, to say nothing of the episode on the Belfast boat, Miss Harlow's life has been in danger. Now she has not taken me into her confidence. I was foolish enough to try and flirt with her until I knew her better, but can't you put me in possession of the facts of the whole business?"



Eric sprang forward. "Hazel!" he cried, "Hazel!"

Eric hesitated. Although his friendship for Venables had passed the point of any restraint in conversation he nevertheless felt somewhat chary in divulging the whole story of how Hazel's life had come to be overshadowed by so much tribulation.

"Look here, Venables," he said at last, "I'd much rather you got Miss Harlow to tell you the whole story herself. You know perfectly well what my feelings for her are; that I'd marry her to-morrow and take her away from the stage at once if she'd have me. We're both in the same boat there."

"Except that I wouldn't take her off the stage," broke in Venables with an attempt at levity, "I'd make her and my fortune first. But that's away from the point. It's a fair field and no favour for us both, old man, and perhaps you are right in not betraying confidences. I'll ask Miss Harlow to make me her confidant if she thinks I'm worthy of it. It's a funny thing," he went on somewhat irrelevantly, "but I seem to be quite a changed man ever since I fell in love with Miss Harlow. The other ladies in the crowd seem so frightfully vulgar beside her. I don't seem to care a bit for the larks I used to have, for you know my boy how powerful the manager of a Company can be and how willing most of the ladies are to sacrifice a good deal to get into his good books. I could tell you tales that would set your respectable British hair on end like a porcupine's bristles."

"Spare me, my dear lady-killer," broke in the other with a laugh, "but, joking apart, to return to our subject. I wish I could get Miss Harlow to leave the stage. At every new town where we arrive I experience a sinking feeling at the heart that some terrible and unexpected accident is going to happen to our Star, and yet you can't be always watching her. With all her nobility of character she's as headstrong as a child over some things. Hullo! Isn't that the fair Jenny Lovelace?"

Jenny Lovelace it was, and on her face was a look of trouble. Eric was quick to notice the expression.

"What's up?" he asked quickly. "Hazel——"

"Is gone—disappeared," broke in Jenny. "I had some letters to write, and she went out to buy some hairpins. I waited half an hour, and as there was no sign of her I went to look for her. I went to the shop in Grafton Street where I knew she would get them, and they said that nobody had been in there to buy hairpins at all that afternoon. I hurried back to our lodgings thinking that I should perhaps find her there, but she had not returned. I went out again an hour or so after Hazel had gone, and at the corner of Wicklow Street I met a ragged boy, who asked me if I was looking for a tall, beautiful lady. I said yes, and he said he had seen her go off with a poor-looking woman some time back. He knew who she was, because it appears she had given him a bunch of flowers she had been wearing at the stage-door of the theatre last night. There's all I know."

The two men heard her out in breathless interest.

"Now what on earth," said Eric, "can have possessed Hazel to make her go off with a poor woman in Dublin? What on earth can be the meaning of it?"

Jenny shook her head.

"I don't know, I don't know," she said with tears in her eyes, "but what's to be done? Supposing——" she broke off and looked up piteously, almost fearfully, in Monteith's face. He read what it was she would have said. Supposing Hazel had fallen into the hands of the villain Caldecott again. Eric ground his teeth together in impotent fury.

"Where's the boy?" he said, "who told you that story?"

"He only told me and ran away after he had finished his speech," said Jenny despondently. "I don't believe I should even know him if I saw him again. He was an ordinary street urchin, rather taller than the average, and seemed pretty thick-set."

"Let us go back to the lodgings," said Eric, "perhaps Hazel has turned up after all. She may have gone off on some errand of mercy. The woman who called her away may have asked her help, and Hazel, who is always too ready to give an attentive ear to anyone who may seem to be in want, may have complied with her request. Perhaps we are making a mountain out of a mole-hill."

But in Wicklow Street there was no sign of the missing girl. It was now nearly five o'clock, and three hours had gone by since Hazel had disappeared.

"And we were going to have tea together in Sackville Street," said Jenny.

"We had better communicate with the police," cried Venables. "Things are getting serious."

"What good will that do?" asked Eric. "They've got no more to go upon than we have. If only we could find that urchin. He didn't say in which direction she went off with the woman, Miss Lovelace, did he?"

"He only said what I have told you," replied the girl.

The case was beginning to look hopeless. The three were at their wits' ends to know what to do. It really seemed as if Venables' suggestion was the only feasible one, to put the matter in the hands of the police. Accordingly a move was made towards the Police Head Quarters. The Superintendent of Police was put into full possession of the facts as far as they were known, which were meagre enough in all conscience. He could promise but little help as yet. There were hundreds of street-arabs in Dublin that might have answered to the description given by Jenny of the gamin who had supplied her with the information concerning Hazel's disappearance with the unknown woman.

"Unfortunately," he went on, "we have a great many slums in Dublin and there are not lacking people, as is the case in every great city, who are on the look-out for young and beautiful women for purposes of blackmail and extortion. All I can do is to supply a detective with all the details that we know and to get him to work through the low quarters of the city to see if anything has been heard of the young lady. You may be quite sure that if any police officers hear anything about the missing young lady, they will at once communicate with head-quarters. I shall at once communicate with you at the theatre."

The time passed slowly away. Six o'clock came and went, and the time for the performance of The Good Samaritan drew ever nearer and nearer. Of Hazel there was still no sign. Venables was at his wits' ends. In the first place, every seat in the theatre was sold in anticipation of seeing the famous Miss Harlow appear in the chief part of the play; secondly, the sickening fear that something terrible had happened to Hazel awoke terrible forebodings in the manager's mind. As for Eric, his feelings can be well imagined. Yet all his efforts had proved unavailing. He could find no trace of Hazel. It seemed as though the earth must have opened and swallowed up the beautiful young actress, together with the woman who had lured her away. It wanted half an hour before the commencement of the play. Eric was standing moodily at the stage-door of the theatre, a prey to the most horrible misgivings.

"I'd give a hundred pounds," he muttered, half aloud, "to anyone who would take me to Hazel Harlow."

A hand touched him on the arm. He turned sharply round, to be confronted with the tattered figure of a Dublin street arab. "Did ye say a hundred pounds, yer honour," the lad said.

"What do you mean?" Eric's hand gripped hold of the lad's arm like a vice. "Did you hear what I said."

"Faix, yer honour," answered the urchin with cool impudence, "I heard ye say that ye'ed be willing to give a hundred pounds to anyone who would take ye to Hazel Harlow, and it's meself would like to have the earning of such a swate little sum."

"Look here, boy," went on Monteith in a terrible voice. "If you're joking I'll wring the life out of you. If you're speaking the truth and can lead me to Hazel Harlow at this moment I'll give you one hundred pounds any time you like."

The boy's eyes glistened.

"A hundred pounds," he echoed faintly, "Mother of Moses, then I could go to Ameriky and join Mike. I'll do it." Then he went on in a low voice. "It's a dirty place I'll be after taking ye to, sir. Ye cannot come as ye are. There's niver a fine gentlman been where I'm going to take you. Have ye got any ould clothes?"

Hope renewed sprang up in Eric's breast. There was of course the chance that he was being made the victim of a hoax; on the other hand the lad might be speaking the truth.

"Wait here for me five minutes," he said, and turning, he dashed inside the theatre bellowing for the property man.

In a wonderfully short space of time he had found a new make-up. He had discarded his elegant Bond Street apparel for the dress of a fifth-rate Irish hobo. Coming down the stairs that led to the stage-door from the dressing-rooms he ran full tilt into Venables.

"Delay the piece as long as you can," he cried to the astonished manager. "Try the audience with a curtain-raiser. I've news of Hazel. I'm off on what may be a wild goose chase, or even worse. And even if I do find her she probably won't be able to act to-night. But anyhow we shall have something to show the audience and we can get through the piece with Cora Bond, her understudy."

Without more ado, before almost Venables could recover from the surprise occasioned by this tatterdemalion presentment of Eric Monteith the immaculate, the pseudo tramp had dashed out into the street. The arab was waiting for him.

"Be jabbers!" was the urchin's remark, "it's changed ye are entirely. I think even Mother Malone will be afther believing ye to be one of her bhoys. And about that hundred pounds, yer honour," he went on, "how am I to know I shall get that, supposing I take ye to find Miss Harlow?"

"Find Miss Harlow," answered Eric impressively, "and I swear by the Holy Saints above that you shall have the money."

"I believe ye, sir," said the urchin soberly, and together the strangely-assorted couple set off along the now darkened thoroughfares.

Eric did not know Dublin. He trusted himself implicitly to his youthful guide who led him through a maze of narrow slums and reeking alleys and noisome courts, where men and women reeled past in drunken frenzy. Eric shuddered to think that it was in haunts like this Hazel Harlow had been incarcerated.

Suddenly the boy drew near to his companion's side. "Say nothing," he muttered, "and follow me." And he suddenly dived down through a narrow pathway that led into the blackness beyond.

Monteith kept close behind his guide. The next moment he heard the sound as of a key being thrust into a door-lock. Together the two entered what Eric felt must be a deserted tenement house. He blundered on behind the boy up a flight of rickety wooden stairs. At the top the lad paused.

"Have ye a match?" he whispered.

Monteith produced a lucifer, and, from some recess in his tattered garments, the other drew a small piece of tallow candle. This he lit, and Monteith found that they were standing on a narrow landing, facing yet another door, that was apparently locked. Again the lad produced a key. He shot back the bolts, and ushered the other inside a squalid apartment, in one corner of which was a huddled-up figure. Eric sprang forward.

"Hazel!" he cried; "Hazel!"

The girl—for she it really was—sprang from her crouching position with a cry of almost apprehensive joy.

"Eric, is it you? Thank God!"

But the youth interposed. "There's no time to lose," he said. "We've got to look out for Mother Malone's spies, but the lady can't go out as she is in those clothes," for Hazel still wore the stylish walking dress that she had had on when leaving Wicklow Street.

"What's to be done?" said Eric in despair.

The boy laid a finger upon the side of his nose in a knowing manner. Then he went to a corner of the room and pulled up a plank which was evidently the lid of some recess in the boarding. Thrusting his hand into the black void he pulled forth a bundle consisting of a coarse piece of sacking knotted at the top. With quick fingers he untied the knot and disclosed a heterogenous mass of clothes among which could be seen one or two pairs of boots, some faded silks and satins and a lot of worthless pieces of garments.

"This is my collection," he said with a grin. "We'll find ye something here to cover yer dress."

The clothes were indescribably dirty and had evidently been stolen by the lad at various times. But with so much at stake Hazel did not hesitate. She discarded her fashionable hat and covered her glorious red-gold hair with a poke bonnet that must have done service for some old Irish beggar woman. Over her dress-skirt she slipped a dirty faded red petticoat, disguising her bodice with an old cloak.

"And will ye make yer face dirty?" said the boy.

This was easily done; there was no lack of dust and filth in the squalid chamber. The final touches having been given to this somewhat unusual toilette the lad surveyed Hazel approvingly.

"Faix, and I'm sure Mother Malone won't know yer again," he muttered exultingly, "and now follow close behind me and we'll have ye out of this before ye know ye've been here, and if it's drunk ye can both of ye pretend to be so much the better. It's a way wid the gintry here and it'll not make ye so conspicuous as if ye were sober entirely."

To an actor and actress, for Eric could now fairly lay claim to be called such, while Hazel had indisputably proved her right to stand among the ranks of the ladies of her profession, such an injunction was sure to be obeyed. Moreover the knowledge of all there was at stake acted as a goad both to Monteith and to Hazel notwithstanding all that the latter had but recently gone through. And so the oddly assorted trio started on their journey towards Brunswick Street.

CHAPTER IV.

It can be well imagined that Raymond Venables' state of mind after the apparition of Eric Monteith as a seedy tramp was more chaotic than it had been before. And now, not only had he lost his leading lady but another member of his company had dashed off upon an unknown quest leaving him with the onus of providing a curtain-raiser to keep his audience quiet, under the faint hope that perhaps Miss Harlow might be restored within an hour. In despair, Venables sought out Jenny Lovelace and asked her advice.

Jenny's sunny nature was at once imbued with the re-accession of hope.

"Mr. Monteith is not the sort of man to go off like that unless he had some reason for it," she said, "you must do exactly what he told you."

Venables looked at his watch.

"The curtain should be up in a quarter of an hour," he said, "and I can make the orchestra give an extra turn. That'll be a saving of five or six minutes; then I'll go on and make a little speech and explain that an accident has happened to Miss Harlow, but that I hope she will be well enough to get through her part later on. Then you and I can give them Theyre Smith's A Pair of Lunatics, and then—well, if Monteith and Miss Harlow don't turn up by that time the fat will be in the fire. You know what a Dublin audience is? They'll think we're having them, and as likely as not there'll be a rumpus."

The orchestra gave the extra turn as decided, and a selection of Irish airs wound the audience up to a fine pitch of enthusiasm. As the last notes of "The Wearing of the Green" died away, Raymond Venables stepped out before the curtain. His face was rather pale, yet he spoke with perfect distinctness and decision.

"Ladies and gentlemen," he said, "I have to convey to you a piece of news that will, I know, cause you profound and heartfelt sorrow. Miss Hazel Harlow, who is cast for the part of Ruth in The Good Samaritan, is unfortunately rather seriously indisposed, but with wonderful fortitude she has consented to try and appear a little later on in the evening. As I know that you are all desirous of seeing an actress who, although young to the stage, has won a prominent place for herself in her profession, I have decided to present to you a small curtain-raiser as a commencement of our bill-of-fare. The piece we have chosen is called A Pair of Lunatics and will be, I hope, adequately presented by Miss Jenny Lovelace and myself."

The speech was received with good humour and much applause.

"The audience is in a good temper now," muttered Venables, as he retired to his dressing-room, "I only hope to goodness Monteith and Miss Harlow will turn up in time."

A Pair of Lunatics was received with acclamation. The curtain was rung down and Venables rushed off the stage into the wing to find that a sudden commotion had sprung up occasioned by the arrival of three disreputable beings whom my readers will not have much difficulty in recognising as Hazel, Eric, and the larrikin.

When it became known among the members of the Company that the dramatic entry had been effected by Eric and Hazel their surprise can be better imagined than described. As for Venables he was jubilant, and not without cause, for by a miracle his beautiful lead had been restored to him safe and sound and, notwithstanding the fact of all she had gone through, expressed her firm determination to sustain her rôle as soon as she could remove the traces of her recent adventure.

With jubilation apparent on every line of his countenance Raymond Venables once more stepped out before the drop-scene and faced the expectant audience.

"Ladies and gentlemen," he said, in a ringing voice, "You will all rejoice to hear that Miss Harlow has consented to appear to-night. In a few minutes she will appear on the stage in person to ask for an endorsement of her talent."

A perfect storm of applause rent the auditorium. At the eleventh hour the situation had been saved. When the curtain went up and Hazel was discovered seated alone in the room where the enactment of the drama first started another outburst of cheering proved how great was the hold the beautiful young actress had upon her audience. It was some moments before she was enabled to speak the opening words of her part and then not until she had bowed again and again to an audience worked up to concert pitch by the diplomatic speeches of Raymond Venables. How she got through her part that night no one but Hazel ever knew. Once or twice it was only by a tremendous effort that she prevented herself from breaking down entirely.

CHAPTER V.

After the performance, Raymond Venables insisted on carrying off Hazel, Eric, and Jenny to supper at the Metropole, where Hazel had promised to relate her adventures of that most thrilling day.

The street-arab who had been responsible for the rescue had been bidden by Eric to come round to his rooms near Stephen's Green early the next morning to receive the promised reward.

After the supper had been done full justice to, Hazel began her narrative. She told them how she had been struck by the miserable appearance of the woman in Wicklow Street, how she had been lured to Molly Malone's by the plausible creature who was subsidised by the queen of the beggars.

There is no need to recapitulate the story in full here as my readers are already fully acquainted with the facts up to the incarceration of Hazel in the inner chamber.

"I had scarcely been in the room two minutes," she said, "before a sound above me attracted my attention. The glass skylight suddenly opened and I heard a voice say: 'Look out, lady, there's a ladder coming down.'

"To my intense amazement, a rope ladder fell noiselessly almost on to my head. 'Quick,' said the voice, 'Can you do it?'

"Now, you must remember, that ever since a child, I have been used to all sorts of agile pursuits. About a farm there is always plenty of work to bring one's muscles into full play. Many a time as a girl have I swung myself up into lofts or on to the top of a hayrick by means of such a ladder. I did not pause to think who the owner of the voice was or where I might find myself should I succeed in making good my escape. I only knew that a few feet away from me was a terrible harpy of a woman and a man whom I have more occasion to hate and fear than anyone else in all the world, for at the moment of setting my foot upon the lower rung of the ladder I had heard the voice of him who I knew would give all he had to get me in his clutches. Up the swaying ladder I went without a sound. When I reached the roof above it was to find myself on the leads of a house beside the very boy who was the means afterwards of bringing you, Eric, to my ultimate rescue. Noiselessly he shut down the skylight and together we crept across the roof, through an attic window into a deserted house. I was then conveyed to a squalid chamber and locked in there until the night. You can imagine how terrible that lonely waiting was, yet somehow I felt that the lad who had so strangely befriended me would not deliver me up into the hands of my enemies. I had given him a bunch of flowers at the theatre last night and he apparently had dogged my footsteps ever since."

That was the end of Hazel's narrative and the end, so far as she was concerned, of further adventures in Dublin.

At the appointed hour the next morning the street arab made his appearance at Eric's lodgings.

The boy spoke well, and street-arab as he was, brought up in the midst of criminality and vice, Eric saw that he had in him the making of perhaps a fine man, and instinctively felt that in handing him this sum of money it would not be misplaced.

"And when you get to America, Tim," he said, "you must write and let me know how you're getting on."

"Shure and I will," said Tim, "though I can't write yet I'll be after making someone write for me."

Mother Malone and her gang was split up and the old beldame imprisoned for her misdeeds though the punishment came somewhat tardily. As for Horace Caldecott the base means he had endeavoured to use in order to accomplish his fell ends had, as we have seen, proved his undoing.

Ely's Automatic Housemaid.

J. Brewster Fisher

In order for a man to have faith in such an invention, he would have to know Harrison Ely. For Harrison Ely was a genius. I had known him in college, a man amazingly dull in Latin and Greek and even in English, but with ideas of his own that could not be expressed in language. His bent was purely mechanical, and found expression in innumerable ingenious contrivances to facilitate the study to which he had no inclination. His self-acting lexicon holder was a matter of admiring wonder to his classmates, but it did not serve to increase the tenacity of his mental grasp upon the contents of the volume, and so did little to recommend him to the faculty. And his self-feeding student lamp admirably illuminated everything for him save the true and only path to an honourable degree.

It had been years since I had seen him or thought of him, but the memory is tenacious of small things, and the big yellow envelope which I found one morning awaiting me upon my breakfast table brought his eccentric personality back to me with a rush. It was addressed to me in the Archimedean script always so characteristic of him, combining, as it seemed to do, the principles of the screw and the inclined plane, and in its superscription Harrison Ely stood unmistakably revealed.

It was the first morning of a new cook, the latest potentate of a dynasty of ten who had briefly ruled in turn our kitchen and ourselves during the preceding three months, and successively abdicated in favour of one another under the compelling influences of popular clamour, and in the face of such a political crisis my classmates' letter failed to receive immediate attention. Unfortunately, but not unexpectedly, the latest occupant of our culinary throne began her reign with no conspicuous reforms, and we received in gloomy silence her preliminary enactments in the way of greasy omelette and turbid and flavourless coffee, the yellow screed of Harrison Ely looking on the while with bilious sympathy as it leaned unopened against the water-bottle beside me.

As I drained the last medical drop of coffee my eye fell upon it, and needing a vicarious outlet for my feelings toward the cook, I seized it and tore it viciously open. It contained a letter from my classmate and half a dozen printed circulars. I spread open the former, and my eye fastened at once upon the sympathetic exordium:

"Doubtless, my dear friend, you have known what discomfort it is to be at the mercy of incompetent domestics——" But my attention was distracted at this point by one of the circulars, which displayed an array of startling, cheering, alluring words, followed by plentiful exclamation points, that, like a bunch of keys, opened to my enraptured vision the gates of a terrestrial paradise where Bridgets should be no more and where ill-cooked meals should become a mechanical impossibility. The boon we had been sighing for now presented itself for my acceptance, an accomplished fact. Harrison Ely had invented "An Automatic Household Beneficent Genius. A Practical Realisation of the Fables Familiar of the Middle Ages." So the circular set forth.

Returning to the letter, I read that Harrison Ely, having exhausted his means in working out his invention, was unable to manufacture his "machine" in quantity as yet; but that he had just two on hand which he would sell in order to raise some ready money. He hoped that I would buy one of his automatons and aid him to sell the other.

Never did a request come at a more propitious moment. I had always entertained a kindness for Harrison Ely, and now such was my disgust at the incompetence of Bridget and Juliana and their predecessors that I was eager to stake the price of a "Household Beneficent Genius," on the success of my friend's invention.

So, having grasped the purport of the circulars and letter, I broke forth to my wife:

"My dear, you've heard me speak of Harrison Ely——"

"That man who is always so near doing something great, and never has done anything?" said she.

"He has done it at last," I declared. "Harrison Ely is one of the greatest geniuses the world has ever seen. He has invented an 'Automatic Electric Machine Servant.'"

My wife said: "Oh!"

£5 notes waiting to be claimed. See page 400.

There was not an atom of enthusiasm in that "Oh!" but I was not to be daunted.

"I am ready," I resumed, "to invest my bottom dollar in two of Harrison Ely's machine servants."

Her eyes were fixed upon me as if they would read my very soul. "What do they cost?" she mildly asked.

"In comparison with the benefits to be derived, little enough. Listen!" I seized a circular at random, and began to read:

"The Automatic Household Genius, a veritable Domestic Fairy, swift, silent, sure; a Permanent, Inalienable, First-class Servant warranted to give satisfaction."

"Ah!" said my wife; and the enthusiasm that was lacking in the "Oh!" made itself eloquent in that "Ah!" "What is the price?" she asked again.

"The price is all right, and we are going to try the experiment."

"Are we though?" said she, between doubt and desire.

"Most assuredly; it will be a saving in the end. I shall write to Harrison Ely this very night."

The return mail brought me a reply stating that two Electric-Automatic Household Beneficent Geniuses had been shipped me by express. The letter inclosed a pamphlet that gave a more particular account of the E. A. H. B. G. than the circulars contained. My friend's invention was shaped in the likeness of the human figure, with a body, head, arms, legs, hands, and feet. It was clad in waterproof cloth, with a hood of the same to protect the head, and was shod with felt. The trunk contained the wheels and springs, and in the head was fixed the electric battery.

The face of bisque was described as possessing "a very natural and pleasing expression."

Just at dusk an oblong box arrived by express, and was duly delivered in our hall, but at my wife's urgent entreaty I consented not to unpack the machines until the next morning.

"If we should not get the knack of managing them they might give us trouble," said this wise wife of mine.

I agreed to this, and having sent away Bridget with a week's wages, to the satisfaction of all parties, we went to bed in high hopes.

Early next morning we were astir.

"My dear," I said, "do not give yourself the least concern about breakfast; I am determined that Harrison's invention shall have fair play."

"Very well," my wife assented; but she prudently administered bread and butter to her offspring.

I opened the oblong box, where lay the automatons side by side, their hands placidly folded upon their waterproof breasts, and their eyes looking placidly expectant from under their waterproof hoods.

I confess the sight gave me a shock. Anna Mira turned pale, and the children hid their faces in her skirts.

"Once out of the box," I said to myself, "and the horror will be over."

The machines stood on their feet admirably, but the horror was not materially lessened by this change of position. However, I assumed a bold front and said jocosely:

"Now which is Bridget and which is Juliana—which the cook and which the housemaid."

This distinction was made clear by dial-plates and indicators set conspicuously between the shoulders, an opening being cut in the waterproof for that purpose. The housemaid's dial-plate was stamped around the circumference with the words: Bed, Broom, Duster, Doorbell, Dining-room Service, Parlour Service, etc. In a like manner the cook's dial-plate bore the words that pertained to her department. I gave myself first to "setting" the housemaid, as being the simpler of the two.

"Now, my dear," said I confidently, "we shall see how this Juliana can make the beds."

I proceeded according to the pamphlet's directions, to point the indicator to the word "bed." Next, as there were three beds to be made, I pushed in three of the five little red points surrounding the word. Then I set the clock connected with the indicator for a thirty minutes' job, thinking it might take about ten minutes to a bed. I did not consult my wife, for women do not understand machinery, and any suggestion of hesitancy on my part would have demoralised her.

The last thing to be done was to connect the indicator with the battery, a simple enough performance in itself, but the pamphlet of directions gave a repeated and red-lettered "Caution" never to interfere with the machine while it was at work. I therefore issued the command, "Non-combatants to the rear!" and was promptly obeyed.

What happened next I do not pretend to account for. By what subtle and mysterious action of electricity, by what unerring affinity working through a marvellous mechanism, that Electric-Automatic Household Beneficent Genius, whom—or which—for short we called Juliana, sought its appropriate task, is the inventors' secret. I don't undertake to explain, I merely narrate. With a "Click!" the connection was made, and the new Juliana went upstairs at a brisk and business-like pace.

We followed in breathless amazement. In less than five minutes bed number one was made, and in a twinkling the second was taken in hand, and number three also was fairly accomplished long before the allotted thirty minutes had expired. By this time familiarity had somewhat dulled that awe and wonder with which we had gaped upon the first performance, and I beheld a smile of hopeful satisfaction on my wife's anxious countenance.

Our youngest, a boy aged three, was quick to feel the genial influence of this smile, and encouraged thereby he bounced into the middle of the first bed. Hardly had he alighted there when our automaton, having finished making the third bed, returned to her first job, and, before we could imagine mischief, the mattresses were jerked about and the child was tumbled headforemost on to the floor.

Had the flesh-and-blood Juliana been guilty of such an act she should have been dismissed on the spot; but as it was no one of us ventured so much as a remonstrance. My wife lifted the screaming child, and the imperturbable machine went on to readjust the bed with mechanical exactitude!

At this point a wild shout of mingled exaltation, amazement and terror arose from below, and we hastened downstairs to find our son John hugging his elbows and capering frantically in front of the kitchen door, where the electric cook was stirring empty nothing in a pan with a zeal worthy a dozen eggs.

My eldest hopeful, impelled by that spirit of enterprise and audacity characteristic of nine-year-old boys, had ventured to experiment with the kitchen automaton, and by sheer accident had effected a working connection between the battery and the indicator, and the machine in going off had given the boy a blow that made him feel, as he expressed, "like a funny bone all over."

The Juliana and the Bridget were fighting for the broom.

"And served you right!" cried I. The thing was set for an hour's work and a half, according to the showing of the dial-plate, and no chance to stop it before I must leave for my office. Had the materials been supplied we might have had breakfast; but remembering the red-lettered "Caution," we dared not supply materials while that indefatigable spoon was grating in the empty pan. For my distraction Kitty, my eldest daughter of seven years, now called to me from upstairs.

"Papa, you had better come quick! It's tearing up these beds."

"My dear," I sighed, "there's no way to stop it. We'll have to wait for the works to run down. I must call Harrison's attention to this defect. He ought to provide some sort of brake."

We went upstairs again. The B. G. Juliana stood beside the bed which she had just torn up for the sixth time, when suddenly she became, so to speak, paralysed; her arms in the act of spreading the sheets, dropped by her sides, her back stiffened, and she stood absolutely motionless, leaving her job unfinished—the B. G. would move no more until we again wound her up.

I now discovered that I was hungry. "If that fiend in the kitchen were only at work on something substantial instead of whipping the air into imaginary omelettes," I groaned.

"Never mind," said my wife, "I've got a pot of coffee on the kerosene stove."

Bless her! She was worth a thousand beneficent geniuses, and so I told her.

I did not return until late that evening, but I was in good spirits, and I greeted my wife gaily:

"Well, how do they work?"

"Like fiends," my usually placid helpmeet replied, so vehemently, that I was alarmed. "They flagged at first," she proceeded excitedly, "and I oiled them, which I am not going to do ever again. According to directions I poured the oil down their throats. It was horrible. They seemed to me to drink it greedily."

"Nonsense! That's your imagination."

"Very well," said Anna Maria. "You can do the oiling in the future. They took a good deal this morning, it wasn't easy to stop pouring it down. And they worked obstreperously. That fiend in the kitchen has cooked all the provisions I am going to supply this day, but still she goes on, and it's no use to say a word."

"Don't be absurd," I remonstrated. "The thing is only a machine."

"I'm not so sure about that," she retorted. "As for the other one—I set it sweeping, and it is sweeping still!"

We ate the dinner prepared by the kitchen fiend, and really I was tempted to compliment the cook in a set speech, but I recollected myself in time to spare Anna Maria the triumph of saying, "I told you so."

Now that John of mine, still in pursuit of knowledge, had spent the day studying Harrison Ely's pamphlet, and he learned that the machines could be set like an alarm clock for any given hour. Therefore, as soon as the Juliana had collapsed over a pile of dust in the middle of the hall, John, unknown to us, set her indicator to the broom-handle for seven o'clock the following morning. When the fiend in the kitchen ran down, leaving everything in confusion, my much-tried wife persuaded me to give my exclusive attention to that machine, and the Juliana was put safely in the corner. Thus it happened that John's interference escaped detection. I set Bridget's indicator for kitchen cleaning at seven-thirty the next morning.

"When we understand them better," I said to my wife, "we will set their morning tasks for an earlier hour, but we won't put it too early just now, since we must first learn their ways."

"That's the trouble with all new servants," said Anna Maria.

The next morning, at seven-thirty precisely, we were awakened by a commotion in the kitchen.

"By George Washington!," I exclaimed. "The thing's on to time."

I needed no urging to make me forsake my pillow, but Anna Maria was ahead of me.

"Now, my dear, don't get excited," I exhorted in vain.

"Don't you hear?" she whispered in terror. "The other one—swe-eep-ing!" And she darted from the room.

The next sound I heard was like the dragging of a rug along the floor. I recognised this peculiar sound as the footsteps of the B. G. Then came a dull thud, mingled with a shout from Johnnie, a scream from my wife, and the terrified cries of the two youngest children. I rushed out just in time to see John in his night-clothes with his hair on end tear downstairs like a sheet of lightning.

The Juliana and the Bridget were fighting for the broom!

I comprehended the situation intuitively. The kitchen cleaning, for which the fiend had been set, had reached a point that demanded the broom, and that subtle attractive affinity which my friend's genius had known how to produce, but had not learned to regulate, impelled the unerring automaton towards the only broom in the house, which was now in the hands of its fellow-automaton, and a struggle was inevitable.

However, this was no time for investigating the exact cause of the terrific row now going on in the front hall. The Beneficent Geniuses had each a firm grip of the broom-handle, and they might have performed the sweeping very amicably together could they but have agreed as to the field of labour; but their conflicting tendencies on this point brought about a rotary motion that sent them spinning around the hall, and kept them alternately cracking each other's heads with a violence that ought to have drawn blood. Considering their life-likeness we should hardly have thought it strange if blood had flowed, and it would have been a relief had the combatants but called each other names, so much did their dumbness intensify the horror of the struggle, in the midst of which the waterproof hoods fell off, revealing their startling human countenances not distorted by angry passions, but resolute, inexorable, calm, as though each sustained in the contest by a lofty sense of duty.

"They're alive! Kill 'em! Kill 'em," shrieked my wife, as the gyrating couple moved towards the staircase."

"Let 'em alone," said Johnnie—his sporting blood, which he inherits from his father, thoroughly aroused—dancing about the automatic pugilists in delight, and alternately encouraging the one or the other to increased efforts.

Thus the fight went on with appalling energy and reckless courage on both sides, my wife wringing her hands upon the staircase, our infants wailing in terror upon the landing above, and I wavering between an honest desire to see fair play and an apprehensive dread of the consequences, which were not unjustified.

In one of their frantic gyrations the figures struck the hat-rack, and promptly converted it into a mass of splinters. In a minute more they became involved with a rubber plant, the pride of my wife's heart, and distributed it impartially all over the premises. From this they cannoned against the front door, wrecking both its stained-glass panes, and then down the length of the hall they both sped again, fighting fiercely and dealing one another's imperturbable countenances ringing blows with the disputed broom.

We became aware through Johnnie's excited comment that Juliana had lost an ear in the fray, and presently it was discernible that a fractured nose had somewhat modified the set geniality of expression that had disguised Bridget's face in its prime.

How this fierce and equal combat would have culminated if further prolonged no one but Harrison Ely can conjecture, but it came to an abrupt termination as the parlour clock chimed eight, the hour when the two automatons should have completed their appointed tasks.

Though quite late at my office that morning I wired Ely before attending to business. Long-haired, gaunt and haggard, but cheerful as ever, he arrived next day on fire with enthusiasm. He could hardly be persuaded to refresh himself with a cup of coffee before he took his two recalcitrant Geniuses in hand. It was curious to see him examine each machine, much as a physician would examine a patient. Finally his brow cleared, he gave way a little puff of satisfaction, and exclaimed:

"Why, man alive, there's nothing the matter—not a thing! What you consider a defect is really a merit—merely a surplus of mental energy. They've had too big a dose of oil. Few house-keepers have any idea about proper lubrication," and he emitted another little snort, at which my wife coloured guiltily.

"I see just what's wanted," he resumed. "The will-power generated, and not immediately expended, becomes cumulative and gets beyond control. I'll introduce a little compensator to take up the excess and regulate the flow. Then a child can operate them."

It was now Johnnie's turn to blush.

"Ship 'em right back to the factory, and we'll have em' all right in a few days. I see where the mechanism can be greatly improved, and when you get 'em again I know you'll never consent to part with 'em!"

That was four months ago. The "Domestic Raries" have not yet been returned from Harrison's laboratory, but I am confidently looking for the familiar oblong packing case, and expect any day to see in the papers the prospectus of the syndicate which Ely informs me is being promoted to manufacture his automatic housemaid.

Short Stories That . . . . . . Make You Laugh.

We devote every week space in Short Stories to pithy, humorous anecdotes similar to those which appear in these columns. A prize of £1 1s. will be sent to the reader who submits the best storyette this week, and a P.W. penknife to each of those whose attempts are used. The anecdotes may be either original or selected; in the latter case, the source MUST be stated. Attempts must reach the Storyette Editor, Short Stories Office, Henrietta Street, Strand, London, W.C., by Monday, September 30th. Post-cards only, please. The prize of £1 1s. has been awarded this week to Mr. James Perkins, 95 Green Lane, Stoneycroft, Liverpool, whose contribution is denoted by a star thus.*

SHE: "Have you heard the three-year-old infant violin prodigy?" He: "Yaas! Heard him eight years ago in Vienna."

SHE: "You cannot kiss me with my consent." He: "Not once?" She: "No; but can't you see that I have left my consent at home?"

"YES," said Mr. Henpeq, "I, too, have my favourite flowers." "And what may they be, pray?" sneered his wife. "They are the ones that 'shut up' at night," he bravely managed to articulate.

CHARLIE SPARKES: "I should be sorry to marry a clever woman like that. Why, the other night, when he sent a telegram to say he'd be kept late in the city, she sent a message to his club saying she'd sit up for him till three."

SCENE: Mission room. Woman with little boy applying for soup ticket. Vicar's Wife: "Your little boy has a very bad cough, has he? Well, he looks well enough." Applicant: "Oh, indeed, lady, 'e 'as a 'orrible' cough. Coughs awful." (To little boy): "Cough for the lady, Billy."

BASHFUL MIKE (after a long pause): "I'm a-thinkin' I shall 'list an' go an' fight the Boers, Widdy McGay." "Faith, thin, it's a poor sojer you'll make!" "Phwat de yez mean?" "Oh, nothin'. Only a man who kapes on callin' on a widdy for a couple o' years without pluck enough to spake his moind hasn't the makin' of a sojer in him."

A SCOTCH settler in Victoria was arrested for stealing a set of bagpipes from a musically-minded Chinaman. When the case came on for hearing the defence was ready and fluent. "I'm no saying," said the Scot, "that I didna' tak' the pipes, but I hold I was pairfitly justifyit in rescuin' the national instrument o' my ain country frae the hands o' a yellow-skinned chow like yon, wha kames his wee pickle hair like the tail o' an auld soo. I'm willin' enouch to pay the fine, ye ken, but I'm dashed if I'll gi'e back the pipes to siccan a jaundiced-faced birkie to desecrate any mair."

* OWNER of property (sternly, to tramp reclining on a mossy bank): "Don't you see that notice—'Trespassers will be prosecuted?'" Tramp (calmly): "No, I don't see it, fer I can't read." Owner of property. "Well, you know what it is now, so go!" Tramp: "Hexcuse me, mister, but I don't know what it is. I've only got your bare word fer it, and you're a puffect stranger to me. Fer wot I know to the contrary, the notice may be 'New milk sold 'ere,' or 'Cherries tuppence a pound,' or 'Welkim, weary wanderer.' Don't you lay your 'ands on me, mister, or I shall 'ave to see whether my stick is really a good old oak, or only a sugar stick!"

"MARY JANE, have you given the goldfish fresh water?" "No, mem." "And why not?" "They haven't drunk up what's in there yet."

AN Irish magistrate asked a prisoner if he was married. "No," replied the man. "Then," said his worship, "it's a very good thing for your poor wife."

"THERE are many things in this world to which we must shut our eyes," said the paternal Gibson. "Yes, pa, and soap is one of them," chimed in the pride of the family.

"WASN'T that young Mr. Tiff who left the house as I came in?" "Yes, papa." "Did I not issue an injunction against his coming here any more?" "Yes, papa, but he appealed to a higher court, and mamma said yes."

"Now, children," said the school teacher, "can you tell me of a greater power than a king?" "Yes, ma'am," cried a little boy, eagerly. "What, Willie?" asked the teacher (expecting the answer, "An emperor") benignly. "An ace," was the unexpected reply.

GREAT JURIST'S WIFE: "What makes you so tired to-night?" Judge: "I had to charge the jury with an important case this afternoon." Great Jurist's Wife: "Oh! I suppose it is a great strain to recall the details of the case." Judge: "It's not that. It's being obliged to talk to the jury thirty long minutes without meaning anything."

OFFICER (just landed on island, to shipwrecked mariner): "You have been here six months without anything to eat? My poor fellow, whatever did you live on?" Shipwrecked Mariner: "Well, you see, sir, I found that whenever I thought of my wife and family at home, a big lump came in my throat, so I swallowed the lump!"

A NEWLY-MARRIED Birmingham man had never been satisfied with his meals since his marriage, so he told his wife to get a cookery-book and consult it every time she was going to cook. Next day the dinner was just the same, and the wife, seeing the sad look on her husband's face, said: "Don't you care for the pie, John, dear?" "It's awfully hard and tough," he replied. "Well, dear, I did as you told me. I made it out of 'Livewell's Cookery Book,'" she lovingly answered. "I thought so," replied John; "but you might have taken the leather backs off; then I could have my teeth through it."

THE proprietor of a Birmingham restaurant advertised for a cook the other day. The first to apply for the berth appeared to be in every way suitable. But before engaging him the restaurant-keeper inquired if he could give him a tip for the 2.30 race. The cook's eyes brightened. He whispered a "dead cert.," and mentioned that he had five shillings on the horse himself. That was enough. The proprietor gave him a lecture on the evils of betting, and showed him the door. As he went out he saw another man about to enter. "Are you going to apply for the job?" he asked. "Well, if you are asked if you know anything about racing, say you can't tell a Derby winner from a coster's donkey." The man took the advice, was engaged, and commenced his duties. Presently the proprietor rushed to the speaking-tube and yelled to the new cook: "Calf's head one." Instantly the reply came: "Did he, by George? What was second and third?"

DO YOU WANT A £5 NOTE?

Five Crisp £5 Notes to be Given to Readers Every Week.

£25 per Week if you will ask for it.

HERE IS THE SCHEME.

We have in our possession a considerable number of photographs of men, women, and children of all grades of society, secured for us by our agents, who have scoured the United Kingdom for this special purpose.

Each week we shall publish five of these portraits, and to each of the persons thus represented we shall dispatch the sum of £5, on his or her claiming same on a postcard addressed to

PORTRAIT DEPARTMENT, "SHORT STORIES,"
Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Although the persons whose portraits will appear in this competition are quite unknown to us personally, we have their names and addresses in our possession, and, therefore, a claim can be settled at once, without risk of fraud.

We may say that our agents are still at work all over the country. It is, therefore, possible that your portrait may appear without your knowing it at any moment. So you should watch SHORT STORIES.

HERE ARE THE FIRST FIVE PORTRAITS.

Is your portrait here? If so, drop us a post-card, and get £5. Five more portraits will appear next week.

All claims in connection with the above portraits must reach the address already given above by Tuesday next, October 1st.

Full names and addresses of the people represented in each number will appear in succeeding numbers, whether the five pound notes are claimed or not.

Simply write on a postcard these words:

> The Portrait No.......... (here put number of portrait) in the current number of SHORT STORIES is mine. Please forward a £5 note.

A Pair of Blue Eyes.

Howard put both arms around her, held her close for an instant, and then released her. It was in broad daylight on a crowded street crossing; they were not related to each other, and he did not even know her name. It must be said in his defence that it would have been a great unkindness on his part to have done otherwise.

She was hurrying to catch the tram from which he had just descended.

The street was wet and muddy; she slipped and would have fallen had he not caught her just in time. She blushed "celestial rosy red" and raised a pair of startled blue eyes to his face.

"Oh, thank you," she stammered.

She was gone before he could speak.

All day the blue eyes haunted him. They came between him and his writing and danced on the pages of the Lancet.

Had he been less devoted, heart and soul, to his profession, it is to be feared that even his patients might have found him absent-minded, for he failed to see two of his best friends on the street, and at dinner that evening was so preoccupied that his mother worried lest he was working too hard.

Weeks passed and the memory of the eyes was fading into a regret.

Dr. Carston's telephone bell rang suddenly one night, in the small hours. He had just fallen asleep after a nineteen hour day, but he could not ignore the ring. The summons was imperative. A stranger had called the nearest physician.

"Pray come," she implored, "for I am afraid my father will die."

The sweet, girlish tones were eloquent of distress.

Howard dressed himself hastily and went downstairs. He could scarcely open the hall door, so strong was the wind.

"A doctor leads a dog's life," he muttered to himself as he went out into the storm.

The address given him was that of a boarding house a few streets away—one to which this was by no means his first visit. He found Mrs. Madison, the boarding house keeper, awaiting him in the hall.

"I am so glad you've come," she said. "Mr. Wharton is awfully sick, and the poor young lady, his daughter, is 'most scared to death."

The patient was so ill as to occupy the doctor's entire attention. The battle was for life. Hours passed before it was won, and the tired but glad physician was free to go.

"Now your father needs nothing but rest. Let him sleep as much as possible, and see that he has a cup of Mrs. Madison's beef tea when he wakes. I will call this afternoon," he said, looking at Mrs. Madison, although he spoke to Miss Wharton.

Howard went home to refresh himself with an hour's nap, a bath, and a cup of coffee before his office hours. At three o'clock he visited his new patient and found him doing well.

"You have saved his life," said Miss Wharton in a voice tremulous with gratitude, and she raised her eyes to Dr. Carston's.

Howard's head swam. He saw again a crowded street crossing, a waiting car, and held a slender, girlish form in his arms.

Miss Wharton's eyes were the violets of his dreams.

A Love Story of the City.

CHAPTER I.

In Which a Young Lady is Late.

"Hullo, Miss Merriman, have you been running after someone or running away from them? I saw you in Cheapside, but you actually outstripped my 'bus."

Doris Merriman—young, shy, simply dressed—coloured as she paused on the threshold of a small lobby that opened from one of the narrow streets off Cornhill and whose further extremity gave access to a flight of broad wooden stairs. The building through which it penetrated was dingy, plain, and single-storied. On a wall of the passage was a painted inscription—"Peter Adinsell & Company, Paper Merchants." Hard by this announcement stood Peter Adinsell in person, a tall, precise, yet not unattractive figure, in frock coat and silk hat.

"I beg your pardon, sir," he was told confusedly, "but I am a little late, so I was hurrying."

Peter Adinsell consulted his gold watch with great gravity. "It is just five-sixths of a minute past nine o'clock," he said. "Miss Merriman, you deserve a lecture."

Doris cast down her eyes—they were grey, and clear as a mountain pool. "It—it shan't occur again sir," she faltered; "it was my bull-finch, he was very old, and he took a fit this morning and died as I was getting ready to come out. I had had him for years." And the last words of the sentence were muffled by a passionate regret.

The paper merchant coughed. "You foolish, sensitive child," he said. "I didn't mean a lecture for the odd fraction of a moment, but for tearing along at such a pace, exhausting and overheating yourself. Even commercial rules are entitled only to a reasonable observance."

He hesitated, looking at the sorrowful face of Doris Merriman, at her blush-rose complexion, her quick, intelligent glance, limpid with feeling, her slight, yet graceful frame and delicate gloved hands. The sunshine of the September morning gleamed on her trim braids of chestnut and tinged them with tawny gold.

"In any case," he pursued, "I have had it on my mind for some time to express to you my entire satisfaction with your work. Yesterday I instructed Pimm to pay you, in future, a certain addition to your present salary. There, no thanks. Run upstairs and get your notebook ready; I am going out of town for best part of the day, and must polish off my letters as rapidly as possible."

Peter Adinsell had relapsed into his habitual dry demeanour and air of command. Although he was a practical trader, the employer of Miss Doris Merriman was no mere business man. At forty the head of an ancient and prosperous firm—whose vast connections were out of all proportion to their modest methods—Mr. Adinsell was a wealthy bachelor with a few magnificent hobbies.

The very newspaper which he held contained his name in large capitals—he had been entertained the preceding night at a public dinner that celebrated the devotion of some third of his fortune to national purposes. His integrity and frugal customs were a proverb in the City, as his father's had been before him. He seldom used his own horses—the London Bridge omnibus that had brought him from his West-End home was even now on the way to its destination.

Doris—more than half consoled for the death of her favourite by the praise and tacit sympathy of the great Peter Adinsell—had darted up the gloomy flight which led to the scene of her labours. With characteristic consideration, the paper merchant lingered, for his typist to make her entry unaccompanied. Soon he was striding in at the swing-doors on the upper landing—the whole of the second floor was occupied by the offices of his firm.

Miss Merriman had seated herself at her typing-table near the entrance to his own private apartment, and was cleaning her machine. The bell tinkled musically as she drew the carriage of the typewriter to and fro. A melancholy form, gaunt, deferential, slightly bald, was stooping over her, laying out at her elbow a batch of papers with deliberate gestures of instruction.

"Morning, Pimm," remarked Peter Adinsell, crisply, putting his umbrella in the rack. The other turned to bow. He was a privileged servant; twenty years of life had Thomas Pimm sold to the house of Adinsell; his junior clerkship dated back to the termination of his schooldays, and he had climbed by degrees to the full control of the staff.

"Good morning to you, sir," said the cashier. "There is a heavy mail in. Are you going down to the mill this afternoon, sir?"

"Probably," was the answer, "if I can slip off early enough. Will you take your book into my room, Miss Merriman?"

Doris obeyed, and Peter Adinsell put a low query to the cashier. "Has Goulder condescended to arrive, yet?" he asked.

Pimm flung an optical query across the office. A stool at the high desk in the middle of the floor was empty; the others were tilted at various angles and occupied by busy writers, all the busier for their master's presence.

"No, sir," said the cashier, rubbing his hands deprecatingly.

The paper merchant wrinkled his brows. "Bad, bad!" he muttered. "The fellow gets worse. Lucky he is my nephew and not my son, Pimm."

"Indeed yes, sir," agreed Pimm. "The prospect of the firm ever being 'Adinsell and Son' seems—begging your pardon, sir—to be growing fainter and fainter." And the cashier tittered at his own retort.

"Heigho!" sighed Peter Adinsell; "I don't suppose I shall marry, Pimm. I must contrive to occupy my spare time with building libraries. My poor sister's fate ought to be a warning to me. If I had a child like Cecil Goulder I would——"

"Sssh, sir!" interrupted the cashier; "here he is."

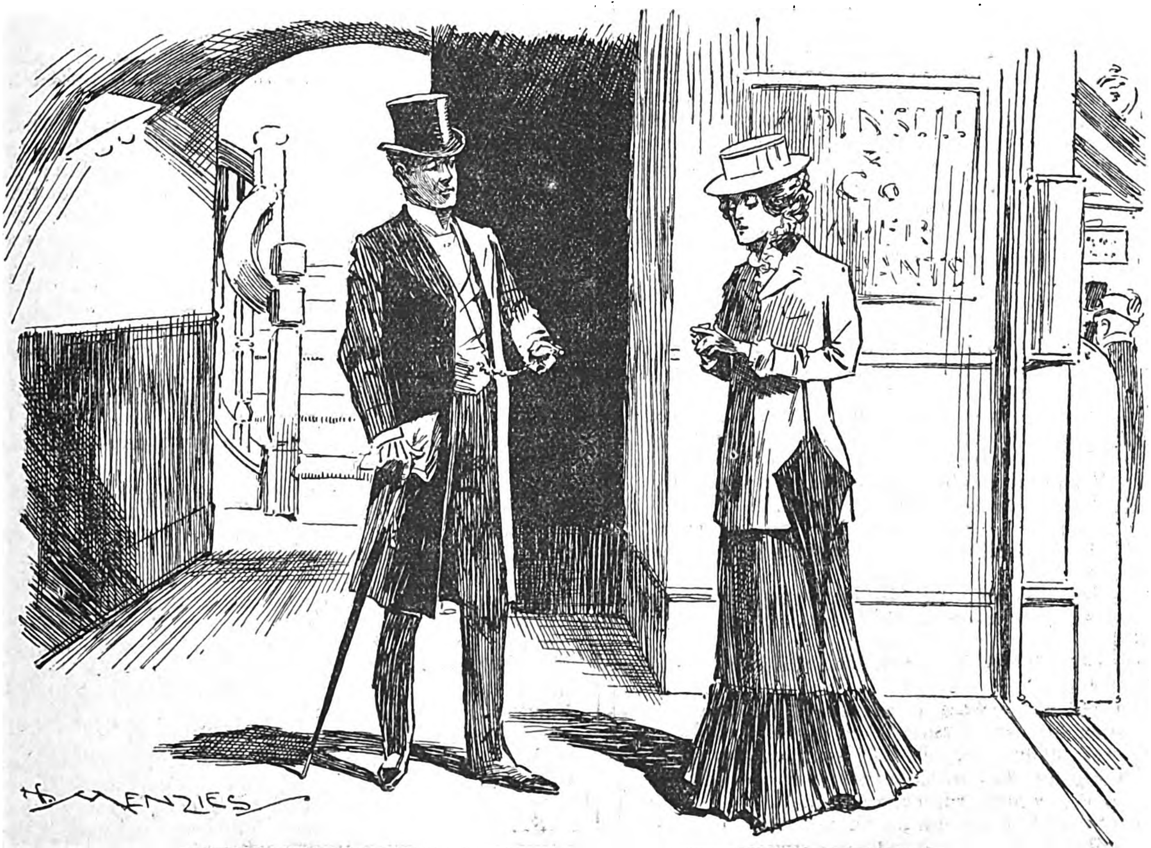
The merchant spun about. The door of the principal office had been thrust ajar and a slouching personage slid in—a personage limp and leaden of gait, with blood-shot eyes, purple lips, and a yellow skin. The clerks peeped covertly over their shoulders and nudged one another. Peter Adinsell walked to the newcomer.

"This is not a fit condition in which to approach the tasks of the day," he said. "Dissipation is stamped upon you, unhappy boy! Will nothing rouse you to your folly?—I believe you spend at the bar or at billiards three in four of your leisure hours."

His nephew scowled, but modified the insolence of his bearing by a miserable whine.

"Who's been lying to you about me?" he grumbled. "Don't you see I'm ill? I can't sleep of nights—that's what's the matter, uncle."

The merchant frowned and walked away from his young relative towards the apartment where Doris Merriman sat with pencil and note-book.



Peter Adinsell consulted his gold watch with great gravity.

"Have those bonds come in from the brokers, Pimm?" he asked, halting on its threshold.

"The ones for the Adinsell Trust, sir," said the cashier. "No. Shall I ring up?"

"Do," replied Peter Adinsell, and passed on into his private room. With a growl of sulky ill-temper, Cecil Goulder clambered on to the vacant stool, picked out a pen, opened a big ledger, and began to work.

As the paper merchant shut the door, he caught a glimpse of his nephew and sighed again. Then he dropped into the swivel-chair at his massive desk and smiled—his gaze had encountered the pretty, thoughtful, face of his little typist. Within the last few moments he had awakened to two unsuspected facts—the possible tragedy of a bird's death and the subtle charm of Doris Merriman's features.

"Forgive my keeping you waiting, Miss Merriman," he observed, and reached to his letter-basket. For a quarter of an hour he raced through correspondence and composed replies while Doris's pencil flew over the ruled pages. She wrote a neat, almost microscopic, shorthand, nervous but fast—it attracted her employer's attention and he paused.

"Do you know," he inquired contemplatively, "I have never noticed till now what a beautiful thing a sheet of your shorthand is? It is as dainty as you are—and you are very dainty."

The scarlet flamed up in Doris's cheeks at his compliment. He was delivering her the missive to which he had dictated the response. Their fingers touched. Peter Adinsell's were white and strong, Doris's slender and tremulous. Something of her excitement seemed to communicate itself to the merchant—his almost haughty countenance became flushed and irresolute.

A tap sounded at the door, and Peter Adinsell looked up as Pimm entered the apartment.

"I am going to the bank, sir," the cashier announced. "Have you anything for your private account? I have heard from the broker's, sir; they are sending the bonds across."

"Thank you, Pimm," said the paper merchant. "No; there is nothing you can do for me."

His tone was sharp and decisive. He had regained in a flash the demeanour of a man of business. When they were alone again he concentrated himself upon his correspondence, and with a stern brevity, finished the dictation of the replies. Doris secretly admired her masterful employer; but after his bewitching lapse into friendliness, his return to the previous and more familiar mood abashed and chilled her.

As she rose to leave, something in her expression won Peter Adinsell from his absorption, and his features relaxed.

"Tell me," he desired, "have you no other friends—animal or human—to balance the loss of your bullfinch?"

Doris shook her head frankly. "I have the people I live with," she allowed. "They are relations—my father and mother are dead. But I don't quite think my aunt and uncle are friends—not exactly. Poor Bully was a darling. He had such quaint ways that only I understood—he would perch on my thumb, and hop up on my arm, and even kiss me."

She stopped, blushing, and commenced to twist the knob of the door. Peter Adinsell smiled.

"After all," he said, "Bully's virtue had its reward." And he studied her mischievously. Doris wondered how she could have imagined him old; the gaiety of youth had leapt into his face with that smile. But she was not lacking in self-respect, and her employer's observation was certainly a trifle daring. So she grew grave abruptly.

"Will you be able to sign your letters if you are going out of town, sir?" she asked, changing the subject with feminine skill.

The merchant bit his lips amused at her tact. But he did not choose to apologise for his audacity. "I shall come back later," he said, "on my way West from the station. You can leave them, with the envelopes, in here, and I will post what are urgent."

Doris gathered up her papers to depart, vaguely conscious that she had made the acquaintance of a hitherto unsuspected side of Mr. Adinsell's character. As she opened the door, one of the clerks appeared in the entrance.

"A messenger from Grimwood's, the brokers, sir," he announced. The merchant nodded.

"Let him step through," ordered Peter Adinsell, and Doris slipped out, while the smart Stock Exchange emissary, with his chained portfolio in his hand, passed into the room. The door shut, closed by its spring.

The typist settled herself at her machine, found the first page of the morning's dictation and started to tap out the translation. The clerks scrutinised her, from a distance, in their usual free fashion. Between the cashier's corner, which she shared, and the main section of the office was, however, a stout, waist-high railing.

Nearest her, in virtue of this arrangement, there lolled upon a mahogany slope of the ledger desk the person reproved so recently by Mr. Adinsell for his tardy arrival and dissolute appearance. From time to time he cast at her a leer of vulgar admiration. The broker's messenger treated her to a scarcely less appreciative review as he hastened out, swinging a portfolio much reduced in bulk. Doris proceeded collectedly with her typing. She was used to these masculine peculiarities.

At length a latch clicked and the paper merchant himself strode forth, polishing his hat on the sleeve of his frock-coat. Of fine proportions, military bearing, and fastidiously correct garb, he might have challenged comparison, in a romantic sense, with any—even the youngest—of his clerks.

He paused at the typewriter table and laid something upon it. "Tell Pimm I am off to Barbury," she was instructed; "and give him this key—that of my private safe. He has the keys of the general one, so I have locked up temporarily in my own the bonds which Grimwoods have sent over. He must carry them to my solicitors—he knows the business, it is that of the Adinsell Trust. The key he must retain until morning. You will not forget to place my letters on the desk in my room against my return. Good-day, and do not hurry again as you hurried this morning. I would not like my little secretary to fall ill."

Doris accepted the shining steel thing and hooked it on her office chatelaine. Peter Adinsell watched her action approvingly, repeated his farewell, and walked from the office. As he passed out he looked back at his typist, and his grave mouth softened into an expression that might have been affectionate, that might have only been sympathetic, but which was certainly pleasant.

CHAPTER II.

IN WHICH SOMETHING IS LOST AND FOUND.

"I SAY, Miss Merriman, old Pimm's a deuce of a time. Suppose he's taking it easy because the governor's off for the day."

It was Cecil Goulder who spoke. He had abandoned his stool, crossed the office, and leaned upon the railing by which Doris sat at her typewriter. She tapped out the close of a paragraph, added a "Faithfully yours," drew the sheet from the machine, and inserted another.

"I shouldn't suppose anything of the sort," said Doris severely. "Mr. Pimm is not that kind of man; he has only gone to the bank." She turned to another page of her note-book, found the corresponding missive, and began to make the typewriter click once more.

Cecil Goulder did not accept the hint. Though he allowed the subject of the cashier's absence to drop, he remained obstinately at her side. "Beastly dull tack, that," he commented; "I couldn't swallow it, I tell you straight. It's as much as I can do to stand double entry, and that's merely owing to the fact that I can refresh myself with an occasional glimpse of you, Miss Merriman."

"Don't be silly," desired Doris; "and please go away—you're hindering my work. These replies must be finished for Mr. Adinsell, and Mr. Pimm has a lot of statements he wishes me to type."

"What's the use of my going away?" grumbled the other. "I'm stuck till old Pimm gets back—honour bright I am. By the bye, you heard the governor jawing me just now—if you didn't you might have done, he shouted it loud enough. Precious considerate he is of my feelings. Oh, hang it, Doris," he broke off, "stop that dashed rattle!" And a shaking palm—mute witness to Mr. Goulder's shattered health—was laid upon her wrist.

Doris Merriman snatched her arm free. "How dare you!" she exclaimed under her breath. "And if you call me by my Christian name again, I'll——"

Cecil grinned. "What will you do, Miss Straightlace?" he demanded. "Complain to my uncle—a pretty matter to complain about. There, don't create a scene before the whole office and I'll be good."

He lounged against the barrier, critically perusing the lines of violet print she was tapping out. His broad shoulders effectually screened her from the view of the interested clerks beyond, and Doris winced as she heard them whisper and laugh. But she understood the character of her persecutor and favoured him with no further response of any description. At last he moved off, growling in a spiteful undertone.

Mr. Goulder had some reason, however, to remark upon the cashier's delay in returning from the bank. A couple of hours had elapsed since Mr. Pimm's departure; the majority of the clerks were preparing to leave for their lunch. Cecil Goulder chose to remain, apparently engrossed in the despised double entry.

Soon there were only left, with the exception of the laborious Cecil, the small errand-boy, eating his package of bread and butter in a corner, and Doris Merriman, still operating her machine and availing herself of chance pauses over her shorthand notes to consume a sandwich.

Finally Cecil glanced up. "Not going out to lunch, Miss M.?" he called. "Bad for your complexion, you know."

"I am too busy," said Doris coldly, and went on with her clash of bars and roll of wheels. Mr. Goulder scowled—perhaps at the manner in which the retort was delivered—and slamming his ledger, reached to his hat and slouched from the apartment.

Glad to be rid of his presence, Doris finished her sandwiches, rinsed her finger-tips, and devoted herself to the completion of her task. The morning's mail was, as Mr. Pimm had announced, exceptionally large, and most of the replies were lengthy.

A summons in the outer vestibule interrupted her. At the wide counter that shut off the entrance of the suite of rooms from the exterior landing a uniform had appeared, and its wearer, seeing no one at the long desk in the main room, had uttered a stentorian "Telegram!" Doris crossed for it. It was addressed rather curiously, to—

Office,
Adinsell & Co.,
40, Chitling Street, E.C.

Doris opened the buff envelope and unfolded the message. It read:—

> "Knocked down cab in Cheapside this morning. taken hospital insensible and sent on home. Only shock—return to-morrow.—Pimm."

The girl gazed at the words. Suddenly there flashed into her mind the remembrance of Peter Adinsell's order—the bonds in the private safe—they were to be delivered by Mr. Pimm to the lawyers. What ought to be done about them? Mechanically her hand drew up her chatelaine to touch the key which had been given her. It was gone!

"Any answer, miss?" asked the bringer of the telegram, staring inquisitively at her white face and drawn lips.

"N-no, no," murmured Doris confusedly, and sprang back to her chair. Eager to terminate her own alarm, she looked about it, beneath it, in the hollows of the typewriter, on the table, under the adjacent hearthrug. Ransack and examine as she would, the key had vanished.

The forehead of the little typist grew damp. In the private safe to which that missing slip of steel possessed the power of entry, were the bonds representing Peter Adinsell's gift to the Adinsell National Library Trust—oil bonds, railway bonds, canal bonds, Government bonds, all first-rate negotiable securities, and worth two hundred thousand pounds. She had placed the key on the strong metal chain that swung from her waist, Peter Adinsell had watched her secure it, and now it was there no longer, and neither her employer nor the kindly Mr. Pimm were near to provide against the dangers of the loss.

Suddenly a thought struck her—a thought that sent the blood rushing to her temples and produced bewildering gleams before her eyes. She was certain that she had threaded the key upon the split-ring of her chatelaine. From that time till she crossed to the counter to receive the wire she had not moved, nor had anyone approached her, save Cecil Goulder.

The recollection was electrical. She suspected the purpose of his forced conversation over the rail, his nearness to her, his dawdling attitude and restless actions. He must have caught the sentences exchanged between herself and Mr. Adinsell, and between that gentleman and the cashier, respecting the bonds from Grimwood's for the Adinsell Trust.

What that trust was everybody knew—the morning journals were full of it. Peter Adinsell had said the previous night at a great West-End hotel during the course of a remarkable speech, that his brokers had bought him two hundred thousand pounds worth of "gilt-edged" bonds, and that, within a few days, his solicitors would hand them to the trustees.

Switched on the lights again and revealed to the would-be thief the trap he had fallen into.

Doubtless Cecil had heard also Pimm's telephonic inquiry, he had seen Grimwood's clerk visit Mr. Adinsell, he had learned that the bonds were deposited in his uncle's private safe, and—worst of all—he had gathered that the key of the said safe was in her charge. He alone could have pilfered the valuable article entrusted to her.

What should she do? Girl as she was, she realised that no scandal must taint the honoured name of Adinsell. Yet, if anything should happen to those bonds, Peter Adinsell would, she dare be sworn, replace the amount, even if it crippled his splendid resources. Oh, if Mr. Pimm had not been knocked over in Cheapside and sent home by way of the hospital!

She sat down at her typewriting-table to consider. One by one the clerks strolled in and resumed their occupations. But no Cecil Goulder was among them—the very fact was suspicious. A joke or two was cracked by his colleagues over his non-appearance, after which it provoked no further notice. Doris got up to announce the accident which had befallen Mr. Pimm, and returned to her work and her meditation.

So the afternoon wore on, with a trifle more of gossip and laughter than would have been possible in sight of Mr. Pimm or hearing of Mr. Adinsell.

Meanwhile Doris had come to a certain decision, in part execution of which she wrote a short missive, addressed it to her home, and had it posted. The errand-boy who took it was instructed to bring back with him from a convenient pastrycook's the materials for a fairly substantial meal. Doris Merriman had resolved to hold the fort in person.

When six boomed from Bow Church along thronging Cheapside, the staff began to melt away. Doris bade her colleagues good-night gravely; her machine was still clicking, and a small pile of "statements" lay at her elbow.

The last clerk gone, and with him the resentful errand-boy, Doris heaved a sigh of relief and hastened to set the door of the private room ajar. The sight of the black iron safe, solid and intact, comforted her.

This done, she ate her tea hurriedly. By seven o'clock at the latest the resident caretaker of the building would descend to clean out the offices, and her presence there be perceived. Picking up her hat and jacket, and removing the traces of her meal, Doris extinguished the lights and entered the private room of Peter Adinsell, to attack the second stage of her plan.

By the fireplace rose a tall, deeply recessed cupboard, usually kept on the latch, but supplied with a lock and key. In this Doris ensconced herself, and fastened it from the inside. She had arranged an impromptu sofa of paper samples, and sank upon it, panting.

She was only just in time. The jar of bucket and dust-pan grated upon her ear, and through the chink of the door she could tell that the office had been re-illuminated. For twenty minutes the elderly charwoman bumped and banged, then quiet supervened. Doris was alone again. With a cautious sigh she stepped out of her prison and seated herself in the sacred swivel-chair of Peter Adinsell.

Everything was very dark and solemn. By degrees Doris's graceful head drooped upon her arms, her breathing grew regular, and, in spite of her efforts to remain awake, she dozed. Bow bells rang out the hour—eight o'clock, the quarter followed, the half ensued.

The latter chime had scarcely died on the air when a hand was placed upon Doris's shoulder. She started and looked blinkingly at the yellow rays of the electric pendant over Peter Adinsell's desk. In front of her stood the paper merchant, and with him was a feminine figure, silver-haired, but handsome, upright, and a trifle severe. Both Mr. Adinsell and his companion were contemplating amazedly the picture presented by Miss Doris Merriman.

Doris's heart leapt into her mouth, but she rallied her wits determinedly. "Please," she said, "I—I lost the key of the private safe, sir, and—and Mr. Pimm didn't come back, so I—I stopped to take care of it, because of the bonds."

Peter Adinsell wondered if he were dreaming. But Doris, with her lustrous grey eyes, her palpitating colour, her tremulous lips, was no dream. The merchant placed a chair for the elder woman.

"Sit down a moment, Bilhah," he suggested. "This is Miss Merriman, my typist. Miss Merriman," Doris was told courteously, "this is my sister, Miss Bilhah Adinsell."

A pause showed that Doris's employer was pondering the extraordinary situation in which he found her.

"Miss Merriman," he added, "your conscientiousness does you honour, and I am glad for your sake that I returned earlier than I anticipated on account of my sister journeying with me. You say that you have lost the key that I left in your charge. Will you not explain more fully?"

Miss Bilhah Adinsell rose and bent over the girl thus questioned. "Steady your nerves first, my dear," she advised, patting Doris's cheek. "Poor child! to stop here all alone, shut up and locked in. I declare it makes me melancholy to think of it."

"But why not have contented yourself with warning the caretaker?" demanded Peter Adinsell perplexed.

Doris faltered. "I—I fancied I'd better not, sir," she said. "I—I don't believe I lost the key—it—it was stolen. Oh, please don't ask me any more. No one knows I stopped. I wrote home that I was going to a friend of mine at Dalston, and I hid in your big cupboard while the office was being cleaned. And I know the safe hasn't been touched, for I watched it through a crack. Do be satisfied with that and let me go."

The paper merchant leant on the top of his desk and his dark eyes met Doris's reassuringly. "Trust us, Miss Merriman," he urged. "Whom do you suspect of stealing the key?"

Doris was saved the trouble of evasion or reply. A bell pealed below, and footsteps descended to answer it—the caretaker lived on the topmost storey. Instinctively the three persons in Peter Adinsell's room fell to listening. A latch clicked, and a familiar voice was heard dimly through the door and partition.

"Don't trouble to come up, Bateson," it said. "I have matches. I just want a letter I forgot to post and that must catch the mail."

The voice was the voice of Cecil Goulder. When he recognised it, the paper merchant leapt to the switches, snapped out the lights, and drew Doris and his sister into a sheltered angle. The next minute Cecil entered the apartment, a vesta burning in one hand and a key grasped in the fingers of the other. He was dressed in a heavy ulster and travelling cap, and had set down on the mat a distended Gladstone bag.

As he thrust the key towards the aperture of the safe beside the desk, his uncle switched on the lights again and revealed to the would-be thief the trap that he had fallen into.

Cecil Goulder's gaze wandered from Miss Bilhah Adinsell to her brother, and from Peter Adinsell to Doris. A spasm of hate contorted his features.

"Out-schemed, you jade!" he hissed. "But you shan't have the laugh of me, curse you!" He made a quick motion and levelled his arm. The paper merchant threw himself on his nephew, to wrest from him, dangerously, a small six-chambered revolver.

Peter Adinsell was too late. One of the cartridges had cracked ominously. Doris Merriman reeled back into the swivel-chair with Miss Bilhah supporting her.

CHAPTER III.

A Drive from the West.

"Now, my dear, if you are not quite strong again you are not going back to the City this morning. I can't understand what makes my brother so anxious to carry you off. I am sure Cadogan Square is better than Cornhill yet awhile for a young lady who has had a bullet through her shoulder."

Having given vent to this opinion, Miss Bilhah Adinsell rose from her chair at the dainty breakfast-table and went to bend inquiringly over Doris Merriman, who, a little paler and slighter, sat where she could look down into that part of the West End just mentioned by her hostess.

"I wish to go, too, dear Miss Adinsell," said Doris gently. "Indeed, I ought to have gone home that—that terrible night. But Shepherd's Bush was so far off, and Mr. Adinsell so determined. I—I think he got that City doctor who came to frighten me about the danger of travelling, on purpose. But he has been very, very kind."

Miss Adinsell took up her guest's cup and filled it from a silver tea-pot. "My poor child," she answered, "it was our own flesh and blood, worse luck, that had injured you. We were bound to make you comfortable. We would have done as much for the merest stranger."

"I suppose so," she murmured and sipped her tea, glancing about her regretfully. The breakfast-room at Peter Adinsell's house in Cadogan Square was a cheerful apartment, simple, bright, and yet luxurious. She had set in it for a dozen mornings now, and for more than a dozen before that, she had been given her morning meal in a cosy chamber adjacent to Miss Adinsell's boudoir. Hither she had been borne after her startling experience in the City. Peter Adinsell had made himself entirely responsible for her restoration to health.

His sister was keeping an expectant watch upon the door. "Who can Peter have in the library?" she exclaimed. "He did not eat half a breakfast. And there is the carriage at the door. Peter said you must be driven back in state. I insisted you ought to have a holiday, but he only told me, in his masterful fashion—'I cannot do without Miss Merriman any longer.'"

There was a footfall at the entrance of the breakfast-room, and Peter Adinsell made his appearance. He was thoughtful, even gloomy; but his face lighted up as his gaze travelled to Doris.

"Are you ready? Miss Merriman," he asked. "Don't mind my sister's protests. I know she is anxious to keep you in Cadogan Square, but I am adamant."

Doris got up silently, and slipped away to don her familiar costume—the tiny toque and trim jacket in which she had gone down to the offices of Peter Adinsell & Company a whole month ago. The merchant waited in the hall, smoothing his silk hat abstractedly on his sleeve, as was his habit. Miss Adinsell kissed her guest as she passed down the stairs.

"Good-bye, dear," she said, "and thank you a thousand times for letting us hush up Cecil's dreadful deed," she whispered. "After all, he's our sister's only child, and an exposure would have killed her. Come and see me soon, and remember, whatever happens, I am your true friend."

The little typist could not reply—some mysterious emotion seemed to be choking her. She returned Miss Adinsell's kiss and hastened to descend, struggling for self-control. Her employer helped her into the brougham, the horses fretted, plunged, and were off on the road to the City.

Peter Adinsell studied her as she lay back against the leather cushions. "You could not guess, Miss Merriman," he observed, "what I have been doing this morning. But I have been bidding farewell to the unhappy lad whose criminal folly you helped to restrain, and who repaid you—with a bullet! He says he had been drinking that day—he asked me to tell you as much, though he dare not hope for your forgiveness. England, however, will know him no more. He sails for Australia to-morrow."

Doris interlaced her fingers and whispered that she wished him prosperity.

"You wonder at my hastening your return to the office," said the paper merchant after a pause. "I had a reason. While you remained under my roof I did not think it fair to approach a subject that demands your attention—and mine. I desire you to relinquish your situation with Adinsell & Company."

He glanced away from Doris Merriman's young countenance—it had grown white and piteous.

"You were too sensitive, too delicate, in a word too finely touched," he proceeded, "for the life of a business woman. I may say at once that I have found you a different sort of position—a—a more comfortable, and, I trust, a more attractive one."

"I am sorry," gasped Doris, "that you want to send me away."

"I did not say so," retorted the paper merchant. "You would still be, so to speak, with me."

"Would I?" said Doris, suddenly relieved. Peter Adinsell contemplated her tremulous lips and heaving bosom, and was encouraged to take his fate in his hands like a man.

"Yes," he murmured. "I—I cannot do without you. Doris, be my wife?"

Doris gazed at him astounded. But the merchant stole an arm around her and drew her to him. "And Miss Adinsell?" whispered Doris.

"Is at Cadogan Square on tenterhooks of expectation," was the response. "Doris, my darling, she—she said you wouldn't have me."

* * * * *

There was nothing but a call paid at the office that morning, for Peter Adinsell carried off his betrothed for a long drive in the park and a tête-à-tête lunch at Prince's. He did find time, however, to send a telegram to Miss Bilhah—a telegram that contained the one phrase, puzzling to all but the recipient: "I am not too old."

Mr. Pimm—long since recovered from his accident—saw them off from the doorway in Chitling Street, and as he turned to ascend the staircase, glanced at the inscription on the wall at his side.

"'Peter Adinsell & Co.,'" he muttered. "Ah, well, perhaps we shall alter that one of these days. But who would have expected Mr. Peter to fall in love with that grey-eyed typist?"

Counsel for the Defence.

BY VAUGHAN DRYDEN.

THE bright June sunshine, pouring down on the grim walls of the Central Criminal Court, lights upon a kind of human fungus which has attached itself by means of one greasy, humped-up shoulder to the door-post, and never ceases from directing its evil red eyes into the hall, the while it sucks absently at a perfectly cold clay pipe of venerable appearance. Another human fungus, if possible more hump-shouldered, greasy, and red-eyed than the first, shuffles up.

"Court full?" it asks.

"Yus."

"Wot's on?"

"Mouf-piece bein' tried."

"Garn! A mouf-piece! Wot for?"

"Outin' a bloke."

The second fungus gives a hideous chuckle.

"Lummy!" it croaks. "A barrister up for murder. Ain't that lovely? That wins it—strite, it does. Lor', I'd like ter see that blooming mouf-piece 'ung. Wotatreat! We'll 'ave ter wet this. Come on, I've got enough for a pint."

The two fungi slunk across the road into a neighbouring public-house, being the sort of excrescences that do nothing except furtively invest even such innocent things as hospitality and conviviality with an air of vague guilt.

Inside the stuffy Court hundreds of eyes are measuring the prisoner's neck for the halter. Two ladies occupy seats on the Bench, their airy summer attire making the sword of justice above the judge's head look grimmer than ever. The case is no ordinary one, for a member of the Bar is being tried for his life.

Dermot McDonnell, the rising young barrister, is charged with wilful murder, and to the ladies on the Bench and the other spectators this is the tit-bit of the list. The fungi outside found a grim relish in the idea of a "mouth-piece" being tried for "outing a bloke." The same idea is naturally expressed differently by fungi and hot-house flowers.

The kind, wise face of the old judge is troubled. Every member of the legal profession, from his lordship to the most junior member of the Junior Bar, keenly feels the stigma which is hovering over their craft. Milton, K.C., who leads for the Crown, has been naturally moderate in his opening address.

"They all—even old Foxe on the Bench—want to get him off," grumbles a spectator with a taste for blood. "Great shame, I call it."

In opening the case Mr. Milton revealed the following facts:

The murdered man, Mr. John Maguire, was a retired merchant. He was a bachelor, of simple tastes and habits, and, though well-off, chose to inhabit a flat in Challis Mansions, Kensington. The prisoner, Dermot McDonnell, was his adopted son, and heir to all the property, which was considerable.

On the afternoon of the murder prisoner had lunched with deceased, with whom he had always seemed on affectionate terms. There was to have been a third at lunch, Mr. Kevin Roche, K.C., a life-long friend of the prisoner's, but that gentleman had an engagement to lunch with some friends at Ascot, it being Gold Cup Day. (Laughter.)

His Lordship: "If there are any more of these unseemly interruptions I will clear the Court."

Resuming, the counsel for the Crown had said that the little party of two were waited on by George Sim, the deceased's own man. After lunch this man left the flat for about half-an-hour, and on returning was horrified to find his master stretched on the floor quite dead, having evidently been murdered.

Deceased had been stabbed to the heart from behind, but in spite of all their exertions the police had not been able to discover the weapon with which the deed was committed. Witnesses would speak to sounds of a violent quarrel proceeding from the flat during the absence of Sim.

Mr. Milton sits down, and during the usual buzz and rustle which ensues the spectator with a taste for blood nudges his neighbour violently.

"What's the row?" asks the latter somewhat crossly.

"Say," mutters the spectator, staring with all his eyes at the knot of counsel below him, "see the man for the defence—him with the black whiskers and the scar on his forehead? Well, that's Roche, what ought to have been at the lunch but went to Ascot instead."

"Never!"

"It is, reely," affirms the bloodthirsty one. "They're pals, you know, and I suppose McDonnell fancied the other'd do for him better'n than a stranger would. Don't he look worried?"

Mr. Kevin Roche, K.C., certainly does look worried. His heavy brows are bent, his square jaw, blue with constant shaving of a strong beard, is set, and with a long, white hand he tugs irritably at the sparse clump of black whiskers which ornaments his cheek. A man of strong passions this, and iron will. The square chin, the mouth shut like a trap, and the fire in the deep-set eyes proclaim it.

McDonnell, the prisoner, is taking things more calmly than his friend and advocate. With one elbow lightly resting on the part of the dock, he has turned his fresh-coloured, healthy, pleasant face towards the impassive occupants of the Press-box.

He is not strictly handsome, just the ordinary, clean-limbed, clean-minded, healthy young Briton which our public schools turn out by the thousands, to the eternal glory of these islands. His frank, blue eyes are idly watching a reporter sharpening a pencil. Decidedly, if appearances go for anything, not the man to do murder.

The cold, clear tones of Milton, K.C., were heard. He is examining his witnesses. The medical and police witnesses are quickly drained and dismissed. Kevin Roche, tugging at his whisker, does not cross-examine.

George Sim, elderly, respectable, and terribly nervous, enters the box. Has been valet to Mr. Maguire for eighteen—beg pardon, gentlemen, nineteen years. Recollects prisoner as a boy. Prisoner had always been treated as deceased's son, and they had always been on the most affectionate terms, far more so than some fathers and sons. There might have been some disagreement about a young woman. Disagreement began about three weeks ago. Mr. Dermot—beg pardon, gentlemen, the prisoner—wanted to marry a girl to whom his adopted father objected. Waited on the two gentlemen at lunch on the day of the tragedy. They were very quiet, and only talked of ordinary subjects—politics, racing, and such-like. After lunch went out for half-an-hour with his friend, Jack Leroy, porter at Challis Mansions. Came back to find deceased murdered, and calls in police.

Mr. Roche rises to cross-examine. How can witness fix the time of his absence after lunch?

Witness looked at his watch as he left the flat and at the clock when he came back. Both kept good time. He went about three-quarters of a mile—as far as the Crown and Sceptre in Holland Road. Had two half pints of beer and came straight back. There was no quarrel between the gentlemen while he was in the flat.

John Leroy, porter at Challis Mansions, supported the last witness's evidence, and is not cross-examined.

Ida Thorne, young, smartly gowned, and extremely self-possessed, is the next witness. She occupies a flat just over the one in which (with a pretty little shudder) the tragedy occurred. The flats were supposed to be sound-proof; but, as a matter of fact, were not. On the afternoon of the murder she distinctly heard loud voices in the deceased's flat. It sounded as if people were quarrelling. She distinctly heard deceased say three times in a high voice "I will not! I will not! I will not!" Then prisoner's voice cried "Take the consequences, then!" After that there was complete quiet for a few moments. Then heard the door of the flat bang and prisoner run downstairs. Immediately after that she went out to rehearsal (being on the stage) and did not return till late.

Cross-examined, had not the slightest doubt that the voice and step she heard were those of prisoner. Knew them well. Prisoner was a constant visitor at the flat. It was about a quarter to three when she heard the door bang. Ten minutes afterwards she had left the Mansions. She had heard no sound of a struggle.

Minor Crown testimony being heard, Mr. Roche intimates that he intends to call no witnesses. There is a buzz and a murmur, "Won't put his man in the box. That's bad!" And the spectator with a taste for blood cranes his neck an extra half inch.

Every syllable in the cold, clear tones of the Crown's leading counsel is another tap of the hammer on the nails in the prisoner's coffin. There never was a clearer case made out against a man in that Court. The eyes of the counsel for the defence are like lamps in his pale face.

The prisoner has lost his easy air, and stands perfectly still, with his eyes fixed on the man whose clear voice is fitting the noose upon his neck. Now and then he gnaws his lip, and a sharp intake of the breath tells that some new, skilful bit of art in the great advocate's speech has come home to him. By the end of the peroration the prisoner's face has taken on a grey look of despair.

Roche rises, and there is a murmur of surprise and curiosity. There is hope and confidence in every gesture of the barrister, in every tone of his deep, rich voice. He faces Court, jury, judge and all, with a superb air. He seems confident of beating down the net that the skill of the Crown counsel has flung round his client, and delivering him from the hangman's hands.

With practised hand he tears to tatters the evidence. And lo! what does it amount to? One Crown witness is a self-confessed beer-bibber, another belongs to a profession never noted for cold accuracy of statement. In Heaven's name, gentlemen, what is such evidence worth?

It is a masterly exposition; the Court is as still as death as the advocate thunders on. The prisoner's face is flushed with hope; he clutches the front of the dock.

Consider now, gentlemen, the weapon with which the deed was done. Such knives, largely used by sailors, are sold in thousands every week——

Good God! what are they all staring at? The judge leans forward, his face like granite.

"Mr. Roche," he says, sternly, "let me remind you that the weapon was never found."

Lost! lost! The advocate's face is livid and wet, his eyes stare horribly, his mouth moves, but no words come. There is a murmur of many voices as Roche, counsel for the defence, sways forward and falls in a fit on the floor of the Court.

* * * * *

Among his papers afterwards they found a full confession. Kevin Roche, the great barrister, was a born gambler, and his affairs were hopelessly involved. His largest creditor was the murdered man. Desperate, his back to the wall, the gambler resolved that he would not stick at homicide if he could so mend his affairs.

The invitation to lunch on Gold Cup Day gave him the opportunity. He declined it on the plea of a previous engagement for Ascot, went there, and was actually seen on the course by a number of acquaintances, and rushed back to London after the first race.

Having watched Dermot McDonnell leave the flat, he went up, and was instantly admitted. While his unsuspecting host turned to the sideboard to procure some refreshment, Roche stabbed him from behind with a sailor's knife, with which he had provided himself. He left the Mansions unperceived and took train to the Temple.

His horror when McDonnell was arrested was intense, and he resolved to make an effort to save him by appearing for the defence. His blunder with regard to the weapon was fatal.

"No," admitted Mr. Brasher, in a depressed tone; "I only wished to say that I have no news of Mr. Geddes. I wonder, Miss Connie, whether you'd pay me the compliment of so much regret if I were to disappear."

Connie gulped a sob. "The business is going to rack and ruin," she told him evasively; "father isn't fit to attend to it. He'll be poisoning somebody before long."

The Inspector scratched his head. "Talking about poisons," he remarked, "Geddes was more than a bit gone on poisons. He may have done away with himself in some experimental fit."

Constance Forester gave her favourite stamp. "It's absurd to suggest such a thing," she declared. "Mr. Geddes was too sensible. No; if he's come to any harm, Mr. Brasher, you're to blame."

"Well, I like that!" said Michael Brasher, ruefully.

"Yes, you are," persisted Connie: "he was trying to do your work, I'm sure of it. He was always worrying about Sir Christopher's murder and planning to get at the bottom of it. And a good job it would have been if he had been able to find out who killed the squire and prove that it wasn't Mr. Felix. Poor Miss Carew has just been driven from pillar to post since every old woman in Wyresdale took to scandalising Mr. Dering, and all the fine folks gave him the cold shoulder. Miss Carew's heart is broken, I'll be sworn, and—and—so's mine."

Connie dissolved into tears, and Michael Brasher left hastily—feeling that his position had become an ungraceful one. When he stepped on to the pavement outside the shop it was to see Otto Hare's phaeton flash by him, as he had seen it once before.

But this time the Golden Dwarf was not alone—though the rumble at the rear of the hooded front was empty. On the left hand of Otto Hare, as the swift roan cob sped down the High Street, sat Esther Carew, her delicate features drawn and her eyes fixed in a look of utter despair.

CHAPTER XXXIX.

A DUEL AND A DISCOVERY.

SPURT!

It was the scratch of a wax vesta struck cautiously upon a hard surface. The match burst into flame, and the sudden flame illuminated the features of Archibald Geddes. With a profound and foreseeing cautiousness, he had crawled over to that side of his singular cell at which the rock-hewn wall was diversified by the wooden portal.

Kraft had been armed, and the Scotchman was not inclined to risk being killed or disabled by a shot from the small moveable panel which he had observed in the upper part of the stout door. Crouched in the corner by it, he was comparatively safe from espionage or treacherous attack.

Puff! puff! puff! The chemist's assistant had set going a neat briar pipe. Its bowl had been filled—in the dark—for the fifth time. On each occasion Geddes had looked at his watch; he did so now; nine o'clock. More than twelve hours had elapsed since the light in the crimson globe had ceased to glow, and Archibald Geddes had been left to solitude and obscurity.

He weighed his rubber pouch—but a pipeful or two remained, and his match-case was almost empty. An over-powering hunger had seized upon him, the narcotic influence of the tobacco began to dull its pangs. He lay down at length on the harsh concrete and wondered if starvation were the fate to which Joseph Kraft had condemned him.

Hardy by birth and training, there was plenty of life in the Scotchman yet, despite his unconscionable fast. But his head ached with the continuous strain of his long vigil. For those twelve hours he had sat or lounged awkwardly, his hand on the bulb of his odd weapon, the ammonia-pistol; his muscles braced to make the most of its temporary effect on a possible foe.

As he pulled at his pipe, irritated by the absence of taste which the darkness lent the tobacco, but aware that it would sooth his ravenous appetite, he heard a sound—not that which had throbbed constantly about him like the purr of some huge animal, but a faint and wavering sound. It was the same, if he had only known the fact, which had startled Esther Carew when she paid her visit with Otto Hare, to the observatory on the hill.

Archibald Geddes drew his pipe from his mouth and whistled softly. The noise came once more, its nature was unmistakeable. He slipped to the door and lowered his ear to the threshold—an instant only, then he sprang back. A ponderous footstep was approaching without. The chemist's assistant retreated to his strategical angle and waited.

The footstep passed, and Geddes counted the moments. There was a splutter above him and the glow returned to the crimson globe that hung from the ceiling. It dazzled the Scotchman with a transient blindness.

At last there was a click at the door, and Geddes guessed that the panel had been opened. He flattened himself against the wall, so that he was invisible from the coign of vantage occupied by his enemy.

A period of suspense ensued. Finally a lock snapped, a bolt whined, the door swung in, and the lumbering form of Kraft entered. His plump fingers were extended before him and grasped a revolver.

The German had scarcely crossed the threshold when

£5 notes waiting to be claimed. See page 400.

Archibald Geddes leapt at him sideways, and a mimic deluge of ammonia bespattered the eyes of Joseph Kraft. Geddes had recollected that his adversary wore spectacles and directed his aim to defeat this protection. The German dropped his revolver, which exploded in its fall, and clapped his hands to his face.

The chemist's assistant darted behind him, dashed through the door, dragged it to, and bolted it. Seeing that the panel was ajar, he closed and hasped it also. A second after, a shot came crashing through the wood —Joseph Kraft had turned to bay.

Archibald Geddes dodged out of range and paused to review his position. He stood in a narrow passage, dark but warm. Before him and at his back was a vague gloom. From the key-hole of the door he had so precipitately fastened by its slight bolt, streamed a ray of the deep crimson lustre that had illuminated his onslaught upon Kraft.

Opposite this streak of blood-red light another, and paler, ray of the same hue fell athwart the dusk. A pace in advance, a couple of similar beams, doubtless streaming through corresponding key-holes, stabbed the darkness with a shaft of bright pink and one of a still more delicate flush.

Further on, along the narrow corridor, a quartette of blue rays, similarly varying in the depths of their tints, slanted towards the floor, and in the end of the cramped lobby, a brace of white rays pierced the shadows.

Ten rays in all, four red, four azure, and two of a dazzling white: Geddes started at them, as though puzzled by the combination. The slender beams of radiance seemed to tremble under the constant mysterious vibration that shook his surroundings. Archibald Geddes roused himself to seek a means of escape.

He turned, and perceived, a few yards off, a thin crack, as of a door, through which there stole the wan, yet pleasant, shimmer of daylight. Geddes would have hastened to it. But in that very moment there came again the faint, yet arresting, sound he had heard in the cell.

CHAPTER XL.

"YOU SHALL BE MRS. GARLAND."

"THERE, so much for that! Pardon my trespassing on your patience, Mr. Dering, but if you could understand the delicacy of the little matters I have had to arrange, you would forgive the length of my correspondence."

Neal Garland flung down his pen and closed the flap of the envelope he had just addressed. He blotted deliberately the wet ink of the inscription and put the missive in his pocket. The suppressed merriment with which he had vaguely irritated and alarmed Felix Dering still flickered about his features. But the tone of his harsh and usually defiant voice was polite enough.

Mrs. Schwartz's singular lodger had been writing for over an hour—first a scribbled draught, then a clean copy, and, in the end, a duplicate of the latter. The rays of the lamp had served to illuminate the constant humorous twitches of his mouth as his thin lips trifled with cigarette after cigarette.

"I say," he observed, as he opened, for the tenth time, the case containing those articles, "excuse my not offering you one. But you seem so determined to be on your guard I was afraid you might suspect me of attempting to hocus you. Isn't your wrist tired, holding that confounded pig-sticker of mine in such an awkward fashion?"

Felix Dering started. Neal enjoyed for a moment his companion's surprise. "Come," he said; "you are too clever, Dering, to make such a mistake. If I had contemplated doing for you I should have tipped the wink to Keturah, and she would have smuggled me in a pop-gun of some sort. What good is steel against lead? As for the noise, bah! we could have whisked you out of sight, and explained to any inquisitive soul that I had been cleaning the thing and had an accident."

He blew a cloud and waved it clear of his grinning countenance.

"I cannot compliment you on your perspicuity, my dear fellow," he added patronisingly; "if you were smart you would not have been decoyed here, or, had you accepted the risk, you would have carried it through more cold-bloodedly. However, I am not inclined to complicate my position by violence, hence your practical safety. As a rule, when it is worth my while striking a bargain, I perform it. Reassure yourself, therefore."

Neal chuckled over his impudence, and going to the cellaret in the sideboard, got out a decanter, filled himself a glass of port, fetched it to the table, and consumed it between the puffs of his cigarette.

Felix Dering—not to be bluffed into unwariness—maintained both his silence and his grasp of the stiletto. He had forseen all the dangers so insolently sketched by Neal, but he knew that a resolute and athletic man, even slightly armed, may match, with a trifle of luck, the most desperate odds. The next move on the board was Mrs. Schwartz's, and he waited it calmly.

At length there was the rattle of wheels in the thoroughfare below, succeeded by a sharp knock upon the street door as the dismissed cab rolled away. A couple of persons mounted the creeking stairs without, the leader undoubtedly the massive lodging-house keeper herself. She strode heavily into the lamp-lit apartment, clad in a huge mantle and gaudy hat. On her heels followed a tottering creature, shawled and bonneted in a by-gone mode, with hollow, dirt-encrusted cheeks and hands like claws. It was the baby-farmer to whose tender mercies Keturah Schwartz had entrusted Brian Dering. Mrs. Schwartz pushed her convoy into a chair.

Neal sprang up, spat out an oath, and hurled his glass at the grate, on which it shattered into a thousand pieces.

"Where's the kid," he hissed; "Keturah, where's the kid?"

Mrs. Scharwtz pointed a disdainful finger at the hag she had escorted thither. "Ask her!" was the landlady's advice; "she's as tipsy as David's sow, or I wouldn't have got her here, drat her wooden head."

Neal Garland acted upon the recommendation and started forward, to catch the old crone by the back of the neck and snarl in her ear. "Speak up," he cried; "what have you done with the child?"

A cackling laugh was the answer. "He-he!" tittered the drunken baby-farmer; "I had a fine bargain of him and no error. Twenty pounds I had from Kitty there to adopt him and thirty from the party I got rid of him to. What has anyone to grumble about?—Kitty said she never wanted to see the brat again, nor aught concerning him, except it was his burial certificate."

Neal shook the decrepit figure in his anger. "Fool!" he exclaimed; "who did you sell the boy to?—tell me before I strangle you."

Keturah Schwartz thrust her irate partner aside. "That's not the way," she said; "now, Mrs. Dobson, you've got to give us what information you can. It won't harm you: I'll take care of that, and you may trust my word. Who had the child?"

The baby-farmer smiled—a half-shrewd, half-foolish smile. "I—I don't know," was her response: "names are risky in my business and consequently aren't mentioned. A child of four or five was wanted, well-grown and healthy, I was told, to send abroad to a family as wished to adopt one."

Felix watched acutely the faces of the three, who, ignoring his presence, had exchanged these few rapid sentences. Yet he could not but discern that Neal Garland was as disappointed as himself at the result of

Mrs. Schwartz's mission. The features of this gentleman, however, were fast resuming their complacency. A glance passed between him and the fat woman. Neal assumed a more tolerant air and turned to the baby-farmer, the person to whom Keturah Schwartz had referred to as Mrs. Dobson.

"Perhaps you are correct," he admitted; "and we may have nothing to complain of. But as it happens, we desire to regain the child, and we need your help—you said it had been despatched abroad, where was the child to be sent?"

"Dear, dear, I am not sure," quavered the baby-farmer, "howsomdever, I think it was France. Or it may have been Russia—yes, I believe it was Russia. Some English folk out there it was for—the gentleman as bought the boy of me was a doctor and choosing it for them; he was most particular about the child being healthy. He-he, it was the only kid I had as was, so you can guess I hadn't had it long."

And the hag broke again into a shrill and cackling laughter. Neal slipped across the room.

"Mr. Dering," he said in an undertone; "I have done my part, as you see. The child was given to this creature to adopt—as you hear, she has sold it to be adopted elsewhere. Frankly I believe she is lying about the Russian destination of the child. But if she will not speak the truth nothing but the law will make her. That, though, is not my fault, and I claim the fulfilment of our agreement. I have set you on the track of the boy—allow me forty-eight hours, and then lay the police on the trail."

Felix reflected. After all, he was a Dering, and he had pledged his word. Also, he suspected that Neal and Mrs. Scharwtz, unscrupulous though they were—were but the minor villains of the plot which had been woven about him. He recollected the vague threats of Neal and decided against the wisdom of desperate measures.

"I have but a single condition to impose," he declared, "and that is that I learn, to my own satisfaction, the abode of this wretched creature. I propose to do so by accompanying her home, in a cab. Under the circumstances it is but too probable that I should be given a false one if I relied upon a verbal direction. On the condition I have stated, you may have your forty-eight hours' grace. It is now close on eleven o'clock. Upon the morning of the fourth day from now I will call in the aid of the law, as you suggest. After that, look to yourselves—I do not guarantee to shield you."

Neal called to Mrs. Schwartz. "Keturah," he said; "Mr. Dering has kindly offered to see Mrs. Dobson home to Whitechapel. He will thus assure himself of her actual address and prevent her being run over—or run in—on the road. Something would infallibly happen to her if she attempted the journey alone in her present degree of intoxication. Her limbs are as drunk as her tongue is sober."

Keturah Schwartz made an indifferent gesture of assent and went to rouse the tipsy baby-farmer.

"Wake up," she cried; "you're going back; we've finished with you, deuce take you." And she hustled the old crone from her chair and pushed her to the door. Felix followed—his brown right hand still clutching the stiletto in the shelter of his sleeve.

"The stairs are dark," he said; "have the goodness to go before me, Mr. Garland."

The other shrugged his shoulders and stalked down the rickety flight in the rear of Mrs. Schwartz and her charge.

Felix prepared to descend. As he set foot upon the top-most step he felt a touch on his arm, and glancing above him, saw that there leant over the balustrade of an upper flight a slovenly girl with sparkling eyes.

"I've been listening," she whispered: "I'm Louisa, the servant here, and I can tell you summat. Stop the cab at the street end and wait—I'll come after you. Ssss-t!"

And her mysterious message concluded, she vanished

The Day of Miracles not past.

A RETFORD FAMILY'S EXTRAORDINARY EXPERIENCE.

BILE BEANS CURE MOTHER, SON, AND DAUGHTER.

It has come to be a commonly accepted statement that the day of miracles has gone past. This is only partially true, for if many of the things done to-day had been done the day after that upon which Lazarus was raised from the dead, they would no doubt have been chronicled as miracles. For instance, the truly wonderful cure of Mrs. Turner, of Moorgate, Retford, and her son and daughter, by Chas. Forde's Bile Beans for Biliousness, would, doubtless, have attracted attention from the scribe, so sensational is it in its nature. Says Mrs. Turner, speaking to a Retford and Gainsborough Times reporter,—"For a long time I suffered so from weakness and debility that it was with difficulty I moved about. I had a constant feeling of heaviness at the stomach, and do what I would I could not get rid of it. My breathing was laboured and caused great pain. Many a time, when outside, I had actually to stand still in order to get my breath, so bad had I become. One day a neighbour gave me a few of Chas. Forde's Bile Beans, so I purchased more. From the time I began to take them I have gradually improved, until now I am quite well again." Mrs. Turner's daughter said she also had suffered from nervous debility, adding—"My strength left me, I became depressed, and lost all interest in everything. I could hardly move about. My mother gave me some of the Bile Beans, and I determined to give them a fair trial. The result is most satisfactory. Although only a short time has elapsed since I began to take them, my weakness and depression are gone, and my strength has returned. The Beans are certainly a wonderful medicine." Mrs. Turner told of the third cure in her family:—"A short time ago," said she, "my son could not go about his work in consequence of sick headache and dizziness. I gave him some of the Beans, and gradually his ailments ceased to trouble him. The Beans have done him worlds of good, and he is not slow to recommend them to others." Chas. Forde's Bile Beans for Biliousness are unequalled for nervousness, debility, indigestion, liver and kidney disorders, constipation, piles, headache, pimples and face sores, anæmia, female ailments, rheumatism, sleeplessness, neuralgia, palpitation, and the after-effects of influenza. All chemists stock Bile Beans, or you may obtain them direct from the Bile Bean Manufacturing Co., 119 London Wall, London, E.C., by sending prices, one and three-half-pence or two and nine.

in the gloom. Felix Dering's pulses beat faster and he went vigilantly down into the lobby. Neal was whistling for a cab; Mrs. Schwartz piloted the baby-farmer to the level of the pavement.

"They are anxious for their own safety," he decided mentally; "otherwise I should not be permitted to leave without a struggle."

Having passed which comment on the situation, he entered a four-wheeler, seated himself opposite the baby-farmer, and was borne off. Keturah Schwartz had instructed the driver.

The landlady and her peculiar lodger regained the lobby and climbed to the first-floor parlour.

"To-morrow, Kitty," said Neal, putting an arm about the fat woman, "we shall be on our way to the Continent. You've wanted me any time these two years—well, I will be magnanimous. You shall become Mrs. Garland in Paris. Go and pack; we will leave the house for the tradespeople to quarrel over, you'd have had to skip soon, at any rate—to avoid a committal to Holloway for debt."

"And what about Felix Dering?" queried Mrs. Schwartz, pushing her cynical wooer away: "he will get us extradited before our honeymoon is well begun."

Neal grinned his characteristic grin. "Fate is on our side, Kitty," he responded; "of course, even if Dering had had a glimpse of the child, he would have gone back to Wyresdale without it to fall into a trap of my laying. As it is, he has plunged himself more deeply in the mire and the disappearance of the boy will complicate him beyond extrication. He could not have done a worse thing than to mix himself with that old witch Dobson."

"What are you talking about?" demanded Keturah Schwartz.

Neal Garland held up the letter he had written during her absence and under the very nose of Felix Dering. It was addressed:

The Inspector in Charge,
Police Station,
Wyresdale,
Derbyshire.

"Go and pack!" he cried; "pack, my dear Kitty—we must be out of England when this is opened."

CHAPTER XLI.

"It's a Queer Tale."

"Excuse my coming in beside you, sir, but I want to whisper. Perhaps the old cat isn't as drunk as she looks."

In the light of the gas-standard near which the cab had halted, Felix Dering glanced at the baby-farmer. The unkempt figure was huddled into a corner of the opposite seat, apparently asleep. But he recognised the wisdom of the little servant's caution, and moved to allow her the suggested room.

With a hasty injunction to the driver to "Go easy for 'arf a mo'," Louisa drew the door after her, pulled up the window, and subsided, at a respectable distance from Felix Dering. She had tied a black shawl over her head, and panted, from haste and excitement. Calming herself, she leaned towards him.

"Won't I get in a fine row if Mrs. S. finds I've been out!" she gasped, sardonically; "oh, no, not much. I shall say I've been talking to the bobby on the beat. But about the child you came after—I heard that part of what Mr. Garland said, thanks to squeezing myself half through the key-hole and stopping my breath till I was purple in the face."

"Yes," murmured Felix, soothingly; "you had something to say to me."

"I had," admitted the little servant, "an' it's this—they went and dyed his blessed hair. Which it was all golden, to begin with, but when Mrs. S. took him off in the hansom, it were a sort of carrots."

The listener started. Neal had not mentioned the fact—was he playing false, or was it a lapse of memory? Louisa broke in upon his meditation.

"Do you know a big man, with yellow eyes and specs?" she queried, still in an undertone; "furriner, I'll bet a million. Sizes you up in a kind of smile as makes you feel as though he was a hundred and you just born. Wears a slop coat and has flat feet."

"By Jove!" exclaimed Felix; "yes, I do—his name is Kraft, he's a German."

"Right you are," said Louisa, "well, he first come about the house a couple of years ago, when Captain Schwartz was alive. The Captain was a Dutchman or a German, or one of them sausage-gorgers; went to sea, he did, most of his time. It was just afore his last voyage as ever was that he brought home Dr. Kraft and two whopping boxes, all coopered, like casks, and stuck full of holes, except where it was printed on 'With great care.' I was a bit of a girl then, at three shillings a week, and the doctor used to potter round the kitchen, cooking messes for some wild beasts as he kept in his boxes. Fine and curious was Mrs. S. about them, but not a sight of them had she to my knowledge, for all she prowled about 'em like Mrs. Bluebeard."

"My dear child," interrupted Felix; "what has this to do with the object of my search?"

"Nowt," conceded Louisa, honestly; "but that was when I first seen the doctor. Then he disappeared. Captain Schwartz was drowned at sea soon after, and not till the boy was fetched by Mr. Garland did the doctor turn up again. The very next day he lands in while the boy was knocking about. Some time after he came once more; I wondered if he could be in it anyhow."

A numbing sense of mystery seized on Felix—he groped for a clue to its recesses. Neal must have been gulling him, both Garland and Mrs. Schwartz must stand in a secret relation to Kraft, a relation hostile to the Derings. But for what reasons?—what could be the German's object in aiding or in commencing the intrigue which Felix was so powerless to plumb?

He stirred, to put a hand in his pocket and extract a sovereign.

"You have given me priceless information," he responded; "and I will not forget you, Louisa. However, for the present, accept this trifling acknowledgement." And he pressed the coin into the servant's palm—Louisa repulsed it.

Every year thousands of new books are published They are read and forgotten. But once in a hundred years a new book appears which THE WORLD IS WAITING FOR. It contains some new truth which alters the history of mankind. Such a book has just issued from the press. You will read it. If not to-day, then some other day, for sooner or later it will be read by all men and all women. And when you have read it your life will be altered. It will become better, happier, more joyous. The writer of the book is Professor Boyd Laynard. The name of the book is "SECRETS OF BEAUTY, HEALTH, AND LONG LIFE." It is pronounced by the Press to be the most remarkable work of the century.

Professor LAYNARD is now recognised as the greatest living authority on personal hygiene. The sale of this book is rapidly approaching ONE MILLION copies.

* * * * *

The first part of this remarkable book consists of a practical guide to the attainment of good looks without the aid of art. Professor Boyd Laynard will have nothing to do with powder, paint, face-washes, and the like, but gives plain instructions for the scientific cultivation of beauty. The rest of the book deals with health and long life. These chapters are of the highest value.

* * * * *

This remarkable handbook to the three subjects embraced in the title has been a long period in preparation by the author; being, in fact, the labour of many years of diligent research and earnest investigation. The work is arranged in 127 chapters, the whole of which (in the popular edition now offered to the public) is bound in one volume. The book, although published at Two Shillings, will, if ordered direct from the Publishers, be forwarded to readers of Short Stories, carriage paid, at the low discount price of

ONE SHILLING AND SIXPENCE.

Amongst the numerous subjects dealt with in Professor Laynard's work the following are but a few. A Complete Syllabus, showing the contents of the whole of the 127 CHAPTERS, enumerating upwards of 500 SUBJECTS and divisions of subjects, can be had free on application to the Publishers:

The way we make our own faces—Secrets of face transformation—Changeableness of beauty and its causes—Some Strange facts concerning the variableness of beauty—"Odd-faced" beauty—The countenance the counterpart of the mind—How pleasing expressions become permanent—How a person's habitual look is acquired—How permanent expressions can be transformed—Metaphysical secrets of keeping young and preserving a youthful appearance—The author's investigations into the causes why some individuals look younger than others at a certain age—Discovery of a great metaphysical secret—Wonders of the skin—Relation of the skin to beauty—Effects of mental emotions upon the skin—Effects of heat, cold, and changes of temperature upon the skin—Bad complexions and their causes—Diet that spoils and diet that improves the complexion—General care of the complexion—Construction, growth, and wonders of the hair—Why hair falls out, and its remedy—Premature greyness: its causes and prevention—General care of the hair—Superfluous hairs and how to treat them—Wrinkles: their prevention and treatment—Freckles, tan, and blackheads—Oily skin, dry skin, and loose skin—How the nose can be improved—Protruding ears and their treatment—Offensive breath—Anatomy of the teeth—Why teeth decay—General care of the teeth—Tallness, and how to attain it—Round shoulders and how to cure them—How to acquire a full chest—Perfect form and figure: their proper proportions—Thinness, and its treatment—Excessive stoutness—Care of the hands—Care of the feet—Physiognomy; or, the art of reading character from the face—Mental influences upon health—Power of the mind over the body—Influence of the mind in curing diseases—How the mind can cause dyspepsia—Effect of the direction of thought to the heart—How real diseases often supervene upon fancied ailments—How violent passions injure health—Laughter as a medicine—Ailments cured by laughter—Wonders of digestion—Relative value to our bodies of the principal articles of food—Fruits and vegetables as medicine: their various influences upon the physical system—Health preserving diet and its consistency—Diet favourable to mental exertion and intellectual culture—Influence of various foods upon our passions and propensities—The influence exerted by the mind upon the appetite and digestion—Some perilous articles of food—Light, and its influence upon health—Exercise and its relations to health—Baths and bathing: their influence upon health—The marriage state, and its influence upon health—Statistics showing the comparative vitality of married and single persons—100 professions, trades, and occupations: their respective influences upon health and long life—Sleep, and its relation to health—Insomnia, and its treatment—The eyes, and how to preserve them—The ears and hearing: how to prevent deafness—The voice: its cultivation and preservation—Memory, and how to improve it—Sudden failure of memory—Rules for cultivating the memory—Effect of some foods upon memory—Stammering, and how to cure it—Prevention of disease—Nervousness—Blushing: its physiology and treatment—Rules of life for attaining longevity—How to live to a hundred—Premature old age and its causes—Short biographies of 30 modern centenarians, whose ages range from 115 to 185 years—General principles that can be laid down for the anticipation of longevity—The eight signs of long life.

If you are a millionaire the announcement made on page 400 will for you have but a passing interest. But if you are one of that quite considerable number of people who "could do with a five-pound note," the announcement will be worthy of your most careful attention. And one of the chief charms of the affair is that it will give you very little trouble. You merely look at the portraits which we reproduce, and if you find yours among them, drop us a card. If your claim is correct, we send you the five pounds at the earliest possible moment. Simplicity itself, you see. Don't give up hope if your portrait isn't among the first lot. We shall give five different portraits each week, and any time yours may appear. Moreover, even if your own portrait isn't there, a friend's may be, in which case tell him of it and win for yourself one of the additional prizes offered.

This competition is going to be a very big thing indeed. It will become, in the course of the next few weeks, the talk of everybody. For never before will there have been such a wholesale distribution of five-pound notes. I should like to remind you that this affords an admirable opportunity for mentioning Short Stories to your friends. The simple query addressed to an acquaintance: "Seen Short Stories' photo scheme?" and the thing is done.

Sebastian—the office boy—sends me the following, which he says he is open to sing at any London variety theatre if managers will pay him fifty guineas a night:

"Have you won that £5 note?
Has appeared or no.
I ask all Rads and Tories
To buy Short Stories,
And win a £5 note to give to me."

Advice on Love and other Matters.

(Replies to Correspondents.)

"A Proud Papa" writes a doleful letter. His wife has lately presented him with twins, and he complains that ever since their arrival she has had eyes and ears for no one else. What can he do in the matter? He has spoken to her on the subject, but she seemed very upset and annoyed about it. She is only nineteen, and used to be very fond of him. Have patience, "Proud Papa." Every young mother thinks her baby the most lovely and perfect being in the world, and when she has two, of course she would feel more proud than ever. Very soon she will get used to them, and you will have no further cause for jealousy. Don't upbraid her, or she will begin to feel that you do not care for your babies. Nineteen is very young to have such a responsibility, and you must help her all you can.

"Sybil" wonders if I shall take the trouble to answer her letter. She is in great grief at the loss of her lover, and feels now that he is dead, life is not worth living, and she is sure she can never feel resigned as her friends tell her she ought. She is only eighteen, and looks forward to a long life of wretched unhappiness.

My poor child, I am only too ready to do what I can to help you to bear your terrible burden of lonely sorrow. In such a grief as yours I know how worthless and shallow all words of hope and comfort must appear, but, in days to come, when the first sharp edge of grief has begun to wear off, remember that the parting is but for a little while, and in God's good time you will see your loved one again. You are young, and can do much towards cheering and comforting your poorer brothers and sisters, and, believe me, in helping them you will do the best possible thing towards filling up the blank in your own life.

"Dead to the World"

Grand New Serial by
HENRY T. JOHNSON
Starts Soon.

I am afraid the sovereign you put into the church plate, in mistake for a shilling, cannot be recovered, "Poor Widow." You say you are poor, and can ill spare it; perhaps if you went to the clergyman of the parish and told him your trouble he would do something to help you. I am very sorry for you. It is always a mistake to carry money loose in one's pocket.

You tell me, "Anxious One," that you have a lover who is a Jew, and that your friends try to set you against him, and your mother has forbidden you to have anything to do with him, and yet there is nothing to be said against him beyond the fact that he is a Jew. I should tell your mother that you intend to remain true to him, as you love him; for, after all, you have every right to think about your future, haven't you? Being a Jew is nothing to his discredit, and I should take no notice of what people say on the subject. No, I do not think eighteen is too young for a girl to be engaged. Many thanks for your good wishes.

(Romany: "GENUINE," "GOOD," "TRUE.")

Now Mr. G. R. Sims, as many people know, is one of the busiest men in the kingdom, but hastily affixing his signature to a letter, he looked up and extended a characteristically cordial welcome. Then he said: "I will explain. I found that I was rapidly going bald. Not seriously, you understand, but the thinning out was sufficiently marked to set me thinking out a remedy. I went to two specialists, both of whom cheerfully assured me that I should be absolutely bald in two years.

"Then I discovered the preparation which is now placed upon the market. I found that I had hit upon a remedy capable of working wonders. Look at my hair now, isn't that convincing evidence of the value of my preparation.

"Ladies confirm my good opinion of it as a dressing for daily use. Mrs. Brown Potter, whose beautiful hair is the admiration of the entire lady world, writes that she uses nothing but 'Tatcho.' There is nothing to prevent every woman from making her hair silken in texture and bountiful in volume, for she can obtain a bottle of 'Tatcho' now in every town or even village."

In order that the public may be able to test the superlative value of Mr. Geo. R. THE ADVENTURES OF AN ACTRESS.

IX.—Diamond Cut Diamond.

CHAPTER I.

HORACE CALDECOTT sat before his open bureau in his well-appointed study, the very room into which he had tricked Hazel Harlow when she had first come to London. Before him was a pile of letters and papers. Presently he leant back in his chair and lighting a cigarette, gave himself up to his thoughts.

"What a piece of luck," he began, "to think that old Jacob Dimsdale should be able to help me in my plans, and there's no fear of his going back on me. He knows I've got him in the hollow of my hand. I'll trot down to Birmingham to-night and once there, I ought to be able at last to bring off the coup that has already cost me so much. Yes, Hazel," his dark eyes gleamed vindictively, "my time must come sooner or later. You won't always have Mr. Eric Monteith and the luck of the very dickens to keep you from becoming mine."

He put his hand into a pigeon-hole of the desk and drew out a cabinet photograph. It was the head and shoulders of a girl, a girl with the face of an angel, with a great aureole of hair surmounting her broad forehead and wide open eyes. Caldecott ground his teeth together. "Yes, Hazel," he muttered, "you're worth risking the torments of Hades for."

At that moment a slight rustling sound at his back caused him to wheel round in his revolving chair. So engrossed had he been in his own sinister thoughts, and the contemplation of Hazel Harlow's photograph, that he had not heard the study door open, had not seen the stylishly dressed female figure that crept inside the room, had not observed her steal across to his very side. It was only when he could almost feel her breath upon his head that he discovered her presence.

"Valerie!" Caldecott thrust the photograph he had just been gazing at so intently into its hiding place. Then he rose to his feet, and battling with a sudden rage, tried to face his unwelcome visitor calmly.

"Yes, Horace," answered the woman quietly, though her face was pale and there was a look in her eyes that told of suppressed passions behind them. "You didn't expect to see me, Valerie Bellairs, the woman you have tricked and fooled for so long. You have sworn to me over and over again that Hazel Harlow was nothing to you, yet I find you here gloating over her portrait and muttering like a love-sick swain."

Caldecott flushed. For a moment he hesitated, then with a sharp mirthless laugh he broke into quick speech. "So be it then," he said, "the buttons are off the foils, and we fight with naked blades. If you will have the truth, by Heaven I'll give it you. I am tired of you. Sick to death of your pestering, jealous ways. So it's no good your coming here and sneaking in upon me unawares, and then trying to ride over me roughshod. Go your way, and leave me to go mine."

Valerie staggered back as though she had been struck in the face. For a few moments she remained speechless, while Caldecott confronted her with a sneer on his saturnine countenance.

"So that's how the wind blows, is it?" at last she said in a low voice. "I'm to be cast off like an old glove. It wasn't enough that I gave you all the love there was in me, that I lied and schemed, and did things that were base and mean merely for a caress or a word of endearment from you. I'm to go my own way, am I? Very well. And now hear me. I'll not rest until I have brought you down into the mud, Squire Horace Caldecott. And as for Hazel Harlow, though she proved one too many for me once, I've learnt wisdom since then. I'll strike in the dark, and when she thinks herself most secure. You've had your warning. Beware!"

The actress spoke in a voice fraught with pent-up rage. Resourceful villain as he was Caldecott could not help quailing somewhat before the anger of the woman he had tricked and deluded so long. Her eyes were opened now, and a wild unreasoning passion of love had given place to a dark desire for revenge, the strength of which Caldecott little realised.

"Heroics, my dear Valerie," he said with an attempt at levity, "Why should we desire to cut one another's throats? We, who have been—" he hesitated, and then said meaningly, "such very good friends. I am sure that Valerie Bellairs, with all her talent and all the admirers that she has won for herself upon the stage, will never lack admirers far more worthy of her great reputation than so humble a man as Horace Caldecott. So let us shake hands and at least part as friends."

He held out his hand as he spoke, but the woman drew back. "I don't think you quite understand," she answered, "it's going to be war between us now, war to the knife, for I swear to you that I will not rest until I have dragged you down to cry for pity at my feet. You are powerful, rich, unscrupulous, and I am only a woman, a plaything, to be scorned and thrown aside as soon as I have fulfilled my destiny in becoming your toy."

Look at page 432.

Without another word she turned and left the room.

A low laugh broke from Caldecott as she disappeared; a sigh of apparent heartfelt relief fell from his lips.

"So ends a chapter in my life," he muttered. Yet in his heart of hearts he knew that the chapter had not yet ended—he knew all the fierce passion that lay latent in Valerie's heart. She was a passionate woman scorned, and he knew that from that moment he would have to be on his guard. "Anyhow," his thoughts ran, "she's not sailing under false colours."

"Its open hostilities between us. I wonder what her first move in the game will be. Ah, well, I'm not afraid of her. I don't think her bite will be anything like as bad as her bark. And now I must get to business. I'll catch the 2.10 to Birmingham from Paddington. I've got plenty of time to get everything ready and be off."

At about a quarter to two the front door of Horace Caldecott's house opened and a man issued forth. He was an elderly gentleman, with almost snow-white hair, grey moustache, and trim-pointed beard streaked with white. He was well-dressed, and carried himself alertly, while his bronzed face betokened the traveller, his upright carriage the old soldier. A private hansom was drawn up alongside the kerb.

"Paddington, James," said the old gentleman. The man touched his cockaded top hat and whipped up his steed, a coal black thoroughbred. The vehicle rolled noiselessly away on its pneumatic tyred wheels.

CHAPTER II.

It was mid-day. New Street, Birmingham's chief thoroughfare, was crowded with shoppers and pedestrians. On a hoarding at the Town Hall end of the street was a large placard, a coloured poster with just a girl's face upon it, and underneath the words, "Hazel Harlow, the famous actress, is at the Theatre Royal." Outside the theatre itself was a crowd of people examining the photographs and playbills displayed by The Good Samaritan Company, whose headquarters for that week were at Birmingham. The box-office was crowded, and that despite the fact that at the Prince of Wales's Theatre a London company, with all its original cast, was making a bid for the favour of Birmingham playgoers. The Good Samaritan Company had already given two performances in the town, and the papers, especially the Daily Post, had been enthusiastic in praise of the beautiful Hazel Harlow. The box-office of the theatre was beseiged. Raymond Venables, the manager, was ecstatic. He stood in the entrance to the theatre with the lessee of the house and gazed jubilantly at the crowds that pressed forward to buy seats for that evening's performance.

"I wonder what they are doing at the Prince of Wales's," he muttered to his companion.

"Precious little. That was a stroke of luck for you, Venables, getting Hazel Harlow," added the other enviously.

"You're right, my boy," replied the manager, "and shall I tell you what I'm going to do when this tour is over? I'm going to get hold of a London theatre and run the Harlow for all I'm worth. Why, she's worth a hundred pounds a week to anyone for her face alone, and more than that, she can act."

In the meanwhile Hazel Harlow and Jenny Lovelace were walking together along Corporation Street.

"So this is Birmingham," Hazel was saying, "the best governed city in the world, eh? Well, it's a fine town, and I think we ought to have a jolly week here. Let's go back to our lodgings, have some lunch, and then go out to the Botanical Gardens at Edgbaston. I hear they are worth seeing, and it really is a lovely day."

To this Jenny agreed, and getting on to an omnibus they were driven up to Broad Street, in a quiet street off which their lodgings were. At the lodgings there was a letter for Jenny.

"I seem to know the handwriting," she said as she looked at the envelope, "but I don't know who it's from."

"Look inside and see," said Hazel laughingly.

The letter was as follows:

"Belle Vue,
"Augustus Road.
"Edgbaston.

"My Dear Jenny,—

"Seeing that your Company is here in Birmingham, and not having seen or heard anything of you for some time, your aunt and I are writing to ask you to come and see us this afternoon. We shall be delighted if you would bring Miss Harlow with you.

"Your affectionate uncle,
"Jacob Dimsdale."

"Well I never!" cried Jenny, handing the note over to her companion to read. "It's from Uncle Jacob. I'd quite forgotten about the old boy. He's my mother's brother," she said explanatorily, "and he owns a big electro-plating business in busy Birmingham. What do you say, Hazel? Shall we give up the Botanical Gardens and go and have tea with Uncle Jacob and Aunt Sarah? They've got a lovely house and garden, and he's as rich as Crœsus."

"I shall be delighted, dear," answered Hazel. "I never knew you had an uncle in Birmingham."

"Well, to tell you the truth, I'd quite forgotten all about him. I haven't seen him for some years. It's rather funny he should write and ask us to go and see him now I come to think of it, for Aunt Sarah is rather puritanical in her ideas. She comes of an old Quaker stock, and I remember that when she heard I was going on the stage she wrote me a long letter all about the terrible dangers and awful wickednesses that I was going to be plunged into. Perhaps Uncle Jacob thinks that he owes me something to make up for his past neglect of his niece's existence. Anyhow, he's quite harmless, and there is no reason why we shouldn't go."

At that moment the landlady appeared.

"A gentleman to see you, ladies," she said, "Mr. Monteith."

"Ask him up," replied the girls simultaneously.

The door opened and Eric was ushered in.

"Good morning," he said cheerfully, "I want you two to come and have lunch with me at Lissiter's. I've heard it's a good place for a feed."

The two girls exchanged glances. Eric noticed their hesitation.

"If you have a previous engagement," he said courteously, "please don't let me interfere with your plans."

His eyes looked hungrily at Hazel's beautiful face. It was plain to see the adoration that was in his heart for the young girl whom he had sworn to befriend and cherish, if not as a lover, at least as a brother.

"Oh, we've not got an engagement," cried Jenny, "at least yet awhile. We've promised to go up to Edgbaston this afternoon to have tea with an uncle of mine. There's no reason why we shouldn't come and have lunch with you, notwithstanding the fact that we've been shopping in town all the morning."

Mr. Henry T. Johnson's new serial starts week after next.

"I've got a carriage outside," said Eric deprecatingly, "if you will be so kind as to avail yourselves of it."

There was no legitimate reason under the circumstances for refusing so generous an offer. Accordingly the trio were speedily driving off towards Lissiter's.

During lunch Jenny told Eric about the invitation she and Hazel had received for that afternoon. On hearing the news Monteith's face clouded.

"I suppose it's all right," he began doubtfully.

Hazel broke in with a merry laugh.

"I am quite willing to admit, Eric," she said, "that you have every reason to view with suspicion any movement of mine, especially considering the terrible experiences we have gone through together." Her voice grew suddenly grave. "But," she went on, "I don't really see what harm can come to me this time. Mr. Dimsdale is undoubtedly Jenny's uncle. He is an elderly man; he has a wife with religious scruples. Surely there is nothing terrifying in that."

But Eric was not convinced.

"Jenny has just said," he remarked slowly, "that she is at a loss to understand why her uncle has expressed a desire to see her with such cordiality. The last time she was in Birmingham he took no notice of her at all."

"Yes," broke in Jenny, "but that's easy enough to explain. Everyone's heard of Hazel Harlow by this time, and my uncle, despite Aunt Sarah, is only human after all. He wants to get a glimpse of the famous actress, and he wants to be able to see her in private life."

"You may be right," answered Monteith, "yet I beg that you will both be careful. Every new town we come to I get the idea that something is going to happen, and it makes me as nervous as a woman. If only—" he broke off short, but Hazel knew what he would have said and the colour rose to her face. If only she would become his wife. Those were the unspoken words that had hovered on Eric's tongue. Yet love had not yet thrilled Hazel's pulses, not that love at least that a girl must feel in the presence of the man to whom she has given her heart.

CHAPTER III.

Belle Vue, Augustus Road, was a fine red brick mansion, standing back from the road in its own grounds, ringed in with noble trees. At about the same time when Hazel, Jenny, and Eric were discussing their lunch at Lissiter's, two men sat at meat together in Jacob Dimsdale's house. The one was Jacob Dimsdale himself, a somewhat portly man, the hair on whose temples was thin and grey, whose forehead was furrowed with deep lines, with small, rather crafty eyes resembling a ferret's. The other was he whom we had last seen issuing from Horace Caldecott's town house, the mysterious stranger with the grey beard and white hair.

Dimsdale took out his cigar-case and proffered it to his guest.

"You can smoke here," he said somewhat nervously, as Sarah's confined to her room. "As a rule she doesn't like smoking in the dining-room."

The other laughed.

"Petticoat government, eh, Dimsdale?" he said.

Then he went on. "Now let's get to business. There's got to be no misunderstanding between us. Either you play your cards as I tell you or I blow the gaff about what happened twenty years ago, when Jacob Dimsdale started to build up a big fortune after as deliberate a crime as anyone was ever guilty of."

Dimsdale's face was ashen.

"For goodness sake, Caldecott," he said, "don't speak so loud."

"And for goodness sake," broke in the other roughly, "drop that Caldecott. Remember my name's Antrobus. Colonel Charles Allister Antrobus. Please to remember that."

"Yes, yes," answered the other, "I won't make the mistake again. And I'll do anything you like if you will only swear to keep locked up in your own breast what you and you alone, beside myself, in all the world know."

Caldecott smiled. "I little thought, friend Jacob," he said callously, "that I should ever be constrained to put the screw on you. But it's a strange world this, and you never know what's going to turn up next. To think that the simple little fact of your being uncle to Miss Jenny Lovelace should have necessitated my flying down to Edgbaston and asking your help."

Jacob Dimsdale writhed. He was as clay in this man's hands, and he knew it. For twenty years he had gone on steadily amassing wealth which owed its foundation to an act the true story of which Horace Caldecott alone knew. Twenty years is a long time, yet it was not time enough for the memory of that act of criminality to disappear from Jacob Dimsdale's life. And now Caldecott, the one man above all others whom he never desired to see again in this world, had risen up to confront him with the black story, nay, more, had put as the price of his silence the consummation of yet another deed of villainy.

"What is it you want to do?" asked Dimsdale hoarsely. "I have asked Jenny and Miss Harlow here this afternoon according to your instructions. Have you evil designs upon my dead sister's daughter?"

"You can assure yourself on that point," broke in Caldecott, "my business does not lie with your niece. It is with her comrade. But you need know nothing about that. All you have to do is to keep your mouth shut and your niece out of my way at the same time. And remember if you betray me by the faintest word or gesture I'll not spare you. At your time of life it would be decidedly unpleasant to be forced to visit Portland or Dartmoor."

Jacob Dimsdale shuddered.

"Anything but that," he murmured, "anything but that."

"Good," went on the other. "Then we understand one another perfectly. Your part this afternoon will be an easy one. It will be merely to back me up in everything I say and do most vigorously; to convey to your niece and her companion that I am in every way a desirable and praiseworthy acquaintance. If you do that all will be plain sailing, and the world need never know that Jacob Dimsdale reached his present wealthy position by letting another suffer for his crime."

The last shaft struck home. Dimsdale shuddered and put up his hands with an imploring gesture.

"You need say no more," he muttered hoarsely.

At four o'clock that afternoon Jenny and Hazel, according to arrangement, arrived at Belle Vue to take tea with Uncle Jacob and his wife. They were ushered into a beautifully appointed drawing-room by a tall, stately footman, who informed them that Mrs. Dimsdale was unfortunately indisposed. She sent her love to her niece, and her compliments to Miss Harlow; Mr. Dimsdale would be there in a few minutes. The man retired, and barely had he closed the door behind him when it reopened to admit the portly form of Uncle Jacob, followed by the grey-haired, white-bearded, "Colonel Antrobus."

"How do you do my dear niece?" said Dimsdale, kissing Jenny warmly on the cheek. "I'm proud to meet you, Miss Harlow," to Hazel, "all Birmingham is full of your praises. Allow me to introduce my very dear old friend, 'Colonel Antrobus,' late of the Rosshire Buffs, to you."

The pseudo-colonel bowed courteously. So complete was his disguise that all the two girls saw was a well set-up soldierly old gentleman with pleasant manners.

"I am delighted to meet two such charming members of a profession to which the public owes so much." His voice had a silky smoothness about it quite unlike that of the Horace Caldecott that Hazel knew, and had such good reason to fear. She acknowledged the greeting becomingly, and the conversation soon drifted into topics of general interest.

By the time tea was brought in the little company was on the best of terms. Jenny was secretly charmed to find her uncle so cordially disposed, neither did she see any reason to regret the fact that Colonel Antrobus was the substitute for her austere aunt.

Suddenly Antrobus, fixing his eyes on Hazel, said pleasantly:

"I wonder if I could induce you, Dimsdale, to bring your niece and Miss Harlow to visit me at my house. I should like to contribute somewhat to the enlivenment of your stay in Birmingham. What do you say to a little supper party after the theatre? I could drive you out to my house and see that you were sent back quite safely."

Dimsdale turned to his niece. "What do you say, Jenny?" he asked, "would you care to come?"

Jenny looked at Hazel. She saw no reason to refuse, and indeed read acquiescence in Hazel's eyes.

"We shall be charmed," she answered brightly.

"Good," said the Colonel, "then let us say to-morrow night." And so it was arranged. Dimsdale promised to be at the theatre at the close of the next evening's performance and drive with the two girls to his friend's house.

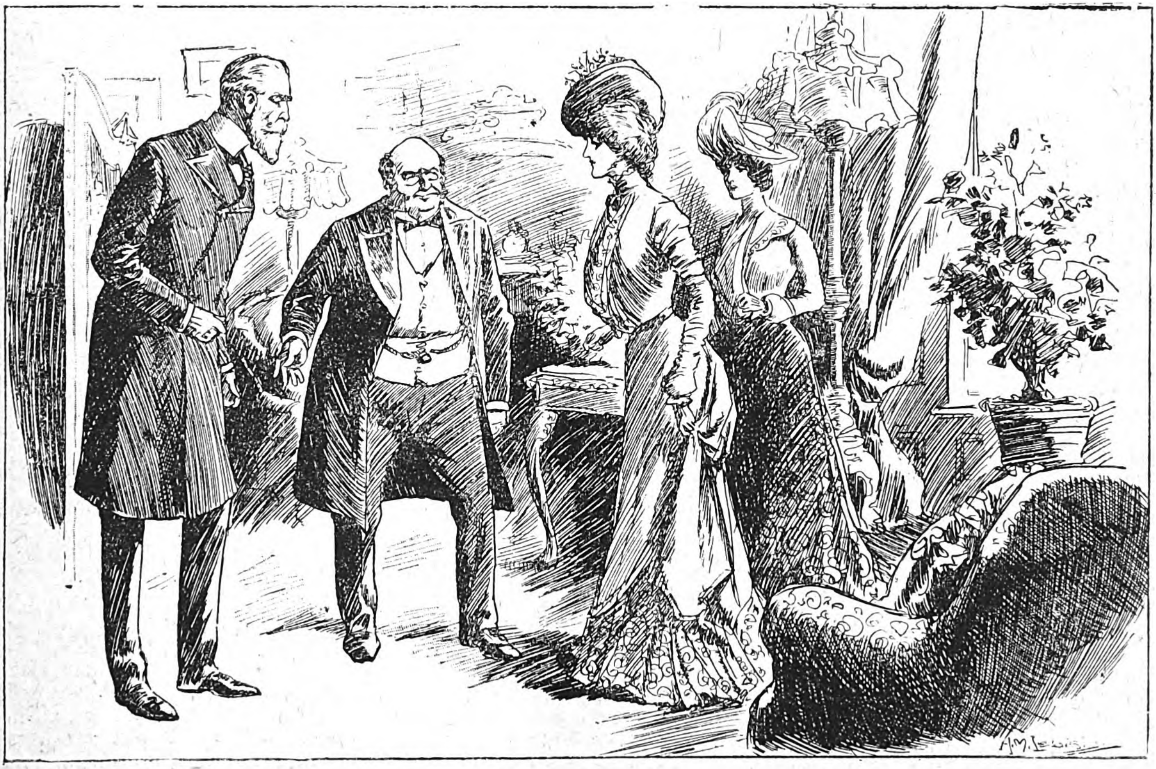
CHAPTER IV.

It was between the first and second act of The Good Samaritan on the evening of the same day that had witnessed Jenny and Hazel's visit to Edgbaston. Eric and Hazel were standing at the wings talking together. Hazel was recounting how pleasant an afternoon they had spent and wound up by saying:

"There was an old gentleman there, a Colonel Antrobus, who has very kindly asked us to supper at his house to morrow night under the chaperonage of Mr. Dimsdale."

"Colonel Antrobus," echoed Eric, "do you know if by any chance he was formerly in the Rosshire Buffs?"

"Yes," answered Hazel, "that was the name of his regiment."



So complete was this disguise that all the two girls saw was a well set up, soldierly, old gentleman.

Look out for "Dead to the World."

"How strange," replied Monteith. "That was my father's old regiment, and he and Colonel Antrobus were very great friends. He lives in a beautiful house in Edgbaston. Yet it is rather strange that he should ask you to supper with him."

"How strange?" queried Hazel.

"Because he was a man of the most quixotic views. He was a regular austere man. They used to call him the Covenanter in the regiment. He never went inside a theatre in his life, and he always professed to hold the stage and everything in connection with it in the utmost abhorrence."

"He certainly doesn't answer that description now," said Hazel laughing. "He seemed a most sociable old gentleman, and Mr. Dimsdale evidently thinks a lot of him."

"And what sort of a man is Mr. Dimsdale?" went on Monteith.

"I should say rather a self made man, but very kind hearted."

Eric was silent, yet the thought that ran through him was, "Not at all the sort of man that Colonel Antrobus a blue blooded, stiff old martinet, as I knew him would be likely to cultivate. He must have changed since the old days."

The rise of the curtain cut short any further conversation between the pair, but Eric had determined to inquire more fully into the strange, and to him, absolutely inexplicable change of front made by Colonel Antrobus, late of the Rosshire Buffs.

He was up betimes the next morning, and repairing to the General Post office, obtained a look at the Birmingham directory. Yes, there it was plain enough. "Lieutenant-Colonel Charles Alister Antrobus, D.S.O., G.C.B., Rosshire Lodge, Edgbaston."

Eric noted the address and strolled out into New Street, pondering deeply as he went. Ever since that first day when he had met Hazel Harlow, and had realised that henceforth he could have no other mission in life but to guard her, and to endeavour, if possible, to make her share his destiny and fortune, he had felt that the young girl's life was beset by danger and difficulties of which she herself had but a slight realisation, and how amply had his forebodings been justified? Go where she would danger seemed to dog her footsteps, and her worst enemy was a man whom Monteith knew would leave no stone unturned—and, as events had proved, was absolutely without scruple—to ensnare Hazel into the loathsome net of an all-absorbing passion.

Thus it came about that even when danger seemed farthest away, Eric Monteith was most on his guard. It might be, as Hazel's words had implied, Colonel Antrobus had repented of the austerity that had won him the nickname of The Covenanter in days gone by, and yet—a vision of the grim soldier as Eric remembered to have seen him when a boy, rose up and made the very thought seem preposterous.

"Anyhow," said Monteith to himself, "there is one perfectly simple way of finding out the reason that has caused the Colonel to so suddenly abdicate from the rules of his younger days. I can call on him this afternoon, as my father's son. Then I can satisfy myself that everything is as it should be."

He said nothing of his intentions to Jenny and Hazel, who were both of them looking forward to their evening's dissipation. Hazel in her simple country life had tasted so few of the sweets of civilisation and refinement, that it was quite a novel experience for her to have a supper party to look forward to in a big house where everything must be of the best.

As for Jenny, she had all an actress's love of excitement and jollification. She was Bohemian to the core, and had been agreeably surprised with the change in her uncle's manner towards her. She saw no cloud to dim the horizon of her mental vision.

At three o'clock that afternoon Eric jumped on to a 'bus at the Town Hall and was soon driving up Broad Street towards the Five Ways and the Hagley Road. He had found out the whereabouts of Rosshire Lodge.

At the end of Hagley Road he jumped off the vehicle and walked down a quiet tree-shaded thoroughfare that led to the road where the Colonel lived. Rosshire Lodge he found to be a large red brick building flanked by noble trees, and up to which a fine, carefully-swept carriage drive led. He walked up the drive in some trepidation, and pulled the wrought iron bell-pendant.

Almost as soon as he had let go of the handle, the door swung open, and a respectable looking old manservant, with the evident air of an ex-army man about him, stood before him.

"Is Colonel Antrobus in?" Monteith asked.

"Yes, sir," came the answer. "Will you please to step this way?"

He followed the servant across a stone-flagged hall, hung with trophies of the chase, curious armour, and a few tattered flags whose faded fabric had evidently been riddled and rent by shot and ball.

The lackey opened a door leading out of the hall, and Eric found himself in a beautiful oak-panelled chamber, with a desk in the window, and all the usual appurtenances of a well-appointed study.

"What name shall I say, sir?" asked the man.

"Mr. Eric Monteith," came the answer. "Son of Major Ivor Monteith, late of the Rosshires."

The man stiffened automatically.

"A gallant gentleman, your father, sir," he said respectfully. "I was in his regiment."

Eric's face flushed with pride. "I am glad to meet one of my father's old comrades," he said.

The man retired, and in a few moments the door reopened to admit as fine a specimen of veteran manhood as Eric remembered ever to have seen. With grizzled thick hair, and face browned with exposure to the tropical sun, blue eyes as keen as a hawk, and erect alert carriage, despite his sixty odd years, well over six feet in height, such was Colonel Antrobus.

"So you're Eric," he said, holding out a long lean hand. "What good wind brings you to Birmingham? Ah, I see you're your father's son. A better comrade no man ever had."

"I was only a little boy when I saw you last, sir," said the young man, "but I remember your face distinctly."

"And how goes the world with you?" went on the other "You've not followed in your father's footsteps, have you?"

"No, sir. At the death of my father my sister Alice and I were left rather poorly off. Then we came into a pretty considerable fortune left to us by our mother's sister, and now I've taken to the stage."

"The stage!" A look almost of horror came into the old soldier's face. "That's not the profession for Ivor Monteith's son. A loafing, idling, drinking life, a life that has been the undoing of many a fine young man who ought to have been serving his King and country over seas."

Look at page 432.

Eric flushed. "The profession was none of my seeking, sir," he said almost haughtily. "I did not go on the stage to suit my own interests. I like the life scarcely better than you do."

"Then, why in Heaven's name, not cut yourself adrift from it?" cried Antrobus almost irascibly.

Eric hesitated. Then he determined on a bold course.

"It was for the sake of a lady," he said in a low voice, "with whom I think you are already acquainted, a Miss Harlow."

"A lady with whom I am already acquainted?" echoed the Colonel in utter amazement. "I know no lady of that name. I never was much of a lover of the fair sex."

"Then you have never met Miss Harlow?" went on Eric in a low voice, a growing fear clutching at his heart.

"Never, sir," came the answer with obviously growing ire.

"And you're not acquainted with a Mr. Jacob Dimsdale?"

"He is also unknown to me," came the quick answer.

Eric was in a dilemma. He had learnt what he wanted to know, namely, that somehow Hazel and Jenny had been entrapped by some person masquerading under Antrobus's name, but he found it difficult to explain to the old soldier the full story of what he knew. Then a sudden inspiration came to him. He drew a photograph from his breast pocket and handed it over to his father's old friend for inspection.

"What do you think of that, sir?" he asked in a low voice.

Antrobus took the photograph and examined it attentively. It was a portrait of Hazel. After a few moments he handed it back to Monteith.

"I think it's the picture of the most beautiful woman I've ever seen," he said.

Eric put the photograph back into his pocket. "Then with your permission, sir," he said, "I will tell you the story of the original and how I came to be brought into her life. You shall then judge for yourself."

Then in as few words as possible he told Colonel Antrobus Hazel's story. How the girl had been forced to flee from her home; how alone and unprotected she had come to London; how Fate had sent her to his house; how she had been tracked and persecuted by Horace Caldecott; and how he, Eric, had fallen madly in love with her, and had become an actor to guard her life from ill.

"And now," he said in conclusion, "I will tell you why I asked you if you knew Miss Harlow. It is because she has been invited by a Colonel Antrobus, reputing himself to be late of the Rosshire Buffs, to supper at his house to-night. She is to go in company with another lady and her uncle. I knew that was not like the Colonel Antrobus who was my father's dearest friend, and so I determined to come and find out for myself."

For a few moments after the recital of this story the old soldier found but little to say. His eyes were fixed scrutinisingly on Eric's face.

"Upon my word," he said at last, "The days of knight errantry are by no means over even in this 20th century. So it is for a woman that you have become an actor. Well, let that pass. What concerns me is to think that there is some villain masquerading under the name that has never in my life-time been mixed up in any intrigue. This is a serious matter and must be looked into."

"Might I make a suggestion?" put in Eric. "It is that you leave the matter in my hands. I can quite see that it would be extremely unpleasant for you to allow yourself to be dragged into an affair that may have the most tawdry elements as its basis. Whoever the villain is who is masquerading under your name, I think now that I know the facts of the case I shall be able to cope with him. Do you agree, sir? Will you allow the settlement of this affair to rest in my hands?"

The Colonel hesitated. There was, however, something in Eric's face and manner of quiet, manly decision, that did not fail to make its impression upon the old soldier, and that won the day.

"Very well, my lad," he said, "I'll leave it to you on condition that you tell me how you played the game after it's all over."

"I'll do that willingly," answered the other, "unless ——" he broke off abruptly. It was on the tip of his tongue to say, "unless I am prevented from doing so," for he had of course no idea of what lay before him in his attempt to unearth the mystery surrounding the bogus Colonel Antrobus.

The old soldier noted his hesitation, and read his thoughts. "The lad's a plucked one," he said to himself, "there's danger before him in this business. Ah, well, he won't be Ivor Monteith's son if he can't pull through somehow."

"And now I'll be going, sir," said Eric, "to-morrow I hope to be able to report further to you on the matter."

"And now comes the question," ran Eric's thoughts as he walked down the broad avenue that led to the entrance gates, "how I'm to circumvent this plot of the false Colonel Antrobus whatever it may be. Is it possible that that villain Caldecott's hand can again be traced in this? I think my next move will be a visit to Mr. Jacob Dimsdale. I should very much like to know what his share in the business can be." Thus thinking, he drew in sight of the massive wrought iron gates that opened out on to the quiet thoroughfare that ran along the grounds of Colonel Antrobus' property.

A couple of juniper trees were set on either side of the gate inside the garden. At the foot of one of them Eric's quick eyes were attracted by a sealed envelope that lay as though someone had purposely placed it there. Naturally enough he turned aside to satisfy his curiosity as to what the note might be. This act proved his undoing. Almost before he had time to realise what had happened and just as he was in the act of stooping down to appropriate the note, a quick footfall sounded on the gravel behind him. A figure had stepped out from behind the other juniper; in his hand a short loaded cane. Before Eric had time to recover his normal position, the man had brought down the murderous-looking weapon with stunning force at the back of his head, just above the nape of the neck. With a faint cry the luckless man fell like a pole-axed bullock.

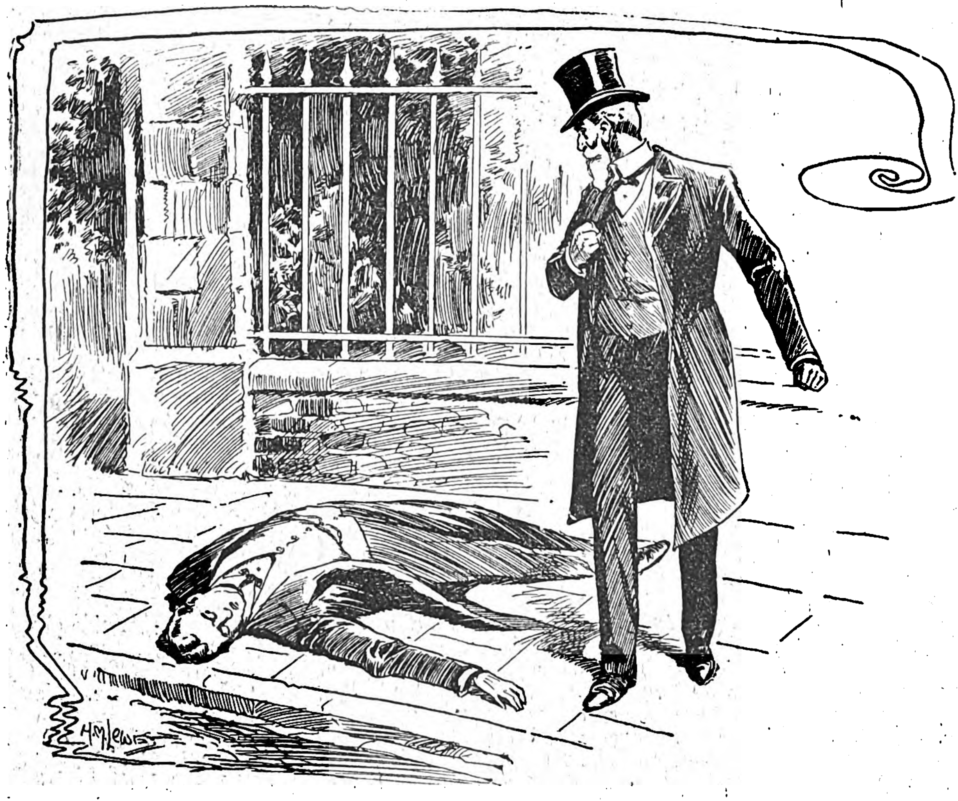
Quick as lightning his assailant stooped down and, ransacking his pockets, removed all the papers he found therein. Then lifting the body, having first of all hurled his weapon away into the brushwood, he carried the lifeless burden out into the roadway. Not a soul was in the street. The unknown miscreant deposited Monteith upon the pavement and gave vent to a low breath of apparent satisfaction. He was a tall, elderly, well-dressed man, and did not seem to be at all the sort of person one would take to be a common footpad.

"Neatly done," he muttered "the fish took the bait.

Mr. Henry T. Johnson's new serial starts week after next.

I think we've settled your hash for a while, Mr. Monteith. It'll be twenty hours or more before you become conscious. That blow means concussion of the brain for a certainty. It'll teach you to mind your own business, and when you do come to yourself I don't think you'll be able to do any further harm. I was rather a fool to adopt the personality of Colonel Antrobus, and if I hadn't dogged your footsteps, and if things hadn't turned out as well as they have, you might have been able to call checkmate."

At that moment the figure of a policeman came into view proceeding leisurely along the quiet road. In a moment Caldecott, for it was the ubiquitous ruffian himself, began waving vigorously to the constable who, perceiving that something was amiss, hurried forward at the top of his speed.



The unknown miscreant deposited Monteith upon the pavement, and gave vent to a low breath of apparent satisfaction.

"Just in the nick of time, constable," said the cool-blooded villain, "here's a job for you. I just found this unfortunate gentleman lying, as you see him, upon the pavement. I should say that he had been knocked on the head by a footpad who hadn't time to appropriate his belongings. I came round the corner of the road to find him lying as you see him now. All his papers are gone, though his watch and money have been left! Look at this swelling on the back of his head; it's a clear case of concussion. You'd better get him into a vehicle, and drive him off to the General Hospital. He's in a bad way. I'll give you my card, so that if necessary I can be called upon to say what I know about the business."

Caldecott spoke quietly and with confidence. There was not the faintest evidence to implicate him in any way with the cowardly assault. It is not to be wondered at, therefore, that the policeman saw no reason to disbelieve his story.

"There's a cab rank at the end of the road, sir," said the officer. "Perhaps you won't mind sending a cab down here as you go. I'll wait here with this gentleman, and if you'll give me your card as you said there will be no need for you to stay any longer."

Caldecott pulled out his card-case and handed the man a piece of pasteboard upon which was neatly engraved, "Sir James Henderson, 116 Calthorpe Road."

Caldecott was not the sort of man to do things by halves. Thorough-paced scoundrel as he was he was always equipped with every sort of device to aid him in the furtherance of his crimes. He gave half-a-crown to the policeman. "Do your best for the poor fellow," his said, and hurried away towards the cab-rank.

"That's a gentleman," muttered the policeman, pocketing the coin. "Now I wonder what is the explanation of this little game. This won't be a nice thing for me when it comes known at head quarters that there's been a highway assault here in one of the best streets in Edgbaston in broad daylight. Yet I don't see how a man can be everywhere at once. Whoever the chap was who knocked this gentleman on the head he knew where to plant his blow." The constable stooped down and examined the unfortunate Monteith's pale expressionless face.

"Hullo, my man, what's this?" said a voice in his ear. The constable sprang up in a moment. Colonel Antrobus stood before him. The Colonel gave one swift glance at the motionless body, and a cry escaped his lips.

"Eric Monteith!" he said sharply, "what's the meaning of this?"

In as few words as possible the policeman told the story of how he had come across the senseless Eric.

"Help me to lift him up," said Antrobus with military precision, "and let us take him inside my house. I know him well."

The constable obeyed, and together the two men bore the helpless body up the drive.

In the meanwhile Caldecott had hurried down towards the cab-rank only to find that there was no cab there. An expression of annoyance crossed his face. "Confound it!" he said. "It won't do to leave things as they are. The fellow must be got inside a hospital before some philanthropic busybody comes along and spoils my game."

He walked swiftly back to the end of the road from where he could see all down the street in which he had left the policeman and his victim.

An oath escaped him. Save for a solitary pedestrian there was no one to be seen. Eric Monteith had disappeared and the constable with him. Where had they gone to?

He hurried back the way he had just come to run full-tilt against the policeman himself who was issuing from the gateway that led to Rosshire Lodge.

"What's this?" cried Caldecott.

"Colonel Antrobus has got the poor gentleman safe and sound, sir," answered the other quickly. "I'm just going for a doctor. Colonel Antrobus knows the gentleman quite well, and is going to keep him there instead of sending him to the hospital."

With a mighty effort Caldecott concealed the deep chagrin and hot rage in his bosom at this unexpected event. In a moment all his calculations were scattered to the winds. He knew full well that Eric had probably divulged the fact that he himself as the false Colonel Antrobus, had been laying siege to the girlish susceptibilities of Hazel Harlow and Jenny Lovelace. There might, of course, be a chance that such was not the case, but that Eric's visit to the Colonel had been merely a friendly one. If this was so the plot that he and Dimsdale had concocted to entrap Hazel might still be successfully perpetrated. He determined to hurry back to Dimsdale's house and have a hasty consultation with him as to their next move. There was little fear that Eric would recover consciousness for a good many hours.

It was past five when he reached Dimsdale's house. "Mr. Dimsdale was in his study," the footman said. "Shall I show you up, sir?"

"No," answered Caldecott, "I know my way perfectly. I'll run up immediately." So saying he sprang up the richly carpeted stairway, and made his way unerringly to Dimsdale's sanctum.

He knocked at the door. There was no answer. Unceremoniously he pushed open the portal and stormed inside the room.

Dimsdale was sitting at the desk set in a big bay window at the far end of the luxurious apartment. He was apparently engaged in writing. Caldecott hurried forward and laid his hand upon the shoulder of his partner in crime.

"Dimsdale," he cried hoarsely, "rouse up and stir yourself. If we are not careful the fat will be in the ——" his words died away into nothingness.

In Dimsdale's right hand in place of a pen, was clutched a small bottle. His other hand contained a sealed envelope. As for the man's face it had on it a look of ghastly that Caldecott recoiled with a cry of horror while beads of perspiration formed upon his forehead.

Dimsdale's eyes were wide open. They were glassily staring straight before him. The muscles of his grey-hued face were rigid and stiff. His face was contorted out of all semblance to himself, as though he had been seized by some terrible pain.

One look told Caldecott the truth. Jacob Dimsdale had gone to his last account. He had died by his own hand.

Even Caldecott, cool, calculating scoundrel that he was, was so unnerved by the ghastly unexpectedness of this terrible tragedy, that he could find no power of action to help him further. Stock still he stood and gazed with terror-stricken eyes upon the miserable wretch who had been goaded by his own conscience to take away the life he had misused. The terror deepened in Caldecott's heart as the full horror of what had happened possessed him momentarily with greater intensity. In another instant, impelled by a power of which he was scarcely conscious, he moved silently towards the door through which he had just come, and sped down the staircase into the hall below. There he found the servant who had only a few moments before admitted him.

"Go to your master," he muttered hoarsely, and before the astonished footman could recover from the surprise at his words and gestures, he had opened the front door and dashed madly, unthinkingly, away.

CHAPTER V.

Raymond Venables, the manager of The Good Samaritan Company, was in the box-office of the Theatre Royal, himself seeing to the sale of seats for that evening's performance. It was about six o'clock, and he was expecting the advent of Monteith, who had arranged to meet him at the theatre at about that hour.

Suddenly an elderly gentleman put his head in through the box-office window and asked courteously if he could see the manager of the company.

"I am the manager," answered Venables, his curiosity slightly aroused. "What can I do for you, sir?"

"I should like a private word in your ear," was the answer, and the old gentleman produced a card, upon which was written, "Lieutenant-Colonel C. Alister Antrobus."

"Will you come with me to my room?" said Venables courteously, and led the way to a private ante-room adjoining the stage of the theatre.

"I regret to tell you, sir," began the old soldier, "that a sad accident has happened to one of the members of your company, Mr. Eric Monteith, with whom I am intimately acquainted. He is at present lying in my house at Edgbaston, suffering from a bad concussion of the brain, caused by a dastardly assault by some unknown miscreant. The doctor tells me it will be some weeks before he will be fit for much again."

Regret was visible on every line of Venables's countenance at this piece of bad news.

"How did it happen, sir?" he asked quickly.

"I cannot tell you any more than I have done," replied the Colonel, "with the exception of the fact that a loaded bludgeon was found in the grounds of my house with which the blow was probably struck. There is no chance of his being able to act to-night, or indeed for a good many nights. I have a favour to ask of you and that is that you will let me have a word with Miss Hazel Harlow."

The mystification deepened on Venables's countenance.

"That is a request I can easily grant, sir," he answered. "I need hardly say how deeply I am grieved to hear such an accident has happened to Mr. Monteith. It is at least refreshing to know that he is in such good hands."

Hazel and Jenny were, as luck would have it, both at that moment within the theatre precincts. They were both much surprised to hear that Colonel Antrobus had called to see them without Jenny's uncle, for they were of course under the impression that "Colonel Antrobus" was the man who had invited them to supper that night, and whom they had met at Dimsdale's house.

Judge of their surprise then on being presented to the real upholder of the name of Antrobus, who was so very different from the man they already pictured as being the genuine Colonel.

So mystified was Hazel that the old soldier at once read in her countenance what was passing in her mind.

"You have been the victim of a cruel deception, my dear young ladies," he began kindly, and without further preliminary. "Some rascal has been masquerading under my name; for what reasons I won't pretend to know, but I much suspect that he is the same who has been responsible for the sad accident that has happened to Mr. Eric Monteith," and he forthwith proceeded to give a detailed account of how Eric had come to his house, had told him the sad story, and of the finding of the lifeless body of the young man outside his own front gates.

Jenny's first thoughts went to her uncle Jacob. What on earth could be the meaning of his part in this disgraceful affair? As for Hazel, her thoughts flew to her stricken friend lying so sorely wounded at the house in Edgbaston.

The Colonel road the sorrow in her face aright. "With Heaven's help we'll pull him round, Miss Harlow," he said fervently, "and remember it was for your sake."

Needless to say neither Mr. Jacob Dimsdale nor the pseudo-Colonel Antrobus turned up after the performance that night in accordance with the preconcerted plan. It was not till the next morning that Jenny and Hazel read in the paper the story of how Jacob Dimsdale had met his death. The following is a verbatim account of the dread occurrence:

"SUICIDE OF A BIRMINGHAM MANUFACTURER.

"A TERRIBLE STORY.

"Yesterday Mr. Jacob Dimsdale, the head of the great firm of electro-platers, trading in Regent's Place, under the name of Dimsdale and Company, Limited, committed suicide by taking laudanum. The reason for this terrible act is to be found in a confession written and signed by the late Mr. Dimsdale, admitting to a crime long forgotten, and for which an innocent man has already paid the penalty. It appears that when Mr. Dimsdale first started in business in Birmingham, he had been associated with a young man named Durnford. Both these two young men were greatly addicted to card-playing. A forged cheque was uttered, and the authorship of the crime traced to young Mr. Durnford, who had been hard pressed for money to pay his gambling debts. The young fellow was sentenced to penal servitude, and died in prison, stoutly maintaining his innocence to the last. In the confession found at the late Mr. Dimsdale's house by the police, is a full acknowledgment that his was the hand that forged the cheque for which Durnford suffered punishment. Our regrets and sympathy must be given to Mrs. Dimsdale, who was of course in total ignorance of the black affair that has proved to bear such terrible fruit. Mr. Dimsdale comes of an old and unimpeachable family. The bulk of Mr. Dimsdale's fortune is bequeathed to charities."

As for Horace Caldecott his part in the event that led immediately up to Jacob Dimsdale's death never transpired. Even his passion for Hazel was swamped by the memory of that last scene in Jacob Dimsdale's study.

His one idea was to leave Birmingham, to get away from the city that had been so fraught with incident for all concerned. The plan that he had conceived of ensnaring Hazel remained locked up in his own breast.

But if he had once got the helpless girl into the house that he had hired during his brief stay in Birmingham there is but little reason to doubt that he would have found some means of achieving his fell ends, those of getting the girl into his power, for by diabolical stratagem he had rendered Eric a non-combatant in the affair. It was destiny that had stepped in and over-ruled his machinations.

During the rest of the company's stay in Birmingham Hazel gave up all her time by day to nursing Eric, for a great sadness filled her heart. She knew full well that some time must elapse before Monteith could again take up his part as a member of The Good Samaritan Company, and she did not like to think of what life would be without the presence of the young man to cheer and sustain her, for although Love, the divine, had not yet been kindled in her heart, she had still a feeling for Eric such as she had for no other man. The true steadfastness of his nature, the unselfish devotion that had prompted him to give up so much for her sake, had won a hold upon her heart. She knew, moreover, that trials and tribulations still lay ahead of her. Young, beautiful, stainless as she was, she was nevertheless beset by foes who would leave no stone unturned to accomplish her undoing. Small wonder that the future loomed before her dark and forbidding.

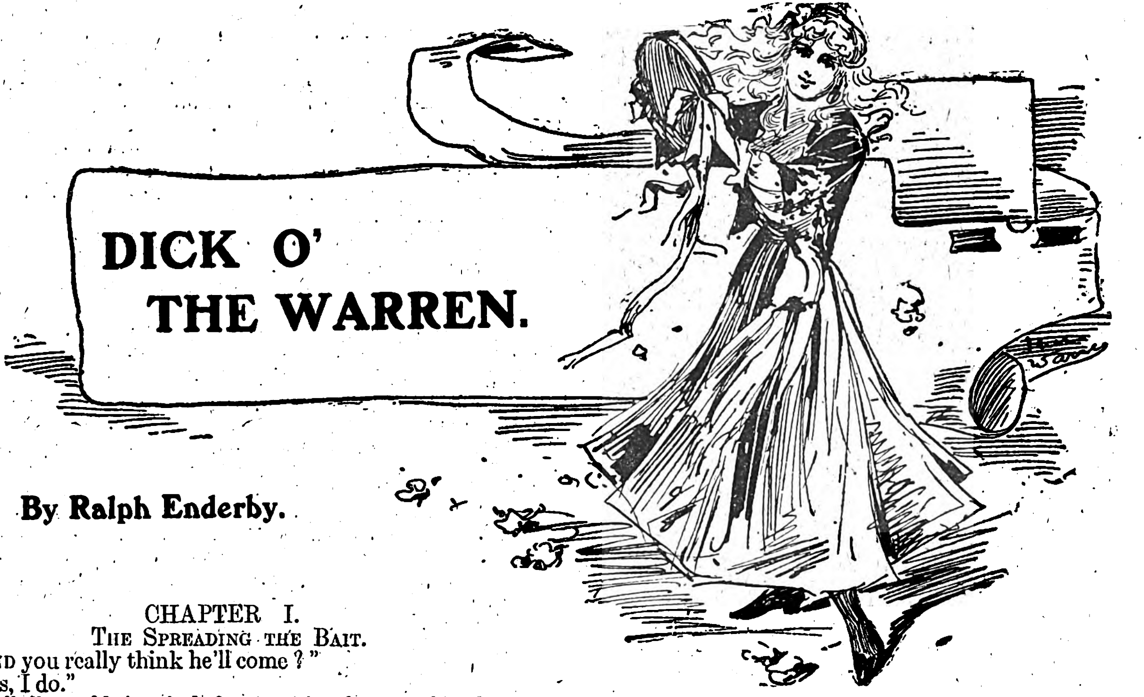
DICK O' THE WARREN.



By Ralph Enderby.

CHAPTER I.

THE SPREADING THE BAIT.

"AND you really think he'll come?"

"Yes, I do."

"Well, I wouldn't mind the wagering barest odds that he won't!"

"I'll take you! though it's almost like picking your pocket. Dick Westaway, whatever else he may be—dense, dull, and beastly rich—is, or was, rather, for neither you or I have seen him any time these ten years, punctual to a hair in everything."

"Yes, I know; but he mightn't be quite so dense or so dull now. These slow-witted fools, especially when they tumble into money, sometimes develop highly objectionable wariness and super-shrewdness."

"Sometimes, yes; always, no; and Dick Westaway will, unless I am very much mistaken, remain to the end of his days the blundering dunderheaded ass we knew him at Eton and at King's."

Archie Daunt, the last speaker, was not a man who most people would be inclined to accept at his own valuation, beyond that a general agreement must have been come to with regard to his cleverness—of a sort; cleverness most suspiciously akin to cunning.

Still, he contrived to appear, to the average person, the deft, tactful, pleasant man of the world. The best dressed man in town, people almost invariably forgot to notice the many silvery threads interspersed among the abundant fair hair; the faint, but sure signs of slowly advancing age. Eight-and-forty, if he was a day, Archie Daunt might very well have passed for ten years younger at the very least.

A close man; one who never, by any chance, revealed his own secrets, he was suave and smooth to a degree. With a smile ever, in public, on lip and in eye, both were as the unyielding gates to the real thoughts of the man, the very innermost workings of a dark and dead-cold spirit.

One man there was who knew him, or who, at least, approached as nearly to knowing him as such knowledge was possible.

This was Blair Anstie, his present companion, although even he oftentimes had his doubts as to the real value of his own estimate of his friend.

But Blair Anstie did not trouble himself much on this score. One of the easy-conscienced, "doesn't-mind much" type of individual, he let everything in life swing subservient to his own present peace and comfort—at someone else's expense. That it should have been at Archie Daunt's cost most men marvelled.

The two were always together, or, at any rate, not far apart. It was the elder man's habit of systematically "putting him up to a good thing" that kept Mr. Anstie's mill going and his head above water.

The good thing might not always be absolutely moral, or respectable, but, from the point of view of both of them, it served, and the toady's banking account was kept at solvent point accordingly.

When, many years before, the pair were professed tuft-hunters at Cambridge, Dick Westaway "came up" from Eton. They had known him there, but were never very enthusiastic about him.

In those days Dick was not a rich "possible," or with any reasonable prospect of ever becoming one; Daunt and Anstie, therefore, had no particular care for him.

The son of a fairly prosperous doctor in the West-end of London, Dick was four removes from the baronetcy and Yorkshire estates of Sir John Westaway, of "the Warren," near Ripley, by the river wharf. A boating accident reduced the intervening lives to two, and things stood at this when Daunt and Anstie ultimately left the University. Since then they had heard nothing of their quondam fellow "undergrad" till about a week previous to the above recorded conversation, which took place over late breakfast at Archie Daunt's chambers St. Margaret's Mansions, S.W.

It was a paragraph in the Times, first seen by Blair

Mr. Henry T. Johnson's new serial starts week after next.

Anstie, announcing the almost simultaneous deaths of Sir John Westaway and his two immediate heirs, apparent and presumptive.

This was followed by the information that the title and estates now descended to Richard Hoyle Westaway, next in succession, and now tenth baronet. It was added that the deceased's personality, all of which was bequeathed to Dick Westaway, amounted to, it was believed, over three millions sterling.

The consultation, consequent upon this news, between Daunt and his ally, was that morning long and earnest.

"Now, Blair, my boy, this is a gift from the gods," said Daunt impressively, "and accordingly as we work it so will the result be to us."

"As how?" queried the other.

"Simply, my dear fellow, by a reasonable revival of the ancient and gentle pastime of falconry, or hawking."

"I don't exactly see——"

"No, I don't suppose you do quite—yet, but when I say that a 'lure' will be needful to the due snaring of the quarry, why, probably, light will break for you—eh?"

Briefly a plan was arranged which should have for its object the renewing of old-time acquaintance with Dick Westaway, and the persuading him, if possible, up to town for purposes best known to themselves.

Daunt's first move in the game was to drive to the house of his sister in Alma Square, St. John's Wood.

"You know, Margot," he said persuasively, after he had explained the object of his visit, "I have no one but you to do the honours for me, and Dick Westaway is such a big swell now that I want the thing done in as good style as may be. You remember Dick Westaway?" he went on, "that shambling, good-natured young giant who persisted in making love to you the night of your birthday ball in Duke Street, just before the pater died."

"Oh, yes, I recollect him! and he is coming up to dine with you, you say?—poor fellow!"

"What do you mean?" said her brother, badly disguising an angry snarl, and uneasily gnawing his moustache. "I think it is rich fellow he ought to be called now."

"Of course! I was forgetting! And you wish me to head your table and play the hostess for you? Very well, I will do so. When is the feast to be?"

"To-morrow evening. Westaway is to be at my place at eight. Make yourself nice, there's a good girl—but there! you always do yourself credit."

"Thanks, Archie, awfully! And now that is settled I am going to be busy, and must turn you out."

Margot Daunt, in years twenty-seven, and one of the most beautiful women to be found in all London (which is saying much), had, up to this, failed in woman's one acknowledged mission, the finding a husband. There was no accounting for this, for she was in all ways formed to be the desire of a good man's heart and eyes.

She was gifted beyond the ordinary with the penetrative sense, and, with regard to human nature, could read where others scarce could spell. She had no very exalted opinion of her brother's character or pursuits, and so instinctively suspected danger for this newly rich but single-hearted young fellow, fresh as he was to all the allurements, so ready to the hand, and so daintily spread when money is plentiful.

But it was curiosity as much as anything else which influenced her to fall in so complacently with her brother's proposal.

She had a strange desire to see Dick Westaway again, why she didn't know beyond that she had a rather pleasant remembrance of her one-time boyish admirer. That she hoped by her presence to counteract any evil intentions Archie Daunt might have concerning his guest was certain, and when, on the morrow evening, her brother entered the room with the big, fair-haired young baronet, and introduced him to her, she told herself that she would see the thing through at whatever cost to herself.

"Do you know, Miss Daunt," said Dick gaily, "that I have never forgotten that birthday dance of yours. Things have changed since with me a bit, but with you—not an iota!"

"It is very good of you to say so, of course, but I must tell you that I never, on any consideration, allow compliments—they make me angry."

"Then I will not pay you another compliment, for, to speak honestly, I do not like them myself. By the way, what name do you think they've given me down at my place?"

"I really couldn't guess."

"No, I don't suppose you could. You are aware, perhaps that my place is called 'The Warren.' Well, the folk round about, only knowing me, on my visits to my uncle, as Master Dick, and sometimes Dick, when familiarity got the better of respect, have actually dubbed me 'Dick o' the Warren,' the veritable nick-name, if you please, of a certain notorious ancestor of ours, who lived uncleanly, and died shamefully, some two centuries ago, in Dutch William's time. How's that, Miss Daunt? The name is assuredly picturesque, but its application to myself isn't quite complimentary, is it?"

"Oh! I don't know," Daunt replied, seeing that his sister was inclined to, as he thought, take matters too seriously. "I don't know, Westaway; it's a good name, a name out of the common, so, as Trent says that dinner is served, I will ask you to take in my sister, 'Dick o' the Warren.' Ha, ha, ha!"

CHAPTER II.

The Quarry Breaks its Wing.

In the little station-yard at Ripley stood a smart dog-cart and a roomy wagonette, in charge of a couple of grooms in dark livery.

"The six-eighteen's late," said he of the dog-cart.

"Is it? That don't matter much—we've done for to-day when we've taken this lot up. The master's with 'em, ain't he, Ben?"

"Yes. Hullo! 'ere she comes round the bend! Woa, fidget (to his especial quadruped), what's up with you? Know who's close handy, I suppose!"

The train ran in, out of it stepping a party of six, two ladies and four gentlemen, followed by a couple of maids.

"Deuced out-of-the-way place this of yours, Dick!" said Archie Daunt.

"D'you think so?" replied his host. "Well, I don't know; perhaps it's because I've known it, on and off, ever since I was a lad, but I hold it to be just the most perfect place under the sun; don't you, Miss Congreve?"

The lady addressed had settled herself comfortably, and to her entire satisfaction, in the only available seat in the dog-cart, which held two, besides the driver. She was a handsome woman, dark, with glorious eyes, and with a mouth which, though in shape and general expression such as alone would have turned the head of any ordinary man, still had about it something hard and unsympathetic. Her attire was ultra-fashionable, betraying, as it did, the undoubtedly theatrical taste of the wearer. "Professional"—of a kind—was writ large on every flounce and scrap of trimming; the young lady—she was not more than one-and-twenty—being, in fact, Miss Lilian Congreve, a leading London variety artist, and the especial friend of Mr. Archie Daunt.

Replying to Dick's appeal she said that it looked pretty, what she could see of it, but that she could express no definite opinion until she had seen her dog—her dear, darling Fido — safely disposed in the quarters assigned to her at "The Warren."

Margot Daunt eyed the little lady with undeniable, if furtive, disapproval. She herself would not have come but that she conceived Dick incapable of looking after his own interests, to guard which, as far as in her lay, she had constituted herself his devoted shadow. She felt her position in that company to be somewhat open to question, but would not abandon her determination to watch developments.

It was a jovial, merry party assembled in the old Yorkshire manor house, and Dick Westaway was the lord, if not of misrule, of something, at any rate, very much like it.

True, there was no viciousness in his boisterous boyishness, or in his enthusiastic catering for the amusement of his guests. He was just a happy - hearted, irresponsible king of sports.

Daunt and Anstie, while seconding in a well - bred superciliously tolerant sort of way their host's efforts, were not a little impatient that their scheme did not make the progress they, or rather, Daunt, more particularly, desired.

Then, a hint dropped by his sister, that she was not altogether ignorant of that which he contemplated for Dick's detriment, contributed to make Daunt at once uneasy and savage. Uneasy, as fearing to lose hold of his prospective prey, and savage, in that he had been fool enough to allow Margot so good a view of his ugly purpose.

Look out for "Dead to the World."

"Look here, Anstie!" he said one day to his satellite, when the two were enjoying the after-dinner cigar under a tree on the lawn: "We must hasten things a bit. Anyone—a blind man, even—can see that Margot is more than a little gone on Westaway, and that being so, she'll thwart us at every turn. I think, too, the fool likes her; but it's not my book to let him have her, for, knowing her as I do, once married or even engaged to him, and it will be good-bye to our chance for a share of the Westaway millions."

"Well, what do you propose?" asked Anstie. "You can't exactly order a woman of your sister's age not to encourage Westaway; and I'm sure it wouldn't be safe to try and drive him. He's wonderfully like, do you know, that portrait of old 'Dick o' the Warren' in the long gallery; and, I for one, shouldn't care to tackle him on a tender point."

"You're an idiot! You ought to know by this time, I think, that I never, upon principle, resort to force, save under extreme pressure, and we haven't arrived at that yet."

"And I hope never shall!" fervently remarked Anstie, between two dense ejections of tobacco smoke.

"Oh! And why not, pray? You're a cruel coward, Blair, my son! And if ever you back out on the emergency, and leave me to fight it single-handed, mark me! but I'll kill you! Yes, I'll kill you!"

Blair Anstie's cigar dropped out of his fingers on to the grass, as Archie Daunt bent over towards him, and looked him squarely between the eyes. Then the arch-conspirator sank slowly back into his former position, smiling that eternal smile of his, which boded ill for somebody, and which, somehow, always irritated the other, while it tended to frighten and to disturb him.

"Just pull yourself together!" said Daunt again, "and listen to me! You, as well as I, can see that Westaway won't touch the cards. There's only one way, then, by which we can now gain our end, and that is—through Lilian!"

"Well," replied Anstie, with a curiously meaning little laugh, "I fancy you won't have much trouble there. I overheard something last night which——"

"Spit it out! What?"

"Why, which makes it as clear as daylight that your game is being played for you; and in right good earnest, too, by the young lady herself."

CHAPTER III.

In the Snare of the Fowler.

The drawing-room at the "Warren" was an immense chamber, long, and with half-a-dozen big French windows facing the garden terrace.

The men are at billiards. Margot is in her room, and alone, with her hands idly lying in her lap, sits Lilian Congreve.

She has, somehow, lost that lightly-worn smile of hers, that trick of gay, reckless abandon, hitherto almost habitual with her.

She is talking to herself.

"Why," she says bitterly, "why should I run Archie Daunt's course? He doesn't know how I love this man!—that 'Dick o' the Warren' loves me! But he does, he does, for he has told me so; has sworn that I—the the daughter of 'old Bet,' the drunken orange-hawker of Drury Lane—the once little flower-girl of the Shaftesbury Fountain—am more to him than is the whole wide world. He is so big, so strong, and splendid, that how could I help but love him?"

"By just packing-up, my dear, and taking the next train for town," said a deliberate voice from behind her.

"Archie Daunt! You are well set to work, I think, to spy even upon my very thoughts!"

"You shouldn't speak them so loudly, then. But I've something to say to you, and as it intimately concerns you, I should strongly advise you to listen to me carefully."

She turned from him with an air of contemptuous indifference, answering him not a word.

"I have changed my mind during the past twenty-four hours," he went on. "You and I have been very good friends up to now; indeed, it was my intention to have done you the honour of making you an offer, but, as I have said, I have changed my mind."

Still she did not speak.

"I find," he continued, in even cutting tones, "on consideration, that your own evident plan will suit me quite as well, if not better. Now I am ready to help you, on one condition—that you help me."

"Help you?"

"Yes. You surely do not imagine that it was for your mere enjoyment and benefit that I got you here? or that you might seriously exercise your fascinations upon our impressionable friend—eh?"

Still silence.

"It was, as you very well know, that you might act as a foil to my precious sister, whom Westaway insisted upon inviting down here, and who is determined to put a spoke in my wheel!"

"You never spoke a truer word in your life, Archie!"

He turned sharply to encounter Margot, who had quietly come in at the window from the terrace.

"Now, Archie," she continued, "don't go, as you and I have something to say to each other. Nor you, if you don't mind, Miss Congreve; it may be as well, perhaps, that a witness should be present."

He threw the cigar he was smoking savagely out through the window, and lit another.

"I know," said Margot, "that you have deliberately planned to rob—don't interrupt me, please—to rob Sir Richard Westaway. I know that you already have, even in this short space, borrowed from him—or, shall we rather say, forced him to lend you—certain large sums of money. From what your friend Mr. Anstie has told me——"

"Oh! he has been talking, has he? Well, I will settle with him by-and-bye."

"I should advise you to be careful, Archie, how you proceed with regard to him, or, indeed, at all. You are my brother, but surely you have not in your veins one drop of my mother's blood! I will never forgive you for even suggesting to me, however indirectly, the bolstering up of your wretched scheme. Miss Congreve, I ask your pardon, but will you let me beg of you, if you are in any way cognisant—which I hope and believe you are not—of what is going on, to cease any further hand-in-handness with Mr. Daunt."

Lilian Congreve was not a bad woman. Frivolous she was, fond of display and admiration, but beneath it all there was a genuine under-current of true womanly right principle.

She stood up and looked Margot steadfastly in the face for half a moment.

"Miss Daunt," she at length said, "your brother, I think, quite understands that any collaboration between us is impossible."

Look at page 432.

"I am glad!" Margot smilingly replied.

"But," continued the girl, a trifle unsteadily, "the fact which renders it more than ever impossible is, perhaps, not quite so well known to him. It cannot be told by me. Sir Richard Westaway must himself communicate it to you!"

"Sir Richard!"

"Dick Westaway!" Margot and her brother exclaimed in one breath.

"Yes, and as I hear him coming from the billiard-room, he no doubt will do as I wish."

"Hullo! Archie! Hullo! Miss Daunt! What's in the wind?"

Then his glance fell upon the figure of Lilian Congreve, whom at first he did not see, and who stood waiting for him to speak.

"Do you want me?" he said to the girl, his manner conveying to the others present—Daunt and his sister—an impression of studied confidence, and intense, if restrained personal feeling.

"Please tell them," was all she said.

"It was my intention," he said, after a moment's hesitation, "to have kept this matter secret until—well—until I had made certain private arrangements, which I considered necessary; but since this lady," taking her hand and lifting it to his lips, "has asked me to divulge it—for very good reason, I am sure—I have only to say that this morning, during an early drive, Miss Congreve and myself were married at Pately Bridge church, and that 'Dick o' the Warren' is a very fortunate as well as a very happy man."

CHAPTER IV.

Wounded and Free.

One morning all London was startled to its centre by the newspaper announcement of a terrible tragedy.

"Between half-past ten and a quarter to eleven last night, Lilian Congreve, the leading light of the variety stage, who, by mutual consent had, for the past five years, been separated from her husband, Sir Richard Hoyle Westaway, Bart., was shot as she passed to her brougham from the stage entrance of the Stadium. She died immediately.

"The man who fired the shot, and who is in custody on a charge of wilful murder, is a well-known man-about-town, of good family, but of somewhat shady reputation, one Archibald Daunt.

"The assassin made no effort to escape when taken, being calmly occupied in wiping the revolver with his handkerchief."

In the very midst of the most lovely orange-grove in all Florida, stands a low built but spacious house of Spanish design, which, with its green jalousies and its wide verandad "stoep," is an ideal home for those who live there.

Though there are no little ones to make pleasant noise and laughter, the couple who inhabit it are very content and happy.

Hear what the man says, as he stands in the cool of the tropical evening, with his arm round his wife's shoulders.

"Margot," he whispers, "had I never made my mistake, what would you have done?"

"That which I have actually done, I am afraid," she answers, smiling up at him. "Poor Lilian!"

"Poor Lilian!" echoes "Dick o' the Warren."

A farmer, whilst entertaining some visitors to tea, somewhat startled the company by exclaiming to one of the guests: "Stick in, man, stick in; Mr. Broon's twa scones aheid o' ye."

"You went right in boldly, did you?" "Yes, after looking in." "And you started ahead and asked the old man for his daughter?" "Well, no; I didn't." "Why not?" "He wasn't there."

Johnny: "Mother wants you to come to tea this afternoon." Miss Passee: "That's a nice little fellow; I shall be delighted. Did your mamma say anything else, dear?" Johnny: "Yes; she said she s'posed she might as well have it done with."

"Children," said the mother of the family, opening the door of the nursery and looking in, "what are you doing to Puggy that makes him yelp so?" "Ben's been using the curling tongs on his tail to make it curl tighter," explained Eunice.

"Charlie, dear," said young Mrs. Torkins, "the baby is trying to talk again. It's wonderful how he takes after you!" "What is he talking about?" "I think it must have been politics. He started very calmly, but in a few minutes he was as angry and red in the face as he could be."

Little four-year Harry was not feeling well, and his father suggested that he might be taking the chicken-pox, then prevalent. Harry went to bed laughing at the idea, but early next morning he came downstairs looking very serious, and said: "You're right, papa, it is the chicken pox, I found a feather in the bed."

His Reverence (at bush accommodation house for the first time): "When does the mail come here, Mr. Clancy?" Mr. Clancy: "It arl depinds, y' riv'rince. A former vicar of a country parish not far from Sheffield was a distinguished mathematician, and took a high place in the Cambridge Tripos. One day a visitor to the village got into conversation with one of the parishioners, and the talk turned on the vicar. "Your clergyman," said the visitor, "is a very able man. Why, he is a wrangler." "I never heard that," was the villager's reply, "but his missus is."

"How much are these oranges?" said an old lady to a fruit dealer in the market. "Tenpence a dozen, mum." "And those?" "1s. 8d." "What's the difference between them?" "Tenpence, mum."

"Didn't you shoot anything at all, John?" "Yes; I got a fine bag of game, but it was stolen from me on the railway." "Well, never mind, John; you've brought home a bran-new story!"

"What did your wife say when you got home last night?" "Nothing." "Nothing? I can't believe that." "Don't blame you, my boy. Wouldn't have believed it m'self unless I'd been there."

Diner: "Come, tell me straight. Is it any real advantage to a man who gives you a tip?" Truthful Waiter: "Honestly, I can't say that it is; but it is apt to go hard with the gentleman that doesn't tip me."

Sharp Father: "I believe that handsome stranger has fallen in love with you, my dear." Extravagant Daughter: "Do you? Why?" Sharp Father: "I saw him gazing sadly at that expensive dress you have on."

"Never mind," said the poet, as he tossed a rejected poem on the floor, "I'll set the world ablaze yet." "And just to help you start the conflagration," said the better half as she picked up the aforesaid MS., "I'll light the fire in the cook stove with this."

A young Irishman once went to a kind-hearted old squire for a recommendation. An elaborate one was written and read to him. He took it with thanks, but did not move. "What's the matter with it?" roared the squire. "Oh, nothin', sorr," said the lad quickly. "Well, then, why don't you go?" "Sure, sorr, I thought on the stringth of a recommind like that, you'd be wantin' to employ me."

THE HOUSE WITH TWO DOORS.

A Mystery and the Manner of It.

THE PROLOGUE.

Early in the summer of 18—, all London was startled by the supposed murder of a man under somewhat strange circumstances.

The term "murder" is here used with a certain amount of reservation, as, although facts pointed, almost conclusively, to the commission of a great crime, there were not a few criminal scientists who doubted. They could put no theory in the place of that which they questioned; merely suggesting that the murderer, if he ever existed, must needs have been a consummate genius (in a homicidal sense), inasmuch as he had left behind him not even the faintest trace or clue by which the deed could be brought home to him.

Absalom Tighe, bachelor and millionaire, had lived for over twenty years in the dreariest retirement, in an old house on the London side of Edgeware. He kept but one servant, a middle-aged man-of-all-work, his household, such as it was, being supervised and cared for by his niece, Eva Tighe, a girl of twenty-two or thereabouts.

Men of Absalom Tighe's character and disposition often get a reputation for keeping large sums of money in the house—unscrupulous individuals, as often, acting upon the rumour.

When, therefore, the old owner of "The Hermitage" (he was nearly eighty) was one morning discovered by his niece lying with his throat cut from ear to ear on the floor of his sleeping-room, people's minds jumped at once to the conclusion that he had been murdered for as much of his money as there had been in the house.

Subsequent investigation proved, however, that nothing was missing; not even to the value of a single sovereign, or less.

The legal wits working upon the mystery made no headway, and were fain, in less than a month, to give up the chase.

A reward of £500 was publicly offered for the discovery of the criminal or criminals, but elicited nothing; and the "Hermitage" murder bid fair to, in course of time, take its place in the long list of undiscovered crimes.

After her uncle's funeral, Eva Tighe, suddenly and completely disappeared, going none knew whither. All that pertained to her in the shape of personal property she one night removed, without word or sign. The furniture and household belongings were, the week following sold by auction; and, the odd man being paid off—some said pensioned—by Mr. Tighe's solicitor, the house was shut up, pending its sale.

A certain young police recruit, one Paul Wreford at that time qualifying for detective duty, was struck with the curious mysteriousness of the affair. He, for one, did not credit the "murder" theory, "for," as he said at the inquest, where he gave evidence as having been called in by Miss Tighe on the morning of the discovery, "how came it that the razor with which the deed was undoubtedly done was found so close to the dead man's hand? The doctor states that the wound could not possibly have been self-inflicted, judging from, he says natural premises, and from the position of the body when found. That is as it may be — I have my own opinion."

"And that is——?" queried the coroner, blandly, but with just the suspicion of a sneer, expressive of the officer's youth, and presumable inexperience.

"My own," replied Wreford, boldly. "If ever I am to do anything in the solving and unravelling of this mystery, and though I am not officially told off for the duty, no one can prevent me finding out the truth, if I can; I say, if I am to do anything, my ideas and my methods must remain mine, and not the public's."

There was much girding at, and critical contempt for, this callow investigator in both official and lay circles, but he took little heed, and quietly went his way.

One thing troubled him not a little. It was the disappearance of Eva Tighe. For the moment it shattered alike his hopes and one of his most cherished theories with regard to this matter of Absalom Tighe's death.

He had only seen the girl once, and then but for a brief while. It was sufficiently long, however, to thoroughly impress her personality upon him.

"If," he argued with himself, "she knows anything about this thing; or if she herself did it, then I'll give up detecting. But first, to find her! Let me only see her; talk to her, and make her talk, and then perhaps I may find a clue to the death-dealing of old Absalom."

But Eva Tighe was gone beyond his reach, and he felt instinctively that unless chance or fate, or some other like thing, should ever throw her across his path, in some way at present absolutely unknown to him, he should never succeed in the object he had so much at heart.

CHAPTER I.

The policeman on the beat had watched the house for days, in obedience to official instructions; but as yet nothing had come of it.

The house was peculiar, for London almost unique.

Of but two stories in height, rambling, and in length excessive, it presented to the street its back walls only, pierced with four windows. The front of the house, the real front, gave upon a longish and lovely old-world garden, now a very wilderness of tangle and desolation. At one time the residence of an ancient Admiral, of the old school, dead these two years, it was now (had been in fact for more than a twelvemonth) occupied by a tenant whose face no man, not even the landlord, had ever seen.

The most curious feature about the house was its two street doors. Situated at some little distance from each other, they might easily have been mistaken for the respective entrances to separate dwellings. Strangers often made the mistake, but as knocks were never answered, it did not much matter.

It was the mysterious character of the then tenant that had at last set Mr. Superintendent Hastie thinking. He had heard it whispered that, although the house had been taken by some person in the name of Creeve, no one could say whether it was a man or a woman. Public opinion on the subject was about equally divided.

Look at page 432.

The same policeman who reported on Monday the issuing out on Sunday, just before midnight, at one door, of an elderly man, well dressed, but whose face, owing to the darkness, could not be discerned, on the very next night told of a young lady, fashionably dressed, but thickly veiled, who left the house about the same time, by the other door.

"You're sure," said the superintendent, "that it was a woman you saw to-night?"

"Yes," replied the constable. "I'll swear to it! They may say as there isn't two people living there, but I know better."

"Well, you may be right, and—you may not."

He touched an electric bell.

"Is Wreford in?" to the officer who answered the summons.

"Yes, sir."

"Send him to me. Look here, Davis" (to the constable), "you needn't worry any more about this business, except just to be ready if anything turns up. Ah! Wreford, you've nothing in hand, have you?"

"No—nothing much. Anything special?"

"'M—well, just an enquiry or two, that's all. All right, Davis—that'll do."

Davis would have dearly liked to stay and be taken into confidence. He had a feeling of being slighted.

Plain-clothes-man Wreford was a well set up young fellow of not more than three and twenty, though looking older. Tall, athletic, and more than passably good-looking, he had about him that air of genuine refinement which in the case of the average detective is usually lacking. The "bull-dog" spirit was there, but without the other and peculiar canine characteristics. Add to all this a kindly if keen grey eye, and you have the man.

"It's that house in Underwood Road—we've got to find out what's going on there."

"Do you suspect anything wrong, then?"

"Well, I do and I don't, if you can make that out; but the two are a bit jumbled. I won't tell you what to do, for I believe you're smart enough to act on your own."

"Thanks! You want to know who, what, and why. Well, I'll try and find out for you. Who's on the beat?"

"Davis."

"'M—yokel. Has he told you anything?"

"Yes; says that the night before last, Monday, about 12 p.m., an old gentleman came out of the door nearest to Gwydr Street, and that last night a young woman, fashionably got up, came out of the other door at the same hour. He saw neither of them return."

"Ah! only one person supposed to be in the house, is there?"

"So the landlord says."

"He ought to know; but landlord, like other people, don't know everything."

The young detective lost no time in getting to work and within half an hour was outside the mysterious house in Underwood Road.

His first action was ordinary—just a mere commonplace knocking at the right-hand door.

There were no steps, the door sill being on a level with the street pavement. On the left was a small, four-paned window, breast high, and about twenty-four inches square. This window appeared not to have been cleaned for months, its dirty panes needing no curtain to ensure privacy.

Paul Wreford, as became one of his profession, was a model of patience and deliberation.

His first summons having no effect in arousing attention, he knocked a second, and a third time. Still no result.

It then occurred to him to stroll quietly to the corner of Gwydr Street, along the left side of which ran, for some little distance, the boundary wall of the garden of "The Limes."

Turning smartly but stealthily back, and hugging the house wall, he stole silently up to the little window.

As he suddenly advanced his face to the dirty glass he was quick enough to see a pair of big, fierce looking eyes glued to the inside, and evidently trying to spy out the cause of the persistent knocking.

The eyes, on being met with those from without, did not remove for a second or two, enabling Wreford to mistily make out the face of a woman and a wealth of fiery red hair. Behind her was the dim glimmer of a flickering candle, which, while it threw the head outline into a certain amount of relief, did nothing towards revealing the interior of the place.

Wreford tapped at the window. As he did so, the light disappeared, and with it the face of the woman.

He tried to recall whether it were young or old, but for the life of him could not.

"I've seen those eyes and that hair together somewhere, surely," he said musingly to himself, as he walked slowly away.

He could only have reached half way to the Gwydr Street corner, when he heard a door slam violently, as if blown to by the wind.

Turning sharply, he saw the figure of an old man (at least, he appeared to be old), bent, and clad in a long, ulster-like garment reaching almost to his feet, move away from the other door, and proceed up the street toward the main road.

Wreford, though having no authority to stay the man or otherwise interfere with him, went rapidly after him. By the time, however, he reached the main road, there was not a trace of him.

He was lost in the hurrying throng of passers-by—vanished completely into space.

CHAPTER II.

In a room at the back of "The Limes"—the house in Underwood Road—looking on to the lawn, sat a woman by the open window. It was an old-fashioned "bow," taking up nearly the whole side of the room, and forming an alcove or divan, the very essence of cosiness and comfort.

It was getting dusk, and the few articles of furniture looked ghostly and weird in the gathering gloom.

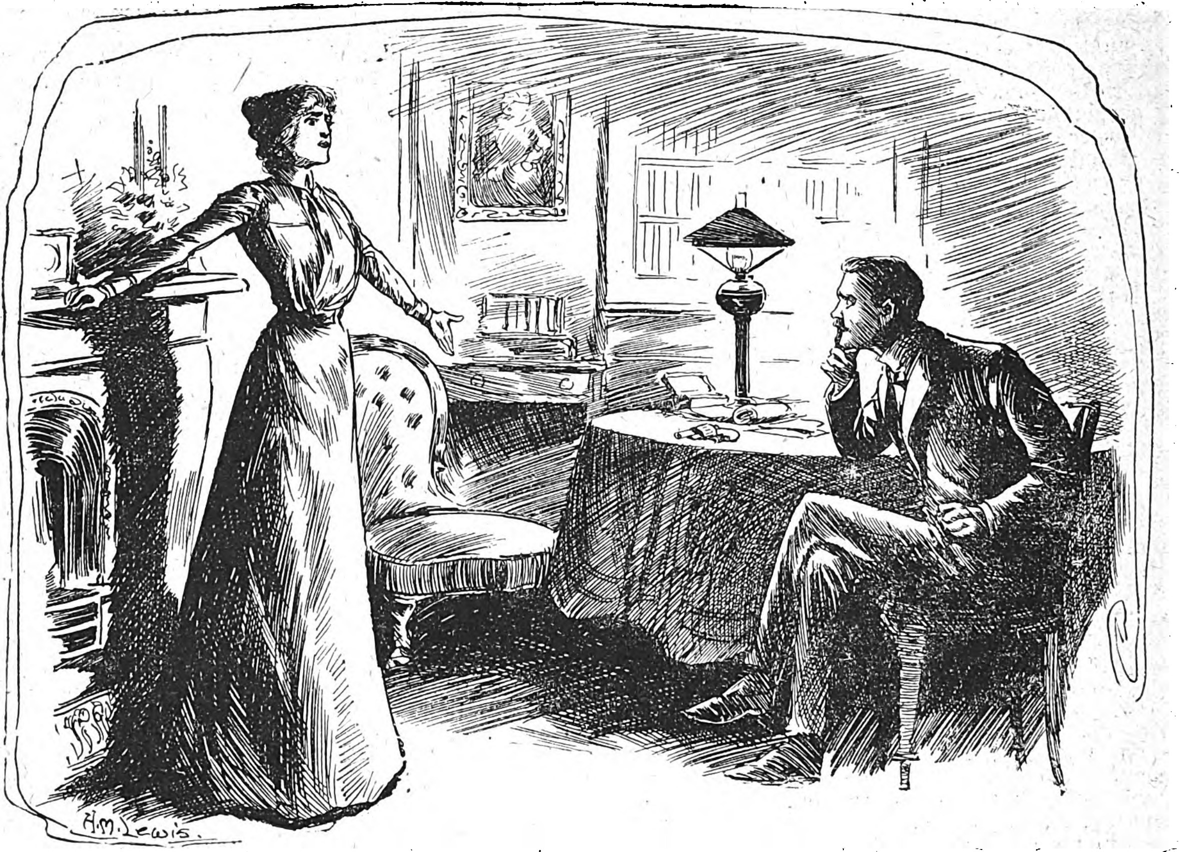
A large round table stood in the centre, upon it being a motley heap of papers, jewelled nick-nacks of all sorts, and, conspicuously handy, a tiny silver-mounted revolver.

The woman, even in the dim light, was noticeable for her mass of red hair, bound up in Grecian fashion with a large knot high up the back of the head.

Her eyes, too, compelled attention, by reason of the strange, unquiet look in them. Sitting in the twilight, with her chin supported upon her hand, her eyes gazing abstractedly out across the grass to the belt of trees at the bottom of the garden, she seemed as one who saw and heard things unrevealed to all other women.

Presently she broke the silence.

Mr. Henry T. Johnson's new serial starts week after next.



"You cannot? I thought all the world had long since made up its mind as to why I—Eva Tighe—had fled from the face of it."

"Why doesn't he come? Why doesn't he? Oh! he would if he knew!"

At that moment a knock at one of the front doors reverberated through the house.

The whole woman was transformed.

From her attitude of introspective depression she passed in a second to high-wrought, nervous agitation.

With a bound like a tigress she was at the table-side, the tiny revolver in her hand.

Then the knock was repeated.

Straining her ears as if to catch some sound she either looked for or dreaded, she crept noiselessly across the room to the door, which opened into the large square hall.

Right in front of her was the street door—the one, that is, nearest to Gwydr Street. Gliding up to it, she stooped and placed her ear to the letter-slit, listening intently.

Hearing nothing, she moved softly along a passage to her right, half way down which was the other street door.

Here, too, being conscious of no sound, or presence even, outside, she returned, and tried to peer out through the before-mentioned little window.

The deliberate heavy tramp of the passing policeman was all that she could hear.

Up to this she had struck no light of any kind.

It was while she was crossing the mat in the hall that she indistinctly saw lying upon it, immediately under the letter-slit, a white something.

Swiftly stooping and seizing it, she carried it tremblingly into the room she had but now left; turned up a lamp with a large dark shade toward the window, and opened a folded sheet of notepaper. It was a letter, hurriedly written in pencil.

"Eva," if ran, "I cannot keep my appointment with you to-night. There are bloodhounds about. You will know what I mean.

"Your house is evidently watched, so that whatever precautions you have hitherto taken to avoid recognition will, I fear, soon be useless. Personally, I am at a loss to account for all this hiding away, dear, when, as I believe, there is no need for it. Why will you not be open with me?—with me, who loves you so? When you so suddenly left 'The Hermitage,' immediately after uncle Absalom's funeral, I thought then, and I think now, that you did that which at least was unwise and imprudent. Had you confided more in me, and let me advise and see you, all this horribly unnatural state of things would never have been. Eva! you know that it was only poor uncle's death that interrupted our marriage. Are you going, dear, to make this marriage an impossibility? I will be here to-morrow night at the same time, and, if the coast be clear (though I quite refuse to acknowledge the necessity for it) will knock twice.

"Think over what I have said.

"Your own
"ALEC."

"What have I done? What have I done? Even you, Alec, are against me! Oh! God forgive me! if I wrong you—my own love!—my own love!"

With a cry, bitter with the wrung-out agony of helpless misery, Eva Tighe, letting the bright little weapon she still held drop out of her hand upon the table, sank into a chair, her face buried in her hands, and weeping as though her heart would break.

CHAPTER III.

"EVA," said Alec Hurst, when the terrified girl had feverishly shut-to the door, bolting and barring it with trembling hands, "at last I shall know what it all means. You will have to tell me, for this state of uncertainty and doubt is killing me."

For reply she led him into the same large back room where we first saw her. The window was closed now, a heavy curtain being drawn across it.

"And you live alone in this place, Eva?"

"I live alone in this place."

"But why—why?"

"You surely can divine why!"

"But I cannot!"

She was standing by the empty fireplace, one arm leaning on the marble mantelpiece, while he, in deference to her bidding, sat by the table, waiting for the words which should enlighten him.

"You cannot? I thought all the world had long since made up its mind as to why I, Eva Tighe, had fled from the face of it."

"Then I am not of the world," he said, wondering over her drift; "for the one thing concerning you upon which I have made up my mind is that I love you so that I would take you away—now!—this hour—if it were possible, out of this pernicious atmosphere of doubt and fear to some other country, where you could breathe the pure sweet air of content and happiness."

"Alec," and he fancied he could detect through the intervening shadow upon her face the faintest of sad smiles. "Alec! do you not remember how, when after dear Uncle Absalom died, people looked askance at me?"

"Great heavens! No! What are you driving at, Eva? Are you mad?"

"Sometimes I think, dear, that I am," and her voice sank to a low, sobbing whisper.

"Forgive me!" he cried, springing up, and holding out his hands towards her. "I know not what I said."

"Oh, yes, you did; and—you were right, perhaps. It would be kinder to believe me mad than to know that I sanely could endure such tortures as I do."

"But what do you fear?"

"Alec, ever since my uncle's awful death they have suspected me—sought for me—would take and kill me!"

"They! Who?"

"Those dreadful men! I know that one of them is close to me now. I know that only last night about this time he sought entrance here!"

"Eva! My darling! my promised wife! for pity's sake!—for my sake!—cast from you this dreadful cloud of darkness and despair! When, in my note yesterday, I said that 'bloodhounds were about,' my words had no definite intent or meaning. I did but wish to respect your reason for seclusion, whatever it might be."

"You cannot deceive me, Alec. I know now that you know. It was my last hope that you did not—the last straw to which I clung—your faith and trust in me."

Alec Hurst was a brave man and good; a man, too, whom any woman might have been proud to call husband; a man whose love would be as the one thing needful to a heart sore and empty, and craving that which was truest and best.

Being all this and, indeed, more, he could not, apart from his great love for her, but regard this woman with all that pitiful, protective tenderness her state so manifestly demanded of him.

"Eva," he said, very gently, yet with a firm purpose which she could not mistake, "listen to me. My answer to your terrible story is that I refuse, for one moment, to believe it. Say, rather, that I absolutely refuse to credit any man or woman with so great lack of wisdom and of heart as to put this awful suspicion upon you."

"But, Alec!——"

"Do not interrupt me, dear: I have but little more to say—until to-morrow. Briefly, then, put up all those things that you most value and be ready at nine o'clock to-morrow evening to join me at the main road end of the street, where I shall have a cab waiting."

"I cannot—I cannot!" she moaned.

"I will then drive you," he continued, as not heeding her deprecatory exclamation, "to my mother's. Once there, all will be well for you, and—for me."

He looked at his watch, saw it was getting late, and told her he must go.

As the street door closed behind him, neither of them saw the figure of Paul Wreford standing in the shadow at the corner of Gwydr Street.

Half an hour afterwards, the other door opened quietly and the shambling, long-coated figure of an old man slipped out, and, shutting the door carefully, shuffled down the street.

Quick as thought, the detective shot out from his dark retreat and followed.

This time the quarry did not escape.

A heavy hand laid upon the old man's shoulder provoked a piercing shriek that rang through the quiet street.

"Eva Tighe! I arrest you on suspicion of having killed one Absalom Tighe, at 'The Hermitage,' near Edgeware, some time on the night of June 17th of last year."

CHAPTER IV.

WHEN Alec Hurst left the house in Underwood Road he had much to do.

Jumping into a hansom, he drove to his chambers in Victoria Street, and without tasting meat or drink wrote at high pressure for more than a hour.

At the end of that time there was a goodly pile of letters lying on his desk. These he himself took out to post, returning at once to his rooms. A slight meal, a glass of wine, and a pipe, and he turned in.

He was up again the next morning soon after six, and ordered his breakfast for eight o'clock. It was his usual practice to run through the papers during the meal, this morning being no exception to the rule.

It was a leaded headline in the Telegraph that suddenly drove back the blood from his heart and made him sick with apprehensive terror.

"THE EDGEWARE TRAGEDY.

"Arrest of Miss Eva Tighe.

"A startling development of this, well-nigh forgotten case, is the arrest, late last night, by Detective-Sergt. Wreford, of Eva Tighe, niece of the deceased man, on a charge of murder.

"The young lady is quite silent on the subject, refusing indeed, any communication whatever.

"It is expected that at the magisterial examination to-day there will be some highly sensational revelations.

"We hear, on just going to press, that Miss Tighe is completely prostrated, and that the police-court proceedings may, after all, have to be postponed. A curious feature of the arrest is that the prisoner was disguised as a man, wearing also a wig and beard of long grey hair."

Driving like a madman to the family solicitors, Alec quickly put things in train for efficient defence. Then, with the purpose of the night before stronger than ever within him, he made for the old house at Edgeware which still remained empty and unsold.

Arrived—having previously secured the key from the lawyers, who temporarily held them—he entered the deserted place.

It seemed to him like a vault, and as he made his way up the bare oak staircase his footsteps sounded hollow and eerie.

It was not an altogether blind man's search, this upon which he was bent. Wending his way to his late uncle's bedchamber, he carefully tested every panel to see if there was any chance of a hiding-place.

It was not money he was looking for, as all old Absalom's available cash, securities, and so on, had been duly accounted for by the solicitors.

Eva's portion—a not inconsiderable one—was lying waiting for her whenever she should claim it.

It was getting towards evening when Alec's painstaking was at last rewarded.

Close by where the bed had originally stood was a panel in the wainscoting slightly more worn than the others about the edges next to the raised bead.

For some time the young fellow could find no means of moving it; but when he was almost on the point of giving up in despair, his fingers came in contact with a tiny button, and the panel slid creakingly back.

In the black recess were papers without end.

Another hour was spent in going over these by the light of a small hand lantern he had brought with him.

"Thank God!" he at last exclaimed, so loudly that the mice behind the wainscot squeaked and scampered again.

It was but a folded sheet of ordinary notepaper.

"I have nothing to live for. As did my father before me, so have I decided to do. I write this in the event of trouble arising to anyone through this my act. I die without regret. Eva will be the better for my death. She will marry Alec Hurst, and soon forget

"Absalom Tighe."

That night, late, an excited, unreasonable man knocked up the senior partner of Parker, Hyde and Co., who, in his turn, paid a late visit to the magistrate who, in the natural course of things, would hear the case on the morrow.

An appeal, then, to a still higher authority speedily procured poor Eva's release; the only dissatisfied person being Detective-Sergeant Wreford, whose knuckles were duly and somewhat sharply rapped by his superior in that he had exceeded his duty and brought disgrace upon his, Mr. Superintendent Hastie's, district administration.

Mr. and Mrs. Alec Hurst are, it is believed, in permanent residence now somewhere in California, in which delightful State they have an ideal home.

The house in Underwood Street, Kensington, is "To Let."

Ralph Enderby.

HIS ONE LOVE DREAM.

It lasted nearly one day, and he thinks he escaped very easily.

Nine o'clock of a lovely April morning, with the air breathing soft scents of budding grass and early spring violets, while overhead the blue sky stretched its dazzling dome, like an arch of glittering sapphire.

"It's spring in good earnest," said Mr. Petro Peterson, as he sat at his window, his heels poised on the extreme outer ledge, and a fragrant cigar perfuming the surrounding atmosphere. "Heigho! I can almost fancy how the dandelions are starring over the hills of the old New Hampshire farm where I was born. Who would think that it was the 26th of April already? And my house not let. What can the real estate agents be thinking of?"

Mr. Petro Peterson was a stout, bald-headed gentleman of some six-and-forty years of age, with bright hazel eyes, and a neat, compact little figure—one of those men whose very air and gait, even though they were never to speak a word, make the perpetual proclamation: "I am a man of money and position!"

"I don't see why Mrs. Parker wanted to give up the house," went on Mr. Peterson, in his unsyllabled soliloquy. "She says it's because the price of board is falling, and she can't afford to keep up the establishment! A great mistake of hers in my opinion—a great mistake! She's the only woman I ever knew who could make a real French omelet, or knew what café noir meant! I'm almost tempted to wish—almost I say—that I had married some nice, sensible little girl twenty good years ago; for—dear me, what can all that ringing at the bell mean? Why don't Mrs. Parker answer it?

Look at page 432.

Do the people mean to pull the wire out bodily, I wonder ?"

He had just tossed his cigar out of the window, with the intention of himself hastening to the rescue, when a servant girl came up to his apartment, breathless and eager..

"What is it, Hannah ?" he cried irascibly.

"If ye please, sir, the mistress is gone to market, and there's no one to show the house. I told 'em would they call again, but they said perhaps Mr. Peterson would oblige 'em !"

"Very cool of 'em, upon my word !" cried Mr. Peterson, mentally execrating the whole race of house hunters.

"I beg your pardon, Mr. Peterson," cried a voice as soft and sprightly as the notes of the bluebird, "but mamma and I have so many places to go to, and we thought you wouldn't mind our seeing the house !"

And Mr. Peterson's wrath melted away like a morning vapour before her pretty insolence of demeanour, as she stood in the doorway, balancing a fairy parasol on her finger, and looking with saucy artlessness round his bachelor sanctum, while Mrs. Cope's matronly countenance appeared in the background.

"You can allow us the privilege of looking at your house," said Jeannie coaxingly. "I—that is, mamma has got to move, and although the rent of this house must, of course, be very high, she thought, by taking a few boarders she might contrive to meet expenses !"

"Exactly so," said mild Mrs. Cope.

"Are you going to move elsewhere ?" asked Jeannie of our hero, as she glanced at the half-packed trunks.

"My landlady is," groaned Mr. Petro Peterson. "It's awful to be at the mercy of a landlady, Miss Cope !"

"But it's all your fault !"

"All my fault ?"

"To be sure—why didn't you get married ?"

"Because I was a fool !"

"And why don't you get married now ?" pursued the relentless little sprite.

"Would you," questioned Mr. Peterson gravely, "if you were I ?"

"Of course I would. Get married and board with us. Mamma will give you this room, and——"

"My dear !" checked Mrs. Cope gently.

"My dear madam !" cried Mr. Peterson, still with his eyes fixed on Jeannie's lovely face, "I assure you I think it is an excellent idea !"

And all through their journey from cellar to French roof, while Mrs. Cope considered the relative advantages of this room and that, Mr. Peterson kept revolving this same "excellent idea" in his mind.

"Miss Jeannie," he said, somewhat awkwardly, as they turned downstairs, "supposing I should—ahem—adopt your suggestion, what would be your fancy in furnishing a suite of rooms ?"

"Let me see," said Jeannie, looking composedly around, "I'd paper the room in white and gold, and I'd fill the windows with canary birds and plants , and I'd have a blue carpet and blue silk chairs and sofas."

"Mrs. Cope, if you should decide to take the house, you will please reserve these rooms for me, and—and Mrs. Peterson, ma'am, at ten pounds a week."

"I shall be very happy, sir !" said Mrs. Cope. "Jeannie, stop laughing ; you behave exactly like a little school-girl. You will give me till to-morrow morning, sir, to decide ?"

"Certainly, ma'am—certainly."

As he turned, after seeing them off, already in imagination leading Jeannie Cope to the flower-decked altar, a slender, good-looking young man of some four or five and twenty stood beside him.

"Good morning, uncle," he cried breathlessly.

"Good morning, Joe," returned Mr. Peterson, nodding to Mr. Joseph Franklin, his only nephew. "What brings you here in such a hurry ?"

"Is your house let yet, uncle ?"

"Yes—no—I don't exactly know," responded Mr. Peterson, a little awkwardly. "What does it matter to you whether it is or not, hey, you young scapegrace ?"

"Much, sir. To tell you the truth, I was thinking of renting it myself."

"You !"

"Yes, I. I'm going to be married next week, uncle."

"A very sensible plan," said Mr. Peterson beamingly.

"I'm glad you approve of it, sir, and, in case my wife and I conclude to take a few boarders, can I have your promise to consider you as one ?"

"That is, in case you take the house ?"

"Yes."

"I can't promise ; in fact, I think I've already engaged myself," said Mr. Peterson, importantly. "To speak frankly, Joe, I've some idea of marrying myself."

"You, uncle ?" exclaimed Franklin, in amazement.

"And why not ?"

"There's no reason on earth why you shouldn't uncle," responded Joe, smothering a laugh ; "only, you see, you took me rather by surprise. In that case, why shouldn't we have the pleasure of accommodating both Mrs. Peterson and yourself ?"

"Because, sir," said Mr. Peterson sententiously, "because my mother-in-law that is to be takes boarders, sir—a few boarders in a genteel sort of way, and I've all but promised myself to her."

"And if you should make no other arrangement you will let us have the house ?"

"Y—yes, I suppose so."

"There can be no harm in my bringing her to look at the house this afternoon after office hours ?"

"No, I suppose not."

He was making a little pencil estimate about the probable cost of refurnishing the apartments he occupied with velvet and satin, according to Jeannie's not particular economical ideas, that same afternoon, when Joseph Franklin entered, flushed and proud.

"Uncle," said Joe proudly, "this is my promised wife. Jeannie, this is Uncle Petro Peterson."

"Jeannie Cope !" gasped the astonished bachelor.

"You'll give me a kiss, uncle, won't you ?" said Jeannie, putting up her coral lips in the most bewitching way in the world. "I said it was mamma this morning ; but it was really Joe and I that wanted the house."

"It was, eh ?" said Mr. Peterson, with a curious commingling of sensations.

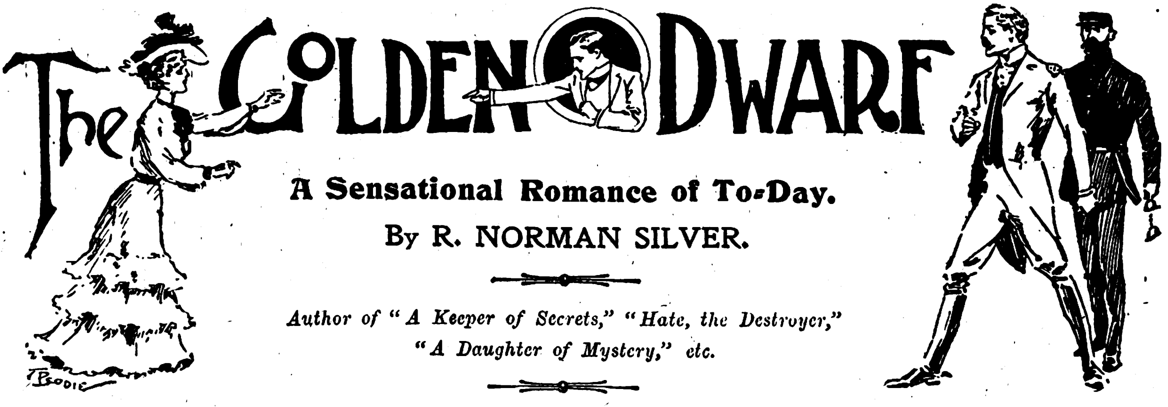
"Yes, and you know you promised to get married and board with us. He did, indeed, Joe."

"I was only joking. Married, indeed,! I'm not such a fool yet. I'll stay here, but I'll not refurnish the rooms this year."

So the bill was taken off the front door ; and Mrs. Joseph Franklin has learned to make an omelet that suits the fastidious taste of her uncle-in law.

"And it's just as well that Fate saved me from making a fool of myself," says Mr. Peterson exultantly.

Mr. Henry T. Johnson's new serial starts week after next.



The Golden Dwarf

A Sensational Romance of To-Day.

By R. NORMAN SILVER.

Author of "A Keeper of Secrets," "Hate, the Destroyer," "A Daughter of Mystery," etc.

"I don't want nothing for what I've done," she declared; "I was sorry for the kid—a real good 'un, he were, and a perfect gentleman, though a mere baby, as you may say. But I ought to tell you as she called him Jack, and clumped him when he told her it wasn't his name. Tell me who he really was, won't you, sir?"

Felix shuddered to think of the cruelties at which the servant-girl hinted. "His Christian name was Brian," he said; "just now I must not reveal his surname—you shall learn it some day. For the rest I want you to do me another service—and that is to direct me to a second-hand clothier's. I must cover up my tweeds and riding boots or I shall be guyed in the East End, as if I were a Punch and Judy show. While I buy a long overcoat, I'll get you to keep an eye on my prisoner, she musn't escape till I know where to pick her up again."

He had stooped and was taking off his spurs as he spoke—it was the one safe occasion on which he had remembered their existence.

"There's a place round the end of the next street," said Louisa; "Ill sing out to the cabby." And she thrust herself bodily through the window, to shout a few sentences in her broad Cockney. The vehicle swerved, turned at a sharp angle, and increased its speed, to halt before a tiny establishment, one of the few still lighted in the depressing quarter they were penetrating. It was a Jewish slop-shop.

Felix descended, went in, and purchased a soiled Newmarket of fawn cloth; it reached, as he donned it, nearly to his heels. When he regained the four-wheeler, the baby-farmer was still slumbering, Louisa sitting sentinel.

"I'm off now," she decided; "I must scoot back, or I'll get the sack, without any wages. 'So-long' and good-luck sir." And, nodding cheerfully, the little servant vanished in the gloom.

Felix ordered the puzzled driver to proceed, and re-entered the cab. The old crone, huddled on the front seat, apparently slept. Felix permitted her to snore until they drew towards the end of their journey. As they passed into Whitechapel-road, the quarter to midnight chimed out from an adjacent church-tower, and Felix, touching, with a certain reluctance, the grimy form of his companion, wakened her by force.

She stiffened herself and stared wildly around—there was no doubt she had been genuinely in the arms of Morpheus. "Who are you," she faltered; "and where am I?"

Her escort pointed out of the window. "I promised your friends to see you home," he answered; "as you may perceive, you are on the way thither."

Mrs. Dobson blinked at him. "You take a mighty interest in me," she snapped.

For reply, Felix produced the sovereign he had uselessly offered to Louisa. He struck a vesta and held up both the light and the coin. The sunken eyes of the baby-farmer gleamed.

"This child you were given," he said; "it had reddish hair, had it not?"

The other snatched at the piece of money. "It had," she owned, with her cackling laugh; "but the red was dye—they couldn't trick me in that way He-he!"

A further golden coin was shown her in the glow of a flaming vesta.

"You got rid of the child to go abroad?" he said; "now tell me exactly all the circumstances of that bargain and I will pay you five more of these."

"He-he," quavered the old crone; "a fool and his money are soon parted. Well, if you'll buy, I'll sell!"

The baby-farmer was interrupted by the halting of the cab—they had attained their destination. Mrs. Dobson tottered to her feet.

"Come in," she said; "and you shall learn what you want to know. And I'll not have you robbed or murdered, because you're a gentleman. I can hear it in your voice, the sort of voice I haven't heard for sixty years, when I was a pretty girl in the country and had many a soft word from the quality sparks."

Felix dismissed the cab and followed the baby-farmer into her mean abode. She preceded him into the wretched kitchen and put a match to a candle-end. Upon the visitor's gaze there burst the squalid horrors of the place, the damp, foul floor, the filthy infants, drowsing in the heavy torpor of exhaustion the crawling vermin, the shattered panes that gaped to the autumn night.

The baby-farmer stamped out the remains of the match and approached him unsteadily.

"He-he," she said; "it's a queer tale, and worth the money. In all my old life I never saw the like. I was paid to hold my tongue, which was always providing I wasn't paid to wag it. So you shall be the wiser and I the richer. He-he!"

She rested a skinny hand on the back of a damaged chair and began to whisper. The candle-end spat and guttered and Felix Dering listened—amazedly.

CHAPTER XLII.

Mr. Brasher Goes on the War-path.

"I do not expect you to assume for me a love you do not yet feel. But there is a difference between a slight lack of enthusiasm and a frigidity which verges on the statuesque. Your demeanour is not flattering to your future husband, Esther."

Have you claimed that £5 note?

And Otto Hare, with a sudden scowl and a tempestuous outburst of passion, lashed at the trotting roans. They broke into a wild gallop.

Esther Carew shivered, not so much at the spurt of terrifying speed or at the Golden Dwarf's vicious display of temper, as at the sound of her name upon his lips.

Otto Hare dragged the cobs into their trot again, and put by the whip. "I do not know, Esther," he went on, "whether you have actually given Dering an explicit dismissal. If not, it would be as well to do so. He must leave Wyresdale, that is flat; his presence here can only be disturbing to you and irritating to me."

The girl beside the Golden Dwarf knitted her gloved hands. "I—I have not seen Felix—Mr. Dering—for some time," she faltered, "and I—I only promised to—to marry you yesterday. But I could not face him now; I dare not tell him I have been false to him, even though it was for his own sake."

Otto Hare sneered. "Have the goodness not to remind me," he requested, "of your absurd interest in Dering. Otherwise I may cancel the bargain you view so ungraciously, and, instead, pursue a policy of revenge. In that case I shall effectively deprive you of Dering, and you will receive a gratifying public sympathy as the romantic maiden who loved the notorious Wyresdale murderer."

Esther's delicate fingers gripped one another in a desperate effort at self-control. "You—you are horribly cruel!" she stammered.

The Golden Dwarf laid a tiny palm upon her arm, grasping it like a vice. "I could kill you," he muttered, "when you mention Dering—kill you myself by lingering degrees. Esther, I love you to distraction, and the measure of my love is the measure of my jealousy. To win you I have had to make a certain agreement with you: did you not love Dering and desire his safety above all things you would not have consented to marry me. If you wish me to observe our contract teach me to forget that it was ever made. Were you a fraction less beautiful, I would kill you—first—and revenge myself on Dering afterwards."

His small features glared distortedly into hers, she felt his hot breath upon her cheek, and shrank from him, recognising that in the Golden Dwarf's diminutive body two awful emotions struggled for the mastery, and that on the issue of this struggle hung the fate of Felix Dering. She fought for the power to bend her proud spirit—since her lover was in danger—and a weak smile crossed her pale countenance.

"I suppose I must be glad, then, that I am presentable," she said, attempting a jest.

Otto Hare looked at her, a gleam of madness in his contracted pupils. "How lovely you are!" he exclaimed; "if you would smile upon me oftener you could mould me to your will, whatever it might be."

Esther trembled at the extravagance of the sentiment that spoke in his accent. "I—I have only one wish just now," she replied, "and that is to be taken home. Your horses go so fast, they frighten me."

The Golden Dwarf drew rein immediately, and the cobs relapsed into a walk. "See," he declared, "how they obey your least command; they and all I have are yours. Which reminds me—your mother says you have not ridden the mare I gave you. Believe me, she is worthy of a better destiny than your old groom's exercise canters. One of these days I will ride down to the Rosery and you shall go for a gallop with me."

He shook up the roans as he made this promise and turned their heads towards the white villa. "If I have seemed a trifle harsh this afternoon, Esther," he said patronisingly, "I trust it is for the last time." He patted her soft fingers with his whip-hand. "We shall be very happy, Esther," he added, "when we are man and wife. You will spend thousands where other women spend hundreds; you will have the finest horses, the smartest dresses, the most luxurious establishments, and, on the whole, the most devoted of husbands."

With this prophecy he checked the roans at the Rosery gate and alighted in order that he might help her to descend. Then, opening the wicket for her, he watched her go up the gravel path and waved an adieu as she disappeared into the hall.

Esther heard the rattle of the phaeton wheels die away before she stole, numbed and dizzy, into the drawing-room. Someone advanced to meet her, someone tall and stalwart, with a quiet yet affectionate gravity. This someone was Felix Dering.

"At last," he said, almost gaily, "you see me again under your own roof. Barbara told me, though, I admit with reluctance and a spice of mystery, that you were out driving, and I insisted on waiting. Esther, the shadow begins to lift. I have great news for you."

Esther gave a sharp cry and retreated. "Don't come near me," she whispered, "you'll hate me when you know what I have done. I'm not yours any longer. I—I am to be married to Mr. Hare."

Felix staggered. "Esther," he cried, "what magic have they used to make you yield? Did I not urge you to believe nothing you were told; did I not write to you that I was on the track of the real mystery of my uncle's death. Did I not bid you be hopeful, since the darkest hour was over, and the dawn in sight?"

Esther sank into a seat. "I could not hope," she sobbed; "Mr. Hare brought a man here who assured me he had seen you in Wyresdale that night in July at the cross-roads. Mr. Hare gave me the choice between marrying him and allowing Mr. Garland to go to Inspector Brasher. Mr. Garland, he said, would keep or reveal your secret as he wished. I could not let you be ruined. Everyone would think you guilty, after you permitted them to believe you were in Duchester all the while."

Her lover was staring at her, astounded. "So that was Garland's purpose in calling here," exclaimed Felix Dering; "good heavens, now I understand all. He was Kraft's tool in a double sense, but for the same object—to separate us. Esther, my darling, your sacrifice is to no end and shall not be consummated. I would save you not only at the cost of my reputation, but my life, if need be. Yet neither is necessary. At length I can prove my innocence—Esther, I have discovered how my uncle died, and who killed him."

Incredulous of her own ears, Esther sprang up. But there was no mistaking the sober self-possession of her lover's face. He carried his shoulders well back and his head was borne proudly—she perceived in every lineament the consciousness of freedom and security. As he flung his arms about her she sank into them and pillowed her fair curls upon his breast. A great peace filled their hearts, so loyal and so long-suffering.

A sudden peal at the door-bell of the Rosery interrupted them. Barbara's feet hurried through the little hall outside and they heard her voice in colloquy with the visitor. There was a heavy step on the threshold, the latch whined, and Michael Brasher strode into the drawing-room. The lovers had moved apart at the first intimation of a call, and Mr. Brasher, stalking deliberately between them, cleared his throat.

"I arrest you, Felix Dering," he proclaimed, "on the charge of procuring the abduction of your cousin, Sir Brian Dering—a child under the age of fourteen years—and also with aiding and abetting in the said abduction. It is my duty to warn you that anything you say may be taken down and used in evidence against you. I have a cab in readiness," added Mr. Brasher, subsiding into his usual manner, "so if you will come quietly, there need be no fuss for the present."

He made a peremptory motion and a couple of constables, who had posted themselves at the entrance of the apartment, stepped forward. Barbara had darted to Esther's side immediately upon the disclosure of Michael Brasher's mission. But Esther was gazing, in an agony of apprehension, at Felix Dering.

A half smile played about Felix's mouth. "Very well, Inspector," he said, "I suppose I must consider myself your prisoner. I am afraid, however, that this is not one of your lucky cases. You are on the wrong scent again." He turned to Esther and his unruffled bearing comforted her, despite the abruptness of this new and crushing blow. "Adieu for an hour or two, dear," he murmured, reassuringly, "till I convince the worthy Mr. Brasher he was not born for a detective."

He took up his hat, nodded to her cheerfully, and fell into line with his escort in blue. Michael Brasher marched his men and their captive out to the Rosery gate, installed them in a fly, gained it himself, and was rattled off, the incarnation of official calm, towards Wyresdale police depôt.

Once Felix, tickled at the Inspector's stern reserve, asked a question, "May I know," he inquired, "the immediate reason for this action."

Mr. Brasher shook his head. "I'm not at liberty to give you any information," he said briefly; "you cannot be brought before the magistrates until to-morrow, so you may be sent to Duchester over this evening. I have wired for instructions, but you can communicate with a solicitor, if you wish."

Felix laughed. "No more trusting the strong-room after Spencer's escape?" he queried. Michael Brasher blushed and was silent.

Reaching the police-station, Felix was guarded into the office, the charge formally booked, and the accused searched. Then Mr. Brasher glanced about him uneasily.

"There's a drunk and disorderly case in the cell," he said: "I'll make you comfortable in my private room if you'll let me slip a pair of irons on; you'll be less public so, till the reply comes from Duchester."

The prisoner held out his wrists and the steel bracelets snapped upon them. He was marshalled into the indicated chamber and a constable lit a gas bracket—for the autumn day was beginning to close in. As an afterthought, Inspector Brasher opened the hand-cuffs, re-adjusted them through the stout arm of a wooden chair, and Felix Dering was fairly hobbled.

"Can I wire for any lawyer?" inquired Michael Brasher, as he prepared to leave.

"No, thank you," answered Felix: "my solicitors are a Duchester firm, and if I am to go there I can send to them later. It will prevent a double journey and possibly confusion."

"As you choose," retorted the Inspector and went out, locking his important captive securely in.

Hardly had the lock clicked than there came a tapping at a door, which, to all appearances, divided the room from another and neighbouring one. It was a singular, impatient summons, and it was followed by a cautious whisper.

"Is that you, Felix Dering?" said a woman's voice, thin and piercing; "it is Judith Garland who speaks to you."

Felix twitched himself close to the door whence the question emanated. "I am Felix Dering," he responded, "and alone. Why on earth are you near me?"

"I also am arrested," replied the voice. "Neal has turned informer—they must have got on his track, somehow. At least so I conclude from what I wheedled out of the fool Brasher. He told me guardedly, 'Your brother has made a certain confession and your other accomplice will be in custody in half an hour.' When I heard you speak to Brasher a moment ago I guessed everything."

The listener drew a deep breath—in a flash he comprehended the purport of the letter that Neal had written and of his mysterious merriment over it. By now Mrs. Schwartz and her lodger were out of England, and a skilful plan to revenge himself upon Judith (doubtless for the supposed "blabbing," which had so excited his anger) had been put into effect. He started from his meditation; Judith was whispering again.

"I was not able—for my own sake—to destroy the cheque you had made out for Neal, and which I have kept with a purpose. Brasher has it—Neal must have put him on the scent of it. It will go against both of us. You see, Felix Dering," she continued, "I make you smart at last, even in my defeat I drag you down. If Neal has not given you away over your uncle's death I will—I still have the bloodstained links. How your pretty Esther will enjoy her notoriety and your ruin!"

Felix recoiled from the barrier through which penetrated the vindictive sentences. As he did so the door at his back was unlocked and pushed wide. Michael Brasher entered—an embarrassed expression on his bearded lips. He crossed to his prisoner and unfastened the hand-cuffs.

"Will you please come this way, Mr. Dering?" he said, and his accent was both nervous and respectful. Surprised at the 'Mr.' and the change in Mr. Brasher's demeanour, Felix rose and followed him into the outer office.

A thrill of amazement struck him. Sitting in the sergeant's chair at the charge-desk—rather weak and wan—was Edward Spencer, the missing groom accused of Sir Christopher Dering's murder. Near him stood Archibald Geddes, in his shirt-sleeves, and carrying a bundle composed chiefly of his own coat. From an extremity of this bundle projected a childish head, parti-coloured gold and auburn. And the wasted cheeks and delicate brow beneath the strangely-hued locks were those of—Brian Dering.

CHAPTER XLIII.

"What's Become of Kraft?"

"Spencer, Brian, Geddes!" gasped Felix Dering, as he stared incredulously at the trio before him: "what does it all mean?"

Archibald Geddes settled the tiny baronet upon his bosom and withdrew a flap of the coat in which the child was enveloped. Brian Dering's face was pinched and withered—he seemed, while retaining his infantile stature, to have grown years older. Also the astounded observers were able to perceive—for his little body was devoid of any other clothing than the Scotchman's impromptu wrap—that Brian Dering's limbs were as shrunken as his countenance. The pupils of his delicate blue orbs were widely dilated, yet he appeared to be in a species of waking slumber; no gleam of recognition illuminated his features as he glanced wearily at Felix.

The chemist's assistant pointed to one frail forearm—it was pitted by minute holes, several of which showed still sore and inflamed. They were the scars left by the needle of a hypodermic syringe.

"The child is under the influence of cocaine," said Geddes: "he is not properly conscious." And, with a touch as gentle as a woman's, the Scotchman refolded the coat about his burden. "Don't be alarmed at the look of his hair," added Archibald Geddes: "it has simply been dyed and is regaining its own colour in patches."

"How in heaven's name!" cried Felix, "did you discover him—and where? And why have you, Spencer, chosen this, of all moments, to return to Wyresdale?"

Edward Spencer answered faintly—a wan smile flickering across his now thickly bearded mouth. "I haven't been away from Wyresdale, Mr. Felix," he declared; "though I didn't know that for certain till Mr. Geddes got me out and gave me a glimpse of the dear old place again."

"But you escaped from the cell here," persisted Felix; "did you meet with an accident and get laid up?"

"Twern't no escape of mine, sir," responded the groom; "I dropped asleep in Mr. Brasher's lock-up and woke to find myself in another half as big and twice as strong. Not that there was a window in it—I've seen nowt but electric light for two months. And, though I never dreamed it, little Sir Brian has been my neighbour for long enough. Curse them as blighted his sweet body."

Felix Dering passed his hand over his brow—his brain reeled. Geddes touched him on the shoulder.

"You'll understand all in a few moments, sir," was the Scotchman's comment, "and, indeed, we've no time to lose. Mr. Brasher, if I can lay this poor child down and substitute some other wrap for my coat, I'll take you off immediately."

"The sergeant's wife is a good motherly soul," said Michael Brasher; "will you carry him through to her, Mr. Geddes?"

The Inspector spoke with deference—evidently he had abandoned his cherished conviction that Mr. Geddes was a person of unsound mind.

Archibald Geddes acted on the suggestion and came back alone, donning his jacket as he walked. Mr. Brasher had moved from Felix Dering's side to deliver a series of rapid instructions to a subordinate. As a result of these a couple of constables tramped heavily into the room.

"You'll stop where you are, Spencer," Geddes told his remaining patient; "you're not fit to stir. But if Mr. Dering can be allowed out without bail, now that he has been formally charged, it might be as well, Mr. Brasher."

Michael Brasher blushed. "In view of Sir Brian's reappearance," he said stiffly, "I will take it upon myself to withdraw the charge—I acted purely on my own initiative and in respect of the gravest possible information; I did not ask for a warrant."

"So that Mr. Dering has the right to sue you for false arrest and imprisonment," supplemented the Scotchman, cruelly. Mr. Brasher winced.

"In such an event, Mr. Geddes," he responded; "I should have to contend that your discoveries do not necessarily vindicate Mr. Dering from a charge brought against him by an alleged confederate. But, for the present, we will postpone discussion of the matter. I have arranged for an escort to accompany us—are you ready?"

"Quite," said the chemist's assistant and led the way out of the police-station into the early September evening. The party of four followed him, to proceed, by shadowy ways, in the direction of the cross-roads. Arrived there, they scaled, at the Scotchman's request, the brick wall of Wyresdale Park and threaded its plantations towards the tower in which, twenty odd hours earlier, Archibald Geddes had been conveyed by force.

An occasional deep bark warned them that the great dogs ran loose according to their nightly wont, but, unlike Geddes on his prevous visit, they got through unmolested by the canine guardians of the place. Felix Dering moved thoughtfully, yet as one who was not surprised either at the route or their destination. Geddes was talking confidentially to the Inspector.

Ascending the smooth green slope, the quartette halted by the low door in the bottom of the tower. The Scotchman tried it—to find it locked.

"The dickens!" he muttered; "and I left it ajar—we must breek it in."

"Not without a search-warrant," objected Michael Brasher, "you forget my position, Mr. Geddes."

"Deuce take your position," growled Geddes; "will you spoil all for a legal scruple?" And he flung his powerful frame against the barrier. His attack was futile—the steel fastenings of the door held obstinately.

"Be on your guard," whispered Felix; "someone is coming. Kraft it may be—the figure is too tall for Hare."

Geddes glanced at the speaker curiously, as if to ask what he knew of the German or his patron, to prompt the caution. Then, obeying a murmured command of the Inspector's, the quintette dodged into the angle formed by the tower and the wall of its flanking structure.

The vague shape stole nearer through the gloom, displaying much vigilance. Reassured by the dusk and the stillness, it approached the door, produced a stout key, and undid the portal. The new-comer was Zorn, that lean, dark Prussian whom Esther Carew had seen in the telescope-room the day of the garden-party.

As the hinges whined, the Inspector made a rush—his men at his heels. Felix Dering and Archibald Geddes sprang after, and the Prussian, clutched, over-weighted, borne down, was a prisoner.

Felix closed the tower-door behind them and struck a match. In front was a second entrance, giving access to a lighted chamber of considerable dimensions. They dragged their captive through, throttling him into silence as they went.

The five explorers found themselves in a round cellar-like apartment—the ground floor of the tower. In it throbbed and spun a huge gas-engine, driving monotonously a pair of large dynamos. The regular hollow "cough" of the former and the tremor of its strokes were responsible for the singular vibration which had so puzzled Archibald Geddes.

Hard by the dynamos there descended, from the upper floor, a spiral iron staircase. Its last steps seemed to be built into the concrete pavement of the chamber.

Geddes wrinkled his brows. "I left that open also," he said; "Mr. Brasher, something has happened since my escape, the way to my prison lies there, and some other hand than mine has closed it." He indicated the base of the spiral staircase. "Help me to pull this aside," he added; "the lower portion is on a swivel."

Leaving their captive to the care of two constables, Mr. Brasher lent a mighty support to the efforts of Felix Dering and the Scotchman. The device creeked and yielding, to swing bodily away, bringing a stone slab that uncovered a square aperture beneath. From the aperture sloped a flight of straight, rock-hewn steps.

"Now, Mr. Brasher," pursued Archibald Geddes, "if you think we can trust our friend here—whom I conclude to be one of Dr. Kraft's compatriots—in custody of your men, I will reveal to you the mysteries of Wyresdale Park."

For answer, Michael Brasher dived into his hip-pocket, fished up the identical brace of hand-cuffs that had ornamented Felix Dering's wrists, snapped them on the Prussian's, and, with a word to the constables who had held him, slid through the trap in the floor. Felix and Geddes were already disappearing down it.

At the bottom of the steps, in the side of the short well, was a door, bolted exteriorly. The Scotchman negotiated the fastenings and passed in. The three entered the dark corridor, athwart whose obscurity still fell the beams of coloured light.

"You might strike another match, Mr. Dering," remarked the chemist's assistant; "I used all mine an hour ago for the same purpose." Felix ignited a vesta and held it up.

"In here," said Geddes, pausing near the first of the small bolted portals on his right, "is Dr. Kraft—armed with a revolver. You see that hole in the wood of the door, it is where he let fly at me as I fastened him in."

The Inspector strode forward. "I am responsible for these proceedings," announced Mr. Brasher; "I will encounter any risk there may be." And so saying, he grasped the bolt, to draw it.

Geddes favoured his rival with a look of unequivocal admiration, but joined him, almost defiantly. It was as if he shrank from yielding to Michael Brasher the undivided honours of the danger.

Click! The iron rods shot back and the door swung open. Geddes and Brasher thrust into the crimson glare that streamed forth. They recoiled amazed—the cell was empty!

Archibald Geddes swore—not loud but deep. "Tricked!" he cried, "tricked; the scoundrel has got off. There must be a secret way out. Those bolts were fast enough when I left."

Mr. Brasher began methodically to sound the walls and the floor—both rang dull and solid. Felix was gazing at the red lamp, the bare rock-hewn compartment, the shallow metal trough—lined with cotton-wool—in a corner. He noticed the elaborate system of ventilation, the artificially high temperature of the cell.

"What is the explanation of this mysterious recess?" he demanded, addressing himself to Geddes.

The Scotchman relinquished his share in the search for a concealed exit. "Come further on," was his response, "and I will satisfy you."

With which promise, he strode out of the cell and unbolted the door of the next. A red glow met them, but of a tint less intense than that they had previously experienced.

The second compartment was as bare as the other, and had the same long metal trough, piled with cotton-wool, at its extremity. From this receptacle there started, when they passed into the cramped place, a thin form, unclothed, stooping, yet tall as that of a well-grown man. But its eyes were vacant and its face had the tremulous childishness of an infant.

The creature cowered again into its cotton bed as they advanced, fumbling with its skinny fists about its features as a frightened nursling will do.

"Good heavens!" cried Michael Brasher; "is it an idiot?"

Geddes shook his head. "Only so far as lack of education and human society will make idiots," he answered. "It is a boy, doubtless, despite its appearance, of tender age, and forced to this stature by the operation, presumably, of that infernal light. There were four degrees of colour, you would observe, in the rays from the keyholes—which, luckily for my explorations, Kraft had superseded by bolts—so I suppose his subjects are inured to the lights by instalments. He has two more of these embryo giants under lesser intensities of red illumination. All are as good as blind—thanks to the effect of the colour upon the retina."

"But the room in which you secured Kraft," said Mr. Brasher; "the room in which you yourself were confined—that had a red light and no tenant such as this."

"Possibly Kraft had lost one of his involuntary patients," hazarded the chemist's assistant; "there are, however, four red compartments in all, and two more are occupied."

"But the blue lights," said Felix, surveying the huddled figure in the shallow cradle, so cold-bloodedly scientific in its hygenic simplicity.

"You shall see," replied Geddes, returning to the threshold. He piloted them a pace or two down the corridor, and unfastened a third cell.

A profound azure radiance filled the compartment. The Scotchman entered it, crossed to a smaller cradle than they had seen before, and lifted from the cotton-wool bed a little being, some twenty inches in height. It was a miniature of humanity, for its stature sturdy and robust. As Geddes set it on its tiny limbs it regarded the visitors fearlessly.

"Here," continued the Scotchman, "you have an example of the Doctor's skill in stunting. Illegal as his experiments are, he is apparently on the road to the production of both giants and dwarfs. There are three more subjects under the blue lights and all are midgets. I suppose it was Mr. Hare's own affliction that led him to patronise these morbid inquiries."

"Are they English children?" asked Felix, thoughtfully.

"No," said Geddes; "Asiatics of some sort, and either they have remained dumb by reason of their captivity, or—to allow of their transit from abroad—their vocal chords have been extirpated, for they make no noise whatever."

"Heavens," put in the Inspector; "you don't mean that Sir Brian Dering has been rendered permanently speechless?"

"He has been sufficiently fortunate," admitted the chemists' assistant, "to be spared that, for he was muttering deliriously when I rescued him. Otherwise he has suffered terribly, unlike Dr. Kraft's trio of midgets, who must have been introduced to his methods very young. I found him in a cell with a blue illumination. Doubtless Kraft wished to ascertain the effect of his treatment upon a maturer and more cultivated child. Part of the dwarfing process evidently consists of injecting cocaine—Sir Brian was plainly under the influence of some narcotic which, as cocaine does, had dilated his pupils. And I noticed an empty cocaine bottle with our label in a store-cell at the end of the corridor—in which cell, by the bye, there is a larder and a cooking-stove, so that the laboratory has been equipped to be complete in itself. No wonder; Dr. Kraft could scarcely afford to draw attention to the peculiar nature of his researches."

"Then it was for these purposes that they kidnapped Sir Brian?" inquired Michael Brasher.

"So it seems," allowed the Scotchman; "but what beats me is why Spencer should have been stowed away here. He says Kraft has never tried any experiments on him, and has fed him, at least adequately. Yet it must have been Kraft who carried him off from the strong-room—impossible as the feat seems. What was Kraft's motive?"

Felix Dering interrupted the colloquy of his companions. "Spencer apart," he told them, "you are wrong about Brian. Dr. Kraft did not know it was my little cousin he was experimenting upon."

Archibald Geddes gasped. "How can you be sure of that, sir?" he asked.

"From the facts of the case," said Felix; "you followed one line of investigation, I followed another—each of us learned half the story. At some more convenient time we must put the halves together. Now our duty is to recapture Kraft and his villainous collaborator, Hare."

There was a call from the rear of the corridor—one of the constables left behind was summoning them. The Inspector went back with his allies.

"The man we've got upstairs, sir," reported the policeman, "wants to speak to you immediately. He says he can give you valuable information, which must be acted on at once if it is to be of any use."

Michael Brasher dived through the doorway and hurried up the steps with alacrity. Felix and Geddes pursued him, and the constable formed the tail of the short procession. When they arrived in the engine-room it was to behold the Prussian waving Mr. Brasher away.

"I don't want policemen," he intimated, disdainfully. "I want a gentleman. You, sir," he told Felix, "if I, who am a trifle less black than my associates) aid you to capture them—nay, to convict them of crimes you could not prove without me—how will that help me before the law?"

Felix Dering shrugged his shoulders. "To the traitor," he retorted; "the law is often lenient, for its own purposes. It uses, if it cannot respect him."

"So," observed the Prussian; "well, I can't do myself any harm and I may profit in the end. This, then, is my news. Dr. Kraft—whom I myself released, twenty minutes ago, from the durance in which you put him—and Mr. Otto Hare are to join me here before leaving for the Continent. They are now due any moment and if you dispose yourself artistically you will catch them at your ease. When they are captured I will sell you some more information about them on terms more definitely satisfactory to your humble servant, Johann Zorn."

Mr. Brasher scratched his head. "We ought to hide," he said, "that is, if Dr. Kraft has a key of his own to come in with, for I need scarcely say we should not trust you to open for him. But where is there a suitable place to pounce on them from?"

Zorn pointed to the spiral staircase. "Both Dr. Kraft and Mr. Hare have keys," he answered, "and as for your strategic position, there it is, at the top of those stairs. Close the entrance to the laboratory, go up into the telescope-room, taking me, if you prefer, with you, and wait."

"He is right, Inspector," remarked Felix Dering, "and there is not an instant to be lost. Lend a hand, Geddes."

He grasped the moveable section of the stair, and, assisted by the Scotchman, dragged it into place, and mounted it. The constables imitated his example, bringing their prey with them. The ground floor was left untenanted, save by the throbbing gas-engine and the spick-and-span dynamoes, hurling so silently their tremendous currents into the bowels of the earth, to feed the lights in Dr. Kraft's terrible laboratory.

Felix had been correct—they were only just in time; as Mr. Brasher slipped into the dusk of the telescope-room above, a key rattled in the outer door of the tower, a murmur of voices ensued, and Kraft ambled in. With him was Otto Hare. The contrast between the two had never seemed so fantastic as now—the former tall, bland, plump, enormously large in every limb and lineament, the latter scarcely more than a midget and nervously irritable to a degree.

Kraft, the concealed watchers saw, carried a small linen-covered parcel, which he set down carefully. A chirp broke from it—the Doctor's burden was no less than his cage of tropical birds.

"Hurry up, for Heaven's sake!" cried the Golden Dwarf; "it's a fool's trick to come back at all, much more on such an errand. But since you have chosen to risk your liberty, and, possibly, your life, end the risk to mine as speedily as may be."

Joseph Kraft gained the foot of the spiral staircase (from the gloom of whose upper trap Felix Dering and Archibald Geddes looked down on his unwitting cranium), swung aside the loose section, and prepared to descend.

"I shall reappear," he announced, "in precisely the same time as it requires for Miss Esther to blink her pretty eye. And then, hey for the phæton and the Hull express. When these meddlers have sought in vain for evidence and the storm has blown over, we can return from our urgent business abroad and settle once more under our—that is to say your—vine and fig-tree. How surprised we should be to learn of an accident to the costly laboratory which you had built for me to study earth-currents in!"

☛ SEVERE SPASMODIC ASTHMA (of 22 years' standing) CURED.

"Will you please accept my sincere thanks for the excellent results I have obtained from your most marvellous cure. Previous to commencing with your treatment I had been a sufferer from Asthma for a great number of years. The attacks usually came on during the night, which caused me to lay up several days, but I am thankful to say that since I commenced with the treatment I have been entirely free from these attacks. Not having had one for close upon 3 years I can say with every confidence that I never felt better in health than I do at the present time, in fact, I am an entirely different man from what I was previous to commencing with the treatment. In my opinion the treatment is within reach of every person who is a sufferer from that distressing complaint, Asthma. I shall be pleased to recommend it to anyone, if you will kindly refer them to me."—C. W. DEPLEDGE, Sheffield.

Short Stories That . . . . . . Make You Laugh.

We devote every week space in Short Stories to pithy, humorous anecdotes similar to those which appear in these columns. A prize of £1 1s. will be sent to the reader who submits the best storyette this week, and a P.W. penknife to each of those whose attempts are used. The anecdotes may be either original or selected; in the latter case, the source MUST be stated. Attempts must reach the Storyette Editor, Short Stories Office, Henrietta Street, Strand, London, W.C., by Monday, October 7th. Post-cards only, please. The prize of £1 1s. has been awarded this week to Mr. John Sewell, of The Lund, Lamplugh, Cockermouth, Cumberland, whose contribution is denoted by a star thus.*

Wife (club night): "Will you be home early, John?" Husband: "Ye-es, I think so. But don't keep breakfast waiting for me."

Boy: "Mrs. Smith, can yer lend me mother your wheelbarrow?" Woman: "What 'a' ye done wi' ye own?" Boy: "Faither's taken the wheel out of ours because foalk keep comming a-borrowin' it."

"Fame," said the youth with the earnest intellectual expression, "is so hard to attain! It is so difficult for one to get himself talked about!" "Humph!" rejoined the woman with cold blue eyes and a firm jaw. "You just ought to live in our neighbourhood."

Sherlock Holmes: "I have not looked around, but a very tall man just came in and sat down in the opera chair behind me." Miss Marvel: "It is true! Really, you do the most wonderful things. Now, tell me how you knew without looking, of the tall man's presence." Sherlock Holmes: "His feet are sticking through under my chair."

Bridget, a new importation from the Emerald Isle, was very fond of reading novels, and the mistress, noticing the gas burning very late every night, took Bridget to task. "Why, I declare, ma'am," says Bridget, "I cannot read at all; but as you told me that the house was pestered with mice, shure, I lit the gas so that the cat could have a chance of catching 'em."

They sat on the portico of the house. "Annie, dear," he said, "do you love me?" She looked down at the tall, handsome youth, who spoke to her with such pleading in his tones. "You say you are soon to become the junior partner of the firm, George?" "Yes, my own." "And that you have £10,000 in the bank?" "Yes, darling." "And that you will inherit at least £200,000 from your mother?" "Yes, pet." "Then, George, I love you. I am yours." She fell into his outstretched arms.

*A burglar was on trial for housebreaking, and conducted his own defence. "My lord," he said, addressing the judge, "you cannot possibly convict me in this charge. I will tell you why. As the evidence clearly proves, I did not break into the house at all. I found the parlour window open, as the witnesses admit, and all I did was to put in my arm and remove some unimportant articles. Now, my lord, my arm is not myself, and I fail to see how you can punish the whole individual for a fault committed by one of his limbs." "Very well," said the cautious judge, "I find your arm guilty, and sentence it to six months' imprisonment. Go with it or not as you choose." The prisoner smiled broadly, and quietly proceeded to unscrew his cork arm, leaving it in the custody of the court.

Downer: "I am very glad it is good form not to wear a watch with a dress suit." Upper: "Why?" Downer: "Because I never have my watch and dress suit at the same time."

Gentleman (caressing a pretty little girl): "You little beauty; you shall be my wife when you are grown up—will you?" "No, I don't want to get married; but aunty there would like to!"

Sarcastic Inquirer: "What good will it do you to take your bicycle with you to Africa?" Prospective Soldier: "If I become homesick, sir, I can puncture one of my tyres and breathe my native air again."

"In this sentence we read that 'Thomas strikes Henry,'" said the teacher. "Now what is the object of the word 'strike'?" "Shorter hours and higher wages," replied the future Labour Candidate at the head of the class.

She: "Mr. Faresplease doesn't waltz as divinely as he might, but he certainly has an easy, graceful way of putting his arm about one's waist." He: "Yes. He was a conductor on a Kensington 'bus for a long time, you know."

Mr. Ferguson was later than usual in coming home, and as his wife met him in the hallway with her usual kiss he said apologetically: "The train was crowded, Laura, and I had to ride in the smoking-carriage. I suppose I smell like a tobacco factory." "No, George," said Mrs. Ferguson, "you do not. The smell from a tobacco factory, as I remember it, is not at all offensive."

The other day a gentleman entered a restaurant and ordered chicken. The chicken was evidently tough, for when the waiter came in he beheld the gentleman in a great state of wrath. "Waiter," he said, "this chicken is very tough." "Very sorry, sir, that chicken was a peculiar bird. Why, when we came to kill it, we couldn't catch it, so at last we had to shoot it. It flew on the housetops, and——" "Ah, by jove, that accounts for it; you must have shot the weathercock by mistake."

Two yokels, members of an obscure Lancashire village cricket team, recently challenged one another to a single-wicket match. The first man batted and scored fourteen runs. His opponent refused to take his turn until he had had his tea. Remonstrances were of no avail. The man wanted his tea and was going home to get it. "Tha con bowl at th' wickets, an' if tha hits 'em Aw'm out," he said to his opponent at last. This was agreed to, and the hungry one went to his tea. Returning leisurely forty minutes afterwards, he found the match over. "Tha's won!" said the umpire. "Nowt o' the sort!" was his reply. "But tha has. He's bowled fifteen wides!"

A worthy Yorkshire Canon, who had been greatly displeased by an act of disobedience perpetrated by one of his gardeners, sought an interview with the offender in order to reprimand him. Knowing that if he was able to avoid the interview until his master's wrath had abated, he would come off with only a few mild words of censure, the man kept out of his way. A few days afterwards, however, when the storm was quite over, master and man came face to face in one of the hothouses, and the Canon asked: "Why have you avoided me in so pointed a manner of late, Johnson?" To which the gardener replied. "Now I'll put it to you as a man, sir. Would you, if you could help it, stand in front of a cannon to be blown up?"

THE EDITOR'S PAGE.

THE first thing you must do on opening this week's Short Stories is to turn to page 432 and see if your portrait is there. If it is, lose no time in sending in your claim to us. If your claim is just, we shall certainly lose no time in sending you a crisp five-pound note. If you only knew how eager we are to give these fivers away you would be surprised. If your portrait isn't in this week, don't let that worry you. It may be in next week or the week after that. And whenever it goes in, so long as you comply with the printed conditions, that five-pound note is waiting for you.

ANOTHER great attraction will appear in Short Stories the week after next. In that number Mr. Henry T. Johnson's new serial story will begin. It is called and is about as thrilling a story as could possibly be written. It grips the attention right from the first line, and once you have started it, you will find it impossible to relinquish reading it till the end is reached.

HERE is a little essay, written by an esteemed lady contributor, which will probably be of interest to most of my readers.

How to Make the Most of a Little Money.

MANY of us may know the story of the two young girls who, on being given a quarter's allowance of dress money in advance, proceeded to spend it in different ways. The one bought everything that she fancied; the other, before buying anything, asked herself the question: "Can I do without it?"

The consequence was that the one girl spent her allowance within a very few days, while the other was a standing example to all her friends.

We may laugh at the story, but we are compelled to admit that those who wish to practise small economies, cannot do better than follow the example taught by it.

To abstain from small extravagancies is the secret of making money go a long way. Anyone who feels that she cannot resist spending more money than she ought, would do well to leave her purse at home when taking her walks abroad, or, better still, keep an exact account of every halfpenny spent. It is astonishing how foolish small extravagancies appear when they are put down in black and white, after the temptation to indulge in them is over. Do not, however, enter them as "sundries." No "sundries" are admitted as an item of well-kept household accounts. Large savings are generally made from little sums. Few people make a large purchase without due consideration, and yet many people spend as much in unconsidered trifles in the long run. It is the pennies and halfpennies that lie loose in the pocket which are not properly appreciated. "Many a mickle makes a muckle" is true of nothing more than halfpence. Little savings are mostly made in personal expenditure. What is spent in the household is generally needed, but small personal luxuries are not.

Money saved thus should not be mixed with the spending fund. Keep it apart as savings, and you will be surprised how it will grow. The Post Office Savings Bank is good for the purpose, as the little formality required to get money out acts as a check to thoughtless extravagance.

There are many ways of saving. One is to buy provisions in large quantities and take proper care that they are not wasted; another is to pay ready-money for everything.

It is false economy to give bad or insufficient food for a large family. By so doing you incur a doctor's bill. The things to save in are shams, false appearances, and self-indulgences, not necessaries.

ADVICE ON LOVE AND OTHER MATTERS.

(Replies to Correspondents.)

YOU want to know, "Ivy Leaf," whether it would be wise for you to give your lover, whom you have quarrelled with, a birthday gift, and add that you will do something desperate if you are not friends with him again soon.

By all means send him one; it is such a pity to let a quarrel drift on until a breach is made which can never be healed. Write him a nice letter, and say you hope he has forgotten all about your difference of opinion, and I am sure he will be only too glad to make it up with you. Thanks for your good wishes.

YOU tell me, "Harry's Darling," that you are in a dilemma, and hope that I can help you. You are engaged to a soldier in the 11th Hussars, one of the best-hearted fellows you have ever met, but your parents and friends are all against him, and say that soldiers are a reckless, worthless set, and no good to anyone. They will not consent to your marriage, and you don't wish to go against them as they have always been good to you; but you love Harry dearly, and don't know what to do in the matter.

If your parents are really so unfair as to take a dislike to your lover merely because he is a soldier, I should certainly advise you to do whatever you think right in the matter. If you are sure that he is really all that you think him, and he loves you and can keep you in comfort, I should tell your parents quietly that your mind is made up, and much as you would have liked their consent to your marriage, you feel that as they won't give in you must do without it.

INDIGESTION, DEBILITY, & HEADACHE.

ANOTHER BILE BEAN VIOTORY.

Amid pretty rural pastures about ten miles from Melton Mowbray and half the distance from Belvoir Castle is Harby Bridge, where lives Miss Lizzie Starbuck, who has recently been cured of headache, debility, and indigestion by Bile Beans for Biliousness in a remarkable manner. A Melton Mowbray News reporter, who inquired into the case, writes that the young lady looked such a picture of health that it was at first hard to believe the story of torture and then of triumph which was unfolded to him. "As a little child," said she, "I was never very strong. I grew too quickly; and up to quite recently endured much agony with headache and sickness. Last summer I went out cheesemaking, but had indigestion so badly that it took all the life and energy out of me. I felt as though I could not work; and although I struggled on till the end of the season, my condition grew more pitiable. Head and stomach pills I tried in vain. Still the pain of indigestion racked my whole frame. It interfered with my appetite; I slept very poorly; and I was far too weak to carry the buckets of water as I am doing now. It was something more than the ordinary 'out of sorts' or run down feeling. One day we saw an account of the wonderful properties of Bile Beans, and sent for a few. They did me good, and I then bought a large box. Before I had been taking the course long, I began to feel a marked change. The sickly feeling grew less, and there was less headache. Then these both vanished completely. Meanwhile I seemed to be pulling round in general health. Instead of being weak and low like I was before—poor in spirits, pale in looks, wasted, and fatigued by the least effort—I began to feel quite strong again. Now I am not like the same person. I feel equal to any ordinary effort, and can carry those two buckets of water (pointing to two buckets standing near) easily; and one has to be pretty strong to do that. I can honestly say that it is to Bile Beans that I owe all this. My uncle (with whom Miss Starbuck lives) did not believe in patent medicines; but I gave him some of the Beans when he was taken ill, and they did him so much good that he is now perfectly convinced as to the justice of the claims of this medicine at any rate."

"Yes," interposed the young lady's mother, "Bile Beans have done her a world of good and I can recommend them to anybody."

Mr. Starbuck also said he willingly gave Bile Beans their due, adding "They're the best things I've met with in my life!"

CHAPTER I.

It was Saturday evening, and The Good Samaritan Company was giving its farewell performance to a crowded Birmingham theatre.

At the same time, upon the sea wall at Clifton, one of the most beautiful promenades of Bristol's most beautiful suburb, a man and a woman were walking side by side in the gathering gloom. Below them the Avon wound its way to the sea; across the valley lights flickered like fireflies.

"You say you love me," the woman was saying. "I am afraid I have heard that from other men's lips than yours. They are easily said, those three little words, as we actresses know; and you, my dear Maurice, who have had so much to do with things theatrical, should know that just as well as I do."

"I have said I love you, Valerie," answered the man, in a voice tremulous with passion, "and surely you know me well enough to understand that I mean it heart and soul. There is nothing I would not do for you to prove my love. Put me to the test, and you will see I shall not fail you."

Valerie Bellairs gave vent to a low, mirthless laugh.

"Words again," she said, almost mockingly. "Words that might have come straight out of a yellow back. It's easy enough to say that sort of thing. If I were to take you at your word, and ask you to do me a service, I wonder if you would really do all you say you would."

"You can at least try me," cried the other, almost defiantly. "I tell you again that if there is anything I can do that will make me sure of winning you, I'll do it, no matter what it is."

Silence followed the young man's words—a silence that was at length broken by Valerie herself. She spoke in a low, strained, curiously insistent voice.

"Then listen to me, Maurice Scarsdale," she said, "and I will tell you how you can serve me, and thereby ensure my turning a willing ear to your suit. Next Monday, as perhaps you know, The Good Samaritan Company is due at Bristol on a week's visit to the town. You may not know that I was once acting in the company myself, and that I was turned out of it by the instrumentality of one of the other members of the company. There is no need for me to tell you in full the story of how I came to leave. Suffice to say, it was due to one of the other ladies who played a trick upon me that I shall not readily forget." Here Valerie paused, so as to let the full weight of her words sink into the brain of the infatuated young man at her side.

How wilful a perversion of the truth her words were those who have followed the course of Hazel Harlow's adventures will readily acknowledge; for it was Valerie's own treachery towards the beautiful young actress that had caused her dismissal from the ranks of the theatrical company.

"Go on," said Scarsdale. "What then?"

"The woman who wronged me," said Valerie, "is one with whose name you are probably familiar—Hazel Harlow—whose much self-advertised name has been in all the papers of Great Britain. And now I will tell you what I want you to do. I want you to help me to punish her who was responsible for my degradation in the eyes of those who were blinded by Hazel Harlow's beauty. So that you see there will be ample opportunity for you to put your protestations into active operation; and you know what your reward will be."

She put her hand confidingly upon the young man's arm. Her touch thrilled him through and through. He felt that nothing would be too much, no sacrifice he could make too great, to win the love of the woman who had infatuated him with all the wiles of a seductive siren.

"But how can I help you?" he went on.

Valerie paused for a few moments.

"There is no good in beating about the bush," she said suddenly. "I want Hazel Harlow got out of the way."

Scarsdale recoiled.

"Got out of the way!" he echoed hoarsely. "Do you mean that you want me to murder her?"

Bellairs laughed.

"No, no, you silly boy!" she answered. "I don't want you to do anything so terrible as that. I merely want her to be removed from the sphere to which she is absolutely unsuited, with her mock prudish airs and graces, her hypocritical ways, which she masks behind a face which is as beautiful as it is false."

Scarsdale's head was in a whirl. Had Valerie asked him to fling himself off the Suspension Bridge, or to dance a jig inside St. Mary's, Redcliff, he would, in his mad infatuation, have probably obeyed her behests; but when he found himself confronted with an exceedingly subtle form of intrigue, at the back of which was a jealous woman's hatred of another, small wonder that his somewhat narrow brain refused to grasp the potentialities of the case. Valerie noted his hesitation, and read its meaning rightly.

"Oh, I see," she said, pettishly, "it is as I thought. You are like all the rest; ready enough with lip service, but, when it comes to action, you retire with the best grace you can."

"No, no, no!" answered the love-sick swain, impetuously. "It's not that. You misunderstand me. As I have told you, I will do anything I can to win your love, but I hadn't bargained for so unusual a request as this. How on earth am I going to get Miss Hazel Harlow out of the way, here in the twentieth century—I who have had no experience in such sort of things?"

Again Valerie laughed.

"You speak like a child, Maurice," she said. "Where are your inventive faculties? Can you think of no scheme whereby a girl can be put out of the way without danger to yourself or harm to her? And think—help me in this, be successful in removing the woman who has wronged me so deeply from my path, and I will do anything you like. I can't say more."

Had not Maurice Scarsdale been so desperately infatuated with the unscrupulous actress, he would most assuredly have paused before committing himself indiscriminately to so unusual a request. He must have seen that there was something more deep than mere personal spite at the back of the business. Here was a woman who had won for herself a name in the theatrical profession—for this assuredly Valerie Bellairs had done—who was so carried away by animus that she was ready to go to almost any extremes to have removed a young girl, little more than a débutante, who could not surely assail her own position as an actress.

He must have seen, moreover, that such a story as Valerie had told him required more sifting than to be immediately swallowed as gospel when so sketchily presented.

But he saw none of this. He saw only a woman of undoubted charm, who had shown him only one way whereby he could win her love. At that moment Maurice Scarsdale was a monomaniac; his one idea was to win Valerie's consent to become his wife, no matter what means were employed in the achievement of his ends.

"Look here," went on Valerie, "to-morrow is Sunday. Think if you can't work out some plan in the morning. I'll meet you in the afternoon, and you shall tell me what decision you have come to; and, if all goes well, before the end of the week perhaps you will come to me and say, 'Valerie, I have earned the right to call you my wife. Let me name the happy day,' as the conventional phrase has it."

Intoxicated by her words, and favoured by the obscurity and the loneliness of the spot, Scarsdale suddenly flung his arms round the actress, and, drawing her to him, pressed his lips against her own.

"Valerie, my darling!" he murmured, hoarsely; "I'll win you, come what may!"

With a little cry, the actress disengaged herself from her lover's fervent embrace.

"Naughty boy!" she said archly. "I didn't tell you you might do that. You haven't really earned it yet. I must go now. I'll meet you on the Clifton end of the Suspension Bridge to-morrow evening at six o'clock. I hope then you will have something to tell me."

CHAPTER II.

As can be well imagined, there was but little sleep for Maurice Scarsdale that night. Fitfully he lay awake, tossing from side to side on his bed, all the time thinking, "How can I get Hazel Harlow put out of the way?"

So intoxicated was he with passion for Valerie that it never for one instant occurred to him that not only did he run a great risk in solving the problem, but that he was also participating in a peculiarly cowardly and underhand crime. And when morning came he was still no nearer the elucidation of the problem than he had been the night before upon the sea-wall.

He rose early, and after a hurried breakfast, determined to take a good long walk down to the docks at Avonmouth, under the impression that by so doing he might be able to discover a way out of the difficulty. Think as he would, however, his brain remained as barren as ever.

At about mid-day he turned into a little public-house not far from the docks to have a glass of beer and some bread-and-cheese to appease the healthy appetite that not even the difficult problem could overthrow.

The bar of the public-house was partitioned off as some old-fashioned hostelries still are. At one end of the room was the bar proper, then came a wooden partition, behind which was a table with forms on either side of it, then another partition, and a table and forms as before.

He sat down in the end partition and began discussing his frugal meal. Suddenly voices on the other side of the boarding that formed the back of his seat, attracted his attention.

"I must sail on Wednesday then," the voice was saying. "As you know, we're bound for New York, and it's money out of my pocket to wait later."

"Whether you sail on Wednesday or not depends upon yourself; I must have that twenty pounds you owe me before Tuesday, or you'll have to stay here. I can't wait any longer, Si Tucker."

"That would spell ruin," answered the man thus addressed, in a hoarse voice. "I can't find twenty pounds, and that's all there is to be said about it. Surely you can give me a while longer. I hope to clear a bit this voyage."

"That's just what you said before," answered the man who had previously spoken. "No; I give you fair warning. You can't say I've been hard on you, and it's gospel truth I want that twenty pounds powerful bad. Either you hand it to me before you sail, or I shall have to put the law on you."

Silence followed these last words. Then came the sound as of a man rising to his feet and preparing to leave the inn. Scarsdale looked eagerly round the partition. A big, black-bearded man was sitting moodily at a table; a smaller, keener-faced fellow, was just on the point of going. The next moment he had gone, and the black-bearded sailor was left seated gloomily alone.

In a moment Scarsdale had risen from his seat and slipped inside the place vacated by the insistent creditor. That the sailor resented his intrusion at once became apparent.

"Who the blazes are you?" he said savagely; "and what in Hades do you want in shoving yourself down afore my nose?"

But Scarsdale was not to be put off by this ebullition of somewhat natural spleen.

"Steady on, mate," he said pleasantly. "I came here because I may be able to do you a service."

"A service! You? How?"

Scarsdale hesitated. Then he plunged straight to the point.

"A matter of twenty pounds, and perhaps more," he said shortly.

The man half rose to his feet and uttered an oath.

"You've been spying, curse you," he said savagely. "I shall have to teach you manners."

"Sit down and don't make a noise," answered the other quietly. "I haven't been spying, only I couldn't help hearing what you said. I tell you that perhaps I can put you in the way of making twenty pounds, and saving your bacon on Tuesday. If you'll be reasonable I'll tell you further what I mean." For the conversation that he had overheard had suddenly given Scarsdale the inspiration he had waited for.

The man, whose name we have heard as being Tucker, was quiet in an instant.

"Are you in earnest, governor?" he said, suspicion still latent in his voice.

"Yes. But can't you take me to a place more private than this? I can't say what I want to say here."

"Come aboard my schooner," answered Tucker; "she's scarce two cables' lengths from here. There's no fear that we shall be interrupted there. All my hands are ashore; we shall have the whole ship to ourselves."

Scarsdale paid for his beer, and followed the seaman out of the inn. A black-hulled schooner was lying alongside the quay. On her stern was painted in white "Susan Tucker, Bristol."

"That's her," said Tucker, with a jerk of his thumb towards the vessel. "She's called Susan after my missus, who died some years ago."

As he spoke he swung himself from the quayside on to the schooner's deck, and Scarsdale made haste to follow him. Tucker led the way down the companion hatchway into a by no means uncomfortable cabin, the cleanliness of which was almost painfully apparent.

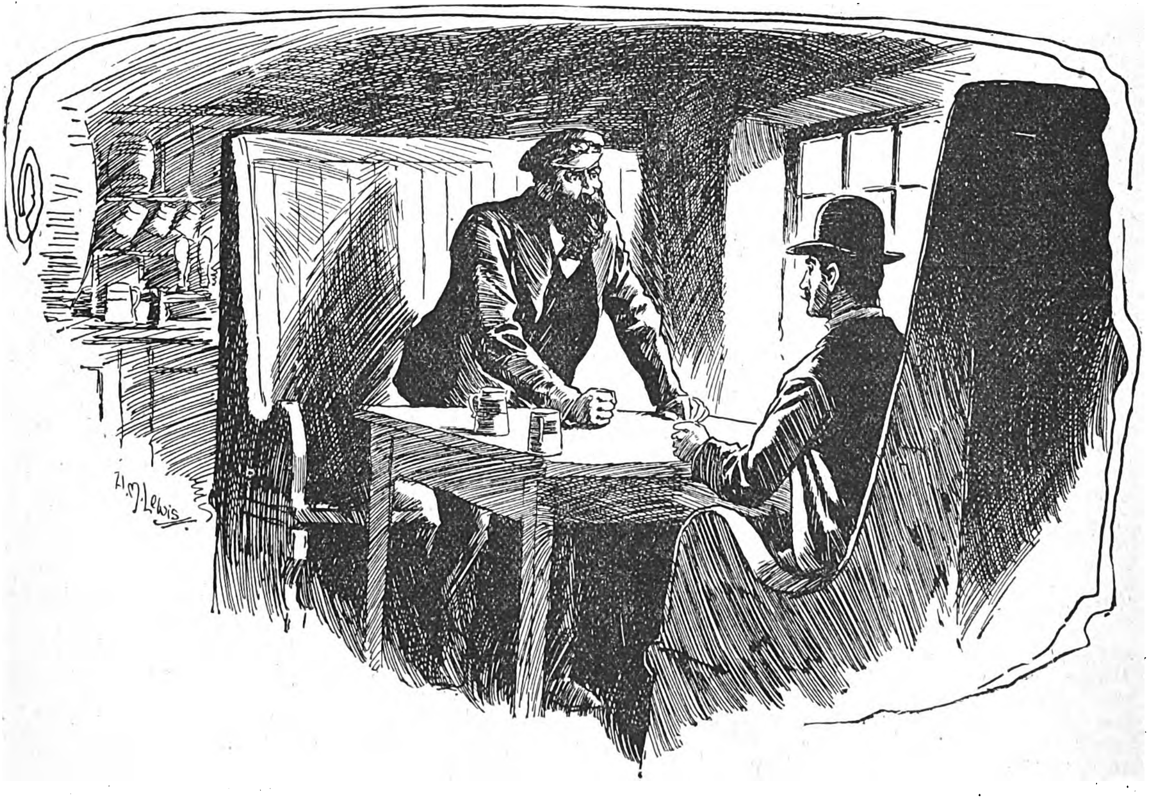
"Now then," said Tucker, "I'm a plain-dealing, plain-spoken seaman. You've made a suggestion to me; supposing as you comes to the point without more beating about the bush. You deal fair and square with me, and I'll do the same by you."

But it was by no means easy for Maurice Scarsdale to obey so simple a behest. It was some moments before he could find speech.

"I won't disguise from you the fact," he said, "that the earning of your money will be by no means an easy job. In fact, you will have to work out the details of it yourself. All I can do is to guarantee you the fifty pounds if it comes off, and as an earnest of my offer I am ready to discharge your debt in advance."

The man's eyes gleamed.

"Well, that's square enough," he said heartily. "There's



"You've been spying, curse you," he cried savagely. "I shall have to teach you manners."

H. T. Johnson's new serial begins next week.

something to get hold of there, and if you're ready to do as you say, well, I'll do all I can to help you in what you want."

Then his voice changed.

"It isn't murder you want me to do, is it ?" he said constrainedly.

Scarsdale shook his head.

"No, it isn't murder," he replied ; "and remember I don't want to bind you down to do anything. If, when you hear what I have to say, you think the task is beyond you, I shall have to have your word that not a syllable passes your lips as to what has transpired between us to-day."

"There's my word and hand on that," cried Tucker, and he thrust out a hairy fist as a token of his sincerity.

"Good !" continued Scarsdale. "And now let's come to business. There is a certain lady possessed of undoubted external charms who is, nevertheless, an exceedingly dangerous personage. This woman has it in her power to do a great deal of harm to another lady, towards whom my feelings are of the tenderest. I hope I have made myself plain so far ?"

Tucker nodded.

"Go on," said he, with interest.

"Now it is as well for all parties concerned," continued the young man, "that this same woman should be removed for a certain time from a sphere of action in which she is more of an ornament than a credit. I will be perfectly frank with you. Can I obtain the spiriting away of the lady for a month or so my dearest object will be attained, and I shall be able to call the woman I love my very own !"

The seaman's eyes glittered.

"I see how the land lies," he said slowly. "It's a case of kidnapping I'm in for. Well, it's a dangerous job, as you know, sir, but fifty pounds is a lot of money to a poor man like me. There's a good deal to be thought of, though. Who's the lady ? Is she in Bristol ? Where does she live ? Has she many friends ?"

But Maurice put up his hand with a half laugh.

"One at the time if you please," he said. "I'm coming to details now ; but, as you say, it's a pretty desperate job. If you still think you're game to go on with it, I'll give you fuller details."

"I'm game all right," came the reckless answer. "Silas Tucker ain't the sort of man to turn up his nose at fifty pounds, especially when he's in such a hole as I am. Why, ruin stares me in the face unless I raise the wind somehow. There's a big hole below my water-line, as you might say, and it's all I can do to keep the pumps going fast enough. Drowning men catch at straws, so you needn't be afraid to trust me."

The man was evidently in earnest.

"Very well," said Scarsdale, "we'll get to details. In the first place, the lady's name is Miss Hazel Harlow, and——"

But Tucker sprang to his feet with an oath. "Miss Hazel Harlow, the actress !" he cried, and his face went pale beneath his tan.

"Yes," answered the other in amazement. "Why ?"

"You need say no more," said Tucker.

"Say no more ? Do you refuse ?"

"Refuse ! no ! Give me the twenty pounds you promised me and ask no more. The fifty pounds is mine."

"Have you taken leave of your senses, man ?" cried Maurice, an expression of the blankest amazement, as was indeed pardonable, upon his face.

"Taken leave of my senses—no ! I should think not ! Why, look here, I'll give you my signed agreement to the undertaking. Do I look like a madman ?"

"No ; but surely you'll be more explicit ?"

"By your leave, sir, I'd rather not. You've asked me to work it out in my own way, and I've done it already. You've made your bargain, now let me make mine. Give me the twenty pounds that you promised, and forward me the other thirty to an address in New York which I'll give you, and which you can send on as soon as you discover that Miss Harlow has disappeared."

Maurice Scarsdale's mystification was only intensified by the seaman's last remark, yet hasty reflection convinced him that Tucker knew what he was saying. He spoke with the air of a man who knew what he was about, and surely a rough seaman could not be expected to be a master hand at intrigue. No, there must be some extraordinary chain of circumstances by which the skipper of the Susan Tucker had been led up to an acquaintance with Hazel Harlow, and besides, it might perhaps be as well for Scarsdale not to know the full details of the plot. His name would be all the less likely to be mixed up in the affair.

"Very well," he said suddenly, "I'll consent. It's a big thing to trust you like this, and I wouldn't do it unless there were reasons for my keeping in the background."

He took a pocket-book from the inside of his coat, and produced two ten-pound Bank of England notes.

"Here's the earnest money," he said. "I shall want your receipt and the agreement you promised to give me. Then, when I learn that Miss Harlow has really disappeared—and you seem pretty confident of being able to achieve that—I will forward the thirty pounds to any address that you like to give me."

And thus the dark bond was ratified.

CHAPTER III.

It was Monday morning. The Good Samaritan Company had arrived in Bristol the day before, and were ready to begin their campaign in the western city. The week at Birmingham had been an eventful one. It had witnessed the temporary loss of the volunteer actor, Eric Monteith, to the company. It had also witnessed the tragic death of Jenny Lovelace's uncle, and the averting of a terrible danger to Hazel Harlow from the unwearying hand of Horace Caldecott.

There were members of the company who had been secretly delighted at the untoward accident that had deprived them of Eric's companionship. Needless to say, this feeling was not shared by Raymond Venables, the manager, by Hazel, or by Jenny. But Eric was of a different calibre to the ordinary travelling actor, while he had not enough so-called levity in his composition to endear him to the minds of the other ladies of the company. He did not flirt or pay them those attentions so dear to their frivolous hearts. He looked askance at their goings-on with unknown young "mashers," and besides, he was the champion of "that stuck-up Miss Harlow."

It was a lovely autumn morning. Jenny and Hazel had determined to devote their first day to exploring Bristol, and had set out to visit Clifton and the famous Suspension Bridge. They had reached College Green when suddenly Hazel's attention was attracted by a young man dressed in the garb of a merchant sailor, with brown face and merry blue eyes, who approached her and pulled off his peaked cap.

"Why, surely," he began diffidently, "it's Hazel—Miss Harlow, I suppose I should say now."

Hazel drew back a few paces. A look of wonderment came into her eyes. "Well, of all the extraordinary things," she said, "it's Amos—Amos White! Jenny, this is a very old friend of mine. We used to play as boy and girl together at Honeycote. What in the world brings you to Bristol, Amos?"

"I'm a sailor now," said the young man pleasantly; "I said good-bye to Honeycote more than a year ago. And in the meanwhile you've grown to be a famous actress. I thought you would have quite forgotten Amos White. Hazel and I were boy and girl sweethearts, miss," he said, turning to Jenny.

There was something exceedingly winning in the sailor's face. Jenny could not help feeling fascinated by his breezy, open manner, and the frank admiration with which he regarded his beautiful ex-playfellow.

"So you're a sailor, Amos," cried Hazel. "That's a good deal more interesting than old sleepy Honeycote would be—travelling all round the world and seeing all sorts of beautiful places."

Amos laughed.

"Well, there's something in that," he said, "but, unfortunately, the life of a sailor isn't exactly what you read it is in books. It's all right in summer, when you're sailing along beneath the beautiful sun, and it's no hardship to skip aloft and reef the topsail or some such job. But in winter, when you can't walk on the deck for ice and there's a roaring north-easter kicking up the sea, it's a different story. Then the food isn't of the best, and the pay is mighty little. Still, I like it in a way, and I wouldn't go back to Honeycote now."

"Is your ship in Bristol then?" went on Hazel.

"Yes, but we're outward bound this week. I'll tell you what," he said, "it would give me an awful lot of pleasure if you would come down to the docks and have a look over the vessel before she sails."

Hazel's eyes sparkled.

"I should like nothing better," she said. "I have always longed to see over a ship, and it would be doubly interesting to see yours."

"It's not mine," laughed the young fellow, "and it's not a big liner. It's only an old sailing boat, though she's a pretty big one of her class. Supposing you come down to-morrow morning. I'll come and fetch you wherever you like, and I can bring you back, as we don't sail till Wednesday."

Hazel turned to Jenny. "Would you like to go?" she said.

"I can't go to-morrow, dear," was the answer; "I've promised to go and see Lily Desmond. She's living in Clifton now, as I told you. She's married and given up the stage, and I promised her I would go to-morrow, but I am sure with such a protector as Mr. White, especially as he is such an old friend, you'll be perfectly safe."

Jenny spoke with all sincerity. She could see no danger ahead for Hazel. Surely this frank-faced, blue-eyed young sailor-boy, the friend of Hazel's youth, would see that she came to no harm? And so it was settled, and Amos was invited to call for Hazel at her lodgings at ten o'clock the next morning.

Punctually at the appointed time the young fellow made his appearance. Hazel was full of high spirits. The prospect of a visit to the busy dock was most alluring. She chatted gaily to her comrade as they sat in the train that was to convey them to Avonmouth. It was quite refreshing to meet an old friend. As he had said, Amos and she had been boy and girl sweethearts. They had played together round the old farmstead, ridden bare-back horses together, and helped in a hundred and one farm duties so dear to the youthful mind.

Hazel told the young fellow how she had come to leave the farm; how the horrible persecutions of Squire Caldecott had made her take the somewhat formidable step of coming to London and embarking on a theatrical life.

"And are you happy, Hazel?" he asked.

"Oh, yes," answered the girl. "If it were not for one thing: the horrid shadow of Squire Caldecott's attentions. For you know, Amos, he has tried in a hundred and one ways to entrap me into becoming his wife."

The young sailor's face darkened.

"I wish I could get near him with a rope's end," he said. "I'd make him smart for his blackguardism." Then his voice changed and became strangely tender. "Surely it would be better for you, Hazel, to rid yourself for ever of his unwelcome attentions. You can only ensure that by leaving the stage, by finding someone who will give you the protection that you need to keep such as Squire Caldecott at arm's length. By that I mean you ought to find some man who honestly loves you and who would be ready to give up everything for your sake."

The young sailor spoke in a manly, straightforward way, that went direct to Hazel's heart.

"But then I should have to forfeit my liberty," she said almost plaintively. "I should have to get married and give up all my aspirations of becoming a really good actress. I don't want to marry unless I can find a man whom I really and truly love."

"And you haven't found that man yet?" There was a strange eagerness in the questioner's voice.

"No. And until I do I shall struggle on as best I can with only myself to rely upon."

Amos said no more. His face had grown curiously grave, and his manner remarkably constrained. Hazel was too pre-occupied with the thoughts reawakened within her by all her companion had said to notice his constraint.

So little more in the way of conversation passed between them until the docks were reached.

The novelty of her situation and surroundings soon dispelled the serious thoughts in Hazel's mind. The bustle on the quayside, the many vessels lying in the port, the din and rattle of the steam cranes as they hoisted great bales from the black interiors of the vessels, or lowered great packages into the holds, were a revelation to her. On every hand was bustle and confusion. Crates of bananas from Jamaica, bales of tea and sugar with queer foreign-looking marks upon them, live stock and machinery—there was nothing apparently that the ships did not devour or emit.

"Here's our boat," said Amos suddenly, pointing to a schooner that lay alongside the quay. Hazel looked at it with interest. It seemed to her a thing of grace and beauty with its raking forepeak and long, tapering masts, which seemed connected one with another by an absolutely bewildering network of cordage. The deck of the ship was as white as snow; the boats that hung from the davits on the deck had lately received a new coat of paint. There was a neat deck-house amidships painted green. Everything seemed to have been polished with scrupulous care and lavishness.

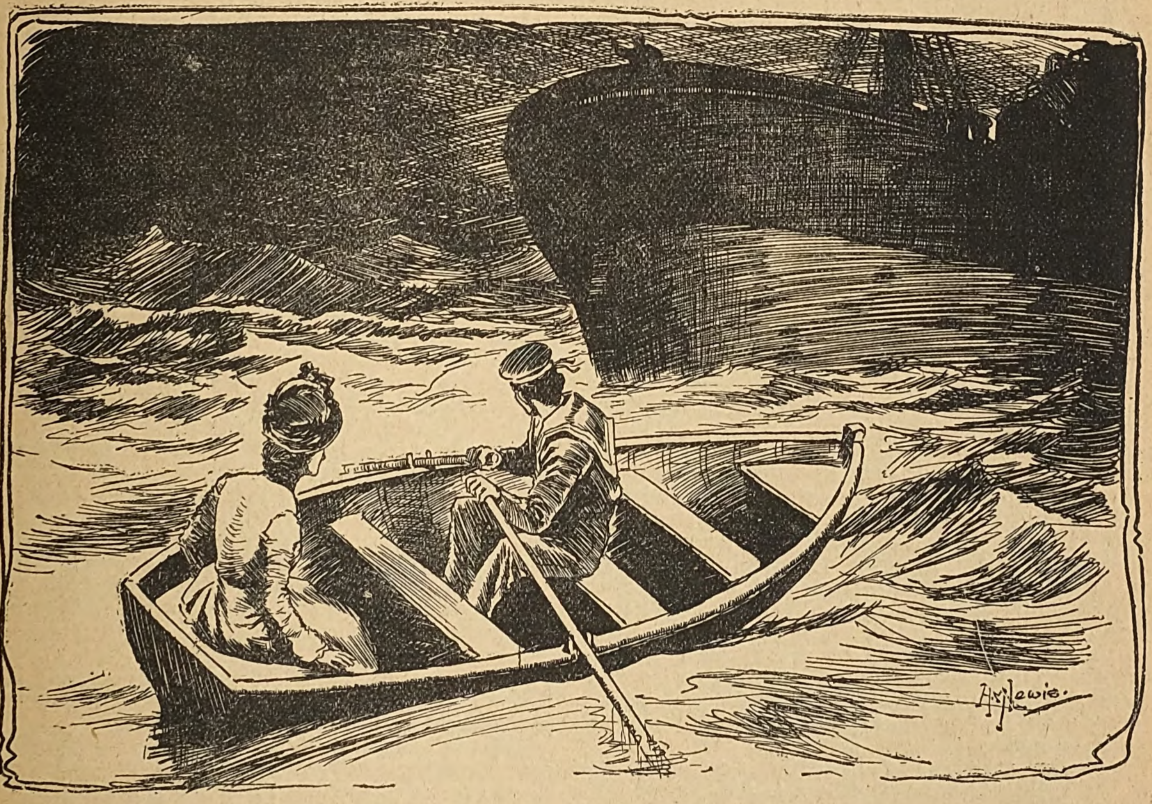
"What a lovely ship!" cried the actress in unaffected delight.

"That's the skipper leaning on the taffrail," said Amos, "If you step across this gangway he will be only too pleased to let me show you round. I told him I wanted to bring you when I got back yesterday, and so he set us all to work making things shipshape. He's been a good skipper to me, and he saved my life. I can tell you about that later on."

Hazel's face grew grave as the memory of that awful episode came back to her. (See Short Stories, No. 664.)

"Amos told me at the time," the skipper went on, "how you and he had been playmates together, and how he hoped that perhaps some day he would have the pleasure of seeing you again. So when we got into Bristol and learnt that you were due here this week, I says to Amos, 'Here's your chance. I'm sure Miss Harlow is not the sort to go and forget old friends,' and I see I was right."

The bluff, hearty way in which Tucker spoke quite won Hazel's heart.



The dark sails of the ship, silhouetted against the darker sky beyond, melted slowly away from view.

In a few moments Hazel was on board the vessel, and skipper had come forward and was welcoming her aboard.

"Honoured to see you, miss," he said. "It's a long time since the Susan Tucker had such a fair visitor aboard."

Hazel laughed. "I always have heard that sailors knew how to flatter," she said, "and now I see I was not misinformed."

"Oh, we heard of you some time ago," answered the captain. "We got into Belfast just after the company you were acting in left. All the town was talking about an adventure you had been in—how you had been picked up at sea and rescued by a warship."

"Old friends are always the best," she said with a winning smile, turning towards Amos as she spoke.

The blood leapt up into the young seaman's face; a sudden thrill ran through him. How beautiful she was; and this was the little Hazel who had played with him among the fields and pastures at Honeycote. Little did he dream of this day then.

"And now," said White, "let me show you over the ship. First of all I'll take you round the deck and explain as much as I can, and then we'll dive below and explore."

There were three or four other sailors on board, and probably more below. They all grinned somewhat sheepishly at the young girl, but made no remarks.

Surely that's your photo on page 466?

Amos was a good guide. He explained to the girl as much as he could about the working of the vessel, told her the names of the chief spars, and muddled her head with technicalities about "to'gallantsles" and halliards until at last Hazel cried for mercy.

"Very well," said the young man with a laugh, "let's go down below. I want to tell you how the skipper saved my life." He took her into the galley and showed her the cook's quarter's, and then into the fo'castle, where were the seamen's quarters.

"And now we'll see the captain's quarters," he wound up.

The captain was evidently a man of somewhat luxurious ideas, to judge by the cheerful little curtains that were drawn in front of his porthole, a well-filled bookcase and a comfortable lounge chair. There were many little ornaments about the cabin that struck Hazel as being remarkably out of keeping with a man of his appearance and manners. She made no comments, however, and at the young man's bidding sat down on a chair and prepared to listen to his story.

"You must know," he began, "that we had reached Bahia, which is a South American seaport, and a pretty lively sort of place. I had gone on shore to see the town, and was strolling down rather a narrow street when I was suddenly set on by three or four Dagos, rough-looking half-castes, who generally have a knife or something on their persons. Well, they set on me, and I was cornered. I used my fists as well as I could, but one of them got his knife in my arm"—he rolled up his sleeve and disclosed a livid scar upon his muscular forearm—"and I was pretty nearly done for. Suddenly there was a shout and something rushed up like a typhoon, which turned out to be Captain Tucker himself. He let out right and left, and before you could say 'knife' the Dagos had gone for all they were worth, and I was saved. It doesn't sound so much in the telling, but it was a pretty plucky thing to do to come single-handed and go for such ruffians as those. I've owed a debt of gratitude to the skipper ever since, and it'll take a long time to repay."

After that Amos took up the tale of his numerous adventures on land and sea, and he proved to be such an excellent raconteur that Hazel sat spell-bound, taking no heed of the fact that time sped on much more quickly than she would have believed possible.

As for Amos, he was in the seventh heaven of delight. To sit there with his old playfellow, now developed into the most beautiful woman he had ever seen, was in itself a delight as enthralling as anything he remembered to have experienced. His eyes and ears too were blind and deaf to anything that was passing beyond the environments of the little cabin, so that it was with a sense as of a rude physical shock that he heard Hazel say:

"Why, good gracious! Surely we are moving!"

The young sailor sprang to his feet with an exclamation of amazement, and rushed to the door of the cabin. To his still deeper sense of surprise, mingled now with a faint feeling of apprehension, he made the discovery that the door was locked; neither could there be any doubt but that it was true what Hazel had said, the vessel was moving slowly through the water. He could hear the gentle lap, lap, of the wavelets against the vessel's side, could tell by the hurried footsteps overhead and the noise of creaking blocks and rattling shrouds that the Susan Tucker was gathering way towards the open sea.

What could be the meaning of it? Tucker had distinctly told him that the vessel was to put to sea the next morning. He rattled at the door handle and shouted with all the strength of his lungs: "Hi! Let us out! We're locked in!"

For even now he could not conceive of foul play. He could not see that behind Tucker's eagerness for him to bring Miss Harlow aboard lay something more sinister than the mere expression of goodwill; and besides, what possible object could Tucker have had in abducting the young actress? For of course Amos had been kept in total ignorance of the interview between Maurice Scarsdale and Tucker.

No one answered the young sailor's shouts. He turned round and faced Hazel with a somewhat helpless expression upon his face.

"Upon my soul, I don't know what's the meaning of this," he said gravely. "There must be a mistake somewhere."

Hazel read the suspicions dawning in his eyes that there was foul play afoot somewhere. The colour left her face.

"Are we really putting out to sea?" she asked in a low voice.

"Yes," came the somewhat reluctant answer. "But keep up your heart, Hazel. It's a long way down Channel, and perhaps the skipper is only going to take you for a short trip and put you ashore somewhere Portishead or Weston way."

"But it's preposterous!" cried Hazel. "Break open the door, Amos. I must get out. What will Jenny think? What will they all think?"

Suddenly a voice from outside rang on their startled ears. It was Tucker's.

"If you try and break that door open, Amos," he said in a stentorian tone, "I'll have you put into irons and clapped below hatches for insubordination. I'm skipper aboard this ship, and don't you forget it."

Amos's heart seemed to turn to lead within him. He stood stock still, as though turned to stone. The truth was at last forced home indeed to him that there was foul play afoot.

The next moment the door was flung open, and Silas Tucker entered the cabin, closing the portal behind him. In a moment Hazel flung herself forward.

"What is the meaning of this, Captain Tucker?" she said peremptorily. "How dare you commit such an outrage as to attempt to kidnap a helpless woman who has never, so far as she knows, done you any harm? You cannot be really in earnest in trying to keep me aboard here against my will. What is the meaning of it all?"

"It means, miss," came the stolid answer, "that you've got to make this voyage with us. You're going on a trip for the benefit of your health to New York and back. It will only be three or four months at the most, and that's all there is about it."

Amos stared at his captain with horror-stricken eyes.

"You're joking, captain," he cried, hoarsely. "It can never be true what you say—that you're going to make Miss Harlow go to New York with us."

"You heard what I said," answered Tucker fiercely. "Now, either you give me your parole not to kick up rough, or else I clap you in irons, as I said, for insubordination. You signed articles under me, Mr. Amos White, and you know perfectly well what that means."

"Yes, but—" broke in Amos.

H. T. Johnson's new serial begins next week.

"There are no 'buts' aboard my ship," came the answer. "Now I'll leave you here to talk with your old playfellow a bit, and come back in an hour or so to find out whether you are ready to obey my orders." And without another word he turned round and left the cabin, locking the door behind him as he departed.

Dead silence reigned between the pair after Tucker's departure. Hazel was too dazed, too stunned by what she had heard, to realise the full purport of the black business.

Amos was no whit less astounded. A wild rage boiled in his heart, yet what could he do? Tucker was his master, with despotic authority aboard his own vessel.

"Look here," he began, suddenly, sitting down beside Hazel, and speaking in a whisper, "our only chance is to acquiesce. If we pretend to fall in with the skipper's views, and to make the best of a bad job, perhaps we may find some way of escape. It's our only chance, I am sure. I know the captain pretty well. I can't believe he's really bad-hearted. There must be some influence at work about which we know nothing that has brought about this action of his. And, whatever happens, I'll stick to you through thick and thin, Hazel. Tell me you believe that I have no hand in this business. I know no more of it than you do. I swear it."

"I believe you—oh, I believe you!" murmured the girl brokenly, faintly comforted by the knowledge that Amos was really loyal and ready to help her. "And if you think that's our best course, why, I'll back you up with all the means in my power."

"Good! And now tell me"—this somewhat shamefacedly—"have you any money on you?"

"Five pounds," answered Hazel.

"Then will you give it to me? There is reason in my request. I don't want it for myself. I only want to use it as a means to obtain an end."

"Then you have a plan?"

"Yes; but I daren't say any more, for fear someone may be listening. But when Tucker comes again we shall know how to behave."

CHAPTER IV.

On leaving her friend's house on the afternoon of the same day upon which the Susan Tucker had set sail, the first thought of Jenny Lovelace was of Hazel, who had promised to be back at their lodgings not later than four o'clock.

As she hurried along the streets, she suddenly ran into a woman. Both recoiled—both involuntarily uttered an exclamation of surprise. The woman was Valerie Bellairs.

Jenny recoiled. She had not forgotten the discreditable part Valerie had played at Scarborough in attempting to bring about Hazel's downfall. In a moment the thought flashed through her brain—"What is Bellairs doing in Clifton?"

"How do you do, Miss Lovelace?" said Valerie, sneeringly. "Where is Miss Harlow? I thought you and she were inseparable."

Angry words were on the tip of Jenny's tongue. With an effort she restrained herself, and with a haughty gesture of disdain swept on in silence. Her action goaded Valerie to fury.

"See that you keep your eye on your friend," she muttered in a low voice. "It wouldn't be nice if you were to lose her." With which words she hurried on.

Jenny hastened back to the lodgings a prey to a mighty wave of anger; yet all the time she kept saying to herself—"Why is that woman in Clifton? She's up to no good, I'll be bound."

There was no sign of Hazel at the lodgings. Jenny waited till five in growing anxiety, and at last could bear the suspense no more. She determined to rush off and find Venables and to ask his advice. Now that Eric was no longer at hand to assist them, both she and Hazel relied on the manager much more than either of them would ever have thought possible.

On learning that Hazel had disappeared, Venables was at once of the opinion that they should take train to Avonmouth and see if they could discover the name of the vessel that Hazel had gone to see. Jenny knew the name of the captain to be Tucker, and this fact was sure to be of assistance to them.

"Upon my word, it's enough to turn a man white-headed," said Venables. "As if it wasn't bad enough to have all the responsibilities of a theatrical company upon one's shoulders, without having one's leading lady continually in some desperate strait or other. I've been connected with the profession fifteen years, and I never remember to have conducted a tour that's been fraught with such terrible dangers as the present one. Unless one really participated in them oneself, and knew exactly the nature of the perils that confront our beautiful Hazel, upon my word, human credence wouldn't swallow their possibility."

Inquiry at the docks elicited the astounding information that the Susan Tucker had sailed outward bound some hours before. She had had one passenger, so quayside loafers affirmed, a lady, who had seemed overjoyed at the prospect of a trip.

This information nearly drove Venables and Jenny frantic. Yet of what good would it be to raise a fuss there? They dashed off to police headquarters, and laid their case before them. Here they were met with that official indifference and incredulity which anything out of the common so often produces in the minds of those used to red tape and laws of rule of thumb.

In vain Venables stormed and raged, and implored that steps might be taken to waylay the vessel before it really got out to the open sea. His excited demeanour only produced irascibility in officialdom. "A pretty job," growled the superintendent, "to go and hunt for a three-masted schooner on the high seas, and how do we know that the young lady hasn't gone off of her own free will? There was a lover in the case, I'll be bound, and when you once have dealing with an actress, well, you never know what's going to happen. Why, the very people on the quay say the girl was jolly and laughing. There was no suspicion of foul play there. The young lady went on board of her own free will. No, you may make up your mind there was a parson on board and she's off on her honeymoon trip."

This apparently brutal callousness, which was nevertheless only the commonsense view of a man through whose hands passed all sorts and conditions of men and women, and who had got into the habit of hearing the most outrageous stories without attaching much importance to them, had, as can be well imagined, a most depressing effect upon the two comrades in misfortune. They were powerless to do more than they had done, however, and as all their prayers and entreaties availed nothing, they were bound to retire, baffled and beaten.

Hazel's fame and beauty had reached Bristol before her, the advance bookings at the theatre had been almost unprecedented, and now Hazel had disappeared, and there seemed but little chance of ever seeing her again.

"Dead to the World" begins next week.

The performance that night was a dead failure. The whole company was demoralised by the news that Hazel had somehow mysteriously disappeared, though Venables and Jenny both resolved to keep the true facts of the case, as far as they knew them, locked up in their own breasts. Hazel's understudy was but a poor substitute for Hazel herself. Jenny could hardly speak her lines for utter misery. The audience soon grew intolerant, and among them sat the two who had been responsible for this heart-rending state of affairs, Maurice Scarsdale and Valerie, jubilant at the success of her lover's plot. And Scarsdale was radiant in the knowledge that Valerie had promised to become his wife when The Good Samaritan Company had left Bristol.

CHAPTER V.

In the meantime the Susan Tucker, under a full spread of canvas, was drawing steadily away beneath the influence of a six-knot breeze towards the open sea. In accordance with their preconcerted arrangements, Hazel and Amos had apparently resigned themselves to the inevitable. Hazel had brought all her powers of acting into play, and Tucker was jubilant at her change of front. It was evident to the skipper's somewhat narrow brain that the girl already viewed her prospects with equanimity.

"If it wasn't for Amos, Captain," she said archly, "I should feel most unhappy; but we are such old friends, he and I; you know we were boy and girl sweethearts. Of course I had to appear reluctant, but"— she treated the captain to a witching glance from her radiant eyes —"we know each other well, he and I."

Tucker chuckled. "So that's how the wind blows," he said good-humouredly, "Well, you're a deep one, you are. Well, Amos is a lucky fellow, and" (so ran the unspoken conclusion of his sentence) "I've never earned fifty pounds so cheaply in all my life."

This change of front enabled Amos to see about the carrying out of a scheme that had occurred to him with comparative ease. No restriction was made upon his or Hazel's actions. They were allowed to go hither and thither on the vessel as they liked, and Amos went about his duties as though nothing had happened.

He had ascertained who were to be on watch that night. There was to be a man at the wheel, and another seaman in spells of two hours each the night long. The man who went on watch at about eleven o'clock was a seaman named Dan Perkins, a good-hearted, jolly sort of fellow, on friendly terms with Amos. Him the young sailor sought out, and after a whispered conversation between them, pressed some money into his hand. The same thing happened with the man who was to take the wheel.

At ten o'clock Tucker retired to rest, free from any suspicion that anything untoward was amiss. At about half-past eleven Amos tapped noiselessly at the door of the cabin that had been set aside for Hazel. He then stole on deck, where in a few minutes he was joined by the girl herself. They went forward steadily, where they were met by Perkins.

What happened to them is soon told. Amos and Hazel clambered up into the long-boat, that was swinging on the davits, and were let noiselessly down into the sea by Perkins. So far, so good.

The schooner slid past them as they lay motionless upon the heaving waters of the Bristol Channel. The dark sails of the ship, silhouetted against the darker sky beyond, melted slowly away from view. Then White, shipping the oars between the thole-pins, began pulling with the quick, practised hand of a man used to such work, in the opposite direction to which the vessel was travelling.

* * * * *

The steamer Windermere, bound from Waterford to Bristol, in ballast, was churning a leisurely way up the Bristol Channel towards her port. She was somewhere off Portishead when suddenly her look-out yelled in a stentorian voice, "Small boat on the starboard bow, sir, signalling for assistance!"

A bell rang in the engine-room; the screw of the Windermere ceased revolving.

"Ship ahoy!" came out of the darkness. "Throw us a line. I've a lady aboard who wants help."

In a moment all was bustle and confusion on the steamer's deck. The small boat drew alongside her, a ladder was let down, and, aided by the light of a lantern, two figures swung themselves up over the vessel's side, the one a tall, beautiful, stylishly-dressed lady, the other a man clad in the garb of a common sailor.

"What's this?" said the skipper of the Windermere, who had come down from the bridge, attracted by the unusual incident.

In a few words Hazel gave him the outline of her story. Deeply interested, he led the way to his own private cabin; his interest only grew more intense as he heard the girl's story in full, and noted the wondrous beauty of her face and form.

"You are never Miss Hazel Harlow?" he said. "Why, all Ireland knows the story of your adventure at Belfast. You seem destined for maritime excitement. It was smart the way you escaped this time. Won't Captain Tucker be mad to-morrow morning? Anyhow, you're safe here. What an old rascal the fellow must be' I wonder what the true story of the business is."

But the skipper was never destined to know that nor indeed, was Hazel, for what means had she of discovering the real facts of the case, how that it was again the hand of Valerie Bellairs that had been raised to work her undoing?

There is little more to be told. It was early the next morning when the Windermere arrived in Bristol, so that Hazel was enabled to start for her lodgings before Jenny had risen from a couch from which all thought of sleep had been banished.

As for Amos, the captain of the Windermere was so pleased with the young man's part in the affair that he had then and there offered to take him on as one of the steamer's crew.

"You needn't be afraid of old Tucker trying to find you," the captain had said. "He probably thinks you are in Davy Jones's locker by now."

And so the event did not turn out so badly for Amos as he had anticipated.

"Perhaps we may meet again some day, Hazel," he said, as with tears in her eyes she thanked him again and again for his devotion to her.

"I'll write to you sometimes if I can," he went on, "and tell you how I'm getting on. And now as an old friend let me give you a word of advice. Try and find a gentleman worthy of you, who will make a home for you and protect you from the recurrence of such an accident as the one that has just befallen you. Anyhow, good luck be always with you."

Jenny's joy at having her friend so miraculously restored to her can be well imagined. Hazel poured into her willing ears the full story of what had happened. After she had finished Jenny cried out:

"I am sure Valerie Bellairs has had a hand in this." And she told Hazel of her meeting with the actress, and of the veiled innuendo that Valerie had thrown out concerning Hazel herself.

And if the performance of the night before had been unworthy of the traditions of The Good Samaritan Company, the same could not be said for that night's representation.

Hazel received a tremendous ovation, though there were two people among the audience who could only sit and gaze fearfully at the radiant vision presented by the leading lady of the company.

"I take back my promise," hissed Valerie in Scarsdale's ear; "you have made a fool of me for nothing."

As for Scarsdale, he could find no words to answer her. Somehow Tucker had played him false, though he was never to know the true story of how his villainy had been defeated.

As for Tucker himself, we need concern ourselves no more with him. He had not earned his fifty pounds, though he had not come out the poorer by the transaction.

He was sensible enough to realise that it is best to let sleeping dogs lie, so he never made an effort to trace Amos White or to take revenge on the young sailor for having thus cavalierly broken his indentures and absconded with the Susan Tucker's longboat.

Portsmouth was to be the town next visited by The Good Samaritan Company. Here Jenny Lovelace was to pit her strength and woman's wit against a man whose cunning had been proved over and again and for Hazel Harlow's sake. How she fared in her enterprise will be told in a thrilling story in next week's Short Stories.

The Right of Way.

BIBLIOTHECA BODLEIANA

CHAPTER I.

Nobody understood the case, and nobody apart from the disputants held any definite opinion as to who was in the right. It is sufficient for present purposes to say that the disputants were respectively Major Crowquill and Sir Robert Bettany; and the subject of dispute the right-of-way by a path that led from Major Crowquill's garden gate and skirted a wood belonging to the other litigant.

The gallant major, more fiery surely than any other of his proverbially fiery rank, was a retired Mutiny campaigner, living on his half-pay in a picturesque old house in Kent with his daughter Dorothy and a couple of servants. Dorothy was just twenty, pretty as a picture, far more interesting to gaze upon, and imbued with the paternal pertinacity to just that degree which, wedded to winsome femininity, added to it so potent and subtle a charm.

Sir Gilbert Bettany, Bart., was handsome, rich, and thirty, of studious and retiring habits, and a most pronounced objection to the "other sex." Rarely going into society, and still more rarely receiving other than men friends, he had swathed himself with the reputation of a woman hater. That he would ever marry seemed an impossibility.

In the matter of the disputed pathway, Sir Gilbert had shown that he, too, could be obstinate or strong of purpose, according to the aspect in which his action was viewed. On the major persisting in the use of the contested path, the baronet had retaliated with a solicitor's letter, threatening a summons for trespass; and when the gallant officer, his blood stirred to boiling point, ignored the letter, the summons was duly served. The case had come before the county bench—of which both prosecutor and defendant were members—only to be adjourned time after time for further consideration of the intricate evidence. For in the preparation of his case, Major Crowquill had unearthed the will of a former baronet, which, cursorily viewed, at all events, seemed to have given the public right-of-way by the path in question. At the same time, the will did not preclude the present baronet from erecting a gate or barrier to prevent people making use of the way. So that, altogether, there was a pretty legal web, in which acuter brains than the average county magistrate's might easily become entangled.

The bench, after some dozen adjournments, decided that the case involved a question of the rights of property, and refused absolutely to deal with it. The upshot was that the case was set down for hearing in the Probate Court. So the lawyers went on writing letters and piling up big costs, and K.C.'s went on talking of precedents (which their "devils" looked up for them) and piling up bigger costs; and the case loomed darkly in the future.

Meanwhile, Major Crowquill and Sir Gilbert Bettany each sturdily maintained he was in the right—the former using the path, and the latter doing all he could to prevent him.

CHAPTER II.

Dorothy Crowquill loved her father. And perhaps her love for him was the more intense since there was no other masculine object on which she poured out her affection. She had never loved in the limited sense of the word—had never had a sweetheart, though her bright eyes and sunny hair had played the rôle of light to the impetuous human moths that exist in London society, seeking whom they may fall in love with. But Dorothy had returned with her father after her first brief London season, bringing her heart back, absolutely whole and unimpaired. Her only feeling was one of disappointment. Naturally somewhat romantic, she had in the secret recesses of her fluttering little heart, imagined that in town she might meet the fairy prince of her inmost thoughts—the hero, noble and brave and strong, whom she had conjured up in her fanciful brain. And, instead, she had met with a lot of shallowpates, with absolutely nothing of the hero in them; but ever ready to admire and flatter and flirt, to say idiotic nothings by the hour together, to treat and humour her like a child. Yes; undoubtedly Dorothy Crowquill was grievously disappointed.

As well as loving her father, she admired him; admired him for his sound intelligence, and above all, for his indomitable spirit, which, as we have already said, she inherited from him, in a diluted form. She admired resolution in a man; and, in the present case, she firmly believed her father to be in the right.

So it was with but little compunction that, one July morning, she took a walk along the disputed path. It was a lovely day. The sun in all its summer splendour was gilding the green of the trees whereon perched myriads of birds, singing their hearts out in thankfulness to Heaven for the happiness which was theirs.

Of part of this joy of living, Dorothy seemed at the moment to partake. As she tripped along, blithe as a lark herself, she too sang—or, rather hummed—the melody of a simple ballad which was a favourite with herself and her father.

Suddenly, however, she broke off, and halted. A bend in the path had brought her face to face with a gentleman seated on a gate. At her approach he looked up and frowned a little as he saw that it was a girl.

Neither spoke for a moment. Then, driven to speech by the awkwardness of the stare they were directing on the other, Sir Gilbert Bettany (for he it was) said:

"You may perhaps not be aware of it, but you are trespassing."

"I am aware you hold such to be the case," returned Dorothy icily; "but my father thinks differently. I believe my father."

The baronet was taken aback somewhat by this spirited reply. He gazed at his antagonist with curious eyes.

"You are Miss Crowquill, I perceive," he said.

Dorothy bowed distantly, and made as though to go on. Sir Gilbert Bettany, his woman hating spirit piqued at her demeanour, got off the gate and stood facing her.

"I am sorry," he said, "to appear to be impolite. But this is a question of principle, and I must insist on my right."

"If, in insisting, you intend to use brute force," Miss Dorothy retorted, her face flushing and eyes flashing with indignation, "I shall of course turn back. Otherwise I insist on my right to go on."

Sir Gilbert paused, astounded. What a girl this was!—so different from the dolls he met in society. Why, she had the spirit and will of a man! It was a revelation in womanhood. He looked at her again, and now there was distinctly something of admiration in his gaze. Disconcerted by the unflinching angry look of her big, beautiful eyes, he stammered out:

"Why, of course, Miss Crowquill, if you wish to go on, I—er—have no objection—not the least. Pray go on by all means."

"Thank you! I have no wish to be merely tolerated." Dorothy's eyes flashed defiance. The baronet looked on in surprised admiration at the girl's spirit.

"To suggest that I am capable of tolerating you," he said quietly, "is to make me feel guilty of gross impertinence. I am sorry to be impertinent." He glanced at her penitently.

"I am sure I do not mean to imply that you are," she replied, with relent in her tone. She rather liked his quiet, unassuming manner.

"It is kind of you to say so," he rejoined, with a ring of genuine sincerity in his tone. "I should never have forgiven myself if you had thought otherwise." He was dragging out the conversation. Dorothy pleased his sight, and he seemed to want her to tarry near. But she was already on the move.

"Good-day, Sir Gilbert Bettany!" she remarked, with just a touch of roguishness in her manner. "I am glad we have settled this wretched question of the right-of-way." And ere he could do more than acknowledge her adieu, she was well on her way along the disputed path. The baronet gazed after her, admiring the beautiful outlines of her figure till she disappeared round a bend in the path. Then, with wonder-set eyes, he sat down on a gate near by.

"She's a beautiful girl!" he said to himself, flicking his leg contemplatively with his stick. "She's better than that—she's a splendid woman. What spirit she has, and what dignity! By Jove, what a—Bah! here am I, known to all my friends as a confirmed woman hater, growing sentimental over the daughter of my arch-enemy. It was her eyes that beat me—they're beautiful eyes." He looked to dream for a moment. "And hang it all," he continued, pulling himself together, "she insisted on her right to use this path, and I tamely submitted! I don't mind, of course, but there's a principle involved. I'll have to talk to her quietly but firmly when I see her again."

While he was thus "audibly thinking" of her, Dorothy, in her turn, was thinking of him.

"It's strange that papa and he should be at loggerheads about this stupid path. He seems such a nice man. What a pleasant soft voice he has, and how polite and serious! So different from men who are always paying compliments and saying silly things. Perhaps I was a little bit rude in insisting on coming this way. . . . . But no! I mustn't let him, simply because he happens to be nice, make me alter my mind. Of course, papa is right, and if I happen to meet Sir Gilbert again, I must tell him, kindly but firmly, that I consider myself fully entitled to use this path whenever I choose."

CHAPTER III.

Although Sir Gilbert Bettany had shown himself (according to his own belief) a little weak in dealing with Miss Dorothy Crowquill, he was determined to maintain his claim to the disputed path.

Then the fat was in the fire! Hostilities were renewed.

And so, one day, in pursuance of this purpose, he had a strong five-barred gate erected, upon discovering which, Major Crowquill grew tempestuous in his wrath.

"Gate, is it?" he stormed. "He thinks he'll keep me out with a gate, does he? I'll show him!"

And duly the Major "showed" him. For at five o'clock one morning, he armed himself with a crowbar and sledge-hammer, and with his own hands demolished that five-barred gate beyond recognition.

Sir Gilbert Bettany issued a summons for wilful destruction of his property, and the Major promptly replied with a cross-summons for obstructing the public pathway. Previously there had been a very pretty legal tangle, and these later developments added to it. For the matter, being already sub judice, was fought shy of by the local bench, and both summonses were dismissed, each party paying his own costs.

This was equally unsatisfactory to both parties. The baronet immediately had a second gate erected, and anticipating a depredatory visit from the irate major, rose very early himself the next morning and sallied out to place himself on guard. In his hand he carried a hunting crop. He was going to take the law into his own hands should it be necessary.

Sure enough, as he got within earshot of the newly-erected gate, he heard through the trees the sound of blows, as of a hammer falling on iron bars. Evidently the major had got to work early. Sir Gilbert Bettany gripped his whip tighter and strode on quickly.

But what a sight met his eyes when he emerged from the coppice in full view of the gate! Instead of the fire-eating major whom he had expected, he beheld Miss Dorothy Crowquill, hatless and jacketless, swinging a sledge-hammer, and inflicting such blows on the gate as would not have discredited a blacksmith.

The baronet stopped dead with surprise. He had not foreseen this development, and was quite unprepared for it. He looked as if he would have liked the earth to open and swallow him up. Failing that, he did actually try a strategical movement back into the shelter of the trees.

But it was too late.

Pausing for a moment's rest from her task, Dorothy espied him.

"Ah! good-morning, Sir Gilbert!" she called out.

There was no indication of confusion in her manner. She was as composed as if she had merely been caught gathering a posy of flowers, instead of in the wanton destruction of another person's property.

"Good morning, Miss Crowquill!" He was actually blushing with bewilderment.

"You are an early riser, Sir Gilbert."

"Not so early as yourself apparently."

"Oh! I am up early this morning in order to get rid of this stupid gate which you have had put up. It is exceptional for me to be about so early as this."

"You think the object worthy of such a change in habit?"

"Oh, yes, certainly! You see, papa is laid up with an attack of gout, or he would have come himself. And he worried so much about not being able to do it, that in order to prevent him making himself worse, I resolved to destroy the gate myself."

She was punctuating her remarks with hammer-blows by this time. Sir Gilbert looked on amazed. Was ever such temerity known as this girl's? How strong she seemed! How supple her body was; how graceful the swing of her arms; what a lovely bloom the exertion put upon her cheeks! She paused again in her work.

"You put up very strong gates," she murmured. There was more than a suggestion of banter in her manner.

"Do I?" he answered slowly.

"Yes—awfully strong. I've been hammering at this silly old bar for ever so long—and I'm quite tired."

"Why not leave off, then?" he suggested.

"What! give up my task—never! papa would be awfully angry. No, I'll go on till I drop!" And she fixed both her beautiful eyes full upon the baronet.

Those eyes did for him. He made a step forward.

"Can I help you?" he enquired desperately.

"Oh! now that's very kind of you," and she handed him the hammer through the bent bars.

For the next three or four minutes the gate echoed to the ponderous blows which the baronet dealt it. When he paused to rest for a moment, his eyes sought those of Dorothy. There was a twinkle in the latter.

"Why are you smiling?" he asked.

"I can't help it," she replied. "It really is too funny!"

"What is?"

"Why, to think that you should take the trouble to erect this gate yesterday, and then help to destroy it to-day!"

She laughed merrily.

"Was there ever such inducement to destroy one's own property?" he asked.

"How do you mean?"

"I mean this, Miss Crowquill," he burst out; "that you asked me to do it. And there's nothing I wouldn't do for your sake."

"Sir Gilbert!" she dropped her eyes and blushed as she uttered the exclamation.

"Forgive me, Miss Crowquill!" He had dropped the hammer by this time, and was by her side, holding her hand.

"Forgive me—Dorothy! I love you—love you as I never dreamt a woman could be loved before! Will you—will you be my wife?"

Dorothy's head dropped lower, and she did not try to release herself from his arm, which somehow or other had stolen around her waist.

"Dorothy—say yes!"

She didn't say "yes," but she allowed him to kiss her; and there's a language in that sort of thing which even a woman-hater can understand. Sir Gilbert Bettany evidently understood it, and was satisfied. Furthermore, the language was repeated.

* * * * *

To the mild chagrin of the members of the legal profession engaged in the case, the famous right-of-way lawsuit suddenly came to an end, in consequence of a settlement having been arrived at.

The cause of that settlement became apparent a few weeks later, when the friends of the respective Bettany and Crowquill families began buying wedding presents. Major Crowquill doesn't quarrel with his son-in-law about the right-of-way now.

MRS. PEMBERTON'S PAYING GUEST.

TO LADIES, Widowed or Single.—A lady with house (much too large for her own use), in good locality, and well furnished, would be glad to receive as a paying guest one or other as above.—Address, for terms, etc., Mrs. Pemberton, Dynevor Lodge, Eynesford Crescent, Bayswater, W.

"The very thing! I'll investigate at once. It sounds all right. At any rate it's better than this!" and Freda Periera threw around a discontented look, expressed and emphasised by curling lip and contracted brow.

It was a private sitting-room on the third floor of the Hotel Cecil. Breakfast was upon the table, and it was an advertisement in the Morning Post that had attracted the lady's attention.

Young she was (eight-and-twenty or thereabouts), and passably good-looking, but her somewhat small, steely blue eyes had in them an over-shrewd, calculating expression, which, together with thin lips, tightly compressed as a rule, gave an unpleasant impression of hardness to most people with whom she came in contact.

Her dark skin and jet-black hair told of Southern blood, while her nervously quick movements implied that, as a daughter of the South, she had inherited its temperament in no small degree.

The father of Freda Periera had been a cadet of a certain noble house, whose principal ancestral seat is the glory of the North of England.

Extravagant—vicious even—he had been compelled, as the result of his own folly, to seek the Continent as a safe place of residence.

It was during a summer's sojourn at lovely Sorrento that he met the Italian girl whom, to her own sorrow, he ultimately married.

The daughter of a small wine-shop keeper in the outskirts of the town, one Carlo Periera, she could not, somehow, resist the persuasive tongue of the well-dressed, perfectly mannered Englishman.

Fortunately for herself, in one way, Carlo would permit no love-making for its own sake—no inconsequent, irresponsible flirting.

"You want," he said, "to marry my daughter—good! You only make your love to her, and then—pht!" and he made a significant snap of the finger in the direction of the road to the frontier. "Well, then I say 'No, Signior Inglese!' No, I, Carlo Periera, have my pride as have you 'milords,' and can claim the best blood in Italy for my own—si! And so, signior, no! if you love only, and will not marry."

As Carlo Periera looked quite capable of not "saying" merely, but "doing," Arthur Delane clearly had but two alternatives.

He loved Margharita—after a fashion, and yet in such a way that he could not let her go.

He took her away, after the marriage, to Florence, where they contrived to live for the best part of ten years. Then Margharita died, and Delane, first consigning the little Freda, like any commercial package, to the care of Carlo Periera, disappeared, to be seen no more. Whether he died, or, indeed, what became of him, nobody knew, and, for the matter of that, nobody cared.

Brought up by her grandfather, the Italian part of Freda's nature greatly developed, save in that, much to the old innkeeper's disgust, she invariably spoke English.

One thing, however, Periera insisted upon, viz., that she should adopt his surname, her father's being, for obvious reasons, hateful to him.

When, just before the completion of her eight-and-twentieth year, Periera died, leaving her the bulk of his savings of fifty years, Freda rejoiced within herself that her time was come; the realisation of her life-dream was made possible; wealth, position, everything! might now be had for the trying for them.

That her legacy was considerable was evidenced by her manner of living in London, whither she had come after a brief stay in Paris.

Her main motive was undoubtedly matrimonial. Her money, she knew, would not last for ever, and she looked upon it, while it remained, to furnish her with the means of securing a good settlement.

Up to the present she had been unsuccessful; all her social ventures had turned out "fiascos," so that now when she was beginning to find that her resources were perilously near their end, she saw that she must make some supreme effort before disaster should render effort of any kind an absolute impossibility.

Eynesford Crescent is in the best part of Bayswater, close to Ladbroke Grove, in fact, Dynevor Lodge being one of the most desirable houses in it.

"Some crank, I suppose, with nothing better to do than to stare at people."

Mrs. Pemberton, the owner and occupier of the latter, was a quiet, refined lady of advanced middle age, and the widow of a distinguished general officer.

Two sons, one a sub-lieutenant in the navy, the other a military cadet at Sandhurst, lived with their mother when they were in London on leave; otherwise, with the exception of her servants, her life was companionless and solitary.

Some little while before the anticipated home-coming of her boys it had struck her that a paying inmate of the house, of her own sex, would benefit her in more ways than one.

In the first place, it would add materially to her income, which, never over large, had been depleted in no small measure by the sacrifices she had made for her children, the starting in life of whom had sadly crippled her means. The presence, too, of a lady would be much to her if the new-comer were in every way suitable, the prospect of even such companionship being, after her hermit-like existence, doubly pleasant.

"Miss Freda Periera."

So ran the card handed her about three o'clock on the afternoon upon the day on which the advertisement appeared in the Morning Post.

An account of the interview would not be particularly interesting; sufficient that both ladies were on the alert to make discoveries, and that both were in the end apparently satisfied.

For a time the arrangement seemed to work splendidly, then the rift appeared, and clouds began to gather.

Mrs. Pemberton, probably because she was altogether unused to the boarding-house business, even on a limited and a genteel scale, had, in spite of the polite fiction implied in the term "paying guest," somewhat hazy notions with regard to the "guest's" true position.

She evidently imagined that the monetary consideration she received gave a commercial complexion to the affair, while it as evidently necessitated a certain assumption of dignified stand-offishness on her part as toward her new acquaintance.

On the other hand, Freda Periera soon began to take liberties (or that which Mrs. Pemberton regarded as such), apparently forgetting, when high-handedly intruding her suggestions, and even orders, that her hostess was the real head of the establishment, and that to take upon herself to usurp the domestic throne was at once a manifest proof of ignorance and of crass impertinence.

This forgetfulness, or, shall it be said, wilful blindness, led her into the perpetration of all sorts of unwarrantable things, to the vexation of Mrs. Pemberton, who bitterly regretted, when too late, having entered so hastily into the contract.

Like many another foolish woman before and since, she had, even on the very first day of Freda's appearance at Dynevor Lodge, acquainted her with all the salient points of the family history, quite unaware, poor soul, that Freda's tale of all that concerned herself was far from being a veracious chronicle; was, in fact, as highly coloured as could well be.

Among other things the fond mother, in expatiating upon her sons and their many good points, communicated the pregnant fact that the elder (the naval sub lieutenant), would, upon attaining his majority in the following June, come into possession of an estate in Hertfordshire and a capital sum of £50,000, under the will of the late General Pemberton's brother, a large holder of "Hudson's Bay" and "New River" stock.

It might, perhaps, have been fancy, but Mrs. Pemberton could not shake off the idea that Freda Periera had thoughts about this matter as from time to time she referred to the subject, getting as much information as she could upon it consistently with prudence

About a month after Freda's arrival at Dynevor Lodge, word came from Douglas Pemberton that he should leave the Naval Depot, Whale Island, Portsea, that evening, and should, all being well, be at home some time during the morning of the next day. His letter con cluded with saying that he had arranged with his brother Cecil to meet him at Clapham Junction, from whence they would journey home together.

Immediately after breakfast the following morning, Mrs. Pemberton was surprised to see her "guest" making preparation for going out.

"I may be away at luncheon time," said Freda airily, "so do not wait, please, as, perhaps, it will be three or half past before I return."

The other thought it strange, this early expedition, though why exactly she could not quite satisfy herself.

* * * * *

It was certainly a curious circumstance, a coincidence almost, that as the Portsmouth train steamed into the "Junction" a tall, sealskin-jacketted, foreign-looking lady should be on the platform awaiting its arrival.

When Douglas Pemberton sprang out of the carriage to greet his brother, who had arrived by another train, their meeting was observed and keenly noted by the lady in question; so closely, indeed, that it drew the attention of the two young men to her.

They could not plainly see her features owing to her thick veil, but they saw quite enough to be able to make out that for some reason the stranger was curious with regard to them.

"D'you know her?" whispered Cecil to his brother.

"Not from Adam!" returned Douglas. "Some crank, I suppose, with nothing better to do than to stare at people. But never mind her old cha ! I'm as hungry as a hunter! We'll put the traps in the cloak-room for half an-hour while we see if we can get a chop at the buffet."

The woman must have overheard this, for she immediately descended the stairs, went outside, and, getting into a hansom, drove away westwards.

* * * *

The two young men arrived at the Lodge just after luncheon.

Mrs. Pemberton rather dreaded saying anything about the new inmate, and so postponed explanations until later on.

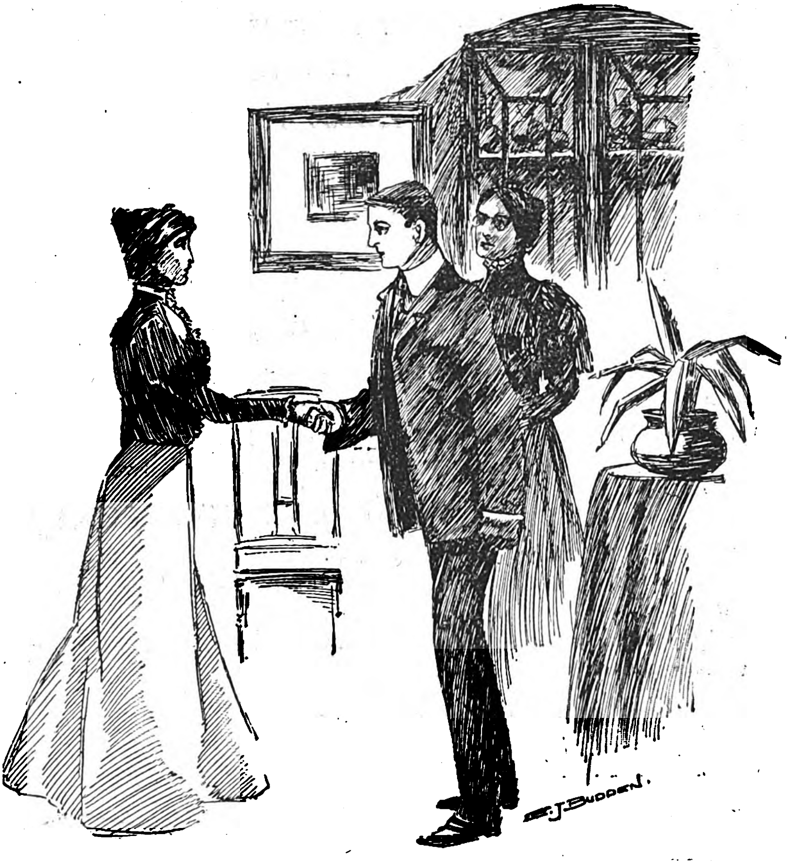
At dinner both Douglas and Cecil greeted the appearance of Freda at the table with well bred but genuine astonishment. The usual introduction conveyed, of course, no meaning. As the meal progressed Freda's manifest disposition to consider the house and all belonging to it as being hers equally with its legitimate mistress caused both boys to exchange puzzled glances of displeasure.

Who was she, this extremely forward individual? No friend and guest of their mother's would surely so far forget herself as to dictate in her hostess' presence and at the latter's own table! The good lady saw the dilemma she was in, and took the first opportunity after dinner to explain matters, if a trifle lamely.

"Yes, mother, that's all very well," said Douglas indignantly, "but neither I nor Cecil see any reason for your having a lady" (strongly emphasising the word) "as a paying member of your family."

"No, mother," said Cecil, "I don't like it, and I am sure Douglas doesn't, and——"

"My dear boys!" implored their mother, "do be reasonable! My life here is rather lonely, as I think you will admit, and I merely thought that if I could induce a lady to honour me with her company" (innocent deception, although I think the lads saw through it) "it would be pleasant for me and——"



The usual introduction, of course, conveyed no meaning.

"Well, but mother!" interrupted her eldest born, "you could have had cousin Dorothy up from Alnwick! She would have been only too glad to come."

Manager as well as mother, Mrs. Pemberton had her own reasons for not extending her invitation to the young lady.

Things went on in this way for the next few days, to

DO YOU WANT A £5 NOTE?

Five Crisp £5 Notes to be Given to Readers Every Week.

£25 per Week if you will ask for it.

HERE IS THE SCHEME.

We have in our possession a considerable number of photographs of men, women, and children of all grades of society, secured for us by our agents, who have scoured the United Kingdom for this special purpose.

Each week we shall publish five of these portraits, and to each of the persons thus represented we shall dispatch the sum of £5, on his or her claiming same on a postcard addressed to

Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Although the persons whose portraits will appear in this competition are quite unknown to us personally, we have their names and addresses in our possession, and, therefore, a claim can be settled at once, without risk of fraud.

We may say that our agents are still at work all over the country. It is, therefore, possible that your portrait may appear without your knowing it at any moment. So you should watch SHORT STORIES.

HERE ARE FIVE PORTRAITS.

Is your portrait here? If so, drop us a post-card, and get £5. Five more portraits will appear next week.

All claims in connection with the above portraits must reach the address already given above by Tuesday next, October 15th.

Full names and addresses of the people represented in each number will appear in succeeding numbers, whether the five pound notes are claimed or not.

Simply write on a postcard these words:

> The Portrait No.......... (here put number of portrait) in the current number of SHORT STORIES is mine. Please forward a £5 note.

the dissatisfaction of the boys, and to the discomfort and distress of their mother.

Of Cecil, Freda took hardly any notice; it was Douglas whose goodwill she angled for.

But Douglas was not to be caught. First impressions had been so unfavourable that a suddenly developed "angel," wings and all, would have quite failed to lure him to rise.

It was one day when she was dressed for going out and standing, deliberating about the weather, at the window, that it flashed across the young man's mind the strong resemblance of Freda's figure and general carriage to that of the lady upon the platform at Clapham. Even the long, loose sealskin was the same, and yet——?

"Why should she have been on the watch for me?" he mused. "I don't half like it, and I wish she would go."

He would have been still more eager for her departure had he but known that only that morning his mother had given her own open cheque for a crossed one for a large amount—£150.

"I think it will hold up," she said at last, turning towards him; "will you be good enough to see that a cab is got for me—a hansom, please."

Always polite, even to objectionable people, Douglas went out himself and procured a hansom.

Simultaneously with its arrival another cab drew up behind it, from which jumped a smart, spruce man.

Upon the steps Freda and the stranger met.

"Miss Freda Delane, otherwise Pereira," the latter said quickly but courteously. "Perhaps you will not mind returning indoors with me for a few moments."

"Why should I?" said Freda angrily. "I do not know you, sir! let me pass!"

But she had to comply, for the Scotland Yard messenger insisted upon having his way.

And then the truth came out.

Freda's money, with the exception of a few pounds, was exhausted when she left the Hotel Cecil, which she did, unfortunately for herself, as it turned out, without paying her bill.

This had set inquiries afloat, but when it transpired that the crossed cheque, given two days previously, was valueless, the matter became serious, and, a warrant being issued, Freda would have to answer for her misdeeds before a metropolitan magistrate.

It is never pleasant to witness the humiliation of any woman, and Mrs. Pemberton could not help feeling sorry for her, although she herself was a victim but, when, just before leaving with the detective, she turned and told her sometime hostess that she regretted more than anything else the failure of her scheme to entrap the affections of young Douglas, Mrs. Pemberton hardened her heart, and then and there vowed nevermore to do as she had done, but, if it was to be, to live a solitary life to the end of the chapter.

Photo Competition.

As we go to press several claims have come in. These will be immediately dealt with and reported upon next week.

In our next number, too, will appear the names and addresses of the originals of our second batch of portraits.

KING'S EVIDENCE.

CHAPTER I.

THE DEED AND THE WITNESS.

"WELL, old chap, it's a bargain, then? You'll come out and join me as soon as you've got things fixed up a bit."

"Yes, in a month or so. But it's 'everybody for the shore' now. So long, Ewart! Be a good boy!"

"Here! one moment, Heath! Oonah! has she told you?"

"Oonah!—told me!—what?"

"Why, that she's promised to marry me!"

Masterman Heath stopped short at the top of the gangway, which sloped at an acute angle from the Icelandic's side to the quay, and down which he had made to move, in response to the hoarse warnings of ships' quartermasters and dock officials.

"I'll write you about it—what she says, I mean," he said at last, slowly, and in a peculiar, half-preoccupied way.

"Then you don't object, old fellow?" cried Eric, seeing that the other was moving down the incline.

"Why should I?" replied Heath, with a curiously set smile upon his always white face. "It will be all right! Good-bye!"

"Good-bye!"

The gangways were unshipped and run back on to the quay; the Icelandic slid away from the granite kerb, and Eric Ewart, with a last energetic hand-wave to his friend on the outer fringe of the shore crowd, fairly faced, in the teeth of a strong head breeze blowing up the Mersey from the sea, a new life, with all its new and as yet unknown experiences.

* * * * *

"Massee Elic gone away—allee same ullee side?"

Masterman Heath started, and turned sharply, to find a grinning Chinaman at his elbow. There was nothing presumptious about this Celestial; sleek, suave, and, perhaps sly, he stood, his shoulders drawn up almost to his ears, his head trifle bent, a smile of peculiar meaning playing about the corners of his thin-lipped mouth.

"What the devil are you doing here? Didn't I tell you to wait for me at the hotel?"

"Me come—lookee after you. See Massee Elic go away Melica."

"Well, and now you have seen, what the wiser or the better are you—eh?"

"Me allee-light. Ming-Ho know something."

The crowd was still dense, watching the trail of black smoke from the funnels of the Icelandic, as it grew ever fainter and still more faint.

Heath signed to his companion to follow him out of the throng. The Chinaman, valet, and general factotum to the man who, some years before, had, in the city of Pekin, rescued him from the cangur—from a fate perhaps even worse—submissively obeyed.

Outside the dock gate Heath paused a moment, and bade the other take a note and a small packet which he gave him to a certain address in one of the branch streets on the Everton Road.

"Velly glood. What Felime you wantee me back?"

"As soon as you can get your errand done, you lazy rascal!"

To see the cringing attitude of the man, it might quite naturally have been supposed that Ming-Ho was perfectly under control; that his very soul, in fact, was not his own; but a glance caught of his wicked little almond eyes, half-veiled, watchful, would tell a different tale.

"Me goee velly quick," he said, slinking away.

A couple of hours afterwards, when his master arrived at the hotel, Ming-Ho was waiting, self-satisfied, smiling.

"You delivered the note?"

"You gave it into Miss Oona's own hand?"

"Yes."

"Has she sent any message?"

"No."

"D——n!"

"You hearder gleat news, Massee Heath?"

"No! and don't want to hear it!—get out!"

"Big news—big lobbely—lite-hair soildier-man—ab 'im thloat clut."

Like a tiger, Masterman Heath, his features contorted and working convulsively, seized the Chinaman by the throat.

"You lying hound! Carry your big news elsewhere," he cried, shaking the man, till his teeth rattled again, and then flinging him from him with a force that sent him spinning across the room, to fall in a heap by the door.

At that moment, up through the open window from the street, sounded the raucous voice of an evening paper-boy.

"Murder!—General Ewart robbed and killed by burglars!—Murder!—Second extry—Murder!"

Ming-Ho, spite his bruises and his sore bones, watched the tall, elegantly-dressed figure by the window.

Heath seemed to be fascinated with the street-boy's cry. His fingers clutched the curtains. His face was whiter than Ming-Ho had ever seen it.

"What—what," he said at length, as if pulling himself together, "what did my sister do with the packet I sent her?"

"She gavee me it back."

"Where is it?"

Ming-Ho slowly, and apparently reluctantly, produced from his long, voluminous blue sleeve the packet in question. He extended it to Heath, who snatched it, and thrust it into his pocket.

More £25 notes to be given away. See page 466.

"Now, go!" he said savagely. "Be here in an hour's time—an hour—do you hear?"

"Me hear—but—Massee Heath, me wantee tell you one little thing."

"Well."

"Day say—one piecy lite paper pollis man foun'—and and——".

"Well."

"Too—one piecy hankchief—foun'."

Mechanically Heath's hand went up to the breast pocket of his coat.

Half-an-hour later Ming-Ho might have been seen in the close, reeking atmosphere of a tumble-down opium shop in the seafaring quarter of the town. He was in—for a Chinaman—eager talk with an old compatriot, the proprietor of the den.

It was not easy to hear what they said, they spoke so low, and with their heads so locked together across the dirty table, but in Ming-Ho's hand was something which evidently had intimate reference to the matter under discussion.

It was a white cambric pocket handkerchief, with, in one corner, the initials M. H. worked in crimson silk.

CHAPTER II.

Craft and Subtlety.

Masterman Heath was a man who, from his first entry into life had been selfish, extravagant, reckless. Possessing originally a fair fortune he had dissipated it in living, riotous beyond the average.

From pecuniary embarrassment to Shylock's office was the inevitable short step. Deep in the moneylender's books, threatened with bankruptcy or even worse, there came a day when he stood pantingly at bay. Turn which way he would, disgraceful liabilities, debts of honour (so-called), and writs without end, hedged him in on every side.

Although most men suspected, and, in course of time, fought shy of him, strange to say, two people—a man and a woman—believed him, loved him even.

His friend, Eric Ewart, the son of an old and distinguished Indian General, was one of those splendid fellows one sees but once or twice in a lifetime.

Associated as he had been with Masterman Heath in many of his mere gaieties, he had absolutely taken no part in the latter's more vicious amusements, and this because of Heath's secretive system in this particular, his companions in debauch being of his own kidney, and alike to him in inclination.

Yet was Eric Ewart no milksop; no apron-string, sawney-brain, but a fine, healthy-minded, athletic young giant, whom it would be well-nigh impossible to pass in the street without envying and admiring. Loyalty was as the breath of his nostrils; and to his friend he was loyal as Jonathan of old.

Beauty might be denied her, and, perhaps with justice, but the sparkle and intelligent expression in eye and mouth were undoubtedly hers in rare abundance, making a more than beautiful woman of her. Her loveableness was on a par with Eric's loyalty; in fact, the two attributes were manifestly interchangeable; her love being loyal, and his loyalty having about it the true essence of tender appreciation.

Oonah's affection for her brother was, in its motherly protectiveness, the very sweetest thing about her. He played upon this feeling, utterly ignoring the sacredness of it, and making her to believe in him even as an "angel of light."

On the morning of the day before Eric sailed for the "West" in quest of fortune, Masterman Heath had had a somewhat unpleasant interview with Shylock, otherwise Mr. Isaac Hyman, financial agent, of Sackville Street, Piccadilly.

Heath, who was really staying with the Ewarts at their country place near Chester, had run up to town the night before on pressing business. He hoped to be able to return to Combe Court by the midday following, but was ,owing to an accident, unable to do so.

Eric had already left his home two days previously, and to avoid unnecessary pain to both sides, was going on straight to Liverpool, where Heath was to meet him at the Adelphi.

Out towards Everton Oonah lived, as companion to a wealthy old maid, who simply worshipped the girl. Eric, before Heath's arrival, had run out to the Cedars to whisper his "farewells." He had also been successful, as has been said, in getting from her an avowal of her love for him. They had known one another nearly as long as he had known her brother; the first occasion of their meeting having been the "bumping" festival on the Isis. That was a long while ago now; when the two young men were freshmen of "Corpus," but neither Eric nor Oonah ever forgot that "birth-time of love."

Masterman Heath's experience the morning which saw the leave-taking by Eric of his sweetheart, was not so enviable, or so pleasant.

On reaching his chambers he found, to his rage and mortification, a man in possession at Mr. Hyman's suit.

Hurrying round to that gentleman's office, he endeavoured but vainly, to soften, and to conciliate him. But the time had now come for the cutting-up of the quarry—the day of grace was passed.

"I shall have some money in a week or ten days, and will then redeem the securities."

"Won't do—won't do. I've lost a lot lately, and must realise, sir—realise. Besides, I'm inclined to put but very little faith in that 'money next week' of yours."

"What do you mean?—you—you——"

"Steady on, my good Mr. Heath; steady on. No hard words, please. The distress must remain in. If you can pay it out within, say, a week from to-day, good—if not, good again—for me."

"You're a swindling old rascal! and——"

"May I ask what you are, Mr. Masterman Heath? These securities you speak of, and which I hold, I have strong reasons for believing to be—well, not quite genuine. More fool me, perhaps, for being so ready to take and lend on them. Anyway, I'm having them examined to-day by an expert, so that—we shall see—we shall see."

"Oh, you want to frighten me, do you? Well you can't, and won't."

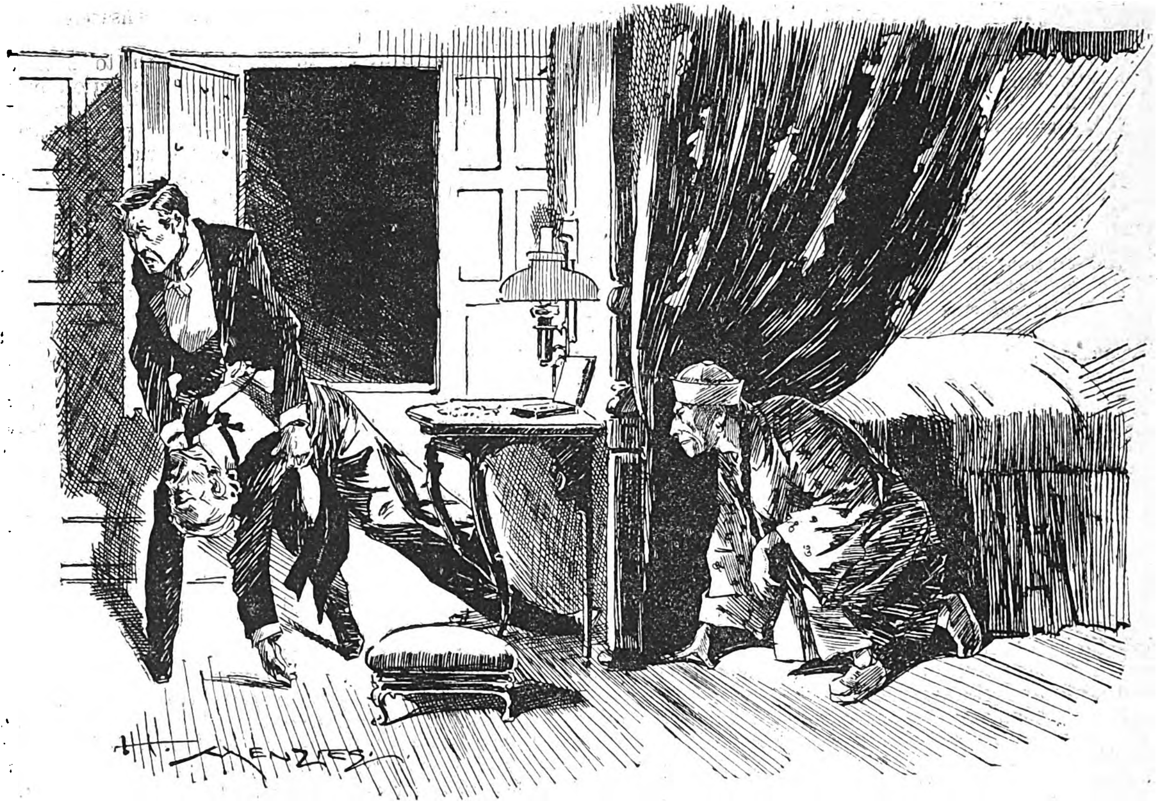
"That's as it may be," calmly, and even smilingly, observed the moneylender. "If you know they're all right, why, you've nothing to be afraid of."

"Rot! Who said I was frightened? What I want to know is, what the devil this man is in possession for? Your claim is liberally covered by the—the securities."

"'Um! How about the nearly twelve months' arrears of interest?"

"Well—you will have to withdraw your man."

Surely that's your photo on page 466?



Again that echo of a sound—this time it was like to a rustle of silken garments.

"I shall do nothing of the kind; and what is more, I should advise you, Mr. Masterman Heath, to look very carefully to yourself, for, unless I much mistake me, other folk will soon be looking anxiously after you."

Heath then left Sackville Street and proceeded to his own rooms. Here he put together some papers, and a few extra clothes, packing them pell-mell in a large portmanteau.

The bailiff's man dared him to remove anything, but, tipping the law's representative a sovereign, Heath walked out with the spoil, got into a hansom, and was driven to Euston.

When he arrived at Combe Court they were just sitting down to dinner. There was no one present beyond the old General, his daughter Margaret, and a young fellow to whom the latter was engaged to be married.

Dinner over, Heath, who when Eric had been there, had invariably sought the billiard-room, sat moody and silent, scarce vouchsafing even barely courteous replies to his host's genial remarks.

General Ewart could not but notice this, and, in the spirit of sympathy, ventured a word or two in kind inquiry as to his guest's health, for he certainly looked to be either physically or mentally upset.

In the course of conversation the elder man incidentally referred to the fact that, in the house, just returned from the London jewellers after resetting, were the famous Ewart diamonds.

"When I go up to bed, Heath, you shall see them if you like, and will come with me up to my room. It's a big responsibility, you know, to have a hundred and fifty thousand pounds' worth of crystallised carbon on the premises, though I don't think there is much danger of losing them, when all my precautions are considered."

Heath quite agreed with him, assuring him also that he would much like to see the stones.

They were in a way historic, a certain necklet in the collection having once belonged—so ran the story—to the notorious Countess of Essex; the slayer of Sir Thomas Overbury in the time of the first James, and an ancestral connection of the Ewart family.

It was nearing midnight when the two men stood by the table in General Ewart's room, inspecting, by the light of a reading lamp, the wondrous Ewart heirlooms. The old gentleman, who was marvellously independent and resourceful for his age, had no personal attendant, and was never disturbed by any one after once retiring.

Heath, in view of an early departure the next morning—he was to leave before five—had dismissed his Chinese servant for the night.

It was a peaceful household, it seemed to Heath, as, the large case containing the gems in one hand, he fingered the scintillating ornaments with the other.

"Dead to the World" begins next week.

A devilish idea took possession of his brain, the consequences were nothing to him, he could not realise them.

His one thought was that he was ruined, completely and irretrievably ruined, and that—Faugh!—It was madness!

Then he fancied that he could detect a sound, but, save for his companion's somewhat sleepy comments, all was silent as death almost.

He must have been mistaken.

By the side of the huge, old-fashioned four-poster, there was a safe, or iron-lined closet rather, in the wall panelling. In this, papers, jewels, plate, and other valuables were in the habit of being stored for safety.

It was a foolish practice, but the master of the house had venerable notions on most matters, and in this preferred to be his own custodian of the family treasures.

As midnight chimed from the clock on the mantelpiece; and, as Heath, laying down the case upon the table looked strangely down upon the bent head of the old man, who proceeded to close the lid, the door of the safe stood wide open; the black, forbidding recess appearings uggestively grim in the semi-darkness of the room.

Again that echo of a sound—this time it was like to a rustle of silken garments.

A quarter past twelve!

The safe door closed; the table, save for a couple of books, bare as one's naked hand—and—the room was empty!

On the floor, by the table-leg is a half sheet of white paper, once folded, with, scrawled upon it in a woman's handwriting:

"Dear Boy,—Rehearsal will be over by two-thirty to-morrow; fetch me, and we'll go to Richmond. Ever yours, Angela."

"Eric Ewart, Esq."

Also on the floor is a man's white cambric handkerchief—but before the half hour strikes—it is gone.

CHAPTER III.

"Mine own Familiar Friend."

Not a little public excitement was caused by the newspaper announcement—two days after the murder at Combe Court—that an extradition warrant for the apprehension of Eric Ewart had been applied for and granted.

It certainly seemed a slight thread upon which to hang a charge of parricide; a letter dropped and found on the scene of the crime.

But people remembered the old proverb concerning "great issues," and "little causes" and were, on the whole, disposed to believe that the son might have killed his father for the sake of the diamonds, which had disappeared.

That ninety-nine folks out of a hundred did not know the man sufficiently well to be absolutely sure that he could not have done this thing, was no argument in his favour with the general public. With the usual outsider's way of taking, and looking at things, the large majority were inclined to let the pros unduly weigh down the cons in the case.

Then it was whispered that a material witness for the prosecution was to be produced in the person of the intimate personal friend of the accused man's. What he would say, was, of course, only conjecture, but that it would be something startlingly sensational people were convinced.

What influenced Masterman Heath to proffer his testimony it is hard to say. That his action brought contumely and scorn upon him is certain, and by no means unnatural, for even a callous public hates an informer, be he gilt-edged, or fustian clad.

It was a letter, however, he received from his sister, that first made him to see himself as he really was. Not that he repented the step he was about to take, his own safety demanded it, for, as a matter of fact, Oonah's words but hardened him the more.

"You say," she said, "that you have proof of Eric's guilt; and that, in the interests of justice you intend proclaiming it in open court. At least one woman does not believe you—your own sister; the daughter of your mother, tells you that you lie; that, for your own purposes—your own wicked purposes—you are seeking by a false and perjured statement to sink your friend in order that you may swim. Should you do this; should one hair of Eric Ewart's head be hurt by any word of yours, from that moment I renounce you. Forgettng that we once lay upon the same breast, and drew the same milk, I will give you over to other mercy—for mine will be dead."

The letter was not signed, but it needed not Oonah's name at its foot to stamp its origin.

His inclination was to burn it, but a power which he could not resist, compelled him to retain it in his possession.

Within the fortnight, Eric Ewart arrived at Liverpool in charge of a "Yard" inspector. As he stepped, unironed, on to the same quay from which he had so recently embarked, Oonah, tear-eyed, but with a brave smile illuminating her face, pressed up to him. Officialism mildly protested, but gave way on the condition that the interview lasted but a moment.

In the shelter of the Customs shed he stood, with her hands holding his.

"My darling! this is good of you, but you must not stay here—you must not in any way be mixed up in this dreadful business. Of course you do not credit this cruelly absurd charge?"

"Credit it! No!—no!—no!—and a thousand times—no!—"

"Then all will be well! Mr. Saville!" (to the inspector) "will you so far oblige me as to let one of your men see Miss Heath safely on her road home."

The inspector would, and did. The trip from New York had awakened doubts in his mind, though as yet he could not formulate or explain them.

"Good-bye, then, dear! I shall be in London nearly as soon as you are."

"You must not, Oonah! You must not! You must leave me to bear this alone."

"And you must leave me to do—as I cannot but do. Good-bye!"

"Good-bye!"

The preliminary examination did not occupy much time. Two formal remands, and the unhappy young man was committed for trial.

The prosecution did not call their principal witness, Masterman Heath, during the magisterial proceedings; they simply proved the finding of the body in the safe; the way in which death had been inflicted, and the finding of the incriminating letter.

H. T. Johnson's new serial begins next week.

The letter was read; Eric's protest that it was not his; had never been written to, or received by him, and that he was altogether unacquainted with anyone of the name of Angela, being duly recorded. He was, however, advised to reserve any such defensive statements for the day of his trial.

* * * * *

On the day of committal, in a disreputable haunt of Chinese seamen, situate in one of the narrow streets round about the Home for Asiatics, in the West India Dock Road, Ming-Ho, Masterman Heath's quondam body-servant, who had been utterly lost sight of ever since the night of the murder, might have been seen calmly lying on a bunk-bed, smoking, and thinking profoundly.

In one hand he held a cambric handkerchief, which every now and again he would survey with intense satisfaction.

It was noticeable that every time any one passed him, he shot his unoccupied hand under his pillow. On one such occasion he drew forth a packet wrapped in a dirty piece of linen. It was not very large, being about six to eight inches in length, by two inches in depth and breadth. It was tied round with strands of spun-yarn, such as sailors use.

By the loving way in which he looked at and stroked it, there was evidently something of value in the package.

Satisfied as to its present safety he returned it to its place under the pillow, and resumed his contemplation of the handkerchief.

"Ah! Massee Heath; you allee same clever man, but Ming-Ho, he beat you! he lick you—he makee you sweat."

Muttering this with variations, over and over again, he got tired of his occupation and rose up.

Taking the package from under the pillow, hiding it carefully in the breast of his jacket, and giving the wretched-looking Chinese proprietor of the place a small coin, he went out, setting his face westward.

In the dock of the old court at the Old Bailey, stands Eric Ewart, indicted for the murder of his father, General Ewart.

It was remarked by those in court, professional and others, that a man looking less like a parricide it would be hard to find.

Upright, honest-eyed, he faced his judge, who with the experience of a long lifetime spent in reading human derelicts, hesitated before placing this man in the category.

The procedure of a criminal trial is generally monotonous, and reported in somewhat dreary reading. The chief events in connection with this particular case, therefore, will be all that it is needful to transcribe.

The evidence taken before the magistrate having been recapitulated, the name of Masterman Heath was called.

As he stepped into the box, he kept his eyes turned away from the prisoner.

But the counsel for the prosecution's first question compelled him to look round.

"Do you know the prisoner at the bar?"

Slowly lifting his eyes to a level with Eric's, he strove to speak. But it was as the convulsive moving of the lips of a dumb man. Not a sound came.

"Witness," said the judge, "you hear the question: answer it."

Still Eric's eyes looked searchingly into his, paralysing the power in him of speech and connected thought.

White to ghastliness, his lips refused to utter the elaborate lie which he had come there to speak.

"My lord," said the prisoner's counsel, springing to his feet. "As the prosecution can make nothing of their witness, I wish, with your consent, to put a man into the box who has, within the last hour been arrested within the precincts of this court as an accessory before the fact in this case."

A five minutes consultation with the Treasury solicitor and the judge speaks.

"Stand down, witness; see that Masterman Heath does not leave the court. Now, Mr. Smith, call your King's Evidence."

Escorted by two policemen, Ming-Ho gets into the box. The saucer is broken, according to the Chinese custom of swearing a witness.

"You know the prisoner?"

"Yes, me know him."

"Where were you at twelve o'clock on the night of the 23rd of October?"

"In soldier man's room, allee same sleepy place."

"In the house where your master, Mr. Masterman Heath was staying—eh?"

"Yes."

"What were you doing in that room?"

"Me lookee round like—Me see what Massee Heath do."

"And what did he do?"

"Massee Heath, he lookee at dlimons with ol' soldier man."

"Well!"

"Then, Massee Heath, he knock old soldier man down; club 'im thloat."

"Well!"

"Then he take 'im body; puttee in wall, put bittee plaper on floor, an' go away."

"And you, what did you do?"

"Before the case proceeds further secure the person of Masterman Heath," said the judge.

"And you, what did you do?"

"Me pickee up hanklechief."

"This is it, my lord, and it bears the initials M.H."

* * * * *

That night, when released, Eric Ewart sits in a room in a quiet hotel near the river, with, as his companions, his sister Margaret, and the girl whose love for him will ever be tinged with a great sorrow; he realises for the first time the depth out of which he has come.

There are not many words between these three, for the thankfulness they each feel is too deep for words.

* * * * *

Masterman Heath never recovered the shock of his terrible but righteous exposure. He died before even the completion of the preparations for his trial.

* * * * *

Ming-Ho, King's Evidence, was returned to his native land as an undesirable addition to the population of this country, but he left behind him the little dirty packet containing the Ewart diamonds. He had rung the changes when carrying the letter and parcel from Heath to his sister. The dastardly attempt to shift suspicion and risk by getting Oonah to take temporary care of his spoil, failed as we know. Oonah never can quite explain why she returned the packet, for then she knew nothing. It was an inspiration, and both Eric and she are to-day heartily thankful that it was born and acted upon.

The Golden Dwarf

A Sensational Romance of To-Day.

By R. NORMAN SILVER.

Author of "A Keeper of Secrets," "Hate, the Destroyer," "A Daughter of Mystery," etc.

OTTO HARE gnashed his teeth. "Curse you!" he said; "why do you remind me of Esther Carew when I am leaving her, perhaps for ever? You promised to be my fairy god-father; I told you you would prove an evil demon. Why did I ever meet you, why did I ever espouse your fiendish science!"

"Ha-ha," laughed Kraft, as he descended, "I was destined to play Mephistopheles to your Faust, my friend. And lo, I vanish, like my prototype, ha-ha!"

With a second rumble of sardonic laughter he went down the steps and they heard him grope into the corridor below. As he did so Michael Brasher and the two constables sprang from the upper section of the spiral staircase to the concrete floor and darted towards the Golden Dwarf.

"I arrest you, Otto Hare," said the Inspector, "on the charge—" he hesitated; on what accusation was he to apprehend the strange person before him? It would have taken a better lawyer than Mr. Brasher to formulate the exact offence Otto Hare's and Joseph Kraft's ghastly researches amounted to. Doubtless it would have been sufficient to accuse him of harbouring Brian Dering, knowing the child to have been stolen. But Felix Dering had frankly asserted that neither Kraft nor Hare was acquainted with the identity of their victim!

In the midst of the Inspector's perplexity, Felix Dering strode forward. "On the charge of being concerned," he supplemented, "with one Joseph Kraft, in compassing the death of Sir Christopher Dering. I accuse him, Inspector, and I demand that he be arrested on that charge and on no other."

A shrill cry broke from the Golden Dwarf's lips and his sallow skin blanched with fear.

"That!" he shrieked; "never, never!—I will not be taken I tell you. You shall not take me—I will die as he died!"

Otto Hare, trembling and unnerved, doubled back, leapt to the purring dynamos, and dropped his hands on the copper brushes that were picking up the tremendous current required for more than half a score of arc lamps. His tiny body was thrown into the deadly circuit, the huge voltage passed through brain and muscle, and, with a convulsive shudder, the Golden Dwarf terminated his existence. The corpse remained a stiff and galvanised shape, upright beside the dynamos. The on-lookers were paralysed with astonishment.

While they stood, lost in horror, the silky tones of Joseph Kraft made themselves audible. He was singing a snatch of his favourite song—the song of Mynheer Jacob van Artevelde.

"'We all must ride outlandt,'" rolled the smooth bass,

"'And drive our way to Bruges town,
Or Brussels in Brabant.'"

The song halted, the door of the corridor below was bolted sharply, and the German's voice called up the trap a guttural sentence in his own tongue.

When the words fell on the ear of his countryman Zorn, that gentleman took one leap in the direction of the outer exit.

"A thousand fiends," he whispered back; "the doctor has been connecting his mines. He has half a dozen laid in readiness for such an emergency. Fool that I was to forget. Out of this, all of you, if you would not be blown to the stars."

Michael Brasher was brave, but he ran, Archibald Geddes was no coward, yet he hurried. As for the two constables, they were already crossing the threshold, apparently pursuing Zorn, in reality fleeing for their lives.

Felix Dering followed—more leisurely. He judged himself safe while Kraft tarried. From the inner doorway he saw the German rise from the trap, push the staircase into position, and turn about to reach his cage of birds.

"Now, Otto," he exclaimed, "we will be off."

The phrase failed on his lips—he was glaring at the body of the Golden Dwarf. "Sakerment!" he cried; "Otto, what have you done?"

He was answered in a ringing voice—the voice of Felix Dering. "Cheated the gallows," Kraft was told, "but you shall not."

Felix flung himself upon Kraft, and young, athletic, resolute, forced the giant German out into the open air. The night was cool and quiet—the yellow glow from the tower portal swept across it like a band of sunshine.

Joseph Kraft realised his strength as he was thrust down the hill. With a colossal effort he flung off his captor's grip.

"My birds!" he cried; "my birds—I have forgot them; they will be killed."

He dashed back and re-entered the tower. Suddenly there came a sullen roar, a blinding flash of flame, the ground felt as if it had split beneath the feet of Felix Dering, and the entire observatory of the Golden Dwarf shot skyward in a hurtling mass. Joseph Kraft's mines, for some mysterious reason, had exploded prematurely.

The shock projected Felix down the green slope into some underwood, and he pitched upon a soft yet bulky object—the form of Michael Brasher.

"Got him," gasped the Inspector and hung on like a vice.

Surely that's your photo on page 466?

"Am I to be rearrested, then?" queried Felix, imperturbably. Brasher groaned.

"I thought you were Zorn," said the Inspector, struggling to breathe; "the beggar has escaped. What's become of Kraft?"

Felix caught a glimpse of the last fragments of the shattered tower and the secret laboratory as they rained back into the abyss carved by the unknown explosive of Joseph Kraft.

"He has expiated his crimes," was Felix Dering's answer; "or, rather, to be honest, he has fallen a victim to his one virtue!"

Michael Brasher stared, as he summoned his men to prosecute the search for the missing Prussian. The echoes of the explosion were still vibrating about them.

CHAPTER XLIV.

The Last Chapter.

"And you have known that all this time, Mr. Dering! But why not have acted on it. Surely you could have done something."

Felix Dering shook his head gravely as he took the scrap of paper which Archibald Geddes had been studying and laid it down on the library table beside the scratched riding-whip that had belonged to the dead Sir Christopher.

"It was not a proof," he said, "apart from confirmatory evidence. For that I was seeking. But not for a moment did the real explanation of the mystery enter my head."

The chemist's assistant reached to the slip again and scanned it thoughtfully by the wan radiance of the fading day. It was covered with some seven or eight short lines of capital letters divided by brackets. They read:

> [DON'T] EXPECT TO GET OUT OF [THIS > PLACE] ALIVE. IF NOT, [MY] DEATH IS > DUE TO [KRAFT. HARE] HANGS BACK
> BUT [KRAFT SAYS] OATH [OF SECRECY]
> OR DEATH. I WILL NE[VER BE A PARTY
> TO THEIR] VILE [PRACTICES.]

"The letters in brackets," added Felix, were at first illegible. The words they form fell, on the whip-handle, generally under one another, and had suffered from being ground into some gravelly substance. But, by the aid of your glass, I deciphered them. Originally I had thought that the K in the former occurrence of the name Kraft was an F, and directed my suspicions towards the man Foley."

"Sir Christopher must have become cognisant of the experiments being carried on at Wyresdale Park," commented Geddes, relinquishing the copy of the scratched lettering; "that accounts for their disposing of him. But why was Spencer kidnapped from the cell at the police-station. He was aware of nothing."

"He had said," observed Felix, "that he had seen a man like Sir Christopher on a led horse, that night near the cross-roads. Kraft must have feared that he might be able to identify the leader—doubtless Kraft himself."

"Then there only remains one question," pursued the Scotchman, "since your experiences in London solve the problem of Sir Brian's appearance at Wyresdale Park—and that is the manner of Sir Christopher's death. You noticed, of course, Mr. Hare's strange cry, 'I will die as he died.'"

"Yes," answered Felix; "it conjures up innumerable horrors, but it tells us nothing. Has Brasher any news of Zorn? He is probably the sole living repository of the dreadful secret."

"No," said Archibald Geddes; "the country has been scoured from end to end but without result. You have heard, I suppose, that Miss Garland has been released."

"By order of the Treasury, yes," was the reply. "Everything is believed against her, but my evidence of her confession to me goes for nothing in the absence of Neal, her brother, whose villainous epistle to Brasher contrived to implicate, so adroitly, me, the innocent, and her, the guilty. She is in the house now, I understand, packing her belongings. Lady Dering, who will neither judge nor acquit her, has refused to see her."

Geddes lifted his hat from a chair. "How is Sir Brian this evening?" he asked sympathetically.

"Failing fast," said Felix, and choked over the response. "He is dying of no particular affection. Confinement, cocaine, depression, and that cursed light."

The chemist's assistant ground his teeth. "It is horrible to think of," he muttered; "but I am sure Kraft was mad—he died to save those birds he meant to take away with him, yet he could torture little children."

"Science digs grim pitfalls for its votaries," rejoined Felix, heavily, and shook hands with his visitor.

Geddes coughed. "They're saying in the village," he ventured, "that Miss Carew and you are to be married quietly next spring. Mrs. Carew is putting it about in her own fashion. If it's not too melancholy a season on account of Sir Brian, I should like to congratulate you. Time was when I musunderstood you; now I think you're worthy of her, worthy of one another."

Felix smiled sadly. "She has come through much for my sake," he replied; "I am to make her mine at last. You and Miss Forester, I hear, are to become man and wife at an earlier date. I hope you will be happy."

The Scotchman wrinkled his brows. "If old Forester will either sign the pledge or drink himself to death in three months," he said morosely, "we'll be happy enough. Not otherwise. Good night to you, sir."

Felix rang, and Mr. Geddes was escorted out, a rather disconsolate Benedict-to-be. As the door closed behind him, Felix crossed to the further side of the room to look out at the waning afternoon—the autumn day had been stormy and was setting in a sullen calm. He opened the French window and stepped on to the terrace, lighting, as he did so, a cigar—that masculine comfort in griefs both large and small. Brian Dering was dying, and the heart of his cousin was sore, though the death of the child baronet meant to him rank and wealth.

He paced this way and that, lost in sorrowful reverie. Suddenly, as he neared the extremity of the terrace, a dark form rose from a clump of rhododendrons.

"Don't be alarmed, sir," it begged; "I want a word with you—for a good object. You'll be well advised to hear me out."

Felix stared—excited, yet incredulous. The figure before him was that of the Prussian, Johann Zorn, the colleague of Joseph Kraft in his infamous researches and the man whom the Derbyshire police-force had been hunting for a week or more. He was ragged, dirty, dishevelled, yet withal cool and self-possessed.

"If you summon help," said the Prussian; "you can only get me a term of imprisonment, for what your law would describe as 'cruelty to children.' Nothing else can be proved against me. Yet, if you will promise to aid me to get abroad, Mr. Dering, I will enable you to vindicate yourself against the slander which Dr. Kraft and Mr. Hare helped to circulate. I will tell you how your uncle died—by some singlar means, I gathered on that exciting evening, you had learned the identity of his murderers. Only I can inform you how he came by his end."

"What do you wish me to do?' asked Felix, perplexedly.

"I want money," said the other; "fifteen or twenty pounds will get me out of England. I have cheated your police so far and I will cheat them the rest. But I must wait till the pursuit has weakened, I must disguise myself, and bribe—a trifle. For these I must have money. I have tried to catch you alone for days, and now, when I had abandoned hope you appeared spontaneously before me."

Felix pondered. "Your explanation will be no use to me," he demurred; "it would not be evidence, except as a sworn confession from your supposed death-bed, or from your lips in court. The former is impossible, the latter would mean your arrest!"

Zorn wrung his hands. "Curse your law," he snarled; "then give me a sovereign or two and I will take my chance. Only, in return, you shall know how Sir Christopher Dering died. If you refuse I must fight you for my life."

Counting out half a dozen gold pieces on the stone balustrade of the terrace, Felix Dering indicated them with a gesture. "There they lie," he answered; "tell me your story and they are yours."

The Prussian stretched out a hungry palm, but withdrew it slowly, to begin his rapid narrative.

"Sir Christopher," he said, "being late that evening, rode across the park for a short cut and, doing so, came upon Dr. Kraft and I. We—we were burying one of the dwarfs—the original occupant of the blue cell in which Mr. Geddes found Sir Brian. He saw too much, was curious, and we took him into the tower, to discuss the situation the better, and sent for Mr. Hare from the house."

Zorn stopped. "I've been without food for twenty-four hours," he declared huskily; "give me a cigar."

Felix obeyed—with a feeling of profound revulsion. But he dare not lose the chance of probing the mystery that had so shadowed his happiness. The Prussian lit the Havana and sucked at it greedily.

"Your uncle," he proceeded; "would not hear reason—though Mr. Hare showed him all and explained the probable value to mankind of the researches the Doctor was making. He threatened to denounce us the moment he was free. As he knew not only of the experiments but that one of our subjects had succumbed we should be indicted for constructive murder—at least, so Dr. Kraft said. The Doctor decided that he must die. You will not believe that I tried to save him but I did. In vain. Dr. Kraft and Mr. Hare chloroformed him by force, and killed him—as an experiment—by an electric shock. Hence your post-mortem revealed nothing—the appearances of a skilful execution by electricity are those of suffocation; we German medical jurisconsults know that."

Zorn paused—to enjoy the flavour of his Havana; Felix wrestled with a violent inclination to strangle him.

"To lend colour to the idea of suffocation," went on the Prussian; "a handkerchief was tied over his mouth and nostrils and his skull was fractured by Dr. Kraft, as part of a suggestion of highway robbery. For this purpose his watch and jewellery, as well as his purse, were taken, and he himself, stiff in the early rigor of an electrical death, was mounted on his horse and conveyed to the cross-roads. The rest you know—it was because we feared that Spencer might have seen more than even rumour stated that we kidnapped him, Dr. Kraft and I, late one night, with the assistance of a borrowed ladder and a crowbar. I entered the cell, injected morphia, and passed him up to the Doctor outside."

The Prussian broke off in his whispering. A white figure showed itself at one of the French windows of the library, and a soft voice called into the dusk.

"Felix," it said: "is that your cigar-end I see?"

There was a tinkle of shifted coins, a crackle in the rhododendrons. Johann Zorn had gone and Esther Carew was advancing nervously along the terrace. Felix stepped forward—under the kindly shelter of the dusk—to clasp her in his arms. A moment they embraced silently, for it was not often they found themselves alone, and then Esther delivered a murmured message.

A Woman with a Bad Heart.

Miss Annie Spencer, of Highland Farm, Broadholme, near Saxilby, Lincolnshire, has told a sensational story to a Retford and Gainsboro' Times reporter. Here are the main facts as she related them, and from their perusal the wonderful effects of Chas. Forde's Bile Beans for Biliousness in all cases of debility, palpitation, and heart weakness will be gathered. Said Miss Spencer: "Just over five years ago I had an attack of brain fever. I got over it, however, but never got back my old health. Instead of feeling bright and well I felt heavy and depressed. Then I began to suffer from indigestion, palpitation, and general debility. My blood seemed to get out of order, and spots broke out on my face and forehead, as well as on my arms and breast. I consulted two of the best doctors in the district, and was told that my ailment was extreme debility as well as indigestion. No matter what I took to eat the effect was the same. Not only did it do me no good but it caused me terrible pain. Occasionally I had a sort of false appetite and took a violent fancy to some article of food. Yet when I had eaten it my suffering was terrible. The palpitation and heart trouble also caused me great pain and anxiety. So violent was it sometimes that I could hardly breathe, and I got very much afraid. In the end I became so weak that I was scarcely able to see anyone who visited me it put me so much about; and I was so fearfully debilitated that I had to take hold of the table to prevent myself from falling when I walked across the room. The doctor said he could not do anything more for me, and I gave myself up in despair. Somebody mentioned Chas. Forde's Bile Beans for Biliousness to me, and in the hope that they would do me a little good—for I really never expected them to cure me—I had some purchased. I had not taken the first box, however, before I found that I could eat better and with less pain afterwards. Of course having experienced that, I persevered with them, and the second box made a wonderful difference in me. Every day I got better and better, and when I had taken a few boxes I was entirely cured. Indigestion is now unknown to me, and I can eat and enjoy any food whatever. The heart trouble has gone also, and I can even run up the stairs without the slightest fear. The spots and pimples have quite disappeared, I have recovered my former strength, and instead of crawling about the house, of no assistance to anybody and a burden to myself, I can do any kind of work which falls to my share. All this I owe to Chas. Forde's Bile Beans, and I felt I must give a testimonial."

The above is no isolated example of the power of Charles Forde's Bile Beans for Biliousness. They are superior to all known medicines for cases of heart weakness, palpitation, indigestion, liver and kidney disorders, constipation, headache, debility, nervousness, anæmia, summer-end "fag" and "that tired feeling," female ailments, the after effects of influenza, pimples, face sores, and all blood impurities. All chemists stock them, or you may obtain them from the Bile Bean Manufacturing Co., 119 London Wall, E.C., by sending prices, one and three half-pence or two and nine.

"Brian is asking for you," she said; "can you come—at once?"

"At once!" repeated her lover, anxiously; "is there any change?"

"He—he is growing weaker every hour," faltered Esther. "Oh, Felix," she added, with a burst of tears, "how ever will Lady Dering bear it!"

Felix held the weeping girl to him as they went down the terrace. "You have conceived a strange attachment for Lady Dering," he remarked, trying to change the subject; "yet you have merely known her a few days—since she begged me to make her acquainted with you."

Esther dried her eyes. "She has suffered so," was her gentle answer; "first her husband and now her child. And she is quite young, not much older than I am; she told me this morning we must be sisters."

"And so you shall!" said Felix, as he led her in through the open window across the library and the hall, and thread the wide staircase, dim with the autumn evening. Side by side the two lovers went, forgetting their own new-found happiness in the grief of another woman and the pain of a dying child.

At a screened door they paused and entered. The apartment was Lady Dering's boudoir. Its high casements were ajar to the night air, a shaded lamp burned on the table by the bed—a lamp that a nurse, in the cool, picturesque costume of her clothes, was trimming deftly. Among the snowy linen of the couch lay Brian Dering, frail, wasted, the ghost of his former self. Over him leaned Stella Dering, her mouth set and an anguished gleam in her dark eyes.

"Is it Cousin Felix?" inquired the child, faintly.

"Yes, Brian," replied Felix: "you wanted me, so Miss Carew came to fetch me."

Brian held out one transparent hand. "I want you to make mother laugh again, Cousin Felix," he quavered; "she used to before father went away and came back—dead. You used to make her laugh a lot when it was a good day with her nerves, Cousin Felix. Get her to stop crying now and laugh instead. Father always said it was bad for her to cry so much. I have asked her to laugh a little, for me, but she won't."

He spoke slowly and with long pauses for breath between the words. Felix Dering turned away, overcome. But Stella Dering nerved herself with desperate resolution.

"I—I did laugh, darling, last night," she said, gathering the child into her arms; "I dreamt you were not a boy any longer, Brian, but a tiny rosy cloud floating up in the sky. And while I watched it it got thinner and thinner and then vanished. And I laughed to think how silly it all was!"

The laughter that Brian had asked for broke from her lips—a ripple of clear laughter, silver and bright as a chime of fairy bells. Esther clung to Felix, awed by that final triumph of mother-love over a nature usually so weak and hysterical.

Brian glanced up at his mother. "What a funny dream!" he murmured; "but I'm glad it made you laugh—you do laugh so prettily, mother."

He closed his eyes and lay against her. For a while he seemed to sleep, and the watchers stood silently about him. Minutes passed away—in the hall below a cuckoo clock marked the hour in a series of gay calls. Suddenly Brian started up.

"Not the blue light again!" he shrieked. "please, please, not the blue light!" He fell among his pillows, panting—his pale cheeks grew florid, his delicate nostrils dilated, he clutched convulsively at his throat. The nurse snatched a glass from the table and put it to his lips; the brandy only wetted the childish mouth. The head dropped back—the little heart had failed. Brian Dering was dead.

Stella Dering flung herself upon the body, white and tearless. Esther would have stolen to her, but the nurse checked the motion. "Let her be," she whispered; "words are cruel now."

Felix made a silent gesture of assent, and side by side Esther and he moved from the room. For long afterwards they could conjure up once more its tragic lights and shadows; the dead child, the stricken mother, the gleaming lamp, the open windows, and beyond, the sullen, yet magnificent, sky of passing storm.

As they stepped into the corridor without, a dark form went by—the cloaked figure of Judith Garland. They shrank from her, but she heard their footfalls and turned upon them a lowering countenance, cruel, vindictive, beautiful.

From the high oak gallery of the great staircase they saw her cross the hall, and, escorted by a disdainful maid, slink into the waiting brougham. A rattle of wheels and the sound of a closing door marked her final disappearance from Dering House.

* * * * *

So did Judith Garland—in the moment that her worst deed found its terrible and unlooked-for consummation—bid adieu to Wyresdale. Nor was she ever known to set foot in the quiet village where her ill-fated and unscrupulous passion had played so disastrous a part. Had she revisited the place a few years later—instead, as rumour had it, of joining her brother, his disreputable partner, and a certain Johann Zorn, on the Continent—she would have discovered how rapidly time can heal even the breaches made by violence and treachery.

She would have seen Sir Felix Dering, no longer an object of suspicion to his neighbours, but liked and esteemed by half a county. She would have seen Esther Carew, now Lady Dering, a girl no more, but a woman, and the graceful sharer of her husband's political ambitions. She would have seen Stella, Lady Dering, absorbed in the education of a new Brian, the first-born of Esther and Felix, and almost believing it her own.

She would have seen a reformed Caleb Forester, a melancholy Mrs. Carew, a resigned Michael Brasher.

She would have seen Archibald Geddes and his wife thriving in the Wyresdale Pharmacy, Ted Spencer and Barbara prospering on the Dering estate. She would have seen a new maid at Dering House, one Louisa, who is learning not to drop her aspirates or the heels of her slippers, but to be smart and merry and to blush at the appearance of Inspector Brasher, who returns the compliment with interest.

She would have seen a new branch of the Hares at Wyresdale Park—a branch that is simple and hospitable, though immensely rich. She would have seen the hill, where once stood the observatory with its subterranean annex, planted with firs. Had she penetrated to the centre of this green grove she would have seen a granite monolith, engraved with initials and a date. The initials are those of Otto Hare's name; the date that of his death. On another facet of the monument is the inscription "Also J. K." Beneath lie the dismembered remains of the German physician and his strange ally, the Golden Dwarf.

Short Stories That . . . . . . Make You Laugh.

We devote every week space in Short Stories to pithy, humorous anecdotes similar to those which appear in these columns. A prize of £1 1s. will be sent to the reader who submits the best storyette this week, and a P.W. penknife to each of those whose attempts are used. The anecdotes may be either original or selected; in the latter case, the source MUST be stated. Attempts must reach the Storyette Editor, Short Stories Office, Henrietta Street, Strand, London, W.C., by Monday, October 14th. Post-cards only, please. The prize of £1 1s. has been awarded this week to Mr. J. R. Trinder, of 14 Coleshill Street, Birmingham, whose contribution is denoted by a star thus.*

At a late election in a country parish a cart might have been seen perambulating the district. On one side of a huge board were the words, "Vote for Thomas Jones"; on the other ran the legend, "Poll Early." A villager was asked by his vicar whom he intended to vote for. "Wol, sir," deliberately observed the old man, who had apparently only read one side of the cart, "I allays goes for the ladies, so I shall vote for 'Poll Early.'"

A train on one of our Southern railways, whilst proceeding between two country stations, came to a standstill. The guard went up to the driver and asked him what was the matter. "Cow on the line," he replied. The cow was removed and the train went on its journey. After proceeding some distance, it again stopped. The guard, who was by this time getting impatient, rushed up once more and asked what caused the delay. "Cow on the line," the driver said. "What! Another cow?" "No. Same cow."

*He went into a Birmingham hotel, and ordered soup. He looked just the kind of man who would be difficult to please, and it was with fear and trembling that the waiter placed the dish of really delicious soup before him. "I can't eat this soup!" said the customer a few moments later. The waiter took it away, and brought soup of another kind. "I can't eat this!" snarled the customer. The waiter hurriedly brought a third dish. "I cannot possibly eat this soup!" exclaimed the customer, in an aggravatingly loud tone, which could be heard by everyone in the room. The waiter, by this time quite furious, called the proprietor, and explained the case. "Why can't you eat this soup, sir?" demanded the proprietor angrily. "Because," quietly responded the customer, "I have no spoon."

A young mill-hand, having lost his sweetheart through his own hot-headed folly, first threatened to commit suicide, and then became vulgarly insistent in his demands for the return of the presents he had given her. "What good will they be to you if you're goin' to drown yourself in t' mill-pond?" she scoffed. "Never you mind, I want them back," he said evasively. "Very well, I'll see that you have them," the girl reluctantly agreed. But five days passed, and the young man still bemoaned the loss of the forfeited trinkets. Once more he requested their return. "Oh, lad, I wish you'd stop worryin' me," sighed the girl, anxious by now for a reconciliation. "I've given t' presents up long since. They're waiting for you at t' bottom o' t' mill-pond, tied up in a red handkerchief; you can't miss but see 'em when you jump in." Then the humble young man apologised, and the quarrel was patched up in the old sweet way.

A little girl, aged nine, called her father to her bedside the other evening. "Papa," said the little diplomat, "I want to ask your advice." "Well, my dear, what is it about?" "What do you think it will be best to give me on my birthday?"

Mr. Kirkland: "And why do you think, Mr. Dunley, that the world is better now and more beautiful than it was thirty-five years ago?" Mr. Dunley (who is after his sweet daughter): "Because—because you were not in it then." Papa Kirkland's objections to the young man have been overridden.

A young lady was teaching her class of girls in the Sunday school, and striving to impress upon them the beauty and desirability of the great Christian virtues. "Yes," she said, "Truth, and Faith, and Meekness, are all good, but what is the one thing we must all especially strive after, the one great thing necessary for our welfare and happiness?" "'Usbands, miss," answered a little girl promptly.

"I hear," said the reporter to the manager of a railway noted for the unpunctuality of its trains, "there was an accident on your line last night." "Oh, do you?" was the sarcastic reply. "Yes." "Do you know anything about it?" "Only that it happened to the train which was due here at 8.15." "That train came in to the minute, sir." "Are you sure of that?" "Of course!" "That must have been the accident referred to." And the reporter dodged out safely.

A schoolboy's essay on water is quoted by a contemporary. One or two of the writer's ideas upon the subject are strikingly novel. For instance, he divides all water into four sub-headings—rain water, soda water, holy water, and brine. "Water," he continues, "is used for a good many things. Sailors use water to go to sea on. Water is a good thing to fire at boys with a squirt gun, and to catch fishes in." But the strangest of all uses for water is this: "Nobody," he says, "could be saved from drowning if there wasn't water to pull them out of."

While a certain battalion was marching from the camping ground to the railway station, en route for home, last summer, a rather corpulent sergeant, who wore an exceedingly large helmet, was much disgusted by several ragged urchins, who kept darting between the ranks and compelling him to "break step." At last, losing all patience, he sharply boxed one little sinner's ears, and shouted, "Take that, you young demon, and clear off!" "Garn, yer fat old buster, an' mind who yer hittin'!" yelled the youngster in reply, adding, as he pointed to our stout comrade's very ample headgear: "Look hear, old red tub, if yer hits me again, I'll report yer to th' War Office for runnin' away with a tent!"

Lady: "Is this celery fresh?" Dealer: "Yes'm." "Real fresh?" "Yes'm." "Just in?" "Yes'm." "Is it crisp?" "Yes'm." "Are you sure it is all right?" "Yes'm." "Where did you get it?" "From a market gardner, mum." "To-day?" "Yes'm." "This morning?" "Yes'm." "How much is it?" "Sixpence a bundle." "Isn't that rather high?" "Not at this season." "I've got it here lately for less." "That was small and rather green." "Can you send it up?" "Yes'm." "In time for dinner?" "Oh, yes'm." "Just break off a piece and let me try it." "Yes'm. Here is some." "Humph! It isn't nice at all. It's withered." "Well, mum, it's a good while since you asked if it was fresh"

DO YOU GOLF?

If you do, there is an article in the October number of THE LADY'S MAGAZINE entitled "Women on the Links," which will interest you considerably.

IF YOU DON'T GOLF

Perhaps you know someone who does, and they will thank you for drawing their attention to this article on the "Ancient and Royal Game." It is illustrated with photographs of many notable players.

THIS IS NOT ALL.

In addition to this there are numberless other attractive features in THE LADY'S MAGAZINE for October. Under the title of "Painting Puppies" there is an article giving many anecdotes of Mr. Cecil Aldin, the eminent caricaturist, and his puppy models. It is profusely illustrated from original oil paintings and sketches.

STATUES TO WOMEN

Are somewhat rare, but those in the United Kingdom form the subject of an attractive article, fully illustrated with photographs.

"CHILD CRIMINALS,"

By Annesley Kenealy, is a most interesting account of Bedford Prison, where the young Hooligan is taught to become a law-abiding citizen.

A large instalment of Mrs. B. M. Croker's serial . . . . . .

"THE CAT'S PAW,"

In addition to a number of stories and storyettes, will be found in this number.

Has your photo appeared yet? Is it on page 466? Better look, hadn't you? In case, you know. For to miss a five-pound note would be a pity, wouldn't it? You might regret it for years. It might even keep you from sleeping o' nights. So in order to avert all such eventualities turn at once to page 466, and satisfy yourself. If your photo is there, why drop us a postcard, in accordance with the conditions, and then any morning you may wake up and find yourself the possessor of five pounds more than you had the previous day. And even if your portrait isn't in this number, don't despair, for it may be in next week or the week after.

Once again I want to draw your attention to the fact that next week's number will contain the opening chapters of Mr. Henry T. Johnson's New Serial Story, entitled

"Dead to the World."

If you enjoy a good, healthy, thrilling story, fascinating from the first line to the last, here is your chance.

Advice to Readers on Various Matters.

(Replies to Correspondents.)

You ask me, "Anxious," if I can tell you of a hair dye that will dye your red-brown hair a light brown, as you are going into business after Christmas, and want to change the colour if you can.

As far as I know, there is no really reliable hair-dye in the market which will answer the purpose you require. Take my advice and leave your hair as it is; there is no such beautiful hair as a real red-brown. Surely it cannot interfere with your business. I am glad you like Short Stories.

"A. Z." is astonished to find such a number of careless people in the world. He has recently come across some statistics dealing with property left in railway carriages, and he sends them to me. "In the course of a single month 13,848 railway travellers part company with their boxes, 10,136 lose sight of their bags and portmanteaux, 13,380 leave behind their umbrellas and sticks, 10,217 involuntarily deprive themselves of articles of clothing, 1,333 forget their hat-cases, 2,914 their hampers, 3,344 their purses, jewellery, and books, and 3,750 their parcels. These articles, together with 8,391 entered as sundries, raise the number of waifs and strays upon our railways to 67,313 a month."

It is curious to note that this last item of "sundries" includes a number of "babies." Fancy a woman forgetting her baby!—but there, I expect it was the brute of a husband who was responsible. Men are so careless, especially when babies are concerned.

C. T. asks if it is true that some of our pleasantest perfumes are derived from substances which in themselves possess most disagreeable odours?

This is so. Musk is obtained chiefly from the musk-deer, and is contained in a fleshy bag about the size of a hen's egg. The dried musk in each bag averages about one-third of an ounce, and is worth a sovereign in the market. The odour of new musk is so powerful that the dealers are forced to cover their nostrils with thick cloths while inspecting the bags or "pods." This extraordinary perfume is said to retain its pungency after exposure to the air for a hundred years. Ambergris is a morbid secretion of the sperm whale. It imparts a delicate odour to perfumes, but its smell is very offensive when in its crude state. The oil of pine-apples is elaborated from sugar and putrid cheese; and the loathsome fluid produced during the manufacture of whisky, and known as fusel oil, is by one particular mode of treatment made to yield the fragrant oil of pears, by another process oil of apples, and by other carefully-devised methods the essential oil of grapes and oil of cognac.

In answer to "Player," I certainly think that chess may be entitled to the distinction of being the most ancient game extant. It appears to have been invented in China or Hindostan, whence it found its way into Persia. The Arabians were very partial to it; and, according to some authorities, the Crusaders learnt it of them, and thus introduced it into England. But others date the time chess was known in this country to a much earlier period. Bishop Etteric relates that when he obtained admission to Canute the Great, about midnight, upon some urgent business, he found the King and his courtiers engaged at play, some at dice and others at chess. Another author supposes the game to have been known at the Conquest, from the circumstance of the Court of Exchequer—so called from its having a chequered cloth on the table of the same design as a chess-board—being then established. As a proof that a knowledge of this game was formerly considered a valuable accomplishment, it may be mentioned that there are no fewer than twenty-six English families which have chess-boards and chess-rooks emblazoned on their arms.

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

"87 Alexandra Road, Norwich, October 19th, 1896.

Gentlemen,—In reference to Trilene Tablets, I may say that my wife found the greatest possible benefit from the use of them; their action was rapid, and exceeded our utmost expectations, as they were also most beneficial to the respiratory organs. My wife was many years growing so stout, but although the disease was, I consider chronic, the Tablets soon reduced the same completely. You have our united thanks, and if I can do anything to promote your interests I will freely use my utmost endeavours to do so.

"Yours faithfully, J. R. CANHAM."

Mrs. DARNLEY SMITH, Landscove Vicarage, Ashburton, writes: "Trilene Tablets have reduced my weight very much. I am so much lighter in every way, and better in health."

COUNTESS SECKENDORFF, of Berlin, writes: "The Tablets greatly benefited me personally, and I am recommending them to friends."

MISS CHATTERTON, 7 Salisbury Villas, Banstead, Surrey, says: "I weighed 12st. 8lb., but am now 11st., and getting much better."

Nurse CROUCHER, at Mrs. Bennett's, 14 Buckleigh Road, Streatham, says: "I lost 9lb. from the box I took."

"77 Hindhill Street, Heywood, February 5th, 1898.

"Gentlemen,—I have not quite finished the box of Tablets and am 21lb. lighter. The change is great, and several friends are beginning the treatment, which not only reduces fat but strengthens rheumatic joints—such has been the case with me.

"Yours sincerely, M. A. HEYWOOD."

Mrs. D. BURTON, of Silverleigh, Tunbridge, writes: "I am very pleased with difference in size, my friends all telling me how much thinner I am getting."

Miss NORTHLEDGE, The Laurels, Riseholm Road, Lincoln, says: "The Tablets reduced me 1st., so that I am cured."

"West Cornforth, Ferryhill.

Mr. WM. USHER says: "A sister of mine, who was 17st., was greatly reduced by your Tablets to 15st."

Extract from The Lady, September 3rd, 1896: "Many stout persons have suffered untold agonies in unavailing efforts to reduce their bulk, either by means of severe dieting, or by taking more or less deleterious drugs; but all these pains would have been saved if they had only invested in a box of the wonderful Trilene Tablets, which are quite harmless, containing neither mercury, arsenic, nor any other mineral poison, and which are an unfailing cure for obesity."

MRS. T. BOSTON, Cambridge Villas, Clifford Street, South Wigston, says: "I congratulate you on your wonderful Tablets. My weight at first starting them was 11st. 7lb., and I now weigh 9st. 11lb."

Mr. MCLEOD, 44 Calside, Paisley, writes: "I have been cured. If you want to know my weight now, it is 10st.; reduced 1st. 8lb., and I am quite content."

A. M. PRATT, of Ongar House, Ongar, says: "My weight is so much reduced it is unnecessary to take more. The reduction of weight was from 12st. 6lb. to 10st. 4lb."

Mrs. H. COX, 28 Watnall Road, Hucknall Torkard, writes: "The box of Tablets has reduced my weight 1½ stones."

Mr. WALKER, 236 London Road, Hazelgrove, Stockport, says: "I have used one box and am 14lb. lighter. Send another soon as possible."

Col.-Sergt. WHITTLE, of East Lancashire Regt., Burnley, Lancs., says: "A man in our regiment in 1891 lost several stone from taking your Tablets."

Mrs. E. ALEXANDER, 102 Dixon Street, New Swindon, says: "They have reduced me quite 2 stone, and I am now quite cured."

Mrs. W. A. RADFORD, of High Street, New Brinsley, Eastwood, writes: "Before taking Tablets I was 46 inches round waist, now I am 32 inches. I hope soon to be 23. I could hardly move or get up, now I get about easily. Please use this as you wish."

Countess FURSTENBERG, of Germany, writes: "They act speedily and well."

The Princess LIECHTENSTEIN writes from Landsberg, Austria: "Pray send me your excellent Tablets."

Mrs. WEAVER, of Greenpits Villa, Ross, Hereford, writes: "I am reduced from 13st. 8lb. to 11st. You may use this if you like."

Mrs. CROSSLEY, of Rose Hill, Torver, nr. Coniston, says: "There is a very decided diminution of fat. I am delighted, and cannot speak too highly in praise of Tablets. My heart is better, and I can breathe so much easier. You may refer to me as often as you like."

Lady C. CONRAD writes from Wiesbaden: "I am very pleased with your Tablets."

Mrs. TAYLOR-ROBINSON, of Tweed Green House, Whalley Range, Manchester, says: "I feel so much lighter and better since taking your Tablets, and am so much thinner that I hardly recognise myself."

Miss A. LONG, of 9 South Parade, Waterford, writes: "Your Tablets have reduced me 14lb."

Miss A. DAWSON, 62 Orchard Street, Weston-super-Mare, says: "Glad to say the Tablets have sufficiently reduced me. I shall always recommend them."

Miss F. L. BALL, 47 Chesterfield Road, St. Andrews, Bristol, writes: "I am quite cured through your Tablets. They improve the figure, and greatly relieve shortness of breath."

Miss PATIENT, of Woodberry, Theydon Bois: "Feel great benefit from Tablets. I have lost 2st., and am sufficiently reduced."

Mrs. DREW, of 1 Bellevue Gardens, The Nursery, Devizes, writes: "I took Tablets some years ago; they soon reduced me and I have not got stout since. Send me a box for my mother."

CHAPTER I.

THE MAN HUNT.

"WE'VE got him now! Stand or I'll fire!" shouts the warder first in the flight of the man hunted.

But the figure in drab presses on, panting, distressed, done up as he is.

"Stand!" another warder calls, but the quarry staggers on through the wet long grass.

"There's the railway—he'll be getting on to the line, then Lord knows what might happen!"

"Let him have it then!"

Bang! The mists quiver, shaken by the rifle shot. The man who is making so desperate a dash for freedom staggers three more paces, then falls.

"Got him!" growls the warder, ejecting the cartridge, "His own fault!" Then, themselves a trifle blown and weary, they ease up a bit.

Which is a mistake. For a miss is as good as a mile, and though the bullet whistled within an inch of the prison-breaker's ear, it is exhaustion, not the bullet, that sends him down. He lies there in the long grass panting like a hard-pressed hare, listening to the shouts behind him nearer and nearer—terribly near.

Raising his head, he scans the landscape.

And something catches his eye. A speck that grows into a gleam. There in front of him, and, like the shouts behind him, drawing nearer—nearer.

And more quickly even than the shouts—on it comes swerving round the curve of the line.

Suddenly the hunted man springs up and dashes on again, and a startled shout goes up from the man-hunters.

There he goes straight for the dip on to the line, reaches the grassy bank, lies breathless a moment at the foot of the rails amid a clump of furze and scrub. Steadily that disc of light draws nearer—nearer, though the train slows down at this bend to half speed, the engine clanks and rattles past. Concentrating all his remaining strength into one desperate final effort, the hunted man clambers up the wooden rails, a frantic leap, he has clutched the bar of an open carriage window, hangs on to it like grim death as the train carries him along. For a moment he dangles helpless, then his toes find the footboard—a little later he fumbles for the carriage door handle.

The rest is easy. The train quickens up, swirls round the bend, the man-hunters come panting up—too late.

"I'll swear I hit him!" the warder who fired declares, more to console his vanity than for any other purpose.

"Wonder if he got across the line!" exclaims another.

"No," says a third emphatically, "he couldn't have got across in front of that train. Let's go down and look if he's been under it."

Meantime, the quarry who has so far baffled them, lifting up the arm rests, stretches himself on the luxurious cushions of the first-class carriage into which he has scrambled, for a while dead to the world, caring nothing, if, indeed, he knows anything beyond that he is as done up as a man need be. At last, however, the shrill scream of the engine whistle reminds him that, if for the moment free, he is by no means scot free. How is he to rid himself of his broad arrow branded garb, he vaguely wonders? But for the present this is a secondary matter, a more immediate crisis has to be faced.

They are nearing a station—who knows what may be awaiting him there—though his pursuers will hardly have had enough time to get back to the previous station and wire his escape, even if they knew the exact manner of it.

Anyway, out of abundance of caution, he dives under the seat just as the train dashes by the Claverton Junction signal-box, and, lying there in hiding, awaits events.

"Ding—ding—ding! Fast train for Euston!" But what a while they seem to be taking their seats; will the doors never cease banging, porters and guards never cease shouting, luggage trollies never cease rumbling—is the train ever going to start for that London they proclaim as its destination? So the escaped convict wonders lying there under the seat holding his breath, trying to hush the very beating of his heart.

At last the rumbling, the trundling, and the banging die away—the shouting changes to "Take your seats," then to "Stand aside there," as the guard's whistle trills.

Thank the stars! at last—at last the train is moving and they have left this carriage and the prison-breaker lying under its seat alone.

Then that shout, "Stand back!" rings out louder than before.

"I tell you I must catch it," a voice exclaims; "confound you! I will catch it!"

The handle clicks, the door swings open, the convict hears the sound of a scramble, then a substantial form flings itself on the seat above him.

CHAPTER II.

Exchange This Time Is Robbery.

"Phew! that was a close shave, mustn't do that again, not worth it—lots of trains—only one life."

Long afterwards the prison-breaker remembered that —"Only one life."

The newcomer sits back perspiring freely and panting heavily.

"Fool I was—to run like that—down the platform—after what Doctor Hall told me too—nuisance having to change—phew!"

He is so intent on mopping his shiny forehead, unbuttoning his coat and waistcoat, and fanning himself that he is oblivious of that set, determined face looking up at him from under the seat, of the dark eyes fixed on him with baleful concentration.

The man peering from under the seat is taking stock of him. Out of condition clearly—weak heart probably —he notes the substantial though not ostentatious jewellery—the fine linen—the good well-cut clothes. What would that long light overcoat not be worth to him now, and that soft felt hat? Fellow passenger is evidently a new arrival from abroad, passenger from Liverpool no doubt, changing at Claverton to catch the express.

He is badly blown, he'd be an easy handful to tackle —the sooner he's tackled the easier. Suddenly, swiftly a dark shadow stands between the newcomer and the light of the carriage window.

His breath comes and goes quicker than ever.

"Who are you—what's your game? Ah, I see—you're a convict; you've broken prison!"

He makes a dash for the communicator, but the other is too quick, has him by the throat, forces him back upon the seat.

With a rattle and a clatter the train plunges into a tunnel—as it were into the bowels of the earth—and now the prison-breaker has two hands at his victim's throat!

After a while the rattle ceases as though the train were a live thing and content to be again out under God's sky and in His open air.

The convict is looking at something lying down there against the opposite door—lying there quite still. He has got his heart's desire—that long, light overcoat rests on his shoulders now; the substantial jewellery besides a purse, a pocket book, and other things are in his pocket, the pockets of the garments he has stripped from the murdered man.

He has done his work very thoroughly, desperately, and deliberately—with that attention to detail which stamps the master of his craft. For instance, the inert leaden arms have been forced into the sleeves of the broad arrow-marked tunic, the exchange has been carried out even to the boots, which he has just finished lacing on the stiffening feet, so that only an insignificant bundle of surplus apparel remains there on the cushions.

Glancing through the window he sees his chance. The train has pulled up on the viaduct spanning the wide river Dass—only a low parapet with an iron rail, and there beyond stretches the silvery bosom of the river, now beginning to reflect the stars.

The convict opens the carriage door—lifts the inert form lying there so still. He is used to handling his fellow creatures, and a man of giant strength as many have known to their cost. Exerting all that strength, he lifts the inert, unconscious form down on to the parapet, gives it a swing—there is a splash down there below! Then he springs back on to the footboard, back into the carriage, pitches the bundle of remaining clothes over the parapet, and, opening his victim's handbag, ransacks its contents as the train swirls on.

Searches also the contents of that pocket-book, so that long before Euston is reached he has learned his victim's name, something of his history, his destination, and full particulars of his luggage.

And when the train at last pulls up, punctual to the half minute, at Euston, the man, who two hours ago was almost hunted down, secures that luggage, has it piled on a four-wheeled cab, in which he drives to the hotel mentioned in the correspondence he discovered in the handbag.

Furthermore, he is deferentially ushered to the rooms engaged by the victim whose clothes he is wearing.

Also whose name he has assumed.

Yes, for this is his plan. Cyril Roylance has come into his own!

And Richard Seldon, alias Tiger Dick, is from henceforth dead to the world. He has thought it out—he will work it out.

CHAPTER III.

The Course of True Love Never Did Run Smooth.

"Now, Jack, dear, you must go!"

"No, no, not yet, a few more moments, Doris!" And Jack Branscombe looks so appealingly down into the grey eyes of the girl, whose dimpled hands he holds, that she finds it harder than ever to be imperious.

For it is not for nothing that throughout the countryside folks call him Handsome Jack, and his face is tender and his eyes just now are soft with the lovelight of two or three and twenty.

"But Jack, Jack, it is getting so late. Listen how impatiently your horse is stamping and pawing, and consider, too, how impatiently my father will be fuming and wondering at my absence."

"Now, dearest little girl, you know as well as anybody that your stern parent always takes his forty winks over his crusted port and choice Havana after dinner."

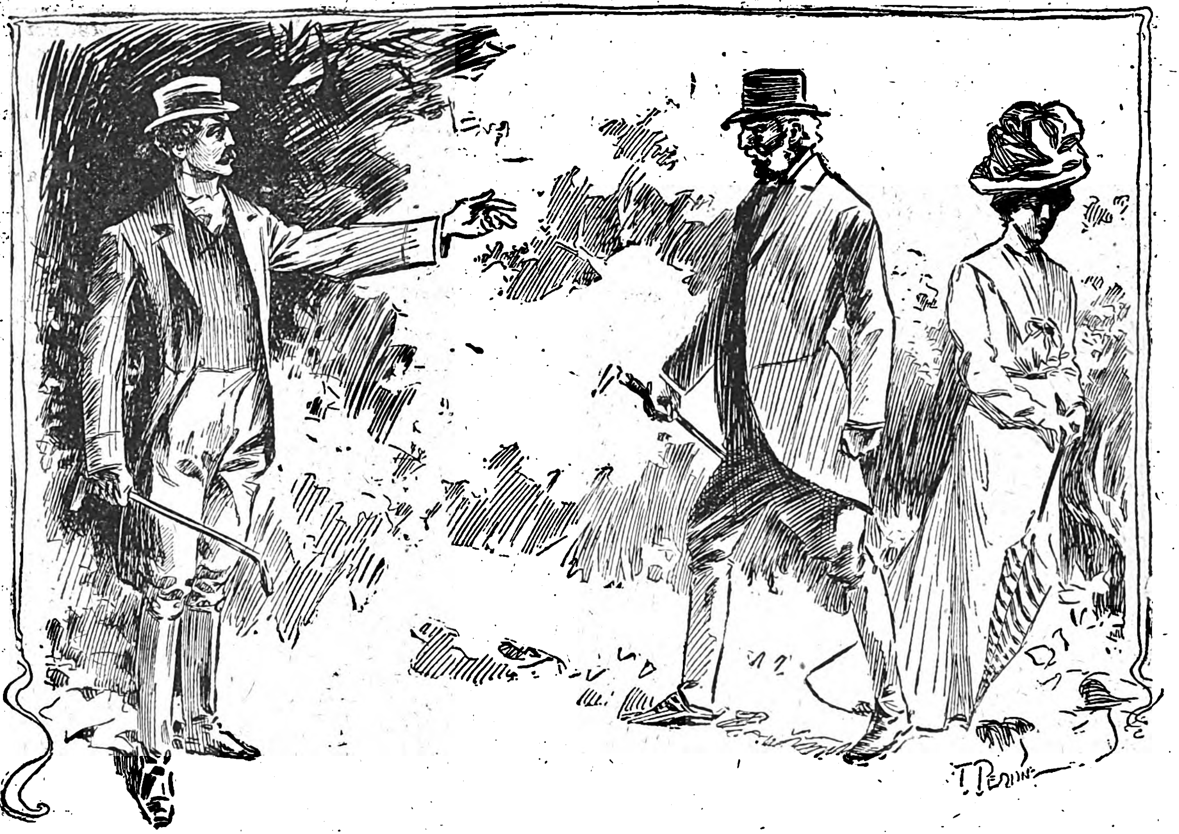
"And then wakes up, fuming and fretful till I go to the piano and play and sing him back into geniality, and I'm sure he's awake and fuming now, and if I don't go back directly he'll get into a dreadful temper and he'll stamp and shout and very likely bring his gout on again."

"And oh!" she went on, a grave look shadowing her pretty face, "if he only knew that I was here at the lych gate keeping tryst with you and that I'd made my way here through that very panel and passage where the Sir Harry Harcourt Dale of 1650 hid King Charles II., he'd be so angry that—that something terrible would happen. Jack, dear, I don't think we ought to meet again; what's the good of it?"

"The good of it! Why this, dear, that I love you and I can't live without you, and you know that you love me a little." And he looks down into the dove-like eyes that cannot deny the impeachment, nor can those rosy lips, for he seals them into consenting silence with a kiss.

And at that moment a heavy footstep crashes through the crackling bracken, and out of the shadow of the nut-bushes strides Harcourt Dale, the Squire of Dalehurst, his iron-grey whiskers bristling and his face flaming redder than ever with fury.

Turn to page 482 at once.



"No one in the world shall ever cry shame or blame on her. I love your daughter, sir!"

"You here!" he exclaims angrily to his daughter, and then with tenfold wrath to her companion, "and you. I've been suspecting something of this kind, only that I couldn't believe my child capable of deceit."

"But father," pleaded Doris, "Jack's way lies along the lane and—and—"

"And you," thundered the Squire, "made your way along the coppice. Shame on you, Doris Dale!"

"No, no!" cried Jack Branscombe, "no one in the world shall cry shame or blame on her. It is true I begged her, implored her, to meet me at the lych gate, vowed that if not here I would seek her elsewhere. I love your daughter, sir, with a love as pure and constant as a man ever cherished for a maid. It is well that the truth should be told."

"You love my daughter, you—Jack Branscombe, a mere yeoman farmer."

"A yeoman farmer," said the other proudly, "and my calling is my pride."

"Well then, once for all, let this folly cease. I forbid you to approach my daughter; I absolutely interdict any communication between you. Doris, return to the house; and you, sir, leave my premises, and remember, if you are found trespassing again upon them I will have you dealt with accordingly."

"Father!" the girl cried pitifully; then to the other, "Jack! Jack!" and the yearning tender tone she spoke in fell upon his heart like balm, soothing the angry passion the other's words had awakened, so that he forgot taunt and insult, remembering only that it was her father who stood before him.

"I will leave your premises," he said proudly, "but I tell you once again that I love your daughter, she loves me, and not all the fathers on earth, nor all the forces of earth shall stand twixt her and me. I know you scorn my pretensions. You, the landed squire, look down on me, the yeoman farmer whose ancestors have for years paid rent and fine for copyhold to yours. But I tell you that the day shall be when you shall repent your angry words, and you, who order me to leave your lands, shall call me across your threshold. Good-bye, Doris, and remember I love you and I trust you always."

Turning on his heel, he vaulted the lych gate, strode along towards where his horse awaited him, flung himself into the saddle, and soon, at a pelting trot, was speeding along the lanes to his farmhouse home.

He had spoken wildly, at random. He could not have given authority or foundation for his words, and yet, somehow, in his heart of hearts he felt confident that in due time his prophecy would be fulfilled.

Doris followed her father without a word through the nut coppice leading to the shrubberies, and so on across the level sward to the Grange. Once within doors her emotion overmastered her and she burst into tears. When the passion of her outburst was over, her father, with a quiet sternness unusual to him, said deliberately:

"Now understand me, this nonsense is at an end, once for all."

"But, father," she cried, "I love him, I shall never love anyone else."

An impatient exclamation broke from him, then in a somewhat kindlier tone he said:

"Listen to me, Doris. Romance affects people at your age and his, just as measles at an earlier period. A girl in your station of life has to consider other matters besides her inclination, property has its responsibilities as well as its privileges. And, by the bye, I have news for you. Cyril Roylance has returned to England and is expected at the Hall at any moment."

Doris instinctively felt an unaccountable chill as these words fell, not only upon her ears, but, as it seemed, upon her heart. They brought to mind an old tale she had heard from the servants and the village gossips. Of how her father and Rupert Roylance, the late master of the Hall, sitting over their wine after dinner, had, some said in jest, others in earnest, made a bargain, that the seven-year-old heir to the Hall should, in years to come, espouse the baby heiress of the Grange.

Since then many things had happened. Rupert Roylance had entered into many vast and rash speculations, ruin had been the result: the estate, which was entailed, was mortgaged to the hilt as far as lay in his power. Taking his little lad, then a fragile, weedy ten-year-old, he had sailed for foreign lands, no one, not even himself, being certain of his destination. The rents of the estate had been for years collected by receivers for the mortgagees, the Hall itself being let to strangers.

Years later news had arrived of Rupert Roylance, who had literally and metaphorically "struck oil," and together with the news came heavy remittances, reducing the mortgages on the estate; then more remittances, until at last the estates were cleared and Morgan Chandler went on managing them, not as receiver for the mortgagees, but as duly appointed steward and factotum for Rupert Roylance.

Later still, came news of Rupert Roylance's death, then a little while later intelligence that his son and heir, Cyril Roylance, was on his way to England to take up his abode in his ancestral home, the tenancy of which happened to have some months previously expired.

And on hearing this news Squire Harcourt Dale had bethought himself of the bargain and the betrothal made by himself and his old friend and neighbour, perhaps in jest, perhaps in earnest. But many a true word was spoken in jest, and from every point of view what an admirable alliance it would be. Doris was just on twenty, Cyril would be a man of twenty-seven; the estates ran together, and, amalgamated, would form the finest in the county; certain intricate questions as to rights of way and other easements, such as will occur between large and contiguous estates, would be set at rest. Oh! the match would be most eligible. As to the inclinations of the parties principally concerned Harcourt Dale declined to take such unimportant matters into consideration. It was a bargain. There were times, as, for instance, when Rupert Roylance had gone forth from his ancestral home practically penniless, when Harcourt Dale had affected to treat that bargain as one begun and to be ended in idle jesting, now he looked upon it as one to be regarded, and, if possible, to be carried out in earnest.

CHAPTER IV.

The New Squire.

Fallowfield village was a-quiver with excitement, for within the hour the new master of Fallowfield Hall was expected to drive through, en route for the home of his ancestors. And, as the old gossips declared, the place would seem itself again with a Roylance ruling at the Hall. And no little proportion of the enthusiasm was due to the reflection that the reign, or, rather, the regency of Morgan Chandler was rapidly approaching its close, a regency long to be bitterly remembered by reason of many an act of spiteful, petty tyranny; the newcomer might turn out to be a harsh master, a hard landlord, he could scarcely prove harder or harsher than Morgan Chandler.

Meantime, up there at the Hall itself the individual in question sat in one of the apartments of the steward's offices brooding over a number of account books.

"It's all over at last," he soliloquised. "Well, I've made a pretty good thing out of it, and I can't grumble. I should have feathered my nest pretty snugly if I'd been content to let well and the Stock Echange alone."

"But suppose the new chap's very clever at figures? Well, it'll take him time enough and it'll give him work enough to find out anything from these," he chuckled grimly, turning over the pages of one of the ledgers. "They've passed the lawyers, and I fancy they'll get by him. Hallo! what do you want?"

This last remark was addressed to a man, who, after respectfully knocking, had shambled into the room and stood there dangling his hat with one hand, while with the other he tugged deferentially at his forelock.

"Axin' pardon, Measter Chandler," he said hesitatingly, "I made so bold as to coom to ax if I canna stay in t'owd cottage a bit longer."

"Not a minute after your time's up, Ned Fletcher, and that's Saturday. I'll have no poachers on the estate. I know all about you, you're sly enough not to be caught, but I know who sets wires in the plantations and nightlines in the Park Water, and out you go, bag and baggage."

"It's 'ard lines on a man, sir, to be turned out of house and home, all for suspicion."

"Suspicion be hanged! Everybody knows you're a poacher, though nobody's been quite sharp enough to catch you redhanded. Don't waste my time—get out!"

And the abashed, unsuccessful appellant shuffled out of the room muttering protests against being turned on the roadside for perhaps once in a while picking up a stray rabbit.

A little later, lusty shouts at the Hall gates heralded the approach of the carriage bearing the new master of the old mansion home. A few minutes more and Morgan Chandler stood before him in the Hall's huge portico with a totally different expression of manner and feature to that which he had displayed towards the poacher, the new arrival eyeing him meantime, steadily, taking the measure of his man, the man most likely to make or mar his game.

Later in the day they were closeted together a considerable time over books and schedules, Morgan Chandler rendering an account of his stewardship. The new master of Fallowfield Hall went carefully through every detail of account, putting from time to time questions which his agent found somewhat difficult to answer. And when the conference was over, and the master of the Hall sat alone in his library still poring over books and vouchers, he sprang suddenly from his seat, took a cigar from the box and lighting it deliberately, muttered in an undertone:

"You're a liar, Mr. Morgan Chandler, and you're a hypocrite; of that I was certain immediately I clapped eyes on you, but I think you're something else. I'm pretty certain, Mr. Chandler, you're a thief. So much the better for my game. Hullo, what's the matter?"

A manservant, entering, announced that the man Fletcher had returned to the Hall and begged for a few minutes audience with the new Squire.

"What does he want?" asked the other sharply.

"I expect, sir, he's on the same errand as this morning, asking to be allowed to stop in his cottage. Mr. Chandler means to clear him out for poaching."

Is your photo on page 502?

"Ask him in," said the other, and in a few minutes Fletcher, again dangling his hat and tugging at his forelock, stood in the presence of the new squire, making his appeal.

"So you thought you'd come direct to Cæsar?" said the latter, eyeing him steadily. "I've heard of your case from Chandler."

"He's always had his knife in me," said the man sullenly.

"Probably," said the other; "men who have got to take care of property generally have their knives in folks of your sort. Now, listen to me. It's abundantly clear, my friend, that you're an inveterate and a desperate poacher. You'd think no more of knocking over a hare than you would of smoking a pipe, and if one of my men interrupted you, if he were alone, you'd think no more of knocking him over than the hare. You're a bit of a drunkard and you're a quarrelsome bully. Don't tell lies, I tell you you are"—for the man had begun to mutter a protest.

"Now," the Squire went on, "I'll tell you what I'm going to do. I'm going to keep you on in the cottage and I'm going to give you a job as a sort of night watchman and under-keeper."

The man started, astounded, scarce able to believe his ears.

"Now clear out," the Squire went on, "and, remember, I'm the man here now, you've got to work for me. Work for me thoroughly, discreetly, and quietly. I'll make it worth your while; deceive me, play me false, and you'll wish you'd never been born," and the man quailed before the sudden gleam in his new master's eye.

He shuffled out of the room muttering protestations of eternal fidelity, and the new Squire of Fallowfield, puffing meditatively at his cigar, remarked sententiously:

"That's the man for me; set a thief to catch a thief," then with a chuckle, "by Jingo! they haven't caught me," and once again he scanned the morning paper containing an account of the mysterious discovery of a dead body floating in the Dass, clad in convict garb, and believed to be identical with one Richard Seldon, commonly known as "Tiger Dick," who had some ten days previously effected an escape from Brimington Convict Prison, though the features of the man found in the Dass were unrecognisable.

CHAPTER V.

FAVOURS.

THE Fallowfield Agricultural Show was in full swing. The population of the country side, male and female, rich and poor, gentle and simple, flocked within its enclosure to inspect broad and mossy backed sheep, prize oxen, champion swedes and turnips, to watch ploughing matches, to gaze upon the glories of feminine attire as well as on much personal feminine loveliness, and to listen to the sweet sound discoursed by a smart regimental band. Spick and span turn-outs abounded, one of the smartest, the splendidly-horsed dogcart driven by Doris, who, nattily attired in a smart tailor-made tweeds and a driving coat, with a straw hat, attracted the admiring glances of all beholders. Of one especially, this one a man with dark, flashing eyes and a black moustache shadowing a somewhat hard mouth, riding a somewhat showy thoroughbred, and riding him well.

Doris for a moment drooped her eyes before the bold flash of the unknown dark ones. A moment or two later her father was standing beside her wheel, leading that showy thoroughbred.

"Doris, dear, this is Mr. Cyril Roylance. Cyril, though you may remember her, you wouldn't have recognised her, eh?"

"Hardly," said the other, raising his hat, "seeing that when I left England Miss Dale was a charming child, and I return to find a still more charming, grown up, young lady."

At that moment Jack Branscombe rode by. Ignoring her father's haughty stare, he, saluting Doris, darted at her a look which spoke worlds, and she answered it with another equally eloquent, and her new acquaintance noted the exchange of glances with a tightening of the hard mouth.

"Isn't it rather strange for you," she asked, "returning to England after living practically all your life down under?"

"It is a trifle strange," he said, "but very pleasant. It's the fulfilment of a dream cherished for years this return from exile." Then he went on: "And only to think that you were once the tiny baby girl riding in a basket pannier, whose pony I used to lead along the lanes. What a dear little mite you were!"

Cyril Roylance and Doris had been children together; the children of old friends and neighbours, the children, aye, the children and great grandchildren of old friends and neighbours. It was not surprising, therefore, that Doris should, after that first strange thrill, greet the new arrival on his return to his home and homeland with unaffected cordiality.

But poor Jack Branscombe, with love's pain in his heart, watched her with a jealous shadow in his eyes.

"Ah! now I see," he muttered bitterly, "why her father wanted the coast left clear. It's a long time since the Israelites sojourned in the wilderness, but the worship of the golden calf hasn't gone out of fashion yet."

Then, putting spurs into his horse, he galloped him into the open space reserved for the jumping competition, for he was showing him.

A clapping of hands rattled round the enclosure as, having cleared two or three hurdles in his horse's stride, Jack put him straight at the wall of wooden bricks, clearing it like a bird, and an enthusiastic "Bravo!" went up as he negotiated cleverly a tricky "in and out" jump, and when finally, with a shake of the reins, he rode him at the water jump, a spontaneous cheer told him that the good horse had cleared.

The other competitors ruefully noted the approving glances and significant nods of the judges there in the centre, and a murmur went round, "Handsome Jack's got the red rosette—just his luck!"

But there was one more competitor still remained, and a hearty cheer arose as the new Squire of Fallowfield rode into the enclosure. He, too, took his jumps beautifully cleanly, and the sleek, graceful animal he rode, charmed every lover of horseflesh as a perfect picture of a thoroughbred.

"By Jove!" said one young farmer, "it's going to be a near thing; Jack might get only the blue after all."

He came at the water jump at a rush, and then—oh! fatal mischance—just at the take-off he slightly slipped on a patch of broken ground cut up by previous competitors, jumped short, and landed up to his hind fetlocks in the water.

As it was he got the blue rosette, but he muttered an oath as he watched one of the judges attach the red on to Jack Branscombe's bridle, for, his dark eyes scanning the arena, he noted one dainty handkerchief fluttering in what seemed to him the daintiest, nattiest gloved hand in the world.

Jack Branscombe had not only won the red rosette, but he was first favourite for another prize, a prize the new Squire of Fallowfield meant if he could to win, namely, the love of Doris Dale.

There are black sheep in every fold, and even among the simple country folk gathered round that arena there lurched a couple of individuals who had been drawn to the show less by any desire to "speed the plough" or any interest in agricultural affairs generally, than a desire to form a collection of purses and other unconsidered trifles which might happen to lurk in the pockets of the unwary.

And one of these leaning on the rails observed to the other: "D'year, cully? pipe that toff as too second prize. D'ye notice anythin'?"

"Dunno what you're drivin' at, Josh."

"That's because you put away too many pints to-day. Why, when that chap come riding past here and that look come into 'is face when 'is 'orse slipped, I says to myself, if I hadn't seen Tiger Dick put away for a stretch, and read only the other day of 'is being drownded arter breakin' out, I should say that's 'im riding the brown 'orse with the white blaze."

A great shout greeted Jack Branscombe as he rode the winner of the first prize out of the enclosure, and from the equipages parked at the entrance many a fair face smiled radiantly, and many a pair of bright eyes, black, brown, or blue, beamed tenderly upon the handsome yeoman farmer, the beau ideal of a healthful, sporting Englishman, and many a sigh fluttered many a gentle heart, for Handsome Jack seemed impervious to all love's arrows.

But only seemed. Presently, walking his horse past the Dale's dogcart once again, his eyes met those of Doris—those dear eyes beaming in the shade of that dainty straw hat like two stars aglow to guide his soul. Her father was looking at her, stern and cold, near her sat the Squire of Fallowfield, with a strange look in his face that aroused partly her wonder, partly her indignation, and many of the stately county dames were regarding her critically, for she was too bright and breezy, too radiant and dainty not to awaken a certain amount of feminine envy. But Doris forgot all these, forgot for the moment all the world except Handsome Jack.

"Oh! well ridden, indeed!" broke from her.

Gallantly, smartly, he turned his horse's head, reined alongside, detached the red rosette of premier place from his horse's bridle, pressed it in the palm of that dainty, buckskin gauntleted hand, then walked his horse away amid the cries of the delighted crowd.

"Well done, Handsome Jack! He's won another favour now!"

An angry oath escaped the Squire of Fallowfield sotto voce, then he sneered:

"Very effective—very theatrical, and just a little bit impertinent."

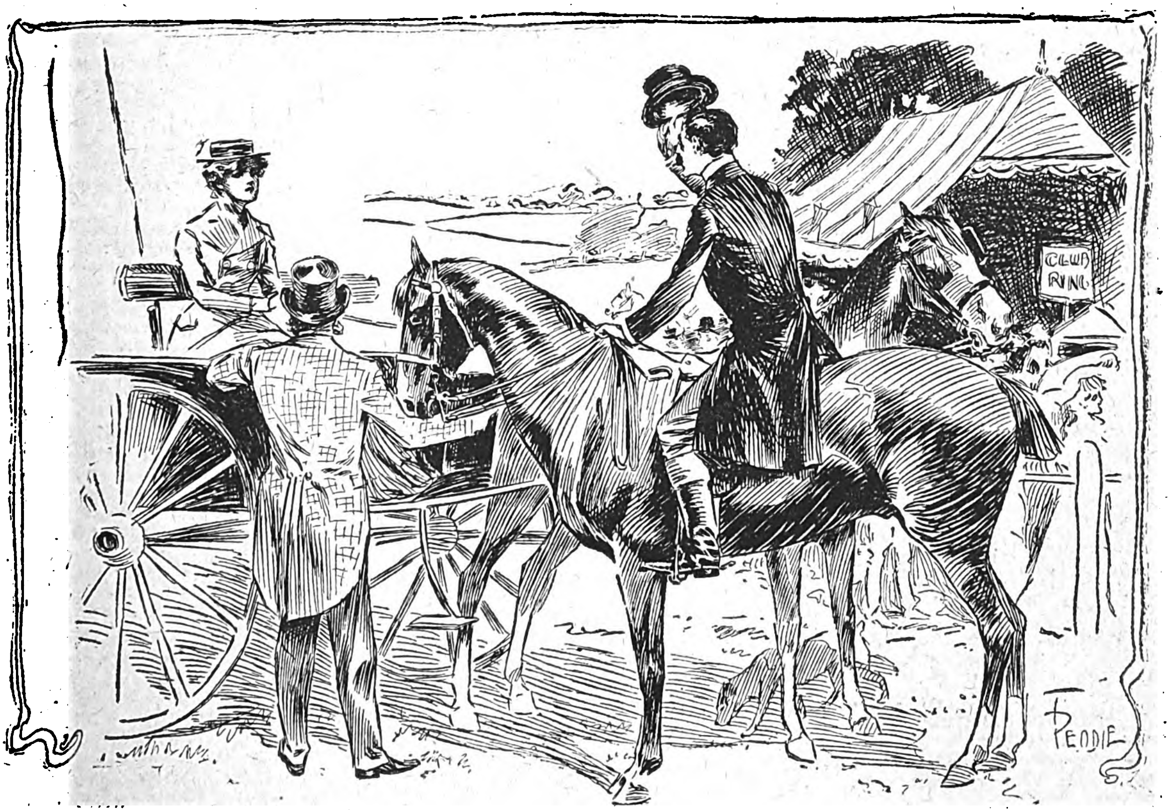
Handsome Jack looked him full and boldly in the face.

"My friend," he said with a mocking smile, "if you've lost the first favour, try not to lose your temper."

He rode on, and, watching him, the new Squire swore in his heart that he would hesitate at nothing, however dark or desperate, to remove from his path the man who had won, not only that rosette, but the heart of Doris Dale.

"Now, Cyril," said Harcourt Dale in his most genial manner, "you'll ride over to the Grange and dine with us, won't you?"

Not much pressure was needed to induce the new neighbour to accept the invitation, for which, indeed, he had been hoping.



"Doris, dear, this is Mr. Cyril Roylance."

Turn to page 482 at once.

And thus it came to pass that a few hours later he lingered at Harcourt Dale's dinner table praising his choice cigars, his rare old vintages, praising most of all his dainty daughter.

"Ha! ha!" laughed Harcourt Dale, "time hasn't weakened your attachments. Don't you remember when you were a little chap you used to call Doris your little sweetheart?"

"I remember," said the other, with a laugh, quickly.

"Begging your pardon, sir, it wasn't 'little sweetheart,' it was 'little Doris dearie.'"

The guest looked up with a quick frown at the old butler, who from long habit had been wont to avail himself of the privilege of an old retainer.

"Ah, that was it," said the Squire. "Barker's right; wonderful memory Barker."

An uneasy light glittered for a moment in the guest's eyes. He took in the situation in a moment, and with a somewhat forced smile turned to the old retainer.

"Yes, yes, of course I remember. And would you have recognised me, Barker?"

"Can't say as I should, sir," said the old servant with characteristic candour. "I seem to remember you as being inclined to be fair as a boy."

"Ah, that's the Australian sun."

"Maybe, sir, but you seemed inclined more to make flesh. I never looked on you as a little chap as 'ud grow up as lean as a wolfhound."

Later on they joined Doris in the drawing-room, and Harcourt Dale, watching his guest lingering by the piano at his daughter's side, thought how capitally events were shaping.

"Confound it! How late it is getting. Time flies so swiftly when the hours are so pleasant," said the guest.

"Well, then you must spend more of them here. Remember the Grange is always open house to the son of my old friend," said the host.

But the parting hour, however long postponed, arrives at last. Doris had retired some hours before, and her father and his guest had smoked many more cigars and emptied many glasses of the rare old port before the latter mounted his horse and rode away from the Grange.

The night had turned dark, cold, cloudy, and cheerless.

"By Jove!" he muttered, "I've played some desperate games in my time, but this is the riskiest of all. But then, the stakes are the biggest I've ever gone for. Only to think of it, a country mansion, a rent-roll many a nobleman would sigh for, horses, servants, carriages, and all won by a coup! Ah, but there's something else to win—Doris, you're the prize I want, and I'll win you if I have to play ten times the desperate game I've dared already. Hullo there! Who the devil are you, and what are you doing?"

A hand was on his bridle, and his horse was plunging.

"Quick, Josh, fetch him down!" a hoarse voice shouted, and the horseman received a heavy blow upon the shoulder with some weapon from the other side.

But he was no easy man to tackle, as his assailants found. Reining round his horse, he clubbed his whip and struck out savagely. One of the men went down with a groan. Then, turning in the saddle, he gripped the other by the collar. Just then the moon sailed up from behind a bank of cloud, and in its cold, blue light he looked down on a brutal, baleful face. And the man he held looked up into his and gurgled:

"Josh was right! It's Tiger Dick, as sure as I'm alive!"

CHAPTER VI.

The New Squire Meets Old Acquaintances.

"Hush—hush!" exclaimed the horseman in a half-whisper, as though fearful that the very leaves and boughs should hear.

Meantime, the other man, half dazed, had scrambled to his feet, and, attracted by his companion's excited ejaculation, staggered round to his side.

"That's right!" he chuckled hoarsely. "I spotted him at the Show, only I couldn't believe my eyes; but it's 'im, by thunder! And only to think as it was 'im who downed me!"

The Squire of Fallowfield instinctively clapped his hand to the hip pocket where in the old days he invariably carried a pistol. A curse escaped him as he reflected that he had of late neglected the custom that at times had proved so useful.

"It's all a mistake!" he exclaimed hastily, "you fellows have taken me for someone else; let go my horse's head!"

But the man addressed as Barney answered, "No fear, Tiger, it's such a long time since we had the honour of your company, and we thought it was going to be such a long time afore we had ever had it agin' we can't part with you just yet awhile. So it wasn't you as was found in the river?"

"I really don't understand you."

"Chuck it, Tiger! What's the use of shamming soft with us? Who could it 'ave been as was wearing your clothes—the suit with the broad arrow pattern?"

"Hush, Barney!" then the new Squire bit his lip and the man with whom he was expostulating chuckled at the recognition he had let slip.

But the other remarked sententiously: "Don't be rerdicklous, Barney, it ain't to be supposed as 'ow Tiger Dick's going to give the show away by taking us to Fallowfield Hall this time o' night—that's the wust of you, you ain't got no ideas of what's etiquette and proper," this last with a grin.

"I don't mind giving you fellows a few sovereigns to get rid of you, but I don't see the necessity for meeting you."

"Yer don't, don't yer, but we do," grinned Josh. Then, adopting a more truculent tone, he continued: "Now no more hanky, Tiger. I could look over your downin' me, not knowing who I was, but when it comes to givin' old pals the go-bye, don't you think we'll stand that, not us—we know too much."

"But it wouldn't pay you to tell exactly all you know."

"Dunno," said Josh stubbornly, "you know we 'ave 'eard of parties chancing being put away and doing time. Yes, sometimes of going back to Portland for another stretch absolute cheerful, rather than let one as they've worked with wipe his feet on 'em. You ain't one of that sort, Tiger, you ain't goin' to play that game, eh? But if you was I'd nark, yes I'd nark on yer if it meant——" To complete the sentence he gave a significant jerk with his left thumb under his left ear.

"What Josh says is right," concurred the other; "yer can't 'ave all yer own way all the time, just as this afternoon you had to be satisfied with only the blue rosette, 'cause there's other folks in the world as well as you, you ain't the only pebble on the beach."

Then, swiftly the new Squire remembered Handsome Jack, felt once again the hate and anger leaping to his heart, reflecting that Jack had won first place and prize in yet another rivalry, and then he reflected that his old acquaintances might be useful and that it might be prudent to appease them, not for old acquaintance sake, but for, to him, more important reasons. And so he answered: "That's all right, boys, I was only playing possum to see how you'd take it. Here's a bit to be going on with, and I'll meet you here at two o'clock to-morrow to talk over business."

"What! Is there any on the board, Tiger?"

"There's good business on the board, Barney, and you are the very men I want to work the oracle."

A COMEDY IN CLIFFORD'S INN.

I.

"HAS Miss Madge come in yet, Adams?" asked Mr. Merriman gruffly, as he glared alternately at his watch and the clock.

"No, sir," responded Adams, the smart parlour-maid, for the fourth time in the last half hour.

Mr. Merriman grunted, and his small, keen, grey eyes got red and angry. He turned to Adams.

"Dinner!" he snapped.

Mr. Merriman hated waiting for his dinner after a long and tiring day in the city, but he equally hated sitting down to that meal without the bright face of his only daughter, Madge, at the other end of the table. Madge had kept house for her widower-father for three years, when this unpretending chronicle begins. She had also driven to distraction all the youth of Holland Road and the adjacent parts of Kensington, but that is a mere detail, and has nothing to do with the story.

Alone in the big, sombre dining-room, Mr. Merriman ate his dinner as if he had a grudge against it, and occasionally compared the fat repeater with the clock on the mantelpiece. His little eyes grew redder and angrier, till suddenly the storm burst.

"What's that?" he roared, pointing to the dish before him with a hand that quivered with passion.

"Mutton, sir," murmured the trembling Adams.

"Then why is it sent up to me raw? Yes, raw!" shouted the master of the house. "Take it away! Good Heavens, this is how one's servants rob one. Thirty good pounds a year do I pay to that incompetent savage downstairs, and she gives me raw mutton to eat! It's shameful! It's wicked!"

And, clasping his bald head with his hands, the outraged man arose and pranced savagely in the dining-room.

His paroxysm of grief was cut short by the apparition of his daughter, flushed and breathless with hurry, and in the act of tucking a couple of pink carnations into her waistbelt.

"Why, father!" she cried, in her fresh young voice: "What is the matter? Why, you're so cross that the top of your dear bald head is quite pink. I'm as hungry as I can be! Is dinner ready?"

"The loathsome mess that my cook is pleased to call dinner," replied the sire in a tragic voice, "has been ready for some time. I have been obliged to send the mutton away. I am not a Central African savage, and cannot dine off raw meat. Adams, bring some soup and fish for Miss Madge."

And Mr. Merriman, with a heavy sigh, sank into his favourite seat, and took up a pink-hued evening paper.

"I am sorry to be late," remarked Miss Madge, attacking her soup, "but really Peter Robinson's was so fascinating I could scarcely tear myself away."

"How did you come home?" demanded her father.

"Tube from Oxford Circus to Shepherd's Bush," said the girl promptly. Then she went on with some hesitation: "I had quite an adventure at the station."

It might have been the crimson lamp-shade that made her look as if she were blushing, and—it might not.

"Ho!" shouted Mr. Merriman. "In my young days well-bred girls did not have 'adventures'—at stations or anywhere else."

"Well, it was like this," said Madge, fidgetting with her serviette-ring. "Er—I spent all my money shopping, and when I wanted to take a ticket, I found I hadn't even the harmless, necessary twopence for my fare. So"—she was bending her head over her plate, and speaking very fast—"there was a man—a very nice man, just behind me, and he saw how upset I was—so—he—insisted on lending me the money to get home with."

Mr. Merriman arose, and began to tramp heavily up and down the room. He was crimson in the face, and the veins on his forehead stood out.

"Upon my soul!" he burst out presently, "I believe I'm the most miserable man on this earth. Business is rotten, my servants rob me and give me raw meat to eat, and my only daughter scrapes acquaintance with strange men at railway stations! I wish I was dead—I do, indeed!"

Madge said nothing. She knew her father's peculiar ways, and that a calm would succeed the storm.

"Some fortune hunter, no doubt," said Mr. Merriman, "been dogging you for weeks—months, I shouldn't wonder. Oh, yes! The only daughter of Merriman and Co. is worth knowing." He laughed sarcastically.

"He was a gentleman," cried Madge indignantly.

"I'll thrash the blackguard within an inch of his life," roared her father. "And as for you, my lady, off you go to—your aunt in the country. I'll just give her a hint of the games you've been up to, and she'll discipline you well, I can promise you that!"

This terrible threat having been launched at her head on a average three times a week for the past six years, Madge received it with some calm, and was mentally deciding which of the fascinating blouses at Peter Robinson's she should exact as the price of peace.

"I couldn't help it—you don't expect me to walk all the way from Oxford Circus here?" expostulated the wily young woman.

"You could have taken a cab, I suppose," growled her father. "By careful searching you might have found enough money in the house to pay the fare."

Then he sank back into the chair, lit a cigar, and between the puffs feebly reiterated that he was the most miserable man on earth, and he wished he was dead. Madge poured herself a glass of claret, and drank it with apparent enjoyment. As has been said, she was accustomed to these scenes, and knew their exact value in the scheme of things.

II.

Mr. Merriman left his office in Idol Lane, E.C., and, climbing heavily into a hansom, told the driver "Clifford's Inn." It was a blazing day, in honour of which the horse wore a straw hat and the driver a cummerbund and a rose in his buttonhole. The attire of Mr. Merriman was likewise suitable to the season. His waistcoat was the whitest, his shepherd's-plaid trousers, the lightest to be beheld that day in the city of London. But the brow of Mr. Merriman was clouded with anger, and he grasped his gold-headed Malacca as a Roman warrior his glaive.

As everybody knows, Clifford's Inn has two entrances, one in Fleet Street, and one through old Sergeant's Inn, in Chancery Lane. It was at the Fleet Street entrance that Mr. Merriman pulled up, and bade his charioteer wait.

He soon found the particular set of chambers of which he was in search, and dealt a resonant blow on the door.

"Come in!" called a cheery voice.

A fair haired young man with bright blue eyes, and a particularly cheery smile was engaged in throwing a miscellaneous collection of things into a Gladstone bag. He looked up.

"Mr. Morse?" inquired the visitor.

"I'm him," said the fair haired young man, regardless of grammar. "Don't mind me going on packing, do you? I've got a train to catch." And he hurled a pair of tennis shoes into the yawning depths of the bag.

"Cool," thought Mr. Merriman. Then aloud he said:

"I will not detain you long, Mr.—ah—Morse. I just wish to know if you are the young man who insulted my daughter at the Oxford Circus tube station last night." With that the angry father grasped his cane in a menacing manner and snorted.

The young man dropped the articles in his hand and stood up quickly.

"I'm not in the habit of insulting people's daughters," said he. "Hadn't you better go?"

"I tell you," cried Mr. Merriman, raising his voice, "that I won't have my daughter insulted by any well-dressed loafer."

"This," said Morse, apparently to the opposite wall, "one can only attribute to the intense heat. Or else drink."

"What!" shrieked the merchant, crimson with fury. "How dare you—you impudent young puppy—insinuate that I—" he choked.

The imperturbed occupant of the chambers resumed his packing, humming as he did so a snatch of "Tell me, pretty maiden."

"Look here," said Mr. Merriman, "you had the impudence to pay my daughter's fare last night. Here it is." He carefully placed two pennies on the table. "If I were a younger man, you should suffer severely," he resumed, glaring at Morse, and trembling with passion.

Morse took up the pennies, looked at them carefully, and dropped them into his trousers pocket.

"Like a receipt?" he asked carelessly.

Mr. Merriman made an inarticulate sound, which aptly expressed mingled anger and contempt, and banged the door behind him. As he descended the stairs he had an uneasy feeling that he had got the worst of it. The scene had not turned out as he had planned it. He, John Merriman, of Idol Lane and Holland Road, Kensington, was not accustomed to be laughed at. He was absorbed in these unpleasant thoughts as he strode angrily into Chancery Lane.

It has been remarked that there are two ways of leaving Clifford's Inn. At the Fleet Street one the cab was waiting. Or, at least, it had been waiting till the driver, learned in the way of bilkers, and remembering the other exit from the inn, loitered casually into Chancery Lane. He soon espied Mr. Merriman, oblivious of all but his late interview with the imperturbable young man of Clifford's Inn.

"Hi, guv'nor!" he cried in a harsh, unpleasant voice. His late fare looked up with a start.

"By Jove, cabby, I nearly forgot you," remarked the latter.

"Did yer, now?" said the driver waggishly. "Well, what a lucky thing I didn't forgit you, ain't it?"

Mr. Merriman frowned. He was not accustomed to familiarity from cab drivers, and he could not know the dark view which had been taken of his absence of mind. He dived into his pocket. It was empty. He then remembered the donning of the shepherds' plaid trousers that morning, and became uneasy. He searched his other pockets. There remained not a single coin.

"Look here," he said to the cabby, "I haven't any money on me. Just drive me back to my office in Idol Lane, and I'll pay you."

"No, yer don't, Kroojer," cried the cabman in a loud, threatening way. "Fink I didn't see yer tryin' to do a guy out o' the other entrance? Bow Street's your mark."

A small crowd, attracted by the altercation, began to gather. Mr. Merriman looked round in agony. The cabby was signalling with his whip to a distant policeman.

"Wicked ole man!" squeaked a young imp of an errand boy. "Why don't you pay the pore feller?" reproachfully asked a navvy.

The policeman approached, and to him the driver explained that he with the whiskers had left him in Fleet Street, and then deceitfully attempted to depart by Chancery Lane; that he (the cabby) was a respectable man, and had drove a cab for fourteen year, and he wished for nothing but justice.

Things certainly looked very black. Mr. Merriman feebly attempted to explain.

"Yes, I know all about that," interrupted the constable. "You come along."

And he grasped Mr. Merriman by the arm. Tears—actual salt tears—gathered in the merchant's eyes. In its way, the thing was a tragedy.

"There's a mistake here, constable," said a cheery voice, suddenly. "I know this gentleman very well." The owner of the voice carried a Gladstone bag, and was, in fact, Mr. Guy Morse. There was a short consultation, the cabman drove off whistling, and the policeman resumed his walk with a thoughtful air.

"How can I ever thank you?" said Mr. Merriman, with emotion, as he grasped his rescuer's hand. "Come and dine with me when you return from your holiday, and I'll introduce you to my daughter."

And Mr. Morse said he would.

Now Mr. Merriman as he watches the two young people at the piano after dinner, wonders what he will do without Madge.

THE ADVENTURES OF AN ACTRESS.

CHAPTER I.

"WELL, if this is a sample of Portsmouth weather, all I can say is——. Perhaps on second thoughts I'd better leave it unsaid," ejaculated Raymond Venables, as The Good Samaritan Theatrical Company drew up inside the station at Portsmouth.

It was five o'clock on Thursday afternoon. A cold, autumn drizzle was driving remorselessly through the quiet streets of the town. The members of the company were all more or less in a bad temper, enhanced by the prospects of securing apartments amidst such unpalatable climatic surroundings.

Jenny Lovelace bore off Hazel Harlow. The former was an old hand on the road, knew where good lodgings were to be found.

"After last week's terrible adventure, Hazel," she said in a low voice, "I shan't let you out of my sight if I can help it. I promised Eric Monteith I'd look after you until he was well enough to help me, and I shall keep my word."

Hazel smiled rather mournfully. She missed Eric more than she cared to admit, even to herself. The sad accident that had befallen him at Birmingham ordained that it would be some time before he would be able to join the company. Venables had found a substitute, and he was to rejoin The Good Samaritan as soon as his medical adviser would permit.

The rooms that Jenny had coveted were luckily vacant. It was not long before the two girls were sitting before the fire and discussing a fragrant cup of tea.

"What a pity the summer's over," Jenny said: "It is jolly here in fine weather. Southsea is great fun. We could have had a bathe and done all sorts of things. Ah, well, we mustn't expect too much," her voice grew suddenly grave, "and we can only hope and trust that we shall get through the week without a repetition of the catastrophe at Bristol."

A slight shudder ran through Hazel's frame. "Sometimes," she said gently, "I feel as though fate means me to give up a theatrical life. I seem to be under a ban. And yet what could I do even if I were to emancipate myself from the stage. The danger that lies over me would be here still. What a terrible man Horace Caldecott is! He drove me from my home, and made my own father turn against me, and even that is not enough for him. His wealth and his powerful resources make him all the more dangerous."

Jenny balled her little fist and shook it fiercely in the imaginative countenance of the man whom she had learnt to hate with all the intensity of her fervent soul. "I wish I could do something to hurt him," she said vindictively, "but, black-hearted villain that he is, he's as slippery as an eel. His day must come some time. In the meanwhile, keep up your pecker, Hazel dear. You've got allies as well as he. We'll best him between us, never fear. And now let's talk of something more cheerful. Let me tell you what Raymond Venables told me a day or so back. He said that when this tour was over he was going to try and get hold of a London theatre; for what object, do you suppose? In order to give the jaded Londoners a chance of going mad over a new star, Miss Hazel Harlow, the famous actress."

A flush of pardonable pride suffused Hazel's face. "Did he really say that?" she cried. "Oh, I should like to come out in London. And did he promise you a part, Jenny?"

"Oh, I saw to that," answered the other, serenely. "Whatever happens to the rest of the crowd, I think I'm all right. And then Venables isn't like some managers I've travelled with. He's got his faults, but he doesn't try to take advantage of one. But then you see he's in love. Oh, yes, he is, Hazel. It's not your fault, but you know perfectly well he'd marry you to-morrow if he could."

"One soon gets used to proposals of marriage on the stage," answered Hazel somewhat bitterly. "It really is amazing how haphazard actors and actresses are as regards matrimony. A man meets a woman, they go on tour together, and he proposes after he's known her three weeks. Then they get married and they——"

"Drift into the Divorce Court, or don't trouble to go so far, but just mutually separate," broke in the other. "Oh, yes, there are precious few happy marriages contracted amongst actors and actresses, I suppose one only hears of the unhappy ones. Well, heaven keep me from becoming the wife of an ordinary actor. Now, if Mr. Eric Monteith were to offer me his hand and heart——"

Jenny stole a roguish glance at her friend, who blushed at the sally, and answered: "Your mind is always running on the same thing, Jenny. I don't want to get married before I've done something in my profession."

Jenny sighed. Yet she determined to say no more on the subject. It was only her great affection for Hazel that made her long for the day when the beautiful young actress would be able to snap her fingers in the faces of those who sought to encompass her downfall, safe beneath the protecting eyes of such a husband as Eric Monteith.

Hazel awoke the next morning with a raging headache. On learning this Jenny at once ordered her companion to stay in bed and volunteered to go to a chemist's and purchase some phenacetin. She accordingly sallied forth, with strict injunctions to Hazel on no account to get up until she returned.

Against a lamp-post in the street, a lad was lounging, who looked quickly at Jenny as she issued from the house.

The next moment he had strolled up to her and said in a low voice. "Are you Miss Harlow?"

Jenny gazed at him with suspicion. "And what's that to you?" she asked sharply.

"It's not much to me, but a good deal to you," came the quick answer.

In a moment all the actress's instincts leapt up to quicker action. Some new danger menaced Hazel.

"What do you mean?" she said, after a moment's pause.

"Can I have ten minutes' conversation with you?" went on the lad.

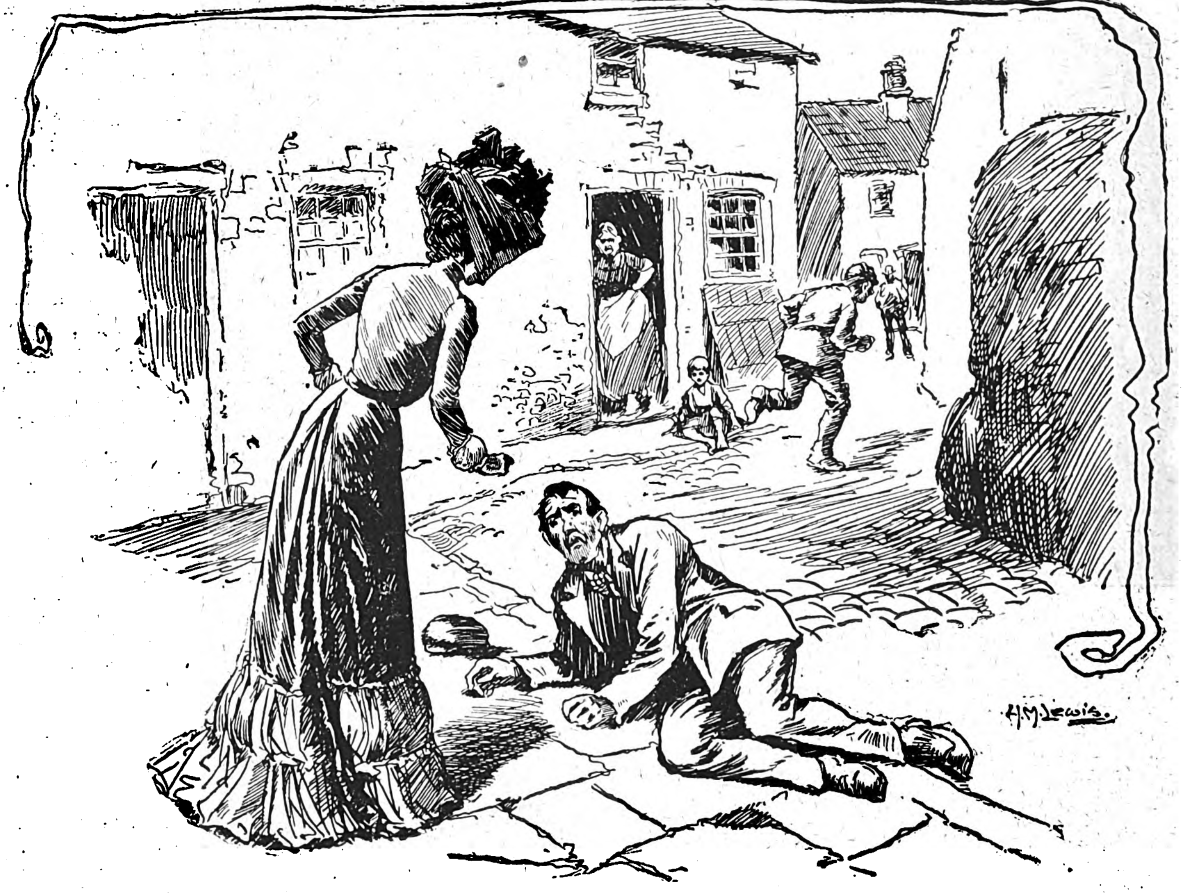
Jenny hesitated. Then she threw open the door of the house from which she had just issued. "Go inside—the first door on the left, and wait till I come back," was the answer, "I shan't be gone more than five minutes."

The strange youth obeyed her without further comment. Beset by a thousand doubts and fears, the girl hurried off on her errand. What was this mystery that had risen up to confront the hapless Hazel almost at the very moment when she had first set foot in Portsmouth?

Jenny lost no time in making her purchase at the chemist's. She flew back with the medicine and up to Hazel's room. "Take this," she said excitedly. "I've told the landlady to bring your breakfast up to you in bed. You're on no consideration to move from here until I tell you. You're in my hands, remember"; and before Hazel had had time to inquire the meaning of this somewhat cavalier command Jenny had disappeared again.

The lad was sitting quietly upon a horsehair sofa in the parlour of the lodging-house when Jenny burst in upon him.

He rose as she entered. "I've been thinking it over," he said quietly. "And you're not Miss Harlow, you're Miss Lovelace."



"Are you hurt," my poor fellow?" said the lady gently.

New serial starts to-day.

Jenny stared at him in well-merited amazement.

"You seem to be wonderfully well informed," she almost gasped. "Who on earth are you, and what is the meaning of your mysterious behaviour?"

"I want to be your friend," came the ready answer, "and though I'm only a boy, I think I can be of service to you. Danger threatens you and Miss Harlow, and unless you are put upon your guard, there's no knowing what may happen."

The lad spoke with impressive seriousness, remarkable in one who could have been little more than sixteen. The actress felt a sudden thrill of apprehension run through her.

"For goodness' sake speak out," she cried. "Don't keep me any longer in suspense. Who are you?"

"My father is a publican," came the ready answer, "and keeps the Three Jolly Sailor Boys in Wilson Street, down by the dockyard. Last evening three men came into the inn, and asked for a private sitting-room. The room my father showed them into was one with a bay window, across which heavy curtains were drawn. In the recess thus formed between the window and the curtain I had gone to sleep, not thinking that anyone would use the room that night. I was awakened by hearing voices.

"My first impulse was to spring up and declare myself. A sentence I heard, however, made me remain where I was. As a consequence I kept still and heard the unfolding of a black scheme that has the ruin of Miss Harlow as its end.

"Suddenly, after they had finished talking, one of the men rose. 'There's a window here,' he said, 'let's see what sort of a night it is.'

"In a moment I realised I should be discovered. There was nothing for it but to feign sleep. I shut my eyes and lay still. The next moment the curtains were pulled aside, and I knew that a man was looking down upon me. He uttered a horrible oath. 'What's this?' he cried. 'We've been betrayed.'

"The other two men hurried to his side. As though I had just been awakened, I sprang up and rubbed my eyes. 'What is the matter?' I cried.

"'What are you doing here?' said the man who had first found me, roughly.

"As well as I could I explained that I had come in here and fallen asleep. I protested that I had heard nothing, and at last they believed me. 'It's wonderful how a kid will sleep,' they said.

"So I was allowed to depart, and I determined I would come here first thing and tell you all I had heard."

"Yes, tell me quickly," cried Jenny breathlessly.

Thus adjured, the lad told his story. Needless to say, the actress drank in every word with avidity.

CHAPTER II.

It so happened that on the morning after their arrival at Portsmouth two letters arrived for Hazel and Jenny. That to the former was from Venables, asking her to come round to the Theatre Royal about midday, as he wanted to see her as regards some details of the evening's performance, the one for Jenny was from a lady in Southsea, requesting her to go thither for a friendly call, the writer stating that a mutual friend of the two women had inspired the invitation.

The way to the theatre from the lodgings lay through a rather poor quarter of the town. At about half past eleven the door of the house that was to be the two actresses' domicile during their sojourn in Portsmouth opened, and a woman, heavily veiled, issued forth.

She was well-dressed, and a wealth of red-gold hair was massed coquettishly beneath the big picture-hat that crowned her head. The dress was one that Hazel had had made only a few weeks before.

She walked quickly forward, looking neither to the right, nor to the left, with the air of one who knew her way well. This was all the more remarkable, inasmuch as Hazel was a stranger to Portsmouth.

At last she turned down a narrow street, evidently en route for the theatre, which was now only a few minutes' distant.

Suddenly her attention was arrested by two poorly-clad men on the pavement in front of her. The one was a burly, thick-set man, the other a much poorer specimen of humanity. They were evidenly quarrelling. Just as the girl drew alongside them the bigger man turned ferociously upon his companion and dealt him a cruel kick upon the shin. The man dropped with a groan, whereupon his cowardly assailant made off at the top of his speed.

The woman stopped almost instinctively. The man lay moaning on the ground. He gazed piteously up at the veiled lady before him. The bystanders, evidently accustomed to such scenes, showed but languid interest.

"Are you hurt, my poor fellow?" said the lady gently.

"I think my leg's broken, miss," the man moaned.

"Let me help you up!" The girl bent down, and, by the aid of her slim, firm hand, the injured one, wincing with pain, dragged himself to his feet.

"Where do you live?" asked his fair helper.

"Up a court not far from here, miss," he groaned.

"Can I help you there?"

"Heaven bless you if you would."

The girl was evidently a real Samaritan. The man leant heavily on her arm, yet she walked firmly forward, regardless of the curious glances and comments that came from the rough people amongst whom she now found herself. The man's pain seemed to increase at every forward step. It was evident from his gestures that he had received no slight injury.

"I'm glad it ain't far," he muttered hoarsely. The girl made no answer. Gradually they moved onward, until at length the fellow indicated that she was to turn down a narrow court.

"The fourth door on the left, miss," he said, "and then up a flight of stone steps to a door on the first landing. My word, how it do hurt," and he leant harder than ever upon the arm of his fair upholder, who found his weight becoming almost more than she could support.

But he was in such evident agony, she must have felt it would have been heartless in the extreme to leave him to crawl home as best he might.

Painfully, and with extreme difficulty, he was got up the flight of stairs.

"Open the door, please, miss," he said, in a strained voice.

The girl threw open the door, the man hanging on to her more tenaciously than ever. It was a gloomy, dingy apartment. Inside it was a man, well dressed, well groomed, strangely out of keeping with his surroundings.

Then a strange thing happened. The injured man, a moment before scarcely able to drag one foot after another, sprang up as though the sight of the stranger had endowed him with health and strength once more. The next instant, before the amazed girl could properly realise what had happened, he had darted away and out of the chamber, slamming the door behind him in his exit.

The stranger and the girl were alone. With a faint cry she sank in a huddled-up heap on the floor.

For a few seconds silence reigned, then the man found his voice.

"It's a long game of hide and seek we've been playing, Hazel," he said, almost mockingly, "and it's sad to think how much labour I've had to employ to gain what should have been mine without an effort. You've been in my grasp before now, only to have escaped because luck was against me, and all your so-called friends were around you. But now I think you must admit that the game is mine. Your protector, Eric Monteith, is hors de combat, Miss Jenny Lovelace has been called off to Southsea on a fool's errand, and you are alone here and in my power. Shall we come to terms, or must I make my own. That's the worst of having a soft heart. It may prove your undoing in the end. Don't stay in that huddled-up position. After all, you're in the presence of your husband"—he made a step forward and put out his hand in order to raise the girl to her feet.

This action seemed to suddenly galvanise her into renewed life. She sprang to her feet, and threw back her veil. Her hand went to her bosom.

"Not so fast, Mr. Horace Caldecott," she said in a firm voice. "It's loaded! Look out for yourself!"

"It" was a particularly ugly-looking little revolver with a gleaming barrel. Caldecott recoiled, as well he might.

But it was not the sight of the pistol directed point-blank at his head that was altogether responsible for the terrible look of baffled rage and fear that transformed his features.

For it was not Hazel Harlow at whom he gazed. Hair and dress were as hers were. The face was that of Jenny Lovelace—Jenny, who had taken this desperate step to save the woman she loved so whole-heartedly.

In a moment the reason for the thick black veil became apparent, while the wig that covered Jenny's raven tresses only set off the pale, resolute face with startling distinctness. Small wonder that a sudden fear filled Horace Caldecott's black heart

"To such sordid depths have you sunk," went on Jenny in a biting voice, still levelling the weapon at his head, "that you can conceive so base a trick to entrap a woman as pure and as unsullied as Hazel Harlow, a woman whose only misfortune it is ever to have met a scoundrel like you. What has she done that you should persecute her so, that you should thrust your loathsome attentions upon her? But the game's not so one-sided as you imagined, is it? You do well to match your strength with women's. Sometimes it happens that the battle is not always to the strong. And I don't think you bargained for your present position."

Caldecott writhed in impotent fury. It was only a slip of a girl who stood before him, yet with that insidious little weapon in her hand she was more than his match and he knew it. Vainly he cast about him for some means of escape.

He moistened his dry lips with his tongue. With an effort he found his voice. It was with the worst possible grace he said:

"I suppose, according to your ethics, I am the biggest villain imaginable, yet you seem to forget the old adage that 'all's fair in love or war.' My action is from the point of view of the lover, yours, also a piece of trickery, the reverse of the shield. I couldn't win Hazel by fair means"—he shrugged his shoulders—"there was no other course open to me."

Jenny's lip curled in scorn.

"And that is your explanation," she said, "of as cowardly and merciless a persecution as ever was conceived by man. When you knew that Hazel had, and never could have, any love for you, you still persisted in your horrible attentions, ay, and tried to drag down not only her, but those who had championed her. I myself have suffered at your cowardly hands before to-day."

"You don't understand," answered the other sullenly, "I love Hazel with all my heart and soul. She was promised to me long ago. I have sacrificed too much now to give her up. I have sworn I will let nothing stand in my path, and but for the most cursed luck that ever dogged a man, she would have been mine long ago."

"Love from your lips is a profanation of the word," answered the girl sturdily. "I did not come here and risk so much without due preparation. Were I to act as my heart tells me, I should pull the trigger of this pistol and make you answer here, at this very moment, for your sins; but I will not become a wilful murderess, unless——"

"Unless what?"

"You give me some substantial gage that from this moment Hazel Harlow is free of your attentions for ever."

"And if I refuse."

"I will sacrifice myself that Hazel may live in peace from any further fear of what you can do. I will forestall the gallows of their rightful victim."

Jenny spoke with amazing vigour and directness. Notwithstanding his position, her attitude compelled Caldecott's admiration. With all his faults he was no coward. He could at least appreciate a woman's strength of mind, even though he was the unwilling victim. The girl read his reluctant admiration in his eyes.

"Come, decide," she said sharply; "which will you choose, life and a substantial proof that Hazel has nothing more to fear from you, or death. I am desperately in earnest."

"Will you tell me first how you came to discover the plot to bring Hazel here?"

"I will tell you nothing. It is no use your trying to temporise. The matter must be settled now and for always."

Caldecott saw that the sands of her patience were running low.

"What proof must I give you?" he asked in a low voice, eyeing the weapon that was still levelled at his head.

"The only proof worth anything when dealing with a gentleman of your morals," was the cool retort; "one that will not only be binding, but will lay you by the heels should you try to escape from it—a signed attestation in the presence of a magistrate."

"And if I refuse?"

"Then I must sacrifice myself for the best woman in the world and put a bullet through you." Caldecott laughed, but there was little mirth in his laugh.

"Spoken like one of the heroines whose character you must often assume upon the boards," he said sneeringly.

Jenny stamped her little foot upon the floor.

"I can waste no more time and patience," she said. "Your answer! Yes, or no!"

Caldecott shrugged his shoulders with would-be nonchalance. "I suppose I must submit to your ladyship," he said, with a glare of hatred. "May I ask if you are going to accompany me into the street holding that revolver at my head in so correct an attitude. Surely such a course of procedure would attract attention."

"There is a police-station round the corner," answered Jenny. "My idea is that you should walk on first. I will follow behind you, and remember, if you attempt to run away I shall fire. I'm desperate, remember," and the girl's appearance did not belie her remark.

"First of all let me give you a word of advice," said Caldecott sharply. "Put down your pistol and return the way you came. You are a woman, and can be pardoned for your hysterical action. But I warn you you little know into what danger you will be running if you proceed with this mad folly of yours."

"You villain!" burst out Jenny, with blazing eyes. "How can you stand there and chide me as if I were in the wrong when you it is who have planned and plotted such diabolical schemes. Do as I bid you, tell your story at the police-station, and let us see if there be any justice there."

"There will be commonsense there," muttered Caldecott, "the woman's mad." Suddenly his expression changed. "I am at your service," he said, with a bow, and preceded her from the room and down the dingy stairs into the reeking street.

Jenny's eyes followed him, and her little hands clutched the revolver convulsively beneath the folds of her cloak.

Without hesitation he led the way to the police-station. "He is only a coward after all," ran Jenny's thoughts. "At last I see a way to save Hazel."

Poor girl! She little knew how bitter was to be her disappointment, or the deep cunning that lay in Horace Caldecott's heart.

Caldecott entered the police-station with the air of a man who knew the place intimately, and entered the superintendent's room, quickly followed by Jenny.

But quick as she was, she could not forestall a move on the part of the man she thought was really in her power at last. He slipped a sovereign into the hand of the blue-coated official in the room, murmuring as he did so: "A madwoman with a pistol! She meant to kill me!"

Low as the words had been Jenny heard them. She sprang forward, and her very action proved her undoing. Her wild gestures and impassioned voice prejudiced the matter-of-fact officer against her, to say nothing of the fact that he was the richer by a golden sovereign.

"It's a lie!" cried the girl. "He's a villain, and he has come here to sign an agreement that is to protect an innocent woman from his wickedness."

"You see," said Caldecott significantly, "her actions betray her!"

Maddened by the villain's callousness, Jenny, overwrought by the events of the last few hours, drew the revolver from her pocket and pointed it at Caldecott's head. Instinctively he ducked down. The police superintendent rushed forward and knocked up the girl's hand. There was a loud report and the bullet buried itself in the wall above Caldecott's head. The next moment the policeman had snatched the weapon out of her hand.

Then reaction came. Jenny burst into tears, and sinking down upon the floor gave herself up to a paroxysm of weeping.

"You see," cried Caldecott, assured now that the victory was won. "The woman's dangerously mad. She's a stranger to me. See to her, or we shall all be killed!"

His words fell with poignant acuteness on Jenny's ears. She realised in a moment that all her efforts had been in vain. She, a weak, ignorant woman—ignorant, that is to say, compared with this villain, and his knowledge of the world—had pitted her puny strength against a far subtler intellect than her own.

Instead of victory had come terrible defeat. Caldecott had played with her all the time as a cat with a mouse.

In the meanwhile the police-superintendent had knelt down, and with one quick motion had fastened a pair of handcuffs round Jenny's slender wrists.

"Good!" cried Caldecott with devilish glee. "I'll run for help!"

He dashed for the door and out into the corridor. A couple of policemen were standing sheepishly outside, undecided as to what course of action they should pursue. They had heard the pistol-shot, and were in readiness to give their aid should it be required.

"Quick!" cried Caldecott, "go inside! You're wanted."

Then, assured that his words would have the desired effect of calling off attention from hinself, he dashed outside and away.

"I'm well out of that," he muttered. "What a fool Miss Jenny is! She's got herself into a fine mess now, and no mistake. A woman's all right in her proper place, but the moment she tries to be original she's bound to come a fall."

With which cynical reflection he disappeared from the neighbourhood of the police-station.

CHAPTER III.

Jenny's behaviour had absolutely mystified Hazel that morning.

She had rushed out to the chemist, and, returning, had disappeared again with strict injunctions to her friend to remain quiet until her own return.

Hazel, suffering from neuralgia as she was, had been only too glad to obey her friend's mandate. And yet Jenny's behaviour had been so mysterious that she felt convinced something unusual had happened.

Towards midday Hazel rose and dressed. Then she found that her new hat and dress had mysteriously disappeared. Where? The mystery was deepening.

At last she could bear the state of uncertainty no longer. Jenny showed no signs of appearing. Hazel's head ache had departed. She determined to go round to the theatre and find out if Jenny had been heard of there.

She issued from the house and determined to ask the nearest way to the theatre. A man with head bent and every appearance of haste was hurrying down the street. She would stop him and inquire if he could direct her.

He drew level with her and raised his head. Her blood seemed to freeze in her veins. There was no mistaking who the man was. It was Horace Caldecott! She uttered a faint scream of fear.

He paused for an instant. Then her courage came back to her. She drew herself up and looked boldly at his hated face. His eyes dropped before her steady gaze. His lips moved convulsively. He tried to speak but no words came. The next moment he had disappeared from sight.

So he was in Portsmouth. What could be the meaning of his hated presence there? Was she never to be free from his loathsome attentions? How she longed for Eric's protection. Never had she felt more helpless than at that moment, when alone and unprotected in a strange city she realised that her hated lover was near her, and probably scheming how he could ensnare her anew.

Was she never to be free of his loathsome addresses. What had she done that she should be persecuted thus? Was this man to be allowed for ever to ride rough-shod over the paths of her life? Was there no way in which she could ensure immunity from his attacks upon her honour?

Then her thoughts turned in natural sequence to Jenny. Could her faithful friend and companion have discovered that Caldecott was in Portsmouth? Had her strange behaviour of the morning any bearing on the fact of her detestable lover's presence? A thousand doubts and fears beset Hazel's heart. Come what would she felt that she must try and discover Jenny's whereabouts. And at the theatre she would be most likely to find an elucidation of the mystery.

A friendly policeman directed her as to the shortest way to reach her goal. In a few minutes she was speeding away through the squalid streets along which Jenny, not so very long before, had proceeded to try and achieve her mad and profitless scheme of bringing Caldecott to book.

Raymond Venables, Hayward Lindsay, and Pendennis, together with Cora Bond, one of the ladies of the company, were at the theatre. None of them had seen Jenny. Venables noticed that something was amiss with Hazel.

"Can I help you in any way?" he asked in a low solicitous voice, drawing her apart from the others.

Hazel hesitated. Yet the manager was her friend. She knew that. He would also have given a good deal to be nearer and dearer. That she knew also. Yet he would not try and take advantage of his position now, whatever he might have done when first she had joined the company.

Hazel was fully aware of that. And now that Eric was not there to give her his help and counsel, she valued his presence all the more. She had long ago confided in him how affairs stood between her and Caldecott. So she did not hesitate.

"I have just seen—Mr. Caldecott!" she said with an effort. "It's unnerved me, and somehow I can't help feeling uneasy about Jenny. I don't know what has become of her."

An exclamation of anger fell from Venables' lips.

"Do you mean to say that cur dares to show his face in Portsmouth after all that has happened?" he muttered hoarsely. "Where is he? He ought to be arrested and locked up."

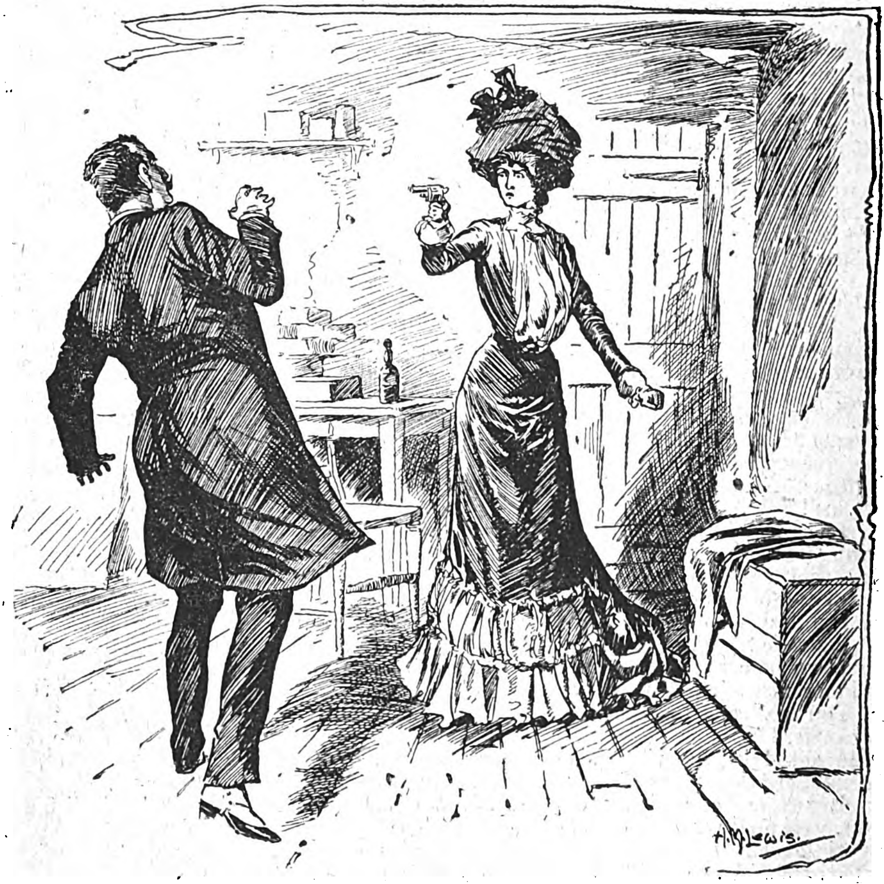
"I don't know where he is now," answered Hazel, who was on the verge of tears. "I saw him for a moment in the street."

Venables ground his teeth together in impotent rage. "I'd like to put a bullet through him!" he muttered vindictively.

But at that moment a message was brought to Venables asking him to go round to the front of the theatre. He hastily complied with the request, to find a policeman awaiting him.

The constable touched his hat respectfully.

"Have you a lady in your company of the name of Lovelace, sir?" he asked.



Caldecott recoiled, as well he might.

New serial starts to-day.

"Yes," answered Venables sharply. "What then?"

"Will you come round to the police-station with me?"

Venables stared at the man in surprise.

"Is Miss Lovelace there?" he cried.

"A young person charged with attempted murder, and giving that name, is, sir."

"Good Heavens!" cried the manager. "One moment, officer."

He rushed off and begged Hazel to come with him. Together they accompanied the policeman to the station.

Here they found the luckless Jenny handcuffed in an inner room.

The indignation of her two colleagues knew no bounds. In broken, almost disconnected words Jenny told her story. How that the publican's son had come to her and revealed the plot that Caldecott had made to entrap Hazel, how she had impersonated her friend, and had hoodwinked Caldecott only to be defeated when victory seemed within her grasp.

But the police-superintendent was not to be thus easily persuaded that he had made a mistake.

"The young lady tried to murder the unknown gentleman," he said obstinately, perhaps mindful of the piece of gold that reposed securely in his pocket, Caldecott's gift. "this story of the publican's lad and what he heard sounds a bit long drawn. Why not find the boy and bring him here. Then, if his story substantiates what this lady says, well, we can see then what's best to be done. I can't afford to run any risks."

"But where's the man who came in here and laid the charge against Miss Lovelace?" cried Venables hotly. "Why don't you produce him?"

The manager's question nettled the professional pride of the superintendent. He was perfectly well aware that Caldecott's defalcation was a more damning piece of evidence against him than anything. This fact made him all the more intolerant as regards Jenny.

"Be that as it may, sir!" he said firmly, "the fact remains that Miss Lovelace rushed in here and fired a pistol at the gentleman's head. There is the case in a nutshell, and she'll have to remain here until the business has been sifted."

"Very well," answered Venables, keeping his temper with an effort, "perhaps you will allow Miss Harlow to remain with her friend till I return with the lad who told Miss Lovelace about the villainous plot he had overheard planned at the Three Jolly Sailor Boys. Then we'll make a sworn deposition before a magistrate and see if we can't lay the villain who is responsible for all this by the heels."

The superintendent could but comply with this request. He knew in his heart of hearts that his prisoner was more sinned against than sinning, and yet—a golden sovereign, as Caldecott had known only too well, is often a powerful factor in determining the upshot of a doubtful point of law.

Accordingly Venables hurried off, bidding the two keep their hearts up. But at the Three Jolly Sailor Boys all was confusion and bustle. The publican's son had not been seen since early that morning. No trace of him was to be found.

"What do you want with my boy?" asked the innkeeper suspiciously. "What's your business with him? Perhaps you know where he is?"

"If I did should I come and ask for him?" cried the perplexed and baffled manager. "The fact of the matter is I particularly wanted him to aid in clearing up a particularly annoying business."

In as few words as possible he told the man what had happened, with the result, as can be readily understood, of only adding to the innkeeper's anxiety.

This new complication had only added to the difficulties of the situation. In the first place, Venables would have to return to the police-station and admit that the lad could not be found; secondly it would mean that Jenny would be kept in confinement until something was forthcoming to clear her from the charge of being a wanton and reckless breaker of the public peace.

Crestfallen and gloomy he returned to the station. "The boy can't be found," he said moodily.

"I thought as much," answered the superintendent, with ill-concealed satisfaction at the way in which his conduct was being justified. "It strikes me as there isn't any boy in the case at all."

Venables' anger blazed forth uncontrollably now. "Confound you!" he cried, "what do you mean to insinuate? I'll get you into trouble for that remark as sure as my name's what it is."

"You will, will you?" was the equally heated rejoinder. "Very well, then, this lady can spend the night in the cells. I know my duty without being taught it by a lot of actors and actresses."

It was all Venables could do to restrain himself from flying at the man's throat. Suddenly Hazel spoke.

"Look here, superintendent," she said gently, "you can't surely be in earnest. This lady is innocent of any intent to commit a crime. She only did what she has done in loyalty to myself. I could bring a hundred witnesses to prove that the man you say she tried to murder is a black-hearted villain. You will surely release her on my recognisances to-night? To-morrow we can appear here to vindicate our honour."

The man was somewhat mollified by the girl's sweet voice, and by a beauty that few men could resist. But he was not to be won over entirely from his subservience to outraged officialdom by any amount of blandishments.

"I'm sorry, miss," he said firmly, "but the lady must stay here to-night. She'll be brought up before the magistrates to-morrow morning, and the whole affair will be sifted thoroughly."

Hazel uttered a low cry. It was terrible to think that Jenny would have to spend a night in the police-court, as though she had been a common gaol-bird.

At that instant an event happened so absolutely unexpected to all the actors concerned that each was deprived of all power of further speech or action.

The door of the room opened and three men entered. The police superintendent drew himself up with military precision to the salute. Two of the men were well dressed, elderly gentlemen, the other was—Horace Caldecott!

Hazel uttered a low cry and shrank back against the wall, Venables clenched his fist mechanically, and swore under his breath, Jenny could only gaze with horror in her eyes at the audacious scoundrel who had, with such bare-faced audacity, dared to come back and confront the victims of his villainy.

"Well, Curtis," began one of the two strange gentlemen, "what's the bother? Colonel Derbyshire and myself have come here at the instigation of my friend, Mr. Caldecott here, to see if we can offer any magisterial jurisdiction over this affair. We've got a full enough charge-sheet to-morrow without adding any more to the list."

"Quite so, Sir George," stammered the superintendent; "the fact is——"

"That lady made a little mistake," broke in Caldecott, with a smile. "She's to be let off this time, eh, George?"

"You blackguard!" burst out the fiery Venables, addressing the suave villain with unmistakable directness. "How dare you have the effrontery to come here as if you were the injured party. I'll run the risk of being locked up myself for the pleasure of giving you a thrashing!" And mad with rage, he sprang forward and would have proceeded to try and put his words into effect, with what result it is impossible to say, had not the superintendent sprang forward and dragged him back.

"The fellow thinks he's still on the stage," sneered Caldecott to the magistrate. "That's the worst of these actors. They can't get away from their shop. He evidently imagines that I am responsible for this lady's"—indicating Jenny—"experiments on me with a six-shooter. That's what I call gratitude, when I came round here on purpose to try and get her off."

The magistrate addressed as Sir George looked contemptuously at Venables.

"I'd have you know, sir," he said, "that this gentleman is a personal friend of mine, and that I consider that your remarks are as unjustifiable as they are impertinent."

"And I would have you know," retorted Venables, boiling with pardonable fury, "that I consider you are by no means to be congratulated upon the choice of your friends. The misery that man has inflicted upon those who have been unfortunate enough to come under his influence is unutterable. He has done things, one of which would have been enough to have ensured a rope round his neck anywhere else."

The magistrate went purple in the face at this flouting of his pompous person.

But Caldecott, who, with masterly cunning, absolutely ignored Hazel's presence, knew well enough how to play his cards.

"My dear George," he said, "if I don't care what the fellow says why should you trouble. You've known me a good many more years than you have this gentleman minutes. Just authorise that this lady be liberated, and we need waste no more time. As I have explained to you, she must have been labouring under a misapprehension."

"That is a base lie!" suddenly cried Jenny. "Oh, gentlemen," she said, appealing almost tearfully to the two magistrates, "why will you take all this man says for gospel. Ask Miss Hazel Harlow what she knows about him; ask me; ask many another whose name I could give you! I own I shot at him wilfully—I would have killed him. Why not bring us up in court together and let him face the music as I am prepared to do?"

Jenny spoke simply and well. Colonel Derbyshire and Sir George Chetwynd exchanged glances. What could it all mean? Surely that was an extraordinary statement to come from a young girl's lips. Yet Chetwynd and Caldecott had been at Cambridge together. The latter was rich, influential. Nay, more, he had positively asserted that Jenny must have fired at him under a delusion. The garbled version of how she had entrapped him, when coming from lips so well versed in lying as his own, had not fallen on barren ground. Both Sir George and his brother magistrate were prepared to back him up in everything.

Jenny's outspoken words had stung Caldecott to the quick. He shot a stealthy glance at Chetwynd. How would the magistrate act?

The local Rhadamanthus stared at the girl in amazement. He had not expected such a retort. But then, he reflected, the girl was an actress. Coming from a woman in her class of life—Sir George classed all actresses together as women on a different plane to the rest of their sex—the words lost half their force in his ears.

"Don't you think, madam," he said somewhat coldly, "that you are acting somewhat uncharitably towards Mr. Caldecott, who has so chivalrously come forward to save you from an exceedingly awkward predicament? It is permissible, no doubt, upon the stage to level firearms at people's heads, but when it comes to real life such an act is apt to lead to unpleasantnesses. I think you would be better advised to put a bridle upon your tongue, and admit the generosity that wishes to save you in spite of yourself."

The position of the three allies was maddening in the extreme. Yet they were powerless to bring home to the plausible villain before them the proof of his duplicity.

He had indeed played a masterly game throughout. Suave, smiling, self-confident, he looked the embodiment of a debonnair man of the world.

But the comedy was not yet played out. A sudden commotion outside the room caused all to turn round. The next moment the door was flung open, and the lad who had been Jenny's informant of Caldecott's plot, stormed inside the apartment, followed by his father.

"There he is!" cried the lad, pointing at Caldecott. "I should know him anywhere. The others have given me the slip, but I should know him anywhere. Don't you recognise him, father?"

"Ay, ay," cried the innkeeper; "that's he right enough. Collar hold of him, someone. I'll teach him to make my inn a place for hatching vile plots against women!"

The tables were turned with a vengeance. A livid flush overspread Caldecott's face. An oath escaped his lips. Sir George Chetwynd turned to him in bewilderment.

"What on earth does this mean?" he cried.

But this was a situation that Caldecott had not bargained for. In a moment he realised that the game was up. Both the innkeeper and his son knew too much. Their evidence, coming on the top of Jenny's accusation, would convince even Sir George, prejudiced as he was in his friend's favour, that there had been villainy afoot.

All this passed through the cornered villain's brain at lightning speed. He determined on flight, and that before the occupants of the room had had time to recover from their surprise.

Before anyone could lay hands upon him he had dashed to the door, overthrowing the landlord with the impetuosity of his movement. The next moment he was out of the room, and out of the building before anyone had had time to raise a finger to stop him.

And when his late friends and adversaries had recovered their senses, it was only to find that he had slipped through their fingers. Venables and the inn keeper's son dashed off in pursuit. But a glance down the crowded street outside speedily convinced them that their chance of apprehending the slippery scoundrel was remote indeed.

"You blackguard!" burst out the fiery Venables.

Ruefully they returned to the party inside the building.

"Have I taken leave of my senses?" cried Sir George. "Here, my boy, let's have your version of this affair."

Thus adjured the boy stepped forward and related what he had already told to Jenny early that morning.

"The plot I heard the three men scheming," he said in the course of his narrative, "was as follows: They were to despatch two notes to Miss Harlow and Miss Lovelace, the one to Miss Harlow asking her to step round to the theatre to see Mr. Venables; that to Miss Lovelace from a lady in Southsea, asking her to go there.

"They were then to get Miss Harlow to take pity on a wounded man, and to help him to a house where Mr. Caldecott was to be waiting.

"I told Miss Lovelace this, and she asked me to tell no one what I had said to her. She was going to impersonate Miss Harlow. I saw the accident in the street, just as the man had planned it. I followed one of them, meaning to run him to earth if possible, but I lost sight of him. Then I went back to the scene of the plot, and got on the track of the man who had pretended to be injured. But he recognised me, and I became the hunted one. After a lot of narrow escapes I gave him the slip. I then hurried back home, as I knew they would be anxious about me there. My father told me that Mr. Venables had come to see if he could find me, and we hurried off here. I then heard Mr. Caldecott's voice, and thought we had at last run him to earth. But it appears the whole three were too slippery altogether."

The lad's narrative, sketchy though it was, convinced Sir George Chetwynd and Colonel Derbyshire that they had been supporting the cause of a man who had no right to their good offices. It was impossible, in the face of such overwhelming evidence, to believe that Jenny Lovelace had been actuated by other than exalted motives in her endeavour to bring Caldecott to book.

They accordingly begged her to give them her story. She told them all; how she had cornered the scoundrel and had elicited from him a promise to accompany her to the police-court and make a declaration in the presence of witnesses that he would abstain from further molestation of Hazel Harlow. His own diabolical cunning was answerable for the mad access of rage that caused her to fire the revolver at him.

Turn to page 482 at once.

The girl told her story well.

"And that man," she said in conclusion, "who has so nearly succeeded in hoodwinking you gentlemen as to his real nature, has escaped again to carry on his schemes against a woman whose only fault is that she will not listen to his detestable suit. I mean Miss Hazel Harlow here. Time after time he has endeavoured to ensnare her into his hateful net. Can you wonder that I made an effort to save her, that I was prepared to go to any lengths to rid her of the persecution of such a monster. Here is a case in point how difficult it is to bring his villainies home to him. He is rich, has an unassailable position in society, possesses amongst his friends gentlemen with the unimpeachable integrity of Sir George Chetwynd and Colonel Derbyshire."

But here the former gentleman interrupted her.

"For my part," he said fervently, "Horace Caldecott is off my visiting-list from this moment. Nay, more, if ever he crosses my path again I'll not spare him." Then he turned to Hazel. "Miss Harlow," he said, "I should like, during your stay in Portsmouth, to ensure you immunity from any chance of further molestation. Will you and Miss Lovelace give my wife and myself the great pleasure of becoming our guests while you are here? I can have you driven to and from the theatre every night in my brougham. Believe me, it would be a great pleasure to me if you would allow me to do this."

There was tears of heartfelt gratitude in Hazel's eyes as she answered—

"Indeed, sir, I should be churlish in the extreme were I to refuse your kind offer. In Miss Lovelace's name and my own, I accept your offer with heartfelt gratitude."

"And I beg to apologise for my remarks just now," cried Venables. "And if you will accept a box at the theatre for to-night and every night this week, if your friends would care to see our performance, I shall be greatly honoured."

Sir George accepted the manager's offer in the same cordial spirit with which it was tendered.

Then he turned to the innkeeper's son.

"I think we ought to send round the hat for this lad," he said, turning to the company. "For, after all, he is responsible for this happy ending to what might have been a most black and tragic business."

His proposition met with a ready response. And the lad, at all events, had no reason to regret the businesss that had brought him into such prominence, and nearly into such an impasse.

Among the most interested spectators of The Good Samaritan that night were Sir George Chetwynd and his party. Hazel and Jenny were both the recipients of lovely bouquets. And the rest of that week went by for them as happily and as expeditiously as is the lot of few actresses on tour. As the honoured guests of Sir George and Lady Chetwynd their stay in Portsmouth was one that lingered long in their memories.

Next week The Good Samaritan Company were due at Leeds. In this thriving manufacturing town Hazel was to meet with an adventure that was to prove to her that there are dangers in the life of an actress that can never be accounted for beforehand. Readers of this series will find the next story in no wise lacking in interest from any of the others that have preceded it. Your friends would surely be delighted if you would mention Hazel Harlow to them.

½D. ANOTHER NEW PEARSON MORNING PAPER. ½D.

THE

Midland Express

WILL APPEAR

Tuesday, October 22nd.

On the above date a new halfpenny morning paper, the Midland Express, will make its first appearance in the whole of the Midland and Pottery Districts.

Local news will be given very fully. Events happening all over the world will be dealt with in a style never before attempted by any provincial newspaper.

The Midland Express will be worked in conjunction with Mr. C. Arthur Pearson's marvelously successful London paper, the Daily Express.

Private wires have been laid between London and the offices of the Midland Express. Every night the news gathered all over the world will be sent direct to the Midland Express, which will thus really have its own correspondents in every city of importance in the world.

The Midland Express will contain special contributions by all the greatest living writers of the day.

In matters of Sport the Midland Express will have no rival. Racing will be fully dealt with by an expert staff.

Mr. C. B. Fry, the International full back, and Mr. J. J. Bentley, the President of the Football League, and late Football Editor of the Athletic News, together with a large staff of expert reporters, will be responsible for the football news, notes, and comments.

Fashion and other matters of interest to women will be specially treated by the best artists and writers.

Serial stories will be a regular feature, and one page of the Midland Express will be profusely illustrated every day.

The combination of the London Express with the Midland Express will enable expenditure to be made with a lavishness that is impossible in the case of a provincial paper standing alone, and it is only by lavish expenditure that a bright, up-to-date newspaper can be produced.

Its Main Aim is

NEWS TRUE NEWS! NEW NEWS! ALL THE NEWS!

Short Stories That . . . . . . Make You Laugh.

We devote every week space in Short Stories to pithy, humorous anecdotes similar to those which appear in these columns. A prize of £1 1s. will be sent to the reader who submits the best storyette this week, and a P.W. penknife to each of those whose attempts are used. The anecdotes may be either original or selected; in the latter case, the source MUST be stated. Attempts must reach the Storyette Editor, Short Stories Office, Henrietta Street, Strand, London, W.C., by Monday, October 21st. Post-cards only, please. The prize of £1 1s. has been awarded this week to Mr. A. K. Rawlings, of 4 High Street, Barnes, whose contribution is denoted by a star thus.*

MAUD: "Yes, it's a pretty fan, isn't it? It was given me by my mother on my twenty-first birthday." Mabel: "Really! How well it has worn, dear."

"FIRST you had whooping cough, then you got the bronchitis, then influenza, and now you have jaundice. Seems to me you catch anything in your town," said Wiggles. "Yes," said the suburban dweller, "everything except the train I want."

ETHEL: "It was very embarrassing to-day when I got into the tram and found Mr. Trotter there. I was engaged to him this summer, but hadn't spoken to him since we got back to town." "What did you do?" Ethel: "Well, I made the best of it, and let him pay my fare."

"WHY do you look so sad, my love?" said Mr. Younghusband. "I was thinking of a poor little beggar child that came here this morning," replied Mrs. Y. "Just think, Charles, the poor child was only eight years old, and her father was killed in the Crimean War, and her mother died of sorrow within a year afterwards."

THEY had tried all the penny-in-the-slot machines on the pier, until at last they came to one that did not respond to the magic bronze. "Look here, my man," said Crumbles to the pier attendant, "that machine is to try your weight, the next your height, the next your strength, then your sight; and now I've put a penny in this thing, but I didn't see what it's for." "That, sir," replied the pierman. "Oh, that one's to try your temper."

A GENTLEMAN on a visit to a coal mine, thinking to take a rise out of the foreman, an Irishman, asked him the following question: "I say, Pat, how do you get the men up out of the pit?" Pat, seeing through the joke, answered: "Oh, we pull them up with the hair of the head." The gentleman looked at him a second or so, and then said, with a smile on his face: "Ha! but what about those with bald heads?" "Oh," says Pat. "we use suckers for them."

*THE farmers of Cape Colony are notoriously hard to move, but rarely have we come across a more sluggish specimen than that furnished by a lazy man, whose farm lies outside Worcester, C.C., and who called at a neighbour's house sometime ago. "Sit down, sit down!" exclaimed the neighbour. "I don't know as I ought," said the farmer, nevertheless he sat down. After half an hour's talk about the crops, and the value of an adjoining piece of ground, the farmer said slowly: "I don't know as I ought to be sitting here, I came over to see if I could get a ladder; our house is on fire."

CHARLEY: "Your eyes always remind me of the sea, Cis." Cis: "Because they are so blue?" Charley: "No. They are so watery!"

"WHAT are your hopes for the future?" asked the solemn man. "I have none at present," replied the youth. "To-morrow is my girl's birthday, and I am worrying about the present."

OLD BOY: "Thomas, if my wife asks you where I am, tell her I have gone to the office." Servant: "Certainly, sir! But where are you really going, in case anyone else should want to know?"

COAL MERCHANT: "I say, Premium, I want to insure my coal yard against fire. What's the cost of a policy for £10,000?" Insurance Agent: "What coal is it, same kind as you sent me last?" Merchant: "Yes, it is." Agent: "Oh! I wouldn't insure it if I were you. It won't burn."

MR. HARDCASH: "Well, sir, what induced you to imagine that I would give my consent to my daughter's marrying you?" De Gall: "Pardon me, my dear sir, I wasn't so foolish as to imagine anything of the kind. I merely asked for it as a matter of form. If you refuse, we shall marry without it, that's all."

A YOUNG lady was driven by her brother lately to West Muddleham Junction, where he was to see her off by train. They were rather late and had to hurry. The porter rapidly pushed her portmanteau under the seat first, and she sprang in, but first in her hurry and confusion she kissed the porter, and gave her brother twopence.

QUITE recently the authorities of a town in Yorkshire were engaged in a discussion as to the Sunday closing of public-houses. During the proceedings a prominent town councillor, not particularly renowned for his erudition, asked timidly what the difference was between a bona-fide traveller and a real traveller. He thought they were the same thing. "Not at all," came the reply from a fellow councillor. "A real traveller is thirsty because he travels, but a bona-fide traveller travels because he is thirsty."

DURING a football match between two village clubs near Lancaster recently, the referee gave a decision which was unappreciated by one of the linesmen. A rather lively discussion took place between the two as to the rules, the linesman finishing up by shouting at the official: "Go on wi' thee; thou can't referee for nuts!" "Can't I?" replied the referee. "But I can tell thee I refereed before ever thau wor born!" "That may be," replied the wily linesman, "but has thau ever refereed since?"

THE cannibalistic advertisement for a servant who could "cook and dress children" brings to mind one or two other misrepresentations of a similar kind. "Dine here and you will never dine anywhere else," is a startling, though doubtless meant to be alluring, statement which appeared in gigantic letters in the window of a cheap restaurant. "Wanted a room by two gentlemen about thirty feet long and twenty feet broad," suggests anatomical monstrosities, and there is something terribly sinister in this advertisement of a furrier, "Mr. Butcher begs to announce that he is willing to make up capes, jackets, etc., for ladies out of their own skins."

DO YOU WANT A £5 NOTE?

Five Crisp £5 Notes to be Given to Readers Every Week. £25 per Week if you will ask for it.

HERE IS THE SCHEME.

We have in our possession a considerable number of photographs of men, women, and children of all grades of society secured for us by our agents, who have scoured the United Kingdom for this special purpose.

Each week we shall publish five of these portraits, and to each of the persons thus represented we shall dispatch the sum of £5, on his or her claiming same on a postcard addressed to

Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Although the persons whose portraits will appear in this competition are quite unknown to us personally, we have their names and addresses in our possession, and, therefore, a claim can be settled at once, without risk of fraud.

We may say that our agents are still at work all over the country. It is, therefore, possible that your portrait may appear without your knowing it at any moment. So you should watch SHORT STORIES.

HERE ARE FIVE PORTRAITS.

Is your portrait here? If so, drop us a post-card, and get £5. Five more portraits will appear next week.

All claims in connection with the portraits below must reach the address already given above by Tuesday next, October 22nd.

Full names and addresses of the correct claimants will appear in succeeding numbers.

Simply write on a postcard these words:

> The Portrait No.......... (here put number of portrait) in the current number of SHORT STORIES is mine. Please forward a £5 note.
> (Name and full address.)

Persons represented must claim for themselves. Claims made by other people on their behalf will be ignored.

"WOULD you oblige me," said the reporter, who gets novel interviews, "by telling me what book has helped you most in life?" And after a thoughtful pause the great man answered: "My bank-book."

"WONDERFULLY active old fellow that man Binks," said Cuffs. "He told me that his legs were so pliable he could kick himself in the back. I couldn't do that, and I'm not half his age." "You don't need to," said Hawkins. "Almost anybody would be glad to do it for you."

MISS COYGIRL: "Jack Softleigh told me last night that I ought to accept him because he was willing to prove his love for me." Her Friend: "What did you say?" Miss Coygirl: "I said I couldn't see it in that light." Her Friend: "Then what did he say?" Miss Coygirl: "Nothing. He just turned the light out."

A PASSER-BY stopped to look at a shop-window. "Walk in, sir," said the proprietor; "you will find anything you want inside." "I never buy at shops where the goods are not labelled." To which the shopkeeper (an old hand) replied: "We never label our articles, sir. Our prices are so low that people might think the goods were second-hand."

MR. SHARP: "I can make sixpence into ninepence." Bore: "How?" Mr. Sharp: "Give me sixpence, I'll show you." (The money changes hands.) Mr. Sharp: "Waiter! A threepenny cigar." (It is brought, and also the change, which Mr. Sharp hands to the Bore, who exclaims, "What's this?") Mr. Sharp: "You've got threepence, I've got threepence" (exhibiting cigar), "and the landlord's got threepence. That's ninepence, isn't it? Good day."

"MY dear friend," said a long-haired man to the manager of a travelling show, "is that unfortunate being really a cannibal?" and he indicated a South Sea Islander from Cork who was sitting on a divan. "Yes, sir; that great living curiosity was captured while in the act of roasting a Presbyterian minister over a slow fire." "Great Heavens!" gasped the countryman. "Can't you convert him?" "Convert him?" said the showman, with disgust. "Do you suppose the great British public would pay threepence a head to see a Christian."

"MY husband is very nice, but he has a temper. Has yours?" "Oh, yes, but he is always losing it!"

HE: "How is one to tell that a love is only platonic?" She: "Oh, well, when it develops into the other kind you can look back and see the difference."

MRS. BROWN: "Men are not what they used to be, if there is any truth in the old stories. Men used to think so much of women that they would die for them." Brown: "That's nothing. Didn't I think enough of you, dear, to live with you?"

HE: "Only one, just a little one." She: "Oh, no! I have no wish to be added to the list of girls you have kissed." He: "I have never kissed a girl in my life." She: "Oh! Then I'm not going to let you serve your apprenticeship on me."

SYMS: "Ah! my boy, you are to be envied. An artist's life is an ideal one. The affairs of everyday life do not engross you." Daubers (whose pictures do not sell): "Not a bit. Why we sometimes entirely overlook such prosaic matters as breakfast and dinner."

BINGO: "While I was matching that ribbon for you to-day a man came in and threw down a bomb. There was a terrible explosion, several people were killed, and I barely escaped with my life." Mrs. Bingo (anxiously): "You didn't lose that piece of ribbon, did you?"

Two Five Pound Notes Captured.

OF the first five portraits published two correct claims have been received. The names and addresses of the correct claimants are:

IN THE SERVICE OF THE TSAR.

The room was dingy and but poorly lighted. Around the long table in its centre were gathered the conspirators—the men who had sworn to kill the Tsar. A strange-looking appearance they made in the flickering candle-light; some with fierce faces marked with the bitter lines of hunger and of hate; some with the enthusiastic and wrapt expression of dreamers; others with the cold impassivity of great generals. One of the last-mentioned, colder, more impassive than the rest, sat at the foot of the table, facing the President. His manner showed not the slightest nervousness, not the slightest exhilaration. Yet in an hour he meant to betray the men who sat about him to the horrors of a living death on the bleak plains of Siberia, gaining thereby the lasting favour of his Imperial master. The blow that would ruin his comrades would make him.

The clock struck eight as the President rose to speak.

"Brothers," he began, "brothers, we have all sworn the same sacred vows, we have all stood the severe tests of our order—we can all be trusted. It becomes my duty, therefore, to speak out. Our days of plotting are passed; the time for action has come. At last we shall strike a decisive blow for liberty."

He paused, but no one spoke. There was not a sound in the room. Some breathed a little more quickly—that was all. Pointing to a powder-keg in a corner, the President continued:

"Our materials are at hand—our opportunity also. The Tsar visits Krasmoe-Selo on Thursday——"

The noise of a scuffle in the hall outside the door interrupted him. Several of the men who sat about the table sprang to their feet, the door burst open, and an officer followed by a squad of soldiers, rushed into the room. In an instant every one of the conspirators was covered by a rifle.

"You are my prisoners!" said the officer curtly.

"By what right?" exclaimed the President. He alone seemed cool; the rest stood as though paralysed. Ignoring the President, the officers glanced at the others.

"Line up against the wall," he ordered.

Silently they obeyed him—powerless to resist. The officer turned to his men and gave a sharp order. The soldiers raised their guns and aimed them at the defenceless breasts of the prisoners.

Again the President spoke:

"What do you mean to do?" he cried.

"To execute you at once," returned the officer coldly. Then to the soldiers: "Take aim. Fi——"

"Stop!"

The cry rang out loud and clear in the deadly stillness of the room, and the spy sprang forward from where he stood against the wall.

"Stop!" he cried.

"Get back," said the officer sternly; but the spy continued to advance. His coldness, his impassiveness, had disappeared; his face was yellow with fear; his teeth chattered; great drops of sweat stood on his forehead.

"No—no—you must not shoot me!" he shrieked. "I am of yourselves—I am an agent of the Third Section. It was I who informed against these men. If you kill me it will be murder—murder—murder!" He grovelled on the floor at the officer's feet.

The doomed men looked at the miserable wretch with bitter contempt, while in the President's eyes there was something that looked like triumph.

"An agent of the police," said the officer doubtfully. "You have your credentials?"

"Yes—yes!" screamed the wretch, tearing a piece of paper from his pocket and handing it to the officer. "It is there—it is there. Ah! my God!"

This last exclamation was one of renewed terror, for the soldiers, dropping their rifles, had sprung upon him, and were binding him hand and foot.

The President stepped forward with a smile.

"Brothers," said he to the amazed men, who still stood against the wall, "brothers, in a great cause like ours we cannot be too careful. This little scene was devised to discover what traitors we had amongst us. It has succeeded. You, who have proved faithful, are quite safe."

The men looked at him as though they could scarcely credit their senses. Then one or two began to sob, and one man laughed.

"And this spy?" he questioned.

A fierce murmur ran round the room. The men, with one accord, started towards the corner where the man lay bound.

"Kill him! kill him!" they shouted.

The President raised his hand.

"Stop!" cried he; "the man is mine—mine to punish as I see fit. Leave him to me. You will accompany our brother Vassoloff," indicating the pseudo officer, "to a place of refuge. From our friend's admission we are no longer safe here."

"But——"

"I have spoken," said the President sternly.

The conspirators turned and silently went out. As the man who had laughed passed the spy, he kicked him in the face, and laughed again.

Then the President was alone with the spy. He stood looking at him for a moment, with a cruel smile on his white-bearded face. Presently he took from his pocket a long fuse, placed one end in the powder-keg, and wound the other about one of the tallow candles, an inch from the burning wick. Then he placed the candle in front of the spy's face, where he could almost touch it, and, turning, went to the door. At the threshold he paused.

"Your fate will be a lesson to your fellow spies," he said, and was gone. The spy heard his steps as he went down the passage; he counted them till they died away in the awful silence of the night. Then he looked at the candle. How long would it take an inch of tallow to burn? The police would not come till nine. Would it last till then? He looked at the clock. Twenty minutes past eight. Would that inch of tallow last forty minutes If it should not, would being blown up be so painful?

He looked at the candle again. It seemed to melt away before his eager gaze. He tried to shriek, but could not. The bruise on his face where the man had kicked him hurt fearfully; he became unconscious. He dreamed of his mother, dead years before. He thought that he was a child again, and that she had taken him on her lap, and was telling him the old stories that he loved. It was summer, and he could hear the reapers singing. . . . He laughed with happiness.

New serial starts to day.

He opened his eyes. The darkness of the room frightened him, and he tried to call his mother. The gag was still in his mouth, and like a flash the whole dreadful sickening truth came back to him. The hands of the clock pointed to twenty minutes before nine, and the candle was more than half burned. He shook like a leaf; a dreadful nausea sickened him.

Again he looked at the clock. Ten minutes to nine. The candle seemed to burn slower. Was there still hope? Would the police come on time—would they come on time? He strained his ears to hear their coming, but there was no sound. Good God! would they be late?

It was five minutes to nine. He tried to pray. He was lost. No! At last he could hear the soldiers approaching; but the clock was striking nine. A knock on the door, and the flame had touched the fuse. He watched the spark as it crept like a snake across the floor, nearer, nearer, nearer to the keg. He tried to scream . . . The sound of a door being broken open. . . . The footsteps of men on the passage outside the door, but the spark had reached the keg! A flash——

* * * * *

A second later, when the soldiers entered, they saw a sight that frightened even them, used to fearful sights as they were. A dead man, bound and gagged lay upon the floor. His face was green with terror, his hair snow-white, and his eyes red, staring, and protruding.

On the floor was the black mark where the fuse had burned, and in one corner was a powder-keg— empty!

BY THE BALTIC.

"Lieschen, child, I must say adieu. I know not when I shall see thee again."

"Adieu, then, Gustav. A pleasant journey to you! If you didn't come back for fifty years you would find me still here, milking the cows and attending to the household. Life here is much the same year by year."

"And thou would'st not fret, Lieschen, if I did not come for fifty years?"

He spoke as though he scarcely knew whether to jest or be in earnest, and stood watching her with a wistful, doubtful smile. She was making buttermilk cheeses at the dresser by the scullery window, and he was leaning in over the window-sill, with a pipe smouldering in one hand, while the other kept breaking off little twigs and leaves of the roses that clambered all round the window, and made a pretty frame to his sunburnt face and broad shoulders.

Lieschen laughed at his question, as she shaped the little white cheeses all speckled over with carraway-seeds, and did not look up.

"You would be about a hundred years old then, Gustav, I should think," was the only remark she made.

"No, come, Lieschen, that is cruel of you. I am only thirty-eight—more than twice your age, it is true, but not nearly fifty. And it is something to have a fine farm and a good new house. and the only carriage on Rugen, even if your husband is old enough to know white from black."

"Yes, I know," said Lieschen, indifferently, "but there is plenty of time yet."

Gustav Baier bit his lip and frowned uneasily as he looked at her.

"Thou dost not care, Lieschen, 'tis plain to see," he said bitterly. "I think thou hast no heart at all, for all thine eyes are so sweet and thy ways so gentle. Thou'rt some mermaiden from the sea here, and one day wilt vanish like the foam. Is it not so?"

"I didn't make myself," retorted the girl, petulantly, "and I never asked you to come and fall in love with me. If you're not satisfied"—she drew the gold betrothal ring from her finger—"here's your ring. Give it to somebody that has a heart for you."

He left the window abruptly, and she glanced up flushed and frightened, not knowing what he meant to do. The next minute he came in at the door from the yard, and went up to the table where she stood with the ring in her open hand.

"Come, come, we mustn't quarrel," he said, peaceably, replacing the ring, and drawing her on his knee as he sat on the dresser. "I shall not be satisfied till that ring is on the other hand, and you come away home with me. Give me a kiss now, and say you love me."

Lieschen hung her head, and her big brown eyes filled with tears.

"What, crying!" he remonstrated, taking her chin in his great rough hand, and turning her unwilling face round towards him. "Thunder and lightning, why, so she is! You spoil those eyes, my pretty one. What's it all about? Art not happy, Lieschen?"

"Yes, quite," she said with a gulp, "if you would let me alone, Gustav. I am yours now—what more do you want? You say I have no heart; I can't give you what I haven't got."

"Why, that's true. Give me kisses instead, then," said he magnanimously—"enough for fifty years, in case I do not see thee again."

"Stupid old Gustav!" cried the girl laughing and struggling. "There, that will do! Put me down, Gustav."

"Ach! See, now, these lovers, these lovers!" cried an old shrill voice in the doorway. "Tears and smiles and kisses, kisses and smiles and tears! So runs the world away, and the old folk are forgotten."

"Lieschen counts me one of the old folk, nurse," remarked Gustav, pausing to speak, but holding his prisoner helpless the while in his great strong arms.

"Tut, tut, child! Not many maidens of sixteen can boast such a fine, brave lover as thine, with his broad farm and his grand new house and steading, and everything heart can desire. Not but what thou canst bring him linen enough to stock the house, were it twice the size it is; but he had no need to seek out a simple child like thee to be his bride."

"So I tell him, nurse. I didn't want him—— O Gustav!" Her speech was smothered in his great, red beard.

"Good-bye, dearest!" he said at last, putting her down. "Take care of her for me, nurse. I don't think it will be fifty years before I come again," he added, turning to Lieschen as he went out; "though to me, at least, it will seem twice as long."

Perhaps the wistful look in his eyes, or the sadness that crept into his voice as he said these last words, touched the girl—perhaps she loved him after all; anyhow, before he had crossed the threshold, she ran after him, and slipped her hand into his.

"I'll go as far as the gate with you, Gustav," she said; and they walked away down the yard together.

"Look at my young ducks, Gustav; aren't they growing fast? and the chickens, too! And look at those lazy geese; they do nothing but feed and sleep. Do you know, I brought them all up, every one of them."

"Ay, thou'rt a brave housewife, Lieschen; and if thou lovest thy father now, and servest him so well, I doubt not thou'lt love me when the time comes. Adieu! Herzliebchen! Be good and happy, and don't forget me—eh?"

"No, you dear, good Gustav! Adieu! Come soon again!" And so they parted.

"Nurse," said Lieschen, re-entering the scullery, "how do people come to have hearts?"

"Good gracious! What does the child mean? Hearts? Why, they are born so!" exclaimed the old woman taking off her spectacles, the better to see her young questioner. "What art thou chattering about!"

"Gustav says I have no heart, nurse," she replied, sitting on the old woman's knee and stroking her white hair; "and I think he is right. How do we get a heart?"

"Herr Gustav should rejoice that thou hast none," said the old nurse, looking thoughtfully into the bright young face with her dim eyes; "it comes by suffering—suffering and sorrow and trial and weeping and loving—loving brings it all. They say the heart is like the steel in iron, 'tis there, but you cannot have it till it has gone through the terrible fires and been beaten on the anvil. The good God save thee from finding thine; for truly I think 'twould be thy death, my little flower."

"But see," she said, pointing to the window, "is it not that thy Gustav come back again? Run, child, and see what brings him."

Lieschen ran out into the yard, but stopped suddenly short petrified with fear at the sight that met her eyes.

"Bring him in—so—gently," Gustav was saying; and two farm-servants followed him, bearing between them the apparently lifeless body of a young man—the head fallen back, the eyes closed, the lips parted, the hands hanging limply down, the clothes stained here and there with blood.

"Run away, child, run away! 'tis no sight for thee," Gustav called out, when he saw her standing there white and frightened. "We want the nurse."

Then he turned to the old woman, who had come out, and explained rapidly, Lieschen, instead of running away, listened eagerly to every word.

"There has been a duel—unless it was darker work. We found him in the wood up yonder, bleeding to death. Where can we lay him down? The nearer the better—here, on this sofa?"

"Oh, anywhere—yes!" cried Lieschen, brimming over with pity.

And so they laid him down on the sofa in the little sitting-room, and then Gustav not unkindly, but quite irresistibly, put Lieschen outside the door.

Soon the old nurse came out hurriedly. Her eye fell upon the girl's white face, and she sent her to fetch a bundle of old linen from the press in the garret, as quick as might be, while she herself went for water.

When Lieschen came flying back, the nurse had returned to the side of the wounded man, and she stole in after her with the linen. She could hardly repress the cry of pain and pity that rose to her lips when she saw the death-like pallor of the face lying back on Gustav's supporting shoulder; but she felt that she must be very quiet if she would not draw attention to the fact that she had come in unbidden.

The nurse took the linen from her hands, without noticing her at all; and then Gustav helping with his disengaged hand gently unfastened and laid open the young man's coat, disclosing a white shirt all soaked in blood.

"Cut it—cut it!" said Gustav impatiently; "there's no time to lose."

"What a pity! and the linen so fair and fine," lamented the nurse, in an undertone. "The lad is noble, no doubt."

"No doubt," echoed Gustav; "but, noble or not, he must die if we can't staunch this bleeding at once. If only I had both hands free!" he muttered, exasperated at the tremulous slowness of the old woman. "This won't do; and not a soul in the house to help. Here, Lieschen, you must be useful. Come and hold his head—so, so—upon your shoulder. Lucky I've [illegible] much of this in the war, and know what to be at," he remarked to himself. And Lieschen knelt and took the heavy fainting head upon her bosom, and closed her eyes to shut out the sight of blood that almost overcame her.

"Yes, he is noble," she thought to herself, trying to keep still and patient under the weight that began to make her limbs ache and tremble. "His hair is like the sunshine, and all waving—like that picture of an angel in my Bible," she thought noting him curiously; "and his forehead is so white that the veins show through. No doubt he is an officer"—this she merely inferred from "the knightly growth that fringed his upper lip." —"and how beautiful he is! Gustav is handsome but not like him"; and she could almost have laughed at the idea of a comparison between great broad Gustav, with his sun-browned face, fine rough-hewn features, and big red beard, and the delicate refinement and almost womanly fairness of the other face.

At length Gustav released her, and laid the lad, as he called him—he looked about five-and-twenty—gently down on the pillows.

"He may do now," he said, after watching him a little while. "I must leave him to your care, nurse, and that of Herr Uterhart. You will explain it—what little we know—when he returns to-night. Good-bye, heart's darling! Thou'lt be a first-rate nurse ere I come again"; and he kissed his betrothed on either cheek and went away.

It was drawing towards evening. A familiar clatter of wooden shoes on the stones outside warned Lieschen that it was time to go a-milking. She stole out, tied on her great sun-bonnet, took up her stool and pail, and followed the women away to the meadows, as she did morning and evening all the summer through.

The shadows were growing very long and the colours fading in the western sky when they came back; and Lieschen still had her young ducks and fowls to shut up for the night. As she crossed and recrossed the yard—now with a can of water, now with the pail and stool ready for the morning—she sang in a shrill sweet voice some of those lovely plaintive Volkslieder—those "songs of love and longing," of endless wandering, seeking, and yearning, that have sprung from the heart of the German people.

Before going into the house, all her work done, she wandered down on to the sea-shore, and stood there dreamily looking over the smooth water into the fading sky, and listening to the splash of the little waves falling on the sand. She thought of what Gustav had said about the mermaiden, and thought it would be sweet to float away on the quiet tide, under the glimmering sky, and see the little stars light up one after another in the glimmering green up there, and watch the flights of birds winging over, and sing beside the boats of fishermen at their nightly toil, and dip down at sunrise—down, down among sea-weed forests, where strange wild creatures swim in and out, and the sea-flowers bloom, and the mermaidens sit combing their long golden hair under the tideless Baltic sea.

She was a strange, romantic child, this Lieschen, full of dreams and longings and fancies; and this seemed better to her than to be a creature of flesh and blood, with a human heart and human hope, and blessed with the love of man.

"And they live three hundred years," she murmured half-aloud, as the light died off the sea, "unless they strive to win an immortal soul by the love of a living man; if they fail they vanish into the sea-foam on the day when he weds another. But there is never, never found a man. He gives his love to a creature of his own sphere, and the foam ever gathers on the sea. If I were a mermaid, though," a shy, proud smile gleamed over her face, "I would not fail."

Lieschen was sitting in the sick room one hot summer afternoon, her patient asleep on the couch, and the warm fragrant air floating in with the murmuring of bees at the open window.

Her work lay in her lap, but her hands were idle, and her eyes gazing dreamily out at the sky, while very, very low and softly she sang, "War ich ein Vogelin."

"Brava, brava!" murmured a voice from the couch behind her. "A sweet voice and a sweet song!"

Lieschen coloured at his praise, and went and knelt by his side.

"I thought you were asleep. You are stronger—you feel better; life is coming back!" she said, in a voice quite tremulous with joy. "You have been so ill, do you not know it?"

He smiled faintly.

"How long have I been here?" he asked.

"Nearly three weeks," she answered. "See, how thin!" and she lifted up the hand that lay on the coverlet, and showed him how wasted it had grown.

He looked at it with a languid sort of curiosity, and then let it fall heavily by his side, and turned his head on the pillow to look at her.

She was a good sight for sick eyes to rest upon, with her pretty brown hair and great gentle brown eyes so full of womanly pity, tenderness, and submission, and, withal, dreamy and wistful as a child's eyes.

"And who art thou, dear child?" he asked presently.

"I am Elise Uterhart—Lieschen they call me. This is my home. I live here with my father and nurse, and keep the house."

"And hast thou nursed me all these weeks?"

"Yes," she answered, "and I have prayed for you when I thought you were dying, and see, the dear Lord has heard. You live, and you will grow strong again."

"Dear child! I owe thee my life. What can I give thee or do for thee?"

Lieschen blushed, her eyes faltered from his face, and she looked down in silence.

"Indeed, I know not; 'tis nothing I have done, only watching," stammered Lieschen. "Tell me your name," and she once more raised her eyes to his.

He tried to hold out his hand, and she put hers into it

"Let be, then," he said slowly; "there is time enough My name? My name is Otto von der Lanken; I——'

"Ach! You are tired," interrupted the girl, seeing a helpless look come into his eyes as he broke off. "Drink this, and do not speak any more."

She raised his head with one arm, and he drank the milk she held to his lips. Then she laid him down upon the pillows, and went back to her seat by the window, he watching her with the idle look of a man still too weak to speculate about things, or think any thoughts, but one or two that seemed of themselves to pass in and out of his brain.

Lieschen smiled, and shook her head at him.

"Shut your eyes and sleep," said she, with a pretty little authoritative air.

"Sing, then," he murmured, inclined to dictate his own terms, and watching her every gesture with passive enjoyment; "sing to me."

Lieschen could think of no song but the one she had been singing when he woke, which was still running in her head, and she sang it:

"Ach! wie ist's moglich dann Dass ich Dich lassen kann?"

"Ah! can it ever be
That I should part from thee?"

When she had finished she turned and looked at him, and saw tears standing in his eyes.

"'Tis very sweet,' he murmured, "and plain to see that thou knowest what love is. Sing again—the last verse again."

So she sang it again:

"Were I a birdie wee,
And by thy side would be,
Fearing nor hawk nor kite,
To thee swift I'd fly.
Pierced by the hunter's dart,
I'd nestle next thy heart:
If one tear dimmed thy eye,
Glad then I'd die."

And he closed his eyes and slept.

So the slow summer days went by. Every day he grew a little stronger, and by degrees she gathered from him the story of the duel which had so nearly been fatal to him; how he and his friend had quarrelled about a lady, and had fought.

"I suppose they thought me dead, and left me," said Otto. "One has not much time to waste on these occasions. Poor Rudolf! He will have fled; but he can come back now, since no harm is done."

"And the lady?" asked Lieschen, breathlessly.

"She will marry Rudolf, no doubt," replied Otto, with a hard laugh; "and I shall dance at the wedding."

Lieschen said nothing; but the great dark eyes that rested on his face were lighted with a new fire, a burning worship; an unspeakable devotion; her heart beat, and her pulses thrilled with a new, sweet, mysterious pain. The die was cast.

At last there came a day—Oh, those days, those few days that make up the earthly history of a life! Some all in white, and garlanded with fresh flowers of spring; some flaming in gold and crowned with sunshine; some—some there must be—draped deep in black. There they are, within the veiled future, coming slowly, surely on, each in its appointed time, neither sooner for our longing, nor later for our agony of fear; and we cannot choose but take them all and bear them until the last sands have run, and there are no more. There came a day when Otto von der Lanken bade farewell. He went through the garden looking for his little nurse, to say good-bye to her. Then he saw little footmarks in the sandy path, under the roses and syringas, that led down on to the shore. He followed them, and found Lieschen standing by the tide, looking out to sea.

"Lieschen," he said, coming up to her, "I am come to say goodbye!"

"Oh, not to-day!" cried Lieschen, clasping her hands and looking up at him with her great, piteous eyes. "Not so soon!"

"I am well again, and strong now," he answered, "thanks to my good little Lieschen; and it is time to be up and doing. And now," he added, seeing the tears rush to her eyes, "now what can I do for thee, sweet child? Ask what thou wilt."

She looked up at him a moment, standing there, so tall and straight and fair, with the sun on his bright hair and the blue sky shining in his eyes; and then she put her hands over her face, and sobbed aloud like a child.

Then he drew a step nearer. "Dear little Lieschen, don't cry, for pity's sake! What can I do for thee? Tell me."

"Oh, give me your love—your love!" she cried passionately. "Love me, if only a little!" and then she broke down utterly, and leaned her little brown head against his arm, crying bitterly.

"Why, that thou hast, dear one—not a little, but a great deal. Who could help loving thee?" he answered soothingly. "Ask something harder for my love thou hast."

After a long pause, she looked up through her tears.

"And thou wilt—thou wilt come back one day?"

"Why, surely," said he, "I am not worth all these tears, pretty one! Be happy, right happy, till I come again. Adieu now, sweet child!"

He stooped and kissed her on the forehead, and went away up the sand, turning under the syringas to wave another farewell, and then she heard his horse's hoofs clattering up the yard, and he was gone.

Gone! How it haunted her day after day as she passed in and out of the house, empty of his presence; down the garden and the meadows, which knew his step and voice no more; and upon the shore, where he had bidden her farewell! Weeks passed before she at all turned from the feeling of missing him so sorely to the hope of his return.

But he did not come—not even when it was spring and the early leaves came out, and the clouds lifted and shone white in the young sunshine, and the birds sang merrily.

Gustav came and went, and began to urge the marriage. Perhaps he saw that his betrothed was losing the pretty roses in her cheeks, and that the light in her eyes was growing sad and strange; and he—knowing, as none but he knew, how much he loved her—longed to take her to himself in his own home, and make her happy.

So they fixed a day at last, and Lieschen, like one in a dream, helped the old nurse to make all the preparations, and plied her needle busily.

All was ready at length, and two days before the wedding Lieschen stood on the shore, her work done, and

A SOLDIER SAVED.

Bile Beans Repair War's Ravages.

Our soldiers now in the field have other dangers besides Boer bullets continually besetting them. Colds, rheumatism, chest affections, and serious liver and digestive disorders are all enemies as dangerous as any armed force. Disease kills more than war. These ailments are often contracted by civilians in the more peaceful walks of life, but to a civilian or soldier whom they attack Chas. Forde's Bile Beans for Biliousness are a boon.

Mr. Geo. Hy. Biggins, of Grange Villas, Grange Street, Hull, testifies to their excellence. He served under Sir Charles Warren in South Africa, and was nine months in Mafeking. Some hard campaigning fell to his lot, and though he bears no scar of the battlefield, misfortunes have come to him in another shape. An Eastern Morning News reporter who called upon him the other day was certainly able to observe in him nothing but a fine healthy type of the British soldier, yet Mr. Biggins owes his present healthy condition exclusively to Chas. Forde's Bile Beans for Biliousness, and he has not always looked as well as he does to-day. "I have known the time," he said, "when I used to be strangely overcome by a chilly sensation. I felt it all over my body; and it seemed to be the result of being altogether run down.

"I felt languid and too weary and weak to do anything. My joints ached as if I had rheumatism all over me, and many a time I had difficulty in keeping up with my duties. I began to suffer from biliousness, too, and to experience a nasty sharp pain at my heart. This pain continued to get worse. Whenever I moved quickly it commenced, and I had to go slowly to get ease. So bad did it become at last that I felt convinced I had heart disease. Of course, I tried to get relief, and purchased all kinds of medicines in vain until I tried Chas. Forde's Bile Beans for Biliousness. The result was most satisfactory. I noticed an improvement after the first few doses, and so went on taking them.

"They soon ended the biliousness, and from first commencing to take them I have never again felt the pain in the chest. Bile Beans have completely cured me, and I am frequently recommending them to persons I find suffering as I did. While at Gosport I gave some to a gunner, and his mother-in-law derived great benefit from them. Only the other night my little daughter was quite out of sorts, and I gave her a few half beans. The next day she was all right again. I can tell you my family, both young and old, have used them with marvellous results." Wherever Chas. Forde's Bile Beans for Biliousness are used marvellous results follow. For liver chill, colds, rheumatism, indigestion, anæmia, dizziness, kidney disorders, constipation, debility, headache, nervousness, female ailments, and as a preventive of influenza they are unequalled. Of all chemists, or post free from the Bile Bean Manufacturing Co., 119 London Wall, E.C., by sending price one and three halfpence or two and nine, no more to do but wait now for the dawning of the day that was to bring Gustav and make her his wife.

As she stood there she seemed to hear a voice answering her own thoughts:

"Thou wilt lose all, bethink thee well—all if thou fail. Thy father's love thy peaceful home, thy fair name, thy good, honest husband—all will be lost!"

"Alas, alas, I know it!" she answered weeping; "but I cannot, I will not fail!"

She went into the house and looked into the sitting-room. There sat her father in his chair asleep, the pipe still between his fingers, and the room dim with smoke. Her lips seemed to frame some word they vainly sought to utter, and then with a choking, stifled sob, she turned and stole away—away out of the house, across the meadows, and on towards the shore of the other side of the promontory on which lay her father's farm.

She was not strong, but something within her gave her power to walk all night in the chill spring weather. Long before noon the next day she had caught the Stralsund steamer on its backward way, and was being carried across the water to Stralsund.

She felt no weariness, no hunger, thirst, or cold, and only longed to be on foot once more. She was quite familiar with the quaint town, and hurried up the quay, across the Water Street, and up under the dark, shadowy Zemlower Gateway, along the quiet streets where grass grows between the stones of the pavement, and the old gabled houses have looked down for hundreds of years upon the simple burgher-life below. She went through the town and out into the country beyond, past many a pleasant little farm where the storks were patching up their great nests on the thatched barns and cow-houses, and making their curious rattling cry as they flew to and fro.

She remembered that the storks used to bring the summer in old days, and all good gifts when they came back, and that this spring they had not yet come to her home on Rügen.

In one little village she asked for a drink of milk, and they made her eat and rest a little while; but she was restless and anxious to be gone so they let her go, though the wind was rising and blowing sharp and keen, and little flakes of snow were flying through the air.

By nightfall a fierce storm was blowing, and the air was thick with driving snow. Lieschen asked shelter at a farm lying a little back from the high road.

"How far is it to Friedenhagen?" she asked.

"What, hast thou friends at Friedenhagen? In the service of the Count von der Lanken, then?"

"Yes, I have a friend there," answered the girl, with a faint smile. "Is it far now?"

"Why, thou wilt not walk it, surely? 'Tis a good four hours from here."

"Oh, I am very strong," answered Lieschen bravely. "Only let me sleep here, and then I shall be able to do it."

So she slept there; but very early in the morning she rose and stole away, out on to the snowy road in the cutting pitiless wind, leaving behind her, as a token of her gratitude, the only thing she had to give—her betrothal ring.

"She has a sad story, doubtless, poor thing!" said the good people, shaking their heads over it; and they put it away, and forgot all about it and her.

Meanwhile, she pressed on till it was drawing towards noon; and then the walls and turrets of the great Schloss Friedenhagen rose dimly through the falling snow. At every step her tired feet grew heavier, the snow glared upon her aching eyes, and the cold wind seemed to pierce her through and through: but still she struggled on, and stood at length under the great porte-cochère, and rang the bell.

She had no thought of her soiled and draggled clothes, or of the impression she might make upon the servants; no thought at all of them, but only of him, of Otto von der Lanken, and that another moment must bring them face to face.

She heard bells ringing merrily—was it only phantom music in her tired brain? And then the door opened, and a rough voice demanded her business and her name.

"Who are you, and what are you here about on such a day as this?"

Lieschen vaguely fancied he was referring to the snow, and timidly asked to see the young Herr Graf.

The man laughed aloud.

"A pretty request truly! Come another day, mein Fräulein. Know you not that the young Herr Graf has just brought home his bride, and is to-day receiving the congratulations of all his noble friends? The gracious lord would be somewhat astonished, I take it, to see a beggar maiden like you among the train. Make way, make way," and he pushed her hastily aside as a gay carriage came rolling up the drive.

Lieschen turned away faint, stunned, exhausted, broken-hearted; and the guests went laughing and chatting up the steps and into the great hall, and the door was shut.

Two days later a big, broad-shouldered man with a sun-browned face and red beard, came riding along the snowy road towards Friedenhagen. The storm was over, but the great drifts still lay piled by the roadside, deep and broad and white. The green buds of spring were withered on the boughs; sullen clouds moved slow against the leaden sky and huddled in great banks about the south and west. It was freezing, but the bitter wind was still. The horseman's face was sad and stern, and he looked absently at the snow as he rode along, when suddenly a great cry broke from his lips. He flung down the reins and sprung to the ground.

"Lieschen, Lieschen, my little Lieschen!"

For there, covered but not hidden by the snow, he discovered something—something that told him all, almost before his eyes had fully seen it—a few shadows, a few curved lines, a sweeping tress of dark brown hair. He fell down beside the still, unheeding form, and put back the matted hair that was blown across the face, and kissed the frozen eyes, and frozen parted lips, the little frozen hands in vain: dead, stark dead, his little Lieschen—frozen in the drifted snow!

This was the end of it all. He saw his ring was gone from her finger, but how or why he could not guess. He only knew she had fled from her wedding day and from him, and dimly felt that Otto von der Lanken might be the cause—whether innocent or guilty he could not tell, and littled cared to know, since all was lost.

And Otto von der Lanken never knew.

"That pretty child will have forgotten me," he said once to himself that spring, when something reminded him of his promise at parting from her, "and will have married the good Baier by this time, or I might send for her to wait upon my wife."

Mr. GEO. R. SIMS' HAIR RENEWER.

Called by him "TATCHO."

(Romany: "Genuine," "Good," "True.")

Now Mr. G. R. Sims, as many people know, is one of the busiest men in the kingdom, but hastily affixing his signature to a letter, he looked up and extended a characteristically cordial welcome. Then he said: "I will explain. I found that I was rapidly going bald. Not seriously, you understand, but the thinning out was sufficiently marked to set me thinking out a remedy. I went to two specialists, both of whom cheerfully assured me that I should be absolutely bald in two years.

"Then I discovered the preparation which is now placed upon the market. I found that I had hit upon a remedy capable of working wonders. Look at my hair now, isn't that convincing evidence of the value of my preparation.

"Ladies confirm my good opinion of it as a dressing for daily use. Mrs. Brown Potter, whose beautiful hair is the admiration of the entire lady world, writes that she uses nothing but 'Tatcho.' There is nothing to prevent every woman from making her hair silken in texture and bountiful in volume, for she can obtain a bottle of 'Tatcho' now in every town or even village."

In order that the public may be able to test the superlative value of Mr. Geo R. Sims' discovery, the Company is issuing large 4/6 size test bottles post free for 1/10, under plain cover, one of which may be had on application. Please cut off the corner of this advertisement where marked, and send with name and address, legibly written, to the—

A NEW SERIAL STORY begins in this number. It is written by Mr. H. T. Johnson, one of the most popular authors of the day. You will find it to be a thoroughly fascinating novel from the first to the last line. Personally, I read it with breathless interest when it was first placed in my hands, and more recently, on a second reading, I have found my pleasure has not waned. To my mind, it is one of the best things Mr. Johnson has ever written, and that's saying a good deal.

THE interest in the photo competition grows apace, and looks like proving a huge success. For the first five portraits published several claims came to hand. These were duly investigated, with the result that the two gentlemen whose names are given on page 503 each captured a five-pound note. They are to be congratulated on being the originals of portraits Nos. 2 and 4. The other claims were found to be incorrect. We are sorry, because we are simply dying to get rid of some more fivers. If your portrait isn't on page 502 don't get disheartened. There are a lot to be published yet.

ADVICE TO READERS ON VARIOUS MATTERS.

(Replies to Correspondents.)

"PATER" has a little boy who is afflicted with stammering, and he asks if I can suggest a cure.

Stammering is the result of a highly nervous temperament. Sufferers, in their great haste to speak, send so much energy to the vocal organs that these cannot act fast enough for the voice to escape, and the result is confusion. In the case of children, care should be taken of their general health, and those who are with them most should talk gently and slowly, carefully pronouncing each syllable. It is a great mistake to correct children for stammering; instead, they should be encouraged to open their mouths and take in breath before beginning to speak slowly and softly. Persons of all ages who stammer will derive great benefit from reading aloud carefully (especially books with conversations, etc.) and seldom reading to themselves without forming each word with the mouth.

"J. P." wishes to know a cure for sea-sickness.

Bromide of potassium taken in large doses before sailing, and in small doses after, is said to be one of the best remedies for the prevention of sea-sickness. Another plan which is supposed to be infallible is to rub the head immediately at the back of the ears until the skin is slightly excoriated, as this excites a certain nerve on which it is thought that sea-sickness is dependent. Persons who advance this theory for the cure of sea-sickness strengthen their claim to its efficacy by the fact that deaf mutes in whom the nerve thus agitated does not exist, never suffer from this distressing complaint. There is one consolation for those who are like the boy who complained that his dinner wouldn't stay swallowed, and that is that sea sickness is supposed to do you a world of good, but it would take a miracle to convince anyone suffering from the malady of this fact.

"POSTSCRIPT" has a large quantity of postage stamps, British and foreign. They are of no use to a collector, being of the common varieties only, and he asks me if I know of any use to which they can be put.

He might, with a little trouble, transform them into very pretty decorative mosaic work. The first thing is to thoroughly soak them, so that they no longer adhere to the paper, and the best way is to immerse them in water for some time. Then proceed to arrange them in geometrical patterns, cutting some diagonally across where the design needs it, or in halves. They can be adapted to the designs published for patchwork. The chief point to aim at is to select a good pattern, to keep it uniform, and to blend the colouring well. When these have been mastered it is very ornamental work, applied to the tops of tables, small cabinets, boxes, frames, letter-cases, screens, etc. It requires to be sized, and varnished with clear crystal varnish

YES, "H. P.," it is quite true that only about one out of every three or four hundred bullets fired in a battle is effective. Here are an expert's statistics on the question. When Frederick the Great defeated the Austrians at the battle of Czaslau, May 17th, 1742, out of every 357 shots fired by the Prussians only one Austrian was killed or wounded. In the campaigns of 1805 and 1806, when the great Napoleon was victorious everywhere, only one man was killed or wounded out of every 3,000 shots, and in 1813 and 1814, 10,000 shots were fired to kill or wound one man. Bautzen was an exception, for there 714 balls were fired for one man hors de combat. At the battle of Vittoria, Wellington's army fired 500 shots for one man killed or wounded. At Solferino in 1859 the Austrians fired 8,400,000 cartridges, and only killed and wounded 12 000 French soldiers, or one man out of every 700 shots. In the campaign of 1864 and 1866 the average was sixty-six shots for one man hors de combat. In the terrible battles of 1870-21, 250 shots were fired for every man killed or wounded.

XII.—THE LAST CARD. The Story of a Wager.

By DONOVAN MART.

CHAPTER I.

Montagu Goldstein, money-lender, sat in his private office in East Street, Leeds, for all the world like a wizened old spider in the centre of his web, waiting for a fat and juicy fly.

Montagu Goldstein had a smile upon his face which cannot be said to have enhanced the attractiveness of his features, unattractive enough when in repose, though in some ways his face was unlike that of the typical son of Israel so often depicted in the pages of fiction and on the stage. His nose was only slightly hooked, and his thick lips and receding chin were hidden by long grey hair. He had scarcely any eyebrows, and though Nature had been beneficent to him as regards the hirsute adornment of the lower part of his face, she had been woefully sparing towards his crown, which was, to all intents and purposes, bald.

He was little more than five feet in stature, and had long skinny hands which seemed specially adapted for a man of his trade and calling.

On this gloomy autumn morning in November he sat poring over a dirty little account book which, notwithstanding its outward appearance, contained a vast amount of documentary evidence to show how far-reaching was the influence wielded by Montagu Goldstein.

Suddenly their came a knock at the door, and a lanky out-at-elbow youth, who might very well have stood as a model for Smike in "Nicholas Nickleby," entered. This creature sidled up to the table of the money-lender and said in a quavering, husky voice:

"Mr. Mark Spalding to see you."

The Jew's eyes narrowed; they always did when their owner was pleased about anything.

"Show him in," he said curtly.

The servant retired as he had entered, in a sidling, crab-like way. Scarcely had he departed than the door opened again, and a young man, well dressed, with a pale, rather weak face, a faint moustache adorning his upper lip, and with watery-blue eyes, entered.

"Good morning, Mr. Spalding," said the money-lender benignantly. "It was a pleasure to see you always. And of course you have come to settle that little account, eh? Sit down and I will give you a receipt in a few moments, and if at any other time Montagu Goldstein can accommodate you, well, you know Montagu!"

The young man gave vent to a nervous laugh, and flung himself down on the ricketty chair offered to him with a would-be air of indifference.

"I am afraid I can't pay you this morning, Mr. Goldstein," he said. "I've come to ask you to give me a bit longer."

The Jew squared his elbows on the table, and leant forward with an ominous look upon his face.

"I am afraid I can't do that, Mr. Spalding," he said. "You see, the bill has been due already some time. I am a poor man, and business is business. You came to me and said you were in a bother, and I lent you the money without a word. Now, when I ask you to pay as a gentleman, you tell me you can't. No, no, sir; I must have my forty pounds or I must take proceedings."

The young man took a cigarette from a silver etui and lit it with a very badly assumed air of nonchalance.

"By Jove, Goldstein," he said, "you do know how to lay it on. So the ten pounds I borrowed have become forty now. Well, look here. I can't possibly pay you now. I'll own I wanted that ten pounds so badly that I was ready to overlook your exorbitant interest, but my allowance doesn't come in till next week, and I'll pay you fifty then, if only you'll give me a little longer?"

But the money-lender shook his head.

"Business is business!" he repeated obstinately. "If gentlemen want to borrow money, well, it's only fair that we poor people who accommodate you should make a little profit" (if 100 per cent. is a little profit, there was justification in Goldstein's words); "either you pay me now, or I go to your father and tell him how his son plays cards with all the other young gentlemen in Leeds."

"Not that! not that!" cried Spalding in terror. "Why my father would disown me. He abhors card-playing more than anything else in the world, and you would be farther off than ever from getting your money."

"I'm not so sure about that," answered the Jew shrewdly; "I'm not at all sure that Mr. Anthony Spalding, one of the most respected mill-owners in Leeds, wouldn't be ready to pay a good deal rather than have all the city know how his son spends his time."

"Then it's very plain you don't know my father," came the quick answer. "He'd kick me out of the house, and tell you to go to blazes. You can take my word for that."

The Jew made no answer for a few moments. His crafty little eyes, keen as a hawk's, scrutinised the young man's face with preternatural sharpness. He was far too cunning to show what was passing in his brain, yet at the same time he realised that Mark Spalding's fear of his father was tempered by the reflection that the mill-owner would sooner disown his son than pay debts for such an abhorred pastime as card-playing.

"Well, what do you propose to do, then?" he said slowly. "How is poor Goldstein going to get his money?"

"Give me another week," came the almost despairing request, "and I'll find you fifty pounds somehow."

"And if you don't, what then?"

"Oh, but I will—I will! Something's sure to turn up by then."

Again came silence.

"Well, look here," said Goldstein suddenly, his wheedling, almost cringing voice suddenly changing its accent and becoming harsh and authoritative. "I'm not going to be played fast and loose with much longer. I'll give you till the end of next week on one consideration. Either you find me the fifty pounds as you promised, or the debt becomes doubled, and I get one hundred pounds from you any way you like. No, on second thoughts, if you again fail me I shall go at once to your father and you will be ruined in every way. I've had enough of your shilly-shallying. Will you promise to pay me fifty pounds next week?"

"I suppose I must," came the hopeless answer; "though it's the most sickening case of bloodsucking I've ever heard of."

"Bloodsucking, eh?" snarled the other; "didn't you come to me and say, 'Goldstein, I must have ten pounds; if I don't have ten pounds at once I am a ruined man,' and didn't I accommodate you at once, and am I to get you out of a difficulty for nothing? No, no, sir; when it's a question of business, business has to come first. I've got to earn my living, just as you have to yours, and if I weren't to charge a little interest how on earth could I hope to make both ends meet in these hard times?"

Spalding rose to his feet with an impatient gesture.

"Well, that's settled, then?" he said, with the air of a reprieved criminal. "I'm to give you fifty pounds next week, and all is to be over between us?"

"Not so fast, my young friend," answered the Jew, with an exasperating familiarity. "I must have your signature to that little bit of business, if you please. Merely a matter of form, I know, in dealing with a gentleman like you; but at the same time, as I always say, business is business."

With a feeling akin to despair Mark Spalding put his signature to the new bond, and left the Jew's office as he had come, shamefacedly and with stealth, and as he walked through the murky streets of Leeds he kept saying to himself, "How on earth am I going to find that fifty pounds? I swear I'll never touch a card again. And yet——" Here his thoughts broke off weakly, for he knew that he would again tempt fortune at the gaming tables, and, like a silly moth round a candle flame, he would go on singeing his fatuous wings until at last his whole being would be absorbed in the fire.

A large poster on a hoarding suddenly attracted his attention.

THEATRE ROYAL, LEEDS.
For Six Nights only.
THE GOOD SAMARITAN,
By a powerful London Company, including
MISS HAZEL HARLOW.

Then followed a cast of the performers, and underneath the lithographed portrait of a girl in colours, and really a very fine sample of the colour-printer's art. It was a beautiful face, with regular features and big blue eyes, surmounted by an aureole of red-gold hair. Underneath was written, "Miss Hazel Harlow in her famous impersonation of 'Ruth.'"

The young man gazed at the picture with eyes full of admiration. Suddenly a hand was laid on his shoulder. He wheeled round, to be confronted by a youth of about his own age and appearance.

"Hullo! Manners," he said. "It's you, is it?"

"Yes. So you're smitten with the fair Hazel, eh? Stunning fine girl, isn't she?"

"Rather!" answered Mark. "Only I suppose that picture is idealised a good bit, isn't it?"

"Don't you believe it, my boy!" cried Manners. "It doesn't half do her justice. She is said to be the most beautiful woman on the English stage."

"So I've heard. And they do say she is the most straight-laced, too. Her name's been in the papers a good deal lately."

"Oh, that's all my eye," answered Manners. "All actresses are the same, and I'll bet Hazel Harlow is no more straight-laced than you or I. She gives out that she is—it's a good advertisement. It draws all the High Church folk and the parsons who preach about morality on the boards. I'll bet you that I'll take Hazel Harlow to supper at the Metropole before the week is out."

Spalding uttered a half-laugh. Then suddenly the expression of his face changed.

"I'll bet you you don't," he said.

"Well, I'll lay you fifty pounds I'll do it."

"Are you in earnest? Do you mean to really say you will lay me fifty pounds that you'll get Hazel Harlow to come to supper with you at the Metropole of her own free will? I'll bet you sixty you don't."

"Done with you there," answered Manners, who, it may be noted, was the pampered son of one of the most wealthy manufacturers in a wealthy city.

The bet thus lightly made was speedily ratified, and the two friends parted, and as Spalding walked on down the street he said to himself, "Sixty pounds! If I can win I shall be able to pay off old Goldstein and have ten pounds for myself. Win! Of course I'll win. It's too good a chance to throw away, and if I can't do it by fair means, well, I must try foul!"

CHAPTER II.

It was six o'clock. Already a crowd was besieging the doors of the Theatre Royal all eagerness to see Hazel Harlow, the heroine of so eventful a tour as the present one had been. Ever since the theatre fire at Newcastle in which Hazel had played so conspicuous a part (see Short Stories, No. 662), Leeds, in common with the other great cities of the North, had been all agog to see the beautiful young actress who had had such a miraculous escape.

Hazel and Jenny Lovelace were in the former's dressing-room, getting ready for the evening performance, when a note and a small box were brought up to their room for Miss Harlow.

Hazel opened the note first.

"Dear Miss Harlow," she read, "although I have not had the pleasure of meeting you in private life, what I have read and heard about you has made me very anxious to be able to congratulate in person an actress who has already made herself such a name upon the stage. It would give me the greatest pleasure imaginable if I might be allowed to show some little mark of my admiration for your achievements. If you would allow me to give myself the pleasure of inviting you to supper after to-night's performance, at the Hotel Métropole, I should be more than honoured.

"Believe me, I make this request from no unworthy motives. If you would so far favour me I should take it as a sign that you are ready to accede to my request by your wearing the trinket that I am sending under separate cover. Should you display this upon your person to-night, I shall take it that you accept my invitation in the same spirit in which it is made, and will wait for you at the stage-door at the close of the evening's performance.

"With sincere wishes for your continued prosperity, believe me to be, yours very truly,

"Archibald Manners."

With a merry laugh Hazel tossed the note to her companion.

"What do you think of that, Jenny?" she cried "Am I not indeed honoured?"

Jenny read the note carefully through and her lip curled.

"What does the young idiot take you for?" she said scornfully. "But I must open the box to see what the trinket is," and she was just about to tear the paper off the little package when Hazel intervened.

"I am going to send it back unopened, Jenny," she said firmly. "Don't you see the very fact of my inspecting it would be a confession of weakness."

Jenny put the box down without a word.

"You are quite right, darling," she said. "I didn't look at it in that way."

Hence it came about that Mr. Archibald Manners received a rude shock to his pride and the prospects of winning the bet he had made with Spalding, on his present being handed back to him by an attendant in exactly the same condition in which he had dispatched it. He had rather foolishly bidden Spalding accompany him to the theatre to see how Hazel was to succumb to his blandishments. Needless to say, Spalding's jubilation was ill-concealed.

"That's what I call a smack in the eye," he whispered jocularly. "You see I was quite right; you're not going to catch Miss Harlow so easy as you think, in spite of your undoubted lady-killing propensities. You may just as well pay that sixty pounds and have done with it."

"It's only fair that we poor people who accommodate you should make a little profit."

Can you play "Hunt the Fiver"? See Editor's Page.

The other made a somewhat poor attempt at a smile. "Don't cry till you're out of the wood," he said, with choler visible in his voice. "I'm not beat yet. Mark my words; you haven't got that sixty pounds yet by a long chalk," and he thrust the little box (which contained by the way, a very charming diamond brooch) vindictively into his pocket.

The rise of the curtain on the first act of The Good Samaritan cut short a further conversation between the pair.

At Hazel's first entry on the stage, a storm of applause rent the theatre, in which Manners and Spalding joined heartily.

"By Jove!" muttered Manners, forgetful for the moment of the cause for rivalry between himself and his companion. "Her portraits don't do her justice; she's the most beautiful woman I've ever seen."

"Perhaps that is why she won't sup with Archibald Manners, Esquire?" muttered Spalding vindictively.

His remark was ill-advised, and had the direct effect of making Master Archibald all the more eager, apart from the monetary considerations of the question, to win the wager.

But Mark felt confident; that queenly, imperious figure, who moved about the stage with such grace and dignity, who spoke with such sweet purity of accent, would surely never condescend to join in the frivolities dear to the heart of the ordinary actress?

It is to be feared that Manners paid but little attention to the play. When Hazel was on the stage his eyes were fixed on her; when she was not his thoughts were entirely concerned with thinking out a plan whereby he could carry out the design which had been so recently foiled.

Now it so happened that the theatrical company numbered amongst its party a girl who appeared on the playbill "Miss Dorothy Lestrange," though her real name was as prosaically Mary Parker. This girl had only a minor part, and was, in theatrical parlance, "in the crowd," that is to say, she appeared in a scene where a number of well-dressed men and women moved about as a set-off to the more prominent characters. She was a warm-hearted, impulsive, frivolous young person, who was never averse to "a lark" or to receiving surreptitious presents from strange "johnnies." She had been "on the road" for quite a number of years, though she had never yet reached the dignity of a good speaking part. Like hundreds of other girls possessed of no extraordinary fitness or attainments, she had been attracted by the glamour of the footlights, only to discover, when too late, that the plums in the profession were few, and that "Hazel Harlows" were born not made.

As Archibald Manners' eyes were roving listlessly over the stage during a scene in which Hazel had but little part, they were attracted by Miss Lestrange, who was walking with an elegantly dressed young man at a fictitious garden-party. He hurriedly consulted his programme, "Lady Lanchester," he read, "Miss Dorothy Lestrange."

"By Jove!" he said to himself, "that must be the same girl that I was introduced to last year when The Lights of London Company was in Leeds. I remember her face quite well. Now, I wonder if it would be any good my trying to get her to help me to win this bet. I should like to score off Mark, to say nothing of the fact of getting such a lovely girl as Miss Harlow to have supper with one. It strikes me I was rather a fool to make that bet, but whoever heard of an actress that didn't like to be trotted round and have attentions paid to her? After all, there's no harm in it; I'll try and get the fair Dorothy to help me."

At the close of the performance Manners, in accordance with the plan that he had already worked out, said "Good-night" to Spalding, and announced his intention of going straight home. He hurriedly left his companion and ostensibly departed homewards, only to retrace his steps as soon as he had assured himself that the coast was clear, and hurry back towards the theatre.

The performers were already issuing in twos and threes from the stage door as he got back. His quick eye at once singled out Miss Lestrange, talking and laughing with some of her fellow-actors and actresses Concealing himself in a doorway he watched his opportunity, and at last saw her hurry away alone evidently en route for her lodgings. He hastened quickly after her, and taking off his hat politely, said:

"Good evening, Miss Lestrange; I think I once had the pleasure of meeting you about a year ago, when you were in The Lights of London Company. My name is Manners. Perhaps you remember me?"

The girl looked at him critically. She had met so many young men of this type during her stage career that, had she been absolutely truthful, she would have at once admitted that she had quite forgotten his face and existence. But this was not Dorothy's way.

"Why, yes," she said, smiling. "Of course I remember you."

"Good," answered the young man; "I am delighted to again have the opportunity of renewing your acquaintance. But it's rather late now, and I expect you are wanting to get home. It would give me great pleasure if you would honour me by accepting an invitation to lunch at Baton's, in Briggate. I could meet you anywhere you like at midday to-morrow."

There seemed no harm in this. The prospect of a good lunch in a restaurant with an evidently wealthy young man, was in itself sufficiently alluring to account for the readiness with which the girl accepted the invitation, and when Manners really departed for his home it was with a more comforting assurance that he was on the high road towards success in his attempt to entrap Hazel Harlow. He did not notice that the figure of a man had dogged his footsteps persistently ever since he had said "good-night" to Spalding. It was, in fact, friend Mark himself, who felt that he had too much at stake to give his so-called friend any latitude in his designs. The fear of what Montagu Goldstein would do unless the money owed him was forthcoming at the appointed time, acted as a powerful spur to Spalding to relax none of his vigilance.

"I wonder what game's up now?" he muttered. "I must try and keep an eye on coming events."

Thus ended the first act in the somewhat paltry drama.

CHAPTER III.

Dorothy Lestrange owned to a weakness for champagne; the lunch that Manners had ordered to cement the acquaintanceship between him and his fair companion was of the best. It was not till after the meal, when the young man had produced his cigarette case and obtained permission to smoke, that he ventured to broach the real subject that had induced him to renew Dorothy's acquaintance.

"What a beautiful girl Miss Harlow is," he began carelessly. "She has regularly taken the town by storm. I suppose you know her quite well?"

"Oh, yes," answered the actress, but without warmth; "she is beautiful, there is no doubt about that, but I can't say I know her very well. She's rather too stand-offish for me. She's very well in with Venables, the manager, but she doesn't chum up with anyone in the company except Jenny Lovelace. A lot of funny things have happened in connection with her, that some of us think must have been put-up jobs. Why, when she was at Portsmouth she and Lovelace, instead of pigging it in ordinary lodgings as actresses generally have to do, got themselves invited to stay with Sir George and Lady Terrington, about the biggest pots in Portsmouth. How they did it I don't know. Then she got kidnapped on board a boat at Bristol, and was at sea a whole night. That was a splendid advertisement, and of course it drew like smoke."

Manners expressed his interest.

"But I thought she was an awfully quiet sort of girl?" he said; "objected to supper-parties, receiving presents, or anything like that."

The other laughed.

"I believe she's a regular deep one," she answered. "To talk to her you'd think butter wouldn't melt in her mouth, and of course all the men are wild on her. A man that was in our company called Monteith got his head cut open at Birmingham, and he hasn't been able to rejoin us yet. This was because of her, though it's a long story, and too much trouble to tell you."

Manners was silent for a few moments; then at last he said: "Don't you think if I were to give a little supper-party Miss Harlow couldn't be induced to come too?"

"You might just as well invite the King of England to join you," came the quick answer; "and I see you're gone on Miss Harlow like all the rest."

"No, I'm not," responded Manners, colouring slightly. Then his voice changed and he leant forward. "Look here," he said in a low tone, "I'll tell you why it is I asked you if there wouldn't be a chance of getting Miss Harlow to come to supper. I've got a bet on with a chap that I'll do it, and I'd give a good deal to be able to bring it off. Will you help me?"

Seeing that he was in earnest the girl dropped her bantering tone.

"I don't mind," she said; "it wouldn't do Miss Harlow any harm, and it would be rather a lark to play a game on her. But she'll be a hard nut to crack, and for the life of me I don't see how you're going to do it."

"Well, I've got an idea," answered the other; "and I think if you will back me up, there is no reason why we shouldn't do it in such a way that Miss Harlow would never know what the real facts of the matter were. In the first place does Miss Harlow know anything about you?"

"Know anything about me!" This was uttered in some surprise. "What do you mean?"

"I mean does she know anything of your antecedents, anything of your private affairs? Have you ever told her who you are and where you come from?"

"Not likely," came the somewhat scornful answer. "My father was cashier in a London Bank. But what has that got to do with it?"

"Everything! I want your father to be a Leeds gentleman; a nice respectable old man who is very proud of his daughter, and fond of everything connected with the stage."

The girl's mystification deepened.

"I don't see what you're driving at," she said perplexedly. "What has all this got to do with Miss Harlow going to your supper-party?"

"You have just admitted," answered Manners, "that Miss Harlow has very rigid ideas on such subjects, but don't you see that if you were to have an elderly and eminently respectable father, who was dying with anxiety to make the acquaintance of the famous Miss Harlow, and had asked you to bring her to supper with him and yourself after the theatre, there could surely be very little harm in such a request. In that way I might win my bet, and you any little present that you had set your heart upon."

"But," said the girl with a laugh, "where's your old father? You are not going to tell me that you're going to pose as my venerable and respected old parent, for no matter how well you were to disguise yourself your voice and actions would surely betray you."

"I didn't say I was going to disguise myself as anybody," replied the young man. "But first of all, do you think you are game to help me?"

"Yes, as long as I know quite fully what I've got to do."

"Well, there's an old man I know," continued Manners, "who has been in my father's firm for nearly forty years. He's a jolly old boy and would do anything for me. I could easily get him to pose as your father 'for one night only,' as the playbills say. The conditions of my bet didn't say anything about two other parties being present. We should be a partie carree. All you've got to do is to go to Miss Harlow to-morrow morning and tell her that your old father is so delighted with her impersonation and herself that he is dying to make her acquaintance. You can pitch any yarn you like about him, and surely she won't see any harm in joining such a pair as you and he. I shall, of course, be waiting at the Metropole till you turn up. You can then introduce me as your cousin, or anybody else you like. We shall just have supper, papa and you will see the fair Hazel home, and I shall have won my bet."

"Well, it certainly sounds simple enough," answered the actress; "but I must be introduced to 'papa,' and we must know exactly what we are going to do."

"We'll fix all that up this evening," came the ready answer. "You can approach Miss Harlow to-night, introduce her to your 'father' at lunch-time to-morrow, and fix up the supper-party for the same evening."

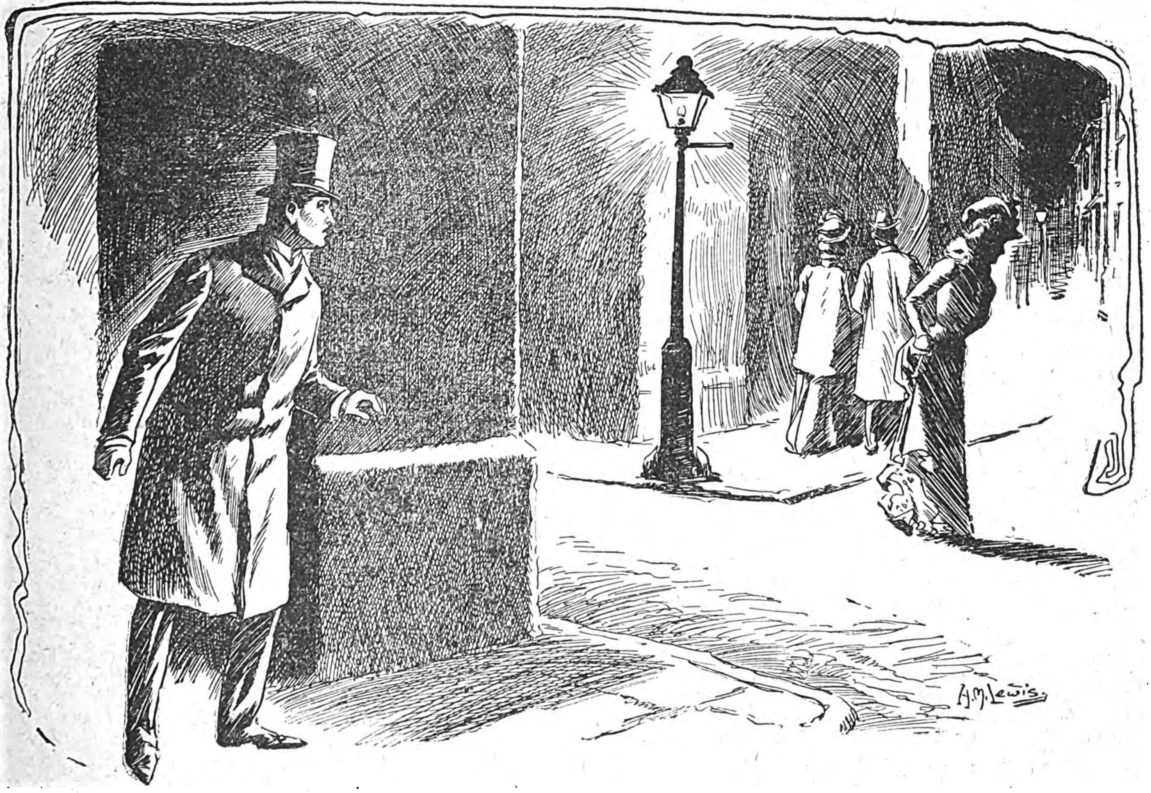
And so it was settled. Any qualms that Dorothy Lestrange might have had were lulled to rest by the reflection that there was nothing criminal about the plot in hand, and if Miss Harlow were by some untoward chance to discover that there was a plot afoot, even under that eventuality there would be but little to fear.

It was arranged that the actress should make her pseudo-father's acquaintance that same evening before the performance at the theatre. She could then approach Hazel, and they could see whether their scheme was likely to prosper.

CHAPTER IV.

"Can I speak to you a minute, Miss Harlow?" It was Dorothy Lestrange who spoke, and it was in Hazel's dressing-room on the same evening of the same day that had seen the interview between Manners and Dorothy.

Hazel looked up in some surprise. She had never had very much to do with Miss Lestrange, and up till now their acquaintanceship had been restricted to the ordinary topics caused by their common calling. She wondered vaguely what the girl could have to say to her. But there was nothing in Dorothy's face or manner to excite suspicion. She looked boldly and frankly in Hazel's eyes.



At last he saw her hurry away alone, evidently en route for her lodgings.

“Certainly, Miss Lestrange,” answered Hazel pleasantly. “Can I help you in anything?”

“I don't think I ever told you,” began the girl, “that my old father is at present living in Leeds. He was at the theatre last night, and will be here to-night, as I have got Mr. Venables to give me a ticket for him. He was very much struck by your performance, and he wanted to have the pleasure of making your acquaintance. I said I would do my best, and that is why I have come to you.”

As was somewhat natural, Hazel felt sligthly flattered at this tribute to her histrionic powers. She saw no reason to suspect anything underlying Miss Lestrange's request, and when in the interval between the first and second act Dorothy brought behind the white-haired, benevolent-looking old gentleman with gold-rimmed spectacles across his nose, Hazel received him graciously. She noted, moreover, that Dorothy Lestrange seemed particularly fond of her old parent; who had the appearance of a respectable old merchant by no means poorly off.

The old gentleman expressed the pleasure he had had in the performance, and especially in Miss Harlow's impersonation of the part of Ruth, the heroine of the play.

“My dear,” he said, turning to Dorothy, “I wonder if you could induce Miss Harlow to join you and me in a little supper-party to-morrow night. Just us three. Your friends, you know, my dear, are my friends.”

He said this with such a delightful air of old world simplicity, that Hazel, as was indeed pardonable, was completely taken in by his plausibility. She could do no more than accept the invitation with becoming grace.

“Then that settles it,” said the old man. “To-morrow night I'll send the carriage round for you both, and we'll go together to the Metropole. I shall then have much pleasure in seeing you home.” This to Hazel.

As was natural, Hazel told Jenny of the honour that had been proposed to her by the suppositious father of Dorothy Lestrange. Jenny was surprised, yet after Hazel's account could see no reason to put in the way of Hazel's accepting the invitation.

“He's a pleasant old gentleman,” Hazel said, “and seemed very fond of his daughter. You saw him, Jenny, didn't you?”

“Yes,” answered the latter; “and I must say he seemed a very decent old boy. I should never have imagined that the Lestrange would have come of such respectable parentage. I suppose it's all right in letting you go; but if I thought there was any chance of that blackguard Caldecott being in the game I'd see that you accepted no invitations anywhere. But I think after that little adventure at Portsmouth he will be chary of showing his nose anywhere where we are. We know enough now to have him laid by the heels and clapped into jail. Sir George Terrington would back us up in that."

In this Jenny was right enough. There was no fear of Caldecott putting in an appearance in Leeds. On the face of it there seemed but little reason to fear that there could be any danger to Hazel in accepting the invitation to supper at the Metropole. Yet had Hazel known the real facts of the case, and the cross currents that were connected with it, she would, under no considerations, have gone further in the matter. Her eyes were to be opened somewhat roughly.

Manners, as can be well understood, was jubilant at the success that had attended his plan. He had purposely kept out of Spalding's way, and on happening to meet that young gentleman on the morning of the very day that was, as he hoped, to see the successful fulfilment of his bet, he was careful to assume an air of the utmost dejection.

"I'm afraid it's all up," he said gloomily. "You were quite right about Miss Harlow. She's one in a thousand among actresses, though I haven't quite given up all hope."

But Spalding was not to be taken in by this assumption of despondency. He had, unknown to Manners, kept a pretty careful eye upon the amplification of the scheme, though he had been unable to find out the exact nature of his adversary's plans. But he knew that somehow Miss Lestrange was implicated in the affair. He accordingly sent an anonymous note to Hazel warning her of her fellow-actress, and admitting that there was a plot afoot to entrap her into a supper-party; but, unfortunately for his scheme, Hazel saw him hand the note in at the stage-door, and thinking that it was merely a missive from some would-be admirer, she tore it up without reading it. Thus Spalding was unwittingly foiled in his attempt to avert the success of the bet.

It had been arranged by Manners that Hazel, Dorothy, and the spurious father should drive from the theatre to the Hotel Metropole, where he (Manners) would be waiting them in a room upstairs, where the supper was to take place. In view of the fact that his appearance would create some surprise, the old man was to mention incidentally on the journey that he had invited a nephew of his to meet him at the Hotel and join them at supper. It would then be too late for Hazel to offer any protest at the introduction of a fourth party to their number.

But there was one thing that Manners had left out in his calculations. He himself had never known what it was to be hard up for money. The son of doting parents, his every whim had been indulged.

But with Spalding the case was different. His mother was dead; his father was a strict puritanical merchant of the old school, who looked with abhorrence on all forms of amusement, who expected his children to agree with him on every point. Thus Mark had grown up in abject fear of his stern parent, and had only indulged in those pleasures dear to the youthful heart surreptitiously and in secret fear, and where his follies had led him we have already seen. And now a chance had come whereby he could retrieve his position and deliver himself from the hands of Montagu Goldstein. In other words, he had staked his all upon the mad wager.

As can be well imagined, Miss Lestrange had concealed from her lady friends in the company her connection in the plot that was to intrap Hazel Harlow. This was not because she was afraid of the consequences that might ensue from her action, for, truth to tell, there were a good many in the company who would have rejoiced to see anything that might lead to Hazel's discomfiture. The girl's beauty, her reserve, her modesty, were all inexplicable to the frivolous actresses, a good representative of whom was Dorothy Lestrange.

Dorothy could see no harm in the deception; it was merely a lark; and if anything did happen to spoil the plan, well, she did not feel that her reputation or her chances of success in her profession would be any the more ruined by such an escapade.

CHAPTER V.

Archibald Manners, in irreproachable evening dress, sat in the private supper-room he had engaged at the Hotel Metropole, awaiting the arrival of his fellow-conspirators and the unsuspecting Hazel.

"How well everything has gone," his thoughts ran; "it'll be a nasty knock to Mark when he has to stump up sixty pounds. Dolly Lestrange is a brick. I'll have to give her that diamond star I got for the fair Hazel. I hope old Walker won't give the show away. He really makes a very excellent father. I must only see he doesn't take too much champagne."

Suddenly the door of the room shot open, and Mark Spalding entered the room with a would-be air of gaiety. Manners looked at him in astonishment, not unmixed with a certain amount of choler.

"Hullo!" he said, "what do you want here?"

"I heard you were giving a little supper-party," answered the other, "and I thought I would just trot up and see how things were getting on."

Manners made no answer to this statement. He was evidently revolving in his mind what this move of Spalding's could mean.

"I must say, Mark," he said at last, "I think it is rather impertinent of you to force your way up to a private room like this; but as you are here you may as well hear the truth. I am every minute expecting Miss Hazel Harlow and another lady and gentleman to sup with me here. So you see that in spite of all the bet is won, and you had better submit with a good grace."

Spalding's pale face went, if possible, a shade paler.

"You've not been playing the game," he said hoarsely. "Miss Harlow is not coming here of her own free will. You are entrapping her here." He paused abruptly. He could not say that he had sent a note to Hazel warning her of the plot that was afoot, for that would show that he had been playing the spy upon his friend, and, strange as it may seem, he had a curious feeling of false honour as regards his behaviour to "his friend the enemy."

Mark Spalding was a curious combination, torn between a sense of half-hearted honour and weak-kneed cowardice. Had he made a clean breast to his father of his delinquencies, it is probably that the way out of his difficulties would have been comparatively easy.

Manners looked at him attentively. In the hour of his triumph he saw no reason to restrain his gratified self-esteem.

"Excuse me," he said bombastically, "Miss Harlow comes here of her own free will, so you can put that in your pipe and smoke it. I tell you the bet is as good as won."

"And I tell you it is not," answered the other in a voice of suppressed passion.

"How will you prevent it?" sneered Manners.

There was a look on his face that goaded Mark to madness. He seized hold of a winebottle that stood on the table and hurled it straight at Archibald's head. It caught the young man fairly on the temple. With a dull groan he sank in an inanimate heap to the floor.

"Good Heavens!" muttered Spalding, "I believe I've killed him."

He stooped down and put his hand over the other's heart. To his great relief it still beat. Then his senses quickened. There was a folding door in the room, connected with some apartment beyond. Mark threw it open and disclosed a dark bedchamber. He lifted the stunned man off his feet, and staggered with him to the bed, where he deposited his victim carefully upon the mattress, and wound the sheet tightly round his legs and arms.

"I don't think he'll come round yet," he muttered, "and when the other three come I'll get them off at once. Anyhow, I shall have won the bet."

This last remark showed in what channel his thoughts really ran.

He quitted the darkened room and locked the folding doors. Hardly had he done so than he heard footsteps outside. A waiter threw open the door to admit Hazel, old Walker the false father, and Dorothy Lestrange.

"Well, Charles," began the old man cheerily, but further words froze on his lips, for instead of Manners, whom it had been arranged to address as Charles Tomson, his nephew, he was confronted with the pallid face of Mark Spalding. As for Dorothy, she could do nothing but gaze open-eyc at the strange young man who so unexpectedly stood before her.

A sudden fear seized hold of Hazel's heart. She had accompanied Dorothy out of sheer good nature to a party that was against all her instincts and desires. What could this new development mean?

Spalding broke into quick speech.

"Miss Harlow," he said hoarsely, "listen to me, I beg you. You are in danger here. You have been misled. This old man is in the employ of Manners, the young man of whom I wrote to warn you. It was his hand that planned the scheme that was to lead you here. He has evil designs against you, and I have come to save you. Be advised by me, I beg of you. A scandal is sure to arise round your fair name unless you take heed to my warning. Go, while there is time. I will escort you to your lodgings."

The effect of Mark's words can be well imagined. Upon the faces of Walker and his fellow-conspirator guilt was largely writ. As for Hazel, she gazed from one to the other of them in the blankest amazement possible.

"I don't understand," she murmured. "Is this true, Miss Lestrange? Is this really a plot? What harm have I done you that you should betray me so cruelly?"

But Dorothy could find no answer. She could only gaze vindictively at Spalding.

As for Walker, he was the picture of villainy unmasked.

Hazel turned towards the door. Suddenly a stifled cry fell on her ears and caused her to pause irresolutely. It came from behind the folding doors of the room beyond.

This new and unexpected event had a marked effect upon Spalding, whose turn it was now to exhibit symptoms of guilt. A dull wave of colour flooded his pallid features.

"Fly," he said hoarsely to Hazel.

Again from behind the folding doors came a faint cry.

"Help! Help!" was heard.

Walker flung open the doors and dashed inside the chamber. The next moment he was beside the bed upon which Manners lay, having just struggled back to consciousness. To undo the captive's bonds was the work of a few moments. With a stifled oath Spalding rushed towards the door of communication with the main corridor of the hotel, but Dorothy was too quick for him. Like lightning she turned the key in the lock and planted herself against the door!

"No, you don't," she said defiantly. "You may as well face the music as the rest of us."

As she spoke Manners tottered into the apartment on the arm of Walker, his white face rendered more ghastly by a smear of blood caused by his assailant's blow.

As can be well imagined, Hazel's brain was in a whirl. She had accepted the old man's invitation, merely expecting a quiet little supper party, and instead of that she was suddenly confronted by a scene that might have been imported from a melodrama.

Manners regarded Spalding with a perhaps pardonable expression of concentrated fury.

"You cowardly blackguard!" he said, "so that's your idea of fair play. When I made that bet I didn't bargain to wager with a would-be murderer." Then he turned to Hazel. "Miss Harlow," he said, "I owe you an apology. The cat is out of the bag now, and it's no good beating about the bush any more. This man is not Miss Lestrange's father. My real name is Archibald Manners."

In a flash Hazel remembered the note she had received from a young man a night or two before.

"I bet this cur here that I would induce you to have supper with me of your own free will, and in order to prevent me winning the bet he came here and tried to kill me. There, that is the whole story, and I promise you there was nothing else at the bottom of it."

Spalding moved towards the door. "Let me go," he muttered sullenly. "You've ruined me between you; I don't see what good I can do by staying here any more."

Dorothy moved away from the door mechanically. As for Hazel she could find no words. Her one longing was to get away from the place as best she could. The affair had indeed ended in a fiasco.

Spalding rushed out of the room and down the broad stairs of the hotel, notwithstanding the outcry made by Manners when he realised that Mark had gone.

"What was the good of keeping him?" said Dorothy scornfully. "The game's up. I should think you had better cry off with that bet. The best thing we can do to have our supper as if nothing had happened."

A world of pent-up scorn was visible in Hazel's voice as she returned.

"You are perfectly free to do as you like, Miss Lestrange; as for me, I am going back to my lodgings at once. I am afraid my ideas of humour and yours do not coincide. I can see no fun in weaving a tissue of lies merely to have the laugh at one who has never done you any harm."

"That's all very well," answered the other with a sneer, "I don't set up for being a straight-laced goody-goody. I wonder what the company will think when they hear that Miss Hazel Harlow, the sanctimonious lead, has been supping at the Metropole at Leeds at the invitation of a strange young man—" but the rest of her words fell on the empty air, as far as Hazel was concerned, for the girl had swept with queenly grace from the room, leaving the three fellow-conspirators to derive what satisfaction they could from the outcome of their paltry scheme.

As for Manners, he was feeling too sick and ill to care about falling in with Dorothy's suggestion and partaking of supper. He wanted to get home, to hide his diminished head. He would settle with Spalding later.

Yet the settlement was to be deferred for a longer period than he dreamt of at that moment.

CHAPTER VI.

It will be remembered that Montagu Goldstein had given Mark Spalding a week in which to find the fifty pounds due to the rapacious money-lender. The time duly came round, but of Spalding there was no sign. Goldstein began to get uneasy. At last he resolved upon the extreme course of seeking out Anthony Spalding, Mark's father, and laying his claim before him.

On the evening of the day on which Mark was to have appeared with the needful money Montagu dressed himself in his best, and sallied forth with no slight feeling of misgiving for his interview with the wealthy mill-owner. He sent in his card, and was ushered into a splendidly appointed library. He had hardly had time to take in his magnificent surroundings when the door opened and a tall, grey-haired old gentleman, with keen eyes and hooked nose, entered.

Goldstein rose and made a profound salutation.

"To what am I indebted for your visit?" said the merchant curtly.

"It is about your son," answered the money-lender.

"About my son! What have you got to do with him?"

"Only that he owes me a matter of fifty pounds, and that I have come for a settlement," answered Goldstein, assuming a boldness he was far from feeling.

"Oh, he owes you fifty pounds, does he? Well, and how do you propose getting it?"

Goldstein began to bluster. "It's a fair and square piece of business," he said; "and if the money is not forthcoming, well, I shall have to see what the law can do for me."

"Then I advise you to go to law about it," was the cool answer. "I tell you I have washed my hands of Mr. Mark Spalding. I'm not a fool, Mr. Goldstein. I have taken the precaution to make myself in no way responsible for my son's debts. And as regards your getting the money, well I believe my son borrowed money off you at an extortionate rate of interest. Here's a letter for you to read that may give you some food for reflection." And he took a note from his pocket-book and handed it across to the infuriated money-lender. And this is what Goldstein read:

"My dear Father,—When this note reaches you I shall be far away. I have gone to London to enlist as a soldier. I grieve to tell you that I have got into difficulties over card-playing—a fact which I know will make you very bitter against me. I owe Montagu Goldstein, the money-lender, fifty pounds. I can't pay him, and I have other debts, so I thought the best thing I could do was to go away and see if I couldn't do better in the service of the King. Hoping you will forgive me, I am, your affectionate and sorrowful son—Mark Spalding."

The letter fluttered out of Goldstein's nerveless fingers on to the carpet. The older Spalding's eyes never left the other's face.

"But surely," muttered Goldstein feebly, "you won't let a poor man suffer this loss."

The adamant old man looked at his watch.

"I think this interview has lasted quite long enough, Mr. Goldstein," he said coldly. "I have the pleasure to wish you a very good night."

He pressed an electric-bell button in the wall. In a moment an austere man-servant answered the summons.

"Kindly show Mr. Goldstein out, Collins," said the merchant. And there was no course left to Mr. Montague Goldstein but to slink away discomfited, tail beneath his legs, liked a whipped cur.

Thus ended an episode in which Hazel Harlow had, unconsciously as far as she was concerned, played so important a part. It is needless to say that Goldstein never saw a penny of his fifty pounds, and the event, as it turned out, proved Mark Spalding's redemption. He served for five years as a common soldier, and then his father—his heart relenting with advancing years—bought him out and reinstated him in a position of trust in his own business. And Mark Spalding never regretted the years he had spent "with the colours."

Hazel had, of course, told Jenny the true story of how she had been entrapped by Manners, and of course Raymond Venables became acquainted with the story as well. This being the case, it was of small moment that among the rank and file of the company the story of the supper-party, as related by Dorothy Lestrange, did Hazel but little harm in the eyes of her intimates.

The better-minded members of the company listened to the garbled version of the story, chuckled over it, and speedily forgot it. If Venables had had his own way he would have given Dorothy Lestrange her conge, but it was Hazel herself who begged him not to adopt this course.

"It would be like an admission of guilt on my part," she said; "for of course they would all think that you had been influenced by me, and that I wanted to be rid of the one who knew a story so greatly to my discredit. I am quite ready to live the affair down, Mr. Venables, for, after all, I have nothing to blame myself with."

And when the knowledge of this came to Dorothy Lestrange's ears it did not, as might reasonably have been expected, make her change her views as regards her antipathy to Hazel.

"If ever I get the chance," she said, when talking to her other lady friends of the Company, "I'll get even with Miss Hazel. If she hadn't been so straight-laced I should have got a jolly good thing out of that young fool Manners. He promised me anything I liked if I helped him to score off our sanctified lead; and you know, dears, it was really she who suggested the supper-party, for all that she said."

Thus did the baffled actress seek to work out the revenge that she had promised herself against her more favoured and infinitely more honourable fellow-actress.

Next week Manchester is to be the scene of the Good Samaritan Company's triumphant tour. Here the company was to be treated to a strange and unpleasant surprise—a surprise due to the envy and malice of a rival touring company, who had been impressed by the triumph due to Hazel Harlow's personality.

Love in a Mist.

A STORY OF TWO NOVEMBER DAYS.

CHAPTER I.

MY NAME IS CHRISTINA FENTON.

"BY Jove, Granger, it is thick and no mistake! Don't I wish I was up in our two-back-pair at Mrs. B.'s, contemplating a bright fire and a glass of something warm. Instead of which I shall be stuck here for another hour or so—these plans must be finished to-night. I wish you were sharing the job with me. If I don't turn up at supper, you'll know I've got lost in the fog on my way home."

The maker of this announcement laid down a long, finely-sharpened pencil, picked up a delicate pen, and began to work at the sheet of crisp paper pinned on to his drawing-board, whistling a gay air the while.

"Never mind, my dear Leslie," he was told soothingly; "the fire and something warm shall be arranged for, providing I don't go astray myself."

Maurice Granger glanced from the casement near which his companion sat—at a long table illuminated by a trio of green-shaded gas-brackets. Below was a usually crowded thoroughfare, hidden at present by a dense brown wall of fog. Through it neither street lamp nor the lights of the shops were able to penetrate. Even the roar of the traffic was dulled to a ghostly murmur.

"Nice boy!" said Mr. Jack—otherwise John Leslie—as he stroked in a solid section on the elevation he was completing. "What a blessing you are to me! I'm mortally afraid of your falling in love, and then farewell to our bachelor friendship, our study of the Elizabethan drama, our cycling, our pipes of peace, in short, our idyllic state of male existence."

"Rubbish!" retorted his ally, donning a smart Raglan of gray frieze, and lifting his bowler hat from its peg; "I've seen prettier faces in Canada than ever I hope to see among your stunted, anæmic townsfolk; and as they didn't soften my heart towards the sweet sex I don't expect an Englishwoman to do it."

"Boaster!" said the other; "well, be off, and don't forget the fire and the toddy. You'll be safe from Cupid's arrow in this fog, at all events, for there's no seeing a bright eye or a trim ankle in the pea-soup mixture the clerk of the weather has served up to us for air."

Maurice buttoned his gloves, took his umbrella, and crossed the lofty room. Only he and his friend had remained out of the half-dozen draughtsmen who worked for the famous engineering concern which had given to the riverside town of Groudle its chief source of prosperity.

"I say," cried Mr. Jack Leslie, twisting in his chair as Maurice Granger reached to the handle of the door; "you might lay in a few cigarettes, we're quite out, I know. None of your Turkish for me, though—mine's the right navy-cut, and medium, you absent-minded rascal; the last you stocked were mild, and I like to taste my tobacco."

"It shall be done as my lord commands," replied Maurice, stepping out on to the dusky flight that descended to the huge yard at the back of the soot-grimed house sacred to the draughtsmen and the designers of the Groudle Steel Company.

The vast stretch of irregular ground, littered with disused boilers, orderly heaps of scrap-iron, girders, engine-beds, and a thousand other forms of rusty metal was invisible. The fog covered it with a bewildering veil.

Maurice found the path to the exit, said good-evening to the porter, and swung off into the oppressive yellow haze. It was his first experience of an English fog. Born in the Dominion—as Canadians love to call it—he had lived there for twenty-three years, of infancy, youth, and early manhood. But at last, alone in the world, with a profession in his fingers, common to most civilised countries, he had been seized by a passion to behold those little islands on the coast of Europe from which so many lands have been peopled. He had ended by packing a kit-bag, drawing the few hundred dollars he had saved, and booking his passage on a Montreal liner. Six months later he was installed at the Groudle Steel Company's yard, the bosom friend and partner of Jack Leslie.

Many things drifted through his mind as he strode along; he was beginning to sicken of the English winter, the thought of the Canadian one came back to him with an irresistible appeal. He heard again in imagination the chime of the sleigh-bells, and the pistol-shot crack of the whip, sniffed the keen, pine scented atmosphere, heard the whine and yelp of the careering dogs. The fog stifled him and stung his face like the fumes of an acid, he muttered a malediction upon the weather of the Old Country, and there rose in his mind a project of returning to the Dominion with the ensuing summer.

He had walked on for three-quarters of a mile—mechanically following, as he imagined, his habitual route. Vehicles passed him but seldom, the pavements were deserted, the town seemed dead—smothered by the overpowering pressure of the fog.

Suddenly Maurice Granger halted; he had awakened to the fact that he was in an unfamiliar locality. A sharp rise in the ground warned him that he was ascending a hilly road, bordered, he could just discern, with closed shops. He struck a vesta and consulted his watch—it was ten o'clock.

"The deuce!" he exclaimed. "I must have been confoundedly late leaving the yard. Leslie, poor beggar, won't get home till the small hours. When I shall arrive there depends upon where I have wandered to. How on earth am I to find out?"

As he propounded this query, he glanced around him, seeking to penetrate the ocean of mist in which he had been moving. A dim patch of radiance shone dimly through the haze. It proceeded from the other side of the street; he went over to it, trusting it might prove an establishment where he might inquire the best way to his lodgings.

His wish was gratified; the illumination arose from a cigar-divan, the neatest and most diminutive he had ever beheld. Scarcely wider than the hall-way of an ordinary dwelling-house, the shop was sandwiched between tall and shuttered neighbours; matting ornamented its strip of floor, a settee fronted the counter, the window held a picturesque display of tobaccos, and, to crown all, a pretty attendant was visible beyond the amber plush curtains, reading a bulky novel.

Maurice Granger recollected Jack Leslie's commission and entered the place. Its custodian started and sprang up.

"I—I'm afraid I alarmed you," said the young Canadian smiling; "sort of absorbed in your book, eh?"

The girl flushed.

"Y—yes," she stammered; "there's been no one in for such a while that I fancy I had slipped into another world. What—what can I get for you?"

Her customer glanced at her critically; she had spoken in a soft and cultivated tone that deepened the impression her appearance had made upon him. She was dark-eyed and dark-haired, with a clear complexion, and her figure, though disguised by her loose blouse of black silk, was sweet and dainty.

"Well," answered Maurice thoughtfully, "I want a large box of navy-cut cigarettes, medium strength, and half a pound of your best Turkish—Diplome Regie, if you have them. Also I should be glad if you could tell me where I am?"

The attendant turned from the shelf whence she was lifting the enamelled box of navy-cut, to stare at him. She checked herself and laughed.

"Oh, the fog!" she said, commencing to weigh the second item of his order. "Why, you're at Pike Hill, in the north-end of Groudle."

The Canadian whistled.

"Am I?" he exclaimed; "that is curious. I struck out for Clubmoor. I am only about two miles out of my course. I see your fogs are as bad as the Dominion blizzards."

"The Dominion!" repeated the girl; "you are a Canadian?"

Maurice nodded; he had caught a cigarette from the scale-pan, and was lighting it. "Certainly," he said. "Have you friends out there?"

"Lots!" was the answer; "why, I am a Canadian myself. But I came to England when I was quite a child. I have always promised myself to go back, though."

Her customer leaned on the counter interested. "I have only been a year in the Old Country," he responded, "but I am pining to sight Montreal again. Oh, for a swift team and a box-sleigh on the Lafayette Road, or an ice-yacht on the St. Lawrence. This isn't weather, it's pea-soup."

The youthful tobacconist sighed.

"I remember the sleighing," she said. We lived near Lafayette, by the saw-mills."

"Did you?" cried Maurice Granger, "my dad had a stake in those confounded mills. They were burned in the big strike."

"I was a tiny mite then," said the girl, putting the Diplome Regies into a tissue-paper bag; "but I have heard that time talked of. My uncle was a foreman there and helped to lead in the strike."

"And my father helped to suppress it," answered Maurice; "how strange it seems, and how queer that you and I should be standing in far-off England talking about it! Thank you! I'll put some of those in my case, if you don't mind."

He produced a silver receptacle and began to fill each compartment, peeping covertly at the girl behind the counter. He noticed that she had firm, white hands, and that there were no rings on them.

"Don't you think we ought to introduce ourselves?" he ventured; "we may have met before in Lafayette, as kiddies, but that don't count. I'm Maurice Granger: won't you let me know who you are?"

The girl flushed, and lowered her eyes—two womanly hazel pupils.

"My name is Christina Fenton," she said.

Maurice raised his hat.

"Your servant, Miss Fenton," he replied. What more he would have added must remain doubtful, for a shuffling footstep sounded in the shop, and he moved from the counter that the young tobacconist might deal with her fresh patron.

The newcomer was a bent, grey-bearded fellow of some fifty winters. He wore a shabby great-coat, a broad brimmed felt, and supported himself on a stout stick as he walked. By his wide, blue, expressionless orbs Maurice perceived that he was blind. His features were harsh and sullen, his fingers bony and knotted.

"Evening, my lass," he said; "got the usual ready for me?" He slipped a rubber pouch from his pocket and held it out. Christina took it and proceeded to replenish it with a coarse, pungent shag.

Read "Dead to the World."

"It's very foggy to-night, uncle," she observed. The visitor drew forth a florin, tossed it on the mahogany, and possessed himself of the pouch.

"Bah!" he growled, "what is fog to me? I know my way about this dog-hole of a town as well as if I had my sight—my sight that was stolen from me. What are fog or sun, day or night to such as I?"

Christina put the change into his withered palm. "Let bygones be bygones, uncle," she begged; "you will only excite yourself."

The blind man beat his staff upon the floor, and set his mouth to speak. But Christina prevented him.

"This is my uncle, Mr. Granger," she said; "my uncle William. Here is a gentleman, uncle, a customer, that used to live at Lafayette. We were talking—of—of Canada when you interrupted us."

"A curse on Canada!" hissed the bearded lips; "and a bigger on Lafayette. It was there I was deprived of my sight, sir," he added, "by a whip-lash as laid open both my eyeballs. I was leading a strike at the Lafayette Lumber Mills, and a party of the owners combined to protect the machinery. Firearms were unpopular, so they used cowhide whips on us."

"You were attacking the machinery, I presume?" said Maurice.

The blind man drew himself together as if he had been struck, and his visage contorted hideously. The next moment it had relaxed into a hypocritical grin.

"Quite so, quite so," he quavered; "all's fair in love and war, and I'm not complaining—not complaining. On the contrary, I am cheerful and resigned, aren't I, Chrissie?"

"Yes, uncle, yes," declared his niece gently, and motioned to Maurice as though to warn him against continuing the subject. He assented with a mute glance of sympathy, and deposited upon the counter a suggestive sovereign—he had not yet paid for his purchases.

"You might direct me to Clubmoor," he remarked; "whether I shall be able to follow your directions in this fog is another matter."

"Clubmoor!" broke in the blind man eagerly; "I live in that direction. Let me show you the road, sir. I have the map of Groudle in my head and fog and midnight do not affect it an iota. You may trust me, indeed, sir, and I shall esteem it an honour to guide a gentleman from the Dominion. Your name, my niece said, was Granger. I fancy, sir, I have known the name over yonder."

"Maurice Granger is mine," was the response, "and I am much obliged for your offer, Mr.—Mr.——"

"Fenton, sir," supplied the other; "William Fenton, Christina is my own brother's child. Then I may have the pleasure of piloting you through the fog, sir?" His wizened, deferential visage twitched oddly as he put the question.

"I should be very much relieved," answered Maurice, "if I were not interfering with your visit to Miss Fenton. Besides, she will need your escort as much and more than I!"

Christina Fenton looked at a timepiece on an Oriental cabinet at the extremity of the counter.

"It is half-past ten, and no use a night like this in wasting gas. I shall close the shop, uncle, and you can take me home as well as Mr. Granger; it is all on your way."

"That's a clever lass," cried the blind man with effusive readiness. "She's perfectly correct, Mr. Granger, perfectly. It's no trouble whatever, not in the least. Hurry up and make all snug, Chrissie, my girl."

Maurice hesitated. But there was something in the charm of Chrissie's shapely little figure and her quick movements to and fro about the shop, as she addressed herself to the task of closing, that decided him to accept the opportunity of spending a further half-hour in her company. Also, to be honest, he had not the remotest idea of the route to his own particular quarter of the town.

At this moment Christina brought out a hooked pole, and would have tripped out to have pulled down the shutter above the window. But Maurice appropriated the instrument and performed the operation himself. Their intending escort had sunk into the lounge and listened silently.

"I'm proving a great nuisance to you," Maurice managed to murmur, as he restored the pole to its niche.

"Not at all," she assured him; "uncle William often takes me part of the way home. I live at Weaste Park, close to Clubmoor, and he comes up here to a crony of his to play chess." And with this decisive explanation she jumped up to extinguish the lights.

Soon the last jet was put out, the door of the shop drawn to and secured, and the three Canadians, so singularly encountered, strode off, the blind pilot marching in the van. The temperature had fallen and the ground was slippery with frozen vapour. Once or twice Maurice had to support Miss Christina Fenton—he appreciated the privilege absurdly.

From street to street their leader stalked, his head at a peculiar bird-like angle, his beard shaking with the motions of his jaws as he muttered to himself. Maurice and Christina exchanged few sentences, a species of constraint had seized them in an embarrassing grip.

At length the blind man halted. "You go down here, Chrissie," he said; "good-night to you, my lass."

Christina Fenton glanced at her young compatriot.

"Good-night, uncle," she rejoined; "good-night, Mr. Granger. Uncle will see that you get home all right."

"I am much obliged to him and to you," returned Maurice, "though the fog has lifted, and I recognise my whereabouts perfectly." He lowered his voice. "We shall meet again, Miss Fenton," he faltered, extending his hand.

Christina laughed and touched it shyly.

"If you patronise my shop," she said, and ran off in the diminishing haze.

The blind man moved on sombrely with Maurice Granger, nor could he be induced to talk except in monosyllables.

Maurice had told him the necessary address and he steered for it unerringly. At a garden gate he paused, correct even to the number of the house—he had counted it from the street-end. His charge pressed a couple of half-crowns into his fingers, and weilding a dexterous latch-key, gained an illuminated hall.

When the click of the lock reached the blind man's ear, he poised the silver pieces, flung them, with a terrible oath, far into the misty night, and stumped on, mumbling in his beard.

Maurice, unwitting of this singular action, arranged for Mr. Jack's Leslie fire and spirituous refreshment—that gentleman not having, as yet, reached home—and went to bed, to dream of Miss Christina Fenton.

CHAPTER II.

"A Drop of Brandy, Quick!"

"Maurice, you're confoundedly moony—I haven't been able to get a word out of you all day, and now you've had your dinner I suppose you're going to sit there and glower at me for the rest of the evening. What is it? You're as fit as a fidddle, you don't owe anyone a sou, and you're not in love. Hang it, man, wake up and be sociable!"

Jack Leslie grasped a squat "bull-dog" pipe, after the manner of a revolver, and levelled it threateningly.

The recipient of his demand lit another cigarette, "Diplome Regie, Superfine," and smiled, indulgently.

"I've no trouble that I know of," he responded; "sorry I'm dull, Jack, old boy, but the fact is I was thinking of Canada; in imagination I was driving a team of bays and a box-sleigh, with bells and a red snow-net, through the moonlight. Fine things for flirting in, Jack, those sleighs. You lounge on springs, muffled in furs to your neck, and with a peaked cap pulled over your forehead, while a dear little somebody leans against you, and soft orbs look up into yours. Heigho!" and Maurice sighed sentimentally.

The listener leapt to his feet.

"Maurice Granger!" he cried, "you're in love—you've been winged, for a thousand. Confess, confess; when, and how did it happen. Why, you haven't been out of my sight for a week, except last night, and you were all right then. Besides, it was too thick to tell a pretty girl from a hag."

He pointed the pipe at his friend. "Nevertheless," he said solemnly, "you had better describe in detail your movements yesterday evening. You told me a fantastic story of your being lost in the fog, and guided here by a blind man. Were you stuffing me? was that blind man the little blind god of love, and did he lead you astray instead of homewards?"

"Oh, go to the dickens!" grumbled the Canadian; "can't a fellow see a sweet face, and enjoy the recollection of it at his leisure without being subjected to an absurd cross-examination when he wants to be quiet?"

"Great heavens!" moaned Jack Leslie; "he has all the worst symptoms. A sweet face, enjoyment in recollecting same, desire for solitude and meditation. Maurice, my poor chap, you've got it bad. I will prescribe for you; regard me as your doctor from this moment. Be perfectly frank with me. Firstly, her name, secondly, her complexion, thirdly, the colour of her eyes. The least evasion, and you are beyond hope."

Half-amused, half angry, Maurice Granger snatched a cushion to hurl at his tormentor. It flew athwart the room, propelled by a powerful arm, and landed full on the bosom of a lean yet dignified person in a rusty black dress, who had at that precise instant, opened the door of the apartment. She reeled and sank into a seat.

Maurice sprang to her side, followed by the cause of the catastrophe.

"My dear Mrs. Boldero," he said, "a million apologies. I was trying to dot Leslie, who has been behaving like a idiot, and the unchivalrous rascal dodged. Are you hurt?"

The astonished landlady recovered her breath and her equanimity in the same moment. Flattered by discovering that she was supported upon the breast of the repentant Jack, and that Maurice was bending filially over her, she beamed upon them.

"Not me," she gushed, "only took aback, as you may say, Mr. Granger. I came to tell you that there is an old blind man asking for you downstairs, and that huzzy of a maid of mine being on her afternoon off—which she should have turned in an hour ago—I fetched his message myself. It was that a Miss Fenton—the young lady you met last night, he did say—was wishful to see you, if you would step round."

Mr. Jack Leslie whistled shrilly, and executed an impromptu war dance. Mrs. Boldero regarded him maternally.

"What sperrits you have, sir," she said; "but there, I must be off to my darning, for the laundry is in and Mr. Leslie's socks are riddles for holes."

"Wait till they give me Granger's salary," retorted that person unabashed; "one must economise somewhere."

When the scrawny but cheerful Mrs. Boldero had departed, Leslie proceeded to draw on his boots, and don his coat and hat.

"I'm going to accompany you, Maurice," he announced, "trust me not to spoil your fun. But I must gaze respectfully upon the fair countenance that has robbed me of my more than brother."

Maurice protested in vain; he and his friend descended the stairs together. The Canadian was racking his brain for an explanation of this unexpected message from Miss Christina Fenton. He had been round by the little cigar-divan on his way home from the yard, but the shutter was down and the place dark. On the iron outer gate a curt intimation had saluted him. "This establishment closes at five o'clock on Wednesday." And Maurice had cursed his luck, for it was Wednesday and no other.

Could that disappointment have any connection with his summons she had sent him by her uncle. And, in any case, was it—he had to confront the question—quite, quite maidenly to favour him with that summons when, as yet, they had met on but a single occasion? So reflecting, he reached the hall, and recognised the bent, though muscular, frame of Mr. William Fenton.

"Good-evening, sir," he said, as soon as Maurice had gained the lowest step, and giving him no time to speak, added. "Pray pardon my disturbing you, sir, but Chrissie, my niece, sir, desired me to fetch you—if you would be kind enough to permit me—to her mother's house. She has—she has had an accident—she—she is dying, sir."

He covered his wrinkled cheeks with his large hands and choked huskily. "You were chatting of Canada with her yesterday," he went on, "and of being from Lafayette. She knows you for a real gentleman, sir, and I fancy she desires you to serve her in some small way."

Maurice gazed at him. "Dying!" he repeated; "dying! It seems impossible. You'll come with me, Leslie?" he said, glancing at his ally; "you may be able to help; she must have the best doctor in Groudle, Jack—she's a Canadian—from my own place. I—I hoped we—we should be—friends."

The last part of his sentence was murmured in a sorrowful aside as he opened the heavy street door. The fog had continued for some thirty-six hours, alternately thinning and deepening; now it was thick and suffocating.

Preserving the silence into which he had so suddenly lapsed, the blind man led them over a portion of the route along which, the preceding night, he had piloted his niece and youthful compatriot.

"What sort of an accident has Miss Fenton sustained?" asked Maurice gently.

"A 'bus was upset this morning in the fog on Pike Hill," explained their guide, "and Chrissie was in it. She was cut about with the glass, sir."

"But surely they took her to the hospital?" responded Maurice, amazed.

"So they did, sir," allowed the blind man; "and it was decided that her wounds were not dangerous. She was brought home in a cab and put to bed. But it seems she was hurt internally, and she's had a bad turn this afternoon."

Mr. William Fenton heaved a great sigh and stumped onward through the haze. Maurice was wrestling with the realisation that the slender figure of Christina was now maimed and agonised, her grave proud features white and bandaged, her gentle life nearing an untimely close. His vague interest in her seemed, in a flash, to have become a passion.

They had reached the dark street down which Christina had flitted the night before. Their escort walked down it unerringly, chose a bye-path, and commenced to twist this way and that among narrow thoroughfares.

As they passed a dingy block of dwellings—low and cramped—their guide tottered and lost his balance, doubling up limply. Maurice caught at him and broke his fall.

"A drop of brandy, quick," whispered the blind man, sinking to the ground; "it's my heart—I often have it. Oh, I'm ill, I'm ill!"

"Get some spirits, Leslie," said Maurice hastily, propping the grey head upon his shoulder; "brandy, whiskey, anything. Heart-failure is a horrible affair, and the old chap's had a bad shock over his niece."

Jack Leslie hurried off, looking for licensed premises of some sort, and Maurice raised his patient to a more comfortable position.

The blind man groped in his pocket and pulled out a key. "The house is Number Eleven," he faltered, "the next one on this side; here's the key. Help me in quietly; they're all with—with Chrissie."

"Very well," said Maurice, a little staggered by this accumulation of unusual events. "I suppose I can keep an eye out of the doorway for Jack—Mr. Leslie."

He clasped the passive frame in his arms, bore it to the indicated portal, rested it on one knee to make use of the key, and carried it in.

Unexpectedly his drooping burden became vigorous, active, powerful. A kick from a dextorous foot, slammed the door, and Maurice Granger, throttled, mastered, tripped up, reeled backwards to the ground.

CHAPTER III.

The Iron and the Ring.

"Good-evening, uncle, may I come in for a moment?"

Christina Fenton asked the question, and she stood upon the threshold of a small dark passage, across which a street-lamp, glimmering through the fog, sent a few rays of uncertain light. The little tobacconist was warmly cloaked against the penetrating mist, her bright glance flashed from under a fur toque, and her curved lips and dainty nostrils were covered by a fleecy wrap.

The blind man had answered her summons, belatedly, and now hesitated in the entrance of his dwelling. Christina, however, did not wait for a formal assent to her query, but tripped into the lobby and stepped over a worn woollen mat into a bare kitchen.

In this apartment there was a chair or two, a table, and a dresser, by way of furniture, but neither, carpet, picture, or other decoration. No fire shone in the high grate, though the choking ash betrayed that it was frequently used. A single source of radiance illuminated the chamber—an iron gas-ring, connected with the hanging chandelier by a length of rubber piping. Upon it was heating a brazing-iron, such as plumbers employ to smooth their leaden joints; its red glow threw a lurid tint into the air.

"Gracious!" cried Christina, "what are you doing?" Her uncle had followed her from the door, which, however, he left open suggestively.

"I—I was just about to stop a trifling leak, my dear," said the blind man; "wait till I get you a light—you're not as handy as I am in the dark."

He struck a match, put it to the wick of a lamp, and adjusted the chimney. "You wanted to see me with reference to some matter?" he inquired nervously, looking from side to side of the apartment with a curious, twitching impatience.

"Y—yes," said his niece; "that gentleman you showed home last night, he—he left a cigarette-case at the shop. I thought if you remembered the—the address, I could write to him."

William Fenton rubbed his large palms together.

"Oh, I am sorry," he said; "the fog lifted, you know, my dear, and we parted before he reached home. He—he did tell me he had only a short distance further to go, but I didn't gather the actual address. How unfortunate!"

"How unfortunate!" echoed Christina, dispiritedly, sitting down on one of the rough deal chairs; "never mind, perhaps he will think where he lost it and come again."

"Let us hope so, Chrissie," answered the blind man, fidgeting; "but hadn't you better get back, dear? This is no weather for you to be out."

"I suppose I ought to," said Christina, and she rose to act on the implied advice. As she crossed the floor there was a sudden crack, the noise of rending wood and separating hinges, and she started aside to escape the falling frame and panels of a door that closed a cupboard by the fireplace. From its dusky depths rolled a masculine figure, gagged and bound. Christina shrieked. It was Maurice Granger, and he lay at her very feet.

Her uncle heard the clamour of the burst door and interpreted the significance of Christina's shriek. Flinging himself towards the brazing-iron, he caught it up and flourished it.

"Stand out of my road, girl!" he bade her; "I've trapped him with a clever tale about you, and I'm going to have my revenge. His father was the fiend as lashed my eyes out. I knew him by his voice yesterday, and the fool gave me his other name to make sure. Stand clear and let me blind the son as old Maurice Granger blinded me. I'd have done it before this if you hadn't interrupted me and made me have to hide him in that rotten locker."

Christina Fenton dropped on her knees and caught the pinioned form in her arms. "You shan't!" she cried, horror-stricken; "I won't let you. Uncle, are you mad?"

"Yes," hissed the blind man; "mad with a twenty years' grudge. Curse you, Chrissie, stand back, or I'll brand you."

He advanced to her, thrusting the iron in front of him. Christina clasped the head of Maurice Granger, burying his eyes in her soft bosom, and screamed out wildly in that awful woman's cry for help which he who has once heard will never forget.

The cry met with a prompt response. Christina felt the glow of the white-hot metal near her cheek and then it was whisked away, as Jack Leslie, springing three yards at a bound, leant over the crouching Christina and planted a blow on the blind man's chin that stretched him unconscious upon his own hearth.

* * * * *

When the liberated Maurice and the astounded Leslie picked up William Fenton he was laughing to himself, with odd crowing sounds of pleasure, like those of a young child. To-day he sits in an armchair in a great Southern lunatic asylum, making the same noises and laughing in the same grim way.

"S—sh!" he will say sometimes; "I did it—I did it! That's a secret. S—sh! Blind as a bat both of us; one blind man debit, one blind man credit, another account balanced in the Big Book. S—sh! not a word, not a word, it's a secret!"

Christina and Maurice are married. The little tobacconist resigned her position a month after her exciting experience under the blind man's roof. They have returned to Canada—to Lafayette. Jack Leslie spent a month with them a year or two after their wedding, and there was sleighing and ice-yachting and snow-shoe parties, and all the winter gaieties of the Dominion.

When Mr. John Leslie returned to England, he brought with him—on Maurice's behalf—a draft for a thousand dollars. This he paid subsequently into the savings' bank account of a smart young labourer. It was Maurice Granger's acknowledgement of the fact that, on the momentous night when Jack Leslie ran hither and thither through the streets of Groudle, seeking his vanished friend, the said young labourer had directed him, with unusual intelligence, to William Fenton's dwelling. What that information prevented we can guess.

At times, when the white snow-fogs descend on the wintry roads of the Dominion, and Maurice checks his team to draw the great sleigh-robe protectingly round his wife's shoulders, he will sigh and smile, and end by whispering:

"This is like old times, dearest. You remember we first learned to love one another in a mist!"

"I am here, gentlemen," explained the pickpocket to his fellow prisoners, "as the result of a moment of abstraction." "And I," said the incendiary, "because of an unfortunate habit of making light of things." "And I," chimed in the forger, "on account of a simple desire to make a name for myself." "And I," added the burglar, "through nothing but taking advantage of an opening which offered in a large mercantile establishment in town."

In a first class carriage in Germany an Englishman was observed to be constantly putting his head out of the window. The train was going very quickly, and a sudden gust of wind blew off his hat. With a somewhat strong expression, he seized his hat-box and hurled it after his hat. Then he sat down and smiled on his fellow passengers, but of course, did not speak. The Germans roared with laughter, and one of them, indulging in an expletive, exclaimed: "You don't expect your hat-box to bring your hat back to you, do you?" "I do," said the Englishman. "No name on the hat—full name and address on the box. They'll be found together, and I shall get both. Don't you see?" The Germans were satisfied, and said they always had considered the English a great and practical nation.

The Cost of a Portrait.

By JOHN DE MORGAN.

"Is it not wonderful?"

"I never saw anything to equal it. Don't talk to me of the old masters after that. I tell you the man's fortune is made."

"Who is he?"

"I do not know. Some American, let me see though, I have heard his name before. Not in our set you know. Poor fellow, good family, but deucedly poor."

"He won't be poor long. That portrait will make his fortune."

Three Americans stood gazing at a portrait hung on the walls of a Paris saloon. It was the portrait of a young, lovely girl, fresh with the bloom of innocence, charming, because perfectly natural. The portrait had become the talk of Paris, and soon would be of the world, for there was a fascination about it which one seldom sees in a modern portrait. In the corner of the canvas was the name of Gerald Manton, a name unknown to fame until then.

As the three men passed on some of the fairer sex took a position in front of the portrait.

"Who is she?" asked one.

"Don't you know? Why Emmeline Grandin, the multi-millionaire's daughter."

"What, Grandin the brewer?"

"Yes. Hush, she is close by. I wish he would paint my portrait I'd give—"

"Come along, you are not a brewer's daughter."

The girls turned away and made room for Emmeline Grandin, who stood blushing as she heard the compliments of her companion, a penniless English peer, who had offered her a title in exchange for herself and a goodly portion of her father's millions.

"You think the portrait a good one?" she asked.

"It is superb! It is glorious! By Jove, I should say the fellow must have been inspired. I must get him to paint me."

While the city rung with praises of the marvellous piece of work and the wealthiest in the land were ready to pay their thousands to have the same artist immortalise them on canvas, but few knew of the tragedy behind that painting.

One year before, Emmeline Grandin had met Gerald Manton in the salon of one of the city's proudest art patrons.

Manton was handsome, witty, talented, and just such a man to inspire a girl with love. She was young, wealthy, ambitious, and a coquette.

The two Americans met frequently, their friendship seemed to grow in intensity. On his side it was love, a love which was all-absorbing, a love which filled his thoughts by day and lived in his dreams by night. On her side, well, it was difficult to see beneath the surface, and only in the privacy of her own boudoir did she ever ask herself how she felt towards him.

Often he had expressed a desire to paint her portrait, but she had only laughed at him, and told him that he would not be in love with a picture of her because it would lack animation, and "really" she said, "I am not pretty when in repose."

A day came at last when her mood changed and she consented.

"You really will sit for me? You are an angel!"

"I know that, Mr. Manton. I have been told that so many times, but it is not an angel I want you to paint, but just plain, every-day Emmeline Grandin."

"When may I have the first sitting?"

"Any time, whenever you please."

"To-morrow?"

"I shall be engaged all day to-morrow, but the next day at eleven, will that suit you?"

"Excellently well. I shall count the minutes until then."

"Do not be silly!"

Punctually at the appointed hour she presented herself at the studio. She was an American girl, and, as her mother was engaged, she dispensed with a chaperon and went alone.

The portrait progressed slowly. The artist became deeper in love with her. His passion was almost too much for him. The studio lost all charm when she was away.

One day his hand shook so that he could not paint, and she asked him most sympathetically, if he were sick. That little question unnerved him. He could not restrain himself longer. He poured forth the story of his love, of the consuming passion that filled his soul.

At first she listened with blushing cheeks and downcast eyes. There was something pleasing in the knowledge that she had won his love. But even while the blushes told of her soul's rapture she remembered her ambition. She had resolved to marry a title, so that Grandin brewery might be forgotten and her children belong to an aristocratic class.

She waited until he had revealed his soul's longings to her, and then, drawing herself up in all the dignity of insulted womanhood, she grew angry at his presumption as she called it, and left the studio.

When away from his presence she relented a little, for she admired him, and that evening she wrote:

"Never speak to me again like that, what you ask can never be. I am not made for a poor man's wife, and unless I marry to please my parents, I may be cast off. I will give you three more sittings, and then—we must never meet again."

It was a cruel blow, but Manton was a man and reasoned it all out, giving her every consideration and coming to the conclusion that she was right.

"It was presumption," he declared to himself. "How could I have dared to hope, even? I'll never let her see that I suffer. God bless her!"

She appeared at the studio radiantly beautiful, a smile on her face and happiness in her voice.

Not one pang of remorse did she feel when she saw how his hand trembled.

Manton worked, but any dauber could do as well. The portrait was beginning to look like a caricature.

"I cannot do anything to-day," he exclaimed at last. "Please pardon me."

"I am very sorry. Shall I come to-morrow?"

"If you will so favour me."

He made several attempts, but try all he could he could not paint her portrait.

"I am afraid Mr. Manton, that—that it is going to be a failure."

"Not going to be, it is a failure, Miss Grandin."

"You commenced so well, you worked as though——" she bit her lips and wished she had not uttered those words.

"I had ambition, you were about to say. It is true. I had ambition but I have lost it, and am not a painter. I know it, I feel it."

She drew near to him, she laid her hand on his arm, he felt her fingers tremble. His blood boiled in his veins. What could she mean?

"Suppose," she paused, "suppose I should tell you that I am sorry for what I said that day. Suppose I should say," she dropped her voice to a whisper. "Gerald, won't you ask me that question again? What difference would it make?"

"Do not, for mercy's sake, do not drive me mad. Forgive me, but you tempt me beyond endurance."

"Gerald, what if I were to say, my answer would be different when the picture is finished?"

"Don't Oh, don't!"

"Must I speak more plainly? Cannot you see how I am blushing? May not you see how I am blushing? Must I say, 'Gerald, I love you?'"

"You do not mean it?"

"Try me."

His face was transformed. The beauty of a glorified spirit overspread it. He was a new man. He knew not what to do. In his ecstasy he opened his arms and she was pressed to his heart. His burning kisses seemed to scorch her, and then—he stepped back, the artist had taken the place of a lover.

A few touches of the brush and what had looked like a caricature became the very perfection of art.

"Not a word of this to anyone," she said, "let us keep our secret for a time."

"Until the portrait is finished?"

"Until then."

Day after day she sat for him, and each day love furnished inspiration. The picture grew until it was as perfect as man ever made a counterfeit of nature's perfection.

"One more day and then——"

"And then," she murmured in reply.

The portrait was finished. She stood before it looking at it and trembling.

"It is too beautiful, oh, far too beautiful!" she exclaimed.

"Nothing could equal your beauty, my darling."

"You will send it to the Salon?" she asked, and the artist's face paled. He had hoped that the eyes of the curious would never rest upon it.

"You wish it?"

"How silly! Of course I wish it. Is it not beautiful? Is it not likely to be admired? Please send it."

"And may I see your father, and—"

"When the picture is sent to the Salon."

Once more she visited the studio. She was unexpected, but a glad light came into the artist's face as he saw the one girl in all the world he had ever loved.

He took her hand but she drew it away. Something had happened.

"What is it, darling? he asked. "May I not even touch your hand?"

"No, Mr. Manton. I said when the picture was finished I would give you my answer, and it is the same as at first."

Was he dreaming? Was she jesting? If so, it was a sorry jest.

"I—I—do not—not understand, you said you loved me, you said——"

"I said many things. I saw you were spoiling my picture and I had set my heart on getting a good one. I am sorry if you misunderstood me, but I won, didn't I? I got a good picture. Good-bye, Mr. Manton."

She left the studio. The artist stood for hours, like a statue. His brain was numbed. Night came and he walked about, eat, slept mechanically. He was soulless. All that was God-like left him and he bore merely the outward resemblance of a man.

For several days he was like this, and then a strange desire to know whether his picture had been hung possessed him.

He rang for a messenger boy. He bade him buy all the papers. Hastily he looked them through. His brain was on fire at the furore his picture had caused. His artist's soul was filled with joy.

He read what the critics said of it. He saw that they prophesied that he would be a greater portrait painter than Lely or Sir Joshua Reynolds, or any of the modern masters.

Almost he had forgotten his sorrow.

Art struggled with love and might have been the victor had not his eyes caught sight of a little paragraph headed, "Won by a Picture."

He read it carefully, and at last realised that the Earl of Pangbourn had seen the portrait of Miss Emmeline Grandin and had wooed and won the fair original.

The artist turned over the paper mechanically and his eye rested on a society on dit. "The engagement is announced of Miss Emmeline Grandin to the Right Honourable the Earl ———"

He read no more.

* * * * *

"That Manton is a lucky chap. His fortune is made. Why, I tell you he will be the most sought after artist in the world. Every girl will— here is his studio, let us congratulate him."

Two rollicking art students ran up stairs and pushed open the door.

They gave a startled cry, for on the floor, his head lying in a pool of blood they saw Gerald Manton, a pistol in one hand, and in the other, a paper in which appeared the engagement announcement of the subject of his painting.

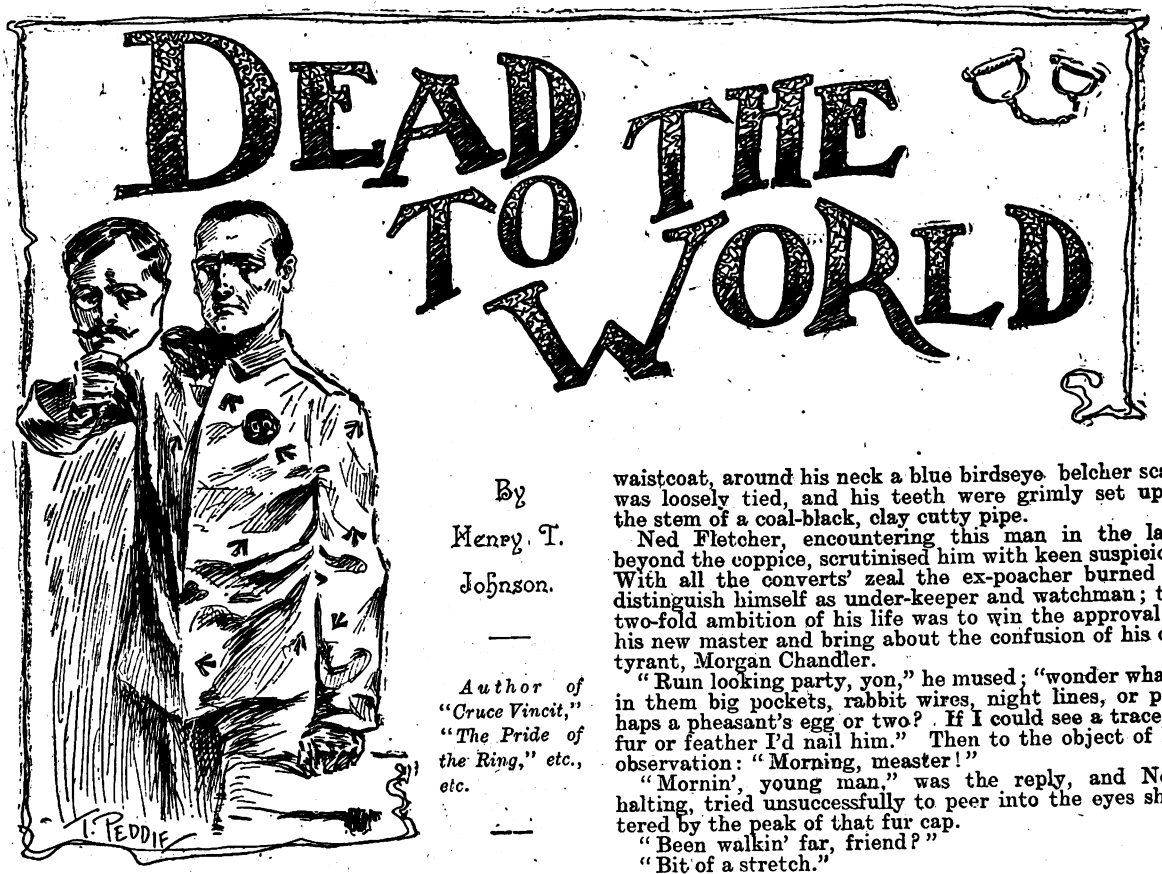
DEAD TO THE WORLD



By

Henry T. Johnson.

Author of "Cruce Vincit," "The Pride of the Ring," etc., etc.

SYNOPSIS OF FIRST CHAPTERS.

Richard Seldon, a convict, escapes. In a train he meets Cyril Roylance just back from Australia, whom he murders and impersonates. He assumes the role of squire, and pays attention to Doris Dale. One day he encounters two old criminal acquaintances and agrees to meet them.

CHAPTER VII.

And Forms New Plans.

The appointment so strangely made was duly and punctually kept.

The new Squire left the Hall unattended, indeed, unnoticed; carrying in one hand a handbag; avoiding the gravelled walks and the carriage drive leading to the terrace, he took a small secluded footpath through the shrubberies, then, casting occasional furtive glances around him, made his way along a glade of green sward studded with spreading oaks of giant girth and known as The Chase. And so he reached the five-barred gate leading into the Home Coppice.

About an hour later, through the far side thicket hedge of that coppice, there clambered a man who, from his appearance, might have been a navvy, an agricultural labourer, a poacher, or a compound of the three. He wore a peaked fur cap, a threadbare fustian coat with flap pockets, light corduroy trousers tied round the ankles, heavy hobnailed boots, a pearl buttoned corduroy waistcoat, around his neck a blue birdseye belcher scarf was loosely tied, and his teeth were grimly set upon the stem of a coal-black, clay cutty pipe.

Ned Fletcher, encountering this man in the lane beyond the coppice, scrutinised him with keen suspicion. With all the converts' zeal the ex-poacher burned to distinguish himself as under-keeper and watchman; the two-fold ambition of his life was to win the approval of his new master and bring about the confusion of his old tyrant, Morgan Chandler.

"Rum looking party, yon," he mused; "wonder what's in them big pockets, rabbit wires, night lines, or perhaps a pheasant's egg or two? If I could see a trace of fur or feather I'd nail him." Then to the object of his observation: "Morning, measter!"

"Mornin', young man," was the reply, and Ned, halting, tried unsuccessfully to peer into the eyes sheltered by the peak of that fur cap.

"Been walkin' far, friend?"

"Bit of a stretch."

"From what part?"

"From where I started."

"Where bee'st thee going?"

"About my business."

"What business is that?"

"My business."

Ned's anger as well as his suspicion was aroused by the tone and substance of the stranger's replies.

"We're a bit particular who we see about these parts just now," he said, turning and walking alongside the stranger, who still plodded along the dusty lane.

"There's need to be, I hear," the latter replied. "I heard summat a month ago about an under-keeper being badly fettled in yonder coppy by a man with a mask across his face."

Ned started. The identity of the masked poacher in question had never been clearly established, but it was said that for some days afterwards Ned's hands were too badly bruised for him to go to work. It was even hinted that he had some difficulty in lifting a mug of ale, which, in his case, betokened no light injury.

"Thee'st main little to say about that business, measter," he ventured after an awkward silence, and the other answered:

"Ay; it is canny to say nowt."

"Suppose I demand to know it?"

"Thou'lt waste thy breath; I'm on the King's highway and not even thee dare stop me."

"My master's the Squire of Fallowfield, and he's soon to be a magistrate."

“I care no more for thy master than I do for thee.”

“Civil, master, there's other magistrates.”

“Ay, there's many of 'em knows 'ee, Ned Fletcher; would'st 'ee like to go before 'em again?”

The new keeper was dumfounded. Strange as the man was to him he evidently knew something of his record, and Ned decided that it would hardly be wise to make an appearance before the Bench in the capacity of the scourge of evil doers until the justices had had a chance of forgetting some of his own misdeeds.

He stood still, and the stranger trudged on with something that sounded to the indignant Ned unmistakeably like a chuckle.

Round the bend of the lane, through the lush grass of the meadows, the man in the fur cap came to a rustic bridge spanning the stream that raced bubbling and babbling to the quaint, quiet, grey old mill, there in the shadows of the willows.

A side-saddled hack was tethered to the bridge rails, and along the meadow margin of the brook its rider sauntered, idly flicking the grasses and the rushes with her riding crop, her habit skirt caught up across the other arm.

And the man who had aroused the new under-keeper's suspicions ducked down with a sudden oath and watched

For the horsewoman was Doris Dale, and the lad sauntering by her side was Jack Branscombe.

By and bye they turned towards the shadow of the bridge, approaching so near that the man playing the spy there could hear their voices.

“And now, Jack dear, I must get off home to lunch.”

“Wicked, heartless girl, to leave me—for lunch.”

“Not for my lunch, Jack, but for dad's.”

“And you'll come to me again?”

“I will—I will.”

“And the stern father shan't part us?”

“No more than Lord Ullin parted his daughter and her Hieland lover.”

“Dearest!” Then for awhile no other word was spoken except what the willows might have been whispering and the rippling laughter of the stream among the rushes, and mingled with these sounds that other one which first was heard in Eden's Garden when the old, old story first was told.

And the man peering through the rails of the rustic bridge, hearing that sound, ground yet another oath between his teeth.

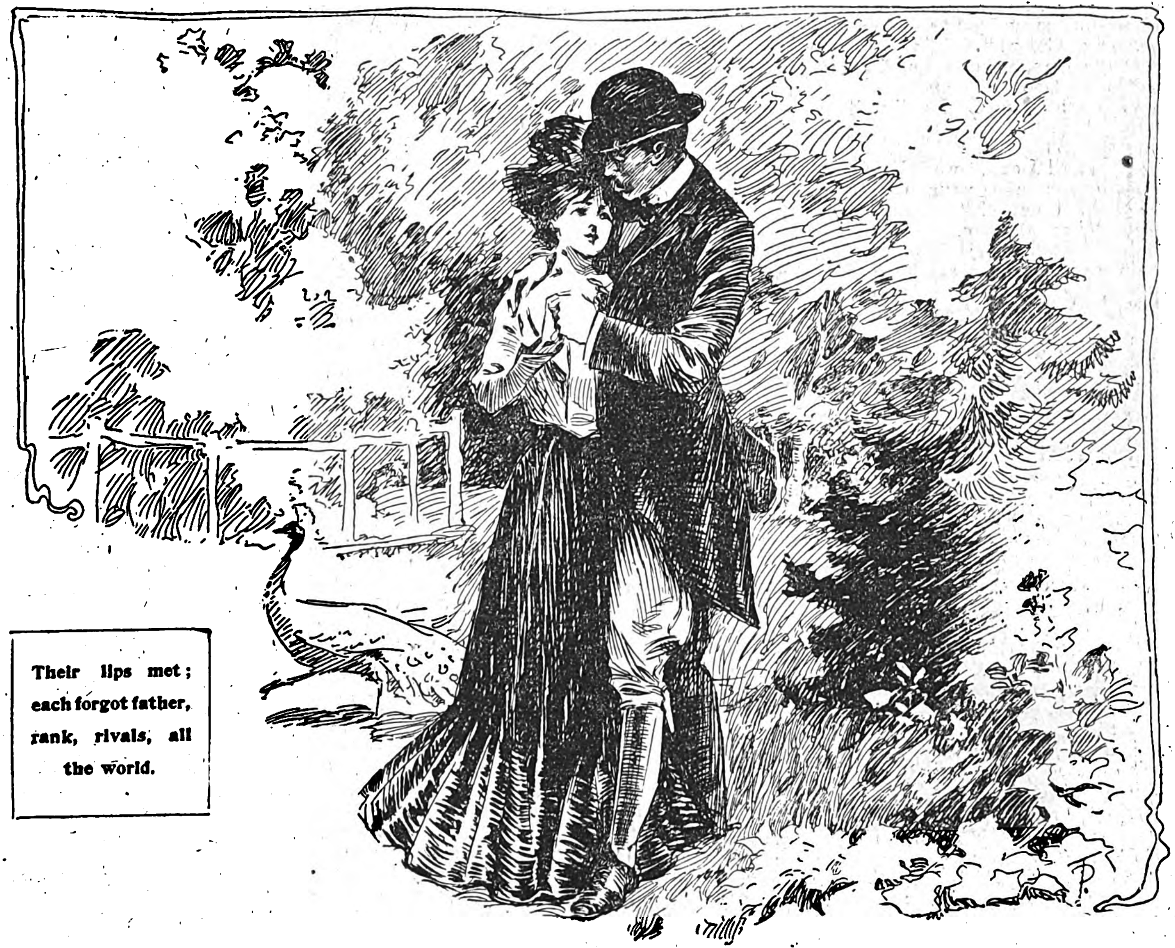
“Dearest Doris,” Jack Branscombe murmured, “you will love me always.”

“Always.”

“And not even the squire of boundless acres shall come between us; no one in the world shall take you from me?”

“No one in the world shall take me from you.”

“Doris, I have brought a little keepsake for you, this marquise ring, dear.”



Their lips met; each forgot father, rank, rivals, all the world.

Read “Dead to the World.”

"Opals and pink pearls, set in diamonds! Oh! how exquisite! Jack, dear, this shall be the dearest gem of all my jewels. And you must keep this, Jack, you must wear this locket on your watch-chain. It was my mother's!"

An exclamation of delight came to the young lover's lips, straight from his heart, as she placed in his palm the pretty trinket she had detached from her châtelaine.

"Your miniature!"

"Yes, Jack dear, I had it painted on ivory especially for you."

"I will wear it all my life."

The spy there, behind the bridge rails, watched the young lover, with fingers that trembled with joy, attach the trinket to his watch-chain, and then and there in his black heart devised a plan to seal Jack Branscombe's doom by means of that love token.

And now Doris Dale, with all the grace and lightness of a fawn, sprang up the bank towards the bridge. Her lover followed, untethered her horse's bridle, and, catching her dainty foot in his hand, swung her into the saddle, their eyes drowning in each others and all their souls in those fond eyes absorbed. What wonder they took no heed of the fur-capped man who trudged along that dusty road, nor of the baleful glance of that wayfarer's deep-set eyes?

Messrs. Branner and Plumb for the third time vowed that the man for whom they looked in vain should repent his contumacy, and that they would put him away, even if the so doing involved their being put away themselves.

"Steady, Cully!" said the former suddenly. "Jest pipe that cove 'anging about 'ere, what's the odds! He might be sent to watch us."

"We'll make it 'ot for 'im if 'e 'is," declared Mr. Plumb. "'Ere, I say, matey, you seems pretty busy taking stock."

"I takes all I can," was the reply.

"S'pose you takes your 'ook."

"S'posin' I don't?"

"Down 'im, Barney."

"I will, s'welp me! 'Ere, steady, what yer up to?" For he was looking straight into the muzzle of a tiny revolver, not too small, however, to bid him pause.

"Put that thing down, guv'nor," said Mr. Barney Plumb, "it might go orf."

"It most certainly would go off," said the man who held it, "if you tried to use that knuckle duster or your pal his life preserver, just as it would have gone off if I'd happened to have had it handy last night."

Then they recognised the voice.

"Lummy, Tiger!" said Mr. Plumb, "I allus said what a play-actor you'd 'ave made if you hadn't happened to have been one of us."

"Let's get to business," said the new Squire of Fallowfield, and then and there the precious three applied themselves to the planning of the only business they knew, the business they were prepared to carry out at the risk of liberty, even life, certainly at the risk of the lives of others.

CHAPTER VIII.

"You must Pinch that Trinket from his Cable, Barney; Let the Ticker Slide!"

It was just then that North-east Brankshire was seized with something closely approaching a panic. Week after week the countryside was startled by some fresh instance of desperate and successful burglary, carried out with an audacity and cleverness bewildering, not only the police of the county, but the experts specially sent down from Scotland Yard. Some of the most important houses in the countryside had been broken into and rifled of plate and jewels of enormous value; the county bank itself had been entered and a considerable amount of bullion had been stolen. The burglaries were generally agreed to be the work of one gang, though probably a large and powerful one.

Questioned as to his opinion on the matter by the owner of Fallowfield Hall, who took a remarkable interest in the matter and who was by his own urgent request furnished with the latest information and views of the authorities on the subject, Detective-Inspector Rossiter of Scotland Yard expressed himself as follows:

"If I weren't very well aware that a certain chap named Richard Seldon, but better known to us and to his own fraternity as Tiger Dick, was found drowned in the river Dass, into which he'd evidently plunged off the railway viaduct after escaping from Brimington Convict Prison, I should say that four out of five of these jobs were distinctly his work. The same thoroughness of workmanship, the same daring, the same absence of clue. Just consider those bank shutters. No ordinary centre bits bored them; this gang, whoever they are, are equipped with as good a set of jimmies, fret-saws, wedges, and tools in general as we've got in our Black Museum, Charlie Peace's not excepted. It's the work of artists, sir. Like this wine, sir? I should think I do; as you say, men of my experience are pretty good judges of a vintage. Your very good health!"

Ned Fletcher, for his part, roundly asserted to the Squire his conviction that the strange man he met in the lane skirting the far side of the coppice was one of the marauders, and Ned had become encouraged to speak his mind to the new Squire pretty freely, greatly to the irritation of Mr. Morgan Chandler, who had, indeed, on more than one occasion, been promptly and sharply checked in attempts to browbeat and bully the man he had purposed evicting, but whom his master had not only re-instated in his cottage, but employed, on which account Morgan Chandler owed them both a grudge.

"If you suspected the man why didn't you arrest him, Fletcher?" asked the Squire with the faintest suspicion of a smile.

Fletcher scratched his bullet head. "Egad, Squire, I'd a mind to, but bare suspicion's a plaguey uncertain thing to go on, and that chap seemed to know it, he kind o' dared me to take him before the justices, as if he were a bit of a lawyer, besides knowin' as they know a bit about me, but if I see 'im again I'd collar him and chance it."

"Quite right, Fletcher," said the Squire, "stick to that. Next time you meet that man face to face take him by the throat, twist your hands in his neck till he can neither speak nor see, give him a backheel and bring him to his knees. Now come along, you men there, isn't that dogcart ready?"

"He be a rum 'un, the Squire," mused Fletcher, watching him. "Lord! when he were talkin' to me just now like that there was a look about 'im as if he could do what 'e was tellin' me to, easy as he was sayin' it; and, dang me, I'll do it too, if my chance comes, for 'e's bin a main good measter to me. 'E give me a chance to swim when that white-livered scallywag would have sunk me," and he turned a bitter look on Morgan Chandler who, crossing the stable yard, was wondering:

1. What had happened to the sight of Cyril Roylance's left eye that he should take to a monocle.
2. What had induced him to cultivate a moustache since it so thoroughly altered his appearance.
3. Whether he had discovered anything peculiar in Morgan Chandler's system of keeping the estate accounts.

It was a capital day for driving, the roads were in excellent order, and in less than half an hour the Hall dogcart, at a spanking trot, had covered the distance between Fallowfield Hall and Dalehurst Grange.

Doris was in her garden; a rose amongst her roses, so she seemed to the Squire of Fallowfield, but he felt a stab as he noted the little frown that momentarily pursed the rosebud mouth and shaded the dove-grey eyes as he approached her. Rogue and ruffian as he was, he had nevertheless learned to love this girl who was all goodness, innocence, truth, not with the higher love which can even forego the loved one for that loved one's sake; that was not his way, ever since he could remember, to desire a thing was to determine to possess it, by fair means or foul.

"Doris dear," said her father, "Cyril has driven over for the flower show, can't you make him stay to dinner as well as luncheon?"

Harcourt Dale's semi-paternal tone was part of his plan. Doris could be neither discourteous nor unkind even to those she could not like, and she gracefully seconded her father's invitation. It was further a part of her father's plan that their visitor should drive them over to the flower show in his dogcart, Dale chuckling that he did not mind taking a back seat, it was one of the penalties of being an old fogey. He observed with keen satisfaction the ardent glance his new neighbour and the son of his old neighbour fixed upon Doris. That was as it should be, their guest was young, distinctly good-looking, smart in every sense of the term, just the fellow to make a girl forget a foolish tendresse for an ineligible suitor, and he ascribed to this growing infatuation his visitor's reticence at the luncheon table. It did not occur to him how much that reticence increased in the presence of Barker, his garrulous old retainer with his eternal reminiscences of the Squire of Fallowfield's boyhood—reminiscences which at times seemed rather to bore the hero of them.

Luncheon over, the dogcart was brought round, and Doris took her seat by their visitor's side. He was a perfect whip, his turn-out as smart a "lot" as was to be seen on the road, and many were the significant nods, winks, and prophecies of the country folk they met or passed, particularly as regarded the feminine contingent. Squire Roylance was losing no time. What a capital pair they made! Their wedding would be the county event of the year. Poor Jack Branscombe was out of the running now. And so on.

And Jack Branscombe himself, ambling towards Hazelwick on his cob, looked up as the dogcart spun past him, raising a cloud of dust, and caught one glimpse of the sweet face he loved best in all the world. And it was so radiant and happy that his heart winced with a jealous pang. Who was he, he asked himself bitterly, a mere yeoman farmer, to aspire to a lady of county family, and with a landed squire in the field, too, against him?

Jack Branscombe was in love and he was three and twenty, and youth and love are rare fertilisers of the rank and baneful weed of jealousy that had sprung in his heart in swift growth. Its tendrils were twining themselves around his very soul, strangling that which they clung to, and for all the golden sunshine of that summer day, for awhile it seemed to Jack Branscombe, even as he moved along the aisles of flaring, joyous bloom, that the poets were wrong and only the cynics were right. All was not gold that glittered, but the glitter was the true magnet for a woman's eyes. The very sight of happy faces around him jarred on him, the ripple of laughter and of airy gay chatter fell like a discord on his ear, and avoiding the throngs he sought the nearest approach to solitude, angry and ashamed with himself for feeling so out of tune with his world.

"Oh Doris, Doris, the one girl in the world for me, to think that you of all others should be dazzled by the dross."

"Jack!"

Looking up with a cry of delight, he beheld her standing face to face before him in the narrow path between the banks of summer roses, not one of them so fair or sweet as she.

IS STOUTNESS PERMANENTLY CURABLE?

Mr. F. C. Russell's Opinion.

It is with no small satisfaction that we have perused a little volume entitled "Corpulency and the Cure" (18th edition, 256 pp.), by Mr. F. Cecil Russell, who for many years has devoted his entire energies to the study of obesity, its causes, and its cure, and who has originated a treatment widely known as the "Russell" treatment, of which more anon. The treatise under notice is written in a clear and lucid style, and is fairly free from those break-jaw scientific terms which only befog the lay mind. There is no aspect of the subject that Mr. Russell does not touch upon. For instance, on the question of hereditary tendency or constitutional predisposition to obesity, our author gives facts and figures which go far to destroy the popular notion that the tendency to stoutness is hereditary; for out of 13,599 cases he has examined and reported upon, he finds that in no fewer than 9,153 instances neither parent was stout. Again, out of the same number of cases, 10,409 persons declared themselves to be small eaters. Now as to the treatment which bears his name, in what does it differ from others? Simply in this, that it does not demand those semi-starvation dietary restrictions so weakening to the system, that it reduces without injury to the constitution, and that it aims at the radical cure of obesity, so that when persons under treatment have been reduced to their normal weight the incubus does not return. Says Mr. Russell, "Under any circumstances, my readers may rest assured that if the removal of dangerous internal fat, with a corresponding improvement in health be a desideratum, I may fairly claim that failure is practically impossible." In support of this claim, Mr. Russell gives about a thousand extracts from letters of grateful persons who testify to the enormous benefits they have derived from a course of "Russell." The compound which forms the basis of the "cure" is a pleasant-tasting, refreshing, and cooling tonic, which aids digestion and assimilates and stimulates the jaded appetite, thus affording the necessary increased nourishment to the body, while the elimination of the unwholesome accumulation of fat is steadily going forward. How very different from the irksome, disagreeable, and even dangerous sweating, purging, and famishing processes by which so many persons do lasting harm to their constitutions, and all to no purpose, for as soon as these debilitating methods are discontinued the fat incontinently returns. The "Russell" treatment, as we have seen, goes to the root of the evil, and cures permanently. The test? The weighing-machine is infallible, and will prove that the process of reduction commences within twenty-four hours of beginning the treatment, the decrease being from ½lb. to 2lbs. (more in severe cases of obesity), and this reduction continues in the same ratio daily until normality is reached, when the treatment may be discontinued. If our stout readers would like to know about Mr. Russell's marvellous success in the cure of corpulence, they may obtain a free copy of the book under notice by sending two penny stamps (for private postage) to Mr. F. Cecil Russell, Woburn House, Store Street, Bedford Square, London, W.C., at which address, by-the-bye, some thousands of original testimonials are kept filed for reference, together with hundreds of newspapers containing eulogistic articles on the success of Mr. Russell's regimen. The above authoritative statement is taken from a recent issue of "Cartwright's Lady's Companion."

"We've had to put him through it," said Brunner.

and fair, with the radiance of innocent happiness in her smile and the crystal light of truth in those twin lamps of love, her eyes. Looking upon her he felt abased because of the doubt that he had harboured, even for a moment, in his breast.

"Doris, my dearest!" he exclaimed, and in a moment, forgetting all the fathers and all the rivals in all the world, he had clasped her to his heart, and their lips had met. And then, all of a sudden, a wild resolution born of his maddening love for her surged up in his heart. She was his own before all the world by love's own sacred charter, why should he not claim her to have and to hold? In an impassioned torrent the ardent words gushed from him, words of pleading, of entreaty, almost of command. They loved each other, their love was the very keystone of their lives; why should they be subjected, he to the weary heart-sickening waiting, she to the parental suasion, the daily importunity of his rival? Yes, yes, he would win her father's forgiveness as well as her own dear self to be his wedded wife, but it would be all the same in the end. Oh! if she would only let him win her first and her father's forgiveness afterwards. And she, listening, loved him, as girls do, all the more for his daring, and when he whispered his plan love was blended with admiration of the genius that could frame that scheme, that preliminary journey to town to arrange a special licence and the place. Yes, yes, it was all so delightfully like it was in the books, and if only that dear, prim Mary Morrison, whom she, a sisterless girl, had grown to love like a sister, would only be the bridesmaid at the runaway wedding! Her father would be angry, the fathers in the books were always angry, but he would be certain to relent in time, they always relented—in the books!

And so, half afraid, and with a strange, wild bliss of doing something wrong and daring, she said:

"Very well, dear, you know best, and it'll be wisest perhaps in the end, and oh! I love you, Jack, best in the wide, wide world. Yes, dear, I'll wait your signal, and when the hour comes the girl will be there."

Their lips met; each forgot father, rank, rivals, all in the world. Once again, as for all time, from before the beginning till after the end, amor vincit omnia.

Yes, but strategy is as necessary to Field Marshal Love, Commander-in-Chief, as to any other general intent on conquest, and so for a while, therefore, it was laid down in their plan of campaign that they should act ostensibly independently of each other, Jack undertaking for his part, as if any such undertaking were necessary, not to flirt with any dame or damsel present, and Doris declaring that not all the landed squires in all the counties in all the realm should cause her for one moment to forget her Jack. So like a butterfly she flitted away and was lost in the floral vista, and Jack Branscombe, turning in the direction of a busier quarter of the flower show, suddenly came face to face with—Morgan Chandler.

"Good morning, Mr. Branscombe, sir," said the Fallowfield steward with unwonted politeness, and Jack returned the greeting with characteristic geniality.

"Why, it so happens, Mr. Branscombe, that you're the very gentleman I was a-thinking of, and only to think I should have the luck of happening on you just at the moment!"

"Indeed? What is it, Mr. Chandler?" asked Jack in some surprise, for in the course of certain business dealings he had been accustomed to finding the steward of the big manor of which he was in respect of certain fields, a copyhold tenant, in a much less amenable mood.

"These are trying times, Mr. Branscombe, for people who live by their land. I daresay even you find that out, for all the best part of your farms are freehold and your copyhold on our estate stands you at a mere bagatelle."

"Oh! I mustn't grumble," said Jack Branscombe, who, after his tête à tête with Doris, felt his heart in tune with all the world.

"Ah, you're doing well, Mr. Branscombe, not but what you might be doing better," Chandler added with a mysterious dropping of the voice.

"What do you mean, Mr. Chandler?"

"I mean that I can put you up to a good thing in the way of business."

"How's that?"

"You're not above making a bit of brass?"

"Naturally, if I can fairly and squarely."

"Well, all's fair in love and war—and business."

Jack, wondering what was coming, made no reply, and the other went on:

"Look here, Mr. Branscombe, this is between you and me. Besides your own freehold and what you hold as copyhold tenant of Fallowfield Manor, there's some two hundred and fifty acres of our estate farmland that you've been leasing for the last three years at a rack rent, you've been leasing that from me as receiver, and now the new squire's come back and cleared off the mortgages, and there's accounts to be made up, besides that, in the way of farming, I've bought as receiver and manager from you, fodder, stock, and seeds."

"Well?" said Jack after a pause. And Chandler went on:

"Now, suppose you and I were to so manage, were to work out accounts, so as to make it look on the surface as though the land you've been farming under us had been rented at a little bit less an acre than you've been actually paying."

Jack's hand instinctively closed on the riding whip he held.

"It could easily be arranged," Chandler went on. "At the next audit you could pay a smaller amount, you and I could fix in five minutes here and now, and in case any questions might be asked, which I think very likely, I could furnish you, for the sake of precaution, with a fresh set of receipts for the last three years; do you twig? And supposing that you gave me, for the sake of convenience, another set of receipts for what I've paid you for hay, straw, seeds, and live stock. Well, you know, Mr. Branscombe, the differences in all those amounts would make a very tidy sum, and between you and me, as a matter of business, if you only acted sensible I could let you have a cheque; no, not a cheque, perhaps that wouldn't be quite wise, but a nice little roll of notes or a plump canvas bag of sovereigns for one equal half of that amount."

Now if Jack Branscombe, besides being an honest man, had been a somewhat cold-blooded and a somewhat crafty man, he might have invited Mr. Chandler to have put his proposal in such a form that he could have nailed it to the counter and that his own act should have been his own unanswerable accuser. But what he did was this. Swiftly with one hand he gripped Chandler by the collar, swung him round, and brought him to his knees, then with the other he slashed him once, twice, three times across the shoulders with his riding whip!

"You hound! you thief!" exclaimed, "to dare to propose such villainy to me! Now I understand a lot that I have heard, and now I'm certain of a lot that I've suspected. Get up and clear out, or else I swear I'll drag you by the collar into your master's presence,

"SHARPSHOOTERS."

A TALE FROM REAL LIFE.

In the typical Lincolnshire village of Little Hale, two miles from Heckington, lives Miss Mary Charlotte Porter. She is a dressmaker; and having for some time been closely connected with the Primitive Methodist body is well known locally as an enthusiastic worker in the good cause. A Boston Independent reporter with an eye to good "copy," called upon her recently to ask her if she would recount the real facts of an experience through which she has recently passed; and she willingly acceded to his request. Thereupon she related to him a wonderful account of how Chas. Forde's Bile Beans for Biliousness had cured her of neuralgia and rheumatism with other complications from which she had suffered for years. Said she:—

"For twenty years I was troubled with rheumatism and neuralgia. I suppose I had it in my system, and being out dressmaking and sitting in draughty houses would have something to do with it. I thought I should never overcome it. Then I had influenza more than once, and that, of course, made me worse. I have been in bed and could hardly move, and even in bed I had to wrap carefully up. The pain was chiefly in my head and round my neck. Once I had a violent attack, and it drew my head quite down to my right shoulder. I thought it was a stroke. We called in a doctor, and I was very ill for about a month. I suffered also a deal with my face, and some of my teeth loosened and came out. I felt the pain in my limbs too, and at times could scarcely move. When I did move I had sharp shooting pains—sharpshooters I used to call them—which made me fairly hold my breath. At the same time I was sorely distressed by bad bilious attacks, accompanied by sick headache. With this combination of ailments you may imagine the miserable plight I was in. Doctors were unable to bring me real relief. So when I read in the paper about the good done by Chas. Forde's Bile Beans I thought I would try them, and got some. In a very short time I experienced good from them. They seemed to clear my head; and the pain which had always been present to a greater or lesser extent, disappeared completely from my back and head."

"What was the result of the continued course?" asked the reporter. "I found I could eat better," was the reply, "and I had no more biliousness. That has now quite gone. I feel brighter and stronger, and can work well and long without the old feeling of distress. The rheumatism and neuralgia have also been driven from my system. My appetite has continued to improve, and is now better than it has been for years. I am strong and healthy in every way, and my cure is due solely to Chas. Forde's Bile Beans. I have never met their equal in all my experience, and I have used many medicines. If they can do me so much good, they can do others good too, and I strongly advise sufferers to give them a trial."

Chas. Forde's Bile Beans for Biliousness are without doubt the world's specific for neuralgia, rheumatism, gout, nervous and general debility, colds, bilious attacks, sick headache, indigestion, pains in the chest, side, and back, palpitation, anæmia, liver chill, female ailments, constipation, piles, pimples, face sores, all blood impurities, and liver and kidney disorders. All chemists sell Bile Beans, or they may be had, post free, from the Bile Bean Manufacturing Co., 119 London Wall, London, E.C., for one and three half-pence or two and nine.

thrash you before his eyes, and tell him the why and wherefore."

Morgan Chandler, smarting with pain, but smarting worse with rage and hate, scrambled to his feet, read determination in the other's eyes, and slunk, like the rogue and coward that he was, out of Jack Branscombe's presence.

And having done this he stood rubbing the wheals on his shoulders, writhing in pain and impotent malice.

"I'll pay him out for this," he said, "I'll get level with him somehow and some time if I get the chance. No! I won't wait for the chance, I'll make the chance. I'll repay every blow that he's struck me a hundredfold."

The flower show was an unqualified success. All the big people of the district flocked to gaze upon the big blooms and vegetables. The hearts of some exhibitors were elated, others were broken; the marquees were gorgeous with tiers upon tiers of flowers, bright and bizarre as summer, and hats and bonnets as beautiful to behold as flower beds.

Doris Dale and her cavalier from Fallowfield Hall were the observed of all observers, and her father's delight at the impression created by their appearance and the circumstances under which they appeared knew no bounds.

"Of course," he remarked with somewhat laboured airiness, "there's nothing in it. He's a smart young fellow and Doris is a smart girl, being a Harcourt Dale she would be. I never interfere in these affairs, I let them take their course; still, young people will be young people, she might go farther and fare worse—and I'm certain he might."

Crowder Keene, the old lawyer who knew, and mostly had something to do with, the affairs of everybody in the county, took the situation at a glance, and decided mentally not to call in that mortgage on the Dalehurst Grange property just yet awhile.

Jack Branscombe listened to the murmurs that reached him frequently, thanks to good-natured friends, he had no need now to even fight against them. What was idle gossip against her own sweet promise? He held that promse, yes, and her own love token! And instinctively his hand sought the, to him, priceless locket he wore upon his chain.

A cry of consternation escaped him; it was gone!

Gone! The trinket he prized above all others, that he would have died sooner than surrender. Yes, it had been stolen, and by a practised hand, for there the link of the chain hung broken and gaping wide! Strange to say, the watch, of treble the intrinsic value of the locket, remained; but he had lost her love-gift, the gift he prized more highly than all the jewels in the world.

CHAPTER IX.

"Murder Most Foul."

That night Harcourt Dale enjoyed his dinner. Matters were going exactly as he wished them. Roylance was evidently infatuated with Doris, who, for her part, seemed very interested in him, and after all, a genial son-in-law with a convenient balance at his bankers would be a more amenable, as well as economical creditor than old Crowder Keene, who was so inconveniently insistent upon punctuality in respect of interest payments.

But really he would have to speak to Barker. As an old and faithful servant, the man had been accorded some indulgence. And till then had never presumed upon it, but on this particular evening at dinner-time Barker was an absolutely unbearable bore with his incessant incursions upon the conversation, his comments, and his reminiscences. Old retainers were very well in their way, but one hardly desired the butler to deputise as a Greek chorus.

"Dear, dear, dear!" said Harcourt Dale after a pause, "how time flies. I've been thinking to-day of your poor dad. When he and I last dined at this table you were a little chap, just out of kilts and into knickerbockers."

"And he don't seem to favour his father, do he, sir, Master Cyril?"

Harcourt Dale answered with a frown.

"Why, the very last day, sir, as you came 'ere with your pa, you tumbled down the stairs running along the corridor from the drawing-room."

"Barker; I think Mr. Roylance requires a little more wine."

"Certainly, sir. What a head he did have to be sure, poor little chap!"

"And perhaps fewer reminiscences."

Barker took the hint and subsided.

And so for another evening the Master of Fallowfield hovered around Doris Dale, while, pressed by her father, she sang to him, played to him, proving himself most of winsome of girl hostesses. Doris seemed both to her father and their guest a trifle pre-occupied, and yet she sang her tender love ballads never with more pathos and expression. Soon, far too soon for him, the time arrived for him to go. And then an untoward incident arose. The head groom reported that Mr. Roylance's horse was dead lame.

"By Jove!" said Harcourt Dale, "you'll have to leave him here to-night and the vet. shall see him to-morrow. I can lend you a bagmunless; by the bye, you let us put you up for to-night, we shall be delighted."

"You're awfully kind," said the guest, "and if it isn't putting you about, it will give me the inestimable pleasure of another hour of Miss Dale's music."

Harcourt Dale expressed himself delighted, Doris could be nothing but gracious, and so their guest remained to experience another spell of, perhaps, the most genuine happiness he had ever known.

"By Jove!" he soliloquised, looking into the drawing-room from the balcony, whither he had gone to smoke a cigarette, and regarding the white-clad, supple, comely form of Doris seated at the piano, waking a ripple of music as her lily hands wandered over the scarcely whiter keyboard.

"Is it all a dream? It's so different, what is to what was, and only such a little while ago. How, I wonder, will it end—will it end? Oh! if it could only go on for ever, why shouldn't it go on, if I play a cautious game, I've got a hand chock full of trumps this time, and, by the Lord Harry, the stakes this time are worth the winning." For his eyes were fixed on Doris Dale.

But even the extended spell of bliss came to an end at last. Doris was gone to bed and Barker, by Harcourt Dale's direction, showed the visitor to the famous guest room of Dalehurst Grange, the one wherein the first Charles reposed when on a visit to that Harcourt Dale who, later, laid down his life for the cause and the king he loved.

"You see 'ere, sir, on this mullioned window, where his Majesty scratched his name with his diamond ring."

"Yes, yes," said the other impatiently.

"Here it is, sir. Carolus Rex, that's Latin, sir."

"Ah! yes."

"Rex is king."

The visitor yawned.

"Don't you remember you had a terrier called Rex, sir?"

"Ah! I daresay!"

"Your memory ain't as good as mine, sir. I recollects a lot more about you than you does about me."

"Very likely," said the other angrily; "only, you see, gentlemen of my position have to occupy their minds with other matters of more importance than dogs—and servants."

Mr. GEO. R. SIMS' HAIR RENEWER.

Called by him "TATCHO."

(Romany: "GENUINE," "GOOD," "TRUE.")

And why, pray, is the successful poet, playwright, and journalist an eminent authority on hair restorer? Eager for an explanation, a Daily Mail representative sought out Mr. Sims. . . .

Now Mr. G. R. Sims, as many people know, is one of the busiest men in the kingdom, but hastily affixing his signature to a letter, he looked up and extended a characteristically cordial welcome. Then he said: "I will explain. I found that I was rapidly going bald. Not seriously, you understand, but the thinning out was sufficiently marked to set me thinking out a remedy. I went to two specialists, both of whom cheerfully assured me that I should be absolutely bald in two years.

"Then I discovered the preparation which is now placed upon the market. I found that I had hit upon a remedy capable of working wonders. Look at my hair now, isn't that convincing evidence of the value of my preparation.

"Ladies confirm my good opinion of it as a dressing for daily use. Mrs. Brown Potter, whose beautiful hair is the admiration of the entire lady world, writes that she uses nothing but 'Tatcho.' There is nothing to prevent every woman from making her hair silken in texture and bountiful in volume, for she can obtain a bottle of 'Tatcho' now in every town or even village."

In order that the public may be able to test the superlative value of Mr. Geo. R. Sims' discovery, the Company is issuing large 4/6 size test bottles post free for 1/10, under plain cover, one of which may be had on application. A Lincolnshire patron writes: "I told some of my cycle club friends that I was intending to buy a Symonds' Cycle. They said I would be sorry, as it was impossible for any firm to sell sound cycles so cheaply. I pretended to be convinced, bought a Symonds' machine without a transfer, paying you £6 14s., then told my friends I had it made to order in Coventry at £14; they all say it is splendid value, and the club experts say it is a superior mount." We have many similar letters. Short Stories That . . . . . . Make You Laugh.

We devote every week space in Short Stories to pithy, humorous anecdotes similar to those which appear in these columns. A prize of £1 1s. will be sent to the reader who submits the best storyette this week, and a P.W. penknife to each of those whose attempts are used. The anecdotes may be either original or selected; in the latter case, the source MUST be stated. Attempts must reach the Storyette Editor, Short Stories Office, Henrietta Street, Strand, London, W.C., by Monday, October 28th. Post-cards only, please. The prize of £1 1s. has been awarded this week to Mr. P. J. Hardman, of 35 or 85 Gardner Road, Prestwich, near Manchester, whose contribution is denoted by a star thus.*

HE: "There was a terrible accident in town to-day. nine lives lost." She: "Really, how very sad; how did it happen?" He: "Well, it was this way. One of the new electric trams ran over a cat."

A pupil teacher was instructing her class upon the positive, comparative and superlative of adjectives. "Now," she asked, "how would you define 'ill'—can we say 'ill,' 'iller,' 'illest'?" "No, miss," exclaimed a pupil, "it would be 'ill,' 'worse,' 'dead!'"

A NERVOUS man whose life was made miserable by the noise of two blacksmiths, prevailed upon each of them to remove by the offer of a liberal compensation. When the money was paid down he kindly inquired what neighbourhood they intended to remove to. "Why, sir," replied one of the smiths, with a grin, "Tom moves to my shop and I move to his."

* COMING home rather late one night, old Jones discovered a country bumpkin with a lantern standing by the kitchen door. "Young man," said he, "what are you doing here?" "I've come a-courting, sur." "A-courting? What do you mean?" "Well, I'm a follower of Mary, the kitchen maid, sir." "Do you usually carry a lantern when you are on such errands?" asked the old man, sarcastically. "Yes, sur, al'ays." "Don't tell me such nonsense. You had better be off quickly—courting with a lantern, indeed! In my young days I never used such a thing." "No, sur," replied the bumpkin, sliding of; "judging by yer missus I shouldn't think yer did."

THE commercial traveller seated himself in the corner seat and carefully adjusted his portmanteau as a foot-rest. Then he handed a newspaper to a passenger opposite, and remarked: "Another of those dispatch-riders captured, you see; they don't know the A B C of their business." "I suppose you could teach them?" remarked the man opposite, with an attempt at sarcasm. "Well, I think so. You don't know Jones, I suppose—Jones, of Birmingham? Smart man, he is! Well, he went out to the Transvaal with the Yeomanry. He was given some dispatches to carry, but he didn't get caught. No, sir. He had his head shaved, and then had the message tattooed on his scalp. Then he applied hair-restorer and he felt safe. He was stopped three times and searched, but, of course, nothing was found. Finally he reached his destination, had his head shaved again, and went to show his head to the general. Oh, he was smart, I tell you. And now, gentlemen, if any of you would like to try a bottle of our 'Grow-up' hair-restorer, price 3s. 6d., I will give a written guarantee that—— Thank you, sir. Three-and-sixpence from ten shillings leaves six-and-six. Good-day; I get out here."

MRS. NEWLYWED (to cook who she has just engaged) "You see, my husband is very particular about his food." Cook (sympathetically): "They're all alike, mem, my old man was just the same. I never cooked nothing to please him in my life."

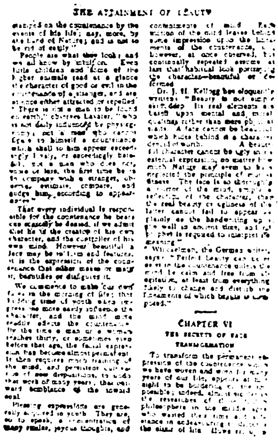
TEACHER (to new scholar): "Now, Mary, I'll give you a sum. Supposing that your father owed the butcher £7 4s., £3 17s. 1d. to the baker, £14 8s. to the coal merchant, £20 10s. to the landlord——" Mary, (confidently): "We should move."

"WHAT'S the matter, William?" said the wealthy householder. "Anything gone wrong?" "Not exactly gone wrong, sir, but I want a new understanding." "What about?" "My pay, sir." "Why, you get very good wages for a cook." "Yes, sir, they does very well for a cook, sir. But I overheard you when you were talking to your friends, sir. You called me your chef." "Well, you ought to be complimented." "Yes, sir, I'm complimented, but business is business. I can't be a chef for less than £800. Wages is all right for a cook, but a chef has to have a salary!"

WHILE a drove of bullocks were being driven through an Irish village from a fair one of the animals suddenly stopped, and, notwithstanding all the efforts of the driver, would not move on its way. A chemist who happened to see the affair went up to the bullock and injected a drug down its throat, which made the animal career down the street like greased lightning. About five minutes afterwards the drover entered the chemist's shop wiping the sweat off his head, and asked the shopman if he was the party who gave the bullock the medicine. "I am," said the chemist. "Well," said Pat, "I'll take a pennyworth of it, as I have to follow the baste."

THIS is what a young lady is reported recently to have said apropos of marriage: "Well, no, I don't know if I would marry for money alone; but if a man had plenty of money, allied to a sweet disposition, and a moustache that curled at both ends, and nice blue eyes, and a social position; if he had a distinguished status in a profession, or even as a merchant, and his father was rich and his mother and sisters aristocratic, and he wished to marry me, and he would promise to let me have my own way in everything, and keep me liberally supplied with money, and have a splendidly-furnished town house and a handsome country residence, was liberal about diamonds and other gems, also about the milliner, never grumbling, and I really and truly loved him, I shouldn't consider marriage a drawback."

HE was "cracking" a house in the suburbs when a slight, delicate woman came running down the stairs, and putting her hand on his arm, inquired in a terrified tone: "What's the matter? Is there a burglar in the house? Oh, protect me!" In her terror she did not think of him as the robber, and the evident comfort it gave her to find someone to protect her afforded him a new sensation. He was staggered for the moment by the situation, but hearing other inmates moving upstairs, who had evidently been aroused by her loud exclamations, he quickly said: "Certainly, ma'am, I'll protect you—have no fear. Just stand here behind the door while I look in the kitchen, where the noise seems to come from." "Oh, thank you," she replied, as he slipped out into the kitchen, picked up his shoes, and vanished, leaving the booty piled up on the floor in a tablecloth.



A MINIATURE PAGE FROM THE GREATEST BOOK ON EARTH.

Here is presented to the readers of Short Stories a miniature page of a book pronounced by the Press to be the most remarkable work of the century. Every year thousands of new books are published. They are read and forgotten. But once in a hundred years a new book appears which THE WORLD IS WAITING FOR. It contains some new truths which alters the history of mankind. Such a book has been issued. You will read it. If not to day, then some other day, for sooner or later it will be read by all men and all women. And when you have read it your life will be altered. It will become better, happier, more joyous. The writer of the book is Professor Boyd Laynard, who is now recognised as the greatest living authority on personal hygiene. The name of the book is "SECRETS OF BEAUTY, HEALTH, AND LONG LIFE." Its sale is rapidly approaching copies.

"Secrets of Beauty, Health, and Long Life," is no misnomer respecting the title of this extraordinary work. The author has unfolded to the world many secrets regarding these subjects, the importance of which it is impossible to over-estimate. The work, however, has not been written for the purpose of startling the reader with remarkable theories, but as a practical handbook for all those desiring good looks, health, and long life.

The publishers have issued a popular edition, at a price within the reach of all, so that the book may find a place in every home. The work is arranged in 127 chapters, the whole of which (in the popular edition now offered to the public) is bound in one volume. The book, although published at Two Shillings, will, if ordered direct from the Publishers, be forwarded to readers of Short Stories, carriage paid, at the low discount price of

ONE SHILLING AND SIXPENCE.

Among the numerous subjects dealt with, the following are but few. A complete syllabus, showing the contents of the whole of the 127 CHAPTERS, enumerating upwards of 500 SUBJECTS and divisions of subjects, can be had free on application to the Publishers:—

The way we make our own faces—Secrets of face transformation—Changeableness of beauty and its causes—Some strange facts concerning the variableness of beauty—"Odd-faced" beauty—The countenance the counterpart of the mind—How pleasing expressions become permanent—How a person's habitual look is acquired—How permanent expressions can be transformed—Metaphysical secrets of keeping young and preserving a youthful appearance—The author's investigations into the causes why some individua's look younger than others at a certain age—Discovery of a great metaphysical secret—Wonders of the skin—Effects of mental emotions upon the skin—Bad complexions and their causes—Diet that spoils and diet that improves the complexion—General care of the complexion—Construction, growth, and wonders of the hair—Why hair falls out—Premature greyness: its causes and prevention—General care of the hair—Superfluous hairs and how to treat them—Wrinkles: their prevention and treatment—Freckles, tan, and blackheads—Oily skin, dry skin, and loose skin—How the nose can be improved—Protruding ears and their treatment—Offensive breath—Anatomy of the teeth—Why teeth decay—General care of the teeth—Tallness, and how to attain it—Round shoulders and how to cure them—How to acquire a full chest—Perfect form and figure: their proper proportions—Thinness, and its treatment—Excessive stoutness—Care of the hands—Care of the feet—Physiognomy; or, the art of reading character from the face—Mental influences upon health—Power of the mind over the body—Influence of the mind in curing diseases—How the mind can cause dyspepsia—Effect of the direction of thought to the heart—How real diseases often supervene upon fancied ailments—How violent passions injure health—Laughter as a medicine—Ailments cured by laughter—Wonders of digestion—Relative value to our bodies of the principal articles of food—Fruits and vegetables as medicine: their various influences upon the physical system—Health-preserving diet and its consistency—Diet favourable to mental exertion and intellectual culture—Influence of various foods upon our passions and propensities—The influence exerted by the mind upon the appetite and digestion—Some perilous articles of food—Exercise and its relation to health—Baths and bathing: their influence upon health—The way we breathe, and how it affects our health—The marriage state, and its influence upon health—Statistics showing the comparative vitality of married and single persons—100 professions, trades, and occupations: their respective influences upon health and long life—Sleep, and its relation to health—Insomnia, and its treatment—The eyes, and how to preserve them—The ears and hearing: how to prevent deafness—The voice: its cultivation and preservation—Memory, and how to improve it—Sudden failure of memory—Rules for cultivating the memory—Influence of diet upon memory—Stammering, and how to cure it—Prevention of disease—Nervousness—Blushing: its physiology and treatment—Rules of life for attaining longevity—Compendium of the mental, moral, physical, and external influences that lessen the years of our earthly existence—How to live to a hundred—Premature old age and its causes—Short biographies of 30 modern centenarians, whose ages range from 115 to 185 years—General principles that can be laid down for the anticipation of longevity—The eight signs of long life.

That good old family game of "Hunt the Slipper" is doomed. It has been beaten out of existence by a new pastime called "Hunt the Fiver." Never heard of the game, you say? Good gracious, how behind the times you are. You'll be saying that you never heard of football next. However, in case you don't understand the latest popular game, let me explain it to you.

Take this copy of Short Stories in your left hand, then turn the leaves with your right till you arrive at page 530. You will there find five portraits. If yours is amongst them and you send in a claim to us in accordance with the conditions printed on the same page, you have won the game and get a £5 note for your trouble. If you don't find your portrait in this week's number, the game is to buy next week's, and so on till you do find your portrait.

Of the second batch of portraits the originals of three of them have claimed, and £5 notes have been dispatched to them. Here are their names and addresses:

Advice to Readers on Various Matters.

(Replies to Correspondents.)

In reply to "Beginner," something remotely akin to the tricycle was known as far back as 1767. The infant progenitor of the bicycle was the "dandy-horse," introduced into England in 1818 by Baron von Drais, in which the initial impulse came from the rider's own feet, with which, as he bestrode his vehicle, he propelled himself rapidly along the ground. The first pedalled bicycle was invented about 1846, and is generally credited to Gavin Dalziel, a Scotch cooper, of Lesmahagow, Lanarkshire, but it was a very primitive affair, and it was not till 1867 that modern cycling, as we know it, took its rise in the "bone-shaker" of M. Michaux, a wooden machine.

On several occasions last winter (says the editor of Home Notes) I mentioned that I knew a quick cure for neuralgia, toothache, and earache, and in reply to many hundreds of inquiries I sent particulars. In the treacherous weather we get during an English winter we never know when one of these complaints may attack us. Whilst I am unwilling to mention the remedy by name here, I am quite willing to give all information as to where it can be obtained, etc., on receipt of a stamped addressed envelope. It has been used, and is always kept handy, by the Duchess of Sutherland, the Earl of Wemyss, Lady Courtenay, Mrs. Kendal, and others. As it cures in one minute, no reader of Short Stories should fail to keep it in the medicine chest.

One of my lady readers writes to ask if it is really true that certain smart society women indulge in cigarettes made of tea?

Yes, unfortunately; and it is certainly one of the maddest and most dangerous "fads" ever conceived. The cigarette is formed of the unbroken leaf of green tea, slightly moistened. The taste is not so disagreeable as might be supposed, but the effect on the tyro is a sense of thickening in the head and a disposition to take hold of something or sit down. If the beginner quits them, that settles it—she will not try tea cigarettes again. If, however, the smoker sits down and tries a second cigarette, inhaling it deeply, then the thickening feeling passes, and is succeeded by one of intense exhilaration. The nerves are stimulated until the smoker feels like flying, skirt dancing, or doing something else entirely out of the common way. This stage lasts as long as the smoke continues, which is until the reaction of the stomach sets in. Words cannot describe the final effects of the tea cigarette. The agony of the opium fiend is a shadow to that of the nauseated victim of the tea cigarette. It will be hours before food can be looked at, yet, curiously enough, the first step towards a cure is a cup of tea.

In answer to "D. B.," the creation of a peer is now effected by letters patent, addressed to the new lord of Parliament, which are accompanied by a writ of summons to the House of Lords. The following is the form of procedure. The Prime Minister informs the Home Secretary of the intention of the Crown. The Home Office thereupon instructs the Crown Office in Chancery to prepare a warrant for the sign-manual. This warrant, when prepared, is submitted by the Home Secretary to the King, and having been countersigned by him, it is returned to the Crown Office for the preparation of the letters patent and the affixing thereto of the Great Seal, and the letters patent and writ are then sent to the newly-created peer. On the introduction to the House, the new peer presents his patent to the Lord Chancellor, and this and also his writ of summons are read and entered upon the journals of the House. They form the "matter of records," in which, as the Lords resolved in 1680, the title to a peerage must originate.

CHAPTER I.

"WHAT the dickens does that mean?" And Frank Holmes, the stage manager of the Good Samaritan Company, suddenly came to a halt upon the pavement of Piccadilly, Manchester, as though he had received a blow in the face.

"Pinch me, hit me. I can't have got them again!" answered Clive Pendennis, actor, in the same company. "No, it's all right enough. What on earth does it mean?"

The two men had come to a halt opposite the hoarding upon which the following poster was prominently displayed:—

PRINCE'S THEATRE, MANCHESTER.
For Six Nights Only.
MISS HAZEL HARLOW
AND Powerful London Company
IN EAST LYNNE.
Miss HAZEL HARLOW as "ISABEL."

"Well, this is the rummiest go I ever struck in all the course of my theatrical career," ejaculated Holmes. "Here are we with the one and only Hazel billed to appear at the Theatre Royal, and on the top of that there's this announcement that Hazel Harlow will appear in another theatre."

"And where, in thunder, are our own bills?" cried Pendennis. "Here, there is something wrong about this, and, as luck will have it, Venables doesn't turn up this afternoon. I wonder what he will have to say to it when he appears?"

The other looked at his watch.

"Ten o'clock," he said. "Let's go to the theatre and see if there is anybody there who can throw any light on the matter."

On their way to the theatre they noticed, confronting them in flaming letters from every hoarding and on the backs of sandwich men, the announcement that Hazel Harlow would positively appear in East Lynne, and on that very night (Monday). They also remarked that their own posters were in meagre evidence, and were quite overshadowed by the placards advertising the East Lynne Company.

At the theatre they found nearly the whole company assembled, among them Hazel Harlow herself. Holmes and Pendennis both saw that they were not alone in the possession of the electrifying news.

"What on earth does it mean, Miss Harlow?" cried Holmes. "Are you doubling your rôle to-night, or have you found a ghost?"

"I am just as much in the dark as you are, Mr. Holmes," answered the girl. "I was just saying what a terrible pity it is that Mr. Venables is not here."

"It's the most shameless piece of effrontery I ever heard of," broke in Jenny Lovelace hotly; "that anyone should have the audacity to usurp Hazel's name. It's easy enough to see what it is—it's a put-up job."

"But whose company is it?" broke in Holmes.

"Tom Henderson's," answered one of the actors. "I think I know his crowd pretty well, and there's no one there that I know of who bears the faintest resemblance to Miss Harlow."

"Of course not," answered Jenny with a contemptuous sniff. "As I said before, it's as plain as a pike-staff; it's a put-up job to draw a crowded house for Henderson's lot."

"But what's to be done?" said Holmes in despair. As stage-manager he was excellent, but in a crisis such as this he was practically useless. All felt that Raymond Venables was the only man who would be able to cope with such a situation, and he was not expected in Manchester till the afternoon, and with him was coming Eric Monteith, to rejoin the ranks of the company he had been forced to abandon for awhile at Birmingham: (See Short Stories No. 666.)

Suddenly Hazel spoke.

"I know what I'm going to do," she said decisively. "I'm going round to the theatre to see if I can't see this 'Hazel Harlow.' Then, when Mr. Venables comes this afternoon we shall have something to go upon. He will probably have some idea that will enable us to get the better of Mr. Henderson and Co."

"A good idea!" cried Holmes, catching eagerly at the first straw that drifted down the current of his perplexity. "That will give us something to go on, as Miss Harlow says."

"Yes," went on the actress; "I don't want anybody to come with me. I'm going alone, incognito. I shall just ask to see 'Miss Harlow.' I'll put on a thick veil, and if I can I'll find out who my namesake is, and anything else that may happen to crop up. Perhaps it is my double," she said, smiling; "anyhow, the idea of becoming a private detective is rather to my taste."

Read "Dead to the World."

Jenny drew Hazel apart.

"Let me come with you, Hazel," she said.

Hazel hesitated.

"I should love you to come," she answered slowly. "But don't you think it would be easier for me to do this alone?"

"But supposing something should happen to you? Suppose there is something at the bottom of it all that means disaster to you. Supposing this is the work of your enemies—of the man Caldecott, of whom we have heard nothing for so long?"

"I'm not afraid," answered Hazel stoutly. "And I am sure, somehow, that Horace Caldecott could have no hand in this. He knows perfectly well that if he were to show his face here I would have him arrested. Sir George Chetwynd at Southampton told me not to hesitate for an instant, but to communicate with the police at once if I heard of his presence anywhere. He assured me that he would come forward and give his testimony on my behalf. And think, I am not going into any outlandish region. I am going to a theatre in broad daylight. No, Jenny, I think the real Hazel Harlow ought to tackle the false one single-handed!"

When once Hazel had made up her mind Jenny knew that argument was useless, but it was not without some feelings of misgiving that she saw her friend depart, veiled and cloaked, through the damp, foggy atmosphere of the November day on her self-imposed errand.

There were a great many people outside the "Prince's Theatre" as Hazel approached the building. Large placards were displayed with the words "Hazel Harlow is here" upon them.

Hazel made her way round to the stage-door of the theatre, where a top-hatted individual, with a clean-shaven, heavy face, was sitting in the little office adjoining the entrance.

"Can I see Miss Harlow?" said Hazel to him in a low voice.

The man stared at her with undisguised curiosity.

"What's your business?" he demanded curtly.

Hazel handed him a sealed envelope.

"Perhaps you would give her this note?" she said.

The man twirled it in his fingers for a few minutes.

"I don't know if she is in the theatre," he said at last. "If you'll wait here a minute I'll go and see."

In a short time he reappeared.

"Miss Harlow will see you," he said. "I'll take you up to her dressing-room."

He led the way up a flight of stone stairs and knocked at a door.

"Come in," cried a voice—a woman's.

The fellow threw open the door, and Hazel entered the dressing-room. It was a small apartment with a screen at one end, a table beneath the window upon which were displayed all the appurtenances of an actress's "make-up," and a few other insignificant details.

In the centre of the room a woman was standing, tall, superbly dressed and undeniably beautiful, though of that bold, pronounced type that is more or less common with women of a certain stamp in the profession.

The man shut the door and retired.

"Are you Miss Harlow?" began Hazel meekly.

"I am," answered the other defiantly; "or rather that is the name that I have elected to assume."

Hazel threw back her veil.

"But I believe I have a prior right to that name," she said, as she did so; "and, besides, the name happens to be my own. It has not been assumed for stage purposes."

The other gave vent to a contemptuous laugh.

"There's no copyright in names," she replied disdainfully. "I believe if I cared to call myself 'Ellen Terry' or 'Sarah Bernhardt,' I could do so."

"But why should you have chosen my poor insignificant name?" replied Hazel, nothing daunted by the overbearing manner of the other woman. "I suppose I ought to take it as a great compliment, but surely your conduct lays itself open to a certain amount of censure when you adopt a name that appears for the first time side by side with mine in Manchester."

"I will admit I had reasons for what I did," came the calm answer. "It suited my purpose to assume your name and there's an end of it. The situation should appeal to you. We are going to ask the people of Manchester to decide between us; see whether they prefer the Ruth of Hazel Harlow No. 1 to the Isabel of Hazel Harlow No. 2."

"Yes," broke in Hazel. "But you don't seem to have given the people of Manchester much chance. Hazel Harlow as Isabel is billed far more than the other. That seems to be rather calculated to mislead. I am perhaps vain enough to think that people will visit your theatre out of compliment to my poor name."

"I am not an advertising agent," retorted the spurious Hazel Harlow, "and if Mr. Henderson has thought fit to spend more money in advertising than your man, well, the inference is obvious. Have you nothing more to say to me?"

Hazel was nonplussed for a moment. The cool and brazen effrontery of the woman almost took her breath away. She was at a loss for an answer. The other noted her hesitation.

"What are you going to do?" she asked.

"You may be quite sure that we shall take steps to protect ourselves," answered the other with spirit. "The game is not played out yet."

The unknown gave vent to a mocking laugh.

"You are quite right there," she said.

At that moment a faint noise from behind caused Hazel to turn her head. A woman had sprung from behind the screen with outstretched hands. Hazel felt her own arms gripped from behind, and then a sharp prick as of a needle being inserted into the soft flesh of her forearm. She uttered a sharp cry, and turned round to grapple with her unknown assailant; then a sudden overpowering lassitude seized hold of her: her strength seemed to be ebbing quickly away; the room swam round; then she lost consciousness.

"Very neatly done, Clara," said the false Hazel. "You drove the needle in well; there's nothing like a hypodermic injection to quiet refractory people. And now we must get on with the rest of the business."

CHAPTER II.

RAYMOND VENABLES's and Eric Monteith were met at the station by Frank Holmes and Jenny Lovelace, with consternation written on their faces. In as few words as possible Holmes related to Venables the astounding news that there was another Hazel Harlow in Manchester, with the result that the rival theatre had had unprecedented booking. But there was almost worse news than that. Hazel Harlow had disappeared. She had gone round to the theatre, and as she had not turned up within the time she had named Jenny had gone round to look for her, only to be met with the information that a lady had called to see Miss Harlow (meaning, of course, the false one) who had left almost directly after the interview.

Venables was distraught, as well he might be. It was bad enough to discover the trick of the rival company, but that Hazel had disappeared was far more serious news.

As for Eric, he had looked forward with intense longing to see Hazel once more, and now to learn that she was missing almost drove him frantic.

Eric, Venables and Jenny held a hasty council of war.

"I am sure," said Jenny, "that Hazel's disappearance is connected with the visit she made to the theatre. I tried to dissuade her from going, but she would not listen to me. What on earth can be done now?"

"I'll tell you what I'm going to do," said Venables. "I'm going round to see Henderson, and to threaten proceedings. It's scandalous that he should play such a scurvy trick. As if it were possible that there were two Hazel Harlows in the world. I shouldn't be surprised if it was part and parcel of the dastardly trick that they've got Hazel shut up there so that our hands are tied as regards billing her to appear at the theatre. This scheme hasn't been hastily thought out. There's something more at the bottom of this than we know."

Accordingly Eric and Venables lost no time in going round to the rival theatre. At the entrance they paused to read the great notices billing Hazel Harlow in East Lynne. Venables gnashed his teeth in fury.

"Look at that," he said hoarsely. "Did you ever see anything more abominable?"

Suddenly a voice fell on Eric's ears.

"Mr. Monteith," he heard. "This is indeed a pleasant surprise." Upon the steps of the theatre a woman was standing, a tall, beautifully dressed figure. Eric looked at her in amazement.

"The Duchess of Stanchester!" he ejaculated in sheer amazement.

The woman laughed at his astonishment.

"Alias Kitty Melville," she said. "It's like old times to see you here, Mr. Monteith. Someone told me that you had taken to the boards, while I—well, you know the moth that has once singed its wings at the candle-flame always flies back to the light, and so it is with me. I mourned for Stanchester a whole year and then—well, here I am!"

Words froze on Eric's lips. Phantoms of the past rose up before him as he gazed at the beautiful figure standing there. He remembered well how in days now dead his youthful fancies had been captured by Kitty Melville, as she was then, and how the actress had responded to his boyish passion. She had sworn undying love for him, beardless Oxford boy as he was; but the glamour with which she had surrounded him soon faded, and it was with a feeling of the utmost relief he read the announcement of her marriage with the aged and decrepit Duke of Stanchester. And now the Duke was dead, and Kitty Melville had risen up before his path to remind him of what were best forgotten. But what was she doing here? Could she have any connection with the spurious Hazel Harlow who had ousted the legitimate owner of that name in Manchester?

These thoughts flashed through Eric's brain faster than they take to tell. His thoughts were centred round Hazel; where was she? Perhaps this woman could give him a key to the situation. He looked round for Venables, but the manager had disappeared somewhere. Then Eric turned to the woman.

"Can I have a few words with your Grace?" he said, in a low voice.

"Certainly, Mr. Monteith. Come up to my dressing-room. It's quite like old times to see you again." But in spite of her lightly-spoken words there was a suspicion of latent nervousness lying beneath them.

As soon as they were alone Eric turned to the Duchess.

"Perhaps you can throw some light on this mysterious Hazel Harlow No. 2," he said quietly. "Perhaps you can also give me some information as to where Hazel Harlow—the real one—is at this moment. As you know, she is a member of the company to which I have the honour to belong."

The Duchess laughed mirthlessly.

"If you must know the truth," she said, "I am acting under the name of Hazel Harlow. As for the young lady in whom you seem to take so great an interest, I can only say that she came and saw me here and then went away. But why do you look at me like that? Have you forgotten the old days, Eric, and all that passed between us? I only married Stanchester out of pique. You know that as well as I do. My heart was always yours, and always will be. If you knew how I had been longing to see you, and to hear from your own lips that you had not forgotten me——"

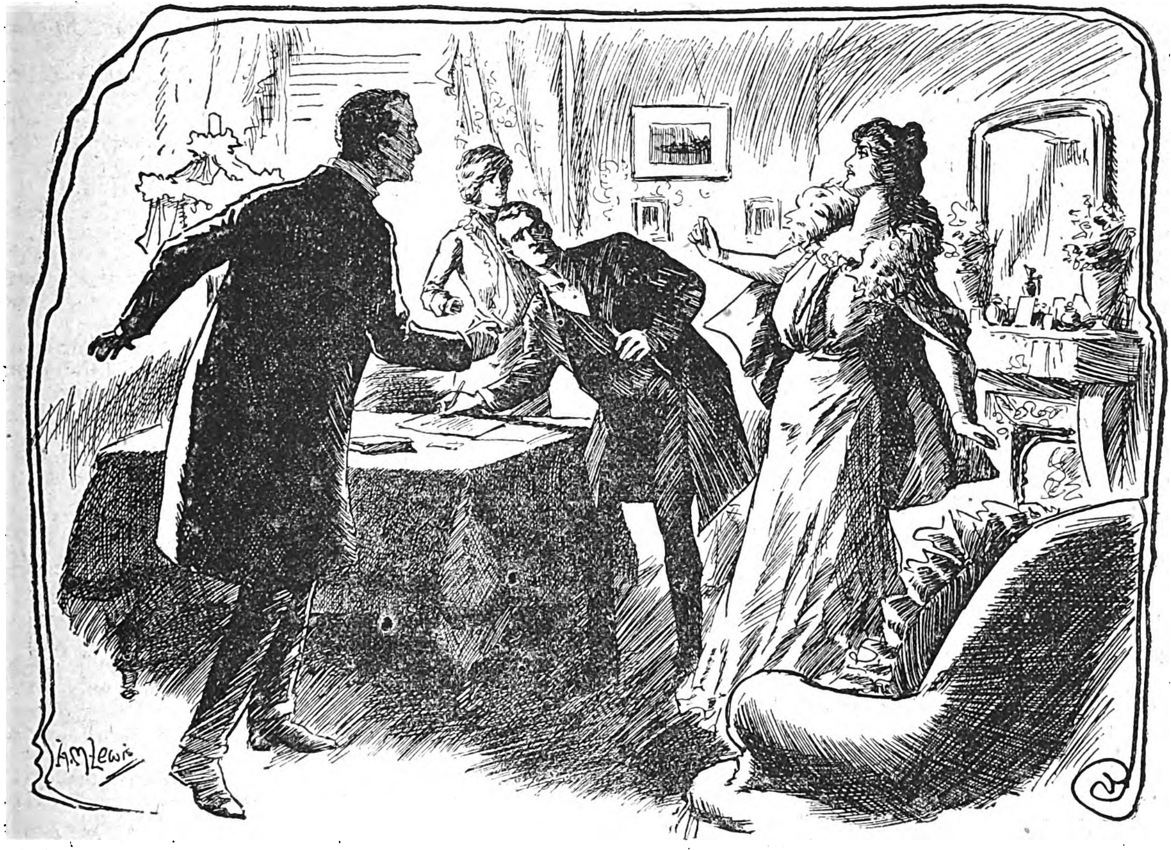
But Eric put up his hand with an imploring gesture.

"How can your Grace speak like that?" he said coldly. "The past is long since dead. It is surely but little use to rake amongst the embers of a forgotten folly."

"Folly!" echoed the actress with heaving bosom and face aflame; "then you mean to say that you were not in earnest, or is it that I have grown plainer and older in these years that have passed since we met? Ah, I see what it is," she continued, with rising passion, "it is this Hazel Harlow that has come between us. You have been captivated by her pretty looks, and are ready to forget all the love words you uttered to Kitty Melville. It is for her—a country chit—that you would throw over a woman's love."

Eric was too dumfounded to find a ready answer to this stormy flood of words. It seemed incredible that he could have ever cared for this woman, or have fancied that he did, and it was incredible that she could make so much copy out of what had been, after all, only a youthful flirtation on his part.

"I regret exceedingly," he said at last, "to find that my past actions have been so misconstrued. I will own that I was in the wrong to have flirted with you, but I never for one moment imagined that you had taken my boyish actions so strongly to heart. I assure you that my regret is indeed deep, and yet I fail to see why you should have impersonated Hazel Harlow as you have done, or why you should take notice of the fact that I am her lover. I admit that I do love her, and if I ever marry, she is the only girl I ever will marry. I own that I have come here hoping to find where she was, for she has disappeared, and it is known that she came here to visit you."



"I have cheated the gallows!" she murmured faintly

A terrible look came into the woman's eyes as she heard this frank avowal, for, to give her her due, all her passionate nature was concentrated on Eric Monteith. In her case absence had indeed made the heart grow fonder.

"If that is your last word, then," she said hoarsely, "go and find Hazel Harlow, and I wish you luck. I don't know where she is and I care less."

In his heart Eric felt that the woman was lying. He felt instinctively that she did know where her innocent rival was; that she had, indeed, taken some steps to wreak her vengeance on the girl who had come between Eric and herself; that this adoption of Hazel's name was part and parcel of her plot. Eric knew that all the vast wealth of the Duke of Stanchester had come to the old nobleman's relict, and that the son of the Duke by his first wife had been practically left a pauper at his father's death. Yet what could he do? He had no proof to back up his belief that there had been foul play. The Duchess was an unscrupulous and a clever woman. She had probably laid her plans with a deep forethought.

"And if I tell you that I do not believe you?" he said curtly. "That I am of opinion that you do know where Hazel Harlow is? I shall take all the steps in my power to elucidate the mystery of her disappearance. What will you do then?"

The actress' eyes gleamed.

"Do your worst," she muttered. "I deny that I have any hand in the affair, and you have no proof to the contrary."

"No, but I will find proof. I see how great your boasted love for me is that you can wound me in my tenderest part, and hope by such methods to turn my affections from one who is purity and goodness personified."

His words had an unlooked-for effect. In a moment the Duchess changed her front and flung herself at the young man's feet.

"Don't turn from me like that, Eric," she wailed. "Why won't you give up this girl? I tell you that I love you with all my heart and soul. Is it nothing to you that I am the Duchess of Stanchester, that I am possessed of great wealth? Am I so unpleasing to look upon? Surely I am not altogether hideous or undesirable?"

But such self-abandonment had only the effect of increasing Eric's distaste for this unwelcome lover.

"Your Grace surely forgets yourself!" he said with difficulty; "it is unwomanly of you to abase yourself so before me. Heaven knows that you are beautiful and attractive enough, but love cannot be bought. It must be spontaneous, and besides, I cannot reconcile myself to the fact which you assert—that you do not know what has become of Hazel Harlow. I cannot help but think that you know where she is, and I cannot hold with your taking her name. There is no excuse for so wilful an assumption of another's reputation."

Read "Dead to the World."

"And why not?" cried the Duchess, rising to her feet. "All is fair in love and war! Well, I have done for you what I would do for no other man. I have unsexed myself and for nothing. I bid you go!"

But Eric felt that the last word lay with him.

"Then you absolutely deny that you know where Hazel Harlow is?"

"Yes," came the defiant answer. "Go out into the streets of Manchester and look for her."

In the meanwhile Venables had been endeavouring to gain an audience with Henderson, the manager of the East Lynne Company, and to demand an explanation of the extensive billing of the name of Hazel Harlow.

But Henderson was not to be found. In other words, the badger refused to be drawn. Venables was beside himself with rage and mortification. In the first place Hazel had disappeared; and secondly, there seemed no way of counteracting the wily plans of his adversary. The blow had fallen so unexpectedly, and so much money must have been expended to gull the people of Manchester, that it must be some time before the evil could be counteracted.

Venables threatened injunctions and metaphorically shook the law in the face of Henderson's minions, who listened imperturbably to his railings. The day was getting on, the bookings for East Lynne were unprecedented, and—to crown all—the real Hazel Harlow had disappeared. Neither was there any evidence to show that Mr. Henderson had any hand in her disappearance. Everybody in the rival theatre was unanimous that a veiled lady had appeared that morning to interview the Duchess of Stanchester, and had left the theatre shortly afterwards. The Duchess had indeed laid her plans well.

Venables rushed out of the theatre breathing vows of vengeance, and almost ran into the arms of Eric returning from his fruitless quest. The two hastily compared notes.

"What are you going to do?" asked Eric.

"Do!" cried Venables. "There is only one thing we can do. Get out bills to the effect that the East Lynne people are advertising a spurious Hazel Harlow, and to offer a huge reward for the recovery of our own lead. That's what blues the whole concern, and makes me feel so unspeakably wretched, as I am sure it must you. To think that Hazel has gone, Heaven knows where, to say nothing of the fact that had we got her here we would be able to hoist Henderson's crowd with their own petard. As it is, upon my word, I don't know what we can do. I wonder if there is a smart detective in Manchester to whom we can turn. Anyhow, I think I'll go round to the police and put the case before them."

Hardly were the words out of his mouth when Eric felt a hand upon his shoulder. He wheeled round, to be confronted by a somewhat ragged individual.

"How do you do, Mr. Monteith?" said a voice that sounded strangely familiar.

Eric stared at the man in astonishment.

"Who on earth are you?" he cried.

The man laughed.

"Ah, you don't recognise me in this get-up," he said. "Don't you remember a little affair at Rugby where we ran a very pleasing scoundrel to earth?"

Light suddenly dawned on Eric's brain.

"Kempton Bond!" he ejaculated.

"Not so loud," answered the detective. "So you recognise me?"

"What brings you to Manchester?" muttered Eric. "You are just the very man I want."

"If you'll come with me I'll tell you," answered Bond. "I shall be very pleased to help you if I can."

He led the way to a quiet hotel in Corporation Street, in a private room of which the three men soon found themselves snugly ensconced.

"And now," said Bond. "I'll tell you why I have come to Manchester. It is in connection with a little affair concerning Her Grace the Duchess of Stanchester."

"The Duchess of Stanchester!" said Venables, "alias Kitty Melville!"

"Yes," answered Bond, "also alias Hazel Harlow."

"So it's she!" cried Venables. "What on earth is her game?"

The detective smiled.

"Her game is nearly up," he answered grimly. "Do you gentlemen care to hear a little story?"

Both assented eagerly.

"You will probably remember," said the detective, "that his Grace the Duke of Stanchester died somewhat suddenly after a short illness, leaving the bulk of his property to his widow. By a will that was only a few days old, and that he would very probably have altered had he lived, the present Duke, then known as the Marquis of Saundersfoot, was left practically a pauper, and it was not till some time after that he made the discovery that there was a mystery surrounding the death of his august father. The Marquis, like many other young scions of nobility, had gone the pace a bit, and had been foolish enough to flirt with his stepmother's maid. This woman admitted to him one day, after a champagne supper, that the Duchess had resolved to become possessed of her husband's entire fortune by fair means or foul. Then came his father's sudden death and the disappearance of the maid afore-mentioned. For some time he took no action in the matter, but among some old rubbish that had belonged to the maid he discovered a small bottle containing the dregs of a particularly insidious poison. His suspicions were aroused, and he communicated with me. Since then I have been on the track of that maid, and I have only just succeeded in running her to earth. She has again entered the employ of the Duchess of Stanchester."

"Then you think that the Duchess poisoned the old Duke?" asked Eric in a horror-stricken voice.

The detective shrugged his shoulders.

"Such things have been done," he said quietly. "But what is this business about which you wish to ask me?"

"Why, that the real Miss Hazel Harlow has disappeared," replied Monteith, and he related to the detective all that he knew about the matter, telling pretty fully his interview with the Duchess only a short time previously.

"So that's how the wind blows," cried Kempton Bond. "That simplifies matters exceedingly. What do you say to paying another visit to the Duchess of Stanchester in company with me, Mr. Monteith? If that lady has had any hand in the disappearance of Miss Harlow, I think we shall be able to kill two birds with one stone. If we can force her hand the game is ours, and there's no need to prosecute any further search for the missing maidservant."

Kempton Bond spoke with confidence, and both Venables and Monteith felt that Providence had given them a most unexpected way out of their difficulty. Venables looked at his watch.

"It's five o'clock now," he said. "We've not too much time."

"Time enough," answered the detective coolly. "If we can only find her Grace the battle is as good as won. Mind you, I don't say positively she did poison the old gentleman, but the servant's words and the discovery of the phial ought to go a long way to clearing up the matter. And, depend upon it, her Grace would do a good deal to keep her name from being dragged up into public notice as a murdress. And, mind you, the facts are pretty strong. The only wonder is they didn't create more comment at the time. The Duke makes a brand new will, dies within a few days of it, and the servant disappears almost immediately after his death. Anyhow, it's enough for Kempton Bond to go on. But this new move of hers is a caution." He threw a sly glance at Eric. "There's some saying about 'a woman scorned,' I believe, Mr. Monteith," he said.

Eric coloured.

"At any rate," he said stoutly, "I don't see that I have anything to blame myself with."

CHAPTER III.

When Eric and the detective went round to the theatre it was to discover that the Duchess was not there. Neither would the officials at the theatre give her private address in Manchester. This was a check that Kempton Bond had foreseen. He accordingly determined to wait about until her Grace should appear.

Venables had not been idle. He had had huge placards put outside the theatre to the effect that owing to the indisposition of the genuine Miss Hazel Harlow her part would be filled that night by an understudy. Underneath the notice was the following sentence in smaller type:

"Miss Hazel Harlow achieved her first and only success in The Good Samaritan, and has appeared in the part of Ruth with unprecedented success in most of the large towns in England. In spite of all assertions to the contrary, Miss Hazel Harlow will appear in no other play save The Good Samaritan. The public are warned against being gulled by any misleading statement."

This notice was put into being at the advice of Kempton Bond, for the detective had assured Venables that if his surmises were correct, he need have little fear that Hazel had been put out of the way. He was convinced that although the Duchess of Stanchester had had a hand in her abduction, she would not dare to go to the extreme of silencing Hazel for ever.

And with this Venables had to be content.

About an hour before the curtain was due to be rung up at the Prince's Theatre on the first act of East Lynne, the Duchess of Stanchester, alias Hazel Harlow, turned up at the theatre with her maid. It was a dark foggy evening, and as she stepped from her carriage on to the kerb she was startled by the appearance of two men who confronted her in silence. With a thrill, she recognised one of them as being Eric Monteith, the other as a dapper, well-groomed stranger, unfamiliar to her. It was indeed Kempton Bond.

"I must have a word with you, your Grace," said Eric breathlessly. "I beg of you that you will grant my request."

The Duchess hesitated. Her eyes went from the one to the other of the two men. "I thought you had said all there was to say to me," she replied haughtily.

"So did I," answered Eric quickly. "But since I saw you last something has happened that makes it absolutely imperative that I should have a few moments conversation with you."

Again the actress hesitated. Then her infatuation for Monteith got the better of her quickly born suspicions that everything was not as it should be as regards dealings between herself and Eric.

"I can give you a few minutes," she said, in a low voice, "but——"

She broke off abruptly and looked fixedly at Bond.

The detective took off his hat with a low bow.

"I can wait for you here, Monteith," he said airily; "I don't suppose your business will take you very long."

His eyes turned to the maid who was standing behind her mistress. He looked fixedly at her for a few moments, and then drew aside, but there was nothing in his action to arouse suspicion in the girl that he was other than an ordinary individual.

"Come up to my room," said the Duchess, turning to Monteith.

The young man obeyed her in silence, trying to hide the turmoil that raged within his breast. When they were alone the woman shut the door and turned towards him.

"What is it you have to say to me?" she said in a low voice.

Eric hesitated. It was some few moment before he could find his voice. Then he said:

"The business that brings me here hinges upon the conversation that I had with you a few hours ago. Since then I have learnt something that has put into my hands a terrible weapon, and one that I must use against your Grace in view of what has gone before." He paused. The woman's face went deathly white. Her eyes were fixed with terrible intensity upon Eric's face.

"What do you mean?" she muttered hoarsely.

The position was a trying one for Eric. Words seemed to stick in his throat. It was with the utmost effort that he continued. "When I last saw you you told me that you did not know where Hazel Harlow was. Do you still adhere to that statement?"

"I do," came the answer, faint yet defiant.

"Then there is no need for me to beat about the bush further. To put the blunt, terrible truth before you, you are on the eve of being arrested for being concerned in the death of the late Duke of Stanchester!"

A cry of horror fell from the woman's lips, and an expression of deadly fear came into her face.

"What do you mean?" she gasped.

"What I say; and I tell you that unless you reveal to me the whereabouts of Hazel Harlow steps will be taken to have you arrested immediately."

"What proof have you of this? It is merely a trumped-up story to get me to renounce once and for always every chance of winning your love," and the infatuated woman gazed despairingly at the pale, stern face before her.

"The proof is incontestable," answered Eric firmly; "but it is not for me to dwell any more explicitly on the dreadful facts that have been adduced as evidence of your guilt. It is not for me to judge whether you are really guilty or innocent. What I am concerned in is to see justice done to one who has never done you an atom of harm--I mean Hazel Harlow!"

A moan came from the lips of the Duchess. For a minute or so she made no answer. Her eyes were fixed on the man's face. She seemed to be reading his very soul. At last she spoke.

"Heaven knows," she said, "how you have found out anything at all about the past. I will not deny or admit that I am guilty, but this much I will admit. I do know the whereabouts of Hazel Harlow, and I will take you to her. Believe me or not as you like, I only played this desperate game to see whether I had absolutely and utterly lost your love. The scheme of impersonating Hazel Harlow was mine. It was my money that bought over Henderson, lock, stock and barrel, to fall in with my plans; but I see that it was all for nothing, and remember, Eric, that whatever happens, it was all for love of you. I was ready to go to any length to obtain your heart." Then a slight shudder shook her frame. "I only married Stanchester out of pique and attracted by the wealth and position he could give me; and now I'll tell you what I'll do. I'll take you this moment to where Hazel Harlow is."

Eric could hardly believe the evidence of his own senses. He had expected defiance, scorn, perhaps tears, but that the woman should have thus capitulated so easily must point to one of two facts: either that there was truth in the accusation preferred against her that she had been party to the death of her husband, or that she realized that the mad scheme she had conceived to oust Hazel from the public eye and from Eric's affections was doomed to failure. Yet the denouement of her surrender was yet to be enacted.

"Who is that man below?" suddenly asked the actress in a low voice. "Ah, you needn't tell me. He is a police agent. Well, what does it matter? The game is up. I've had my fling. Let's go at once." Then she laughed mirthlessly. "We'll leave Henderson to make what explanations he can, for I shan't come back here to-night, there is no fear of that."

She went to the door and bade Eric follow her. On the threshold she paused, and, turning, fixed her brilliant eyes upon his face.

"Eric," she said brokenly, "will you give me one kiss in token of forgiveness? It's all I ask, and Hazel Harlow need never know." The last words were spoken in a tone of unutterable bitterness. Before Eric could answer she leant forward and throwing her arms round his neck, imprinted a burning kiss upon his lips. Then she hurried down the stairs closely followed by Monteith.

Kempton Bond was waiting quietly outside the stage-door smoking a cigarette. He expressed no surprise as he saw the two issue from the theatre. The Duchess, without a glance in his direction, set off hurriedly, walking down the murky street, the two men following closely at her heels. She kept on for some time and then turned down a side street. At a house at the end of this she stopped, and taking a latch-key from her pocket, inserted it in the lock of the door and preceded her companions into a dimly-lighted hallway.

Without a pause, as though desirous of getting through with the business before her with all possible expedition, she mounted the stairs that led up to the higher parts of the house, and at last stopped before a green baize door on a landing upon the topmost storey. This door opened into a small passage-way with another door at the end of it. This was locked, and the Duchess knocked smartly upon its panels.

"Come in," said a quiet voice that Eric recognised in a moment as Hazel's. The Duchess threw open the door and admitted the two men into a long airy apartment tastefully furnished with a skylight of frosted glass upon a sloping ceiling above. A standard lamp with a red shade was lit in the corner, a cheerful fire gleamed in the grate, there were books scattered about. In fact, a more cheery, cosy prison, for a prison indeed it was, it would have been hard to imagine.

"Miss Harlow," said the Duchess, in a firm voice, "I have brought some friends to see you. Your imprisonment is over."

Hazel uttered a cry of joy and ran towards Eric with outstretched hands.

"Again my saviour!" she cried gratefully.

Monteith took hold of the girl's white supple hands with a thrill of pleasure. The Duchess had thrown herself into a chair and sat regarding the young couple with eyes that blazed like living coals from out of her pale face. Bond stood near the door with folded arms, his eyes never leaving the countenance of her Grace the Duchess of Stanchester.

Suddenly the latter sprang to her feet.

"Wait a minute," she said, "the last act of the play is still to be played out." She turned with an imperious gesture to Kempton Bond.

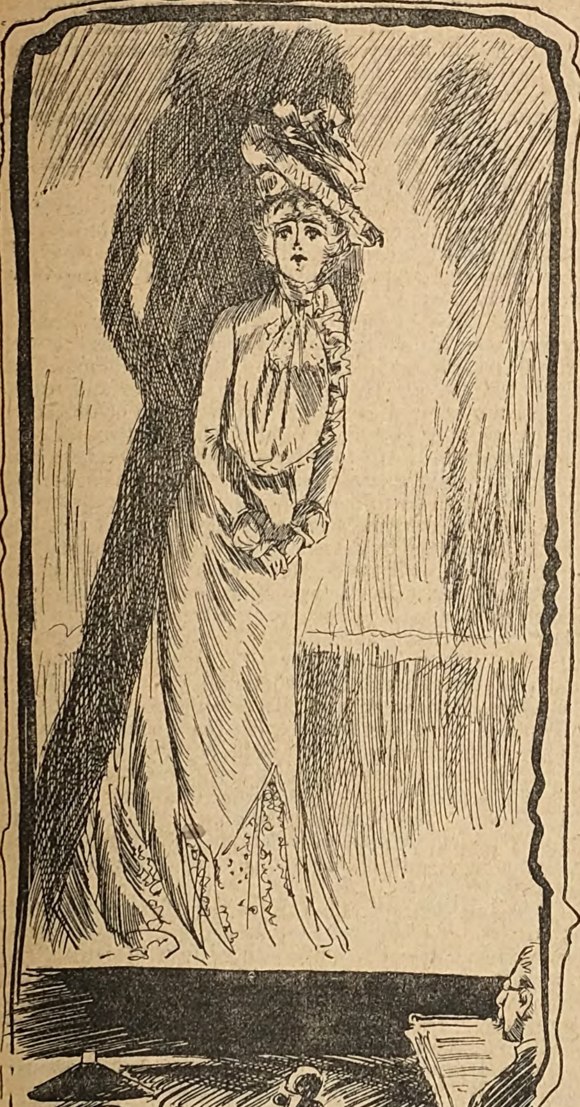
"Mr. Policeman, or whatever you are," she said scornfully, "what I am going to say will probably interest you more than these two young lovers. I believe you are here to arrest me for being mixed up in the death of the Duke of Stanchester. Well, let me save you trouble. I'll tell you the whole story of how the Duke died. He had always been a fast liver, and his system had been undermined by long years of riotous living. He was taken violently ill and the doctor who came to see him said that he might flicker out any moment like the flame of a candle. Needless to say, he did not tell this to the Duke, he only told me. I went to his Grace, informed him that he was suffering only from a trivial ailment, and that the doctor had assured me that with a little careful nursing he would soon be on his legs again. Strange as it may seem"—this with a quick look at Eric—"the Duke doted on me. He was ready to gratify my every whim. I then told him that his son, the present Duke, had contracted a marriage with a person of low descent, and by various misrepresentations induced my husband to make a fresh will leaving practically everything to me, and only the title, as was of course inevitable, and a paltry pittance to his heir. Then—I had been assured, mind you, that the Duke's days were numbered—I sent my maid-servant to purchase some poison. I administered this to the Duke in his medicine. My servant was absolutely guiltless. I say this before witnesses so that there can be no possible mistake about my statement."

A low cry of horror burst simultaneously from Hazel and Eric, Kempton Bond alone remained perfectly unmoved.

"Is your Grace ready to put your signature to a written confession?" he said in a low voice.

"Perfectly," answered the Duchess, with almost incredible coolness.

Kempton Bond took a stylographic pen from his pocket, and with the pen of a ready writer, transmitted the deposition he had just heard to writing.



It was Hazel herself who went before the curtain.

"And now your signature here," he said. When his task was done with unswerving coolness, "and then I'll get Mr. Monteith to add his signature to mine as witness of the deposition."

The Duchess glanced quickly down the lucidly written statement. At a blank space at the bottom of the page she signed her name, "Katharine Stanchester," and not a stroke of her pen showed the faintest indecision or hesitation.

Kempton Bond then took the pen and prepared to add his name to the document. Suddenly the Duchess turned her back and her hand went to her face. Then came the sound of breaking glass, and it was seen that she had hurled a little bottle across the room which struck the wall sharply and fell in fragments on the carpet. With a cry of horror Eric sprang forward; there was a smile on the woman's lips.

"I have cheated the gallows," she murmured faintly. Then her whole body swayed like a tree in a storm. With a gurgling cry she fell forward into Eric's arms—a lifeless corpse.

CHAPTER IV.

Strange as it may appear no one at the Prince's Theatre had noted the disappearance of the Duchess of Stanchester from her room, and until within a few minutes of the rise of the curtain everyone believed she was in her dressing-room. A fact that added colour to this was found in that her maid who acted as her dresser had been seen to enter her apartments some time before. The call-boy was sent on his round, and the stage was at last kept waiting for Isabel, who, it will be remembered, was billed as being enacted by Hazel Harlow. The theatre was crammed, as was indeed the rival house, the Queen's, for the knowledge that there were two Hazel Harlow's in Manchester had acted as a powerful spur to the citizens to investigate the meaning of so extraordinary a coincidence.

Venables had frankly given out that his Miss Hazel Harlow was indisposed, but Henderson had no such statement to fall back upon. He was too far involved for that. His unscrupulous conduct was, indeed, to be the means of his reaping the whirlwind. It was speedily discovered that the Duchess of Stanchester's dressing-room was empty. Here was a terrible quandary. Henderson was at his wit's end. The substitution of the Duchess's understudy as Hazel Harlow would spell absolute failure to the deception, for the Duchess was a woman of undoubtedly fine presence and wonderful acting powers. It was by reason of this that the East Lynne Company had pledged themselves to so unscrupulous an undertaking. Henderson tore his hair metaphorically, and gave wild orders for the orchestra to perform yet another selection in view of the possible return of the lost Duchess.

Suddenly a cab dashed up to the door of the theatre, and a man leapt out. It was Kempton Bond who demanded to see Henderson without a moment's delay.

The manager, clutching at the last straw of hope that the detective's arrival gave him, took Bond into his private sanctum.

"A pretty kettle of fish you've prepared for yourself," said the detective grimly, "and when you've heard me out you will be the best judge of what you're to do in the matter. How you could have been such a fool as to try and palm off her late Grace the Duchess of Stanchester as Hazel Harlow surpasses my understanding, as it must surpass the understanding of every sane-minded individual."

"But where is the Duchess?" muttered Henderson hoarsely, his flustered comprehension failing to take in the detective's ominous meaning conveyed in the words, "the late Duchess."

"The Duchess of Stanchester," came the grave answer, "has been called to a higher tribunal. She has made her last bow on the world's stage."

"Dead!" gasped the manager. "Do you mean to say she is dead?"

In answer, the detective flung down the deposition signed by the miserable woman who had gone to her last account.

"The Duchess died by her own hand," he said calmly; "after having first witnessed the authenticity of this terrible confession."

A paroxysm of fear seized Henderson as he read the document.

"What can I do? What can I do?" he wailed. "The stage waits: the theatre is packed; the audience will lynch me if they don't see her. What shall I do? What shall I do?"

"Do," came the contemptuous answer; "be a man for once in your life. Tell the truth; admit that you have played a dastardly trick. It's all you can do."

"I daren't!" whined the craven, fear-stricken man.

"Then I will!"

"You!"

"Yes, I."

And without another word Kempton Bond left the room and made his way round to the back of the curtain. Here all was dismay and confusion. Everybody seemed at their wits' ends. At the wings were clustered actors and actresses, scene-shifters and supernumeries, all talking together in low, constrained voices.

"I knew we should get landed over this," Bond heard one of the actors murmuring to a companion; "and now her Grace has gone and let us down nicely."

Bond threw him a contemptuous glance, then, brushing aside those who would bar his path, he made his way to the front of the curtain, and before anyone could raise a hand to stop him, or had, indeed, realized what he was about to do, he had stepped boldly out before the footlights and put up his hand to the leader of the orchestra in token that he should stop playing.

The apparition of this dapper, well-dressed man who had so coolly come forward had its effect upon the crowded house. All eyes were turned to the figure of the detective. The orchestra stopped with a final flourish, and Bond, clearing his voice, began as follows:

"Ladies and gentlemen, I must beg of your forbearance for a few minutes, for I have something to say which will be as painful to me to utter as it will be for you to listen to. In the first place, I must tell you that I am in no way connected with this theatre, or with the lessees of it. I am merely here in the interests of truth and justice. It has been extensively placarded all over Manchester that Miss Hazel Harlow, the actress who won her name in the Good Samaritan Company, would appear in this theatre to-night in East Lynne. Now the name of Hazel Harlow is not a common one. People on seeing that name would naturally connect it with the young and beautiful actress who has won so much fame for herself in a totally different rôle. I am not at liberty to reveal to you the full story of how it comes that I am here speaking to you to-night, but I must tell you this—there can be no performance in this theatre to-night, for the lady who had assumed the part of Isabel under the name of Hazel Harlow is dead!"

The detective paused. A cry of horror went up from the audience, who had listened spellbound to the detective's words. Raising his hand to enjoin silence, he went on: "In view of the terrible occurrence I beg of you all to make no demonstration. The money will be returned to all who have purchased seats for to-night's performance." And, with a final bow, he slipped back as quietly as he had come.

In the quiet room where the Duchess had put the consummation to the follies of her life were the minions of the law. Eric and Hazel had hurried round to the theatre just in time to stop Venables from commencing the performance. It was Hazel herself who went before the curtain as Bond had done at the other theatre, and told the audience that there could be no performance that night for reasons that would be explained in to-morrow's daily paper. It had, indeed, been a terrible conclusion to a terrible day.

The Manchester Guardian of the next morning devoted nearly three columns to the tragic story that it was inevitable should become public property. The story of how Hazel was abducted had best be told in the very words which appeared in the paper.

"When Miss Harlow paid a visit to the miserable woman who had so flagrantly impersonated her, it was only to be trapped in the most dastardly fashion. The servant of the late Duchess sprang upon her and ran a needle into her arm containing an injection of morphia. Miss Harlow was smuggled out of the theatre and conveyed away in a cab to a house that the Duchess had taken, and where, later on, the unhappy woman put the crowning end to her actions by committing suicide. The maid-servant had attempted later on to escape, but she was shadowed by detectives who had long wanted her in connection with the death of his late Grace the Duke of Stanchester, and she was apprehended. But what seems to us almost as serious a matter is that a whole theatrical company should have been so easily suborned to fall in with the fell plans of the Duchess of Stanchester to bring about Miss Harlow's discomfiture. We sincerely hope Mr. Henderson and his accomplices will not be allowed to go off scot free. What the Duchess intended to do with her captive we shall never know. In all probability she intended to keep her in durance vile until the conclusion of the East Lynne Company's visit to Manchester. Our sympathy is given unrestrainedly to Miss Harlow. We congratulate her most heartily on having come out of her dangers with comparatively so little hurt. . . ."

It was not till some time afterwards that the full story of how the old Duke of Stanchester had met his death transpired. When it did another thrill of horror ran through the minds of the public to think that Hazel Harlow had fallen into the hands of so abandoned a murdress. Yet the Duchess of Stanchester was not all bad. She was one of those strange combinations of good and evil, a woman who knew no half measures. It must be either whole-hearted love or utter hate with her, and there was no doubt at all that the mad infatuation she had conceived and cherished so long for Eric Monteith had a good deal to answer for the final crowning madness with which she consummated her stormy life.

Yet in this surely Eric must be held blameless. There is probably no young man in the world who has not at one time or another been attracted solely and simply by the face of a beautiful woman without probing deeper for those attributes that must be present if the heart is to be given to a worthy object.

Henderson took refuge in flight. Manchester speedily became too hot to hold him. The company broke up and drifted Londonwards, to hang about outside the doors of agents, and to pick up what crumbs they could that fell to their lot as actors and actresses who had been connected with a company that had come to so ignominous an end.

TEST OF THE HEART.

JONES advised me not to marry her—he said that she was too young and pretty.

Farnum advised me to remain an old bachelor—told me a man past forty simply made a fool of himself by matrimony.

Tewksbury—a man who is notorious for never minding his own business—told me she had had a love affair with Harry Birmingham before he went south.

Allen shook his head and said Clara Myers might be very pretty, but he liked somebody maturer and more settled. (N.B.—He married his housekeeper the next week, and she is mature enough for Methuselah himself!)

Everybody thought I was trying a dangerous experiment, but I didn't pretend to suit everybody, so I simply suited myself. I went quietly to church with Clara Myers and married her one glorious January morning, when the eaves of old St. Paul's were fringed with glittering icicles. She was nineteen and I was nine-and-thirty. She was as beautiful as a rose-bud, with a shy, pretty way, like a timid child, and I am a rough old codger, sound enough at heart, but, like a winter apple, unpromising on the exterior. In short, we were as unlike as May and November. The next day I made a will and bequeathed all my property unconditionally to my wife.

"Are you sure you are doing a wise thing, Mr. Folliott?" said Mardyn, the lawyer, pushing his blue spectacles up on his forehead, until he looked like a bald old gnome with a double pair of eyes. "You see, she is very much younger than yourself, and——"

"Please be so kind as to mind your own business," said I brusquely. "Don't be offended, Mardyn; but really people seem to suppose I am not able to attend to my own affairs!"

"Just as you please, sir—just as you please," said Mardyn, in a rage. "I am a mere tool in your hands!"

"That's it, exactly," said I. So I signed the will and went home to Clara.

"Oh, Paul, you must not die!" said Clara, with a scared look, when I told her what I had done. "Nobody ever loved me as truly and generously as you have done, and I don't know what I should do if you were taken away!"

"There was young Birmingham, if all reports were true——" I mischievously remarked.

"A mere butterfly," she said, haughtily, "without either brains or principle! Paul, Paul, I have found a shelter in your true, loving heart, and I mean to nestle there always!"

And then she cried—this foolish, soft-hearted little wife of mine.

So things went on until the firm of which I was managing partner needed to send someone to Calcutta to see after a turbaned scoundrel of an agent, who had absconded with more money than we could well afford to lose. Morrison was old and feeble. Hewitt's wife lay very ill, so I was the one to go. I kissed Clara good-bye as cheerfully as I could, fully expecting to be back in three months or so. But you know the old French adage: "L'homme propose et Dieu dispose!"

I had to follow the agent up into the mountains of India. I fell ill of one of those burning climatic fevers in the bungalow of an old native priest, and the months flew by until it was more than a year before I found myself on the deck of the Blue-Eyed Mary, steaming up the dear old Thames. And all this time Clara had never heard a word from me.

I had written to her to prepare her for what seemed almost like my rising from the dead, but I had afterwards found my letters in the pocket of the neglectful native servant who had undertaken to deliver the mails to the Calcutta office.

"But it doesn't matter so much now," I thought; "she will be more than delighted, poor little girl!"

And then a cold chill seemed to creep through my veins, like November's wind breathing across a bed of flowers!

I turned into a restaurant, where I had been wont to go in the days of my bachelorhood, and slunk into a dark corner; the twilight was just falling and I was sheltered by the partition.

Hush! That was Tewksbury's voice, harsh and jarring as of old.

"Just what might have been expected," said Tewksbury. "Pretty young widows don't go begging in this market."

"Folliott might have known it," growled old Farnum. "Poor Folliott! There were some very good points about him, too. Sad thing that—very sad thing."

"We must all die," said Tewksbury, gravely.

"Yes; but a fellow would naturally prefer dying in his bed to being carried off by an East Indian fever and buried in the jungles."

I shuddered. Had I then come home to my own funeral, as it were?

"And she's going to marry young Birmingham, after all!" added Farnum.

The paper dropped from my hand.

"I could have told Folliott so when I heard what a confoundedly idiotic will he had made!" said Tewksbury. "So gold has fallen again. Just my luck; I sold out to-night!"

I stayed to hear no more, but staggered out into the darkness with one idea whirling through my dizzy brain—my Clara was mine no longer!

It was quite true what Tewksbury had said. I might have anticipated some such end. She was too young, too lovely for such a rough old fellow as I was. My widow—what a curious sensation the words gave me as I mentally pronounced them!

Under my own windows, with a ruby-red light shining through wine-coloured damask curtains, I stood feeling as Rip Van Winkle might have felt in the play—like a dead man walking the earth once more. Voices and lights were within.

The drawing-room door was ajar. Clara herself stood before the fire, in deep black robes. Directly opposite stood Harry Birmingham.

"Clara, Clara!" he cried. "You surely are not in earnest. You will reconsider."

"My answer is final," she responded. "The time might once have been when you fancied I had a childish liking for you, Harry Birmingham; but that time has long since passed away. I gave my heart to the best and noblest man that ever breathed—Paul Folliott—and in his grave it is forever buried. I loved him once; I shall love him into eternity! I never was half worthy of him——"

And Clara's voice was choked with sobs.

How I ever got into the room I cannot tell to this day—neither can she. But I know that young Birmingham somehow disappeared, and I was standing with Clara clasped to my breast—the happiest man that ever breathed God's blessed air.

CHAPTER I.

A Triangular Discussion.

"It's no use arguing, Hammond, you've got to turn out; your lease of the ground is up, and I want the mill for a tenant who will put some life into the business and not go to sleep over it. Why should you grumble? You've had a couple of renewals since my uncle joined the majority seven years ago."

"You're hard, Mr. Mostyn," was the answer; "very hard! I've run the place for a quarter of a century—Rufus there was a weanling babe when I first got possession. My wife died here, sir, and lies buried in yonder churchyard; it will be like losing her again to bid Oakenarch farewell, for that's what it means."

Jasper Hammond's strong palms clenched, and his quivering mouth set under his grey beard. He was a stout personage in dusty-white garments, with a square linen cap on his sparse locks. He had uttered his nervous, almost tearful, sentences to an accompaniment of splashing water—the murmur of the great mill at work in the pent current of the mill stream.

"I can't establish another mill, you see, sir," he continued, "even if I could secure a water-right—rebuilding this after the fire nigh beggared me. Twelve months back, come Hallow E'en, I paid the last of the money I borrowed, and not a penny have I been able to save in addition."

"That's your own fault," he was told bluntly; "had you taken care to be insured you would have been better off, not worse, for your blaze. I am quite decided, Hammond—you will leave by Christmas." And the speaker twisted on his heel, as though to cross the small paddock on the river bank, and make for the horse that was tethered to a post of the entrance-gate. But a hand was laid on his shoulder and he halted.

Thus checked, the implacable Mr. Mostyn beheld a figure taller and slighter than the miller's, yet giving promise of a superior strength and activity. The countenance of this new participator in the dispute was clean-shaven and intelligent, his gaze cool and resolute. An air of cultured independence seemed to hang about him. Nevertheless, he bore a marked resemblance to the dusty, grey-bearded man at his side.

"A moment, Mr. Gerald Mostyn," he observed; "is yours the final word on the subject? Does Miss Brereton know we are being sent adrift, that were her father's tenants before her, and have paid the Breretons many a hundred pounds in honest gold? Rumour says she is a kind-hearted young creature; was it she who refused us a proper renewal of our lease, so that the ground-rent might be raised on us twice in six years, till it stands at double what satisfied Mr. Brereton? I judge it rather to have been the act of a grasping, egotistical jack-in-office."

"Rufus! Rufus!" exclaimed the miller, horrified; "you forget yourself, my son. Pray pardon him, Mr. Mostyn—he loves me and the mill, and has his mother's quick tongue and hot temper. She was a bit above me, you may have heard, sir, and the lad has good blood in him."

Gerald Mostyn sneered. He was a familiar type, spare, smartly dressed, precise, with a reddish-brown moustache and an insolent half-smile.

"A truce to apologies, Mr. Hammond," he said; "it is sufficient for you to appreciate that I act on Miss Brereton's account. Your son is not her tenant—let him stick to his wood-carving hobby; I care nothing for his long tongue, be it his or his mother's. As you appear to have suffered from it in both cases I wonder you did not tame the lady, and teach the cub manners."

The warm flush ebbed from Rufus Hammond's cheeks, their pallor showing darkly through his tan. A fist closed, and a right arm shot out; Gerald Mostyn was caught on the point of the jaw and lifted into a patch of nettles that filled a corner of the paddock. A spring, and Rufus had stooped over his prostrate critic.

"You insulted my mother," he declared, "and, but for soiling the water that the village folk have to drink I would fling you in the mill-race. Up with you and off our premises—for they are ours till the Christmas bells ring out. Then—should Miss Brereton support your infamous proceedings—you shall have Oakenarch Mill to tempt some poor fool into and rack-rent him as you have rack-rented us."

Mostyn dragged himself to his feet, muttering ominous prophecies. Rufus Hammond regarded him disdainfully.

"Be off," he concluded, "and—if you choose—prosecute me for assault, so that, at the price of a nominal fine, I may expose you in a court of justice."

The recipient of this advice slunk towards his horse, freed the rein from the gate-post, and, mounting with an oath, vanished at an angry gallop down the unfrequented road.

The miller propped his thick palms on either side of an ample waist, and shook a regretful head.

"That was my boy all over," he sighed; "but it's done no good, Rufus, it's done no good. Mostyn wasn't far wrong in recommending you to hold by the wood-carving—you're not fit for business, my son; you're what your mother wanted you to be—an artist. Artists have proud stomachs, and a tradesman must eat humble pie when there's anything to be gained by it."

"Nonsense, dad," retorted Rufus Hammond; "the scoundrel is determined to oust us—no humouring would have persuaded him to alter his mind. Besides, he insulted the little mother; I'd have punished him for that it he'd been a belted earl."

He glanced thoughtfully to and fro. A certain rich and quiet beauty lent the scene an irresistible charm. Before him the river, barred by a weir, spread a glossy sheet, reflecting the dull browns and reds of the autumnal foliage. Its current, confined to the mill-race, swept in a silent volume by the bank to operate the big wheel, dripping and moss-grown.

The scarlet roofs and the blackened walls of the mill and the mill-house nestled among the alders and willow and the rumble of the rotating stones smote vaguely on the ear. Close to, the stream was spanned by an ancient bridge of oak, forming a single curve—the "oaken arch," that had served to christen the locality.

"But we'll not lose the mill without a fight for it, dad," promised Rufus, after an affectionate survey of the prospect; "there was more than a trifle of truth in what I said just now. It isn't Mostyn who is responsible to the law for our going or stopping; it's Miss Brereton up at the Abbey. She shall be asked her view, or my name's not Rufus Hammond."

Having so pledged himself, Rufus buttoned the cuffs of his woollen shirt, and stalked in the direction of the house. He was a comely fellow, frank, clear-skinned, and supple.

"It's not worth while seeking a snub, lad," moaned the miller; "people in her station don't interfere with their deputies over tenants of our class. And Mr. Mostyn's mother is Miss Brereton's aunt; they are cousins—gossip hints that they may strike up a match, Mr. Mostyn being the next heir until Miss Brereton marries. At all events, he manages the estate for her, and she won't fancy your knocking her representative about like a sack of flour."

"She is a woman," replied Rufus curtly. "I will explain that he insulted my mother."

With which intimation he strode into the picturesque dwelling that stood landward of the mill. Climbing a steep staircase, he gained a tiny bedchamber and unhooked a rough frieze jacket from the nail.

In the window was a bench littered with delicate steel tools and fine wood chippings. Rufus Hammond paused by it to don his coat. This done, he picked up a small block, exquisitely carved and curiously polished. It had the shape of a human form—plump, cheerful, with a bearded face and the slight stoop of age. Apart from the vigour of the portrait, its square cap and loose garments identified it as that of the old miller.

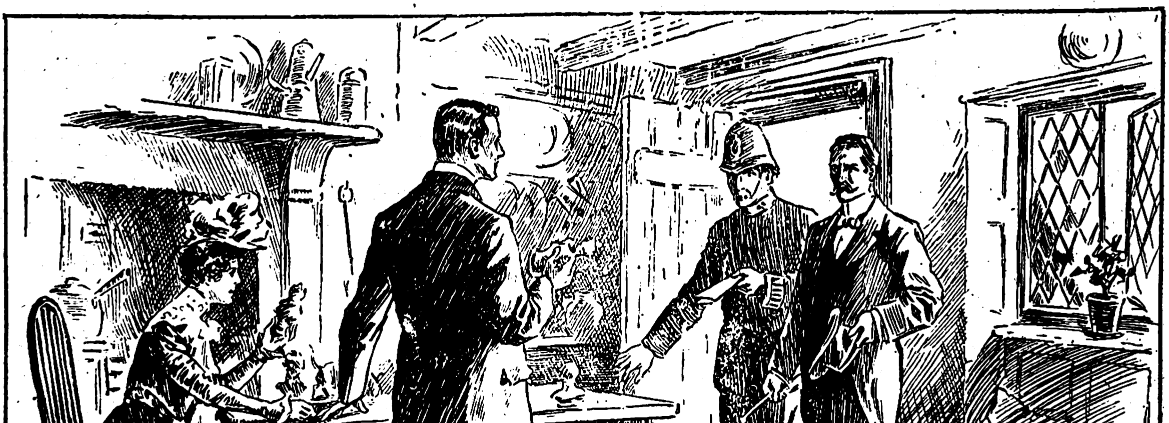
The wood-carver sorted out a scrap of cloth, dipped it in a jar of fluid, and rubbed the block carefully here and there.

"It isn't bad," he said at length, studying it with a smile. "I'll take it round to the Abbey, dad may get a chance to plead his cause in dumb show. Oddments of this kind are supposed, I believe, to amuse the rich and idle—we will try the experiment."

Wrapping the fragile article in a handful of tow—his solicitude for its safety an eloquent comment on his disrespectful reference to it—he drew his soft hat into a less negligent position on his dark curls, and descended to the kitchen. A buxom country girl was cooking at a cavernous grate.

"Lettice," remarked Rufus Hammond, "if I'm not back to dinner mind that father gets his."

"Yes, Mr. Rufus," assented the maid coquettishly, and casting a bashful glance at her young master;



A shadow fell athwart the threshold of the kitchen.

"have you finished that likeness of me you was a-doing in the pearwood I soaked for you?"

"Dear! dear!" was the answer; "I'm afraid I haven't. But it shall be completed, though I mustn't neglect the mill for my hobbies, Lettice."

"No, sir," said Lettice; "but I be rare anxious to see it ended. Shall I brush your coat, sir?—it's main floury."

"Thanks," rejoined the wood-carver, and held the figure of the miller in security for Lettice to perform the suggested office. He was slipping it into his pocket again when the original entered.

"Where are you bound, my lad?" he queried. His son passed him to the door—the withered leaves of the advancing autumn had blown over the threshold and rustled beneath Rufus Hammond's tread.

"To the Abbey," announced the wood-carver, "to ask Miss Brereton a few questions."

He stepped on to the cobbles of the forecourt, walked across the paddock, and went up the road.

"Well!" exclaimed his father; "I'll be jiggered!"

CHAPTER II.

A BITER IS BITTEN.

"It is quite impossible for you to see Miss Brereton now. In any case, she takes no share in the management of the estate—that is all left to my son, Mr. Gerald Mostyn."

Rufus Hammond scrutinized the pale, selfish countenance of the elderly woman before him. He had been ushered into her presence by a supercilious footman, and stood near the luxurious lounge chair in which she sat. The room he had entered was large and old-fashioned, with mullioned windows, commanding a stretch of park and meadow, and the distant tiled roofs of Oakenarch.

"I am sorry to appear persistent, madam," declared the wood-carver; "but I interviewed Mr. Mostyn an hour ago, and it is for that reason I am here."

Mrs. Mostyn looked at him sharply.

"You seem," she remarked, "above your station, Mr.—Mr.—Hammond, I believe your name is. Doubtless you can write a very suitable letter, embodying the purport of this visit. My niece shall give it her earliest consideration."

The visitor's response was a polite gesture of dissent.

"I am afraid such an expedient would not meet the necessities of the case," he objected. "Miss Brereton is the person on whose account my father and I are about to be driven from our home; it is right that she should realize precisely what she is doing."

Mrs. Mostyn rose.

"I perceive, Mr. Hammond," she told him, haughtily, "that you are nothing more or less than a discontented tenant with a glib tongue. However, Miss Brereton cannot see you, and as I am myself occupied at present I shall be unable to spare you any further time. Permit me, therefore, to wish you good-morning."

She put out a thin arm in a black silk sleeve and touched the bell. The door from the hall opened instantly. Yet it was not a servant who stepped into the apartment, but a girl of some twenty summers. She wore a sweeping gown of grey cloth, with a collar of cobweb lace, and a big and feathered hat. Her hair was nut-brown, and had faint golden lights in it. Her eyes were blue, her lips smiling.

"Ah, there you are, auntie," she cried; "I'm just going to drive into the village—the Abbey is as dull as a tennis-court on a wet day. But perhaps I disturb you?"

"No, dear," said Mrs. Mostyn, "this—this gentleman was leaving." And she motioned to the liveried figure that had answered her peal.

Rufus Hammond did not offer to make his exit; instead, he turned to the newcomer.

"I have the pleasure of addressing Miss Brereton?" he asked.

The girl bowed, an expression of surprise crossing her face at the cultured tones and quiet ease of the speaker.

"Y—yes," she responded hesitatingly.

The young man's gaze dwelt on her with obvious admiration.

"I am Rufus Hammond," rejoined the wood-carver, "the son of Jasper Hammond, of Oakenarch Mill; we have been tenants to you and yours, Miss Brereton, five-and-twenty years."

Stephanie Brereton threw her gloves on to a cabinet.

"How interesting!" she exclaimed; "I often wish I knew the Oakenarch people better. But Gerald—my cousin, Mr. Mostyn, who does my business for me—says you would think me inquisitive. Would you, really?"

"Mr. Mostyn is in error, Miss Brereton," asserted Rufus, ignoring, with a stern directness, Mrs. Mostyn's demonstrations of irritability and the stolid patience of the servant; "we should rejoice to know you and for you to know us. Destiny has placed you where you are, and us where we are, but it would be a brave and womanly thing for you to bridge the gulf. As for Mr. Mostyn, pardon me if I confess that he is widening it."

The girl knitted her brows, and Mrs. Mostyn interrupted the wood-carver's grave sentences.

"My dear," she urged, "do not allow yourself to be fatigued. Hammond is merely a dissatisfied leaseholder, possessed by a grudge against Gerald."

"That is not true, madam," replied Rufus Hammond; "we were but concerned with Mr. Mostyn in his character of agent to Miss Brereton, and as such we have dealt honourably by him. But when my father and I are threatened with eviction from the mill that has been our home for a quarter of a century, that we have rebuilt after a disastrous fire, and upon which we have paid, since Mr. Brereton's death, an extortionate ground-rent, we feel it necessary to appeal from Mr. Mostyn to the real owner of Oakenarch manor. It is you, Miss Brereton, who are the mistress of our fate, and it is you who must deliver the verdict."

Stephanie had caught up her gloves and was fingering them abstractedly.

"Has Mr. Mostyn no explanation?" she inquired, colouring at the exercise of her authority.

"Yes," said Rufus, his dark orbs fixed on the fair, sensitive features of the querist; "he wants a higher ground-rent than we can pay, a higher one than the mill could earn—honestly—if it ran double shifts. But there are fools and rogues enough, so Mr. Mostyn has decided to oust us."

"Must I endure this?" gasped Mrs. Mostyn. "Stephanie, have you no consideration? The fellow ought to be removed immediately."

Her niece's mouth twitched, and she took stock of Rufus Hammond's athletic form.

"We haven't anybody who could do it, auntie," she observed; "but I should like to ask Mr. Hammond why his father is not here to state his own case?"

Rufus glanced down.

"He—he is a simple, modest soul, Miss Brereton," was the answer; "he would have been tongue-tied with alarm. But I have brought him in miniature, if not in person. If I am a miller by trade, I am a wood-carver by taste. Miss Brereton, this is my father."

So saying, the visitor groped in his pocket, disengaged the study of the miller from its tow envelope, drew it forth, and set it on the palm of his hand.

Stephanie regarded it at first with amusement, then with appreciation.

"Did—did you do that?" she demanded. "Why, it is wonderful! How did you get your training?"

"Tried to copy what I saw, Miss Brereton," said Rufus Hammond, "as far as the material could be coaxed to permit. Some carving in the parish church—by Grinling Gibbons, I have heard—put me on the right track, and afterwards I experimented."

"You—you must have genius," commented Stephanie; "how splendid! You—you will let me help you? I have powerful friends in London—Royal Academicians and newspaper men. Have you done other pieces?"

"A—a few," stammered Rufus, overwhelmed by the praise which the enthusiastic girl poured out to him.

"I will come and see them," said Stephanie Brereton, restoring him the carving of the miller; "that is, if I may? I am driving into the village; can't I give you a seat in my victoria?"

"Great heavens, Stephanie!" ejaculated Mrs. Mostyn, oblivious of Rufus in her excitement; "are you mad? His—his clothes!"

Her niece laughed.

"It's nothing worse than flour, auntie," she retorted. "Now, Mr. Hammond, the victoria is waiting. And don't worry about the mill. Mr. Mostyn desires to serve my interests of course; but I fancy I can convince him that they don't require your exile."

She signed to the footman, who flung open the door. Rufus stepped to Miss Brereton's side as she passed out: she noticed, with feminine astuteness, that he was not in the least embarrassed or disconcerted. They crossed the hall, preceding the severely-unconscious servant, and gained the sombre porch of the Abbey.

A smart victoria was, as Miss Brereton had stated, in readiness. Rufus handed her to her seat, followed himself, the footman transmitted the direction to the coachman, and they were whirled away. Mrs. Mostyn, gazing from a window, pinched her thin wrist to make sure she was not asleep.

"Pardon me an impertinent question, Mr. Hammond," said Stephanie Brereton, "but have you always lived here?"

"Always," assented Rufus, rolling the tow more securely about his carving.

"Your father is a—cultured man, then, for a miller?" hazarded Stephanie.

Her companion flushed.

"My father has a heart of gold," he faltered, "but—but it was my mother who educated me. She was what the world calls a lady, but she loved Jasper Hammond, and she married him."

Stephanie Brereton was silent, and the carriage dashed along to the chiming of harness and the rhythmic beat of hoofs. At last the victoria stopped—they had reached the gate of the paddock. Rufus alighted.

"We walk through the meadow," he said, and aided her to descend.

Side by side they strolled down to the mill-house—the sturdy, frieze-coated son of the soil, and the daintily-gowned daughter of the "classes."

Lettice stared when they appeared in the kitchen, but Stephanie grew enraptured over its huge grate, its antique, pewter-laden dresser, its cool flags and gleaming brasses. Rufus sent for his father, and, with an apology to their pretty guest, hurried up to his bedchamber for some further specimens of his work. His pulses throbbed and his brain reeled—a thousand impossible hopes had suddenly taken shape and form.

The wood-carver returned to find that his father had arrived upon the scene, and now stood twisting his cap and pumping out monosyllabic answers to Stephanie's friendly compliments on his son's skill.

She hailed the younger man's advent with relief, and began to discuss the carvings. All were animated subjects, a wrestling match between country youths, a bull attacked by a dog, a village fiddler tuning his instrument. Stephanie knew enough to gauge the rare vigour and dexterity of this obscure artist.

The unfinished study of Lettice attracted her attention, she picked it up and looked from it to the original. "You will make something of this, Mr. Hammond," she told him curtly.

Rufus winced. "I have not touched it for a month," he responded. "I had begun to idealize it too much. Lettice wants a likeness of herself, not a fancy portrait."

The words were casual, yet they meant more than reached the ear. Stephanie smiled again. She had been vaguely conscious of a feeling that the splendid craftsman, with the world at his feet, might do better than ally himself to a plump, good-tempered country lass, whose ignorant adoration would have to console him for her lack of brains.

While she sat over the carvings, her arms on the scrubbed table-top, and her graceful head poised to criticise, a shadow fell athwart the threshold of the kitchen, and Stephanie looked up, astonished, to encounter the equally astonished gaze of Gerald Mostyn. By him was a constable, with a blue paper, folded.

"I've a summons for you, Mr. Rufus," said the latter, assuming an official demeanour, yet speaking as one who meets an intimate acquaintance; "it's a summons for assault, and battery, against the person of Mr. Gerald Mostyn, on your premises, this morning."

And the blue paper was thrust into the wood-carver's fingers.

Stephanie started up.

"Gerald!" she cried, "what freak can you be contemplating. Mr. Hammond, surely my cousin has exaggerated your conduct?"

Rufus stiffened himself, and his dark pupils were raised to hers.

"He—he sneered at my—mother," she was answered, "and I knocked him down."

"Assault and battery," said the constable; "but you needn't have admitted it, Mr. Rufus, in my hearing."

Stephanie Brereton sprang to Gerald Mostyn's side, a disdainful fire in her blue orbs.

"We will discuss the whole affair at once, Gerald," she remarked coldly, "and in private. Mr. Hammond, if this summons is pursued, and you are fined I will pay the fine publicly in court to show Oakenarch what I think of my cousin."

She moved towards the threshold of the kitchen, and Gerald Mostyn went with her, whispering unavailingly. Stephanie turned, oblivious of his murmured protests.

"Mr. Hammond," she continued, addressing herself to Rufus, "I will call another day and enjoy your wonderful work, and—and get your father to take me round the mill, which he will not leave. For the present, good-bye."

A spring, and Rufus stood over his prostrate critic.

And she swept out into the autumn sunshine with the air of an empress. Gerald Mostyn glanced back at the wood-carver, to snarl an unintelligible sentence of hate.

CHAPTER III.

A MODERN DUEL.

"I've got it lad, and you were right, after all; I thought you a bit of a fool at the time, but you've saved the mill for me, that you have!"

Jasper Hammond spread out the stiff sheet of parchment, engrossed with the formal phrases of the law-writer—it was a ninety-nine year lease of the land occupied by Oakenarch Mill.

"Called on lawyer in town to-day," said the miller, "and he had it ready for me. No costs, either; Miss Brereton had done the thing free and generous. Though I'll be bound," he added, "it's more for your sake than mine, Rufus."

His son looked up from the bench over which he leant, plying a thin steel blade about a bust of boxwood. It was the head and shoulders of a woman, arch and yet sedate, with waved locks on the low temples and dainty neck. The eyes—by some trick of the carver's art—seemed to smile, and the delicate lips to tremble in sympathy.

"Nonsense!" cried Rufus Hammond; "she acted from a rare and chivalrous instinct of justice. Mostyn plundered you for years in her name—this is her way of repaying you."

"And that," remarked his father, contemplating the boxwood bust, "is your fashion of thanking her. You've a master hand, my boy, and she'll be main pleased, no doubt. Is she to give you some more—what you call them—sittings for it?"

"One," said Rufus, abstractedly, working at a mimic tress of hair, so light it might almost have been stirred by a summer breeze; "this afternoon."

The miller folded and pocketed his precious parchment.

"I heard a bit of good news from lawyer," went on Jasper Hammond. "Mr. Mostyn is not to be Miss Brereton's agent any longer. Folks were saying at the 'Green Dragon' ordinary, there'd been a quarrel between him and her, and she's to manage her business herself in future. Time enough, too, for Mostyn was getting the name of Brereton as much hated as his own. But she's changing that, and fast—others than us, my lad, have had a lift from her in the last month. Oakenarch is wild in praise of her."

Rufus selected a fresh tool, and sliced at the close, even fibres of the boxwood.

"Mrs. Mostyn's leaving the Abbey also," pursued his father; "she's lost her chance of being Miss Brereton's mother-in-law as well as her aunt. Another relative is going to live with Miss B—a different sort to Mrs. Mostyn, the gossips have it."

A clock in the lobby below chimed the half-hour after two o'clock. Rufus Hammond began to collect his implements.

"I must take these down," he said, "Miss Brereton will be here soon."

Is your photo on page 562?

The miller held the door for him. The wood-carver carried off his unfinished subject and a sheaf of shining blades in worn hafts, descended the dusty staircase, and deposited them in the immaculate kitchen.

Lettice was baking bread in the great oven. She glanced at the bust and sighed—a certain daring hope in the little servant's heart had recently received a mortal wound. Rufus had not laboured over her counterfeit presentment as he was labouring over that of Miss Stephanie Brereton.

A footfall sounded in the cobble-stoned courtyard without, and Lettice turned to see, at the entrance of the shadowy apartment, the sullen visage of Gerald Mostyn.

Passing her his gaze travelled to the wood-carver.

"Hallo, Hammond!" he exclaimed, "so you're there —I—I want a word with you."

Rufus laid the last of his chisels in order and crossed to the threshold by which the visitor stood. Mostyn retreated to the short turf of the mill-paddock, motioning mysteriously to the wood-carver.

Puzzled, Rufus followed him. A sudden spring brought Gerald Mostyn between the house and his companion; he flung off his felt hat and unbuttoned his tweed coat—he had come in walking costume.

"Now, my cockerel!" he said, "you and I have a game to play out. A month ago you struck me unawares and I chose to stomach the blow, rather than scuffle with a country dauber. But as I am parting from Oakenarch—an inconvenient development for which you are responsible—I have determined to settle up the two accounts in one. If I am no novice with the gloves, you are a stone heavier and in better training, so we fight fair. Off with your jacket and choose your ground."

The wood-carver remained passive.

"I will not fight you, Mr. Mostyn," he answered; "I am the bigger man and you will get hurt."

Gerald Mostyn sneered.

"Have your drubbing any way you like," was his response, and, freed from his coat, poised himself dexterously and sprang in. Rufus Hammond's head moved—he had avoided a couple of scientific blows, yet his arms hung loosely at his sides. Mostyn's jaw set—the challenged was not lacking in experience. But cowardice was not among Gerald Mostyn's faults, and he rushed in again.

This time a clenched fist attained its destination—a trickle of blood showed on the wood-carver's nether lip. He leapt back, with the agility of a stag, and commenced to slip off his frieze jacket. He had no vest beneath and his waist was belted, his linen shirt fluttered white in the autumn air like that of a duellist.

"You will have it," he said quietly, and, stepping forward with light but firmly-planted strides. Mostyn scrutinized him an instant, and, darted in and sent a double-hammer stroke to the wood-carver's chest and waist. He was away in a second—unscathed.

Rufus Hammond smiled and drew a deep breath.

"Tickle his frontispiece, my lad," called a steady voice —the voice of Jasper Hammond. He had lounged into the courtyard and watched the struggle, one palm on his hip, the other restraining the horrified though fascinated Lettice, his grey pupils contemplating the opponents.

Rufus nodded and in the same moment stopped a hot left-hander. Mostyn pursued the attack, and a vicious half-arm jab sought the wood-carver's ribs, Rufus permitted it to land unnoticed as he recoiled, to deliver his own blows, in quick succession, upon Gerald Mostyn's cheek and jaw. The recipient pitched heavily upon the grass.

Rattled into madness by the shock, Mostyn gathered himself up and dashed at his antagonist just as a piercing cry of "Gerald! Mr. Hammond!" reached the ears of the combatants and announced the presence of Stephanie Brereton, who, escorted by a groom, had ridden unperceived into the paddock. She threw herself from her horse, left the rein dangling, and hurried to the antagonists.

Mostyn—more a bloodthirsty animal than a human being—was fighting a ferocious rally, and Rufus shrank from the madman in a kind of pity, contenting himself with an impassable defence. Inch by inch he yielded ground rather than knock out his opponent under the very gaze of a woman and a relative.

A cry startled him.

"Rufus! Rufus!" warned Jasper Hammond; "the race—mind the race!"

Rufus swerved, he had neared unconsciously the actual verge of the rushing, glassy flood. The action deprived Gerald Mostyn's leaning figure of his previous support, the strong hands and arms of his enemy. His own hail of blows overbalanced him, he tottered, missed his footing, and staggered into the stream, to be borne, with frightful rapidity, towards the wheel.

The wood-carver filled his panting lungs, dashed a red stream from his brows, and dived into the mill-race. The miller, flying to the bank, saw him glide under the surface, his body straight, his legs closed, his palms together. Driven by the impetus of his lungs, he was already beyond the drifting, floundering figure of Gerald Mostyn, who swam, but swam badly.

A second later and his brown locks emerged as Mostyn lurched by in the grip of the current. The wood-carver clutched his quondam enemy, seized a vest-collar in his teeth, and struck out, fiercely, Titanically, for the edge of the race. His fingers snatched the bank and he stayed, the water sucking at him greedily, and the drops from the revolving wheel beating on his head.

A warm clasp fastened on his wrist and hauled him up—it was that of the miller, who, shaking in every limb, but resolute and speedy, had consummated the rescue. Hanging protectingly to Jasper Hammond's loose clothing were Miss Stephanie Brereton's groom and his mistress. As the wood-carver lifted the senseless frame of Mostyn from the defeated current he had a glimpse of Stephanie's eyes; the undisguised admiration in them made his pulse dance.

* * * * * *

"Hammond, I've behaved to you like a cur," said Gerald Mostyn that evening to Rufus, "but you—you can imagine why. I—I love Stephanie, and I was jealous. Folks were coupling her name and yours because of her visits to the mill. And before that I—I didn't understand you or I'd have treated you better over the lease."

He paused, apparently communing with himself.

"To—to be honest, Hammond," he added, "you've saved my life, and—and I—I know she cares for you. You're an artist and therefore a gentleman—ask her to marry you; she'll say 'Yes.'"

And Stephanie Brereton did—to the lasting delight and profit of Oakenarch. The bust of Miss Brereton was finished by her betrothed husband and exhibited in the Academy of the ensuing spring. It was marked "not for sale." Gerald Mostyn went to Argentina in June, and in the following month Stephanie Brereton became Mrs. Rufus Hammond.

SEEN YOUR PHOTO IN SHORT STORIES?

IF SO, YOU WILL GET £5.

HERE IS THE SCHEME.

We have in our possession a considerable number of photographs of men, women, and children of all grades of society, secured for us by our agents, who have scoured the United Kingdom for this special purpose.

Each week we publish five of these portraits, and to each of the persons thus represented we dispatch the sum of £5, on his or her forwarding a claim on a post-card addressed to PORTRAIT DEPARTMENT, "SHORT STORIES," Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Although the persons whose portraits will appear in this competition are quite unknown to us personally, we have their names and addresses in our possession, and, therefore, a claim can be settled at once, without risk of fraud.

We may say that our agents are still at work all over the country. It is, therefore, possible that your portrait may appear at any moment without your knowing it. So you should watch SHORT STORIES.

Is your portrait here? If so, drop us a post-card, and get £5. Five more portraits will appear next week.

All claims in connection with the portraits below must reach the address already given above by Tuesday next, November 5th. Full names and addresses of the correct claimants will appear in succeeding numbers.

HOW TO MAKE A CLAIM FOR A £5 NOTE.

Simply write on a post-card these words:

The Portrait No.......... (here put number of portrait) in the current number of SHORT STORIES is mine. Please forward a £5 note.

(Name and full address.)

Persons represented must claim for themselves. Claims made by other people on their behalf will be ignored.

Short Stories That . . . . . . Make You Laugh.

We devote every week space in Short Stories to pithy, humorous anecdotes similar to those which appear in these columns. A prize of £1 1s. will be sent to the reader who submits the best storyette this week, and a P.W. penknife to each of those whose attempts are used. The anecdotes may be either original or selected; in the latter case, the source MUST be stated. Attempts must reach the Storyette Editor, Short Stories Office, Henrietta Street, Strand, London, W.C., by Monday, November 4th. Postcards only, please. The prize of £1 1s. has been awarded this week to Mr. A. Hutton, of 3 Lapage Street, Bradford, whose contribution is denoted by a star thus.*

Adele: "What do you think is woman's real mission?" Edna: "To get her name changed."

The following notice appeared recently in a shop window of a tailor in Cork: "Wanted, two apprentices, who will be treated as one of the family."

Yankee, standing on the stern of a steamer as she leaves Liverpool, and holding a shilling aloft: "If there's a man, woman, or child on this blessed island I've not tipped, come forward now, for this is your last and only chance!"

Tourist: "These are beautiful mountains, but how much more picturesque would they look if there was an ancient ruin on the summit." Hotel-keeper: "Yes, I believe an ancient ruin would draw more tourists. Next year I am going to have one built."

Young Lady: "I am tired of living on my relatives and want to be independent." Employment Agent: "I might get you a place in a shop." "That won't do. I should be under someone's orders continually. I want to be independent of everything and everybody." "Ah, I see. I'll get you a place as a cook."

Passenger (angrily): "Why didn't you stop the car for me?" Conductor: "How was I to know you wanted to get on?" Passenger: "Didn't you see me swinging my arms and jumping up and down and waving my umbrella?" Conductor: "Of course. Could anyone help seeing you? The whole street was looking at you." Passenger: "Then why didn't you stop?" Conductor: "I thought you were dancing to that organ."

* A certain gentleman who served with the Imperial Yeomanry in South Africa, is rather fond of drawing the long-bow when referring to his personal experiences. This fact has not escaped the notice of the gentleman's faithful man-servant, whom we will call Donald. The other afternoon the returned warrior had been relating to Donald a particularly startling story of heroism and deadly peril, when the canny Scot gravely observed: "It's a peety ye didna tak' me wi' ye." "Oh!" went on the narrator, "I daresay you would have done your best, but, really, you couldn't have assisted me much. I was completely hemmed in, and there was nothing for it but to cut my way through the serried mass of furious burghers. If you had been there, Donald, I'm afraid you would only have been in the way." "Aweel," said Donald doggedly, "mebbe ye're richt; but for a' that, I would ha' been useful as a witness when ye telt that story tae your friends."

Blank books possess no literary merit, but they are bound to sell.

Bridget: "Me mistress has been presented at court, Mrs. M'Flab." Mrs. M'Flab: "Ye don't say so! Phwat was the charge?"

Gentleman: "That looks a well-bred dog." Owner: "I should think he was well-bred. Why, he won't have a bit of dinner till he's got his collar on!"

"Physical culture is so helpful; it teaches the children to go upstairs properly." "How about coming downstairs." "Oh, they generally slide down the balusters!"

Bobby: "Dad, what is a mutual friend?" Mr. Fogg: "He is generally one who makes it his business to see that you don't miss hearing the nasty things your friends say about you."

Husband: "I have made all sorts of sacrifices for you. Now, what did you ever give up for me?" Wife: "What did I ever give up for you? Well, you astonish me! Why, I gave up half-a-dozen of the nicest young men in town."

Infallible: "Is your partner a man of good judgment?" asked an old friend who is in town on a visit. "You will find in him," was the unctuous answer, "a man of infallible judgment. He never makes a move without taking my advice."

A poor woman who kept a small shop in a northern village, and who was troubled with a husband who could scarcely be considered a credit to the family, one day found herself a widow through the sudden demise of her spouse. A lady, who often made small purchases at the shop, called to offer her sympathy. "I am sure, Mrs. G——, you must miss your husband very much," said the lady. "Well, mum," was the widow's reply, "it do seem queer to go into the shop and find something in the till!"

Teacher: "If your mother had twenty-five yards of stuff and made a dress containing eighteen yards, how much would she have left?" Little Girl: "Mamma can't make her own dresses. She has tried often, and they are always either too——" Teacher: "Suppose she sent it to a dressmaker, how much would the dressmaker send back?" Little Girl: "Depends on which dressmaker she sent it to. Some wouldn't send back any." Teacher (impatiently): "Suppose she sent it to an honest one?" Little Girl: "Some of the honest ones cut things to waste, so that there is never anything left, no matter how much you send 'em."

The curious manner in which various members of the same Boer families have ranged themselves on opposite sides in the present war recalls a story attributed to Frederick Locker. In one of our frontier wars with the Afridis we were considerably assisted by several members of the hostile tribe. An officer on duty chanced one day to point out to a native sentry a certain black fellow whom he had observed skulking with others round the fort, evidently with sinister intentions. "I see him, sar," said the sentry; "had two shots at him a'ready, him hard to hit, he hardest man to hit I know." "Oh, you know him, do you?" said the officer. "Oh, yes, sar; I know de rascal. I been trying to shoot him all de week." "Why, who is he?" "Oh, de rascal—he's my father!"

THE WOMAN IN RED.

WINTER reigned throughout Europe, but on the Riviera spring and summer bloomed together. Overhead the sky was infinitely blue, below the sea was green and purple and amethyst. Everywhere the sun, everywhere the scent of geranium and mimosa, the fragrance of rose and violet. Always the deep boom, boom of the waves thundering against the tall cliffs of Monaco, always the cry of the sea gull, forever the chimes of the church of Sainte Devote.

At Monte Carlo, that paradise of the gamester, the season was at its height. The Hotels de Paris and Beau-Rivage were crowded, those of the quarter La Condamine were full, and well-dressed people, finding shelter in some cheap lodging-house over in Monaco, gave the name of some more fashionable resort when applying for a carte d'admission to the "Cercle des Etrangeres," the euphemistic title of that institution which draws hither the avid and the inquisitive of all the nations. Day after day, night after night, the Casino overflowed with those who came to tempt Fortune. Everyone laughed and sang and was gay. Heavy hearts are hidden at Monte Carlo.

It was at a concert that she first appeared—the Woman in Red. The French tenor was just beginning his number when the doors of the middle box of the right-hand tier swung slowly open and closed behind her. She stood for just a moment outlined against the ivory background. Very tall she seemed, dressed from head to foot in red—not cardinal, nor crimson—but the most intense and glowing scarlet. From out this mass of colour her bare throat rose vividly white, and down the satin of her skirt her ungloved arms hung, soft and round as those of a child. Her hair, too, fine and fair, gave her head a rather childish look. And then—no wonder fans stopped fluttering and silks began to rustle—her face was entirely concealed by a mask of dark red velvet!

The lady seated herself quickly, with a curious grace in every movement, and the red of her dress spreading out around her stained as with blood the whiteness of the box. She raised her glass and insolently swept the house, moving her head so that the jewels in her hair blazed and flamed into the faces turned in her direction. A laugh floated from above as a woman in the gallery, with her programme twisted into a little roll, mocked the motion. The Woman in Red turned away her face with a shrug of her white shoulders, and sat through the performance quite still and indifferent. At the beginning of the last number she rose slowly, and gathering together her shimmering scarlet left the box. That was the introduction to the world of Monte Carlo of the Woman in Red.

After that interest centred about her, increasing as her peculiarities became known. She never wore a suggestion of any colour but red, and that alone was enough to make her conspicuous. Then the mask, thought to have been merely a caprice on the night of the concert, was never removed. That rendered her mysterious. She talked but little, going about silently, with soft, light step. One might be quite alone, and the next moment suddenly aware of the Red Woman's presence. When the tall young Englishman who lost everything at a turn of the wheel went out into the Casino garden and, cocking his pistol in the shadow of the cacti, muttered, "I'll end the whole cursed business!" the Woman in Red murmured persuasively beside him, "Oh, I wouldn't—" and he didn't, and when a lady knelt one evening before the image of the Virgin in the church of Sainte Devote, and whispered wildly, "Oh, blessed mother, forgive me my sins!" it was the Woman in Red, who finished softly for her, "and those who sin against me." This made her something more than conspicuous and mysterious—it made her awesome.

No one ever saw her smoke, but her scarlet garments always exhaled a faint odour of cigarettes. Every night she came into the roulette room and sat there in her scarlet dress, with a red flower in her hair, and put down her stakes with as much emotion as though the gold and notes were worthless. Consistent in her colour scheme, she invariably placed her money on the red, and nine times out of ten she won.

To make her a trifle more conspicuous, mysterious and eerie she had for her chaperon a woman so thin and wrinkled and old as to seem hardly capable of life. When some one ventured to ask her a question about the Woman in Red the creature cackled, "Oh, the Devil, the Devil, the Devil. How should I know?"

"No wonder the men like her," chattered a lively little French woman. "They'd like us if we'd muffle our faces and wore clothes like that. I'll wager she has the face of a blanchisseuse—any one could be fascinating behind a velvet mask."

"She is, certainly," said a bystander, dryly.

"Peste!" exclaimed the sallow critic, angrily. "No one wants that old Count or that stupid Baron, or that pink-cheeked English boy, anyway."

It is true that the Woman in Red found ardent admirers in the old Count and the stupid Baron and the English boy—the one to whom she had whispered that night behind the cacti—and the rivalry between them increased as the season passed. To-day one was in favour, to-morrow another, and the frequenters of the Casino got to betting on the chances of the several suitors till it became almost as exciting as a game at one of the tables.

But throughout it all the woman remained calm, inscrutable, mysterious. Neither of the three could persuade her to tell her name or take off her mask.

"I answer to any name," she said, "I have forgotten my own, and as for my face, what makes you think it beautiful?"

"Oh, you," said the courtly old Count.

"Your hands," said the stupid Baron.

"Your hair," said the blonde young Englishman, with British egotism.

In answer to each she only laughed a hard little laugh, not altogether pleasant to hear.

To be much talked about and to say little appeared to suit her. A month after her advent no one in Monte Carlo or Monaco knew a whit more about her than at first, and no one would have hesitated to give half his fortune—had he one—to know everything. The mystery of the masked woman was exasperating—the theories concerning her innumerable. Perhaps the majority of the women believed that, being very ugly, she had adopted this means of attracting the attention rightfully belonging to beauty. She was a problem which might be studied for weeks without arriving at a solution.

The warm southern days crept lazily along, and, as sometimes happens even in that sheltered paradise, began to grow oppressively hot. It was on the languid evening of one of these scorching days that the Woman in Red and the young Englishman were gaming side by side at the roulette table. The air of the Casino was heavy and scented, there was a murmur of laughter and talk, and the frequent click-clack of the roulette balls. The woman pushed back her chair impatiently and said to the man:

"Do come out into the garden—it is insufferably hot in here!"

"I should think," said the young man at length, as they strolled through the shrubbery, "that your mask would be unbearable."

"It is."

"Then why not take it off?"

"I did not come out to talk of that."

"But perhaps I did."

The Britisher's shoulders squared themselves aggressively.

The woman made no reply, but continued her occupation of listlessly slipping a ring up and down her finger.

"Oh, I have dropped it," she suddenly cried, and stooped quickly to search for it. The low branches of a tree caught in the coils of her yellow hair. To free it she impatiently drew up her head. There was a sharp click, as of the release of a metal catch, and the velvet mask, loosened, fell softly to the ground. She made an inarticulate noise in her throat, and her hands were thrown upward in an ineffectual attempt to conceal her face, but the young man was too quick for her. There in the bright white moonlight, he looked full at the face of the Woman in Red and, with a terrible cry of horror, fell like one dead upon the grass.

It was a long time before he opened his eyes and felt the touch of the woman's hand upon his brow and the cool trickle of water over his face. He lay passive, thinking of nothing. Then suddenly it all came back.

"Oh, don't, don't touch me!" he gasped. "Keep away from me."

He staggered to his feet, and pressed his hands to his eyes to shut out the vision that would return. His knees trembled and his teeth chattered. Something as white as the moonlight gathered at his lips.

The woman made an imploring gesture.

"Oh, see, I have put it on again," and she turned her head that he might behold the velvet mask.

At the sound of her voice he shivered in terror and, without a word, but making a strange moaning noise, he ran, like one demented, in the direction of the lighted Casino. And in the still, white moonlight the Woman in Red stood like one of the statues of the terraced garden, its marble purity turned to scarlet.

The next night she was in her usual place at the roulette table, but it was the stupid Baron who sat beside her.

"Why don't you play?" he asked, as she sat motionless and indifferent, eyed curiously by the spectators of the game. She sat up wearily and pushed a pile of gold and notes upon the red, No. 12. The croupier started the wheel revolving rapidly in one direction and sent the ball deftly rolling in the other, and there was a little buzz of conversation. Tongues wagged briskly while eyes were fastened on the whirling wheel.

"What has become of our English friend?" asked one.

"Gone home," was the answer from another across the table. "Perhaps the heat went to his head." He tapped his forehead significantly.

Gradually the wheel slowed down, and the ball was about to settle with its customary click. Gamblers leant over the table to see the result of their bets. The slowly rolling sphere was just dropping into No. 12! No, it has settled into the adjoining compartment.

"Vingt-huit, noir gagne!" calls out the croupier with shrill monotony, and the shining heaps are distributed to the winners.

"And Madame has lost!" exclaimed the stupid Baron in surprise.

The Woman in Red made no reply, but stood up and, with an imperious motion not to follow, walked steadily from the salle de jeu, a vivid bit of colour under the glittering lights of the splendid apartments.

Early the next morning she was found lying on the marble steps of the Casino dead in her scarlet dress. The stain trailing along the snowy marble had been scarlet, too, but was now turning to a reddish-brown. In one fine, strong hand was tightly clutched a folded note. The servants and people who gathered in trembling awe sent for the priest of the church of Sainte Devote to read it. He came quickly, panting a little for breath. Taking the paper from the fingers of the dead woman he glanced over it nervously, while the people looked on in breathless silence. It was written in French.

"I will read it," the priest said slowly, and he translated the writing in trembling tones—

"I have taken my own life—let that pass. Let no one lift the mask from my face but the priest of the church of Sainte Devote, and I pray him, when he knows my secret, to say mass for my soul. By all that is holy, respect these words."

As his solemn voice ceased those crowding about shuddered and fell back in nameless fear. They at once carried the body of the woman to where she had lodged, the early morning sun gleaming strangely on her scarlet garments and yellow hair. The priest entered the house and closed the door upon the crowd.

When he again emerged he was hardly recognisable. His face, deadly white, twitched and quivered spasmodically, his eyes protruded and rolled wildly from side to side, and his lips were parted in an awful, unholy smile. His trembling hands could scarcely hold the crucifix. To those who spoke to him he made no answer—he did not seem to hear.

They buried the woman that evening at sunset, among the nameless graves on the hill behind Monte Carlo, as speedily as possible. When the grim, grotesque companion of the dead was asked if anyone should be sent for, the only answer she would give was—

"Oh, the devil, the devil, the devil. How should I know?"

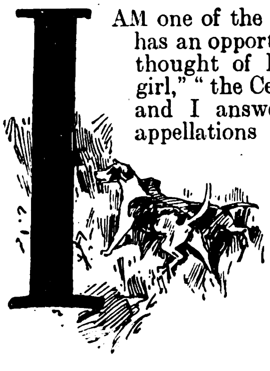
The priest from the church of Sainte Devote mumbled the service rapidly and indistinctly over the grave, with one shaking hand raised in a defensive attitude, as though to banish something or still the quaking terror that shook him from head to foot. When the ritual was ended he turned to the dense crowd which no secrecy or word of authority had been able to keep away, and said so sternly and distinctly that his voice echoed in the silence:

"Whosoever as much as dares to touch this grave, upon him I pronounce the everlasting curse of the Holy Church of Rome!"

Down the sloping hillside back to the town he led the procession, all the way shaking like a leaf. When they came again to the narrow streets he suddenly stopped trembling and began to laugh, and at the sound of such laughter the people stumbled over each other in their anxiety to get away.

The commissaire special and the administration acted promptly and with energy. There was an extra concert that very night, a grand ball on that succeeding, followed by a comic opera. At Monte Carlo it will not do to encourage reminiscence. And so, by-and-by, people stopped thinking, and began to talk of other things. The old Count and stupid Baron were among the first to drop the subject. But when to the mad priest in his cell there came continually the deep boom, boom of the sea, the cry of the gull and the chimes of the church where he should say no more mass, he laughed, and laughed, and laughed—though he could not remember why!

OVER THE WIRES.



I AM one of the few women in the world who has an opportunity to know exactly what is thought of her, for I am the "telephone girl," "the Central," "that stupid operator," and I answer to numerous other tender appellations which come to my ears over the wires, when business is brisk and my patrons in a hurry. It is a hard life, often an unpleasant one, but it has compensations; for instance, if one considers a kindly interest in the affairs of one's townspeople legitimate, it must be admitted that I have exceptional advantages in that line.

Just the other day I concerned myself in an odd little affair, which turned out so well that I am tempted to confess my part in it. That nice chap, Alec Andrews, rang up some weeks ago and asked me to give him Miss Frances Cary's line, which I did with haste and no little interest since the flirtation has been town talk for some weeks. No sooner did I hear Miss Cary's cool "Well, Mr. Andrews," than I knew love must be running its proverbial rough course, and I could almost see him stiffen up at his end, as he said abruptly: "Oh! I beg your pardon for disturbing you, Miss Cary, I merely wanted to make amends for anything I may have said last night that needed an apology. I was vexed, and I may have been hasty——"

His voice dwindled into a sort of expectant silence. But that stupid girl, instead of meeting him half way, wrapped her mantle of injured dignity about her, and gave him to understand that the less said about their differences of opinion, the better. I hardly needed the signal to disconnect their lines, after the last chilly words, but I drew a sigh of regret that there were to be no more daily conferences between them over walks and drives and good times generally.

"You have sent a nice fellow about his business, Miss Frances Cary," I said to myself, vindictively, "and you may be sorry by the time you have forgotten what the foolish quarrel was about."

But while I like Mr. Andrews for his courtesy to me, in my small connection with him, and was really sorry for his bad fortune in the direction of his ladylove, I am much too busy for prolonged meditation over the affairs of the town, and I hardly gave him a thought for the next few weeks. Occasionally I caught echoes, in the talk of Miss Cary's girl friends, of the unhealed breach between Mr. Andrews and herself, but it was quite a month later that I recognised his voice one morning asking for 930, the town florist.

Mr. Mays didn't come to the 'phone himself, but sent rather a raw hand, judging from the extreme uncertainty of his replies. Finally, however, Mr. Andrews succeeded in ordering a dozen American beauties to be sent before the dance the following night to "Miss Um-m-mn."

"What was the name, sir?" asked the clerk.

"Miss Leary," answered Mr. Andrews impatiently, "Miss Frances Leary."

There was a moment's silence, then, adding, "Put in my card, which I'll send down," Mr. Andrews rang off before he heard the perplexed murmur from the timid salesman at the other end.

"Miss Frances—what? Why can't they stop long enough to make a fellow understand? I didn't hear—oh! yes! Miss Frances Cary—that's his particular admiration."

I smiled grimly to myself, but it wasn't my business to run Mr. Mays' shop, and no doubt Mr. Andrews would straighten it out later. I confess I did feel some slight twinges of conscience about not correcting such an obvious mistake when Fanny Leary rang later in the day and asked her married sister, Mrs. Johnson: "Ella," she said, "I want your long white wrap for the dance to-night; I am going with Alec Andrews, and he always sends me flowers, and is so nice that I want to look particularly well."

"Certainly, my dear," came back in placid tones from bland Mrs. Johnson, whose evenings are spent before the fire with Will and the children, and who hardly needs opera cloaks any longer. "Send Mary for it. So you are going with Alec? That's nice. Sends flowers, does he? What are they this time? I hope not red; with your pink gown. Is he still at odds with Fan Cary? I heard her cousin Anne say the other day she thought they were both tired of the row, and if Alec would only make some advance, Fan would respond. Young people are so haughty these days. They never are willing to take the first step. Yes, Will, I'm coming now! Good-bye, child, have a good time."

As I belong to the great army of work-women, my paths don't lead me to dances and festivities, so my knowledge of the events of that evening I gleaned from broken sentences over the 'phone, next day.

Fanny Leary rang her sister up again by breakfast time, and I fancy she sounded a trifle hurried and constrained: "Thank you ever so much for the cloak, Ella. Yes, I had a very nice time. What? Oh! Flowers? No! my dear. It was the oddest thing, none ever came. Alec came late himself, and bundled me into the carriage without ceremony. The dance had begun when we got there, so there was no chance to look around, even. What? No, he didn't say anything one way or the other. Most of the girls had flowers, but not all. Yes, a little queer, as he always did it before. Thank you again, good-bye."

Now for explanations, I thought, and, sure enough, presently Mr. Andrews called up the florist and asked in no gentle tone if he had sent the roses to Miss Leary, as ordered.

Old Mr. Mays himself was answering, but he became rather bewildered, had to send for the assistant, and finally it all came out—the flowers had gone to Miss Cary, as I had known all along.

Mr. Andrews indulged in a pretty expressive exclamation of displeasure, and advised Mr. Mays to change clerks, but the mischief was done.

By-and-bye Frances Cary's mother called for Mrs. Johnson, to ask for some recipe, and I held my breath to hear what followed the business talk.

"Frances isn't going out, I believe, Mrs. Cary. So she wasn't at the dance last night?"

"No; she stayed at home; but she had rather a pretty surprise in a big bunch of lovely roses which came in the afternoon."

"Oh, indeed!" A pause, while I fancied Mrs. Johnson gathering herself up for a question. "I suppose it would be indiscreet to ask who sent them?" she laughed.

"Yes, rather," answered Mrs. Cary. "A very unexpected source; but I won't tell on her. Two spoons of butter and one of oil, did you say?"

Of course it wasn't long before Mrs. Johnson wanted to speak to her sister Fanny, and in the interval she had quite settled in her mind that the roses had gone astray. In fact, she hit the truth almost exactly.

Now, Fanny Leary is a nice girl, but I suppose it isn't in girl nature to sit still and see another girl come in for one's own favours. I resolved to do a very unwarrantable thing. When Mrs. Johnson finished her story, and was hanging up her receiver, I spoke to Miss Leary myself.

"I beg your pardon," I said—and I confess I felt rather shaky—"but, Miss Leary, I unavoidably heard your sister and yourself, just now, and I feel as if I must put in a word, though it's none of my business." She started to answer, but I did not give her time. "I heard Mr. Andrews order those roses, and they were for you; but Mr. Mays' man misunderstood, and they have gone to Miss Cary by mistake. But, Miss Leary, don't you think it may smooth matters over between those two—and—I know I am impertinent, but I am so anxious for Miss Cary not to know!"

I gasped a little at my own boldness, but Fanny Leary laughed good-naturedly, and said: "Oh! very well, Miss Duncan, she shan't learn it from me!"

As I am neither messenger boy nor letter carrier, I can't say what Frances Cary wrote in her note of acknowledgment to Andrews. My part of the story ends with a telephone call, two days later, and it seemed to me that ring had a peculiar vibration, but that may be too fanciful a notion for a sedate public official, like myself.

"Give me Miss Cary, please. Oh! Good morning, Miss Frances. Thank you so much for your note—ah!—what did you say? Not at all; not at all; it was worth a whole garden of roses! And may I come to see you this evening, and apologize for past sins, and be taken back into——"

But here she interrupted him gaily. "Of course you may. This—this—oh! well, this would never have happened if that telephone girl hadn't cut us off so quick one day several weeks ago, when I was about to explain that perhaps I was too quick in saying what I did. Yes; these 'Centrals' are unfeeling creatures. Good-bye, then until to-night!"

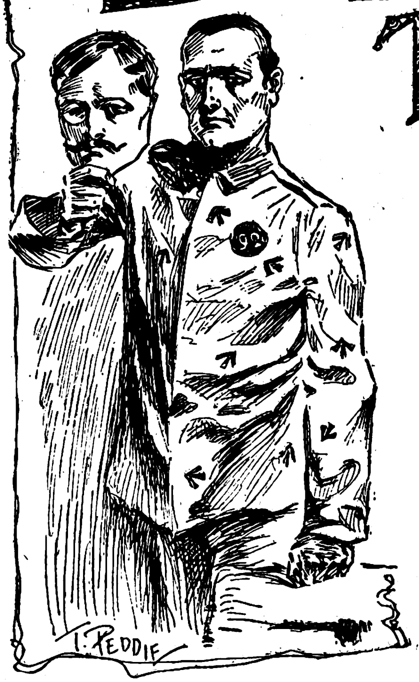
DEAD TO THE WORLD



By

Henry T. Johnson.

Author of "Cruce Vincit," "The Pride of the Ring," etc., etc.

SYNOPSIS OF FIRST CHAPTERS.

Richard Seldon, a convict, escapes. In a train he meets Cyril Roylance just back from Australia, whom he murders and impersonates. He assumes the rôle of squire, and pays attention to Doris Dale. One day he encounters two old criminal acquaintances and agrees to meet them.

While on a visit to Squire Dale's, the latter's old butler talks of Cyril Roylance's younger days to the annoyance and discomfiture of Richard Seldon.

The blood rushed to the manservant's face, he being man as well as servant.

"I beg pardon, sir," he said quietly. "You see I forgot myself; only I thought you might have remembered Rex——"

"Of course, my good fellow," said the other. "Rex the terrier, let's see, Skye terrier, or fox terrier?"

Barker paused a moment, then inquired, "Wasn't he a black and tan, sir?"

"Of course—of course; used to kill rats. And now, my good fellow, run away, you're making my head ache with your chatter."

"Very well, sir, I wish you good-night, sir."

"Oh, go to the devil!"

"Shall I give him any message, sir?"

"You insolent scoundrel, how dare you!"

"Scoundrel yourself, and to the devil with you!"

"What!"

An evil look blazed in the younger man's eyes; his face was livid.

"You hound!" he hissed, "if I were not a guest here and you a servant of the house I'd throw you down the stairs. Leave this room, and I'll report you to your master in the morning."

"And I'll report you too," said the other. "I'll report you as an impostor; you're no more Cyril Roylance than I am, whoever you may be. You might have forgotten the dog's name, you might have forgotten his breed, but you could never have lost the scar he left upon your neck when I throttled that bull-terrier off and saved young Cyril's life, and you couldn't have lost the scar on the left forehead that the doctor said Cyril Roylance would carry from the day he fell down our brass-bound stairs to the day of his death."

The other man stood silent! He was remembering that the man who had lain there face upwards on the railway-carriage floor carried upon his forehead the scar of an old wound—besides the new ones! When he had roused himself from his reverie the door was closed, Barker had gone!

What should he do? Mechanically he went to the door and, holding it ajar, listened to the man's retreating footsteps on his way downstairs, heard the pantry door open and shut. What should he do? Make a bolt for it then and there?

Clink! What was that? That sound of splintering glass and that tiny sound like the whistle of a very little saw. He drew a deep breath, his eyes dilated. Crossing the room on tiptoe, he switched off the electric light and waited. Presently a window was raised, a shutter swung back, muffled footsteps moved stealthily around the apartment, and a disc of light fluttered like a butterfly here and there. Dodging this disc, he crept back to the switch bracket; in an instant the room was flooded with white light, and two men with terrified faces made a rush towards that open window, through which the night air came in sweet and cold.

"Hush, you fools!" he whispered, and Barney Plumb ejaculated, hoarsely and excitedly:

"S'truth, it's Dick!"

"Yes," he replied, "you thought you'd work this job without your foreman—I knew!"

That was a lie, but the other two believed it, and wondered what there was he didn't know.

"Curse you," he went on; "didn't I tell you that you were to leave this job till I could work it with you?"

"Why, what's it matter, Dick, so long as we divides the pool?"

"But you never meant to divide, you meant to scoop the lot. I know my work, don't I?"

"None better, Dick."

Can you play "Hunt the Fiver"? See our Great Photo Competition.

"And I've always a reason for what I do, haven't I?"

"That's right, matey."

"Well then, when I'm foreman mind you've got to carry out my orders, not to question them; but as it happens now's as good a time as any. Let's get to work."

"Where's the pick of the swag?" whispered Josh Branner; "there ain't much stuff 'ere 'ceptin' pictures, and our line ain't 'igh art."

He whispered to them. After a while they went out into the corridor and he waited there, listening to their footsteps as he had listened to Barker's, and in the same direction!

Presently the sounds died away, then there was silence save for the ticking of the huge hall clock downstairs and now and then the squeaking and scuttling of mice inside the old wainscotted walls.

Then his strained ears caught another sound like that of a quickly smothered cry, then of a scuffle and quickly of a fall, then, very faint, the sound of a groan. Then he heard a whisper.

"Dick, come on down!"

Kicking off his shoes, he descended into the cold and silent basement of the great house.

"We've had to put him through it," said Branner. "Barney's got him by the throat on the floor, but he's a handful. Come along quick, you're cleverer than Barney."

Some ten minutes later the three re-ascended the stairs carrying a huge bag.

"Heavy enough, ain't it?" whispered Josh.

"Not so heavy as—what we've left behind."

They reached the room through which they had entered.

"Where's the trap?" whispered Tiger Dick.

"Round the bend of the lane beyond the meadows."

"Well now, get away quick, and here—leave me that pistol!"

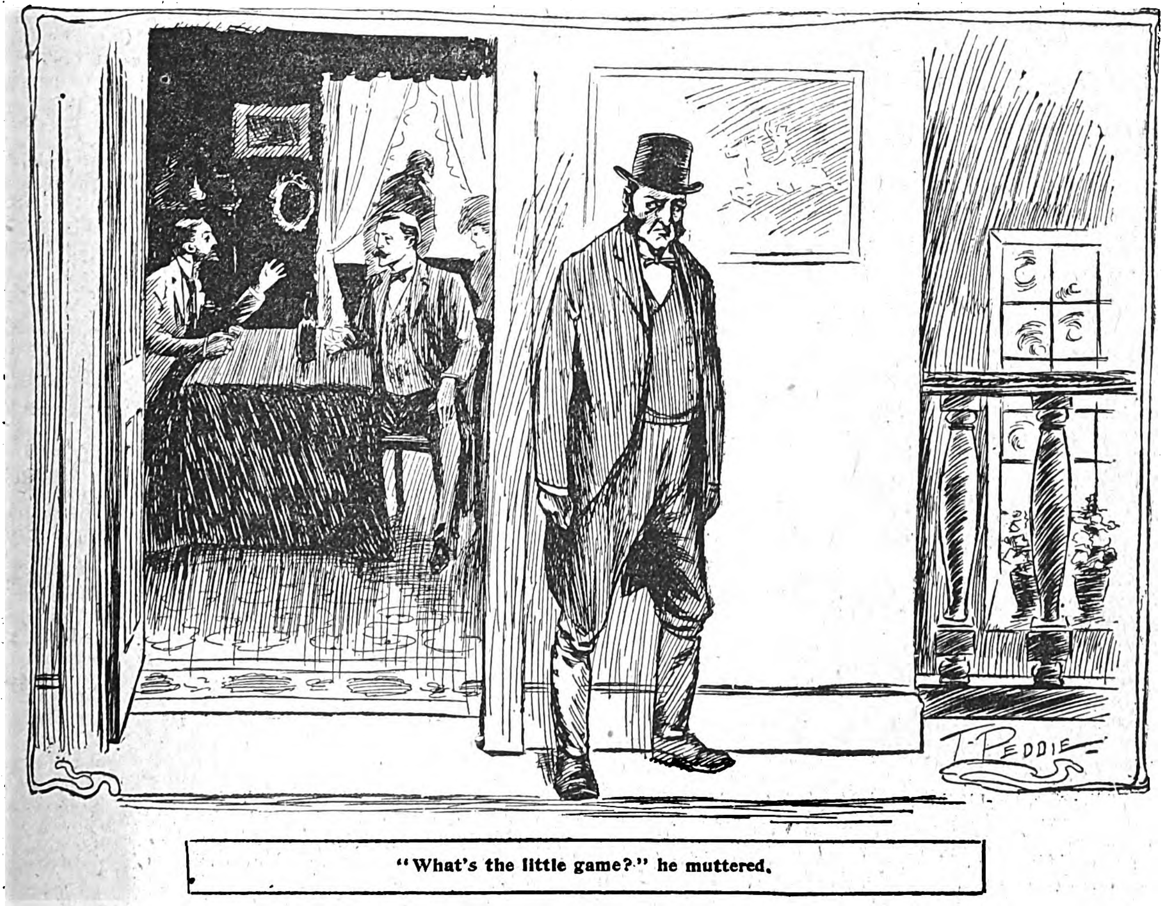
The pair clambered through the open window and down the rope ladder, which, when they had descended, Tiger Dick detached and threw down to them.

"Mind you give us ten minutes start!" That was their parting request.

He waited for a while, his head between his hands, his frame convulsed with violent agitation, a thin stream of blood trickling from his forehead. He partially undressed, and, carefully holding his handkerchief to the contusion on his forehead, got into bed.

He gave them a quarter of an hour; then, methodically, he sprang up and began pitching the furniture to and fro. He might have been a madman in a fit of frenzy, so strange were his antics. Tables, chairs, couch, washstand he turned them over, tugged at the bell and shouted "Help!"

He heard voices. Baug! bang! He fired the revolver through his own shirt sleeves, grazing with one bullet the skin of his forearm. Then he flung the revolver into a corner and threw himself across the overturned washstand.



"What's the little game?" he muttered.

"Quick! quick!" Harcourt Dale's voice sounded along the stairs, "they're in Mr. Roylance's room!"

He opened the door, turned on the light, then a cry of horror escaped him and the two menservants who followed him, for there lay the guest across a heap of débris, evidently, if not killed, badly hurt.

"The scoundrels!" groaned Harcourt Dale. "Look! they've fired point blank at him, quite close, his very clothing is singed, and see, he's bleeding from the forehead!"

"That's with the blow, sir," said the footman, "poor gentleman!" Then to the page-boy. "Here—give him some water!"

"Look here!" said their master stooping, "here's the revolver, three chambers discharged. Ring the alarm bell some of you—we'll arouse the countryside."

Doris, pale and trembling, came down in her dressing-gown and busied herself applying restoratives to the wounded guest. He opened his eyes dreamily with a sigh and fixed them on her face. The stake was worth winning at any risk, he said to himself.

The alarm bell clanged out harshly; then, attended by his servants, Harcourt Dale scoured the house to ascertain the further extent of the damage or loss.

In the butler's pantry they found the plate chest broken open and ransacked, and beside it Barker was lying in a heap. He was quite still, for he had died at his post, like the true man he was, defending his trust.

The tragic fate of his old servant grieved Harcourt Dale infinitely more than the loss of his plate, although just then such a loss was one that he could ill afford, and he reflected with a pang that that night, for the first time within his recollection, he had chidden him.

"Poor, poor fellow!" he sighed; "he served us well and faithfully, man and boy, for more than forty years, and now he has laid down his life for us. No battlefield ever witnessed a more loyal death. Oh! if we could only find a clue to the wretched man who did this thing!"

One of the servants following him up the wide oaken staircase, stooped, picked up something glittering yellow and handed it to her master.

It was the gold locket that his dead wife had given to their only child.

CHAPTER X.

Circumstantial Evidence.

Under ordinary circumstances Harcourt Dale would have made the finding of that trinket the occasion for a lecture on the iniquity of carelessness and the folly of wearing châtelaines and such like fal-lals which were always entangling themselves and their wearers with keys, door handles, door knobs, and what not. But in this instance he was far too overwhelmed by the tragic crime that had been committed under his roof tree to even make a note of the chance of giving Doris a scolding. He placed the locket in his waistcoat pocket, simply remarking:

"Thank you, Bell, it is from Miss Doris's châtelaine. It was her mother's. she'll be distressed at losing it and very relieved at its being found."

But there were the police arriving, details to be furnished, search parties to be organized, the doctor to be summoned post haste, so that, what with the bustle and excitement, to say nothing of the horror of it all, Harcourt Dale for the while clean forgot the finding of his daughter's locket. After due reverence had been awarded the dead, there was his wounded guest to be attended to.

"The wretches!" he exclaimed. "It is not their fault that we have not a double tragedy to deplore," and he gave Doris and the servants strict instructions that their injured visitor should receive every care.

In the dead of night, along the dark, deserted, silent roads and lanes a fast trotting pony, his feet cloth shod and muffled, tore along as though he, as well as the precious pair behind him, were eager to get as far away as could be from the scene of that night's wicked work.

"Josh!" whispered Plumb "we've done it this time."

"You're right," said the other, "best not to talk about it."

Jet black against the night sky over the bend of the upland they saw the gables of an old farmhouse.

"That's the place," whispered Branner, "do you think it's safe to stop, hadn't we better make haste and get away as quick as we can?"

"No," said the other firmly, "Dick's plan's the best, and we shall get away quicker in the long run by stopping here."

They turned down a narrow grass-grown lane, there halted their horse, and alighted, and scrambling over a five-barred gate in the shadow of the hedgerows, made their way to the kitchen gardens belonging to the Abbey Farm, and so at length they came to a grass plot studded with tiny flower beds under an old-fashioned lattice window, twinkling in the fitful moonlight just under the eaves of the quaint old thatched roof. And very deliberately Josh Branner marked his footprints in the pliant soil of the flower bed nearest that window, and quietly, but deliberately, scraped the mud from the heavy boots on the sill beneath.

And meantime, Barney Plumb, stooping, took an iron instrument from his jacket pocket.

"Curse it," he said, wiping his hand inside his coat, "it's still wet." Then he thrust it, still wet as it was, as far as his outstretched arm would reach, inside that clump of laurels. From the farm buildings beyond came a deep, ominous growl, then suddenly the rattling of a chain and a clamorous vehement barking, and Messrs. Plumb and Branner, with a frightened look behind them, sped for their lives along the garden and the meadow, never pausing till, breathless, they reached the trap waiting there in the grass-grown lane, for the big, deep-mouthed baying of the mastiff had been taken up by the full, frequent bark of a retriever, and a couple of terriers had in a second sprung up to add their sharper and even more excitable clamour to the alarm.

"What on earth's that?" exclaimed Jack Branscombe, "a fox marauding the henroosts! What a thundering row the dogs are making, confound them! And I was just dreaming of Doris. Hang it! they're keeping it up and old Bendigo's straining at his chain. Perhaps I'd better go and see what's the matter, it's only fair when the dogs give tongue like that to answer them."

Partially dressing, and in lieu of coat taking a thick ulster from a wardrobe close to hand, he stole gently downstairs lest he should wake and alarm his housekeeper and maidservant. He went out into the stable-yard and the mastiff's angry baying gave way to more joyful greetings.

"Down! down! lie down, Bend'go, quiet Neptune! Hold your row, you imps!" to the terriers. Then more in curiosity than caution he strolled round and glanced at the byres and barns and into the cattle shed, thinking that possibly some poor wretch of a tramp might have sought a night's shelter. But no, there was no sign even of any wayfarer who, knowing Jack's tolerance, had sought a night's rest in his sheds. Feeling now thoroughly awake he lit a pipe, walked across to the fold gate, and glanced up and down the high road. No! A fox or hare must have made a short cut across the place, he concluded, and as it wanted a good three hours to daylight he determined to go back to bed. Before doing so, however, he strolled round to the front of the house, glanced at the door and windows, then went round again.

And just as he turned the corner, Ned Fletcher, trudging along in the direction of a certain coppice, which, guessing something of the movements of his former associates, he was watching, glanced casually over the moss-grown wall dividing the Abbey Farmhouse's pretty flower garden from the road.

"Who's that?" he muttered, suddenly pausing, "why it's young Jack Branscombe! What in the name o' wonder is the lad prowling about there for? Dang it! if 'twere not his own house one 'ud think he was after breaking into it, but that's no business o' mine. I mun hurry along, or else the lads will have drawn the coppice."

Meantime, Jack Branscombe, having convinced himself that all was safe, going round to the back of the house, quietly let himself in. There was still time for a few hours rest, and he wanted a clear head for the next day, because he had a lot to do, and it was work that as a rule laymen hadn't much experience in, even such as had finding as a rule one experience last a lifetime. A few hours later he went down to breakfast.

"Did you hear the dogs barking last night, sir?" inquired Nannie, the good old housekeeper who looked after him like a mother.

"Oh, yes," he said, "that's all right. You say everything's quite ready? That's right, tell Jack to put the dogcart to, I'm going to——"

Before the word "town" had left his lips he stopped himself.

"I'm going to see some people on business. I may not be back to-night."

"Really, sir, but suppose any letters come?"

"They'll have to wait."

"And suppose anyone calls on business?"

"They'll have to wait too. The business I'm going on, Nannie, just now, is to me the most important in the world."

Then she observed that he had brought down his kit bag already packed. Finishing a hasty breakfast, he hurried out along the front garden to where his dogcart stood waiting in the road, flung the rug off the mare's back, took the reins from the lad in the cart, and shouted to the other at her head, "Let her go!"

"Steady, mare! How long before we shall see you again, sir?" inquired this latter, giving the mare her head.

"Can't say!" he shouted with a laugh, little guessing how long. "Good lass," and he set the mare bowling along the road, for he meant to catch the 10.15 and he did it.

CHAPTER XI.

A Strange Reticence.

Greatly to the relief of everyone at the Grange, the guest's injuries were trifling, with perhaps the exception of that contusion on the forehead, and even that required no more drastic treatment than the liberal application of vinegar and water, a little arnica, and a composing draught, and at noon the next day the patient was in quite his normal condition and as interested and active as any in discussing and formulating the steps to be taken with a view of the hunting down of the culprits.

It was he who increased the reward Harcourt Dale immediately offered for the apprehension of the murderers.

And when the proof of that bill headed in big black letters, MURDER! TWO HUNDRED POUNDS REWARD!! reeking and malodorous from the local printer's galley was placed in his hand, there was something almost approaching a smile in the lines of the hard mouth under the black moustache which was growing so swiftly and strongly, for he was wondering if such a thing had ever happened before as a man offering a reward for his own apprehension, and the contin-

ANÆMIA

Mrs. Gertrude Morley, of Crown Street, Awsworth, Ilkeston, suffered from Anæmia from being eighteen years of age. Speaking of her condition, she says:—"I always felt tired and weary, worn-out, and miserable. I lost all power to digest my food, and became so emaciated that I could only walk a few steps at a time, holding on to the furniture to support me. I began to take Bile Beans, and the result has been marvellous. In a few short months they completely cured me. I am now in the enjoyment of perfect health, and the other day I walked eight miles with ease!"

BILE BEANS cure Anæmia by putting the digestive system and liver into proper condition. This being done, all the food taken is turned into good rich blood and kept pure. Anæmia is thus rendered impossible.

gency of his having to sign a cheque for the moiety of that reward appealed to his sense of humour. A soft, white vision entered the room. It was Doris, her beautiful face in keeping with her white morning gown, her eyes bright with recent tears, for she had loved the dear old retainer who had carried her in his strong, trusty arms a tiny baby, had taught her her first steps and to ride her first pony. Doris Dale was an English gentlewoman from the sole of her tiny foot to the crown of her golden head, and, accordingly, her old servants were her old friends.

"Are you quite recovered now, Mr. Roylance?" she asked, and a shudder thrilled her frame as she read the letters gleaming big and black on the damp sheet in his hands: MURDER!

"Oh, I'm quite fit, thanks," he replied, "that is except that, of course, it has been an awful jar to me. The dear old chap you know was so good to me when I was a little fellow, and I thought such a lot of him, was so glad to meet him and talk over those very, very early days, and then for this to happen to him just after our meeting again."

"I know, I know," she said, "and I'm so sorry for you."

"Ah, that's very tender and sweet of you. Do you know, Doris, I can't get out of the old way of calling you by that name, it makes a man feel good the very thought of a dear little woman like you taking an interest in him. Oh, Doris, if I could only hope——"

"Oh, no, no," she said hurriedly, "you mustn't talk like that or think like that. Of course I like you, Cyril. I've always remembered you and liked you as my first child playmate, and, of course, I hope we shall always be friends, but you must never think of anything more than that."

"Doris," he said, fixing upon her a glance that seemed to envelope and to burn. "Strength is my keynote. I'm not a good man, I'm not a great man, I've been told that in a way I'm a clever man" (even as he spoke there flitted through his brain the dim remembrance of a stern-faced man sitting in a wig and gown high up under a canopy adorned with the Royal arms angrily admonishing him on the mis-application of natural talents). "Doris, I'm strong, iron strong, strong in my likes, my dislikes, my love, my hate, most of all in my determination. No, no, most of all now in my love for you, and when a man loves as I do you might just as well tell the tide not to flow or ebb, or the wind not to blow, or the rain not to fall, you might as well tell the moon and the stars not to shine, as tell that man not to think of the passion that has set his very soul aflame."

"I can't hear you, I won't hear you," she said. "Oh, Cyril! since we are friends, spare yourself and spare me pain. Tell me," she went on, changing the subject, "those terrible creatures who attacked you last night, how many were there?"

"Two," he said.

HYPNOTISM

THE SCIENCE OF SUCCESS

Reader, have you ever stopped to consider why some persons are so successful; why everything they touch seems to turn to gold; why they acquire wealth, position, power and influence without any seemingly great effort on their part? Such persons surround themselves with friends, are honoured and respected in their communities; are sought after in society, and gain prominence and distinction without apparently trying. Have you ever considered these things? Do you know why?

WHAT BRINGS SUCCESS

Not hard work, for the poor work harder than the rich. Not birth, because many of our successful men are of lowly parentage. Not luck, for many a lucky man dies friendless and poor. We will tell you why. The secret of success in life is personal influence—the ability to make others think as you do; to win their confidence and friendship and get them to help you. There is a secret power by which you can wield an irresistible personal influence; by which you may overcome all obstacles, charm and fascinate whom you will; by which you may cure every known disease and bad habit without the aid of drugs, medicines or the surgeon's knife. It is called personal Magnetism or Hypnotism. It is the basis of success in every business and calling.

A GOD-GIVEN POWER

It is a God-given power that is the heritage of the poor as well as the rich. It is truly the wonder science of the age. Consider what it means to be able to convince a man that your goods are the best on the market, that your services are invaluable to him, that you are offering to him a good investment, that he needs what you have to sell, that your opinion is correct, that he should act upon your advice, and a thousand other things of this kind. Consider what an advantage such a power would give you. If you wish to secure a good paying position, obtain an increase in salary, or add to your present income in any way, a knowledge of hypnotism will prove invaluable. In hundreds of instances it has been the turning point in the lives of people who were ready to give up in despair—for whom the future seemed to have no hope.

LEARN AT HOME FREE

We have just issued the most remarkable book of the century, which explains all about hypnotism, personal magnetism, magnetic healing, etc., in language so plain that a child can understand it. The book was written by Dr. X. La Motte Sage, A.M., Ph.D., LL.D., the most eminent and renowned hypnotist of modern times. It tells of new secret instantaneous methods which enable any intelligent person to learn this mysterious science at home in a few days and use the power on his friends and associates entirely without their knowledge. We absolutely guarantee success or forfeit $1,000.00 in gold. Many persons are now making from $2,000.00 to $5,000.00 per year from what they learned from this remarkable work, while some have grown immensely wealthy.

Dr. Sage, the author of this rare book, has determined that all the people shall now have the mysterious secrets which have been so jealously guarded for ages. He has determined that the poor shall have an equal chance with the rich.

and no doubt in their terror, for I am sure you are very brave, they fired wide. Not very wide, but oh! what a mercy it is to think of the old saying of a miss being as good as a mile. Cyril, do you think they'll catch them?"

"I can't quite say?"

"Of course, you hope they will?"

"Well, really!" he said hesitatingly.

"Oh! what a generous nature you are!" she exclaimed impulsively, feeling that, though she never could love him, she really did like him. "But that cruel man who struck you that fearful blow on the forehead?"

"Oh, well, yes!" said he, diving his hands in his pockets and pacing the room studying intently the pattern of the carpet. "At the time I did feel very angry with him. May I light a cigarette?"

"Oh, yes," she said. "But, Cyril, don't you hope they'll both be caught?"

Suddenly he came to a dead stop, wheeled round and faced her.

"No!" he said abruptly, almost defiantly, "no; to tell you the truth I do not."

"But, Cyril, why?" she asked with a puzzled expression, "such monsters when at large are living dangers to honest folks."

"I know, I know; still, I have my reasons."

"How strange," she said, "few would be so forgiving. Cyril, tell me, did you see their faces?"

"One of them clearly," he said.

"Would you know him again?"

"Anywhere."

"Had you ever seen him before?" she asked with growing excitement.

"Yes," he replied, folding his arms, "and that is why, notwithstanding that I have offered that reward, I hope he will escape."

"Cyril, what do you mean; who is he, do I know him?"

"Yes," he answered; "it was for your sake I let him go, for I think I could have held him."

"Oh, Cyril, name him—denounce him; let his name and his infamy ring throughout the countryside, through the length and breadth of the land."

"No, no!" he answered, his face set and stern, and she, bewildered, cried:

"Then in the name of common sense and common justice, why?"

He drew himself to his full height, looked her full in the face, and said in a clear and ringing voice:

"For your own sake."

Then he turned and walked from the room, leaving her amazed.

"What can he mean?" she asked. "Oh! the excitement and perhaps that terrible blow must for the while have injured his brain. And yet he seemed so certain. Oh, dear! dear! my own brain is in a whirl. Heaven send these dark days will soon be over."

CHAPTER XII.

A Verdict of "Wilful Murder."

An air of unwonted bustle and importance pervaded the precincts of the Seven Bells, the principal hostelry in Dalehurst village. The very ostlers, hissing as they scrubbed and rubbed their patient charges, wrinkled their brows with portentous gravity, and ever and anon paused to unbend their backs and gaze wonderingly at the balconied windows of the big room up there. The stable yard was crowded with a variety of vehicles, from the broughams of county magistrates to the cart of the village carrier, and, not only in the loose boxes, but outside the stable doors were tethered various steeds, from the trimly clipped and groomed hacks of gentleman farmers to the packman's shaggy pony and the hawker's donkey.

That big room up there inside the balconied windows was crowded as never before in its history. The jury had been empanelled, had elected their foreman, the coroner's officer had gabbled over the charges, beginning "Oyez, oyez, oyez," and the twelve good men and true had settled down to the task of inquiring into the circumstances touching the death of John William Barker, late of Dalehurst Grange, manservant.

At the press table reporters, armed with sheaves of pointed pencils, were waiting eager as greyhounds in the leash, and there at the back of the room twice as many persons as there was comfortable room for were penned like sheep in a fold. The staircases and corridors, too, were thronged, and the management and the staff of the Seven Bells moved to and fro with the gravity and importance of those who felt that the eyes of the world were upon them.

In a private sitting-room on the other side of the house Doris Dale sat with her maid. It had been deemed advisable for her to be in attendance at hand in case of need, though it was not expected that her evidence would be required.

The Squire of Fallowfield was there, deep in converse with Harcourt Dale and Detective-Inspector Rossiter of the C.I.D., and once or twice, when Harcourt Dale returned to Doris, the master of Fallowfield Hall and the eminent detective hob-nobbed very confidentially and seriously over a glass of the best port that could be found in the Seven Bells' cellar, greatly to the perturbation of Morgan Chandler, who, also loitering about the premises, watched askance the tête-à-tête with uneasiness.

"What's the little game?" he muttered. "What's he so chummy with the tec. for. Perhaps it's all right, and it's only this Dalehurst Grange job they're palavering about; only it seemed to me once or twice the detective's eyes were following me, I could sort of feel them on me. I suppose it's only to-day's matter they're discussing, but if it was something else it might be a bit awkward. Hullo, Ned, have a glass of anything?"

"No thank you, sir, I've got to drive over to the telegraph office for the master."

"Will you take a glass of anything, Ned?" said Chandler, who, since Fletcher had been promoted very much into the position of confidential messenger to his master, had exchanged his attitude of tyrannical bully towards the man, after the fashion of his type, and had adopted a policy of conciliation.

"Thank 'ee, Mr. Chandler, can't stop," replied Ned.

"Something important, I suppose? What's it all about, and what's the guv'nor talking so serious to the man from Scotland Yard about. Do you happen to know?"

"Well, I do happen to know," replied Ned Fletcher, "only, like this telegram, it happens to be private. Good-day," and with a nod and grin, which expressed unutterable defiance and contempt, Ned hurried out to where the smart dogcart was waiting, and, seizing the reins and scrambling up into the seat, within a few seconds was spinning along the high road in the direction of the nearest market town.

"Excuse me half-a-minute, Mr Roylance," said Inspector Rossiter, perusing one of the telegrams Ned Fletcher, who had been detailed for that service, had brought him, "I've got a little matter to attend to."

"Certainly," said the Squire, strolling away and leaving the detective wrinkling his brows over the pink flimsy in his fingers.

WHAT a lot of money everybody has! It must be so since so many of our £5 notes are going begging. We offer five each week, but in no one week have the whole lot been claimed. Consequently, I can only conclude that money is so plentiful that a mere "fiver" is not worth sending for.

On page 562 you will find another batch of photos, and unless you have a plethora of riches, I should recommend you to see immediately if your portrait is among them. And even though you are a millionaire, you may as well send for the money. It will do to buy your wife a new bonnet. I am authoritatively informed that quite a nice one can be got for £5.

In connection with the third batch of portraits two £5 notes have been claimed. Here are the names and addresses of the successful claimants:

ADVICE TO READERS ON VARIOUS MATTERS.

(Replies to Correspondents.)

"WHY do so many clergymen suffer from sore throats?" asks "Curate." According to an eminent specialist in throat diseases, the trouble is mainly caused by the habit of hanging the head. The orator who directs his remarks to the bottom button of his waistcoat is almost certain to have a sore throat. The Bar looks up to the Bench: barristers seldom have clergyman's sore throat. But the clergyman in reading the prayers looks down upon his book; his chin is upon his chest. When he preaches, his eyes are still upon his manuscript or looking downwards at his congregation. Let him lift his eyes, praying with diligent observation of the roof, and preaching, in a physical sense, to the gallery, and he will escape the great clerical malady.

"TYRO" suffers from a very common complaint—that of feeling uncomfortable and ill at ease when in the society of people with whom he is not intimately acquainted. He always feels afraid to join in a conversation for fear of saying something stupid, and he asks me to give him a few hints as to how to overcome the difficulty.

The art of conversation is rather a natural than an acquired accomplishment, but "Tyro" can easily do a good deal to remedy his deficiencies in this respect. It does not require much ingenuity to think of something suitable to say upon ordinary topics. Do not, however, imagine that much talking is necessarily a good thing; there must be good listeners as well as good talkers, and there are rather too few of the former and too many of the latter. At the same time, it does not do to sit still as if one had not an idea in one's head. If "Tyro" makes an effort to conquer his reserve, he will soon gain confidence.

"LOVER" writes complaining of his "ownest own," as I have no doubt he sometimes calls her. It appears that whenever they have a slight disagreement she weeps, and he does not like this, because he has to give in at once. "Lover" thinks her conduct shows weakness. I don't; in my opinion—of course, I am quite inexperienced—the young lady is remarkably clever. She knows quite well that were she to return anger for anger, the little rift might soon become a serious affair. Therefore, she adopts what is undoubtedly the most powerful weapon in the feminine armoury—tears—with the result that the poor male thing is completely subjugated and brought to repentance. In these days, when certain distorted feminines delight in aping the manners of mankind, "Lover" ought to be devoutly thankful that he is beloved by a womanly woman.

IT is "L. L." who asks this question, "Are warm baths beneficial?" to which I reply decidedly in the affirmative. Warm baths will often prevent the most virulent diseases. A person who may be in fear of having received infection of any kind should take a warm bath, suffer perspiration to ensue, and then rub dry. He should dress warmly to guard against taking cold. If the system has imbibed any infectious matter, it will be removed by resorting to the warm bath if the latter is taken before the infection has had time to spread over the system; and even if some time has elapsed, the drenching perspiration that may be induced by hot water will be very likely to remove it. In cases of congestion, bilious colic, inflammation, etc., there is no remedy more certain to give relief than a hot bath.

IN reply to "BILL," before a man can drive a cab for public hire he is compelled to pass an examination at Scotland Yard in regard to his knowledge of London. His examination, like most others, is rapidly becoming more difficult, and is conducted in the following manner: A commissioner sits with a map before him, and the would-be extorter of big fares is asked through what streets he would pass if he were to proceed from certain points to other places. For example, he is asked, "Supposing you were to drive from London Bridge to Paddington, how would you go?" Cabbies complain that this is an unfair test, as plenty of people know their way about without being able to name the streets through which they pass.

TO CONTRIBUTORS.

I AM open to consider original stories of any length from 1,500 to 6,000 words. The character of stories required may be best ascertained by a careful reading of the contents of the paper. CHAPTER I.

"TREVANNION, by all that's wonderful! What brings you to Manchester?"

The man addressed looked curiously in the face of the individual who accosted him.

"Your voice is familiar," he answered somewhat dubiously; "but I'm hanged if I can remember your face."

A laugh answered him.

"And yet we've rubbed shoulders together often enough before Lucius Trevannion, Esquire, thought fit to take up stage life. Didn't I take nearly five pounds off you at poker one night?"

"Horace Caldecott!" broke in the other, a light of sudden recognition dawning on his countenance.

"Yes; but not so loud, man. I'm incog. here, but I should like a talk with you. Come up to my rooms at the Grand Hotel and tell me how the world has fared with you since last we met."

Somewhat mystified, the other accepted the invitation, and ere long the two men were seated in a comfortable private sitting-room with an open bottle of champagne to cement their friendship.

"And now tell me what you are doing in Manchester?" began Caldecott, handing Trevannion a cigarette and lighting one himself.

"I'm taking a small part," was the answer, "in the Good Samaritan Company. I was looking for a 'shop' some weeks ago when an accident happened to a man named Monteith, who was taking a small part in the play, and Venables, the acting manager, asked me to fill the rôle. I accepted, and when Monteith came back—which he did at the beginning of the week—sooner than be out of a 'shop' altogether again I got transferred to a part that is nothing more than to walk on."

A curious expression had come into Caldecott's face as he listened to Trevannion's bare story, for it was he who had been responsible for the accident that had caused Monteith to temporarily relinquish his part in the Good Samaritan Company.

"You're lucky," he said lightly, "to have got into the Company that boasts such a star as the adorable Hazel Harlow."

At the mention of the girl's name Trevannion's face darkened.

"That's rather a doubtful blessing," he answered curtly, exhaling a huge cloud of tobacco smoke as though to hide his glowering countenance.

Caldecott's eyes glistened.

"From your tone," he said, "one would almost think that there is no love lost between you and Miss Harlow. A pretty business that has been this week, culminating in the death of the Duchess of Stanchester. A fine advertisement for Miss Hazel, if ever there was one."

Trevannion made no answer. It was plain that his companion's mention of Hazel's name had turned his thoughts into a new channel. He sat in moody silence gazing darkly at nothing, a far away look in his eyes.

"What's the matter, old man?" asked Caldecott insidiously. "You seem mighty hipped. Anything I can do for you?"

"I don't know," came the curt reply.

Then suddenly the actor sprang to his feet.

"Look here, Caldecott," he said. "We used to be pretty thick at one time—you and I. If I were to take you into my confidence, could I be quite sure that you wouldn't go back on me?"

"My dear fellow, I am discreetness personified. I should be very happy to help you in any way I could, if only for old acquaintance's sake."

"Very well, then," said the other, plunging into speech as though relieved at being able to at last unburden his mind. "I'll be frank with you. If there's one person in the world that I hate it's Hazel Harlow. When I first joined the company I'll admit I thought she was the most beautiful and perfect woman I had ever seen, and, like nearly every man who knows her, I fell head over ears in love with her. And I thought the jade reciprocated my affection. One day, encouraged by her graciousness, I asked her to be my wife and she refused me, told me she had no idea of giving me any encouragement, and left me with that consolation. And ever since that day my feelings have gone right round to the other point of the compass. I can't stand her at any price. In fact—I'm frank with you, as you see—I wouldn't mind paying her out for her having deceived me."

The speech just made was a good index to Lucius Trevannion's character. He was weak, self-opiniated young man, who had thought that he had only to throw himself at Hazel's feet to be accepted with acclamation, and the fall of his pride when he discovered that Hazel had no other feelings than kindly personal regard for him, had been so swelled by the self-fancied blow administered to his pride, that his so-called love had veered round to the opposite extreme.

Caldecott read all this almost at a glance.

"I am indeed sorry for you, Trevannion," he said feelingly; "and I wonder what you'll say when you hear that Hazel Harlow played me a much dirtier trick than that. I knew her in the old days when she was only a simply country farmer's daughter. I was Squire of the village in which he lived. Well, I fell in love with her, and as an earnest of my affections offered to marry her at any time she liked. The father was pleased, and she also consented to become my wife. (What a wilful prevarication of the truth this statement was those who have followed the fortunes of Hazel Harlow will readily admit.) Well, the wedding day was fixed and then she gave me the slip, ran away to London, and wormed herself into the Good Samaritan Company. And there the story, so far as the similitude between your experience and mine ceases; but unfortunately I am still madly in love with Hazel Harlow. Yes, I'll admit it, and I have sworn that I'll make her my wife by fair means or by foul."

Caldecott ceased speaking.

Trevannion looked at him curiously, surprised at the sudden turn in events that had proved Caldecott to be also bound up in the life of Hazel Harlow.

"Well, it strikes me," said the actor, after a few moment's pause, "that we might work together in this. I shouldn't at all mind doing you a good turn, and if I could do anything to make Hazel Harlow your wife, and at the same time pay off old scores without actually running any risk myself, I'm perfectly willing to help you, though as to honestly wishing you joy of Miss Hazel—well, I can't do that, and, indeed, I am sorry for the man who ever becomes the husband of such an iceberg."

"Work together," cried Caldecott hoarsely. "Why, I should think we could. I've been waiting for a chance like this for weeks. I'll own to you that I have not been idle ever since Hazel joined the Company, but somehow Fate has always stepped in and snatched her out of my grasp just as success has seemed assured. And another thing. I don't suppose you're particularly flush, if I may ask you the question without offence; and as I've got more money than I know what to do with, well——"

He broke off and looked significantly into Trevannion's face.

The actor coloured and gave vent to a nervous laugh.

"You've hit the nail on the head there," he said; "it was the Turf proved my undoing. There was a time when a fiver was what five bob is to me now, and since I have become an actor I have lost my pride. There is no room for such a commodity in our profession."

"Very well, then," continued the other, "that is settled. I'm perfectly willing to give you five hundred pounds on the day that sees Hazel Harlow Mrs. Horace Caldecott."

"Well, that's all very nice," put in Trevannion; "but surely you're getting on a bit fast. I always thought that one had to catch one's hare before one could cook it. You seem anxious to do the latter process first."

"But I have a plan," answered Caldecott quickly. "The only thing is there's not too much time to carry it out. You are due out of Manchester to-morrow—Sunday morning, I believe. Well, to-day is Saturday, isn't it?"

"Yes," answered the other. "What then?"

"Then there is nothing more but for me to jump straight away into telling you my idea of how we are going to get hold of Miss Hazel Harlow. I have been lying low in Manchester all the week, and I have not been idle. The train is all ready laid, it only wants firing. And you are the man who is going to do that for me."

"Oh, that sounds all right, and what are you going to do?"

Caldecott looked at his watch.

"As soon as I have laid the details of the scheme before you," he said, "I shall rush off to the station, jump into a train, and soon be speeding away as fast as the locomotive can drag me."

Trevannion looked mystified.

"That sounds a very nice programme, so far as you are concerned," he said with a forced laugh; "but I don't quite see where I come in. Am I to play the part of professional kidnapper all on my own hook while you take a journey to Paris? If so, I think I'll cry off—five hundred pounds or no five hundred pounds."

"Not so fast, not so fast," said the other impatiently. "We won't waste any more time. I'll tell you in as few words as possible the plan that I had sketched out before I met you, but that had seemed doomed to failure owing to the fact of having no ally. So please give me your very best attention."

And without more ado he plunged into the recital of the plot that had for its aim the downfall of the unsuspicious Hazel.

CHAPTER II.

It was Sunday morning, and a cold, dismal morning enough, as is consistent with late autumn and smoky Manchester.

The train that was to carry the Good Samaritan Company to Nottingham to inaugurate another week of the provincial tour was due to leave the great manufacturing city at about eleven o'clock. It was half-past eight, and Hazel and Jenny were sitting at breakfast somewhat drearily waiting for the time when they would have to set out for the station.

"What a blessing it is to have Mr. Monteith back with us once again," said Jenny. "Mr. Trevannion made a good enough substitute so far as the acting went, and yet he is nothing like Eric Monteith in private life."

"No, indeed," answered Hazel warmly. "I have come to look upon Mr. Monteith as my guardian angel. I like Mr. Trevannion well enough, but I should have liked him better if he hadn't tried to make love to me."

"I still live in hopes of seeing you Mrs. Monteith," said Jenny smilingly. "I can't think why you don't become engaged to him, Hazel. It isn't fair on the rest of us. Why, I'm not the only girl in the company who would give a good deal to be able to become Mrs. Eric."

Hazel did not answer for a few minutes.

"I don't know what is wrong with me," she said slowly, at last. "I'm awfully fond of Mr. Monteith, and sometimes I think that I really am in love with him, and just as I say to myself that I really will listen to his suit, I begin to have doubts again. I wonder if there is something wrong with my compostiiton. Or whether it is that I am so anxious to become a great actress that I haven't time to think about anything else?"

"I'll tell you what I think," answered Jenny slily; "I think you're a bold, bad girl. You like to have as many strings to your bow as you can, and all the time you are madly in love with Master Eric."

At that moment there came a knock at the door, and their landlady entered, with the announcement that a Mr. Trevannion was outside, and would like a word with the two young ladies on a matter of importance. The next moment Trevannion came into the room, looking strangely heated and flustered, as though he had been brought thither in great haste.

"I am so sorry to interrupt you, ladies," he began quickly, "but I have been rushing round for Venables collecting the company. Venables has made a mistake about the train. It is earlier than he thought, and leaves in a few minutes. I've got a cab outside, and if you can come with me, we shall be just in time to catch it. And I, for one, shan't be sorry to get out of smoky Manchester. Monteith and Venables are rushing off collecting the other people."

For a moment a slight pang of disappointment went through Hazel's heart. Why had not Eric been deputed to apprise them of the fact of the mistake? But she said nothing of this, neither did any suspicion cross her or Jenny's mind at the somewhat unexpected intelligence. It was just the sort of thing that Venables would have done. He was always making plans, only to alter them at the last moment, and there was nothing in Trevannion's manner to suggest anything irregular. Indeed, he seemed genuinely anxious to help the ladies to make their final preparations and catch the train.

"We shall have to get in where we can," he said; "it's a fast train, and only stops once before reaching Nottingham. If we can't get into the carriage with the others we shall have time to change there. As it is, I am afraid we shall run it rather fine."

There was no time given to Jenny or Hazel to think of anything save the importance of getting away from the lodgings. Neither of them, however, connected Trevannion with anything that might have spelt disaster to either of them. He had never betrayed to Hazel how great the revulsion in his feelings as regards herself was since the day when she had so firmly declined to consider his amatory addresses. In a few minutes the two girls were ready, and now only anxious to be off.

"The sooner we go the sooner we shall be in Nottingham," said Trevannion, "and it's always nice to get to a place early—it gives one more time to look about and find decent diggings."

It was about as disagreeable a morning as could be well imagined. A raw, damp fog hung over the grimy streets. As they rattled along in the vehicle towards the station, Trevannion did not allow his companions much time for thinking over the situation in which they found themselves, but kept up a continuous flow of conversation in order to lull any transient suspicions to rest.

"It's just like Venables," he said, "to make a mistake like that about the train, and it won't be our fault if we miss it. If we do we shall land in Nottingham goodness knows when. Venables said particularly we were to jump in wherever we could, no matter if we saw him on the platform or not. I got your tickets so you needn't bother about that. I daresay when we do turn up at Nottingham it will be to find that half the company has been left behind. I left Venables and Monteith ramping round like a couple of crazy tigers."

In this strain he went on until the station was reached, and, jumping out of the cab, he hurried into the crowded station with the two girls at his heels, now thoroughly infected by his feverish haste.

Trevannion had played his cards well. He knew how nervous and excitable women would be when worked up to such a pitch of hurry, and if only he could keep Hazel and Jenny on the move he felt assured that there could be little obstacle in the way of the success of the scheme concocted by Caldecott.

The train was drawn up on the platform. In the gloom it was impossible to see its whole length.

"Come on!" yelled Trevannion, and just as the guard blew his whistle he tore open the door of a first-class carriage and bundled the two girls almost unceremoniously inside the compartment.

"I think I saw Venables," he said mendaciously, "waving like a man possessed. By Jove, that was a narrow shave," he chuckled to himself. "I wouldn't mind betting that half the company is left behind."

The train moved out of the station, and the two girls began to recover their breath slowly. Then Trevannion produced an elegant little box from his pocket.

"I have some bon-bons here," he said airily, "that I hope will compensate for my having hurried you over your breakfast." And he opened the lid to display a tempting array of sweetmeats such as are dear to every feminine heart. In the centre of the box were two bon-bons of exceptionally alluring appearance—delicate little pink and white confections that looked as though they would melt away to nothing within the mouth. As was natural, both Jenny's and Hazel's eyes turned to the two tempting sweets. They each took one with a laugh and popped them into their mouths. Trevannion helped himself to a less seductive-looking chocolate.

But the sweets did not taste so nice as they looked. There was a sickly sort of hot sweetness about them that struck the two girls simultaneously as being particularly unpleasant. Involuntarily both made wry faces.

"Weren't the sweets nice?" asked Trevannion solicitously, "you must try another. Those elegant looking morsels are often deceptive. They are only got up for show, I believe."

Hazel tried to answer, but an indescribable languor had crept over her, a feeling by no means unpleasant, and yet one that rendered her incapable of speech or action. She looked listlessly across at Jenny, who, strangely enough, seemed equally listless and averse to action. Another moment and Hazel's eyelids drooped; the next moment she leant back as though suddenly lost in a slumber of the deepest kind. It was the same with Jenny. She, too, seemed to be in the arms of Morpheus.

Trevannion sat like a statue for a few seconds, his eyes turning from one to the other of the two girls. Great beads of sweat formed upon his forehead. He was deadly pale. Then he cautiously rose to his feet and took hold of Hazel's hand; he lifted it; it was as heavy as lead; neither did the girl show any sign of movement.

"Thank goodness," he muttered, "the opiate has worked. He's a smart man, is Caldecott. I wonder where he got those sweets from and what the drug inside them was. He assured me that it would do them no permanent harm. By Jove, how soundly they sleep."

Half-an-hour passed away—half-an-hour fraught with a hundred anxious forebodings for Lucius Trevannion.

Supposing that the dose had been miscalculated,

"Pursue him!" she screamed. "Pursue him! He's a murderer."

and that the two girls died. He would be a murderer then. He shook with fear as though he had a palsy. The train drawing up in a station brought him to himself again. He arranged the two helpless figures in opposite corners, as though each were asleep, and thrust his head out of the window. The station was Marple. There were not many people on the platform, and it was with a decided feeling of relief that Trevannion saw Caldecott's figure walking down the platform eagerly looking out for his confederate, as had been arranged between them. At sight of Trevannion, Caldecott hurried forward and leapt inside the compartment. In a few moments the train moved away out of the station.

Caldecott's eyes were fixed gloatingly on the two unconscious figures, the victims of his villainy.

"Then it's all gone off well," he said, speaking in a half whisper as though in fear lest the two unconscious figures could hear what he was saying, though there was really but little cause for apprehension of such a contingency. It was his guilty conscience that prompted this needless caution.

"Yes," answered the other, and proceeded to detail in full how easily his work had been accomplished.

Caldecott looked at his watch.

"When we get to Hathersage," he said, "I shall get out, as arranged, with Miss Harlow. I suppose you have the tickets as arranged."

"Yes," answered Trevannion, and felt in his pocket for the ticket, but it was not there. He felt through every pocket in turn without success.

"Confound it!" he said, "I've lost the blessed thing; and, what's worse, I've lost my own too. You know I was going to get out at Eccleshall and leave Miss Lovelace here with a ticket for Sheffield in her pocket. She's sure to be found by someone, and she won't in the least know where you and Miss Harlow are, and when she is found it will surely be too late for her to do anything."

"Yes, that's all right," answered the other roughly. "You can do what you like, but it's a nuisance your having lost those tickets. I wonder what on earth you can have done with them?"

"Well, there's no good crying over spilt milk," answered Trevannion; "and you must own I've risked a good deal for you?"

"Not entirely for me," was the somewhat sneering rejoinder. "You forget that you had a score against the fair Hazel, to say nothing of the fact that there's five hundred pounds waiting for you."

"Well, anyhow, we both of us have to see the business out," he said; "so I don't see what object can be gained by our trying to cut one another's throats."

CHAPTER III.

It was half-past ten. Eric Monteith, absolutely oblivious, of course, to what had happened to Hazel, set forth from his lodgings with the intention of escorting Hazel and Jenny to the station. He arrived at their rooms, and was electrified to hear that they had already gone.

"Gone!" he echoed, in amazement. "Where have they gone to?"

"A Mr. Trevannion—he called for them," the landlady answered. "It must have been some time after eight o'clock, and took them away to the station in a cab. They seemed in a mortal hurry."

For a few moments Eric could hardly believe the evidence of his ears own.

"Are you quite sure," he said to the woman, "that they have gone?"

"Quite," came the answer. "And there is rather a funny thing in connection with their going. I found these railway tickets lying at the foot of the stairs some time after they had left. I suppose they must have dropped them." And she handed the three diminutive pieces of pasteboard to the dumfounded Monteith.

They were three first-class tickets, but the astonishing part about them was that they were all for separate places. One was for Hathersage, another was for Eccleshall, and the third was for Sheffield. Here was a discovery that only made the matter more complex than ever.

But one fact stood out with startling distinctness. Trevannion had called for the two actresses and had induced them to drive away to the station with him pell-mell. The landlady was unable to say more. She had not overheard the conversation that had passed between Trevannion and his two dupes. She could only reiterate that they had all three driven off together, and that her bill was settled—sure index of the fact that her lodgers had taken their final departure.

Eric was like a man possessed. He dashed off to the station, where he found Venables and the rest of the company awaiting him, and at once told the manager what he knew.

Venables was no less mystified than he was.

"What on earth is the meaning of it?" he said; "and what on earth are we to do?"

"I know what I am going to do," said Eric. "I'm going to follow up the only clue we've got. I'm going to charter a special and I'm going to visit Hathersage, Eccleshall, and Sheffield in turn. I take it that those three tickets must have some connection with the business, though why, in the name of goodness, there should be three different destinations is more than I can fathom. It looks uncommonly like foul play."

"But what on earth should Trevannion want to decoy the girls away for," put in Venables; "and supposing that he dropped the tickets where the landlady found them merely as a blind. What will you do then?"

Eric shrugged his shoulders.

"I don't know," he said, "but I am going to follow up the clue I have got. My advice is that you go on to Nottingham with the rest of the crowd and leave me here. Don't say a word of what has happened; explain the absence of Trevannion and the girls any way you can. I'm going to institute inquiries at the station here, and then I'm going to get that special train, no matter what it costs me."

And without more ado he hurried away on his self imposed task.

Inquiries at the station revealed but little. Manchester Central is a big station, and there were crowds of people always there that made the identification of individuals extremely difficult. The tickets, Eric discovered, had been bought at a railway office in the city. He chartered his special train with some difficulty, and then prepared to follow out the next part of his programme. Never had he felt the power of wealth more than he did at that moment. If he had been merely a poor, needy travelling actor it would have been impossible to have followed up the clues, that had been so miraculously delivered to him, with any speed. He would have had to toil laboriously by a slow train to Hathersage, to have instituted inquiries there, and then, if necessary, to have proceeded on towards Sheffield. Whereas, within an hour or so of his discovery he was seated in the saloon carriage of a train composed only of two coaches and the locomotive. In an hour, if all went well, he would be at Hathersage, and on the first stage of his quest.

The journey to the little town was perfectly uneventful. To Eric it seemed interminable, and when once or twice the train had to slow up in obedience to adverse signals, he could hardly contain his annoyance at the delay. But at last Hatherage was reached. He leapt out of the train and asked for the station-master. With the deference due to a gentleman who could afford to travel by a special, he was conducted to the station-master's private room, and at once plunged into the business that had brought him to the place.

"Can you tell me," he said, "whether a gentleman and two ladies have, by any chance, arrived here this morning? One of the ladies was an exceptionally tall and beautiful woman with red-gold hair. The other lady was a slight, dark person. The man who should have been with them would be about my own height and clean-shaven."

The station-master listened attentively.

"About the only passengers to Hathersage this morning, sir," he answered slowly, "were a gentleman and a lady—his wife—who had been taken with a sudden fainting fit in the train, and whom he had conveyed to the house of a doctor in the place. The lady was heavily veiled, but she was tall—I could see that, though she was carried out, and her hair was just the colour you describe."

An exclamation fell from Eric's lips.

"And the man," he said; "what was he like?"

"A tall, dark, handsome, gentleman, with a black moustache," came the answer.

"And he drove her away at once?"

"Yes, sir; he sent for a vehicle from the inn and drove her away through the village."

Eric's thoughts were racing along at lightning speed.

"Do you think I can find that flyman?" he asked quickly.

"Oh, yes, sir," came the somewhat mystified answer. "He's sure to be at the inn now."

"Then look here," went on Monteith rapidly, "I want you to do me a very great favour. I want you not to mention to a soul what I have asked you. In fact, keep your mouth shut entirely. I want this special train to be kept here, and I am going off to find this gentleman and his wife. Believe me, it is a matter of the utmost importance that secrecy should be kept. If I am successful in a certain business that has brought me here to-day, I shall not be ungrateful to you for your part in it."

The station-master readily gave his word, and Eric hurried away hot upon the scent. He had never expected so soon to be put upon the trail and with such little difficulty, yet there was a terrible feeling in his heart as he hurried away towards the village inn, for he knew by the station-master's meagre description who was the only man it could be who had carried off his helpless "wife." It must be Horace Caldecott, and his poor helpless "wife" must be Hazel herself.

So this was the explanation of Trevannion's action. What could have happened to Jenny? A wild wave of fury surged up in Eric's heart.

"I won't spare him this time," he muttered; "and if I can lay hands upon him it will be for good and all."

Inquiry at the inn was soon productive of the driver who had been coachman to the mysterious gentleman and his ailing wife that morning. Half-a crown had the effect of loosening his tongue. His story was brief and very much to the point. He had driven the pair to a house two miles or so beyond the village, occupied by a certain doctor named Ganderton. The lady had still been unconsicous, and they had had to carry her inside the house. That was all the man knew, but it was enough, and Eric did not wait for more. His next move was to rush off to the local police-station, there to enlist the sympathy and co-operation of the village constabulary. He had a brief but pithy conversation with the superintendent. Here, again, the power of gold was able to achieve what less poignant methods would have taken much longer to obtain. So ably did Monteith put forward the pressing claim that made aid necessary, that ere long he was in the satisfactory position of leaving the police-station in company with a pair of stalwart constables in plain clothes. He was going to leave nothing to chance now.

CHAPTER IV.

Although it was a source of annoyance to Lucius Trevannion that he had lost the three tickets in some mysterious way, yet he soon forgot the fact in the stress of the exciting episodes that culminated with the disappearance of Caldecott and Hazel at Hathersage. Had Trevannion paid for the tickets himself he would doubtless have felt their loss more poignantly; but Caldecott had supplied him with money, and hence he had no apprehension on that score. The plan that had been arranged between the two rascals was that Trevannion was to alight at Eccleshall, and to make the best of his way to London and to Caldecott's private house, leaving Jenny in the hands of Providence. By the time she would have recovered her senses and have extricated herself from the position in which she would find herself, Caldecott felt convinced that both he and Hazel would be out of reach; and, besides, the girl would never suspect that Hazel had been got out of the train at Hathersage. She would probably think she had come to Sheffield and been spirited away by Trevannion, as she could not know that Caldecott had had any part in the black affair.

So reasoned the astute Caldecott, and up to a certain point his reasonings were justifiable enough, but as the old saying has it, "The best laid plans of men and mice gang oft agley," and already an event had happened. The providential discovery of the railway tickets by Eric had been the direct means of putting him on the track of the abductor.

Just as the train was steaming out of Hathersage an elderly gentleman jumped into the carriage in which were Trevannion and the still unconscious Jenny. The girl lay in the corner as Trevannion had so artfully placed her, with the appearance of one in a deep sleep, an unnatural pallor overspreading her countenance. Annoyed as he was at this intrusion, Trevannion knew that his only course was to conceal any trace of chagrin that he might feel. It was not far to Eccleshall, and when he reached that station he could leap out of the train and get away before attention had been directed to the unconscious girl.

The gentleman looked somewhat curiously at the recumbent figure.

"The young lady looks tired," he said to the actor, pleasantly enough.

Trevannion threw a careless glance in Jenny's direction.

"Yes," he answered shortly; "she's been sleeping like that for a long time."

"Oh, then she's not travelling with you?" asked the other, in some surprise.

"Certainly not," came the prompt answer. And Trevannion, having made up his mind to his course of action, plunged deeper into the mire of falsehood. "I don't know her from Adam."

"I wonder if we ought to wake her up?" went on the officious stranger; "for all we know she may have overshot her station."

A growing alarm seized hold of Trevannion, a feeling that was intensified by the fact that the train had suddenly slowed up in response to an adverse signal. The only course for him to pursue was to temporise, for if the stranger should attempt to arouse the unconscious girl the results might prove exceedingly awkward, not to say precarious, for the success of the dark business.

"I wouldn't wake her," answered the actor quickly, trying to speak carelessly. "I expect she is bound for Sheffield, and will wake up like clockwork when she reaches her destination. Women are rather like that."

But the other did not seem at all satisfied.

"She doesn't look to me as if she were sleeping naturally," he pursued, in a puzzled voice.

At that moment the whistle of the engine gave vent to a piercing scream, and with sundry bumps and jolts the train started on its way again—a fact that caused Trevannion to breathe a heartfelt sigh of relief. But his satisfaction was short-lived. The jolting motion caused the inert body of the unconscious Jenny to lurch forward, and the next moment she would have fallen on the floor of the carriage had not the stranger sprung forward and caught her in his arms.

Now, had she been sleeping naturally, it stood to reason that she would have been awakened by the sudden shock, but as she still hung limp and resistless in his arms, the gentleman's suspicions were at once aroused as to her grave condition.

"She's not asleep," he said hoarsely, "she's unconscious!" And he laid her down carefully upon the cushions. Now the drug that had been administered to Jenny has different effects upon various constitutions. There are some upon whom it acts much more drastically than others, while some again are enabled to shake it off, after a comparatively short time. Now it so happened that the sudden shock on Jenny's deadened senses caused by the jolt that had displaced her had exactly the right effect in helping her to more quickly throw off the effects of the insidious drug. Added to this the elderly gentleman, with the best intentions in the world, had laid the girl somewhat roughly upon the seat, being unable to support the dead weight in his arms.

Lucius Trevannion sprang forward with a hoarse cry, and to his horrow saw the girl's eyelids slowly flutter back and reveal her eyes, still stupid from the effects of the narcotic. The stranger looked at him in amazement, and reading the terror in his face, raised the girl again to a sitting position, sitting beside her at a loss to know how to proceed further.

A shuddering cry came from Jenny's lips.

"Where am I?" she said weakly. "Are you there, Hazel?" Then her eyes sought Trevannion's guilt-stained countenance, and like a flash consciousness of what had happened came back to her.

"Ah, I remember," she said, her faculties suddenly leaping up to renewed alertness. "We got into the train with you, Mr. Trevannion, at Manchester. Hazel was with me then. Where is she now? What have you done with her? What has happened?" The questions came with frenzied quickness.

The train was moving along pretty swiftly now, and Trevannion realised from the pace they were going that some time must elapse before they reached a station. A mad terror seized hold of him. The stranger's eyes were fixed on his face with resentful curiosity. With a quick motion he turned towards the door of the carriage and tugged at the handle. But the other was too quick for him. Reading his intentions, he flung himself upon the actor, who fell to the ground, striking his head against the wood of the door as he did so, with the effect that, for the time being, consciousness was struck out of him.

Seeing that he was hors de combat for the present, the stranger turned to Jenny, who, faint and ill though she felt, was struggling hard to recall all that had happened since she had entered the train at Manchester.

"Quick!" cried the stranger. "Tell me all you can about this business."

"I am a member of a theatrical company," began Jenny, now almost on the verge of hysteria, "and we were due to-day to travel from Manchester to Nottingham. This morning this man, who is also a member of the company to which I belong, came to the rooms shared by a fellow-actress and myself, she being the beautiful Miss Hazel Harlow, of whom you have perhaps heard, and told us that our manager had mistaken the train, and that it was to start earlier than we had anticipated. He told us that his instructions were to drive us to the station and get us aboard the necessary train, irrespective of the other members of the company. Well, there seemed no reason to doubt his word. Before we had had time to realise what had happened, or to consider whether there was any irregularity in his conduct, we were in the train with him. He then produced a box of sweets and gave us each one. Those sweets were, I believe, drugged. Anyhow, I remember nothing more from the moment of eating one; and where my companion is I can't imagine. Oh, Hazel! Hazel!" she wailed, now breaking down completely and bursting into a flood of hysterical tears. "Where are you? Where are you?"

At that moment Trevannion began to show signs of returning consciousness. The blow on his head had been less violent than the stranger had imagined. Leaping to his feet, the actor flung himself upon the other man with the cry of a wild beast.

"I'll teach you to come interfering in affairs that don't concern you," he howled, and flung the other heavily down upon the floor of the compartment. The fracas had the effect of reawakening in Jenny the alertness of her deadened senses. Like a flash she sprung to the communication cord, and tugged at it with all her strength.

Struggle as he would, the old gentleman found himself no match for his younger assailant, reduced almost to a maniac by his mingled fear and rage. A terrible struggle ensued, but finally Trevannion got his knees in his opponent's chest, and, gripping him by the throat, set to work to try and throttle him into subjection.

The helpless man felt his senses leaving him. He gave a despairing gurgle, and Trevannion, springing to his feet, dashed at the door of the compartment just as the train began to slacken in response to Jenny's appeal.

Heads were thrust excitedly out of carriage windows. Already the guard had hurried out of his compartment and was walking along the train eagerly inquiring who had pulled the communication cord. Suddenly the door of the compartment, in which were the actors in the affray, was flung violently open and Trevannion, leaping out, fled away down the embankment that fringed the line like a hare. Then Jenny's pale face appeared at the open door.

"Pursue him!" she screamed. "Pursue him! He's a murderer!" for she really thought that Trevannion had succeeded in killing her benefactor. In a moment the guard had given chase, followed by two or three passengers, who joined the pursuit with all their sporting instincts aroused. The embankment was fringed with a low ledge at its base; over this Trevannion leapt, oblivious of the fact that along the top of the thorns ran a slender thread of barbed wire to keep people from straying on to the line. His foot caught in this and he fell heavily, and with such force as to knock the sense out of him for a few moments for the second time. This accident proved his undoing. A way was forced through the hedge and he was speedily captured and carried back to the guard's van.

And now that he saw the game was up, he relapsed into sullen silence that passed for indifference as regarded his fate, though in reality his whole being was consumed with fear.

A medical man, a passenger in the train, speedily ascertained that the elderly gentleman's injuries were not serious. His nerves had suffered more than his body.

In a few more moments the train was steaming into Eccleshall. The stranger's course was then plain sailing. He summoned a policeman and placed Trevannion in his charge for assault, at the same time offering to do all that he could to see Jenny out of her difficulties. He was, it appeared, a wealthy Sheffield merchant, and his word had weight. Trevannion was placed in custody and telegrams were sent all down the line to inquire if anything had been heard of Hazel Harlow, but, strangely enough, without success. A telegram was dispatched to Venables at Nottingham, and it was determined, on receipt of his answer corroborating the story that Jenny told, to send the actress thither, a pass being provided for her at the instigation of those in authority at Sheffield.

CHAPTER V.

MONDAY morning saw Venables, Jenny, and the other members of the company at the theatre at Nottingham, all in a high state of excitement, awaiting the arrival of Eric Monteith and Hazel Harlow—for Venables had received a telegram from Monteith to the effect that he would arrive at Nottingham as early as might be on Monday morning in company with Hazel. At ten o'clock a cab drew up outside the theatre, and from it emerged Eric and his charge safe and sound, though the latter showed on her face, as can be well imagined, traces of the terrible ordeal through which she had passed.

Eric's story was as follows: After telling them how he had arrived at Hathersage, and how he had been so providentially put on the track of the abductor, he went on:—

"We proceeded at once, I and the two constables, to the house to which I had good reason to believe Hazel had been carried. We found it to be a small, neat villa, set back in a garden opening on to the road by means of white entrance gates. We proceeded straight to the house where all seemed quiet. A manservant answered the bell, and I whipped out my revolver and told him that if he uttered a sound I would blow his brains out. Needless to say, he was paralysed with fear, and offered no resistance when one of the policemen slipped a pair of handcuffs on his wrists and trussed him up in a little room opening out of the hall. The village constable did his work most expeditiously and quietly, and apparently attracted no attention. Our next action was to reconnoitre and find out if we could whether there was anyone else in the house. The rooms on the ground-floor seemed deserted so we crept noiselessly up the stairs to be attracted by the sound of voices in a room at the back of the house. There we paused, and you can imagine my feelings when I heard the voice of the villain Caldecott speaking as follows:

"'I have the special marriage license here, and I am not going to let any chances slip this time. You will agree to marry me at once, or——' I didn't wait for more. We flung open the door and found ourselves in the presence of three people. One was Caldecott, the other a stranger, who, it turned out, was a rascally little doctor who lived in the house, the third was Hazel. Caldecott wheeled round with a savage cry, to find himself looking down the barrel of my revolver. The policemen sprang on the doctor and soon secured him. It was not such an easy job to get Caldecott trussed up. He struggled like a madman, and it was as much as the three of us could do to secure him. But we managed it at last, and he is at present lying in the cells at Hathersage waiting till we can have him brought up in court and publicly arraigned, and I think we've got enough against him now to insure a pretty long term of imprisonment, though if he were to have his deserts he ought to be strung up without further ado."

The feeling of relief that at last the scoundrel who had been the means of bringing so much misery upon Hazel and so many others was really in durance vile can be well-imagined. Terrible though Hazel's last experience had been, she still, in common with Eric and Jenny, felt that the episode had been almost worth enduring with such an end in view. As Eric had said, enough proof was forthcoming to convict Caldecott a dozen times over. Now that he was really a prisoner he could be confronted with his crimes, and refutation would be impossible. More than that, Trevannion had turned King's evidence. With the faint hope of saving his own skin the craven wretch had confessed at Sheffield to complicity in the plot to abduct Hazel.

And yet, incredible though it may seem, Caldecott's time was not yet. Later on that same day Eric received a telegram from Hathersage from the police-superintendent there. This is what it said:

"Prisoner escaped this morning, no trace of his whereabouts."

Here was a blow indeed. An investigation of the dread message only made the news more black. It appeared that Caldecott had been conveyed away to the cells and safely locked up. He had been put in charge of a policeman, who had been enjoined on no account to have any further intercourse with him than was absolutely necessary. The true facts of the case, however, only came out later on, and were as follows:

The constable had been found lying apparently overpowered on the floor of the cell; the door was open, and the bird was flown. The constable's story was that he had been overpowered by a sudden attack from the prisoner. Being Sunday, the police-superintendent was away, and a subordinate was the only man in charge. This story seemed improbable on the face of it, and after strict investigation it turned out that the man had been bribed by a huge sum of money to submit to allowing it to appear that he had been assaulted, whereas in reality he had aided and abetted his prisoner to escape.

Needless to say, the man was dismissed from the police force with ignominy, though in view of what had happened this was but a poor substitute for the fact that Caldecott was again at liberty.

All that could be done Eric, aided by the police, did. Huge rewards were offered for the discovery of the escaped prisoner, and placards were circulated bearing his description. Spies were put upon his London house, and everything that could be done was, as has been said, set on foot. Yet the days passed by and nothing was heard of the ubiquitous scoundrel. The only poor consolation there was lay in the fact that from that time forward Horace Caldecott went about with a price upon his head. He could not dare to show himself among honest men, but must go about carefully like the hunted criminal that he was.

Trevannion was brought up and condemned to a period of imprisonment for his share in the matter, though, as was pointed out, he was in reality only a scapegoat for the greater villain who had escaped.

As for Caldecott, it really seemed as if the earth had opened and swallowed him up, but in his heart Eric knew that he had not yet heard of the last of the man who had caused him so much misery. He knew that Caldecott would bide his time, that he would never forget and never forgive Monteith for having run him to earth, and for having so nearly been the means of his absolute ruin.

And there was another fact in the case. Caldecott, criminal though he was, was at least sincere in the fact that he was ready to go to any extreme to win Hazel Harlow. He must know now that he had forfeited for ever—even had he not done so before—all hopes of claiming the girl as his wife; yet, if he had gone through so much, had resorted to such desperate expedients to gain her by fair means or by foul, would he pause even now, lost as he was to any hopes of calling Hazel his? And if he could not have her love, would he not lie in his place of concealment like a wounded snake waiting until he might raise himself and strike his poisoned fangs at the heart of her for whom he had bartered his very existence? Would he not also make one desperate effort to put Eric Monteith for ever out of his path? He had nothing to hope for now, and would surely be ready to go to any extreme to gain his one last desire—the desire for revenge.

Eric knew this well enough. He knew that from henceforward he would have to be continually on his guard; that there would be no more open warfare between himself and Caldecott. He knew that from henceforward he would have to go through life like a man who never knows from what quarter his enemy will strike at his existence. It was not fear he felt at the prospect, but a mad rage against the inscrutable workings of Providence. Why had Fate delivered the man into his hands only to snatch him away again just when victory seemed assured?

But he said nothing of this to Hazel. He would at least show her that he thought the danger was past, and one thing at least was certain. It would indeed have to be a desperate game for Caldecott; the sword of Damocles hung over his head ready to descend at the slightest provocation.

The week in Nottingham passed off uneventfully enough, a fact of unspeakable blessing to Hazel and Jenny The Good Samaritan Company played to crowded houses every night, and the verdict that had been passed by other towns upon Hazel's abilities as an actress was fully indorsed by Nottingham.

The Good Samaritan Company were due at Edinburgh the week after their stay at Nottingham. Here Hazel was suddenly to be confronted with a terrible charge, that of theft—a charge substantiated by terribly conclusive circumstantial evidence. To see how the charge was pressed home upon her, and what the upshot of the affair was, we must refer our readers to the thrilling instalment in next week's Short Stories.

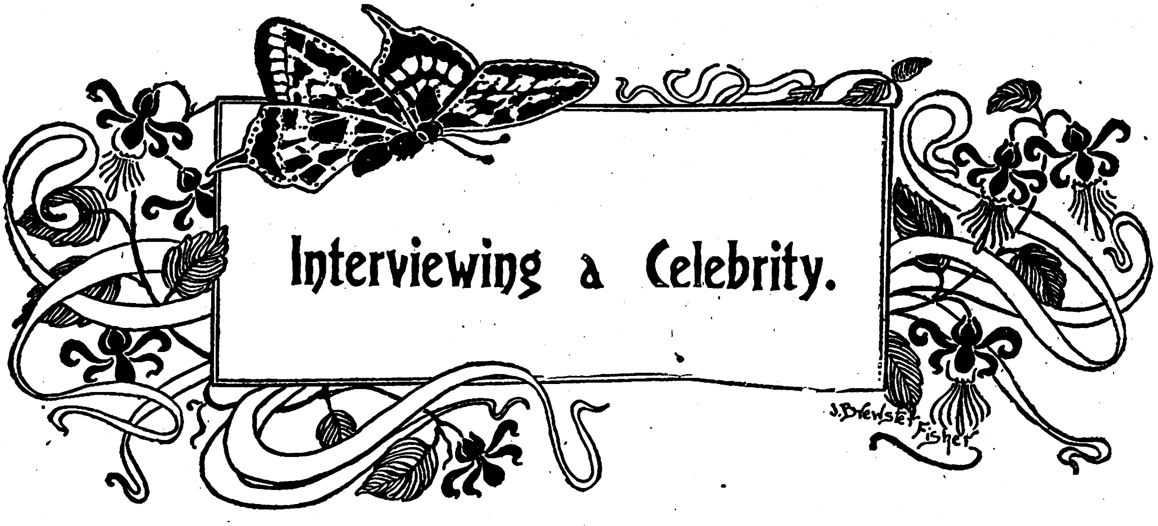
Interviewing a Celebrity.



"THAT young and talented actor, Horace Davenport," as the dramatic critics kindly described him, was seated, with more regard to ease than elegance, before a cheerful fire in his comfortable chambers.

His dark, good-looking face wore that sad, hopeless look that a liver derangement or blighted love alone can bring, and his was not a case for medical advice.

A pile of newspapers and reviews lay beside him. He had looked them all through for the purpose of reading one particular item—the critique of a novel by a new writer. It was with feelings of joy that he found the reviews uniformly favourable.

His interest in the matter is easily explained. One short year ago he was the happy fiancé of the charming authoress. A lovers' quarrel, a few hasty words, and the ring was returned, but not the heart which had been given with it.

Both suffered, but both were proud, and neither would take the first step towards reconciliation. They had not met since the engagement was broken off, and now he found himself longing to hear her voice again—to clasp her hand once more.

Suddenly an idea took possession of his brain. For an hour he sat still, staring into the fire, but with a new light in his eyes. Finally he sprang up.

"I'll do it!" he muttered, and then, flourishing the poker, dealt a large, smouldering lump of coal a mighty blow, scattering it into numberless blazing fragments. But the above exclamation in no way referred to this performance.

A week later, Clarice Luxmore, the new writer in whom Horace Davenport was so interested, was seated in the drawing-room of her charming home in Surrey.

An open book lay before her, but she was not reading. She was thinking of her success, and wondering whether "he" knew of it, and, if so, how he received the news. How she longed to share her triumph with him! But he had not even sent her a word of congratulation, and how could she possibly make any advances.

Then she thought, with some trepidation, of the journalist to whom she had promised an interview on behalf of the Golden Magazine. What was he like? What would he want to know, and what could she tell him that would be of sufficient interest to publish in an important journal? Now that she momentarily expected his arrival, the ordeal, in anticipation, was alarming.

By-and-bye the sound of wheels was heard outside, and a minute later Mr. Carslake was announced.

She noticed, as she rose to greet him in her own sweet and graceful way, that he was a tall, fair man, with hair slightly grey at the temples, and a well-trimmed moustache.

He began by thanking her effusively, in a clear and rather high-pitched voice, for her kindness in acceding to his request for an interview.

She murmured some polite commonplace, and he noticed that she seemed to have grown paler since he had entered the room—the result of nervousness, no doubt.

"What do you want me to tell you?" she smiled.

"Everything," he replied, producing a formidable-looking note-book. "In the first place, I should like to see the room in which you write."

Miss Luxmore smilingly complied, and led the way to her pretty boudoir. Here they settled in comfortable chairs, and began to take the interview in earnest.

Mr. Carslake had all the qualities of a successful, up-to-date journalist. His inquisitiveness was phenomenal, but displayed with such remarkable tact that it was absolutely impossible to take offence, even at his boldest ventures in the art of polite cross-examination. Indeed, his method of extracting information deserved a better title than that ordinary and—to some ears—vulgar term, questioning.

Step by step he elicited his victim's whole history from the bald and toothless age onward. But after a time he approached a subject which even he, incredible as it may appear, introduced with slight, but decided, symptoms of embarrassment.

Meanwhile, the colour had returned to Miss Luxmore's cheeks, and her eyes sparkled. Evidently, she found the interview a far more agreeable experience than she had expected. In fact she seemed to be enjoying it, and had, hitherto, told him all he wished to know readily and frankly.

But now Carslake's wonderful tact seemed to fail him, and the next question was put with alarming directness, though rather disjointedly.

"Is the report that you are about to marry your neighbour, Mr. Milward, correct, Miss Luxmore?"

All the dimples left her face as she replied coldly:

"No; it is utterly without foundation."

"Pardon me for having asked the question," he said. "Of course, I shall mention nothing in my article without your permission. Would you like to have the report contradicted?"

"It is scarcely worth the trouble," she replied indifferently. "I think you had better say nothing of my matrimonial intentions."

"Very well. But gossip is busy with your name, I assure you. Another rumour credits you with being engaged to an actor."

"That is equally false."

Her voice was colder than ever, but the colour in her face deepened.

"Will you excuse me for a moment?" she asked, suddenly rising. "I hear papa in the hall. He has come in."

She left the room, leaving the door slightly ajar.

Carslake heard a man's step, and then a subdued murmur of voices.

Presently she returned, followed by a fierce-looking little man, whom she introduced as her father.

"Pleased to meet you," cried Mr. Luxmore heartily. "You must stay and lunch with us."

"Thank you, I shall be delighted," replied Carslake.

"Have you finished putting my little girl through her paces?" asked Mr. Luxmore with a proud, fond look towards his daughter.

"Very nearly," replied Carslake. "Miss Luxmore is an excellent subject. I have interviewed several eminent people, but have never before found my task so agreeable. I have the greatest difficulty imaginable in getting sufficient information for an article from some of them."

"I can quite understand that," returned the gratified parent, smiling. "I'm very glad that I am not of sufficient importance to merit your professional attention."

At that moment a servant appeared with a message that Mr. Willis was in the drawing-room, and would like to see Miss Luxmore.

"Mr. Willis!" exclaimed Mr. Luxmore. "Show him up. The son of an old friend of mine," he explained to Carslake.

"Why, Dick, my boy, what lucky chance brings you down here?" he cried, grasping the hand of a fine, good-looking young fellow as the door opened again.

"My visit is to Clarice," the new-comer replied, disengaging his hand from Mr. Luxmore's grasp, and turning to greet Miss Luxmore. "I am commissioned by the editor of the Golden Magazine to interview her at an early opportunity."

"Ah, of course! You're in the scribbling line, too. But your colleague here has forestalled you."

"My colleague!" exclaimed Willis, looking sternly at Carslake. "This gentleman is not connected with our Magazine. I have not the pleasure of knowing him."

"What!" cried father and daughter in one voice.

"I repeat, I have not the pleasure of knowing him, and he is certainly not authorised to interview Miss Luxmore by our people."

Carslake was now looking anything but comfortable. In fact, it was very evident that, if the earth had suddenly opened and swallowed him, he would have regarded it as a personal favour.

"Then will you kindly explain this intrusion?" asked Mr. Luxmore, glaring at Carslake, and visibly bristling.

"I—er—I am extremely sorry to confess that I am not an accredited representative of the journal mentioned," Carslake acknowledged, painfully aware that Miss Luxmore was regarding him with unfavourable astonishment.

"Well!" demanded Mr. Luxmore, with strained calmness in his tones.

"I—I thought that if I could obtain an interview and write it up, the editor might accept it," he concluded lamely.

"But you used their official note-paper in making your application!"

"I got it through a friend at the office."

"Oh! you did, did you?" cried Mr. Luxmore, exploding with wrath. "And are you aware that your rascally conduct renders you liable to prosecution for entering this house under false pretences, you precious scoundrel?"

"I am not that, sir," returned Carslake with some spirit. "I admit that my action may appear dishonourable, but I am no scoundrel."

"May appear dishonourable!" echoed Mr. Luxmore. "By George!" he exclaimed violently, "I believe you are one of that gang of burglars that broke into my friend Saxby's house over at Crawford, the other night. No doubt you are reconnoitring to see whether it's worth while waiting on us on some future occasion. But you are trapped now, my friend. I'll send for a policeman."

"Oh, papa, you are making a charge against Mr. Carslake that he can easily refute, I am sure. Pray give him an opportunity of proving his respectability before resorting to such extreme measures," interrupted Miss Luxmore, whose sympathy seemed aroused by Carslake's evident consternation.

"My dear, kindly leave me to deal with this matter. You don't understand these people," said Mr. Luxmore testily. "Do respectable people act as he has?"

"If you will allow me to speak to you in private, Mr. Luxmore, I think I can satisfy your doubts on that score," said Carslake, still dejectedly.

To this Mr. Luxmore at first demurred, but, persuaded by his daughter, he at length grudgingly consented to the suspicious stranger's request.

He was leading the way to the library, Willis bringing up the rear, when Carslake suddenly paused.

"Will you take me to your dressing-room, Mr. Luxmore," he asked, "I can explain matters better there."

"My dressing-room!" gasped the old gentleman in amazement.

"Yes," replied Carslake quietly, "and I should like our interview to be a strictly private one. This gentleman," indicating Willis, "had better return to Miss Luxmore."

Willis glared at the speaker, whose cool impudence seemed literally to take his breath away.

"Hand him over to the police, and have done with him," he cried. "He's up to some trick."

"Pooh! I'm not afraid of him," said Mr. Luxmore, who evidently regarded this advice as a slur on his courage. "Come in here."

He opened a door as he spoke, and entered the room, followed by Carslake.

"You can go back to Clarice, Dick."

"I shall do nothing of the sort," cried Willis hotly. "If you are foolish enough to humour the impudent beggar by shutting me out, I shall, at least, remain within call; and I shall not hesitate to open the door at the first suspicious sound, I promise you."

He looked darkly at Carslake as he spoke.

"Have your own way, then," returned Mr. Luxmore, shutting the door on his young friend with unnecessary violence.

"And now what is the meaning of all this mystery?" he demanded, flinging himself into a chair and looking sternly at the culprit.

That worthy vouchsafed only a sigh in reply. He then silently divested himself of his coat, and busied himself for a few minutes at the washstand and dressing-table.

When he turned to face Mr. Luxmore once more, a transformation had taken place. Carslake the journalist had disappeared, and Horace Davenport the actor stood revealed.

The effect on Luxmore was remarkable, and, to Davenport, disconcerting. Flinging himself back in his chair, the old gentleman roared with laughter.

"Well, well!" he gasped, when he had regained sufficient breath to speak. "This is a surprise, Davenport. What on earth induced you to come here in that guise."

Davenport looked abashed.

"Mr. Luxmore," he said, "I will explain. You know in what relationship I formerly stood to your daughter. I have never ceased to regret that our engagement was broken, and I still love Clarice with all my heart. Not daring to call on her openly after what has passed between us, and yet longing to see her and speak to her once more, I took advantage of circumstances and professional arts. I have acted very foolishly. I sincerely apologise, and beg that you will now allow me to depart without disclosing my identity to anyone else."

"You and Clarice are a pair of stuck up young fools," cried Mr. Luxmore. "My silly little girl is breaking her heart for you, and you are doing the same for her, yet you are both too proud to acknowledge it—to each other at least. Dick!" he shouted. "Come here, lad. Clarice was right, by Jove!"

The door opened and Willis burst in.

"Mr. Davenport, I am delighted to meet you," he cried, wringing the actor's hand warmly. "You must forgive our little joke."

"Foiled with his own weapons! Beaten at his own game!" laughed Mr. Luxmore.

"I don't understand," said Davenport, in amazement. "Do you mean to say you penetrated my disguise?"

"Miss Luxmore did," smiled Willis, "past master as you are in the art of making-up."

"Dick came in with me," explained Mr. Luxmore. "Then Clarice rushed down to the hall, and told us you were upstairs masquerading as a journalist. She knows you are not connected with any Magazine—neither is Dick, by-the-way, but that is of no consequence. She quickly taught us the parts we were to play in the little comedy that followed, and—'pon my word—I consider our acting has been as good as some you'll see in your own theatre—though I say it myself."

Davenport was looking alarmed.

"You completely hoodwinked me at all events," he said.

"Now come along and congratulate the authoress and heroine of the piece," said Mr. Luxmore, taking Davenport's arm.

"Really, I——"

"Nonsense! I'll not hear a word. She's expecting you. Bring her down to lunch. Dick and I will go on. Don't keep us waiting too long."

Left to himself, Davenport boldly turned the handle of the door and entered. The next moment Clarice was in his arms.

"My clever darling!" he cried. "How did you find me out? I thought my disguise was complete."

"'Love is blind' is not true in every sense, dear," she replied softly. "Besides, you have forgotten to remove from your watch-guard that little golden heart I gave you long ago."

"Precious little trinket," he said, touching it reverently. "Fitting type of the heart of her who gave it. And so," he continued lightly, "not content with writing a successful novel, you must needs try your hand at play-writing. I must persuade you to write one for me."

She gave his arm a loving squeeze, as she replied:

"I will, with pleasure. But you must not undertake the part of the cruel deceiver in that, you know. That's not your line."

IF SO, YOU WILL GET £5.

HERE IS THE SCHEME.

We have in our possession a considerable number of photographs of men, women, and children of all grades of society, secured for us by our agents, who have scoured the United Kingdom for this special purpose.

Each week we publish five of these portraits, and to each of the persons thus represented we dispatch the sum of £5, on his or her forwarding a claim on a post-card addressed to PORTRAIT DEPARTMENT, "SHORT STORIES," Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Although the persons whose portraits will appear in this competition are quite unknown to us personally, we have their names and addresses in our possession, and, therefore, a claim can be settled at once, without risk of fraud.

We may say that our agents are still at work all over the country. It is, therefore, possible that your portrait may appear at any moment without your knowing it. So you should watch SHORT STORIES.

Is your portrait here? If so, drop us a post-card, and get £5. Five more portraits will appear next week.

All claims in connection with the portraits below must reach the address already given above by Tuesday next, November 12th. Full names and addresses of the correct claimants will appear in succeeding numbers.

HOW TO MAKE A CLAIM FOR A £5 NOTE.

Simply write on a post-card these words:

> The Portrait No.......... (here put number of portrait) in the current number of SHORT STORIES is mine. Please forward a £5 note.

A VERY NATURAL MISTAKE.

MISS DEBORAH MARKHAM stood at her kitchen sink one morning washing a bottle. It was one that had held an acid preparation for removing fruit stains. Almost any other woman would have thrown it on the ash pile as soon as it was emptied, but to Miss Deborah the natural thing was to clean it and store it away on a shelf in her cupboard with an army of other bottles.

No article ever seemed to Miss Markham to have outlived its usefulness; there was always a possibility that "it might come in handy some time," and it was treasured for the expected need.

People might by turns feel amused and exasperated by Miss Deborah's exaggerated love of economy, but their comments on her always ended with, "After all, she's dreadfully good-hearted, there's nobody in the whole town more ready to lend a hand than Deborah Markham, and if she takes any comfort in being so saving that's her own affair. She can afford to be overparticular." For she had the finest house and the largest income in East Elmore.

"It would be a pity not to keep this bottle," she commented, holding it against the light, "it's such a convenient size and the glass is so clear. I wonder what sort of glue that label was stuck on with; after all the hot water it's been in it hasn't started a mite. I've a good mind not to scrape it off, but keep the bottle just as it is. Like as not I shall want a bottle sometime for holding poison, and this one will be all labelled and ready."

Not long afterwards Miss Deborah decided that she must have the advice of the village doctor. All summer she had been tormented by nervous headaches and sleepless nights. She had doctored herself and had tried one kind of diet after another without relief, and her one servant, an old woman who had been kitchen-maid in the house since the days when Miss Deborah had been little Debby Markham, had experimented upon her mistress with all the potent mixtures she knew how to compound, but she, too, had failed to work a cure.

Accordingly, Doctor Bascom was summoned. The result of this professional visit was a slip of paper that Miss Deborah twisted between her fingers as she watched the doctor climb into his high trap before her gate. She noticed that Mrs. Prescott also was watching from her window, where she sat sewing, and the shutters in one window of Mrs. Treadway's vaultlike parlour were rolled open, a sure indication that the lady herself was sitting behind them.

"The neighbours will be running in to see what is the matter over here, so I shall have to send Hannah to the chemist's for the medicine," thought Miss Deborah, realising that for a few hours she was to be the most interesting person in the village. Her prediction was a true one. Within half-an-hour both Mrs. Treadway and Mrs. Prescott were established in comfortable chairs in her sitting-room making anxious inquiries about her health and going over the last bits of neighbourhood gossip. Other ladies followed them, for the doctor's trap stopping before the house had advertised to everyone the fact that either Miss Deborah or Hannah was ill, and the last callers did not leave until Hannah's clatter over the tea-table informed them that the old woman considered it time they were well out of the way and her mistress at supper.

It was after sunset when she found herself at liberty to prepare the medicine for use. Dr. Bascom had informed her that it was a preparation of bromide which would come in the form of a white powder and would require solution. "To be dissolved in eight ounces of water," she read on the slip of instructions.

"Then the first thing I want is an eight-ounce bottle," she thought, "and that ought to be very easy to find in the cellar cupboard."

The twilight was almost darkness in the cellar, but she did not take a light, and her hands groped about among the bottles in search of one that the sense of touch should tell her was of the required size. In the very front row she came upon one that she judged would answer the purpose. The kitchen was very dimly lighted by its north windows, but Miss Deborah did not stop to light a lamp before sifting the powder through a little funnel into the bottle and filling it with cold water. Not until she was ready to take the first dose of the new remedy did she discover that there was a small white label pasted across one side of the bottle—a skull above two crossbones and the word "Poison" ornamented the label.

It was a startling occurrence, but her sense of humour came to the rescue. "I've no doubt it fits well enough," she remarked grimly. "Most drugs are poison. I shall have to show Dr. Bascom the name I have given to what he calls 'a harmless remedy.'"

She found the "poison" so efficacious that a week later, when Hannah came down in the morning with white face and dull eyes, complaining of a sick headache, her first thought was of the medicine that had helped her own headache.

"Go and lie down on the sitting-room lounge," she commanded. "I'll give you a spoonful of bromide, and you needn't give a thought to the breakfast, for I'll see to that myself."

Hannah gladly allowed herself to be tucked up on the big lounge that was, in fact, a couch, and she swallowed the medicine obediently, then lay waiting impatiently for the pain to abate, but the headache was not to be routed so easily. When Miss Deborah peeped in through the kitchen door after she had finished her breakfast, expecting to see the old woman asleep, she saw instead Hannah's wide-open eyes gazing at her from a confused pile of pillows and shawls.

"One dose doesn't appear to be enough; you must take another," was her decision; "and if you don't feel much better in an hour I shall give you a third spoonful." When Miss Deborah returned to the kitchen, she found a barefooted boy standing on the doorstep. The severe expression on his freckled face showed that he considered his errand one of importance, and the weight of responsibility upon him gave great gravity to his voice as he said, "Good morning, Miss Markham."

"Why, Joseph, what's the matter?" she exclaimed. "Is your mother ill? Has anything happened to my dress?" For the boy's mother was the village dressmaker, and she had a new black silk for Miss Deborah under way in her workroom.

"No'm, mother isn't ill, but my sister Julia is, and mother's going to Sharon to see her. She's going to start before dinner, and she says please to come down right away and have your dress fitted, so she can take it with her to work on, 'cause she may be gone three or four days."

This was a message to be obeyed at once. Miss Deborah hastened to change her wrapper for a more suitable dress for the street and then looked into the sitting-room to see how Hannah was feeling.

"Mrs. Pratt has sent for me," she said. "She's going out of town this morning and wants to fit my dress before she goes. I shan't be away long, and you must lie still till I come back. If anybody comes to the house, let them rap till they give it up. You are not to stir. Your headache isn't much better yet, is it? But it's too soon to give you any more medicine. I'll leave the bottle and spoon here on the stand at the head of the lounge, and you can see the clock without moving. When it's nine o'clock, take another spoonful unless you get rid of the pain before then."

By this time Hannah's opinion of her mistress' much lauded medicine was not a flattering one.

"Nothing in the world but salt and water!" she grumbled, rolling her head restlessly on the pillow in search of a cool spot. "I fancy I'm not the sort of person to work faith cures on."

But at nine o'clock she decided to give the drug one more trial. She sat up on the edge of the lounge and reached for the bottle. The motion made her head whirl, and she sat with closed eyes for a minute to steady herself before trying to pour out the liquid. When she ventured to open her eyes she noticed at once the white label on the bottle.

"That tells how much to take, I suppose," she muttered. "I don't believe Miss Deborah gave me half enough for a dose." And she brought the bit of paper close to her eyes to read for herself the directions. The next instant she was standing in the middle of the room, the bottle on the floor and her headache entirely forgotten.

"Poison!" she gasped. "No wonder I felt worse and worse all the time!"

She ran to the window which looked into Mrs. Prescott's yard and called wildly: "Help! Help!" And when a startled face appeared at an opposite window added: "Send for the doctor! I'm poisoned!"

Mrs. Pratt lived at the far end of the village, ten minutes' walk from the Markham house. Miss Deborah lost no time on the way, and the business was transacted without delay. Both women were anxious to get it done that they might be free for other matters. Mrs. Pratt had a long ride before her, and Miss Deborah did not like to leave Hannah alone longer than was necessary.

After she left the dressmaker she stepped briskly along the street on her way home. There was no one in sight except a man scurrying along far in front of her. He disappeared through some gateway not far from her own, but the shrubs leaning over dooryard fences and the flicker of lights and shadows on the narrow footpath obscured the view and deceived the vision so that she could not be sure which house had been his destination.

"I wonder if that was Ezra Greene. Maybe Mrs. Greene is having one of her bad spells and has sent for Mrs. Prescott. If I wasn't in such a hurry, I'd stop and see," she thought as she passed the Greene house. There was no sign of excitement about the place, however, and she had no time for further speculations on Ezra Greene's reasons for haste, for she saw the doctor's trap turn into the main street from one of the crossroads leading out into the farming districts. Doctor Bascom was on his way home, but in answer to a call from behind him he stopped his horse and turned about on the seat of his trap to listen to the shouted summons. Then he backed his horse round and drove up to the side of the road, where a man came out to take charge of the horse, while he himself vanished as Ezra Greene had done.

"There's trouble at the Prescotts'," thought Miss Deborah, and she began to run, but she stopped short when she came in sight of the Prescott house and her own, for her neighbour's premises were deserted, while in her own garden several men were gathered about the door talking earnestly, and it was in front of her own door that the doctor's horse was tied.

Her pause of astonishment was a brief one. Then she dashed into the garden, through the group of men and into the kitchen. A woman was stirring something over the fire, and a hum of voices came from the sitting-room. Miss Deborah did not stop to question the occupant of the kitchen, who was so interested in the contents of her stewpan that she did not notice Miss Markham's entrance.

Mrs. Prescott was standing over the lounge, with an empty bowl in her hands.

"There, if it was an acid you've been taking there's a chance that the soapsuds will save you," she announced cheerfully, "and the sweet oil ought to help you whatever the stuff was. Don't you feel any better yet, Hannah?"

A feeble groan was the only reply. Dr. Bascom was at the window examining the contents of a bottle. Suddenly the look of perplexity on his face changed to a broad smile. Looking up, he saw Miss Deborah in the kitchen door.

"This tastes like the bromide I prescribed for you a few days ago, Deborah. How did you happen to ticket it this way? You've frightened Hannah out of a year's growth, and furnished the whole neighbourhood with a most welcome excitement."

"Oh, Miss Deborah, it was all a mistake, wasn't it?" cried Hannah, catching sight of her mistress above the ring of the frightened and bewildered faces surrounding her. "You didn't try to poison me on purpose, did you?"

Miss Deborah looked about her with sparkling eyes. The doctor's words had explained the situation to her.

"Mistake!" she exclaimed scornfully. "Have you all lost your wits? Do you think I shall have to poison you when I want to get rid of you, Hannah? I've a good mind to set you packing this instant, but nothing short of a lunatic asylum would take you in, I'm afraid. If your morning's work isn't further along than mine, ladies, perhaps you had better go where you can attend to it!" And she turned and walked out into the back regions of the house, shutting several doors sharply behind her.

Dr. Bascom watched her retreat with liveliest enjoyment; the stern-faced old man could enjoy a good joke heartily. Then he turned to the astonished group in the sitting-room.

"I think, Hannah, that if you have swallowed everything these impromptu physicians have been ordering you may consider yourself thoroughly poisoned, and now, neighbours, shall we leave her to make her peace with Deborah?"

"So you are determined, then, to marry this man?"

"Yes; I am determined to marry this man."

"For the last time, Kathie! Will you not think it over—reconsider your decision? Once done, it can never be undone—remember that!"

"Who are you, Philip Rayne, that you should dictate my course to me? Is it because my father owes yours money? Is it because he—you—all of you Raynes! seek to humble me—in my own eyes, and in the eyes of all who care for me?"

"No, Kathie! it is not that; it is because I love you so, that I would warn you—hold you back, snatch you, if I may, from a danger which you cannot realise!"

"Thanks! It is of course good of you; but I prefer—much prefer—to manage my own affairs. It will be quite time enough for you to offer your advice, sir, when I seek it. As that is a very remote eventuality, we will, if you please, consider the subject, as between us, indefinitely closed."

Kate, better known as Kathie Myddleton, and Philip Rayne were old friends. Kathie's father was one of the unhappy class, who never, by any chance, succeed in anything. Their touch is blight; their lives resultless. Predestined, it would seem, to social failure, they appear to have a strangely keen relish for assisting in the fulfilling of prophecy.

Captain Myddleton, a widower, with but one child, considered himself, in view of that fact, free to pursue, with reckless light-hearted buoyancy, "the primrose-way" so long as his inheritance lasted, and then for a few steps further in the company of the money-lender and his following.

Unfortunately, his daughter Kathie, a girl of exceptionally high spirit and, it must be confessed, of a wayward temperament, had to suffer in the process. Motherless from her birth almost, and, by consequence, thrown early upon the tender mercies of servants and questionable friends, her waywardness at twenty-three inclined perilously towards dangerous, because irresponsible independence; while her original high-spirits were becoming, day after day, like, and yet more like, to that hard, unsympathetic type of nature, whose god is itself.

Philip Rayne, on the other hand, was a handsome, stalwart young fellow who, without being in any sense a "prig," was all that the heart of the most exacting of good and true women could possibly desire.

The son of a rich man, wealth, while he thoroughly enjoyed all that it could give, had not in the least spoilt him. A gentleman (in the true meaning of the word) to the finger-tips, he was manly, and yet tender as a woman—especially to women. From a boy he had worshipped the very ground upon which Kathie stood. That love is always blind, I cannot, and do not, believe; but in this case there was a dimness of vision on the part of love which made the man to be more than a little kind to the woman's faults and failings.

Philip's father had at one time lent Captain Myddleton money; why, it is hard to say, for the ex-guardsman had little or no security to offer beyond his "I.O.U." which, saving the revenue stamp, was scarce worth the paper upon which it was written.

Strange to say, Joshua Rayne, old as the debt now was, had never pressed for payment, or shown the slightest sign of making things unpleasant for his dilatory debtor. This, naturally, suited Captain Myddleton's book to a nicety, for he himself might be fairly trusted not to allude to the subject in any way.

Philip knew of the transaction, and regretted it, insomuch as he looked upon it in the light of a barrier between himself and Kathie.

Still, even he could not quite fathom his father's action, or rather want of action in the matter.

He had always known old Joshua as being so close-fisted and hard in everything relating to money that it puzzled him as to what motive his father could reasonably have for this refraining from reclaiming his own.

Things were in this state when Leon Duvernay was, one summer afternoon, introduced to Kathie at a tennis-party on the Myddletons' own lawn at Richmond.

Nobody knew very much about him—this elegant, soft-speaking Frenchman; not even the voluble lady who was, in a way, responsible for him; but as he was faultlessly dressed, of charming, if somewhat super-charming manners; and paid the daintiest of compliments in the most picturesque of broken English, people—and among them Kathie—were disposed to accept Leon Duvernay, Chevalier of the Legion of Honour, Count of the Holy Roman Empire, and Heaven knows what beside, at practically his own estimate, and as a decided acquisition to Richmond society.

He was a tall, dark man, with eyes which some might call "shifty," but which the majority of the women termed "divine."

It is not an unwise rule to mistrust the man whose eyes are thus breathed "divine" by the sex, whose experience should by this time have taught them to know better.

Duvernay was no exception. From the very first the Frenchman displayed an unmistakable admiration for the Captain's beautiful daughter. Like one of his own poodles, he followed her everywhere. For a long time Kathie resented this, to her, unwelcome attention, and any ordinary Englishman would have at once noticed, and profited by the girl's evident dislike and prejudice.

For awhile Philip Rayne looked exultantly on. Then came trouble.

One day it was observed by Kathie's intimates that Duvernay assumed towards her an altogether new and suggestive air of proprietorship; and it was not long before it was generally known that the pair were engaged.

Soon rumours of an early marriage were heard, and it was in connection with one such that Philip uttered his remonstrance.

"Don't think me ungenerous," he said to her, a few days after the conversation between them which opens this story. "I know you have forbidden me to say anything to you on the subject, but I cannot—Kathie! I cannot hold my peace! You may, perhaps, never speak to me again; yet, though it would go nigh to break my heart, I must repeat my warning, even at the risk of complete silence 'twixt you and me for ever. This man—this Leon Duvernay—Kathie, has not the power, believe me, to effect a perfect marriage with you. French law does not allow it, and he knows that. To make it legal in France, Duvernay's parents should give consent; and, as you know, not one of his friends has made a sign. So long as you remain in England your marriage will hold good—here; but once on French soil, and the fellow has you at his mercy."

Kathie's hard and stubborn nature (only skin-deep, after all), however, nearly surrendered before the earnest pleadings of Philip. They moved her powerfully; but, although she instinctively felt that he was right, she would not acknowledge it, or turn from her purpose.

"You may think it right," she said, with a poor attempt at scornful sarcasm, "to traduce another in his absence, and to the woman whom he is to marry, but I hold it to be mean, despicable, and unmanly!"

"Well," he said gently and sorrowfully, "you cannot help my always loving you. Since you will have it so, I will say no more. Good-night!—Kathie."

"Good-night, Phil!"

She reached out both her hands as if to tell him that she believed him, and despised herself, but it was an impulse only, and she repented before it became an irrevocable act.

"Good-night!"

The frou-frou of her dress as she passed hurriedly out through the open window into the starlit garden, was to him as a sound of ill-omen, which rung in his ears all through the days, until he heard it once again.

Then, a week later, the marriage—all de rigueur—not a hitch anywhere. Bride lovely, but anxious-looking, and pale, bridegroom spic and span, smiling eternally, but yet manifestly subtly conscious of the whole thing's unreality.

Philip was there; he would be true to his resolve to watch and wait.

Ever since the arrival of the Frenchman the young man had been haunted by an indefinable memory, which, rack his brain as he might, would not crystallise.

He felt morally certain that somewhere—where he could not for the life of him remember—he had seen Leon Duvernay in other surroundings, and in very different guise. It worried him to be unable to recall the truth.

The day was warm, and Philip, from his post behind a pillar in one of the side aisles of the church, saw that, every now and again Duvernay wiped his forehead with his handkerchief.

Once, when he did so, and when a beam of sunlight shot right across his face, he pushed the hair well up from his brow.

Then light came to Philip Rayne.

"That scar on the temple! It is Carnier Leon! the man I saw two years ago on trial in Paris for the murder of his wife, and he was acquitted on a point of law!"

He would have rushed up to the altar and stayed the marriage, but as he made a move the last words were spoken, and the strains of the "Lohengrin" pealed out as the gay crowd followed the principals into the vestry.

* * * * *

It was a hard winter in Paris; so hard, that the snow through which driftways had been cut in every thoroughfare, was frozen in heaps to adamantine point.

Everything was dear (food, that is), and distress and misery stalked hand-in-hand through the poorer parts of the city, leaving behind a terrible trail of desolation and death.

The Rue des Etoiles is a small dark street in the Montmartre quarter. The houses in it are of the dreary Clerkenwell, or Pentonville, type, only flush with the pavement. The street bristles with low-class cabarets, and with shops whose wares are neither appetising nor in great quantity.

One house there was which, dirtier, and more squalid than the rest, leant forward out of the perpendicular to such an extent that it seemed a mere push from the rear of it would project it into the street.

The windows were filthy, and here and there stuffed with straw or rags. In the front room on the third floor a woman sat. There was no fire, and she looked, not alone pinched and pale with hunger, but cold-starved.

For just a week she had been tenant of this room, and now she is at the end of her resources. On the apology for a table a letter lies open. This she picks up after awhile, with a gesture of disgust, and reads:

It is in French, and translated, runs—

"My ever-loved and loving wife—Finding on my return from Marseilles that you had separated yourself from my establishment, I think it well to let you know that the arrangement suits me perfectly. As I do not intend contributing to your present domestic expenses, I should advise that you return to your English friends, who, doubtless, will be charmed to receive you. For me—well—I shall marry by-and-by; while you, in England, will have the honour of being still the wife of your most devoted—LEON DUVERNAY."

"Fiend! Fiend! Oh, Phil! Phil! if I had but listened to you!"

Yes, it is Kathie! After less than a year of such misery as she would have once thought it impossible for her to have endured.

Reason out her position she could not; she was only feeling out, in broken-hearted fashion, for some comforting voice and hand.

Then she thought she would go out.

Feverishly putting on her hat, and wrapping herself round with a big, warm cloak (almost her sole possession of any value), she descended the rickety stairs and passed out into the frost-bound street.

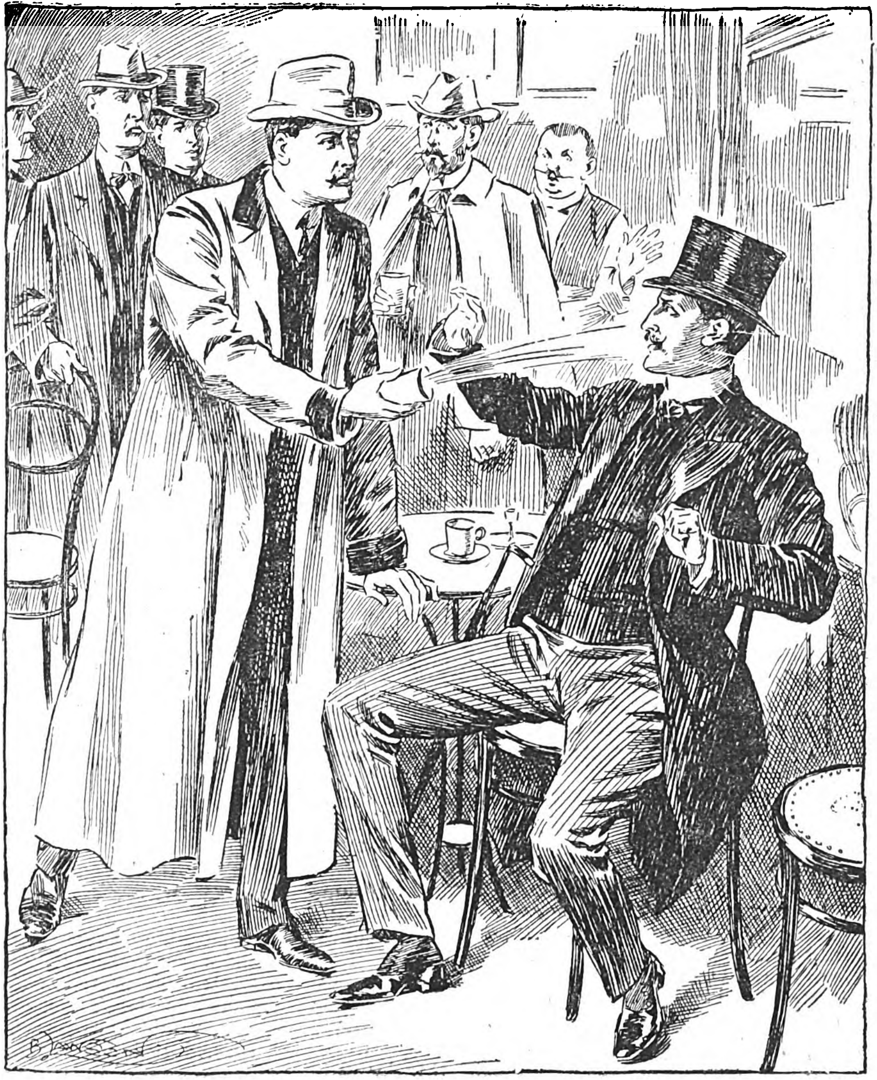
The story of her life since her marriage is both sad and short.

Duvernay had been deceived (not by Kathie) as to his English wife's means. He thought her to be rich, and when he discovered that her father was an impecunious, if not a bankrupt ex-soldier, he fairly exploded with rage.

From that moment he did his best, or worst, to make her life a burden. He taunted her with the fact of the illegality of her marriage—from a French point of view—and when she retaliated with all the spirit that was left in her—he struck her.

Ashamed to communicate the true state of things to her father, or even Philip; unable to move because kept without funds by Duvernay, she only waited the opportunity to leave him.

At last it came. Duvernay had a summons from Marseilles on pressing business. The rest we know. He was cunning enough to leave no money within reach, and her ornaments he had removed and disposed of long before. She, therefore, went out into the world of Paris—penniless (save for a dozen francs or so), and without a friend to consult with or help her.



He dashed the contents of his glass full in the Frenchman's face.

On through the white and bitter streets she went now; this letter of Duvernay's burnt into her brain.

By-and-by, after hours of wandering, she found that her steps had led her to the Seine, by the bridge of Lena.

Chilled to the bone, and ready to drop almost with fatigue and want of food, she halted by the bridge parapet, and leant against it for a moment's support.

A faint echo of footsteps on the hard ground told her of the approach of someone from the other side of the river, across the bridge.

Then a hand was laid upon her arm.

"You seem ill, madame? Can I help you in any way?"

Speak she could not, though she knew that it was Phil!—dear old Phil! honest-hearted, faithful Phil!

And he? Her face was so hidden by the enveloping cloak she was wearing, that he could not for the moment see her face. But for her weakness he would simply have pitied, and passed on.

A little cry, a half-reel, and his arm was round her to prevent her from falling. The movement disarranged the cloak, and he looked down into Kathie's face in bewildered wonderment.

It did not take many minutes to summon a passing policeman, who, for once, sympathetic (thanks, perhaps, to a good tip), procured a belated fiacre, into which the two men carefully assisted Kathie.

Telling the man to drive in the direction of his hotel, Philip Rayne did everything he could think of to rouse

Read "Dead to the World."

Kathie from the lethargic prostration into which she had fallen. The jolting of the vehicle aided him in his efforts; and presently she woke to life and to recollection.

"Phil! don't, don't leave me!" she implored him, taking his hand and shedding hot tears over it.

"No, dear! of course I will not! But tell me, where shall I take you? You must have immediate warmth and food, and——"

Then she told him all; how, save for her wretched shelter in the Rue des Etoiles, she was homeless, starving, penniless! She told him of Duvernay's cruelty; of her determination to leave him for ever; of her few months' life of misery, deceit, and agony of mind.

Philip hesitated no longer. He soothed her tenderly, and as might have a knight of old, his liege lady in distress.

He knew of good friends out Auteuil way. Bidding the cabman drive thither, he hurriedly explained matters—the simple-hearted French folk, giving of their best, and receiving Kathie as a trust from their good M'sieu Philippe.

"I will see you to-morrow," were his last words to her. "Meanwhile, get rest and peace; for you shall have no more sorrow, dear, so long as I shall live to shield you from it."

There is a certain Parisian Cafe, not far from the Palais Royale, much affected by English people of Bohemian tendencies. It is not large, it is not artistic particularly—it is just comfortable.

As a rule, the average citizen gives it a wide berth; the company does not suit him. There is too much "insular insolence," he says, and he stays away to prevent possible mischief.

This being so, the presence in the somewhat dingy place on the morning following the night of Kathie's discovery by Philip Rayne, of a tall, well-dressed Frenchman, was noticeable to habitual frequenters.

He had been there before, at long intervals, but none knew either his name or his business. He sat down at a table near the door, and ordered a cup of black coffee, and a petit verre.

There were about a dozen young men present—all, or nearly all, of them art-students. To them, five minutes after the Frenchman's entrance, was added Philip Rayne, who appeared to know everybody.

"Phil, my boy," said one, "you look transformed! What's happened to you?"

"To me? Nothing, Ernie, that I know of, except—well, that's my business."

"Oh, all right, Mr. Hush-'em-up. Keep your secret! There! never mind, Rayne—the secret is yours; the day is ours! Fill up and drink to——"

"Justice!" said Philip gravely, lifting his glass to drink.

He was within touch almost of the stranger, who watched him curiously.

As he put his glass to his lips in pledge of the toast, Philip's eyes met full those of the tall Frenchman.

What followed is talked about at "Epinays" to this day.

Springing forward, the young man looked at the other for a brief second steadily, silently, then hoarsely uttering the one word "scoundrel!" he dashed the contents of his glass fair in the Frenchman's face.

"Carnier Leon!" he cried, whipping out each word with a cracking snap, like to that made by a hunting crop in a strong man's hand. "I want no parley with you! I just want justice! You understand me!"

"You! Peste! why you are the puppy-boy! and you insult me?"

"Yes; if you will have it so."

"Oh! I want not to speak with you, but—I will fight you!"

"Messieurs! messieurs!" interrupted the anxious-eyed, fat little proprietor. "Do not, I pray you, make the quarrel 'ere!"

Philip reached out his hand and gently put the worthy restaurateur on one side.

Then, tearing out of his pocket a card, he scribbled upon it.

"I am going to kill you! Send to me your friend for a meeting to-morrow."

Duvernay, or Carnier Leon, smiled ever so sweetly.

"I will oblige you, mon cher!" was all he said, as, re-assuming his hat, he bowed to those around, and went out.

* * * * *

Early in the evening of the same day a gentleman of urbane manners, called at the Hotel Napoleon to see "Monsieur Rayne."

A brief five minutes was sufficient in which to arrange for a meeting the next morning in the wood behind the Bois.

Philip's friend, who was with him at the interview, first did his duty by seeking to persuade the other to change his purpose, and then, when he saw that to be impossible, gave his mind to the matter in hand.

Duvernay's friend was politely amenable, and a quarter of an hour after daybreak on the morrow the thing was to be.

"Will you ride with me as far as Auteuil?" asked Philip of his companion. "I want to call upon a lady there."

"Certainly! come along! You haven't much time to lose if you are to be up at three o'clock!"

* * * * *

When Philip Rayne left the Dufosse's house at Auteuil, without seeing Kathie, who was sleeping, he in no wise regretted his determination to kill the man who had wrecked his love's life, and, but for a strange circumstance, would have assuredly carried out his purpose.

He had made his will since the morning, leaving all he was possessed of to the one woman whom he loved.

Bidding "good-night" to his friend at the corner of the Rue de Rivoli, with a promise to meet him at four, he made for his hotel.

Something prompted him to put his hand in his outer side pocket—the document was gone! It was not that it was in itself valuable; it was that it might lead to suspicion, and, maybe, to a thwarting of his revenge. Where could he have dropped it? For dropped it he must have.

A further surprise awaited him at his hotel.

"Lady to see you, sir," said the English porter.

"Lady to see me! Who is it?"

"Don't know, sir. She's—here she is, sir, coming out of the manageress' room."

"Phil! Come upstairs—to your sitting-room. I must see you—must!"

"What is it?" said Philip, unable to speak almost from sheer amazement. "Tell me, dear, what has induced you to follow me here. You were asleep only an hour or so ago."

Read "Dead to the World."

"No. I was on my way here with this, which you evidently sent me in mistake for a letter this morning."

It was his will.

She pleaded with him; for her sake not to do anything which should jeopardise his life. She did not know, till he told her, of Duvernay's imminent meeting with himself.

"You must not! You shall not fight him! With sword, too! why, Phil, he is the best swordsman in all France!"

"Kathie! I am not by nature a blood-thirsty man, but Leon Duvernay—Carnier Leon, as I know him to be—is too base to live, and it is I who must kill him!"

For a moment she did not speak—a wild scheme was forming itself in her brain.

She was, herself, an old pupil of Macpherson's—could use foil and rapier as well or even better than any woman in England. Yes, she would try it.

There is nothing a woman—a true woman—will not do to shield her love, or to avenge reproach.

He told her everything; the meeting at four with his friend, and—what might be.

He thought her sudden calmness strange and incomprehensible, but attributed it to an overwrought mind.

"Phil! I will go now. Tell them to get me a cab."

"Wait here a moment, then."

The door closed, and she was alone; it was but the work of a minute to look round. A pair of swords on a side-table met her eye. Seizing one of them she swiftly concealed it about her dress. On the floor were the contents of a portmanteau tumbled out indiscriminately. A pair of cycling knickerbockers lay right on top of the motley heap. These she snatched up, secreting them inside her large cloak. Scarce had she done so when Philip returned.

"The porter has got you a cab at last," he said. "Now you must get away at once."

He went down the stairs with her and saw her drive away in the direction of Auteuil.

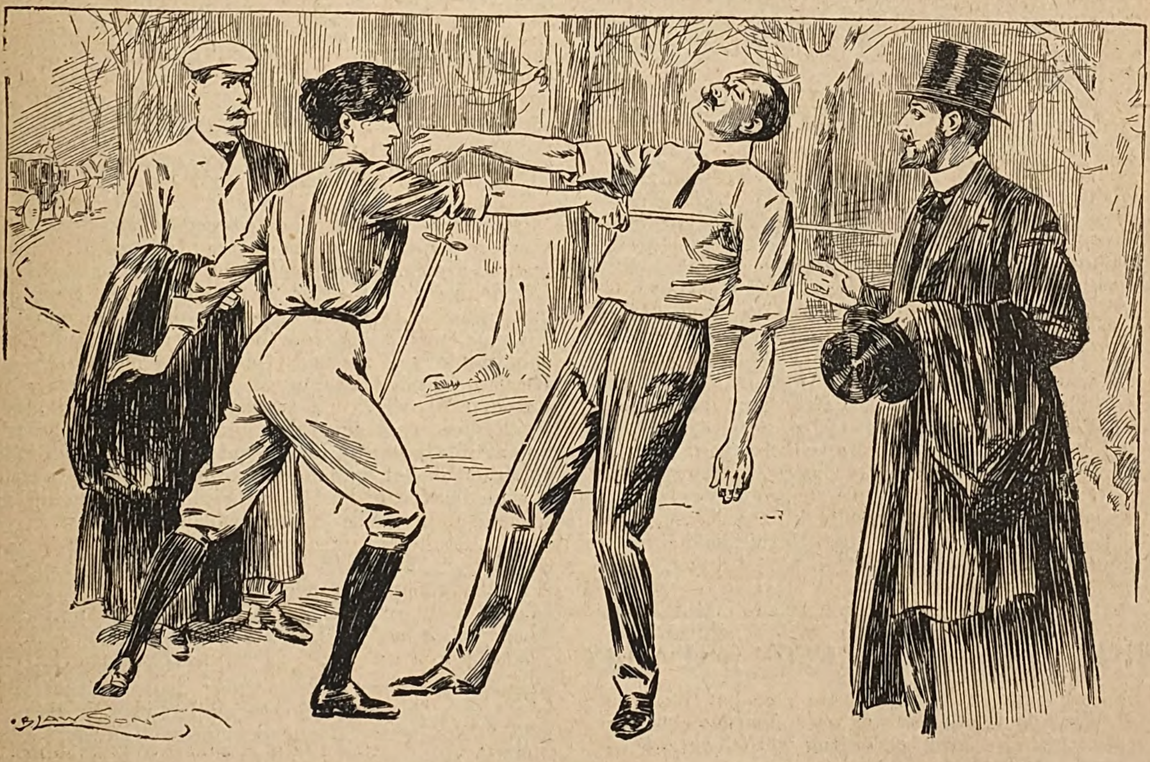
"Just four hours! four hours! I can do it, and I will—for Phil's sake, and for my own!"

He did not see that ten minutes later the cab returned, Kathie descended, had a hurried, but brief colloquy with the porter, and drove away again at top speed.

There is a spot not far from the wooded end of the Bois de Boulogne, which is much loved by the gentlemen who seek to satisfy their wounded honours with sword or pistol.

Here, a little after daybreak, two Frenchmen strolled arm-in-arm about, evidently waiting for an addition to their company.

It came. Two persons approached from the city, who bowed, and awaited preliminaries.



Kathie's weapon pierced his left shoulder to the hilt.

"But this—this is not M'sieur Rayne," said Duvernay, indicating one of the newcomers.

"Mr. Rayne has been taken seriously ill," said the one addressed, and Mr. Rayne's friend, pointing to his companion, "is here to take his place, if you agree?"

"Quite impossible! Out of all order!" said the Frenchman.

"But you will! You will! Captain Masters, see that he does not play the coward! But, perhaps, this will spur him on to fight with me!"

She (for she threw off her cloak and showed her identity) struck him smartly across the face with the flat of the blade in her hand.

Captain Masters did not like matters or approve them; but he knew the story and, could it be done safely by the outraged wife, would applaud the punishment of Duvernay.

Rapidly divesting himself of his coat, and snatching the weapon from his second's hand, the bully initiated the most extraordinary duel ever fought in France or elsewhere.

It was not long.

Duvernay's rage had weakened his arm.

At the sixth pass he seemed to go blindly out to meet Kathie's weapon, which pierced his left shoulder to the hilt.

If her opponent was in a sad case, Kathie was not in much better. For she fainted.

Captain Masters, sorry now for his share in the business, and dreading, too, what Philip would say, raised her and, whistling three times, placed her in the carriage that answered his call.

He looked out of the window as they drove off, and saw Duvernay stretched upon the ground, his head in his second's lap.

* * * * *

When matters were cleared up, just before Kathie, escorted by Philip, embarked at Dieppe, it came out, on confession, that the girl had bribed the hotel porter to lock Philip's door as soon as she was gone. This accounted for his non-appearance on the ground. A hurried visit to Autieul; a return just in time to meet Captain Masters at four, and the reader knows the rest.

* * * * *

"It was very wrong and very foolish of you, dear," said Philip on the deck of the steamer; "and perhaps, as a punishment, I ought not to tell you that the moment before sailing I received a wire, which stated that Duvernay will live, but, for reasons best known to the French Government, at its sole charge and expense for the rest of his natural existence."

"Thank God!" was all that Kathie said; but to Philip it told all he wanted to know.

SHE: "Why does a woman take a man's name when she gets married?" HE: "Why does she take everything else he has?"

SAID an Irishman the other day to a friend, "Arrah, where will you find a modern building that has lasted so long as the ould was!"

PHRENOLOGIST: "Boy, you have a remarkable memory." Boy: "Please, sir, write it on a slip of paper so's I shan't forget it."

NELL: "I believe that people should always marry their opposites." Belle: "I thought you seemed very much interested in the young man who lives across the street from you."

GENTLEMAN (to house agent): "The great disadvantage is that the house is so damp." House Agent: "Disadvantage, sir? Advantage, I call it. In case of fire it wouldn't be so likely to burn."

DOCTOR: "There's nothing serious the matter with Michael, Mrs. Muldoon. I think a little soap and water will do him as much good as anything." Mrs Muldoon: "Yis, doctor; an' will Oi give it t'him befoor or afther his males?"

HE had called on a swell physician, and reported that he was "knocked out generally." As he took the prescription he said: "Well, doctor, what do I owe you?" "A guinea." "I'm sorry I can't pay you to-day. You won't mind waiting awhile, will you?" "No, that's all right." "And, doctor, how much will this prescription cost?" "About five shillings." "You couldn't lend me five shillings to get it with, could you? I'm dead broke." "Let me look at that prescription again," said the physician. He took it, examined it, and erased a line. "I had prescribed something for your nerve," he said, "but I see you don't need it."

HE begged a kiss. She frowned meditatively. "A kiss," she cried, "is an expression of sentiment. Placed upon the hand, it signifies respect; upon the forehead, friendship; upon the lips, both—and more. Since you have asked it, you may express yourself in one kiss. Proceed." He hesitated. Through respect and friendship love may be reached. If he were too bold, she—— He still hesitated. He gazed down into the grass and pondered swiftly. He tried to read her mood. He would place that one kiss upon her—— He heard a trill as of many birds and looked up. She was whistling softly. Her hat was pulled down to her eyes, covering her forehead, and her hands were thrust deep into the pockets of her jacket. The problem was solved.

HE carefully prepared the small garden plot, while his wife deeply interested in his labours, stood watching him. After he had put in the seeds and smoothed over the bed, his wife took his arm to accompany him to the house, and on the way she asked: "When will the seeds come up, John?" He was one of those men who take pleasure in saying a smart thing when the opportunity offers, so laying his hand caressingly on her shoulder, he said: "I don't expect them to come up at all, Maria." "You don't!" she exclaimed; "then why have you gone to all that trouble?" With the smile that springs from superior knowledge, he answered: "The seeds won't come up, but the flowers will by-and bye." But he was wrong, for his neighbour's hens got into his garden that day, and the seeds did come up.

DEAD TO THE WORLD

Henry T. Johnson.

Author of "Cruce Vincit," "The Pride of the Ring," etc., etc.

SYNOPSIS OF FIRST CHAPTERS.

Richard Seldon, a convict, escapes. In a train he meets Cyril Roylance just back from Australia, whom he murders and impersonates. He assumes the rôle of squire, and pays attention to Doris Dale. One day he encounters two old criminal acquaintances and agrees to meet them.

One night two of Seldon's criminal acquaintances break into Squire Dale's house, where he is staying, and with his assistance murder the butler who had recognised him as an impostor. To deceive the Dales Seldon so arranges his room that it has the appearance of being the scene of a violent struggle. With his revolver he puts some shots through his clothes, one of them grazing his arm. He hints to Doris that the butler's murderer and his own assailant is none other than her lover, Jack Branscombe. An inquest is held on the butler's body.

"This is a rum start," he muttered, scratching his short-cropped head. "Oh, I'll ask the question, certainly, at all events I'll get the lawyer to, whether there's anything in it or not. It seems funny; shall I mention it to Mr. Roylance? No, I don't think I will, at all events not yet, I'll wait till the inquest's over. Nice chap, Roylance; somehow something about him, the look of his eyes, or is it the tone of his voice, seems so familiar to me, but, of course, it's only a fancy. I've never been to Australia, and he's only been back here, so to speak, five minutes since he was a little nipper."

"I think they're ready for us upstairs," said the Squire, returning. "Now, inspector, shall you and I have just one more glass of port?"

"You're very good, sir, and it ain't a bad wine. It ain't up to that in your cellar, sir. Ah! a City alderman's port I call that. It's very little I take, but a nice crusted tawny port with a nice bouquet of beeswing I must confess, that's my weakness."

"And a very good one too," said the Squire. "We all have our weaknesses; there's nothing like a good selection even in weaknesses. Here's a jolly good health, and when you go back to town I'll have a dozen of that port wine put up for you, if you'll accept it."

The Inspector's eyes twinkled and the Inspector's lips instinctively smacked as, following the Squire up-stairs, he soliloquised:

"No mistake about it, you can't beat 'em, English country gentlemen; they are the people. this chap's as good as they can make 'em. And somehow something about him does seem to bring back old times."

* * * * *

Harcourt Dale, looking in at the sitting-room occupied by his daughter, said, patting her shoulder reassuringly:

"It's a dreadful business, Doris, but this part of it will be over directly, and I don't think they'll call you."

"Oh, father," she said, "of course, it's very dreadful, even for us, but I'm thinking of the poor, dear fellow we've lost." Looking out of the window, she gazed with some curiosity at a group of decent-looking men with serious faces emerging from a store-house and trooping across the stable-yard.

A shudder went through her as her father whispered: "The jury, dear, they're going back to the court after—the view."

"Doris, my child," he went on anxiously, "you must have a glass of wine or something." Then to the maid: "Get your mistress some brandy, liqueur brandy, tell them the best."

And then, glad of an opportunity to divert the poor child's mind from the topic, he said suddenly:

"By the bye, Doris, I have something of yours that was picked up by Bell on the stairs the night of—this affair." It seemed one couldn't get away from that topic.

She looked up with languid interest.

"Yes, it's off your châtelaine; you must be more careful, dear, you know your mother kept it for many, many years, and I'm sure you wouldn't like to lose it."

And he handed towards her the gold locket—her love gift to Jack Branscombe.

"Where was it found—when?" she asked after a long, to her a frightful pause.

"On the staircase; Bell picked it up just as we were ascending from the pantry to the guest-room after we'd found—poor Barker."

Then she heard him aright! It had been found there after the murder! What could it mean?

"Evidently it got caught in something and the link snapped, that châtelaine frippery of yours is so slight and insecure; and yet, by Jove! the ring of it's all right, and there's a link to it, a link one would think had been part of a substantial chain, quite different in size and pattern to your châtelaine chain. What's the matter, Doris? Oh, my dear, all this business has been too much for you. Here, come along, Bell, make haste with that brandy. Doris, you must drink this, I insist."

There was a tap at the door.

"You are called, sir," said an attendant, and Harcourt Dale followed the man to the big club-room wherein the coroner sat holding his court. Duly sworn, Dale deposed to having been awakened by the screams and shouts of his servants, the noise of revolver firing, and the falling of furniture in the guest-chamber, generally called the Royal Room, then the discovery of poor Barker's body. The jury, in answer to the coroner, intimated that they desired to put no questions to Mr. Dale. The solicitor representing the relatives of the deceased stated that they had no questions to ask Mr. Harcourt Dale, and his clients, in confirmation of that statement, made Mr. Harcourt Dale their respective and respectful bows and courtesies. The coroner intimated it would be unnecessary for him to trouble Mr. Harcourt Dale with any further questions, everybody knew what a faithful servant the deceased had been and what a kind master he had served, and he felt sure he was expressing the feelings of the jury in saying that he sympathised, not only with the relatives of the deceased, but with the family and household at Dalehurst Grange in this sad affliction, whereupon the gentlemen of the jury murmured unanimously "Hear, hear," and the public at the back of the room indulged in an appreciative tattoo with their feet and sticks upon the floor. Then the coroner said: "Call——"

But the solicitor, watching the proceedings on behalf of the police authorities, rose and intimated that, with permission, he would like to put one or two questions to Mr. Harcourt Dale, and Mr. Harcourt Dale, just on the point of leaving the witness-stand, halted and bowed courteously.

"After finding the body of the deceased in the pantry, where next did you go, Mr. Dale?"

"I returned to the Royal Room to see how Mr. Roylance was progressing."

"And how did you go there?"

"Well, I went upstairs."

"Alone?"

"No, attended by Mary Bell, my daughter's maid."

"Do you remember observing anything on your way upstairs?"

"No," after a pause.

"Try and remember?"

"I can't think of anything of importance."

"Was anything found?"

"Oh, yes; Bell picked up a gold locket that belonged to my daughter, but I don't recollect anything relating to the case occurring."

"What became of that locket?"

"I took possession of it."

"What did you do with it?"

"I returned it to my daughter."

"When?"

"As a matter of fact, about five minutes ago. I forgot all about it till, happening to be wearing the same waistcoat, I discovered it in my pocket just now."

"Thank you! That will do."

The next witness called was Mary Bell, a smart, neatly-dressed young person with the brand of respectability all over her. Her evidence was a mere repetition of Mr. Harcourt Dale's, and when the solicitor instructed by the police rose to question her there was a little flutter of curiosity.

"You remember picking up a gold locket on the stairs?"

"Yes, sir."

"You recognised it as having belonged to your mistress?"

"Oh, yes, sir."

"Your master took it?"

"Yes, sir."

"Thank you, that will do."

And the wonder widened and deepened. What had the gold locket to do with the case?

Doris Dale, seated in the private sitting-room of the Seven Bells, asked herself again and again what was the meaning of it. The finding of her locket, the locket—her love gift to Jack—on the stairs, and on that night of all nights. Could her father be mistaken? Then she recalled to mind Cyril Roylance's wild, strange words, his assertion that he identified one of his assailants, that he would not reveal that identity—for her sake! Her father entered, looking somewhat annoyed.

"Doris, dear, you are called after all. It's very annoying, but it can't be helped. There's a lawyer down from town watching the matter for the police, and he's evidently got some bee in his bonnet. I'm sure it's a mare's nest, but anyway you've got to give evidence."

There was a buzz, a sensation, when Doris Dale entered the crowded room, took her place at the witness-stand, and, taking off her dainty glove, held up the prettiest white hand in the world while the oath was administered; but it was noticed that her face was deadly pale, and there were those, who, comparing notes afterwards, spoke of the scared look in her beautiful, doe-grey eyes. She was courteously requested to be seated, and only the merest formal questions were put to her by the coroner, the solicitor for the relatives stating that he had none to ask whatever. Then interest intensified as the London lawyer rose.

"Miss Dale, your father has just told us that he has quite recently, in fact, within the last half-hour, handed you a locket he and your maid found on the stairs immediately after the discovery of the murder."

Doris bowed assent.

"Will you produce that locket?"

Doris held out the trinket. The lawyer, turning to Mary Bell and Harcourt Dale, inquired:

"That is the locket you found on the stairs, and, if necessary you will swear to its identity?" and they nodded affirmatively.

"Now, Miss Dale, how long was that locket in your possession?"

"For many years; my mother gave it to me when I was quite a little girl. Oh, quite twelve years ago!"

"When did you lose it?"

"I—I didn't lose it." The little white hand tightened on the wooden arm of the chair.

"Have the goodness to tell the jury under what circumstances you parted with it?"

"I gave it away."

"When?"

The lawyer's face was set as a fencer's.

"A fortnight ago."

"And you have never seen it since until to-day?"

"Not until within this hour."

"Now, Miss Dale, I ask you, to whom did you give this gold locket?"

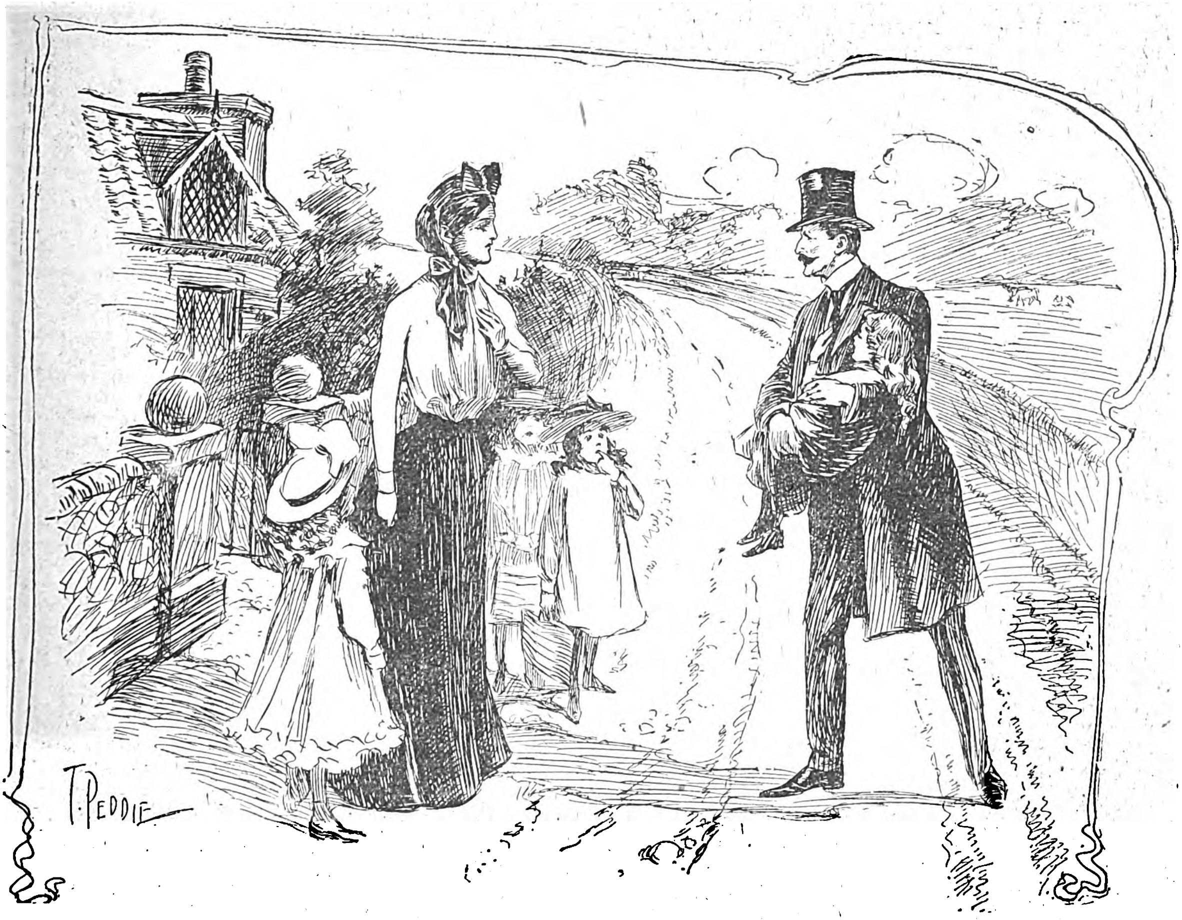
There was a hush; one could hear the scratching pens and pencils.

"I would prefer not to say."

"You must say."

"May I write down the name?"

"No; I want that name spoken aloud in the hearing



"So you are the governess of the village school?" he said. "We just now almost had an accident with one of your little pupils."

of the jury and of this open court, and, with all due respect to you, it is my duty to insist."

Then there was another hush; this time even the pens were still, and faces were turned towards that oval, white one, framed in brown hair.

"I gave it to Mr. John Branscombe, of the Abbey Farm."

There was an exclamation of amazement, almost of dismay, and the spell was broken; not even the coroner's officer's "Silence!" could stop the rustle of the women's tongues. It was true then, there was something between them, they had always said so. But what on earth could he have been doing there on the night of the murder? It was a strange world, and you never knew people till they were found out, and everybody had been wondering, and nobody could understand, how a youngster like him, farming only a matter of fifteen hundred acres, could live up to the style Handsome Jack had been affecting.

"When did you last see Mr. Branscombe, and where?" This was the next question, and Doris replied she had last seen Jack Branscombe on the road to the flower show, and that they had exchanged bows without speaking. And with this question poor Doris' ordeal ceased, and Cyril Roylance was called to take her place at the witness stand. The interest in the case grew more absorbing every moment. The introduction of Jack Branscombe's name had added a new and startling feature to it, and a new witness, practically the principal witness, was listened to with the most rapt attention.

He gave his evidence with the utmost self-possession. He stated that he had not been awakened by the entry of the robbers, though he knew they had come in through his room from finding the shutter removed and the window broken. He had been in the open air nearly all day and had sat late with his friend, therefore he had slept soundly. What had awakened him had been the sound of a struggle and a heavy fall below, and just as he was springing up to ascertain the cause the ruffians re-entered the room carrying, so far as he could make out in the darkness, a bundle. He seized one of them, and they struggled, when the other felled him to the ground with what seemed a short iron instrument; nevertheless, he continued to hold his man, and the other, after a torrent of imprecations and threats, fired a revolver point-blank at him at close range. No: none of the bullets took effect except that one scorched and grazed his forearm. He attributed the fault of the aim to the fact that he and the assailant's comrade were struggling desperately and the risk of hitting the latter. Yes; the moon remained nearly dark. He couldn't succeed in reaching the switch, but there was a gleam of moonlight just through the open shutter. Would he know the assailant? Oh, yes; he was certain as to one of them. Had he ever see that one before?

The witness looked steadily and directly towards Doris Dale for some moments and answered emphatically, "No!"

"But the other; did you see his face?"

"No; by the time that man reached the open window he, witness, had almost gone off with the pain of his wound and exhaustion." The witness before standing down was warmly complimented by the coroner on the courage and promptitude he had displayed, and received congratulations from the same source on his escape from further injury.

He then stood down, and Edward Fletcher was called. Considerable interest attached to Fletcher's appearance, insomuch as it appeared that he was summoned at the instance of the police authorities, and it was the London lawyer who rose to examine him. Excitement increased as he related how, walking along the Fallowfield road shortly after midnight on his way to the plantation known as Brindle's Coppice, he observed John Branscombe reconnoitring his own house, known as the Abbey Farm.

"How was he attired?"

"Well, as if for walking or travelling, he was wearing an ulster and a billycock." This would be, according to the evidence, about an hour after the murder.

"Then," said the coroner, addressing the lawyer from London, "it appears to me that your line of evidence points to a prima facie case against John Branscombe. Have the police taken any steps towards his arrest?"

"They have," replied the lawyer, breaking the intense stillness of the court, "but ineffectually; Mr. Branscombe, as a matter of fact, being absent from his house this morning."

On hearing this those in court looked, nodded, and whispered to each other more significantly than ever. And then the London lawyer added he should call Detective-Inspector Rossiter of the Criminal Investigation Department, and on his evidence he intended to asked for a coroner's warrant for Branscombe's arrest.

Doris sat like one in a dream; indeed, she felt convinced it could be nothing but a dream as she listened to the strange story told by the brisk, alert man with roving eyes, who stood there, his note-book in his hand, answering questions graver, more dreadful than any that had yet been put. In a strange, stupefied daze she heard him tell of wheel tracks traced close to the Abbey Farm, of footprints on the flower bed beneath the window of the room known to be slept in by John Branscombe, and she heard the outburst of exclamations of horror as the officer, reserving like a skilled dramatist his greatest sensation till just before the fall of the curtain, detailed the finding in a laurel bush, just beyond that grass plot, of the big, blunt, iron chisel, which he then and there produced with the blood stains still upon it.

Oh! it must be all a dream, she reasoned, and yet, she couldn't wake, she couldn't wake!

Not even when she heard the jury declare as their verdict that John William Barker had been wilfully murdered by John Branscombe and the coroner granting the warrant for the arrest of the latter.

And yet she felt it couldn't be true; it was too terrible. It must be a dream, a dreadful nightmare, only—she couldn't wake, and she would have given worlds to wake!

CHAPTER XIII.

"And Yet, How Like!"

The man who called himself Cyril Roylance drove back to Fallowfield Hall fairly satisfied with the turn of events. "Yes, Richard, my boy!" he mused. "You look like annexing the Doris Dale stakes now; at all events, the favourite's scratched. It's a bit rough on that young fool, but that can't be helped; most people have bad luck who play cross purposes with Tiger Dick. I wish he'd bolt. I'm not over partial to this rubbing shoulders, even in a new capacity, with juries and magistrates, detectives, police, and that class of people, and, by Jingo! they little know who they're so mighty polite to just now. But no, no; why on earth do I let my mind drift back, it's all right as it is. I'm Cyril Roylance I am—I am—I will be—and Dick Seldon, bad, mad Dick Seldon is dead to the world! If only those two men were dead too!"

And in his mind vague possibilities and designs began to weave themselves. Presently he heard the rattle of dogcart wheels alongside, pulled the check string, and leant out of his brougham door. Inspector Rossiter, whom Fletcher was driving over to Hazelwick, also pulled up.

"By Jove, Rossiter," said the man in the brougham, "you've done your work awfully well."

The detective beamed with conscious merit.

"Well, sir," he answered, "I think I've got this case up in a business-like sort of way; bit of a surprise for 'em, wasn't it, sir, at the finish, came with a bit of a bang, eh?"

"Like a thunderbolt."

"I was very sorry for the young lady, sir."

"Yes, it was a bit of a trial for her."

"Yes, it would be under ordinary circumstances, but a good deal of my game's reading between the lines, you know, and I'm pretty certain there's a regular real love story there, at all events on her side. Pity such a nice girl should like such a scamp."

"Yes," replied the other, with a darkened brow and a cauldron of hatred seething and bubbling up in his heart anew against the man whose life he was doing his worst and deadliest to blight, because of that very love story that was so patent to all. "But he'll suffer for his presumption in the end."

"Oh, I don't blame him for that," said Rossiter. "Miss Dale's the sort of young lady I could forgive any young fellow for falling in love with; it's not being worth such a nice girl caring for him that he's to blame for. But there, there, it's astonishing what good women are very often head over ears in love with bad men. Talk about a problem!"

"Yes," replied the other, complacently twirling his moustache, "it is rather odd, when you come to think of it, the good luck a bad lot sometimes has with the girls."

"Rather. Why! there was a man I used to know, dead and gone now, Tiger Dick they used to call him, something, excuse me, your style, sir, only clean shaved and he didn't wear any eyeglass, got the eye of an eagle, Dick had. Well, do you know during that man's career there were women, swell women——"

"Ah, yes, but excuse me, Inspector, I must have that interesting history another time over a glass of port and the walnuts at the Hall before you go back to town. I have some people coming to dinner. By the bye, if you arrest Branscombe you'll let me know, won't you? I suppose you'll nab him shortly?"

The detective smiled significantly in eloquent silence.

"I wonder," the other went on, "you didn't, having regard to the cards you played so well this afternoon, arrest him on suspicion and bring him up at the inquest."

Is your photo on page 590?

"Um! yes," Rossiter smiled complacently. "I dare-say it looked like that from the outside, only you see, Mr. Roylance, my best trump cards didn't happen to be in my hand till about five minutes before I played them. Why, sir, when I was having a glass of wine with you at the Seven Bells I'd no more idea of connecting Mr. John Branscombe, of the Abbey Farm, with the murder of John Barker than I should have had of connecting—well, say yourself with it."

"By Jove! really wonderful!" said the other, and the detective drew himself up like a bird preening its feathers when spoken prettily to.

"Not but what," he went on confidentially, his air of reticence relaxing, "if he'd happened to have been in the neighbourhood I'd have had him up even then before the court rose, only he went away three days ago, no doubt, when we know all the story, to get rid of some of the stuff."

"Where?"

"That's what we've got to find out and will find out. He left no address, even at the farm—don't that strengthen the chain, Mr. Roylance?"

"So far as circumstantial evidence goes," replied the other, watching the smoke lazily curling from the cigar between his fingers, "there doesn't seem to be a link wanting."

"No, sir," replied Rossiter briskly, "all that is wanting is for two of the links to be closed," and as he spoke he produced from his jacket pocket a pair of glittering handcuffs.

And as the man in the brougham looked at those, the cigar between his fingers for a moment shook.

"Ah," laughed the Inspector, "there is something creepy about the bracelets, ain't there, sir—to them as ain't used to 'em."

"Have you any clue?" asked the other man with a somewhat forced smile.

"Well, of course, I mustn't say too much, even to a gentleman like you, sir; but I fancy I shall as soon as he is in touch with one or more of his pals."

"I wonder who on earth they are?"

"I'd give something to know that, sir, but I fancy I shall somehow before long. Between you and me, I should think one of 'em is a bit dissatisfied about the way they divided the swag or something; or perhaps they've had a row over a girl. You know it's all rot about honour amongst thieves, that don't pass muster in Scotland Yard, we know 'em too well."

"So you think there's a split in the camp, eh? What makes you think that?"

"Well, in confidence, Mr. Roylance, one or two of those questions that I had put, and one or two searches I had made were inspired, and inspired by somebody who knows more about the murder of John Barker than you or I do."

The other man blew the long, low whistle of astonishment.

"Well, anyway, Inspector, I'm glad the case is in such clever hands. Have a cigar?"

"One of yours with pleasure, sir. If I might make bold to say it, your weeds and your wines are, like yourself, first quality. Good day, sir," and as Rossiter spun along puffing and inhaling the exquisite flavour of the perfect Havana, he soliloquised:

"One of the right sort, that man, class all over!"

Meantime, the subject of that probation, leaning back in his brougham puffing thoughtfully at his cigar, soliloquised:

"Gently does it, my friend Richard; you mustn't get too near the edge. So he's spotted the likeness, has he? Well, what of that? Tiger Dick's dead to him, dead to the world; only Scotland Yard says honour among thieves is all a fairy tale; by Jove! if only those two low-down scoundrels were as dead to the world as Tiger Dick."

CURED OF ASTHMA.

The Testimony of a Patient who was CURED of Asthma of 6 years' standing.

For about six years I suffered from violent attacks of Asthma, which were more severe at night. I had often to sit up in bed; my breathing and cough were so bad I thought I should suffocate, having also had pains in my head, the attacks lasting generally an hour, and coming on two or three times in a night, and always in the morning. I had a rattling and wheezing in my chest most of the time. I read in a paper of your cure, and then applied to you, and after following your directions I slept well at nights, breathing became easier and the night attacks entirely ceased. I shall recommend your Treatment to all who suffer from Asthma, as I think it must cure if the directions are fully carried out.—MARTHA TOMLINSON.

CURABLE

The carriage whizzed along through Fallowfield village, and suddenly its occupant was startled by a violent shock and the plunging of the horse, that for a moment had been pulled on to its haunches. Flinging open the door he at a glance ascertained the cause of the excitement. Out of the gate of the village school the children had come romping, shouting, laughing, and singing, and one tiny mite had darted right in front of the horse's forelegs and then, suddenly perceiving her danger, twisted, slipped, and fallen, and the rest had set up a scream.

Just in time, fortunately, the coachman had pulled the horse on to its haunches and swerved it aside. In less time than it takes to tell, the occupant of the carriage had leapt out and snatched up the child.

"Now, now," he said, "you're not hurt, you know, so don't cry, there's a good little girl, and you know you must look where you're going. Now don't bullyrag them, Warren, it's their nature to."

"You careless little ones! I'm always warning you." At the sound of that voice the man with the child still in his arms turned and stood face to face with a woman dressed quietly in grey, her bands of beautiful silky, bright brown hair neatly folded in massive coils, and half-concealed in a neat grey bonnet. A pair of big long-lashed violet eyes were fixed on him with all their gaze, and the colour had swiftly flown from a pair of comely cheeks. She stood there for a moment, her hand upon her heart, as though seized with a sudden spasm.

And he too stood there regarding her with all his eyes as though for the moment transfigured to stone.

"Oh, sir!" cried two or three of the children volubly, "this is our governess. Governess, this is the new Squire, and he's just picked Minnie Bartlett right from under the horse's feet, and he's given her a whole sixpence."

"So you are the governess of the village school?" he said. "We just now almost had an accident with one of your little pupils, but she's all right now, aren't you, Minnie?"

"Yeth, thir! thank you, thir!"

"And you're going to be a good little girl, and never run under horses' feet any more, aren't you?"

"Yeth, thir; pleathe, thir."

"May I ask your name?" he asked, transferring his little burden to the governess' arms, although the little burden had made herself quite comfortable.

"My name," was the reply, "is Mary Morrison."

"Thank you," he said, "and mine is Cyril Roylance, of Fallowfield Hall. I am pleased to have met you. Good afternoon," and lifting his hat, he re-entered his carriage, and the woman stood there with indrawn breath and contracted brows watching the rapidly receding vehicle and murmuring:

"Oh! how like—how like, in face, in form, in manner, in voice—and yet of course it can't be—no—no—it can't be he, he's dead, dead to the world."

CHAPTER XIV.

Branscombe's Narrow Escape.

"Jack! Jack! Oh, wherever have you been?"

"To London, Doris."

"Where have you been these dreadful three days?"

Again they stood at the lych-gate leading from the high road to the nut coppice, in the shadow of the trees.

"Oh, where have you been?" she moaned piteously.

"To London, Doris, hunting high and low for the friend I spoke of, the old school chum in Orders whom I went especially to ask to steer me through the red tape and routine of getting the special license and to promise to marry us. You see, I couldn't ask Hastie to risk his position at Fallowfield. And, oh yes; one other thing I've been doing, I've booked our passages for New York."

"Oh, Jack! but when did you do this?"

"Yesterday."

"But haven't you heard the news, the awful news; the county's ringing with it."

"The country's ringing with it," he said in a dazed tone. "I learnt the news last night just by chance, happening to hear my name on the lips of some strangers reading the extra special 'Evening News' at a neighbouring supper table in a restaurant, too late to return or wire."

"And I couldn't send to you, Jack; no one knew where you were, and they've found a weapon in your garden, a man saw you entering your house two hours after midnight, your sudden and secret departure that same morning, all these points have been taken against you; and oh, Jack! there's a verdict against you."

"I know! I can see," he answered in a wild, agonized tone. "Every step I have taken has helped to accuse me. I am as innocent as a child unborn, as the dead in their grave; but it has all pieced in like a mosaic, picturing my guilt in outline and in detail."

"And, Jack, you know what they found in the shrubbery in the laurel bushes outside your window?"

"Yes, I read it all coming down from town to-day; and I fear I did another foolish thing. I alighted at Mattingham instead of coming on to Hazelwick. I thought," and his voice grew hoarse and he seemed to speak the words with pain and difficulty, "I'd like to see you and talk things over before—before they took me. Oh, my poor darling!" and he groaned.

"But, Jack," she whispered, looking up into his face with a wild, staring look, "what do you think of doing?"

"First and foremost," he said firmly, with, so it seemed, all his manhood and self-reliance coming back to him, "I set you free. There can be no promise and no pledge between us until my name is freed from the stain, even the shadow of the stain of suspicion now defacing it. And next, I go straight to the police, surrender to this false charge, and face it."

"No, no!" she cried. "Whether by chance or evil design, there is a web around you, a web so fatally complete that, walking straight into its meshes, you would be foredoomed. I know you are innocent, love's own true instinct tells me; but in the eyes of the world, my poor, dear Jack, you are guilty. The world, so prompt and prone to judge, has found you guilty in the world's own wilful way before trial; the busybodies are putting together piece by piece that mosaic you spoke of, forming in the concrete that pattern of suspicion in the abstract. Oh, Jack! I won't let you go, I won't let you be branded with the stigma of arrest. You must wait, Jack, wait to give us time to think; and, while you are waiting, I will work and will unweave those threads, those circumstantial threads out of which they are trying to make the strands of the rope to hang you by!"

Could this be Doris, tender, gentle, girlish Doris, this woman vibrate with strong purpose, with dilating nostrils, flashing eyes, and breast heaving to the deep breaths on which her words surged out?

Even while she was speaking they started at the sound of horses' hoofs. Round the bend of the lane they saw the dark shadow of a horseman, another man walking at his bridle.

"The patrol!" whispered Doris, "quick, Jack, you must hide!"

There was no time to argue or reason, even to think. Clasping her arms round him, she half-led, half-dragged him, inside the gate and into the ambush of shrubs lining the narrow path it led to.

Short Stories That . . . . . . Make You Laugh.

We devote every week space in Short Stories to pithy, humorous anecdotes similar to those which appear in these columns. A prize of £1 1s. will be sent to the reader who submits the best storyette this week, and a P.W. penknife to each of those whose attempts are used. The anecdotes may be either original or selected; in the latter case, the source MUST be stated. Attempts must reach the Storyette Editor, Short Stories Office, Henrietta Street, Strand, London, W.C., by Monday, November 11th. Post-cards only, please. The prize of £1 1s. has been awarded this week to Mr. Ernest Franks, of 31 Plaistow Road, West Ham, Essex, whose contribution is denoted by a star thus.*

TARDY ARRIVAL AT A DINNER PARTY: "I am afraid I am too late, dear Mrs. Smith." Mrs. Smith (effusively): "Oh, dear, no, you could never come too late."

OLD LADY (suffering from hiccough): "Young man, I want—hic—to get some liquor—hic——" Chemist: "We don't sell intoxicating liquors here; besides, madam, I think you have had enough alrea——" Old Lady (frigidly): "Some liquorice—hic——"

"REMEMBER, children," said the teacher, "that even the hairs of your head are all numbered." "What's the number of this?" asked a smart boy, at the same time pulling a hair from his head. "Number one, Johnny," said the teacher, "and these" (pulling out a few more) "are numbers two, three, four, five, and six. Anything else you want to know?" "Not now, mum," said the smart boy, rubbing his head.

WE were watching an exciting finish for the Cesarewitch, between Balsarrock and Black Sand, the former winning by half-a-length. There was a wild cheer, and simultaneously I felt my hat lifted off my head from behind, and, looking up, saw my headgear spinning many yards high in the air. I turned round to resent the liberty, when a buxom Yorkshire lass behind me exclaimed: "Aa beg tha pardon, lad, fur usin' thi hat sa freely, but Aa couldn't git marne fro' mi heaad 'caus o' t' pins."

HE had come from the country to his first ball, and was more than a little—surprised, shall we say?—at the immateriality of the ladies' dresses. "What do you think of me?" asked his charming little cousin, "is not my dress lovely?" "It's very—er—simple," responded the young man with caution. "Simple! I've a good mind to shake you for that, you unkind thing. Do you know what this dress cost? Why, thirty golden sovereigns wouldn't cover it." He looked at her steadily with his frank, blue eyes, and stroked his chin. "Well, perhaps not," he agreed, "but I should say thirty-one would if they were spread out well."

* THEY were a happy young couple from Highworth, and were on their way to Cumberland. They had to change trains at Preston, and an obliging porter, whilst struggling with their luggage, made mental note of the fact that the young lady's hair was dotted with rice. Presently he approached the glad young man, and, pulling a folded paper from a pocket, said: "There's a present for you, sir, with the company's compliments." "Indeed!" said the traveller. "What is it?" "A railway map, sir." "Oh, thank you. And what are these marks in blue pencil?" "There's the beauty of it, sir," said the smiling porter. "Those marks show just where the tunnels are, and their length."

IN a country school near Glasgow, an amusing incident happened the other day. The teacher, as in duty bound, was inveighing against smoking, and lecturing his class on the evils attending it. Suddenly he saw a grin overspreading the faces of his scholars, and on inquiring the cause an innocent young cherub yelled out: "Please, sir, your pipe's sticking out of your pocket." The smoking lecture was curtailed.

"MARRYING a man," observed the Philosophical Girl, "is strangely like buying a piece of china-ware. It may have a break or a flaw in it that you cannot see when you buy it, but time reveals it. So time brings to light the hidden flaws in the man's character and shows just what kind of matrimonial bargain one has made." "But there is no need of buying a piece of china with a break in it," said the Disputatious Girl. "One can always test it to see if it rings true." "Yes," sighed the other, "but in the case of marrying, you know, it is always the man who does the ringing."

"DON'T want any," said a London housekeeper from her second-story window to a street vendor, whose waggon was standing a few steps away, and who had just pulled the bell. "Don't want any what?" gruffly asked the arab, who hadn't had even a chance to tell what his wares were. "What have you got?" asked the housekeeper, whose curiosity was getting the better of her annoyance. "Oh, never mind. You don't want any. Git up, Bob!" "Now, I wonder what that exasperating man is selling, anyhow?" she exclaimed, as the waggon disappeared round the corner.

THE conversation in the village inn the other evening turned on angling. "Funny thing about that salmon Brown caught last Tuesday," said Jones the tailor. "In what way?" queried several of those present. "Well," replied Jones, "he went out angling on Monday and lost his spectacles in the river. On Tuesday he went out again, hooked a fine fish, and after a tough struggle succeeded in landing it." "Well, there's nothing funny about that," interposed several voices. "No; I don't think there is," continued Jones, "but the funny thing about the fish is that it was actually wearing Brown's spectacles when the latter landed it, see!" The subject thereupon was promptly changed.

A MAN entered a pawnbroker's shop in a village near Barnsley and laid on the counter a pair of bronze ornaments, at sight of which an exclamation of surprised delight bubbled to the manager's lips. "Here's a stroke of luck!" he reflected, instantly resuming his customary mask of apathy. "How often, I wonder, has my wife vowed that she'd give her ears for a pair of bronzes like that? I'll buy them out and out, no matter what they cost me." So he started a deal with the man, and secured the bronzes, after twenty minutes' haggling, for a five-pound note. Then, flushed with triumph, he carried his purchase home, and was welcomed with outstretched arms by his little wife. "Oh, Harry, how good of you to bring them!" she exclaimed, kissing him warmly. "The man in the market-place actually wanted a sovereign for them and wouldn't give me credit; so I conceived the bright idea of sending him to you for the money. I knew you would beat him down to a more reasonable figure, you old darling; you're such a wonderful bargain-maker!" And the poor manager, directly he could get away, went to his room and pommeled the punching-ball for five minutes without stopping.

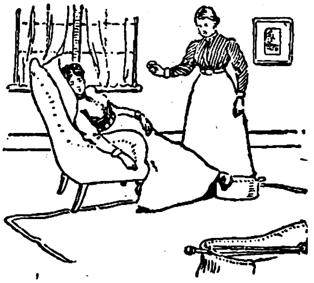
A WHOLE FAMILY CURED.

MOTHER, SON, AND DAUGHTER RESTORED TO HEALTH.

The truly wonderful recovery of Mrs. Turner, of Moorgate, Retford, and her son and daughter, has attracted considerable attention, so sensational is it in nature. Said Mrs. Turner to a reporter from the Retford and Gainsboro' Times—"For a long time I suffered so from weakness and debility that it was with difficulty I moved about. I had a constant feeling of heaviness at the stomach, and do what I would I could not get rid of it. My breathing was laboured, and caused great pain. Many a time, when outside, I had to stand still in order to get my breath, so bad had I become. One day a neighbour gave me a few Bile Beans to see if they would do me any good. I thought they did, and so I purchased some. From the time I began to take them I have gradually improved, until now I am quite well again." Upon being questioned Mrs. Turner's daughter said she also had suffered from nervous debility. She said: "My strength left me, I became depressed, and lost all interest in everything. So dreadfully low did I get that I could hardly move about, and I felt as if I should like to go to bed and not get up again. My mother, who said it was dreadful to see me so ill, gave me some of the Bile Beans, and I determined to give them a fair trial. The result is most satisfactory. Although only a few weeks have elapsed since I began to take them, my weakness and depression are gone, and my strength has returned. The Beans are certainly a wonderful medicine." Before the reporter left, Mrs. Turner said: "A short time ago my son could not go about his work in consequence of sick headache and dizziness. I gave him some of the Beans, and gradually his ailments ceased to trouble him. The Beans have done him worlds of good, and he is not slow to recommend them to others."



THIS GREAT SPECIFIC

Has been found an undoubted cure for HEADACHE, INFLUENZA, COSTIVENESS, PILES, LIVER TROUBLE, BAD BREATH, RHEUMATISM, LIVER CHILL, INDIGESTION, DIZZINESS, BUZZING IN THE HEAD, FULNESS AFTER EATING, CONSTIPATION, LACK OF AMBITION, DEBILITY, ANÆMIA, FEMALE AILMENTS, PIMPLES, and a host of other ailments that owe their origin to defective bile flow, assimilation, and digestion. Bile Beans act quickly in restoring females to health, and for a general aperient and tonic remedy they are unequalled. They are obtainable of all Chemists, or Post Free from THE BILE BEAN MANUFACTURING CO., 119 and 120 London Wall, London, E.C., on receipt of price, 1/1½, and 2/9 large box, containing three times small size; three large boxes 7/6, or Six for 14/-.

PERHAPS there are some of your friends—and they might have friends, too—who have not yet seen our new Photo Competition on page 590. If so, don't lose any time in drawing their attention to the fact, as it is more than likely that their portraits may appear, and as they have to send in their own claims, think how unfriendly they would consider you if you did not put them in the way of getting a £5 note—especially as it means so little trouble to yourself—merely telling them of the competition either in conversation or by postcard, or sending a copy of Short Stories to them.

This week we have to chronicle the names of four winners, and to each of these fortunate individuals a £5 note has been sent. Their names are:

MR. JOHN HOLLAND (No. 16),
57 Richard Street,
Cilfynydd,

ADVICE TO READERS ON VARIOUS MATTERS.

(Replies to Correspondents.)

"MINNIE" is only twenty-one, and yet every now and then she discovers that feminine horror, a grey hair. This distresses her very much, as she fears she is ageing too rapidly.

Perhaps it will comfort her to learn that many persons begin to show grey hairs while they are yet in their twenties, and some while in their teens, and that it does not imply premature decay of the constitution. It is purely a local phenomenon, and may coexist with unusual bodily vigour. Many feeble persons, and others who have suffered extremely, both mentally and physically, do not blanch a hair till past middle life; while others, without assignable cause, lose their capillary colouring matter rapidly when about forty years of age. Men and women grow grey about the same period in life. In men the hair and beard rarely change equally. The one is usually darker than the other for several years, but there seems no general rule as to which whitens first.

"QUILLDRIVER" says that the nature of his employment compels him to frequently go without food for a long time, and he is anxious to know if this is hurtful.

Most decidedly it is. One of the most important conditions to a healthy state is, that meals should be taken at regular intervals. Unfortunately, in the present age of hurry, a strict observance of the rule is almost impossible, but a little more attention might be paid to it than is usually the case. Nowadays, both men and women rush about and become so absorbed in their affairs that the period of hunger is allowed to pass and the period of fatigue and depression to set in. Once the second stage is reached, the desire for food is gone, and after many hours' abstinence the man or woman is too exhausted to digest a meal when either of them gets it. To avoid this extreme, it is only necessary to take the most light and rapid repast during the hungry stage. A few biscuits carried in the pocket will be quite sufficient.

APROPOS of the late terrible gale, a correspondent sends me the following particulars of what was probably the greatest storm this country ever experienced. It raged throughout England on November 26th and 27th, 1703. The devastation on land was immense, and in the harbours and on the coasts the loss in shipping and in lives was still greater. The damage sustained in London alone was calculated at £2,000,000 sterling. The number of persons drowned in the floods of the Severn and Thames, and lost on the coast of Holland, and in ships blown from their anchors and never heard of afterwards, is thought to have been 8,000. Twelve men-of-war, with 1,800 men on board, were lost within sight of their own shore. Trees were torn up by the roots, 17,000 in Kent alone. The Eddystone Lighthouse was destroyed, and in it the ingenious contriver of it, Winstanley, and the persons who were with him. Multitudes of cattle perished; in one level 15,000 sheep were drowned.

"VIRTUOSO."—Yes, you are quite right; there are many things in this life better than money. But the trouble is that, even if you can get them without money, it is hard to get much satisfaction out of them on the same terms. Thus, of course, it is very nice indeed to be good and know it; but, unfortunately, the good man gets hungry just as soon as the wicked one, and needs just as many clothes to keep him comfortable and warm. That is the worst of some of these dear old crusted moral sayings; they don't get down deep enough into things.

TO CONTRIBUTORS.

I AM open to consider original stories of any length from 1,500 to 6,000 words. The character of stories required may be best ascertained by a careful reading of the contents of the paper. All MSS. are dealt with promptly, and every effort is made to return rejected stories which are accompanied by stamped addressed envelopes. At the same time, I cannot hold myself responsible for MSS. accidentally lost. SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

"87 Alexandra Road, Norwich, October 19th, 1896.

Gentlemen,—In reference to Trilene Tablets, I may say that my wife found the greatest possible benefit from the use of them; their action was rapid, and exceeded our utmost expectations, as they were also most beneficial to the respiratory organs. My wife was many years growing so stout, but although the disease was, I consider chronic, the Tablets soon reduced the same completely. You have our united thanks, and if I can do anything to promote your interests I will freely use my utmost endeavours to do so.

"Yours faithfully, J. R. CANHAM."

Mrs. DARNLEY SMITH, Landscove Vicarage, Ashburton, writes: "Trilene Tablets have reduced my weight very much. I am so much lighter in every way, and better in health."

COUNTESS SECKENDORFF, of Berlin, writes: "The Tablets greatly benefited me personally, and I am recommending them to friends."

MISS CHATTERTON, 7 Salisbury Villas, Banstead, Surrey, says: "I weighed 12st. 8lb., but am now 11st., and getting much better."

Nurse CROUCHER, at Mrs. Bennett's, 14 Buckleigh Road, Streatham, says: "I lost 9lb. from the box I took."

"77 Hindhill Street, Heywood, February 5th, 1898.

"Gentlemen,—I have not quite finished the box of Tablets and am 21lb. lighter. The change is great, and several friends are beginning the treatment, which not only reduces fat but strengthens rheumatic joints—such has been the case with me.

"Yours sincerely, M. A. HEYWOOD."

Mrs. D. BURTON, of Silverleigh, Tunbridge, writes: "I am very pleased with difference in size, my friends all telling me how much thinner I am getting."

Miss NORTHLEDGE, The Laurels, Riseholm Road, Lincoln, says: "The Tablets reduced me 1st., so that I am cured."

"West Cornforth, Ferryhill.

Mr. WM. USHER says: "A sister of mine, who was 17st., was greatly reduced by your Tablets to 15st."

Extract from The Lady, September 3rd, 1896: "Many stout persons have suffered untold agonies in unavailing efforts to reduce their bulk, either by means of severe dieting, or by taking more or less deleterious drugs; but all these pains would have been saved if they had only invested in a box of the wonderful Trilene Tablets, which are quite harmless, containing neither mercury, arsenic, nor any other mineral poison, and which are an unfailing cure for obesity."

MRS. T. BOSTON, Cambridge Villas, Clifford Street, South Wigston, says: "I congratulate you on your wonderful Tablets. My weight at first starting them was 11st. 7lb., and I now weigh 9st. 11lb."

Mr. MCLEOD, 44 Calside, Paisley, writes: "I have been cured. If you want to know my weight now, it is 10st.; reduced 1st. 8lb., and I am quite content."

A. M. PRATT, of Ongar House, Ongar, says: "My weight is so much reduced it is unnecessary to take more. The reduction of weight was from 12st. 6lb. to 10st. 4lb."

Mrs. H. COX, 28 Watnall Road, Hucknall Torkard, writes: "The box of Tablets has reduced my weight 1½ stones."

Mr. WALKER, 236 London Road, Hazelgrove, Stockport, says: "I have used one box and am 14lb. lighter. Send another soon as possible."

Col.-Sergt. WHITTLE, of East Lancashire Regt., Burnley, Lancs., says: "A man in our regiment in 1891 lost several stone from taking your Tablets."

Mrs. E. ALEXANDER, 102 Dixon Street, New Swindon, says: "They have reduced me quite 2 stone, and I am now quite cured."

Mrs. W. A. RADFORD, of High Street, New Brinsley, Eastwood, writes: "Before taking Tablets I was 46 inches round waist, now I am 32 inches. I hope soon to be 23. I could hardly move or get up, now I get about easily. Please use this as you wish."

Countess FURSTENBERG, of Germany, writes: "They act speedily and well."

The Princess LIECHTENSTEIN writes from Landsberg, Austria: "Pray send me your excellent Tablets."

Mrs. WEAVER, of Greenpits Villa, Ross, Hereford, writes: "I am reduced from 13st. 8lb. to 11st. You may use this if you like."

Mrs. CROSSLEY, of Rose Hill, Torver, nr. Coniston, says: "There is a very decided diminution of fat. I am delighted, and cannot speak too highly in praise of Tablets. My heart is better, and I can breathe so much easier. You may refer to me as often as you like."

Lady C. CONRAD writes from Wiesbaden: "I am very pleased with your Tablets."

Mrs. TAYLOR-ROBINSON, of Tweed Green House, Whalley Range, Manchester, says: "I feel so much lighter and better since taking your Tablets, and am so much thinner that I hardly recognise myself."

Miss A. LONG, of 9 South Parade, Waterford, writes: "Your Tablets have reduced me 14lb."

Miss A. DAWSON, 62 Orchard Street, Weston-super-Mare, says: "Glad to say the Tablets have sufficiently reduced me. I shall always recommend them."

Miss F. L. BALL, 47 Chesterfield Road, St. Andrews, Bristol, writes: "I am quite cured through your Tablets. They improve the figure, and greatly relieve shortness of breath."

Miss PATIENT, of Woodberry, Theydon Bois: "Feel great benefit from Tablets I have lost 2st., and am sufficiently reduced."

Mrs. DREW, of 1 Bellevue Gardens, The Nursery, Devizes, writes: "I took Tablets some years ago; they soon reduced me and I have not got stout since Send me a box for my mother."

BEECHAM'S PILLS

HAVE been, ARE now, and WILL be

THE PEOPLE'S MEDICINE.

It is possible by plausible advertisements, set forth in an attractive style, to temporarily arrest the attention of a certain number of readers and induce them to purchase a particular article. But it is a more difficult matter to ensure their continued patronage. Unless the advertised article proves to be all that is claimed for it, not only do the purchasers discontinue its use, but warn others against it as a thing to be avoided. Should it be, however, of genuine value, those who make trial of it naturally become habitual users and advocates; their advocacy being the most effective and absolutely reliable advertisement possible. The present position and popularity of BEECHAM'S PILLS prove them to be a preparation of high merit. Old friends show their appreciation of BEECHAM'S PILLS by continuing, year in, year out, to rely solely on their remarkable curative and tonic qualities. No other medicine is taken, and none is needed; and it is to the steady recommendation of all who take them that the widespread fame of BEECHAM'S PILLS is due. As BEECHAM'S PILLS have been tried for more than half a century, and are now recognised as an unsurpassable Family Medicine in all parts of the world, there is no need for you to pause or room for you to doubt. Others have long since put them to the severest test of time and intelligence, and have given the unqualified verdict:

CHAPTER I.

A Mysterious Meeting—"They are Worth a Thousand Pounds"—A Fair Cat's-paw.

"It's past the time. Why doesn't he come? Has he begun to break faith?"

It was a man who uttered these words. A well-dressed, handsome fellow, with a silky brown moustache disguising a mouth which, but for the hair that hid it, would have been at once marked by physiognomists as the one weak part in a face otherwise exceptionally well favoured by nature. The man's lips were hard and cruel.

It was in Princes Street, Edinburgh, a thoroughfare famed all the world over for beauty. It was one of those rare mornings in early winter, with a cloudless sky and keen exhilarating atmosphere, a morning to make the blood dance, and even the most pessimistic feel that, after all, life has something worth living for.

The man was standing beneath that graceful Gothic structure, the work of a Scotch peasant boy—the Scott Memorial. His eyes roved impatiently down the busy street and along the handsome line of shops that were lost in the distance in the cool morning mist.

Suddenly a hand was laid on his shoulder. He wheeled round rapidly, to be confronted by another man, a short, sturdy figure with clean-shaven face, upon which was none of that refinement that lay upon his own countenance.

"Ah, David," said the man who had been first at the rendezvous, "you are here at last. I had begun to think that you weren't going to turn up."

"Have you ever known David to break his word!" asked the other curtly, "where you are concerned? I am late because—well, because I couldn't help it. But I've got a lot to tell you though it can't be here. Come along up to the snuggery in the Canongate. We can talk there without fear of being overheard."

The two men at once set off, and walking swiftly past the way to the station, held on up Cockburn Street and into the old town. Walking silently down the Canongate they came to a pause at a public-house just before the Tolbooth, which they entered quickly, and with the air of men who knew their locality well.

The man called David led the way upstairs to a small private room, rather more comfortably furnished than might have been expected from the house and its surroundings.

"Now I daresay you are wondering, Phil," he said, "why I have summoned you here to Edinburgh in such a hurry, but the fact is I am on to a thing that is worth a little trouble, as pretty a little haul as ever a gentleman of our persuasion attempted to lift. In the first place, you have no doubt noticed the posters all over Edinburgh announcing that the Good Samaritan Company is engaged to appear at the Royal Lyceum Theatre for one week only?"

Phil gave vent to a quick exclamation of surprise.

"What on earth is your game now?" he said; "and why should the advent of the Good Samaritan Company have anything to do with you?"

"Not so fast, Mr. Philip Chesterton," broke in David. "You seem to be mighty flurried all of a sudden. Give me time and I'll tell you all."

"I couldn't help being surprised," answered the other, with a half-laugh; "but the fact is there's a little girl in the company that I'm rather sweet on."

"Now you are not going to tell me," cried David, "that you've been bowled over by the charms of the beautiful Miss Hazel Harlow?"

"No," answered Chesterton with a laugh. "I don't fly quite so high. No, it's a little girl called Millie D'Esterre, who, happens, funnily enough, to be rather fonder of me than I am of her."

"Ah, you good-looking ladykillers!" broke in David. "You never give us poor beggars a chance." Then his voice changed, and his sharp little eyes narrowed themselves into slits.

"It couldn't have been better!" he said, with almost diabolical glee. "It's just the very thing that will be of use to us—this fondness of Millie D'Esterre for handsome Phil Chesterton. It'll mean a thousand pounds in our pockets at least."

"Whatever do you mean?" cried Chesterton in great agitation. "Here, we've had enough of this beating about the bush—what's the game?"

"Since you and I went into partnership, Phil," came the answer, "and turned ourselves into a very limited company for the appropriation of other people's valuables we've had one or two pretty good successes. Well, I must tell you that one of the leading ladies in the Good Samaritan Company is a Miss Hetty Morton, a girl who, sometime ago, had the good luck to attract the spendthrift young nobleman the Marquis of Basingford. As an appreciation of the fair Hetty's charms and ability the young nobleman, in a fit of generous folly, presented the girl with a necklet of diamonds that had been heirlooms in his family for many a long year. As you can understand, his mother, the Dowager Duchess of Porlock, was nearly off her head with rage to think that the young nobleman could throw such pearls, well, it was just the same as to say, Hetty seemed swine to the old lady. She raved and swore in Duchess-like language, begged and intreated, and even wrote to the girl offering to buy them back at her own figure. But Miss Hetty laughed at her. She'd got the trinkets and she was going to keep them, and kept them she has till this day. Now the reason why I've asked you to join me in Edinburgh so soon after our little coup at Buxton, is because I've got my eye on the Porlock diamonds, and having just heard from you that there's a girl in the Company who's sweet on you, well, it strikes me those jewels are as good as got."

Chesterton listened to his confederate with attention.

"That's all very well," he said, "and the trinkets are undoubtedly worth the trying for, but I don't quite see how the fact of Millie D'Esterre being spoons on me is going to help us."

"You're denser than I thought you were," answered the other coolly, lighting a cigarette. "I see I shall have to be more explicit. Could we not, somehow, or could you not get speech with Miss Millie and endeavour to get her to assist us?"

"In other words," broke in Chesterton, "Millie is to lift the jewels?"

"Exactly. But I don't want you to go to her and say: 'Please, Millie, go and steal the Porlock diamonds.' In the first place, does the girl know all about you—about all your antecedents, and where you come from, and that you are—well, at home, Mr. Philip, and abroad a gentleman cracksman—to put it bluntly."

Chesterton laughed.

"I'm not quite such a fool as I look, David. To tell you the honest truth, the girl doesn't know who I am. I was introduced to her in London as a Mr. John Smith, and my introducer said that that was the name by which I elected to be known, as though I were in reality somebody much more exalted. This was said to impress her at a supper-party. Well, I saw her repeatedly after that, but she never found out who I really was."

David brought his hand down upon his thigh with a resounding smack.

"Upon my word," he said exultantly, "wasn't it old Shakespeare who said, 'There's a destiny that shapes our ends,' or something like that? Hang it all, Fate is working for us. You couldn't have done it more neatly if you had tried." Then his voice changed. "Now don't you see how it can be done?" he cried. "Listen, attentively. From this moment you are no more John Smith or Philip Chesterton, you are the elder brother of the Marquis of Basingford, in other words, the Duke of Porlock. You have come to Edinburgh on the track of the family jewels which were stolen—yes, stolen, why not—for you can say that Basingford had no right to appropriate them and give them to Hetty Morton. The family have deputed you to try and get those jewels back by fair means or foul. Will Millie help you? Why, of course she will. She'll find some means of getting hold of the diamonds and then, well, there are plenty of steamers sailing for foreign parts from Leith; in fact, there is a little German—the skipper of a Hamburg boat —who would land us at Rotterdam at a word from me. What do you say, Phil? Is it worth trying?"

The other paused, though there was nothing on his face to indicate the thoughts passing through his mind.

"Yes, it's worth trying," he said suddenly with apparent nonchalance; "and I'll see if I can get word with Millie this afternoon. I'll meet you at the theatre to-night. We can see the play, and I'll tell you what I've done after the play is over. How does that suit you?"

"Excellently, and I'll run down to Leith and see if the Schwalbe, which is the name of the steamer belonging to my German pal, is in the docks. If she is I'll get word with the skipper so as to have everything ready in case our little business does come off."

CHAPTER II.

An Unexpected Meeting—Love, the Destroyer—A Base Plot.

"Millie, as I'm a sinner!"

"Jack, by all that's holy!"

The scene was again Princes Street on the afternoon of the same day that had seen the concoction of the plan between the two cracksmen. The Good Samaritan Company had arrived in Edinburgh on the Sunday, and were now prepared to open the campaign of the week in modern Athens.

Millie D'Esterre was tripping along Princes Street gazing in the shops spread with so many alluring baits to catch feminine cupidity.

Philip Chesterton, alias John Smith, had known that if there was one place in which he could be quite sure of finding his quarry, it would be Princes Street, and his intuition had proved correct, hence the greetings with which we open the chapter.

"What are you doing in Edinburgh, Jack?" asked Millie tenderly with heightened colour.

"Need you ask?" came the answer. "Did I not know that the Good Samaritan Company had come up North? That was my chief reason, in order to have another glimpse of the little girl with whom I have passed so many happy hours in London town. But there is another reason, and that also is connected with you. Frankly, I want your help."

"Want my help? How can I help you?"

"Jack Smith" looked at his watch. It was just three o'clock. "Look here," he said, "let's go for a drive. We can go round to the Queen's Drive, past Holyrood and have a look at Arthur's Seat. Then we will come back and have tea in Princes Street, and by that time I shall have been able to tell you how you can help me."

He hailed a carriage from a rank close at hand and helped his fair companion inside the conveyance. He gave the driver his instructions, and then getting in beside his companion, closed the window and sank back on the cushioned seat beside her.

"That's cosy," he said tenderly, and threw her an ardent look.

Millie's heart was beating wildly. The man with whom she had fallen hopelessly in love had once more crossed her path. She thought of nothing but the intoxicating happiness she had felt at being in his presence.

"First of all," began the man in a low voice, "I have a confession to make to you, Millie. My real name is not John Smith."

"As if I did not know that," answered the girl quickly; "though I think Jack is a sweet name. I do hope you didn't deceive me in that, anyhow, but that one part of your name at least is Jack."

A melodious laugh answered her. "No, I am afraid that even the name of Jack must be taken away," he replied; "though if you like to call me Jack, well, any name sounds sweet from those lips."

"But what is your name?" said the girl impetuously. "I've known you so long as Jack Smith that it is only fair you should now let me into the secret."

"I'll do that with pleasure, but it must be a secret, dear, for reasons that I'll explain afterwards. Promise that you won't tell anyone what I am going to tell you. And tell me also that you haven't forgotten me altogether?"

"You know I haven't!" cried the girl passionately; "I'm not that sort. I haven't forgotten you, and I don't think I ever shall. And I'll promise not to tell anyone though I don't see what harm it can do."

"You will presently," came the significant answer.

He took hold of her hand and caressed it.

"My real name, sweetheart," he said, "is Ralph Lionel Despencer Lavington D'Arcy, and that's not all."

The girl gazed at him in amazement, as well she might.

"Now you're joking again," she said petulantly.

"No I am not," came the earnest answer; "though you may be quite sure I had no hand in the adoption of such a mouthful. They are all family names, dearest, and if you must have the rest of it, well, it ends up with 'Duke of Porlock.' Now perhaps you can understand why I called myself plain Jack Smith that memorable evening when first we met."

Millie went pale.

"The Duke of Porlock!" she almost gasped. "Then I must call you Your Grace and be very distant. I rather wish you had remained plain John Smith."

"Don't look so tragic," came the gay answer, "I'll be Jack Smith to you still, darling. The accident of my being a Duke"—it was well for the girl that she could not see the grim lines of his mouth behind the silky moustache—"has not taken away the fact that I am still a man, a man, with all the passions and longings of any individual, who still has a very tender spot in his heart for little Millie D'Esterre."

"Do you mean that?" cried the girl with a sob, taking his hand in both of hers, "or are you only saying that to please me?"

"No, no! I care for you very much indeed, Millie, and I shall care for you all the more if you will try and help me in a matter that is one of the reasons for my letting myself be known as plain Jack Smith—a matter in which you can help my family as much as you do me. Have you ever heard of the Marquis of Basingford?"

"Why, rather, he was Hetty Morton's pet mash. Everyone knew that; and didn't he give her those splendid diamonds? Why every girl in the Company envies her those."

"Exactly. It is about those very diamonds that I want to speak to you."

The girl looked mystified and not a little curious.

"Perhaps," went on the false Duke, "you never heard the true history of those diamonds; that they were not the Marquis of Basingford's to give, but jewels that should have been held in trust as family heirlooms. I was abroad at the time the gift was made, or you may be sure I should have put a stop to it. And now, what I want to ask you is to help me to get the diamonds back for the honour of the family."

The girl gasped.

"Do you mean you want me to steal them for you, Jack?" she said in an almost awestruck voice.

"Well, that's rather a hard way of putting it, dearest," answered the other with a half-laugh. "It was really a theft to give them away. You see, with an old family like ours that has always prided itself upon its possessions, it was almost a criminal act of Basingford's. So will you help me?" Then his voice changed and became more tender again. "And perhaps you wouldn't be the first actress who has become a Duchess." This in a meaning tone.

The girl blushed rosy red. With eyes that sparkled brightly, infatuated with love and ambition, she gazed into the cracksman's face.

"Do you mean that if I help you to get the jewels," she said, "you will marry me?"

The man nodded.

"Then I'll do it," she went on in a low voice. "I think I would do anything to become your wife even if you were only plain Jack Smith. There, isn't that a bold confession to make?"

The man's heart was beating exultantly. Stifling a faint feeling of compunction that had risen even in his crime-stained heart at the trick he was playing, he went on:

"And I am very fond of you too, dear, as you see. And now, tell me how do you think you are going to get hold of the Porlock diamonds?"

"Well, as you can easily understand," went on the girl, "Hetty has kept a pretty good eye on them, and she has gone further than that. She has had an imitation set made exactly like the others which she wears on the stage. These she keeps together with the genuine set in her trunk. As you can understand, it won't be too easy to get hold of them, but, as luck has it, I am sharing her dressing-room."

The man gave vent to a low whistle.

"So there are two sets, are there?" he said. Then with the quick instincts of the criminal, he continued: "I've got an idea. Couldn't you pop the false jewels into somebody else's box and then go to the fair Hetty and accuse that person of theft? Then you could get hold of the real ones and the family would come into possession of its own again without the least chance of your being found out."

Millie paled. She had not quite bargained for this. To implicate somebody else had not been part of her programme. She hesitated, and the villain beside her, noticing her reluctance, brought all the powers of his manly fascination to play upon the infatuated girl.

"If you really cared for me, darling," he said in a low voice, "I am sure you would do anything for me. Think of the service you are doing to our family—your family, it may be some day—for that diamond necklet ought really to encircle the neck of the future Duchess of Porlock and nobody else."

At his words the last remnant of the girl's better feelings were shattered. From that moment she was Chesterton's heart and soul, and entered into the spirit of the plot with zest.

"There's one girl in the company," she muttered, "whom I can't stand, and whom Hetty hates, and would be only too ready to see in a tight fix. I mean Hazel Harlow, our lead. All the men are wild on her and the manager thinks of nobody but her. It's 'Miss Harlow must do this,' and 'Miss Harlow must have that,' and 'Miss Harlow's wishes to be consulted,' until the rest of the crowd sometimes wish Miss Harlow at the bottom of the seas. Now if I could get suspicion fixed on her she might get the sack from the company, and I, for one, would only be too happy to see her come a cropper."

"Millie, you're a wonder!" said her false lover enthusiastically, "everything is dovetailing beautifully. Now I tell you what. If you can get hold of those jewels and work the game on Miss Harlow, meet me inside the Waverley Station near the booking-office, for Carlisle and England. That will be the safest of all places to meet, because there is always such a crowd there. I'll be at the tryst at noon to-morrow, and, anyhow, if nothing has happened you'll be able to report progress."

CHAPTER III.

"What were you Doing in my Room?"—Accused of Theft.

It was six o'clock. Hazel Harlow was just entering the stage-door of the Lyceum Theatre when an attendant said to Hazel:

"Will you please go to Miss Morton's dressing-room, she wants to see you."

Rather surprised at this unusual request, for hitherto Hetty Morton had always rather shunned than courted her company, Hazel obeyed the summons, only to find the dressing-room empty. She waited there a few moments, and as no one appeared, she hurried out to run right into the arms of Millie D'Esterre, who looked at her, as she thought, in a somewhat curious way. The meaning of this was to be brought home to her later on.

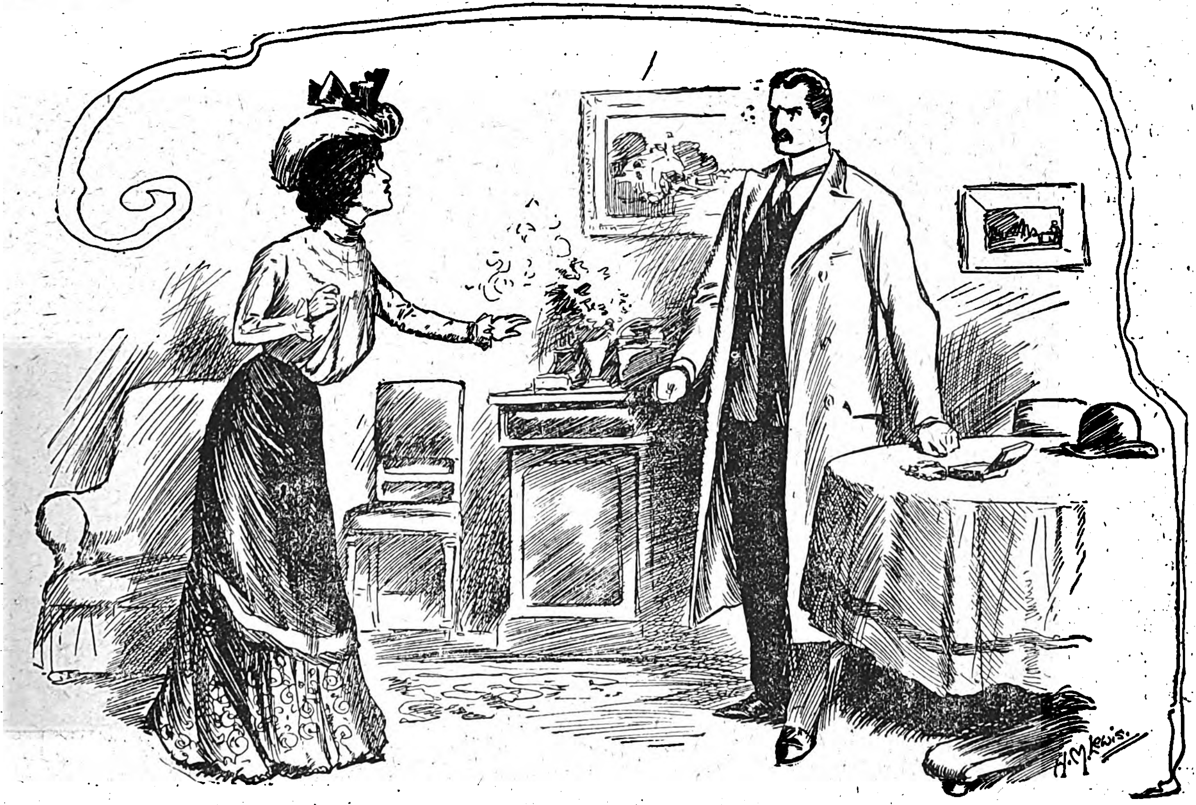
"Have you seen Miss Morton?" asked Hazel lightly.

"No," answered the other curtly, and passed on.

Half-an-hour passed away and everyone more or less had come to the theatre to set about getting ready for the evening performance. Suddenly an electrifying piece of news went round the theatre precincts. "Miss Morton's jewels have disappeared." The actress had gone to her trunk to take out the trinkets, to find that both cases identical, and each containing a necklet—one false the other real—had disappeared.

Hetty Morton was beside herself, and then a more startling development was set on foot. Rumour had it that somebody connected with the theatre had appropriated the diamonds. Orders were given for everyone's dressing-room to be systematically searched. Naturally an immense amount of indignation was raised at such a proceeding.

"It's ridiculous!" said Venables, "to think that people like Miss Harlow and Mr. Monteith and Miss Lovelace and myself should have done such a thing."



"You can't mean that, Jack," she said in a low voice. "You must be joking."

"We'll begin with Miss Harlow," she said; "I'm not going to lose those jewels without every effort being made to recover them."

Secretly indignant though she was Hazel said nothing to the excited actress, but bade her courteously turn out everything in her dressing-room. This the girl did. Judge of Hazel's feelings when, at the bottom of her trunk was discovered a green morocco case containing one set of the famous diamonds.

Words fail to describe the scene that followed. Hazel protested with all her strength that it was not her hand that had placed the jewels there.

"Then what were you doing in my room," asked Hetty, "some time ago? You were seen coming out of there by Miss D'Esterre."

"Why you sent for me yourself," cried Hazel.

"I never did," came the answer.

The person who had given the message to Hazel was sought out and she stoutly denied having given any such message. Here was evidence most damning to Hazel's innocence, though of course her friends absolutely refused to believe that it was she who had taken the jewels.

For reasons best known to herself Hetty made no mention that there had been two sets of jewels, and this omission on her part was to bear unsuspected fruit later on.

The jaundiced actress was for sending for a policeman there and then, and it was only by Venables' and Monteith's most urgent remonstrance that she was prevented from so doing.

"Very well, then," said Hetty, "I shall have Miss Harlow charged in court later on. I shall get out a warrant for her arrest with all haste. Was ever circumstantial evidence stronger?"

Remonstrances, protestations, arguments availed nothing. Jenny Lovelace, Eric and Venables, and, indeed, all those who knew in their hearts that Hazel was absolutely incapable of such a crime, begged the girl to reconsider her action. Even Hazel's protestations availed nothing.

"In consideration to you, Mr. Venables," said Hetty, "I won't wreck to-night's performance, but will wait till to-morrow, but justice shall and must be done. If Miss Harlow can clear herself well and good. If not, I must only protect myself and others."

In making this statement Hetty was urged on by two considerations; the first was personal spite against Hazel; the second was a desire to somehow discover what had become of the duplicate set. The genuine jewels could only be distinguished (except by experts) from the others by an infinitesimal scratch on one of the facets of the centre stone of the necklace—a beautiful blue diamond nearly as large as a pigeon's egg, and worth a fabulous sum in itself, as the profligate young Marquis of Basingford had known, in common with others of his family.

How Hazel acted her part that night she never knew, while the strain on Jenny and Eric was equally great. It was horrible to think that such a sword of Damocles was hanging over Hazel's innocent head. To think that on the morrow or the next day the beautiful girl whom they loved would be arraigned in a public police-court on a charge of theft made their blood boil. As for Eric, his every thought was centred on how he could find evidence to show that Hazel had been the victim of a base plot—for plot it undoubtedly was. In the first place the message that Hazel had received to go to Hetty Morton's room; secondly, the instant demand made by Hetty to have Hazel's box searched first of all. Surely the girl must somehow have known where the jewels were unless—and this suspicion could not be entertained for a moment—Hazel had really been the thief, and had been seen removing the diamonds from their place of concealment.

That was all he had to go upon, and flimsy enough it was in all conscience. It was probable that the jewels had been conveyed to Hazel's trunk some time before the theft had been committed, and by someone who knew the ins and outs of the theatre very thoroughly. It must have been someone who knew Hetty Morton pretty intimately, and where she kept her jewels.

"Will you tell me, Miss Morton," he asked her in an interval between the acts, "where you kept the jewels?"

"At the bottom of my trunk," came the answer, given somewhat churlishly.

"And the key of which you of course kept upon your person?"

The other hesitated. Like most actresses she was most free and easy as regards the safeguarding of her own belongings, and it so happened that she locked the trunk or not exactly as her memory to do so prompted her or the reverse.

"Well, no, I didn't lock it," she said, "but merely because I thought I was dealing with honest people."

Eric uttered an exclamation.

"But don't you see," he went on, "what happened? Someone came into your room and abstracted the jewels and conveyed them to Hazel Harlow's trunk which, like yours, was kept unlocked. There's the whole thing in a nutshell. You can't in your heart believe that Miss Harlow is only a common thief."

"But I do believe it," answered the girl fiercely, "and the whole world shall believe it before we are many days older."

"I wish you were a man, Miss Morton," retorted Eric, stifling his rage with difficulty; "and I'd make you answer for those words."

The other laughed scornfully.

"But I'm not," she said; "if I were, perhaps I, too, would be infatuated by Miss Harlow's beauty. As it is, I am only a weak woman, and if it gives you any satisfaction to knock me down, well, pray do so. I shall then be able to bring a charge of assault against you."

Eric bit his lips and turned aside. He could not trust himself to speak, but he knew that there would be no hope of mercy from Hetty Morton.

CHAPTER IV.

The Meeting—"You've Brought me the Wrong Lot"—A Villain's Callousness.

Besides being the largest station in the United Kingdom, the Waverley Station of Edinburgh is also one of the busiest, and the booking-offices were crowded as was usual with excited throngs of ticket purchasers. Near the main booking-office stood the spurious Duke of Porlock clad in a smart Chesterfield overcoat, and with a soft grey felt hat on his head pulled down low over his brows as though he were desirous of concealment. Punctually at noon he saw the eager figure of the girl he had made his too willing tool, searching anxiously for him. He went towards her, and in a moment she recognised him.

"Well," he said in a low voice, fraught with anxious insistence, "how have you got on?"

"I have them," came the low answer.

"You have them!" He gazed at her almost incredulously, then reading verification in her face, he uttered an exclamation of gratified surprise.

"You darling!" he said. "You are a cleverer little woman than I thought you were, and that's saying a good deal. I'll take you to a hotel I know of not far from here and you can tell me all about it."

He led her to a closed carriage, gave a hurried direction to the driver, and in a few moments they were being driven along the cobbled thoroughfare that led to the humble inn of Canongate, where he had had the memorable interview with the mysterious David as recorded at the beginning of our tale.

But little conversation passed between the two during their short journey. Each was fully occupied with their own thoughts. The man was scheming how he could shake off the infatuated girl, the girl was building hopes on the future, though these same hopes were tempered by a dread concerning the very jewels that she had been at such labour to secure. At the humble hostelry Chesterton led the way without more ado to the room upstairs in which he had interviewed his accomplice. His first action was to take the girl in his arms and embrace her with warmth.

"And now, darling," he said, "where are the Porlock diamonds?"

Unfastening the collar of her dress with a quick motion the girl slipped off the beautiful necklace that she had put beneath her dress for safety.

Chesterton uttered a faint cry as the diamonds scintillated and coruscated before his enraptured gaze. Without a word he took them from her hands and then taking a small phial from his pocket containing an almost colourless acid, for such the liquid was, poured a drop of it on the centre gem. Then a cry escaped his lips.

"Paste!" he exclaimed hoarsely; "wonderfully good paste, but paste without a doubt. Confound it all, Millie, you've brought me the wrong lot."

The girl went white to the lips. Her worst suspicions were realised.

"I was afraid of it," she murmured; "and yet I hoped for the best. I found the jewels at the bottom of the trunk, both in morocco cases, both so absolutely identical that I couldn't tell one from the other. Somehow these looked the finer jewels. I was going to try cutting on glass with them, for I couldn't find any means of identification, when I heard someone coming, and had to take these and trust to luck. And now all I have done is useless. I've got the blame fixed on another girl, and all for nothing. And the real jewels are in Hetty Morton's safe keeping now." Then her voice changed. "But it won't alter our love, will it, Jack? Anyhow, I did my best for you. I did my best."

Chesterton's face had become hard and stern. Black rage filled his heart as he thought of the chance that had been missed, that a useless crime had been committed (though it was not the fact of the criminal side that caused him any compunction) which had resulted in the theft of a paste necklace worth not a thousand pounds or even more, but at the most five. His thoughts worked quickly. Should he cast the girl off for ever there and then, accuse her of having deceived him, of having wilfully stolen the false jewels to save her own skin, or should he still play upon the tender susceptibilities of the heart that he knew to be absolutely his own, and still urge the girl to make yet another effort to gain the coveted diamonds? On maturer reflection he decided upon this course of action.

"Let's have the whole story," he said, trying to speak gently, "and see if there is any way out of the mess."

"I managed to get the jewels stowed away in Hazel Harlow's box," replied Millie almost piteously, "though, as I have said, it was absolutely impossible for me to tell the real from the false. Then just as Hazel Harlow came into the theatre I bribed one of the attendants to tell her that Hetty Morton wanted to see her in her room. Of course Miss Harlow went up there and found no one. She waited there a few minutes and then came out to be confronted by me. Then when Hetty came to her rooms a few minutes later, I told her I had seen Hazel Harlow nosing about the room. Then, when she had missed the jewels, her suspicions went straight to the girl on whom I had meant they should fall. The jewels were found in the trunk, and Hetty is going to prosecute, and I have to be a witness against Miss Harlow."

"But the jewels," broke in Chesterton. "What has Miss Morton done with them?"

He spoke roughly, forgetting in his annoyance at having been baulked of the costly trinket that he should really have been the supposed lover of the girl—his catspaw.

"In the strong-room of a bank," came the tearful answer.

An impatient exclamation broke from the cracksman's lips.

"So that's the end of the whole thing," he said vindictively, careless now of the impression his words might make on Millie. "The game is up, is it? Well, you've got yourself into a mess. The best thing you can do is to get yourself out of it."

The girl staggered back as though she had received a blow in the face.

"You can't mean that, Jack," she said, in a low voice. "You must be joking. It was for you I did it all. Think, I have turned myself into a criminal for your sake, and now you speak to me like that. Jack, dear Jack."

"Oh, enough of that," interposed the man; "I should have been ready enough to have been your dear Jack if you hadn't made such a hopeless mess of things, but now"—a faint touch of compunction came into his debased heart as he looked at the pale, broken woman before him in whose eyes was agony unspeakable—"I must go now," he said hurriedly. "You shall hear from me again. It won't do for us to be seen here together. It's all your fault, Millie; you should have secured both the necklaces and tried to implicate Hazel Harlow in some other way. As for these gewgaws"—he threw the paste necklace contemptuously down upon a table—"you had better keep these as a souvenir of your acumen as a diamond expert."

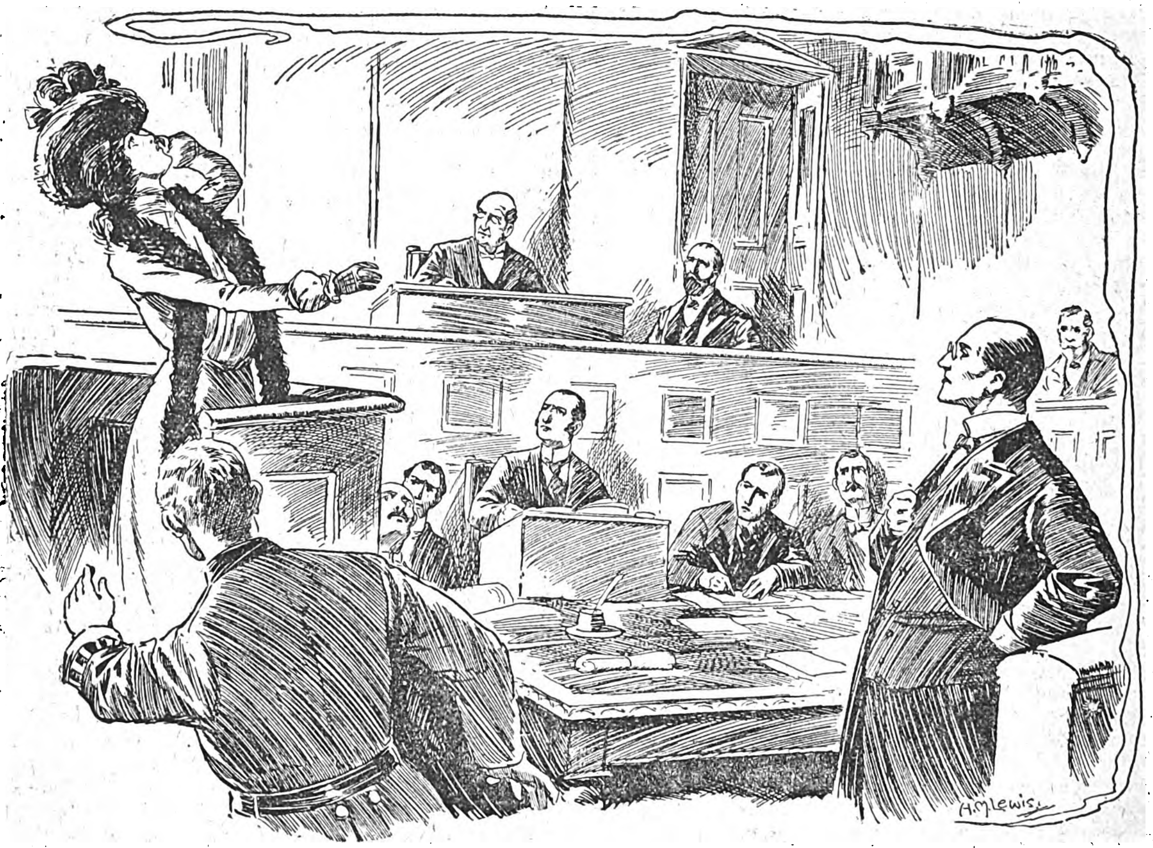
With a sob Millie picked up the paste diamonds. Her eyes were blinded with tears. She turned aside to hide the evidences of her anguish from the villain who had unmasked himself so thoroughly in her eyes. Dimly, yet with woman's quick intuition, she realised that it was the Porlock diamonds and not herself that this man's heart had been really set upon. Already a suspicion had dawned upon her as to his identity with the Duke of Porlock. She brushed aside her tears and wheeled round. A low cry escaped her lips. Her false lover had gone. He had taken advantage of her pre-occupation to steal towards the door and slip away, whither she knew not.

CHAPTER V.

THE SECOND NECKLACE—A STRANGE LAPSE OF MEMORY—ALL'S WELL THAT ENDS WELL.

THE police-court was crowded. Bad news travels on swift wings, and already all Edinburgh was ringing with the news that Hazel Harlow, the beautiful young actress, was arraigned on charge of theft.

True to her word, Hetty Morton had lost no time in pressing home the charge against the unfortunate Hazel. She had procured a warrant for the arrest of her rival, who was to appear on Thursday morning, bail for Hazel having been secured through the instrumentality of Eric Monteith and Raymond Venables so that she was at least spared the indignity of spending any time in jail.



She tottered forward, and the next moment collapsed in a heap in the witness-box.

For the defence the services of one of the best advocates in the Scotch capital had been secured. He was a young man named Macdonald, who was not without hopes of clearing Hazel from the charge preferred against her, though he was forced to admit that the circumstantial evidence against his client would be a hard nut to crack.

There is no need to set out in full the case for the prosecution as our readers are already aware of the full facts of the charge, how that Hazel had been seen by Miss D'Estérre issuing from the room of her fellow-actress, how that she had gone straight to her own dressing-room, and how that only a short time afterwards the missing diamonds had been found in the prisoner's trunk.

There was still no mention made of the existence of a second set of jewels, and strange as it may appear, Millie D'Esterre was the only person who knew of the existence of the duplicate set, for with the vanity of a vain woman Hetty Morton had concealed the fact from others that she had a second set made. It was exceedingly gratifying to be able to flaunt the famous Porlock diamonds in the faces of the other members of the Company.

The first witness called was Millie D'Esterre. Having given her deposition it became necessary for Macdonald to cross-examine her and to endeavour to discover some flaw in her statement.

"Are you aware," he said, "that a message was sent to Miss Harlow purporting to come from Miss Morton requesting my client to go to her room, and that your discovery of Miss Harlow there is to be explained by the fact that she was waiting for Miss Morton?"

"I know nothing of that," replied Millie in a low voice.

"Then it is your opinion that Miss Harlow, whose reputation is surely well enough known to exclude the possibility of such a deed, went to Miss Morton's room openly for the sole purpose of extracting the diamonds from her fellow actress' trunk?"

"Yes," came the somewhat faint answer.

Macdonald made a gesture of incredulity.

"Why, the thing is absurd," he said. But all further questioning failed to elicit any other answer from the witness. She still maintained that Hazel had been in the dressing-room as a thief.

And then a strange thing happened. Millie D'Esterre was suddenly seen to grow very white. She tottered forward, and the next moment collapsed in a heap in the witness-box. A policeman sprang forward. The girl had fainted. He unloosed the collar of her dress and she was taken out into an adjoining ante-room. This event naturally caused some little commotion in the court and had the effect of retarding the case somewhat. It was of course understood that the Porlock diamonds had been produced in court and sworn to by their owner as being the identical jewels presented to her by the Marquis of Basingford. Judge of the sensation in court then, when, a few moments after the removal of the unconscious Millie, the constable who had carried her out returned, and approaching the counsel for the defence, he requested a few words with him. Mr. Macdonald, craving the magistrate's tolerance for a few moments, retired with the officer, to return in a short time to the court with an expression on his face that an astute observer would have recognised as typical of elation.

"I must crave the indulgence of the court," said the barrister, "but a fresh phase has entered into the case which will, I think, admit of conclusive evidence of Miss Harlow's innocence from the terrible charge that has been preferred against her. Round the neck of the witness who has just fainted a necklace has been discovered that seems to be absolutely identical with the diamonds alleged to have been stolen by my client."

And amid the profoundest sensation he held up aloft the spurious gems that, as we know, Millie D'Esterre had placed round her neck for greater security.

The introduction of this surprise into the case that had already been fraught with so much sensation, created the profoundest amazement. Hetty Morton was called again, and Macdonald at once assailed her with questions.

"Do you know of the existence of a second necklace?" said the advocate.

"I do," in a low voice.

"Is it yours?"

"It is."

"Then will you kindly explain to the court why you made no mention of it before, and how it came to be in possession of the witness upon whom it was found?"

Hetty paused, and then seeing that there was no way out of it, she said in a low voice:

"The jewels you hold in your hand are only paste. I had them made in imitation of the real diamonds, which I did not care to always wear in public. I made no mention of them because—well, because—I forgot about them."

Here was Macdonald's opportunity.

"You forgot!" he said in a trenchant voice. "You forgot the existence of a set of jewels that you yourself had had made, and that you were in the habit of wearing so that people might think they were real diamonds?

"Do you really mean to stand up there and tell the court that that is the true explanation of this extraordinary occurrence? It looks to me very much like a conspiracy. Perhaps you have also forgotten, madam, how the paste diamonds came to be round the neck of the last witness?"

"I have no idea how that happened," answered Hetty, trying to speak boldly. "I am as much at a loss to understand how they came to be round Miss D'Esterre's neck as you are."

Macdonald gave vent to a contemptuous sniff far more expressive than any words could have been.

"At any rate," he said, "I think the introduction of this fresh element into the case disposes pretty effectually of the trumped up charge against my client. I beg to move an adjournment of the case until the matter can be thoroughly sifted. I understand that the last witness is incapacitated from making any further statement at present."

Such indeed was the case, for by this time Millie D'Esterre was delirious, having succumbed to an attack of brain fever that was almost to cost her her life. When she did recover she made a clean breast of everything, not disguising the fact that she had been duped by the so-called Duke of Porlock, who, needless to say, had disappeared, together with his confederate. And but for Hazel Harlow, it would have gone hard with Millie D'Esterre.

And Hetty Morton, convinced in the most conclusive way of the mistake she had made, and smarting under the remembrance of the rebuke administered to her in open court by Macdonald, felt no desire to press home the charge of theft, or to recall a business out of which she had emerged with so little credit to herself.

But "Philip Chesterton" and "David" were not to be allowed to disappear from the scene with impunity, for some months later on they were both apprehended red-handed in a burglarious attempt to break into a mansion in the north of Scotland. It was then discovered that Chesterton was, by his own confession, the very man who had been instrumental in implicating Millie D'Esterre in the robbery of the Porlock diamonds. He was imprisoned together with his accomplice, serving a sentence of ten years' penal servitude.

Liverpool was the town next upon the tour list of the Good Samaritan Company after a week that, notwithstanding what had happened, had been a great success from a financial point of view. At the great seaport Hazel was to be the central figure in a tragedy that owed its existence to professional jealousy, and which was to be nearly instrumental in cutting short her career for ever. Readers are referred to next week's issue of Short Stories for a story no less thrilling than those which have preceded it.

THE WEIR COOKHAM

The Lion Tamer's Story.

A TERRIBLE TEN MINUTES.

WHEN you see a lion tamer stepping jauntily into the lions' den, and putting the great, skulking brutes through their paces, you wouldn't think, perhaps, to look at him, that he is exposed to much risk. But take my word for it he is.

From the moment he steps inside those bars, no matter how seasoned he may be to the business, he simply carries his life in his hand until he is safely out of the place again.

You see, most of these savage beasts, lions and tigers especially, are sharper in some ways than human beings even. They seem to know by instinct if a man has anything on his mind when he ventures in amongst them. And then they watch him.

If he allows his attention to wander, if his eye loses its grip on them for one half-second, they notice it, and are on him like a shot.

Worst of all, if a tamer takes to priming himself with drink before he enters the cage, as some of them used to do in the olden days—well, good-bye to him! His Dutch courage may stand by him all right for a time, but so sure as he's got a head on his shoulders, there'll come a day when his nerve will fail him at the critical moment, and then you may expect to see his obituary notice in next morning's papers.

I had a terrible experience in this very connection when I first took to the business, and it taught me a lesson.

Though I have been in the taming line for years now, and there's not many men who can handle their beasts more surely than I can, I never touch a drop of drink until I have got my nightly performance off my mind. I am ready enough to join in a friendly glass with any of you fellows when the show is over; but before—no thanks!

I was very young at the time that this thing happened—had only just joined Westwood's show, in fact, and was apprenticed to a tamer named Robson, who carried as many scars on his body as if he had gone through half-a-dozen campaigns.

We went into a big cage together every night, and I stood by while he made the growling, snarling brutes skip round, feeling safe enough so long as I was under his wing.

Robson—or "Old Rob" as we used to call him—had been a noted man at this kind of thing in his day. He had the power of bending those savage beasts to his will. He could make them do almost anything.

Not only in England, but all over the Continent, he had exhibited before no end of celebrities, and could show as many medals on his breast as many a Crimean veteran.

But, unluckily for him, he had fallen into the bad habit of tilting his little finger far too much.

At first he used to wait until the show was over before he tackled the whiskey bottle; then, finding his nerves a bit slack I suppose he tried to brace them up beforehand in this way.

I confess that I felt uneasy about it, for lions and tigers are not to be trifled with, and it is no joke to face them when your only safeguard is a man who might step into the cage any night in a half-muddled condition. And of all places in the world where one requires to be quite sure of himself it is there.

Many a time I tried to coax the bottle away from Old Rob when he sat brooding over it an hour or so before we were due to appear. I pointed out the terrible risks to which he was exposing the pair of us, though there was little need to do that.

He saw it, knew it better than I could tell him. But though his eyes were wide open to the fact that there was death in that bottle for one or both of us, nothing on earth would induce him to part with it.

"Ah, lad," he would say, "I am not the man I used to be, and want something to stiffen me a bit. I've kept those snarling brutes under for many a long day; but their time will come, their time will come. They'll round on me yet."

One or two of the other chaps tried their hand on him also, but had to give it up as a bad job.

When they saw they couldn't turn him, they just stood aside, and let him go his own way.

But I stuck to him. He was a good sort, Old Rob, in spite of his faults; and—and—well, there was pretty little Nellie, his daughter, and she counted for something in this business.

Poor girl, her heart was nearly broken as she saw him drifting nearer and nearer to the catastrophe which we knew must come sooner or later. Many a time, when I saw that he had taken quite enough, and actually forced the bottle from his grasp, I have caught a grateful look in those honest grey eyes of hers that caused a little flutter within me, and well repaid me for my trouble.

Nellie Robson, you must know, was engaged in another part of the show. She did all the usual tricks on horseback—flying through paper hoops and that kind of thing—and a lot more besides.

Ever since she was a tiny child she had watched her father perform amongst the lions and tigers. As she grew up she was always prowling around the cages, studying the great beasts and their ways, until she knew every twist and turn of them by heart. I believe from the very first she had a hankering after a tamer's life. It may have been in her nature, for this sort of thing often runs in families, and I know she had spirit enough for that or anything else.

The cage which Old Rob and I entered every night contained an African lion, a Bengal tiger, a puma, and a panther. Of the whole four the tiger was the fiercest and the panther the most treacherous, but both were kept in awe by the King of Beasts himself.

When our turn came on, and the great cage with its fierce occupants was wheeled into the ring, Nellie Robson stole in from the dressing tent and hovered about quite near the entrance until the pair of us emerged safely from behind those iron bars. I knew right well that she was on thorns the whole time. And so was I for that matter; for though Old Rob's dull eye caught something of its former fire when he found himself face to face with those savage creatures, it was only a flash in the pan. The moment the performance was over his nerves simply went to pieces, and for the rest of the evening he was usually to be found in a pitiable state of collapse.

One night I noticed with inward misgiving that he did not seem at all up to the mark. Not that he had been drinking heavier than was his wont—less if anything—but his eye was not nearly so steady, and had a queer, uncertain look in it.

I did not like that look in it at all. To me it was a danger signal.

I went so far as to draw him aside and speak to him about it, telling him straight that he wasn't in a fit state to appear.

Unluckily, that did more harm than good. He was one of those men that you couldn't argue with; if he thought you were trying to cross him, it only made him the more determined to have his own way.

At the very first word he shook me off roughly, told me to mind my own business and not to meddle with his; and as our "call" came just then, he strode out into the ring with a face as black as a thundercloud. Well, I had roused the spirit in him a bit, if I hadn't done anything else.

All the same, my heart was down in my boots as I followed him across the arena. At every step my feet seemed to be weighted with lead. I felt an odd depression over me that evening, and for the life of me I couldn't shake it off.

As we entered the cage the four beasts scurried away to the further end, where they crouched in a quiver of rage, glaring at us with open mouths and savage growls.

It was always a ticklish moment, this; and Robson, as was his wont, stood perfectly still for a second or two with his eye on the brutes as if he were gauging their temper.

He appeared to be satisfied, for he advanced boldly into the centre of the cage and thrust a wooden pole out through the bars.

I took up my position with my back to his, holding a similar pole through the bars at the opposite side. Then, at the word of command from the tamer, the lion took a flying leap over the first barrier, the other animals following in rotation, and round and round they went in this manner.

We had got about half-way through the performance, and I was beginning to think we would come out of it all right after all, when one of those unforeseen and disconcerting accidents happened, which are always to be feared in a calling of this kind.

The tiger had just come round to Robson's side of the cage; but, instead of clearing the pole, for some unaccountable reason it pulled up almost in the very act of springing.

The panther, which was close behind, jostled up against the bigger brute, and like a flash, before you could realise what was happening, the pair rolled over at my companion's feet, snarling and tearing at each other.

To this day I don't know whether Robson imagined they were about to attack him, or if it was simply a case of blind, unthinking panic.

At any rate the incident seemed to throw him completely off his balance. Without giving a thought to me apparently, he dropped his pole and fled from the cage, the little grated door closing behind him with a crash that seemed to make my heart stand still.

For one single instant I stood there in the midst of those savage, snarling beasts, as powerless to move as if I were in the clutch of some appalling nightmare. And then, oh, heavens! the great tawny lion, which happened to be nearest to me, reared himself up on his hind legs with a roar that seemed to shake the whole place, the horrible red cavern of his mouth gaping before my very eyes. The next second with one tap of his mighty paw, he stretched me full-length upon the floor!

As I went down, a sound like the roaring of the sea smote upon my ears, and I knew that the vast crowd of spectators, seated all round the place in rising tiers, had started to their feet with cries of horror. I heard, too, the shouts of the attendants as they rushed towards the cage; and then came silence—a blank!

The time that I lay unconscious in that awful position seemed to me like a long night, though I learnt afterwards it was well under one minute.

When my senses returned I became aware of a heavy pressure on the lower part of my body and wondered what it was.

Opening my eyes I found that the lion had sunk upon me, and lay there with its two massive paws planted upon my chest, pinning me to the ground in such a manner that I couldn't move even if I wanted to.

Strange to say, when I realised how completely the great beast had me at his mercy, it awakened no concern within me. I experienced no sense of fear whatever. A sort of dreamy indifference took possession of me.

I was even curious as to when the brute would begin to tear me, and wondered what part of my body he would attack first.

I lay on my back, with my head towards the upper end of the cage.

The tiger, the puma, and the panther were at the lower end, but not one of them dared dispute possession of me with the lion.

And now, as I remained pinned there to the floor, it suddenly dawned upon my dazed senses that there was a strange hush in every part of the crowded building. Even without moving my head in the slightest degree, I beheld, as through a mist, a sea of white faces all round the place. But not a sound came from that vast throng; some great tension, some awful suspense seemed to hold them spellbound.

What was the meaning of it? Why were the attendants grouped outside the cage there in that state of intense, breathless watchfulness? Above all, what was there behind me at which the whole four brutes were glaring, and which seemed to enrage them so?

In an instant the answer to these puzzling questions flashed through my brain. Someone had entered the cage while I was unconscious, and was standing right behind me.

Opening my eyes to the fullest extent, I tried to throw my gaze back, and there—Good Heavens!—there, within a few feet of me, I beheld Nellie Robson!

Still in her circus attire, the brave girl stood in a half-crouching attitude, facing those savage beasts without a flinch or a waver, and holding them in check by her perfect knowledge of their ways and the power she had inherited from her father. The next second, without daring to turn her head, she dropped a few words through the bars to the attendants.

"Meat!" she said. "Bring them meat—quick!"

As the great chunks of raw flesh were thrust through the bars, the tiger, the puma, and the panther fell upon them savagely, and their rending and crunching could be plainly heard in the breathless hush.

But the lion was not so easily tempted. Though a huge joint was held within a foot of him, he merely turned his head and sniffed at it.

Then, as he saw it about to be withdrawn, he rose slowly from my body, and craned his neck out after it.

Quick as lightning Nellie's hand slid along the floor and took hold of me by the collar. Now was her chance. Gently—oh! so gently—she drew me towards her; and then—Ah! Heavens!

Seeing me move, the lion turned with an angry growl, and once more his heavy paw came down upon my chest, the savage claws digging deep into the flesh.

Again the joint was thrust forward, and again he was enticed away.

This time, however, the temptation proved too strong for him and he pounced upon the meat.

In a twinkling Nellie whipped me beyond his reach.

At the same instant the attendants shoved a high grating through the bars, ran it across the cage —and I was safe!

Well, if there was dead silence before, there was uproar enough now in all conscience. How that vast crowd swayed and roared!

The air was black with waving hats, and the white flutter of handkerchiefs. And then as I was dragged out of the cage, and Nellie sprang lightly down after me, the people burst into the ring on all sides, pressing eagerly forward to shake the brave girl by the hand, and cheering as if their very lives depended upon making all the row possible!

Poor old Rob never held up his head again after that awful night. He retired from the business altogether. But he always had a home with us—Nellie and myself —after we were married; and I don't know which of us, he or I were prouder of her. J. HORNIBROOK.

GREAT STATESMAN: "You were in rather a sad condition when you left the banquet the other night." Reporter: "Yes, I drank more than was good for me." Great Statesman: "So I noticed. And it showed in your report of my speech. It was terribly mixed up. Didn't the editor make a row about it?" Reporter: "No; he didn't blame me. He thought you were slightly intoxicated."

SIR JOHN MILLAIS had some very funny stories regarding his sitters. One day a lady, wife of an American parvenu, came to him to have her portrait painted. At the first sitting the lady asked the great artist, curiously, what were his most expensive colours. "Oh," replied Sir John, "vermilion——" "Indeed!" interrupted the lady quickly. "Then paint me all in vermilion, if you please; my husband doesn't mind expense." It is hardly necessary to say that Sir John did not accede to her wishes.

A Man of Spirit.

"Impudence, young man—confounded impudence—that's what I call it!" And old Mr. Widger accompanied his vocal thunder with a thump of his fist on his blotting-pad and glared at Edward Elliston.

"I'm sorry you call it that, sir," answered the "young man," in the sort of firm, respectful tone that means "Say what you like, but I'm going to get my way."

"Call it that! Why, what else should I call it? You come to me and ask for the hand of my daughter—you, an employe of mine—a clerk with a beggarly salary of three hundred."

"It's not my fault if the salary's beggarly, sir."

Mr. Widger waved the interruption away.

"Three hundred a-year," he finished. "What do you mean by it, sir?" Mr. Widger's thunder grew louder. "This is what comes of my treating you confidentially. I take you to my house, introduce you to my daughter, and you repay my kindness by falling in love with her! You have the temerity to become engaged to her. I took you to my bosom as a dove, only to find that you turn to out be a s—s——"

"Son-in-law!" finished Elliston, mildly.

"How dare you, sir! 'S—erpent,' I was about to say! Now understand me once for all, this engagement has got to come to an end."

"I hope so, sir," said Elliston, with fervent significance. "I trust we shall marry ere——"

"I mean the engagement must stop now—you understand? It must be broken off at once."

"Never, sir!"

Old Mr. Widger looked up quickly. This imperturbable young man was a little too much for him. He went red in the face, then purple, then—when governing calmness came—back to normal hue.

"Well, I must say, Mr. Elliston," he remarked, and now he was much gentler than before; "that you beat all the people I've ever met for cool cheek."

"It's a record-breaking age," ventured Elliston.

"Well, I should think it was," rejoined old Widger, fanning himself with a sheet of note-paper. "But I want you to know that you're not going to beat me. You're a smart young man, Mr. Elliston, and if you'd behaved yourself, you'd have got on. But when you come to me with this romantic nonsense, you make a mistake. It's only in stupid novels that clerks marry their employers' daughters. They don't do it in real life."

"Then I'm going to create a precedent."

"You're going to do nothing of the kind. You're going to get the sack! Do you hear? Unless you promise not to see or write to my daughter again, I'm going to discharge you from my employment."

"There is no necessity, sir. Kindly read that."

Elliston handed him an envelope, which Mr. Widger tore open.

"Oh, so you resign!" he said, when he had finished reading. "Then you fully expected that I should object to your engagement with my daughter?"

"Fathers always do, sir—in stupid novels," returned the young fellow drily.

"Hold your tongue!" yelled Mr. Widger. "You're very impertinent. . . . And since you resign, consider yourself out of my service from this moment. And remember that I forbid you ever to see my daughter again."

"I'll certainly remember it, sir; but I will not promise to comply with your request."

"Go out!" cried Mr. Widger, exasperated beyond bounds; "get out! You're a scoundrel, sir—an impudent scoundrel. Go!"

"Yes, I'll go!" returned the other as coolly as ever. "But before I go, I'd like to remind you that it's fortunate for you that you are Mabel's father."

"Why—what if I wasn't?"

"Well, only that I should punch your head! Good-day, Mr. Widger!" and Edward Elliston strode firmly from the office and out into the street.

"Phew!" he ejaculated to himself, as he let the cool air fan his heated brow. "I'm glad that's over! I wouldn't go through it again for ten thousand—or for anything or anybody—except Mabel of course. I'd do anything for her. And she told me to tackle her father boldly—that a mild, ordinary request wouldn't be of the least use. I was surely bold enough, but the thing is, I'm afraid, I've been a bit too bold. Lord, how he fumed!"

When Mr. Widger arrived home at Hampstead that night, he at once sent for his daughter.

"Mabel," he said sternly, "I have to-day received some astounding news."

"Indeed, papa!" and there was a look of complete innocence on pretty Mabel's face.

"Yes, that clerk of mine—that Elliston fellow—has had the audacity to tell me that he loves you. What does it mean?"

Mabel blushed, and her blue eyes sought the carpet.

"He spoke the truth, I think," she said simply.

"How dare he? How dare he?" I ask.

"Speak the truth?" Mabel dug the rug with the toe of a tiny slipper.

"No, I don't mean that," Mr. Widger snapped. "You're as bad as he is with your impertinent answers. How dare he fall in love with you—and how dare you encourage him?"

"Daddy, dear!" Mabel put her arms round her father's neck. "You don't really mind, do you? Ted—Mr. Elliston—loves me, and I love him dearly."

"Well, you'll have to stop it, that's all!" snorted Mr. Widger, and he gave a twist of his fingers as if he were turning off imaginary gas.

"The idea!" he went on—"the idea of your receiving the attentions of a mere clerk! You—an heiress!—it's preposterous! Why, he's not even a clerk now!"

Mabel inquired with her eyes.

"He's gone—I've discharged him. He's joined the ranks of the out-of-works."

Mabel paled a trifle and then flushed.

"Father! how could you do it?" she asked reproachfully.

"Do it? Why, I'd do it a hundred times if necessary. Such impudence!"

"You're very unjust!" and Mabel's eyes flashed indignantly. "It surely is no crime for us to love one another."

"Crime? It's worse! It's madness! But enough of this—I dismiss the subject for ever."

"You're very cruel!"

"I'm very hungry. I want my dinner!"

* * * * *

Edward Elliston was not out of work long. No man with an ounce of common-sense and a whole ton of energy ever is. And Master Edward had both in full weight. He got another berth soon at two-hundred a-year, and four months after that, induced his new employer to increase it to three hundred. So that he was once more on his old pecuniary footing. He was saving money, too.

Meanwhile, of course, he had been seeing Mabel. Brief, clandestine meetings they were for the most part, but the sweeter for that. The course of true love never did run smooth—most lovers would be terribly bored if it did. So Edward was attracted by the difficulties, and simply delighted in these surreptitious meetings.

But his face straightened when, one evening, while they wandered through the woodland paths of Hampstead Heath, Mabel confided to him that she had something serious to tell him.

"What is it, darling?" he asked.

Her eyes timidly sought his for a moment, then dimmed and turned half away, as she replied:

"It's papa!"

"What of him?"

"I don't know how to tell you—but he's so horrid!"

His eyes flashed fire.

"What's he been doing now, my own darling?" He fixed the note of interrogation with a kiss.

She looked as if, under the same conditions, she would have liked the question repeated.

He repeated part of it—omitting the words.

"Papa wants me to marry."

"So do I, my darling; there's nothing horrid in that."

"Oh, but he wants me to marry someone else."

Edward Elliston sprang back a step.

"Marry someone else!" he cried in quite a dramatic manner. "His name—his name, I say!" He looked as if he would have added, "that I may have his blood." But he didn't.

"It's Count Slumpski—a Russian nobleman."

"A Russian!" Edward looked aghast. "Mabel, it must never be!"

Mabel opened her beautiful eyes wide.

"Why, of course, it mustn't! But papa is very much in earnest about it. He mentions the matter every day."

Edward Elliston remained silent for a minute or two. Then suddenly he turned his eyes full upon the girl at his side.

"Mab," he said firmly, "there is only one thing to do. We must elope!"

Mabel blushed to the roots of her hair, then, to hide her confusion, buried her face on Edward's shoulder, with just a little exclamatory "Oh, Ted!"

Ted let her go on burying her confusion. He was always most considerate in such things. It took some time; and by the time her confusion had been effectually buried, the whole matter was arranged.

"I shall be having a fortnight's holiday soon," observed Ted. "We can get married and go on our honeymoon then."

* * * * *

On a day, about a month later, Mr. and Mrs. Edward Elliston alighted from a train at Brighton. They had been married quietly that morning, and had come to the popular south coast resort for their honeymoon.

Edward hailed a cab.

"Grand Promenade Hotel," he directed the driver, and, ten minutes later, they were there.

Scarcely had they been shown into their sitting-room, when a servant entered with a card.

Edward took it up with wonder in his eyes. Wonder grew to amazement, as he read the card—

MR. JOSIAH WIDGER.

with a pencilled inscription in the corner. "Must see you at once in No. 37."

Edward turned a little bit pale.

Mabel darted to his side.

"What is it, dear?" she asked anxiously. "You look ill."

"All right," said Edward, recovering himself, and addressing the waiting servant, "you may go. I'll see the gentleman who sent you in a moment."

Then, as the door closed, he turned to Mabel.

"Mab, my darling," he said, "don't be alarmed, but your father is here."

"Father here! Oh, Ted, Ted! He must have seen me slip away this morning, and been suspicious. Jane, my maid, must have told him. I had to confide in her. And now he's come to take me back."

"No, no, my darling!" Edward consoled, "he can't do that. You're my wife now, and nothing on earth can ever part us. But he's here, and wants to see me. I must go and see him."

There was a grimness about Edward's tone and look that startled Mabel. She clung to her husband's arm, and in a tone of supplication, begged him not to be too hard on her father.

"Remember, Ted, dear, he has always been so fond of me, and must be excused if his feelings get the better of him."

"But, Mab, he's not a tenth part as fond of you as I am, so I must be excused if my feelings get the better of me. However," Edward pursued, as he saw the tears coming into Mabel's eyes, "for your sake I'll be gentle with him." And having kissed her twice, he quitted the room. With compressed lips and clenched hands he arrived at the door of No. 37. He paused for a moment. Then he knocked.

"Come in!"

Edward Elliston stood face to face with Mr. Widger.

"Ha!" ejaculated the latter; "and so, sir, you've come?"

"It appears so!" Edward remarked quietly.

"So it does. And now you're here, aren't you ashamed of yourself, sir?"

Edward looked at his father-in-law square in the eyes, and returned:

"Not the least bit in the world, sir! I've done nothing to be ashamed of."

"Oh, you haven't, haven't you? You don't think then, that it's disgraceful of you to carry off my daughter and marry her?"

"On the contrary, Mr. Widger, of all things I have done in my life, it's the act of which I'm most proud."

"You stole my daughter, sir! You're a thief!"

Edward's fists clenched tighter than ever. He advanced a step. Then he checked himself, and said very sternly:

"Mr. Widger you presume on our relationship. If you were not Mabel's father I should knock you down."

As Edward spoke, the features of Mr. Widger suddenly relaxed, and to Edward's utmost surprise, he broke into a fit of the most uncontrollable laughter.

"Oh—oh—oh—oh!" he roared. "You're too much! You threatened some time ago to punch my head, and now you threaten to knock me down—all because I presume too much on our relationship. Oh—oh—oh!"

He paused a moment, mopped his brow with his handkerchief, and then, having controlled himself, he advanced with outstretched hand to the amazed Edward Elliston.

"Edward, my boy, give me your hand! Accept my heartiest congratulations. Fetch Mabel in as well—I want to congratulate her, too!"

Edward looked as though he thought Mr. Widger were mad.

"No, my boy, I'm not crazy," remarked the old man. "I'm really delighted. I opposed your marriage with my daughter because I wanted to make sure you were the right kind of man for her. I didn't want her to marry a fool. I wanted her to have for a husband a man of spirit. And that's just what you are. So shake hands and accept my congratulations."

The astounded Edward shook hands, unable to utter a word.

"And now, Edward," went on Mr. Widger cheerily, "take me to my little girl."

The scene between Mabel and her father was one of hysterical joy.

"But, papa," she asked presently, with a blush, "how did you know I had run away this morning?"

"Know, you little minx; why, of course, I knew! Do you think I haven't been aware of your clandestine meetings with this rascal Edward here for the past few months? When the man had the spirit to throw up a good berth with me and start all over afresh, I guessed I had a man of pluck and determination to deal with. And that's just what Edward is. Why, Mab, do you know, he threatened to knock your poor old dad down because I presumed too much on our relationship! Oh—oh—oh!" And the old fellow went off into another hearty fit of laughter.

"Well," observed Edward; "now that you're down here sir, you'll stay of course to dinner?"

"No, no," replied the old merchant. "I'll drink your healths in a glass of champagne; but as for staying to dinner, certainly not. Shouldn't have liked it myself when I was honeymooning, and shan't inflict a father-in-law's presence on you."

And, despite all protestations, Mr. Widger insisted on catching the six o'clock train back to London.

"Good-bye!" he said, as the young couple were seeing him off. "Good-bye, and God bless you! And, oh, Edward, here's a little wedding present for you. Buy Mab something nice and keep the rest for housekeeping." And he thrust a piece of paper into Edward's hand just as the train moved off.

"Why," remarked Edward, as they made their way out of the station; "it's a cheque—a cheque for £1,000! What a brick your father is, darling!"

"I'm so glad!" replied "darling." "But you deserve it, you know, because you are a man of spirit." And she smiled sweetly.

"I'm a man in high spirits, anyhow!" Edward replied.

And both made their way back to the hotel in the happiest of moods.

SEEN YOUR PHOTO IN SHORT STORIES?

IF SO, YOU WILL GET £5.

HERE IS THE SCHEME.

We have in our possession a considerable number of photographs of men, women, and children of all grades of society, secured for us by our agents, who have scoured the United Kingdom for this special purpose.

Each week we publish five of these portraits, and to each of the persons thus represented we dispatch the sum of £5, on his or her forwarding a claim on a post-card addressed to PORTRAIT DEPARTMENT, "SHORT STORIES," Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Although the persons whose portraits will appear in this competition are quite unknown to us personally, we have their names and addresses in our possession, and, therefore, a claim can be settled at once, without risk of fraud.

We may say that our agents are still at work all over the country. It is, therefore, possible that your portrait may appear at any moment without your knowing it. So you should watch SHORT STORIES.

Is your portrait here? If so, drop us a post-card, and get £5. Five more portraits will appear next week.

All claims in connection with the portraits below must reach the address already given above by Tuesday next, November 19th. Full names and addresses of the correct claimants will appear in succeeding numbers.

HOW TO MAKE A CLAIM FOR A £5 NOTE.

Simply write on a post-card these words:

> The Portrait No.......... (here put number of portrait) in the current number of SHORT STORIES is mine. Please forward a £5 note.
> (Name and full address.)

Persons represented must claim for themselves. Claims made by other people on their behalf will be ignored.

Stanley Green's Deception.

"No luck again, Madge," groaned Stanley Green, as he entered the room in which his wife was anxiously awaiting him. "How is Dora? Has the doctor been?"

There was a moment's pause before Madge replied; she was trying to recover from the pang of disappointment which had shot through her on hearing her husband's first words and also from the emotion caused by his inquiries.

"I am very sorry, Stanley dear, but—but perhaps our ill-fortune will turn soon. No, our little darling is no better, the doctor says, and I—I fear—she is worse. Doctor Leyton says we must give her all the nourishment we can. She is sleeping just now and I hope——"

She was unable to finish the sentence, for there seemed but little room for hoping that the black cloud which overshadowed them would soon lift.

"Oh, Heaven, why are we so sorely tried?" cried Stanley, the words wrung from him by bitterness of heart. "Ever since I was ill three years ago, misfortune has followed us unceasingly. For myself I do not care, but for you and our little one—Oh, it is too hard!"

These words brought strength to Madge as nothing else would have done.

She rose from her seat, crossed the room to where her husband stood with half-uplifted hands and with anguish written on every feature, and placed her arms lovingly round his neck.

"Stanley," she said gravely and tenderly after she had kissed him, "it is the duty of a man to suffer and be strong! Oh, my dear husband, it would be the last drop—the drop that would make my cup of sorrow overflow—if you, my ideal, were to falter and fail under trial!"

"Man is kept strong by such angels as you!" cried Stanley, passionately kissing her and pressing her to his breast.

They had been married five years. People said that Madge, although she could not exactly claim to be pretty or of higher social standing than Stanley Green, might have made a much better match. She had had at least one suitor who possessed money, and they could not understand why she should prefer to be the wife of a man holding a position in an office at a salary of two hundred a year, even if he were possessed of capabilities that would insure his rising.

But they had not seen Stanley Green in the same light as Madge had seen him; and she had joyfully become his wife, and for two years their happiness was as perfect as human happiness could be.

Then the demon influenza had laid his grasp on Stanley and when he had recovered from a severe illness it was to find that his once brilliant mental powers had been terribly impaired. His memory failed him at intervals with startling suddenness, and at others, he did the most stupid things—from a business point of view—although he believed at the moment that they were quite correct. The result was that he lost the situation which had been kept open for him during his illness; he had obtained others, only to lose them after a short period of service. The little stock of money soon disappeared, trinkets and other things were disposed of; Stanley obtained some odd work now and then and Madge did a little in various ways, so they just managed to keep afloat, and now, to crown the edifice of trouble, their little one had fallen ill.

When husband and wife returned to the little sitting-room, they felt more calm and were able to discuss the situation quietly. Their deliberations were interrupted by a tap at the door; it proved to be the landlady's maid of all work, who brought a packet for Mr. Green.

"It must be the jelly," said Stanley, cutting the string. "I had clean forgotten it. I met John Harcourt this morning and he asked how we were. I did not tell him how low down we were, but I said that Dora was very ill and he was good-natured enough to promise to send this. The little darling will enjoy it, won't she, Madge?"

"Yes."

The word came slowly from Madge's lips, while a slight tinge of red mounted to her cheeks.

John Harcourt had been her well-to-do suitor, but he had attracted her very little; she knew of nothing against him but she had not cared for him.

When Stanley appeared on the scene, Harcourt's chance of success completely vanished, and this fact the latter had not forgotten nor forgiven.

On the following morning Harcourt again met Stanley as the latter was wandering from place to place in search of work. Again he made the same kindly inquiries, and in the afternoon another delicacy was sent for the little one, whose condition remained unaltered.

During the next ten days Harcourt met Stanley four times and on as many occasions a delicacy was conveyed to the house in which they lived.

On the eleventh day, Stanley suddenly found an arm linked in his and heard Harcourt's voice.

"You must come and have lunch with me at the club, my dear fellow. I'm sure you can spare the time—your business cannot be immediately pressing, and it is nearly one o'clock. You commercial men do eat sometimes, I suppose? You always seem to be so confoundedly busy that I really doubt it at times."

Stanley's face flushed and he tried to utter some words of excuse, but Harcourt merely said "Tut, tut!" and drew him along with a firm grip,

Stanley ate but little of the good things that were placed before him, for his thoughts went away to the little sitting-room where Madge was probably dining off bread and cheese.

The food seemed to choke him. Oh, if he could only have her with him to share it!

Luncheon over, Harcourt insisted that they should spend a few minutes in the smoking-room and Stanley felt powerless to refuse. He was weak from worry and proper food, and his morning's tramp had nearly exhausted him; he was partly fascinated by the other man and allowed himself to be led to a favourite corner and installed on a cushioned seat.

Harcourt took good care that his guest should partake freely of wine and then he began to talk. His words were uttered in a quiet tone and with an air of concern, his eyes at the same time watching every expression on Stanley's face.

At first the latter did not catch the meaning of what was said; the wine had contributed to make his mind still more confused, and it was not until he caught the name of Kate Barbour that he really began to understand.

Kate Barbour! He had almost forgotten that shallow-pated girl who had been rather sweet on him before he had become betrothed to Madge; what little brains she possessed had always been filled with romantic ideas culled from cheap novelettes, and the fact that she was still Miss Kate Barbour was a proof that, despite her independent income, she was not attractive enough to be selected as a partner by any sensible man.

"But perhaps I am wronging her," thought Stanley with some remorse. "She was a long way from being to my liking, but she had some good in her, I believe. But what is Harcourt talking about?"

Then, aloud to his companion, he continued:

"I beg your pardon, but I fear I have not heard all you have said. What was that about Miss Barbour?"

Harcourt was not in the least put out by his companion's inattention and he began again.

"Miss Barbour and you were on friendly terms at one time, I know, so I need not tell you that she has some foolish notions. Now, she has of late conceived the notion that it would be a splendid thing to be run off with by some suitable member of our sex. Well, her aunt, who is a friend of mine, is afraid that the silly woman will run away with some worthless scamp and wishes to avoid that catastrophe and teach her a lesson, It is quite on the cards that some fellow will try to do it for her money."

"Yes," said Stanley inquiringly, "and what is that to do with me now?"

Harcourt coughed drily and took a sip at his glass before continuing.

"Mrs. Evin and I have decided upon a plan by which we hope to cure the young lady of her foolish notion. In order to carry out that plan we must have the services of a thoroughly trustworthy man. We want you to be that man."

"Please explain further," requested Stanley hesitatingly.

The idea was not altogether pleasing.

"To put it briefly," returned Harcourt, "we have schemed an elopement—that is, a pretended one. We want you to be the man to run away with her."

"The idea is absurd!" exclaimed Stanley. "How on earth am I to run away with her?"

"Didn't I tell you that it was merely a pretence?" asked the other in an injured tone. "The girl will be mad at first, but she will soon get over that and in time she will herself thank you for it. You will have nothing whatever to do but to go with her somewhere—wherever you like—except that I may possibly ask you to write a letter to Miss Barbour just to make the thing look plausible."

Stanley flatly refused, but Harcourt was not daunted. He knew his man, and was convinced that by judicious appeals to Stanley he could so work on the man through his love for his wife and child that he could induce the unhappy husband and father to yield.

It took more persuasion, however, than Harcourt imagined; he offered Stanley twenty pounds for his assistance, then thirty, then fifty.

Fifty pounds!

Stanley's brain degan to whirl; for that sum he had worked three whole months even in his days of fortune —what did it mean to him now! Would he be doing anything very wrong, after all?

He would not dare to tell Madge the truth, for he knew instinctively that she would not agree; he must tell her a falsehood. He had never deceived her before and he hated to do it now, for she believed in him so implicitly; but fifty pounds might save them all, so did not the end justify the means?

Harcourt could see that his victim was yielding and he clinched the matter by a renewed offer.

"We'll make it seventy-five pounds. We are not particular to a few pounds so long as we save this girl from probable harm."

"I'll do it!" exclaimed Stanley. And they shook hands on it.

"I have already begun to carry out this scheme," said Harcourt, "and the girl believes that she has been in correspondence with an ardent, but unknown admirer, who dare not woo her openly just now for certain powerful reasons which he will explain later. The correspondence has been managed through the medium of a small shop keeper, and the admirer's letters have all been type-written. But now that the thing is coming to a head, you must write a note in your own handwriting, making the appointment, just to make it look genuine. Have I not told you that I have arranged all the details?" he demanded somewhat tartly as Stanley was beginning a question.

Stanley gave up further opposition, deciding to concern himself only so far as absolutely required. Seventy-five pounds! The vision haunted him, and nerved him to crush all qualms of conscience at his duplicity.

Two days later, Mr. John Harcourt was ushered into the presence of Miss Kate Barbour and at once began a hurried apology.

"My dear Miss Barbour, it is with the most profound regret—really I am most vexed! I have important business, which is taking me away from town this very afternoon and I shall be unable to accompany you to the North to-night. What a shame! I am afraid that you will have to go by daylight and alone."

"Oh!" ejaculated the young woman in a tone of deep disappointment. "And we had planned it so nicely. I was quite looking forward to a night journey."

"I knew you would be disappointed, so—I hope you won't blame me."

"What?"

"I have taken it upon myself to find a trustworthy friend to go with you, so that you might have your way in spite of all. I have spoken to Mr. Stanley Green, who has business in Marlington and was going to-morrow, but has consented to travel by the midnight train and act as your escort. You know him."

"Oh, that will do nicely. Mr. Green—I thought he was a nice man some time ago, and I suppose he hasn't altered."

"We have been friends for years," Harcourt assured her. "And it will be—like an elopement," he added slily.

"So it will! I'll tell him that just to make him feel uncomfortable, that I will!"

Stanley Green came back in great haste on the morning of the eventful day and astonished Madge by telling her that he had secured a temporary appointment in his old firm; he was to go off at once to the provinces and would be away for three days, after which he would take up a subordinate position in the office, and he handed the delighted Madge five pounds, which he said was an advance of salary kindly made by the head of the firm.

The landlady of the house was surprised beyond description when Madge appeared at her door with a smiling face and held out a sovereign as a first payment of the arrears of rent; the young mother seemed completely transformed.

The cloud was lifting at last; Stanley had got a situation, which, as his memory was now better he would doubtless keep, and Dora was rallying. The silver lining was showing itself; Madge's heart was glad.

The day waned and night fell; it was ten o'clock and Madge was asking herself whether she might venture to retire. Since five o'clock Dora had been worse and she feared a relapse; she had not sent specially for the doctor and, as the child now seemed easy again and Madge was very tired, she decided to snatch a little sleep.

She had hardly arrived at this decision, when a tap came at the door and the servant peeped in to say that a gentleman wished to see Mrs. Green on very urgent business.

It was Harcourt. He had followed the girl upstairs and now entered the room with an apology for intruding.

"Mrs. Green," he said gravely, "in spite of our old acquaintance I would not dare to make this intrusion had I not something of the gravest importance to communicate."

"My husband!" exclaimed Madge, turning pale with fear. "Something has happened to him!" She clutched his arm imploringly. "Oh, do not keep me in suspense!"

"Pray calm yourself, Mrs. Green," admonished her visitor, soothingly. "No bodily harm has come to him; the mischief is moral."

"It would be well to await his return and make the charge in his presence," Madge said with a mixture of haughtiness and anger, as she half-raised her hand to point to the door.

"He will not return. He has found someone more to his liking and with money enough to lift him out of poverty and keep him out of it."

Harcourt prepared himself for an outbreak of anger, but the result was different. Madge was weak with mental strain and physical work, and her remaining strength failed her under these terrible words. She tottered to the nearest chair and sank on it, her face as white as death.

"It's false!" she gasped in a husky whisper.

"I know how this must pain you," continued Harcourt tenderly. "And I would not have undertaken the task of telling you, but that the affection I once expressed is still as strong as ever and—Oh, I can no longer stand by and see your husband deceive you, Madge!"

For once in his life Harcourt made a mistake; the intrusion of these words of love in the midst of her anguish filled Madge with indignation and infused renewed strength into her exhausted frame. With blazing eyes she sprang to her feet and pointed to the door.

"Go!" she cried, her usually sweet voice hoarse with passion. "How dare you insult my husband and myself in this way? He would never stoop to even one of those petty acts which are as nothing to others! he is the soul of honour and I will believe nothing against him. I will believe in him against the whole world. Go!"

"I can give you convincing proof," said Harcourt, once more self-possessed. "I can show you a letter written by him to Miss Kate Barbour, a former sweetheart; and I can take you to the railway-station, where you can see him keep the assignation with your own eyes."

He took from his pocket the letter which he had induced Stanley to write, but which of course never reached the addressee. He held it so that Madge could see it by the the light of the oil lamp; her eyes went to the sheet of paper because she believed that it would prove false and so vindicate her husband. But she started on seeing the handwriting and mechanically took it from him and read it through.

There was no doubt about the handwriting, and the contents were plain enough. Once more strength failed the overwrought body and she sank on her knees and burst into a flood of tears.

* * * * *

It wanted but five minutes to midnight when Stanley Green and Miss Barbour entered the booking-office. Stanley hurried to the window and asked nervously for two first-class tickets, quite unconscious that his wife's eyes were fixed upon him and that her ears were strained to catch his every word. She had agreed to watch for him, still half-believing that Harcourt's information was false.

She would probably have rushed up to him, but Harcourt thought it prudent to detain her by urging her to let the guilty man actually go into the train so that he should be unable to invent any excuse.

Stanley offered his arm to his companion and conducted her to the platform where a train was waiting.

"Thank Heaven!" he muttered, as he sank back among the cushions. "I am glad that Harcourt has arranged it so that she does not expect me to make love to her—I really could not do it, not for seventy-five pounds! But she certainly is quiet for a girl who is being run away with. Poor Madge! How I have deceived her. I have done it so that she and our little girl may benefit."

He was still thinking of his wife and staring dreamily out of the window when the train started. As it glided along the platform his eyes fell upon a figure; he turned white as he caught the accusing eyes and expression of that white face and uttered a groan of "Madge!"

Madge herself fled wildly from the station, and before Harcourt could recover himself and follow her she was lost to view.

That journey seemed like an age to Stanley Green and he scarcely spoke a word all the time, somewhat to Miss Barbour's disgust and alarm, for she thought he looked ill.

It did not surprise Stanley to find a carriage waiting for her at that early hour, because that was part of the plan, but he was just conscious enough to feel rather astonished that Miss Barbour made no fuss about her elopement being thwarted—in fact she seemed to take it as a matter of course.

Stanley saw her into the carriage and then dashed back into the station to ask the time of the first train to London. The irregularity of his conduct did not strike him at all. But his action upset part of Harcourt's plan, for the latter had arranged to have him waylaid and kept confined for a few days.

It was noon on the following day before Stanley Green, weary in body and mind, reached his home.

"Madge, Madge!" he cried as he entered. "Oh, Madge——"

"Stanley Green," said a voice which he scarcely recognised, "our ways are separate from this moment!"

"Madge," he cried in desperation, "listen to me! I deceived you, I am a wretched and despicable man, but——"

"In there," she interrupted in a toneless voice, pointing to the bedroom, "lies all that remains of the child you deserted. She had a relapse and died before—before I could get back. Look at her, and then go your way! Do not come here to me to deceive me again; you cannot deceive me, for I have found you out."

"But, Madge, listen to me!" cried Stanley desperately.

He understood that his wife believed him guilty and he was horrified.

"I know I deceived you, my dear, but it is not what you think. Oh, Madge, do not harbour such thoughts against me. Listen to me, dear, and I will explain all."

Madge was about to interrupt, when he stepped forward and took her in his arms, despite her struggles.

He understood that the terrible ordeal had affected her mind.

"You shall listen to me, Madge," he cried almost fiercely, as he kissed her passionately. "I have done wrong, but I did it for your sake—for your sake, Madge!"

The appeal in his voice and his eyes seemed to sink into Madge's very soul and arouse her from her half-demented condition. She gave a great sob and yielded to his embrace with the words:

"I ought to have known. I have done wrong as well."

Side by side they sat and each told the story of the past few hours, and light began to dawn upon the dark mystery. There had been a plot against them.

When the first burst of grief at the death of his little one had passed away, Stanley's heart was filled with a fierce desire to inflict punishment upon the man who had sought to ruin his domestic life and had partly succeeded.

He would have gone in search of Harcourt had not Madge restrained him.

Towards evening, as they were finishing a frugal tea of which they had forced themselves to partake, they were startled by a rap at the door, followed by the turning of the handle and the entrance of a male figure.

The new-comer was evidently as much surprised at seeing two occupants of the room as those two people were at seeing him, for he uttered an exclamation and would have retreated. But Stanley rushed at him and clutched him by the throat.

"You villain!" shouted Stanley as he shook Harcourt with all his strength.

"Let me go!" gurgled Harcourt.

Madge hurried to the struggling men and begged her husband to desist, for Stanley was throttling his opponent.

Stanley loosened his grasp enough to allow Harcourt to breathe and hesitated for a moment; then he suddenly twisted Harcourt round and kicked him down the stairs and into the street, where the much rumpled, hatless and smarting plotter was glad to take to his heels.

On the following morning they received another unexpected visit, the visitor being none other than Miss Kate Barbour.

"I have come to make an explanation and I should like to speak to your wife alone, Mr. Green."

Stanley bowed in silence, and went out of the house. Then Kate seated herself opposite Madge and began to ask questions and make her own statement.

"What a rascal he is!" she cried, her tones betraying both vengefulness and vexation. "I know I am rather silly and giddy, but fancy a man taking advantage of that in order to work out a plot against someone else! But I'll pay him out for it! It was my aunt who set me thinking and then I found out that Mr. Green had returned to London, so that he could not have had any business in the town. So at last I was so worried that I decided to come back and get to the bottom of it. By a little trickery I got your address from one of Harcourt's servants and here I am."

There was silence for a little while and then Kate continued:

"You are in very bad circumstances," she said gently, "and I intend to atone for my foolishness by helping you. No!"—as Madge opened her lips—"It will do me good to be of some use; I feel that I have led a very useless existence. Come, my dear Mrs. Green, let us be friends."

Madge was sorely in need of sympathy and a friend, and she allowed the other to take her hands and press them. Then Kate Barbour acted the part of a true woman and drew her new friend closer to her while Madge sobbed in mingled sorrow and joy.

Kate was as good as her word, and in less than a week Stanley was in a new situation in a firm in which Miss Barbour had an interest.

She helped the Greens unobtrusively in many ways and brought sunshine into the home once more. She also contrived to make things so uncomfortable for Mr. Harcourt that he deemed it advisable to take up his residence permanently on the Continent.

Miss Kate Barbour, still unmarried, often pays a visit to the Greens, where she is vociferously welcomed by a sturdy youngster who rejoices in the same name as his father and who calls her "auntie."

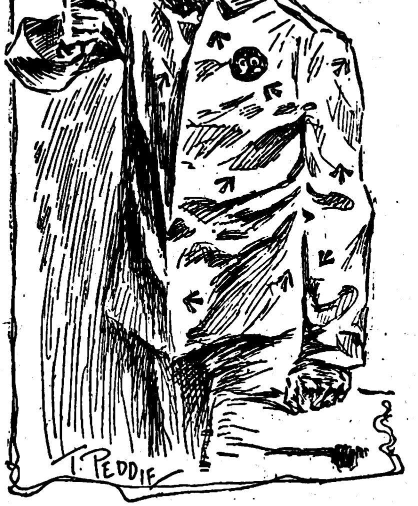
DEAD TO THE WORLD



By

Henry T. Johnson.

Author of "Cruce Vincit," "The Pride of the Ring," etc., etc.

SYNOPSIS OF FIRST CHAPTERS.

Richard Seldon, a convict, escapes. In a train he meets Cyril Roylance just back from Australia, whom he murders and impersonates. He assumes the rôle of squire, and pays attention to Doris Dale.

While visiting the Dales, the butler is murdered by Seldon and two accomplices, but he so manages that the guilt is fixed on Jack Branscombe, Doris' lover. Branscombe is away from home when the verdict against himself is pronounced, and on his return meets Doris.

Nearer and nearer came the sound of horses' hoofs, and the voices of the mounted man and the companion walking beside him. And Branscombe, listening as it seemed with heart as well as ears, thrilled as he heard his name.

"That was the man, Mr. Rossiter, no doubt," the mounted policeman was saying. "Pity there was only one chap on the down platform at Mattingham, and he a sleepy-headed dunderhead; but, wool gatherer as he was, when he noticed how the man hurried with his cap peak pulled down and his ulster collar turned up, and besides that his ticket was for Hazelwick, the station beyond, it set him wondering, and if he'd only had the sense and pluck to have set out after him then and there, we might by this time have had the bracelets on Barker's murderer. We gave it him pretty straight, I can tell you, about letting him slip, but by the time he'd done wondering there was another train coming up, that had to be cleared, and by that time, of course, the man had got a clear start, so the chief ordered me to ride over and warn you."

"I am much obliged to him," said Rossiter. "I'll have this district scoured and my men posted at every likely spot. By the bye, I'll plant one here," and as he spoke he walked up to the lych-gate, peered inside, and stood within a few yards of the very spot where Doris and Jack crouched, holding their very breaths.

And it seemed to them that the beating of their own hearts would betray their hiding place, as, after a pause of seconds, which seemed to them so many hours, of agonising suspense, he turned away, and the sound of footsteps and horses' hoofs receded, and at last merged, into the silence of the night.

"Jack, Jack," she whispered; "you see how the toils are closing round you."

"Yes, yes," he answered; "and surely it is best for me to face my accusers."

"Not with your hands bound as they are by the threads woven of suspicion, of deluding circumstance, and unhappy mischance. No! you shall not seal the unjust doom that hovers over you."

"What can I do?" he asked in a tone of bitterness, maddened at his very helplessness in the face of falsely accusing circumstance.

"That we must think out," said Doris. "For the present you must—you shall—put yourself in my hands, and I will be your guide."

Before he could argue, or even remonstrate, she had seized his arm, led him by the path through the nut coppice that closed like a leafy screen behind them as they entered, and so to the shrubberies of the Grange and to a postern gate which, by a secret spring, she opened; that very postern gate by which her loyal ancestor had led out his fugitive king in the guise of a serving man, with the pack horses waiting at that very lych-gate. Closing on its rusty hinges, that iron-clamped and studded oaken door, she led him by a dark and winding narrow passage to that secret chamber wherein the second Charles had lain safe in cover while the Roundhead pack were drawing all the county blank. Then, leaving him there while she went in quest of food and comforts for him, she drew a bolt, pushed aside a canvas frame, stepped down into the library, then, with her own fair hands, replaced the picture by Sir Peter Lely of the second Charles, covering the very hiding place of the original of that historic portrait.

And not a moment too soon; for her father, entering the library, said:

"Doris, it is time for you to dress. Remember we are dining with the Ponsonby Smiths this evening, and it's a long drive to Brettelby Court."

“Very well, father,” she replied.

“And, Doris,” he went on, “I want to speak to you seriously. It has come as a great shock to me the news of your persistence in that foolish entanglement with that young scoundrel.”

“Scoundrel, father?”

“You know very well whom I mean.”

“Yes, father, I can guess, but the man you mean has not yet been even tried for—for what you mean; still less has he been found guilty.”

“No!” thundered her father angrily, “and why? Because he has flown from justice! No more of this, I have done with imploring and intreating. I command you to dismiss out of your thoughts, out of your heart, yes, out of your life, this wretch who has already done so much to darken it. You are going to-night among people of your own set and class——”

Even in the midst of her grief, thinking of the Ponsonby Smiths, Doris smiled.

“Friends who are disposed to save you from your own folly and to gloss over the imprudence with which you have linked your name to one that has so swiftly sprung into criminal notoriety. And, in particular, you will meet one there who is ready, able, willing, eager, to give you even now the shelter of his own good name. You know who I mean, you know what I mean! It has not pleased Providence to bless me with a son; disobey me, and remember I cease to have a daughter!”

He watched her sternly as she glided, pale and silent as a spectre, out of the door, and even with anger at what he deemed her disobedience raging in his heart, he could but feel a pang of pity there too, for, with all his pride, and notwithstanding that he was intent upon her carrying into effect the plan of his pride, that plan was formulated, so far as he forced himself to believe, in her interest, as well as in his own—and he loved his daughter!

But he loved the fame of his ancient house even more; if it came to a choice between his daughter and the honour of his house he knew which he would cast aside, and he knew it would not be the honour of his house! And thinking of the man who, to his mind, had brought about the gulf between himself and his child, the man whom he believed had, in cold blood, foully murdered his old and faithful friend and servant, he clenched his hands and teeth.

“The wretch! the villain!” he exclaimed. “Oh, John Branscombe, it is well for you that you are far beyond my reach, for, if it were not so, I myself, with my own hands, would give you into the hangman's.”

He little guessed that there beyond the mellowed canvas from which the debonair, beruffled Charles beamed down, John Branscombe, bowed with anguish, heard.

CHAPTER XV.

“A Quick Change.”

“We've got the right sort, to-night, Maria,” said Mr. Ponsonby Smith, with a smile as broad as his white waistcoat, and Mrs. Ponsonby Smith with dignified asperity replied:

“Did you expect the wrong sort at my table, Joseph?”

“No, my dear, only”—and unable to find a suitable explanation, Mr. Ponsonby Smith ejaculated: “You're a wonderful woman!”

“Yes,” replied the lady, “I should like Rebecca to be here to-night.” For Rebecca was Mrs. Ponsonby Smith's sister, and at a stage in their upward flight when the Ponsonby Smiths had not reached their present altitude had emphatically and acidly expressed her conviction that Joe might buy a place in the country, but with all his money he wouldn't buy a place in county society, and Mrs. Ponsonby Smith reflected with complacency that while Rebecca, whom she had never forgiven for having years ago presumed to look down upon Ponsonby Smith because he kept a butter shop, while she had married a solicitor's managing clerk who was learning his articles, was struggling to make ends meet on about three hundred pounds a year, she was entertaining to dinner, amongst others, two county magistrates, one member of Parliament, a real live lord, and their respective womankind. For the solicitor's managing clerk was still a managing clerk, albeit a solicitor, but Joseph Ponsonby Smith was a millionaire. For Joseph had prospered. In the first place, he had had a fire, and, phœnix like, out of the ashes of the little shop with one window there had arisen a provision store with a plate-glass double frontage. And Joseph had got on to the Vestry, shortly after which he had developed a happy knack of acquiring small properties which happened to have to make way for parochial improvements, and in such cases, of course, even vestrymen have to be properly compensated. By and bye, Joseph took another shop, and another, and yet others, and by and bye, in many quarters many men drove Joseph's horses in Joseph's carts. And on and on he went along the high road to prosperity with accumulating velocity. And the wife of his bosom severely subdued her sister by referring with sniffs to her husband's clerks, and his cashiers, and his managing clerks! And Rebecca went home and wept.

In those days the Ponsonby Smiths were only the Smiths; it was at a later day that they took up the prefix Ponsonby, one of the shops being in Ponsonby-street. At the date of our making their acquaintance they were contemplating, by license, reversing the position of the Smith and the Ponsonby, as doubtless in the fulness of time they will drop Smith.

“Now, Joseph,” said the lady, “mind, you'll offer your arm to Lady Limberg; she's an old cat, but she's a very old family, and these people they've got their ways, and you must ask his lordship to take me down. He's an old fool, but he's a lord, though he don't look it! And, Joseph, just remember this time and don't flop down into your seat until all the ladies have taken theirs; and don't go telling people how much you paid for the wine, and, whatever you do, don't go explaining the points about butter and telling people all about cheeses; you may know more about cheeses than anybody else at the table, but that's just what you don't want them to know that you know. And, remember, if you hear me clinking my champagne glass accidentally with a fork, that's a warning to you not to put your foot in it.”

“All right, my dear; you know it's most marvellous, it is, the way you've picked up society ways. I say, we have got there, haven't we, Maria? Astonishing what you can do with money! You can't do much without it, and there ain't much you can't do with it. But I never thought we should have got on visiting terms with that there stuck up Harcourt Dale. Fancy a haughty, starchy, old buffer like him having such a nice daughter.”

“That was my contriving, Joe. I got that smart young Mr. Roylance to say he'd come to dinner, hinting that the Harcourt Dales would be here; then, knowing how her father was pitching the girl at the young fellow's head, I'd only got to mention that he was coming to get them here.”

“You are a contriver, Maria! But, I say, what an awful thing it is for that girl letting her name get mixed up with that young villain of a Branscombe's, and with a smart young chap like Cyril Roylance fairly gone on her. Ah, I'd give a lot of money to have that chap's style and be just as free and easy as he is in society.”

“Oh, it'll come in time, Joe. He's had more practice than you, and practice makes perfect, that's all. Now I must go down, they're arriving. Don't forget when I clink my glass."

"What's the matter with that woman? Has she got the fidgets, or is it nerves?" Lady Limberg, fixing her pince-nez, asked her neighbour at the dinner table. "She keeps tapping her champagne glass with a fork as if she were a singing teacher trying to get C!"

"I rather fancy," replied her neighbour, "she's using it as a bicycle bell to warn her husband to mind how he comes round the corner. There it goes again; see, he pulled up short just as he was telling your husband what his Chateau Lafitte cost him a dozen."

"What an observant man you are, Mr. Roylance, you'd make an excellent detective. By the bye, wasn't it smart of that man Rossiter?" She dropped her voice to a whisper, for Doris Dale was only some four seats down, and her father was across the table.

"Yes; they've got up the case pretty well considering how little they had to go upon," her neighbour replied. "Where shall you winter?"

"Biarritz; Limberg wants to be near Monte Carlo."

"Isn't he going to hunt?"

"Not foxes," laughed the old woman with a hard face, "but I was thinking it would be very awkward for a criminal to have that man Rossiter on his track. Oh, of course, I see you don't care to talk about the affair, naturally"—for an impatient shade flitted across her companion's face, and he emptied his champagne glass at a draught.

As the dinner proceeded, wise Mrs. Ponsonby Smith furnished the conversation with an accompaniment in the form of a musical glass obligato, so that her lord and master managed to keep clear of serious danger. It is true he brought a frown to the cadaverous face of Lord Limberg by alluding, in order to demonstrate his familiarity with the family connections of the upper ten, to one or two relatives of his lordship who had happened to figure rather more prominently in the court of bankruptcy, and that presided over by Sir Francis Jeune, than at the Court of St. James'; and he caused something like a panic at the table by casually mentioning that he had that afternoon been perusing Stubbs' Gazette and beginning to recapitulate the names of those belonging to the district he had found there. Cling! cling! went Mrs. Ponsonby Smith's glass furiously, as a tripper's restaurant bell; the recapitulation was throttled at birth, and the situation was saved.

But from one theme, not wild horses could drag Mr. Ponsonby Smith; the superlative intrinsic value of his belongings. His 'ouses, his 'orses, his wines, his pictures, he waxed enthusiastic enumerating and describing them, never forgetting to mention, as the unfailing criterion of their merit, what he had paid for them, and frequently, as an instance of sagacity, how much more he had been asked for them. Lord and Lady Limberg and others present exchanged significant glances; the master of Fallowfield Hall listened with rapt attention, which won the heart of his host.

It seemed that the beating of their own hearts would betray their hiding-place.

"There's class, Maria, if you like," Mr. Ponsonby Smith remarked at a later stage in the evening. "Why that there old gambler, Lord Limberg, could hardly set an' listen at the dinner table when I was a-talking about the stock of port I'd bricked up in the cellars. But, bless you, that Mr. Roylance, he was all attention, and, after dinner, when you ladies had gone upstairs and Limberg was fidgeting to get to the cards, Mr. Roylance was one of the very first to say 'yes' when I orfered to show 'em the cellars. He was the sort of chap as takes an interest in things, and I like him; and I was jolly glad he did clear old Limberg out when we did sit down at cards."

"So was I, Joseph," replied the lady, "for it's something shocking the tales I've heard about them Limbergs going out to people's houses to dinner and winning every blessed penny the people who asked them was worth. People say they actually make their living at the cards. And how anxious he was to get Mr. Roylance down at that little green table in the ante-room? I heard Mr. Harcourt Dale whisper to him, 'Be careful of Lord Limberg, he's worse than a professional gambler; he's an amateur gambler, and a gentleman by profession.' And Sir George Manders said out loud in the drawing-room: 'Limberg's got a nice fat pigeon; he'll be plucked pretty clean before he's done with him.' And for all Lord Limberg's a nobleman, he looked more like an old hawk as he took young Roylance's arm and led him into the card room; yes, and I saw him look back over his shoulder at that old scarcecrow of a wife of his and he winked, and that wink said as plain as A B C: 'Got him!'"

"Yes, my dear," said Mr. Ponsonby Smith; "but he didn't look much like a hawk when he came out, he looked more like a poor barn-door fowl what had been set about by a fighting cock and then chucked into a pond. They say Roylance had most astonishing luck, it's often the way with novices. But, I say, he was quick enough, wasn't he; nobody else except him saw that accident?"

"What accident, Joseph?"

"Why, didn't you see him when they was playing Bridge suddenly stop and say, 'I beg pardon, my lord, you've dropped an ace'; then Limberg swore he'd done nothing of the kind, and the other says, cool as a cucumber and as sure as a gun: 'Oh, yes! really, I saw it fall, look, my lord, on your right knee, it slipped off the table.' And Lord Limberg looks down, and he says: 'Well, I'm sure, so it has. How very careless!'"

So far as the Ponsonby Smiths were concerned, it was a most enjoyable evening. They enjoyed the display of their own abundance, they enjoyed Doris Dale's singing, and the Squire of Fallowfield surprised and charmed everybody when seated at the piano. He filled the room with melody, sometimes classical, sometimes popular, managing to delight everybody, except, perhaps, Lord and Lady Limberg, who were wondering how on earth they were to scrape along minus the hundred and fifty pounds which had been transferred from their pockets to the pianist's, and how on earth Limberg was going to take up the promissory note he had scribbled at the table for another two hundred. And fancy, when Limberg suggested an I.O.U., the Squire of Fallowfield happening to have a bill stamp in his pocket-book!

"It's been a most disappointing evening, Caroline," said Lord Limberg as he threw himself back in a corner of the carriage. "It serves us right for acknowledging and visiting that class of people."

"Oh, but the Ponsonby Smiths would have been all right if we could only have got them to have played."

"But we can't, and I shall cease to know the Ponsonby Smiths; at least I shall if I can raise that fourth mortgage in other quarters."

"But don't be precipitate, Limberg. The man who spoilt our evening, as a matter of fact, was the one most nearly our equal in social standing."

"Yes, by gad! Never saw such luck before! And a mere beginner too!"

As for the Squire of Fallowfield himself, leaning back in his brougham as it sped along the tree-arcaded lanes, its lamps cleaving the inky blackness of the tunnels made by interlacing boughs, he folded his arms, half-closed his eyes, and puffing at his eternal cigar, muttered:

"A fair night's work in one way. Yes, the business part of it was all right, but as for pleasure. Ah! she wouldn't say a word to me except but what etiquette and common politeness demanded, and I couldn't win a smile from her. All the while the other women were looking at me with languishing eyes under drooping lashes, she was still and cold as a statue, thinking of him. Yes, I know, with a canker-worm gnawing at her heart for his sake. But where on earth can the fellow be? He couldn't have played into my hands more completely if he'd been trying, trying as hard as that old harridan Lady Limberg was trying to play up to the hand of her rogue of a husband just now. His disappearance has condemned him: not merely before he's tried, but before he's caught. By Jove! he's clever enough in keeping out of the way; he's slipped Rossiter clean enough as a whistle. What a coincidence if he's been working some little plant of his own—on the cross! Or again, suppose something happened to him, suppose he's been to town for a night or two off and he's got into a mix, say in some place like those I learnt to play Bridge and Baccarat in, and paid for learning; or again, something may have happened to him in his own district.

"Now, I wonder if Barney and Josh, working on their own account, have happened to cross him and are keeping it dark from me; they're quite capable of it, they meant carrying out the whole of the Dalehurst contract on their own. I wish—oh! I wish three people I know, two men and a woman, were at the other end of the earth. I'd win Doris, I'd marry and settle down, and there wouldn't be a sleeker and more respectable member of society than Tiger Dick—I mean, Cyril Roylance of Fallowfield Hall.

"Or if only two of them, the two men were away—for she's staunch enough, she wouldn't play my game, but she wouldn't give it away, she's got the pluck to, but she wouldn't; they would, if it paid them, but they daren't. But where on earth can this fellow Branscombe be? Wherever he may be, by Jove! for her sake I'd change places with him and chance it.

"For I love her; by Jove! I love her. I've liked plenty of girls, a thundering sight too many, perhaps, but I never cared for any girl quite in the same way as I care for her. Except, perhaps—once! Long ago. And then I only thought I cared; in this case I'm sure."

The carriage paused a moment at the lodge, the big gates swung open, and then the wheels creaked as they wound along the stately avenue leading to the magnificent, though a trifle sombre, main portal. The doors swung open, the man who ruled there entered, then said, with a nod to the footman who divested him of his sable-lined overcoat:

"Don't let anybody wait up. I want nothing more to-night. Good night, everybody."

Then he sought his palatial bedroom, lit another cigar, filled himself a liqueur from the tantalus, and sat awhile smoking.

Then he went to the door, softly opened it, and listened, reclosed it, kicked off his dress boots; he gave a glance at the bed, the smooth white coverlet and quilt, he undressed, and tumbled into bed. Two or three minutes later, instead of composing himself to sleep, he tumbled up again, flinging aside quilt and coverlet.

"Yes," he said; "in case anybody entered early in the morning I've been to bed and got up early for one of my gallops or walks before breakfast."

Then he went across to an inner dressing-room, where stood a wardrobe, on casters, some inches away from the wall. He had once expressed a doubt as to that wall being damp and conducive to moth.

He pushed it further from the wall, touched a spring, and slid back the secret door of the false back of that wardrobe. Then from within he took a reefer jacket, a fur cap, a pair of corduroy trousers, a pair of thick blucher boots, a belcher neckerchief, a close cropped wig, while he fitted on a bull's eye acetylene lamp, a revolver, a short leather-laced stick with a loaded knob attached by gutta percha! Pulling the cap well over his eyes, he stealthily made his way back to the bedroom, switched off the light, then stealthily emerged into the silent corridor. At the end of it he gently raised a window opening on to the gardens of the east wing, made his way across these to the fields, and so to a lane, where in the dense shadow of the overhanging trees the identical trap with, between its shafts, the identical fast trotting pony with muffled shoes which had waited close to the Abbey Farm in the early morning following the midnight murder at Dalehurst Grange was standing.

"That you, Barney?"

"Right ho, that you, Dick?" came an answering whisper.

He clambered into the trap, and silently, swiftly, it sped away towards Brettelby Court.

Silently, steadily the midnight hours crept away. Once, twice the turret clock in the stable yard at Fallowfield Hall mentioned the fact that Time was still toiling on his journey whoever else might be resting. Stealthily along the oak wainscotted and floored gallery a man's form crept in the darkness that was quivering on the very point of beginning to lift. He approached a window.

"Yes," he said, "I'd best leave this one open, this is one they might get in by. And what infernal carelessness; it's unlatched, and how smooth it moves." Then the strange figure made its way up a staircase along the corridor to the Squire's bedroom.

"He's going into accounts to-morrow is he?" the prowling man muttered, "Very well, I'll settle accounts to-night. Cyril Roylance, you'll almost wish you'd stayed beyond the seas; you won't quite wish, because you'll be past wishing."

He placed one hand on the door handle, gently, noiselessly turned the latch, and entered.

* * * * * *

Meantime, another form approached that window—from outside!

"What? The deuce! Was I fool enough to leave it open?" A sudden spring, he was kneeling on the sill, another second he had dropped noiselessly into the corridor. Stealthily he made his way along the corridor, into which, through the mullioned windows, the thin grey-blue shaft of light was piercing.

"It's a bit late," he muttered. "I hardly fancied the job would have taken so long." He reached that bedroom door, then gave a start.

ENGLAND'S DANGER.

A HULL SOLDIER'S STATEMENT.

George Henry Biggins, of 5 Grange Villas, Grange Street, Hull, served under Sir Charles Warren in South Africa, and was nine months in Mafeking. Some hard campaigning fell to his lot, and though he bears no scar of the battlefield, misfortunes have come to him in another shape. An Eastern Morning News reporter who called upon him the other day was certainly able to observe in him nothing but a fine healthy type of the British soldier, yet Mr. Biggins owes his present healthy condition exclusively to Chas. Forde's Bile Beans for Biliousness, and he has not always looked as well as he does to-day. "I have known the time," he said, "when I used to be strangely overcome by a chilly sensation. It was not altogether cold, for I felt it all over my body; and it seemed to be the result of being altogether run down. I felt languid and too weary and weak to do anything. My joints ached as if I had rheumatism all over me, and many a time I had difficulty in keeping up with my duties. I began to suffer from biliousness, too, and to experience a nasty sharp pain at my heart. This pain continued to get worse. Whenever I moved quickly it commenced, and I had to go slowly to get ease. So bad did it become at last that I felt convinced I had heart disease. Of course I tried to get relief, and purchased all kinds of medicines in vain until I tried Chas. Forde's Bile Beans for Biliousness. The result was most satisfactory. I noticed an improvement after the first few doses, and so went on taking them. They soon ended the biliousness, and from first commencing to take them I have never again felt the pain in the chest. Bile Beans have completely cured me, and I am frequently recommending them to persons I find suffering as I did. While at Gosport I gave some to a gunner, and his mother-in-law derived great benefit from them. Only the other night my little daughter was quite out of sorts, and I gave her a few half beans. The next day she was all right again. I can tell you my family, both young and old, have used them with marvellous results." Wherever Chas. Forde's Bile Beans for Biliousness are used marvellous results follow. For indigestion, anæmia, dizziness, liver and kidney disorders, constipation, debility, headache, nervousness, female ailments, colds, chill, rheumatism, and as a preventitive of influenza they are unequalled. Purely vegetable in composition, their use is followed not merely by temporary improvement, but by permanent cure. Of all chemists, or post free from the Bile Bean Manufacturing Co., 119 London Wall, E.C., by sending prices—1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. They have been instrumental in restoring scores of our gallant defenders, as they did Private Biggins.

FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.

The gathering light stealing between the chinks of the blinds fell upon the face of Morgan Chandler.

"Why! what's this? I'll swear I never left that open too!" He entered the door, heard a shuffle, a stealthy footstep, saw in the dim first streak of dawn the figure of a man step by step advancing across the room towards the bed; the gathering light stealing between the chink of the blinds fell upon the face, the face of—Morgan Chandler.

And it fell and glistened on something else; on the barrel and cylinder of a revolver! Swiftly, but silently, the second form sprang upon the first, a strong arm was hooked across Morgan Chandler's throat, a resistless knee pressed into his spine. He went down with a gasp; crash! came something full upon his skull. He half-uttered a cry that died into a gurgle as a pair of iron hands tightened the collar at his throat; crash came something down again, and Morgan Chandler fell back and lay face upwards there upon the floor.

Swiftly, silently, but deftly and coolly, within that dressing-room the master of Fallowfield Hall divested himself of his disguise, replacing it within the trick back of that ingeniously constructed wardrobe. Then he tumbled into a suit of pyjamas; for a moment he looked down on the heap huddled up there by the dressing table.

"He's right for an hour or two, anyway," he soliloquised. "I may as well, however, take this out of harm's way in case of accident," and gliding back to the inner room he placed the revolver inside the false back of the wardrobe. Then he timed a tiny alarm just an hour ahead, crept into bed, composed himself comfortably between the sheets, and dropped off quietly and comfortably to sleep.

In Its Worst Forms the gnawing, boring, twisting, piercing, grinding pains of Rheumatism are almost unbearable, and often drive the sufferer to seek relief by resorting to opiates that in time enslave him to the dreadful thraldom of opiumism.

Broken and Pain-racked Bodies might have been kept supple and well if properly attended to during the beginnings of the disease.

I Have a Cure for Rheumatism. My remedy, "GLORIA TONIC," has CURED thousands of people from almost every country of this torturing disease, many of them having suffered for over 50 years.

In England it Cured Mrs. M. Stickland, of High Heath, Pelsall, who suffered for 58 years. Mr. L. Pinkney, of 3 Well Lane, Bridlington, was cured after being afflicted for 27 years. Mrs. W. Clarke, 1 Percy Street, Stratford-on-Avon, from being quite helpless for eight years, has been entirely cured through its use. It cured Mrs. J. Brewster, 59 St. Ann's Road, Barking, E. It has cured hundreds of others throughout the British Isles too numerous to mention.

Short Stories That . . . . . . Make You Laugh.

We devote every week space in Short Stories to pithy, humorous anecdotes similar to those which appear in these columns. To those readers who submit storyettes which are used, a six shilling novel will be awarded. The anecdotes may be either original or selected; in the latter case, the source MUST be stated. Attempts must reach the Storyette Editor, Short Stories Office, Henrietta Street, Strand, London, W.C., by Monday, November 18th. Post-cards only, please. The prize of £1 1s. for the best storyette published this week has been won by Mr. H. A. Moore, 18 Athol Street, Hulme, Manchester, whose contribution is denoted by a star thus.*

"THIS age demands men who have convictions," shouted the impassioned orator. "Where shall we find them?" "In prison," replied the man in the gallery.

TEACHER (taking the class in English history): "Now, William Johnson, what happened on the Fifth of November?" William (readily): "Please, sir, our Henry got his finger blown off, and dad singed off all his whiskers."

A GENTLEMAN one day took his little lad out for a walk, but the boy, from some cause or other, got lost, and, meeting a policeman, tearfully asked: "Please, sir, have you seen a man without a little boy? 'Cause if you have, I's that little boy."

MISTRESS: "Why is dinner not ready, Bridget? Didn't I tell you to cook it with the gas stove?" Bridget: "Plaze, mum, yis, and I did thry, but th' stove wint out." Mistress: "Why didn't you light it again after it went out?" Bridget: "Yis, mum; but it's not come back yit. It wint out t'rough the roof."

LADY VISITOR (to little girl): "What became of that little kitten you had here once?" Little Girl: "Why, haven't you heard?" Lady Visitor: "No! was it drowned?" Little Girl: "No!" Lady Visitor: "Lost?" Little Girl: "No!" Lady Visitor: "Poisoned?" Little Girl: "No!" Lady Visitor: "Then whatever became of it?" Little Girl: "It growed up into a cat."

A NATIVE of the green isle of Erin called at a chemist's shop the other day with a prescription, the putting up of which he watched with great curiosity. "What's that, ony way?" asked the customer. "This," said the obliging apothecary, "is tincture cemicitaga racemosa and liniment of saponis, cantharides, and opii." A look of bewilderment changed to one of grave concern as the Irishman inquired: "And what is the price?" "Sixpence," was the reply. "Be jabers," said Pat, "I thought two such names as that would cost me at least five shillings."

*A WORTHY doctor, while enjoying a holiday last summer in the island of Arran, took the opportunity, along with a friend, to go whiting fishing. During operations the doctor's sinker came off and was lost. Here was a dilemma—no sinker, no more fishing that day. Ha! happy thought—his flask—no sooner said than done. The bottle was filled with salt water, carefully corked, and sent down on its mission. After a few minutes' interval, "Ha!" quoth the doctor, "a bite!" and up he pulls at racing speed a fine pair of whitings, one on each hook. His companion exclaimed. "Ha, doctor, twins this time!" "Yes," quoth the doctor, "and brought up on the bottle, too."

JONES: "Ah, no! I'm not opposed to women riding bicycles. There are some I would like to see give all their spare time to it." Mrs. Jones: "Who are they?" Jones: "Well, for instance, the young ladies in this neighbourhood who are learning to play the piano."

HUSBAND: "Do you know the reason that Shamrock II. did not win the race?" Wife: "No! Why?" Husband: "Because the Yankees put something into the water to prevent her winning." Wife: "What a shame! Wasn't it found out? What did they put in—oil?" Husband: "No, the Columbia."

AN Irishman in Dublin, happening to break a shop-window, immediately fled. The proprietor of the shop, seeing him running, ran after him, and, after a long chase, managed to catch him. "Are you the fellow who broke my window?" he asked. "Yes," replied the Irishman, "and wasn't I just after running home to get the money to pay for it?"

IT happened in the drawing-room of a boarding-house. He was a young dentist and she a school teacher, but hardly young. "I have made up my mind to speak to you to-night," he said in a low voice. She blushed, looked at the faded tulip in the carpet, and was dumb. "I have established myself in my profession, I have a little money laid by, and I have made up my mind to get married." More blushes and more silence on the part of the maiden. "I am going to ask you——" He hesitated. She moved nearer to him. "I am going to ask you if you know any young girl whom you think would make me a good wife." She stopped blushing, chilled him with a look, and swept out of the room.

IT was a cold, dark night, but Sandy and William were happy, because there sat between them the most charming young lady in Farsley. It was a spirited horse they had hired, and the trap bowled merrily along o'er moor and fell. William held the reins, and as he could dimly perceive, in spite of the darkness, that his side of the lady's muff was unoccupied, he slipped his own disengaged hand into it, and—well, two hands were very soon tenderly pressing each other. And so the happy moments flew, and the drive home came almost to an end. "When you gentlemen have done with my muff," said the young lady presently, "I trust you will not fear to tell me, as my own hands are becoming quite numb with the cold." Then dark suspicion fell upon her two admirers, for things are not always what they seem. And William and Sandy are now sworn enemies.

HIS history is briefly told. After several days of thought he discovered a sure way of making money, and, like other men, he was in a hurry to try it. He made haste to insert the following in several country weeklies: "Sure way to kill the potato beetle. Send twelve stamps without delay to X. Y. Z., who will send a recipe that cannot fail." Then he hired a dray to bring his letters from the post-office and had 50,000 of his recipes printed. Within two weeks something like 46,000 or 47,000 farmers had contributed their stamps for the printed recipes. By-and-by several hundred of them bought stout cudgels and railway tickets and started out to interview the advertiser. At his office they were informed that he had left to attend to important business abroad and was not expected back. All he had left was a package of 3,000 or 4,000 slips of paper on which was printed the following: "Put the beetle on a flat stone, and then hit him with another."

THE EDITOR'S PAGE.

A Half-guinea Fountain Pen will each week be awarded to the reader who is the sender of the most interesting query answered on this page.

THREE people, especially, will now be sorry that they did not buy the copy of Short Stories dated October 26th, as they have thereby lost their chance of each winning a five-pound note. To prevent further disappointments, see that your friends all purchase this and succeeding numbers, so that if their portraits do appear they may be able to send their claims in before the time limit expires.

THE two claimants of the five-pound notes this week are:

MR. STANTON WRIGHT (No. 21),
1A Hilton Villas,
Champion Crescent,
Sydenham, S.E.

MR. JAMES CATES (No. 23),
28 Esplanade,
Scarborough.

I SHOULD like to draw your attention to the fact that I am now offering a Half-guinea Fountain Pen to the reader who sends in the letter containing the best query which is answered on this page each week. Remember that it is not for one week only that this offer holds good, but for every week, so that many of you will have the chance of winning one of these pens, which, nowadays, are almost a necessity to everyday life. While I am on the subject, I might as well add that I shall always be glad to receive letters from my readers, whether they contain queries or not.

ADVICE TO READERS ON VARIOUS MATTERS.

(Replies to Correspondents.)

"BELLA."—I should say that the cathedral of Antwerp holds the record for a peal of bells. It consists of no fewer than ninety bells. Elaborate chimes are rung upon them every half-hour. As you are fond of calculations, try to work out the time required to ring the complete changes on such a peal of bells, at the rate of two sounds a second. It will, perhaps, assist you to know that with a peal of twelve bells the time required would be ninety-one years.

"How is it," writes "E. M. P.," "that one seldom sees a sketch of an African scene without it being embellished with palm trees? Now I have travelled very widely in Africa, and have come across vast tracts of country not only innocent of palm trees, but destitute of every sort of vegetation. It seems to me there must be some reason for this peculiarity, besides the crass ignorance of those who make the sketches."

There is certainly a reason, and a very good one. It is entirely the fault of the public. Readers of illustrated papers are convinced in their minds that no African scene is complete without palm trees, and palm trees they will have. I remember an incident in which Sir Francis Grenfell once sent a sketch from the seat of war in Africa to a London illustrated paper. The scene of the battle was a part of the country absolutely destitute of trees. Imagine his astonishment when at length a copy of the journal came into his hands to find that here, there, and everywhere, all over his illustration were stuck palm trees. On writing to the editor to protest, he was informed that unless this particular sort of tree were included in the sketch, the public would believe the whole thing to be a fake and drawn somewhere in the office by an ignoramus.

"FLORIST" wishes to know if there is any way of preserving the green of plant leaves when it is desired that they should remain a long time on exhibition.

I believe that an official of the United States Department of Agriculture has discovered such a method, but it is somewhat complicated and costly. He combines the chlorophyll in the leaves of the plant with copper, in the form of acetate or sulphate, producing a copper phyllocyanide which is insoluble in almost everything except strong alcohol, is not destroyed by light, and gives a colour hardly to be detected from the natural green. The process is, unfortunately, too difficult for anyone who has not a chemical laboratory at his disposal to undertake with any hope of success.

"X. Y. Z." has observed for several years past that it is always colder on Monday morning that on any other day of the week. He wants to know whether I have noticed the same thing.

I confess I haven't. Probably the reason is that "X. Y. Z." does not take any exercise during the week-end, and eats more than he does during the week. If so, his circulation would be in a lower state than usual, and he would feel any cold air there may be about on Monday more readily than on any other morning.

"POPPY" asks: "Which is it correct to serve first at table, gentlemen visitors or lady members of the family?"

Unquestionably, the lady members of the family, except when the hostess herself is serving at the foot of the table, when it would be obviously irregular for her to serve herself before the male guests.

TO CONTRIBUTORS.

I AM open to consider original stories of any length from 1,500 to 6,000 words. The character of stories required may be best ascertained by a careful reading of the contents of the paper. All MSS. are dealt with promptly, and every effort is made to return rejected stories which are accompanied by stamped addressed envelopes. At the same time, I cannot hold myself responsible for MSS. accidentally lost. Communications of this kind should be addressed The Editor, Short Stories, Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, Strand, W.C.

XVI.—A LIFE FOR A LOVE.

By DONOVAN MART.

CHAPTER I.

The Firing of the Train.

Nowhere is the spirit of cliqueism more rampant than among the ranks of a travelling theatrical company and the members of the Good Samaritan Company were no less addicted to cliques than any other of their kindred professionals.

In the first place there were those who radiated round the beautiful "lead," Hazel Harlow, and as amongst these could be numbered Raymond Venables the manager, Eric Monteith, Jenny Lovelace, and a good many of the men, it will be readily understood that this set predominated. It was among the other ladies of the company that divergence of opinion as regards Hazel was most to be looked for, and the reason for this can be put down to one cause—jealousy.

Hazel was practically a newcomer in the ranks of her profession, yet with a bound she had cleared the heads of many who thought themselves altogether superior to her in looks and histrionic abilities, hence there was much heart-burning among those who had not come under the influence of Hazel's sweet personality. A girl of the latter class was Ethel Montrose, Hazel's understudy, a girl who had undoubtedly pretensions to good looks, who was also vivacious, and a fair actress, yet without enough depth of mind to ever make herself pre-eminent in her profession.

Yet Ethel Montrose had a grievance. Her ground for complaint was that she had never yet been given a really adequate chance to display her talent. How could she ever hope to show the world her powers if she were always doomed to be another's understudy?

This view she aired amongst those of her companions whom she knew were actuated by the same feelings as herself, dislike, or in other words, jealousy, of Hazel Harlow. Yet there was one person who lent a ready ear to her complaints from other motives than that of mere dislike to the more favoured actress, and that was a young actor, Harold Kenrick, who played a subordinate part in the piece, and was head over ears in love with Ethel Montrose.

Liverpool had been reached, and already the Good Samaritan Company had given the first performance at the Prince of Wales' Theatre, the pretty playhouse in Clayton Square, and once more indorsement of Hazel Harlow's power and beauty had been rendered by a crowded audience.

After the performance Kenrick had induced Ethel Montrose to accompany him to supper at a certain well-known hotel in Bold Street. He had determined to bring affairs to a head, to disclose to his companion in words what he had hitherto only hinted at in a hundred minor ways, his undying love and desire to make her his wife. He was not long in coming to the point.

"I have been long waiting," he said, during a pause in the meal, and speaking in a low, nervous voice, "to have an opportunity of seeing you alone, Ethel, only you have always been with one or another of the crowd, and I have never had a decent chance. Anyhow, you must know what I am going to say, you must know that I love you madly"—this with that slight affectation of theatrical pose that most actors find it so hard to get away from in real life—"will you become my wife?"

The girl heard him out in silence, and it was some moments before she answered him. At last she said:

"I like you very much, Harold, better than any other man in the crowd; but at the same time I don't quite know whether I like you enough to marry you, and supposing we did get married, and you were to find someone else you loved better, well"—with an assumption of archness—"what would become of poor little Ethel?"

"You know that is impossible," came the answer in a low voice fraught with suppressed passion. "You know that I would do anything for you; that I would simply die for you. Won't you say 'Yes,' Ethel? We'll take a flat in London. I believe I could get a part at one of the theatres, and you, with your beauty and talent, will have no difficulty in getting a good shop somewhere."

The girl laughed somewhat bitterly.

"It's all very well to talk of my beauty and talent," she said, "but it hasn't done me much good so far, except to get me Hazel Harlow's understudy."

She gave vent to an impatient exclamation.

"It's really a shame," she went on; "how Venables and all of them kowtow to Hazel Harlow. I'm sure I'm every bit as good an actress as she is, and if only I got a chance of playing Ruth, I'm sure I could convince everybody of the fact."

"You are quite right, darling," answered the man. "I, and everyone else with any sense, know that Hazel Harlow can't really hold a candle to you, but you haven't given me my answer yet."

The girl looked at him scrutinisingly. Her shallow little brain was still running on the idea that possessed her, namely of her superiority to Hazel, and she had not really room in her mind to consider two subjects at once.

Is your photo on page 652?

Then suddenly Kenrick's impassioned glances started a new train of thoughts within her.

"Supposing," she began, "that I were to consent to become your wife, would you be ready to give me some tangible proof of your affection, because, after all, it's only right that I should test you if I've got to tie myself to you for ever."

"Only try me," came the delighted answer. "Anything I can do, I will do."

"Yes, that's just it. I don't know whether you can do it."

"Do what? For goodness' sake don't torture me any more, Ethel. At least give me the chance of trying."

"Very well, I will."

The girl spoke half-banteringly, more as a pretext for putting on one side the attentions of her lover, for whom, if truth must be told, she had not sufficient regard from the point of view of a future wife. "Contrive that I shall play the part of Ruth for one week on tour, and I'll promise to marry you. There!"

She finished up with a little laugh, little thinking what the result of her words were to be. Had she only divined the consequences of her foolish freak, she would then, once and for all, have quelled any hope in her lover's breast of complying with his desire, for she was not radically bad. Foolish and flighty she might be, but not a criminal.

"Get you to take Hazel Harlow's part for one week?" echoed Kenrick moodily; "that's rather a tall order. Not that I am sure you wouldn't play Ruth every bit as well."

"That's just it," broke in the girl; "I'm quite sure I could, and if I was to be given a real look in who knows what it might lead to. Venables might say 'Well, we never knew what a genius we had in Miss Montrose.' It might lead to my becoming the star of the company."

She spoke without thinking, trying to believe that she knew there was truth in what she said, though in her heart of hearts she knew otherwise. She knew perfectly well that she stood on a different plane from Hazel, that she would never be able to reach the level of excellence attained by her more successful rival. And Kenrick, infatuated as he was, quite believed that she was everything she said, nay more, the idea took shape and began to grow within him that it was merely a question of personal spite, that Ethel was being kept from the place she ought to occupy by the intrigues of Hazel Harlow.

"Then you are really in earnest?" he said. "You promise to marry me if you are able to act the part of Ruth for six consecutive nights?"

The girl was secretly somewhat perturbed at his quiet seriousness. Then she broke into a laugh.

"Yes," she said, "I am serious. On the sixth night following a week's performance in which I have taken the part of Ruth, I'll give you my promise to become Mrs. Kenrick."

"Then Mrs. Kenrick you shall become." There was something terribly sinister about the quiet air of finality with which the few simple words were spoken.

CHAPTER II.

THE STORM THREATENS.

It was an everyday occurrence for Hazel Harlow to receive at the theatre a great number of letters, nearly all of them from men desirous of making her acquaintance. Invitations to supper, to lunch, begging letters, letters from unsuccessful actors and actresses, these and many others she received from day to day. On the Tuesday after their opening performance in Liverpool there were as usual three or four communications, among them a note of somewhat different calibre to the usual collection. The note in question ran as follows:

"Miss Hazel Harlow is warned by a friend and well-wisher to at once relinquish her part and to abandon all idea of succeeding as an actress. Miss Harlow is undoubtedly a woman of beauty and charm, but her sphere does not lie upon the stage. She is only standing in the way of those whose heart is in their profession, and would be well advised to abandon as soon as possible any further connection with theatrical life. Unless this letter is complied with Miss Harlow may find herself in a very awkward predicament."

"There! What do you think of that?" cried Hazel, handing the note to her companion, Jenny Lovelace.

The two girls were in Hazel's dressing-room. Jenny took the missive and read it through carefully.

"This was written by a maniac," she answered. "Someone who is completely off his or her head. It's unsigned, and undated, and written evidently in a disguised hand. Are you going to take any notice of it, Hazel?"

"I think I shall show it to Eric," answered the latter. "He may recognise the handwriting."

But Monteith could throw no light upon the epistle.

"It's my idea," he said, when the note was shown to him a little later, "that it was written by someone who is wildly jealous of Hazel's success, but I don't really think it's worth taking any notice of. Anyway, forewarned is forearmed, and we shall have to keep our eyes skinned, as the Yankees say." And so, for the time, the matter dropped.

Hazel took no notice of the mysterious letter, and, indeed, banished the occurrence from her mind. As a matter-of-fact, this was the first move in the game set on foot by the foolish jealousy of Ethel Montrose, and it was the work of Kenrick, who had lost no time in setting his machinations on foot.

He was indeed at his wits' end to know how to accomplish the task imposed upon him, and yet with the end in view that was held out to him he had determined to lose no time in proceeding with his plans. He knew, as did all the Company, that Hazel had on more than one occasion been made the victim of a conspiracy. He knew how often her life had been jeopardised, though he did not know the real reason at the back of the whole story.

He had some vague idea that the adventures through which Hazel had gone had been instigated to a certain extent by herself in order to advertise the charms that he could not understand.

"Yet, if she really had been in danger," he argued, "she would be chary of courting any further. If, therefore, I can intimidate her sufficiently, she will throw up the sponge and leave the road clear for Ethel. And if I can once get her away from the Company it is inevitable that Ethel must take her place."

Thus in secret he watched whether his anonymous communication would bear any fruit. But another day passed away and Hazel showed no sign of being perturbed by the unusual epistle she had received, and so he determined on stronger action.

Again an anonymous note was found among Hazel's letters, and this time the wording was much stronger.

"Unless, after to-night, you hand in your resignation to Mr. Venables, and once and for all leave the Good Samaritan Company the result of your conduct will be upon your own head. Your stay with the Good Samaritan Company has already been productive of enough unhappiness. You are the Jonah of the voyage, and must be cast overboard. Therefore take this warning and disregard it at your peril. If you leave the Company you will have nothing to fear. If you stay on your blood be upon your own head."

The handwriting was identical with the first one Hazel had received of like character. But there was such an unmistakable air of vindictiveness about the missive that a vague feeling of alarm grew up in Hazel's breast that danger really threatened her. She took counsel with Eric and Raymond Venables as to what she had best do, and it was Venables who came forward with a proposition that seemed likely to help her.

"Let us publish the note," he said, "publicly, and offer a big reward for the writer of it. This sort of thing is intolerable. It surely can't be anyone in the Company and yet it reads to me very like professional jealousy. Let's publish it as I say and offer a large reward for the discovery of the person who wrote it."

But Hazel was strongly averse to his course of action, and Eric came forward with much wiser counsel.

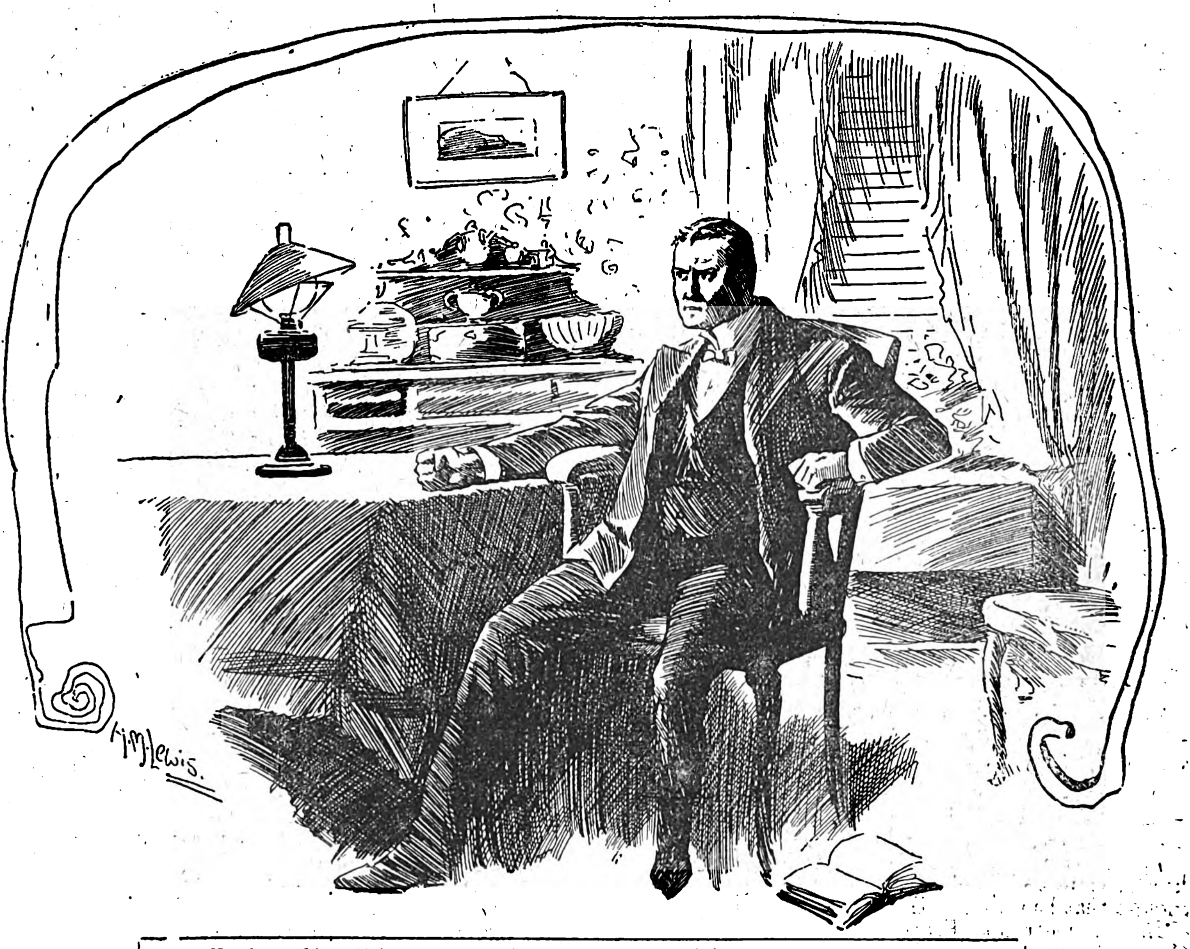
"I am of opinion," he said, "that the letter is written by one of the other members of the Company. Let's call them all together and read out the note. I'll keep my eyes on them while it is being read and surely we shall be able to spot the culprit if she or he exists in our own ranks."

"That's not a bad idea," answered Venables; "and even if it is unproductive I really don't think Hazel need be frightened. We have learnt experience on this tour, and we ought to be able to insure the non-repetition of any of the horrors that have gone before. But still, if the perpetrator of this note is in our midst, the affair had better be stopped before it gets any further on our nerves."

"Then I should suggest," said Monteith, "that the whole Company be assembled upon the stage of the theatre; that Venables makes one of his telling speeches, and I will try and give my capabilities as an amateur detective full rein. It's my opinion that someone is trying to play a stupid practical joke upon Hazel."

The proposal having been thus set on foot, practical demonstration was soon forthcoming. With feelings of the intensest mystification the Company was assembled, and Venables stepped forward primed for his speech.

"Ladies and gentlemen," he began suavely, "I have called you here to-day upon a matter that touches one of your members very intimately, and knowing as I do that I have to deal with honourable men and women, I have no compunction in taking you fully into my confidence. But the fact of the matter is that Miss Harlow



He threw himself into a chair, his eyes burning brightly as the light of a hideous resolve flamed up within them.

has been the recipient of a threatening letter which I think it would be the best for me to read out to you as she has handed it to me naturally under some alarm."

Hereupon the manager produced the last threatening missive that Hazel had received, and read it out in a clear, penetrating voice.

A faint hum of astonishment followed the recital of the epistle, and Venables, allowing a few seconds to elapse so that the full purport of what he had just read might soak into the minds of the assembled Company, continued:

"If there is any one present who has any light to throw upon this extraordinary document the least he or she can do is to step forward and speak out, for I take it that I am dealing with honourable people, and I can hardly believe that there is anyone among you capable of such an outrage on good breeding."

Again he paused. A clamour of indignant denial of any complicity in the matter arose on every hand. There was nothing left therefore but for Venables to thank the assembly for having listened to him.

After the meeting had broken up Venables made his way, as arranged, to Monteith's room.

"Well," cried the manager, "has our detective any report to make? Were you able to deduce anything from the faces of the crowd?"

Monteith paused for a moment.

"I did notice one rather suspicious thing," he said cautiously, "and that was that Ethel Montrose, who was standing in front, went very pale when you began speaking and then got very red. Well, we know that woman is a bundle of nerves, and perhaps surprise may account for her exhibition of nervousness, yet at the same time Miss Ethel is Hazel's understudy, and, as I have good reason to know, would give her empty little head to be in Hazel's shoes. It may be—mind you this is only a theory—that her hand penned the note merely with the idea of getting Hazel to relinquish her part so that she herself might be given a chance of showing what she could do as Ruth. If my theory is correct, I don't believe we need have any serious cause for alarm because I don't believe Miss Ethel is of the stuff that makes a murderess. She'll merely want watching."

"The easiest way out of it," broke in Venables, "is to give her the sack, or to tax her direct with being the writer of the note."

"Now that's just like you, Venables, rushing into extremes the moment an idea is mooted. If you did sack her she would indeed have a motive for paying off old scores against Hazel, and goodness knows, we've got our hands full enough in looking after our 'lead' without having any fresh factor dragged into the business."

There was undoubted commonsense in this view of the case, and Venables thought the same. It was therefore determined to do nothing further in the matter except to keep a keen eye upon the doings of Ethel Montrose, for of course it was admitted that they might be on a wrong scent altogether, and the note might have been inspired from sources outside the Company.

The hand of Horace Caldecott, the one that had already brought so much trouble into Hazel's life, might possibly have something to do with this new phase. Yet neither Venables nor Monteith could divine how near to and yet how far they were from the true motive that had inspired the clandestine communication.

In the meantime Ethel Montrose had sought out Harold Kenrick.

"So this is your doing," she began excitedly; "you have already begun to turn out Hazel Harlow from the Company."

She spoke in a voice in which fear and hope struggled for mastery.

"And what if I have?" came the dogged answer. "I'm going to win you somehow. You must leave me to take my own steps in achieving my object."

A sudden terror clutched at the girl's heart. There was something terribly sinister in Kenrick's manner.

"What are you going to do next?" she asked fearfully.

"I don't quite know," answered Kenrick in the same sullen tone; "but you can trust me, darling. Before many days are out you will be finding yourself called upon to fill the role of Ruth. All is fair in love and war. Don't forget that, and besides, I am as firmly convinced as you are that you will do far more credit to the part than Hazel Harlow. I am not alone in my belief. I have been casually inquiring of one or two of the others and they quite agree with me it's all a put-up job. Venables is sweet on Hazel Harlow, and he's running her for all he is worth. There'll be no chance for anyone else so long as she holds the stage."

The girl was silent for a few moments, then cowardice mingled with an unwelcome thrill of satisfaction to think that this man was willing to dare so much for her sake made her resolve to let him go on with whatever he had before him.

"Very well, then," she said finally; "if you have really got a scheme that will insure my taking Ruth's part I shan't say any more, but will only wait to see how you are going to carry it out. But I think it will be best if we are seen as little as possible together, then nobody's suspicions will be aroused, and you will be able to work on without a handicap. But take a word of warning and keep your eye on Eric Monteith. He's a deep one, he is. I advise you to keep out of his way. I shan't give him any ground for suspicion." And in making this resolve the girl was in reality doing the very best she could to further her lover's schemes, whatever they were, for although she was not cognisant of the fact, as we know, she was the very person towards whom the finger of suspicion pointed.

"Oh, I'm not afraid of Monteith," answered Kenrick carelessly; "he's too much wrapped up in the fair Hazel."

CHAPTER III.

DARK DOINGS.

HAVING fully recognised that his first attempt to oust Hazel Harlow had failed, it can be well imagined that Harold Kenrick only made up his mind to concentrate his attentions more fully upon devising a scheme that might bring success to his frenzied machinations.

The power of a true pure love upon a man is too well-known, and its possibilities too potent to need of amplification here, but with a man like Kenrick, who had come under the influence of an all-absorbing passion, the result was the reverse of anything that might militate for good. All his spare moments were given up to brooding over the fancied slight offered to the object of his fierce affections, and the more he pondered the more his passion grew, and with it the resolve to bring about the discomfiture of Hazel Harlow, no matter what the cost might be.

A hundred mad schemes floated through his brain only to be rejected each in turn for another still more mad. The fancied wrongs offered to Ethel Montrose became a terrible reality, and thus the monomania, fed by the fires of his jealous passion, grew and grew until at last he had scarcely another thought. And although Eric Monteith had, true to his word, kept a careful eye upon Hazel's understudy, he could discover nothing in her actions or behaviour to justify the suspicion that had been awakened by her conduct on the occasion of Venables' harangue.

And as the days passed by and the final hours of the sojourn of the Good Samaritan Company in Liverpool drew ever nearer, it became forced upon him more and more acutely that he had been on the wrong track. The anonymous letter must have been sent outside the Company. And yet it was strange that since Venables had made its contents public property among the members of the Company there had been no repetition of a like unwelcome communication. This fact undoubtedly pointed to the letter having been inspired by one of his own colleagues. All these surmises gave Monteith ground for apprehension, and he was all the more vigilant to keep an eye upon Hazel.

Hazel herself viewed his forebodings with that cheery optimism that none of her previous adventures had ever been able to entirely quell.

"Depend upon it it was a practical joke," she said. "We shall hear no more about it."

And Eric, anxious only to guard the woman he loved, from more annoyance than need be, appeared to concur with her surmise. He kept his own forebodings locked up within his breast. Yet had Monteith or Hazel Harlow been possessed of the power of second sight they would on the Thursday night during their stay at Liverpool, after the performance was concluded, have noticed a strange occurrence in the room taken by Harold Kenrick. Seated at his table with a lamp before him the actor was poring over a book, a volume that he had picked up that same day at a second-hand bookstall, that treated of a no less sinister subject than "Poisons and Poisoners."

To such a state had his morbid desire conveyed him that Ethel Montrose's lover had already determined upon a desperate step. He had now resolved that there was one way, and one only, to remove the barrier that existed between himself and Ethel Montrose—the living barrier, Hazel Harlow—and that expedient was murder. How he was to achieve his terrible end he had not yet fully worked out in detail, but the train of thought that was in him had received further impetus by the discovery of the little book in the obscure bookshop. Thus he sat and pored over the volume, his brain in a whirl with the emotions conjured up by his base purpose.

Yet the book was old and obsolete, and for the most part treated of obscure and forgotten poisons, dealing with the curious compounds that could be made by the admixture of certain alkalis and irritants, the names of which were completely strange to the actor. Old recipes that had been in use in the time of the Borgias, or that had been handed down by wizards and necromancers of the East, filled up a large part of the volume. At last Kenrick flung the book across the room in a pet and began pacing up and down with quick, frenzied strides.

"There's nothing to be got out of that," he muttered morosely; "no chemist would be able to supply me with the things treated of in that old volume. No, it will have to be something that I can get easily, opium or morphia or arsenic, or something like that." He spoke with the utmost callousness as though he were discussing some ordinary everyday occurrence, and had not in his mind the destruction of a young and beautiful woman who had never wilfully done him any harm.

"Well, it's got to be done," went on his thoughts. "There is no other way out of it; the only thing is how can I do it without getting found out, for of course if I am found out it will be good-bye to any hope of ever calling Ethel mine. To call Ethel mine, isn't that enough to fire one to sacrifice a good deal, and besides, it'll only be a just retribution, the overthrowing of a vile conspiracy that has for its object the wilful neglect of true talent and the advancement of the basest favouritism. Who is Hazel Harlow that she should ride roughshod over those to whom she is not fit to hold a candle? It is no crime I am meditating. I merely forestall human justice." And with such ravings the miserable man paced up and down the narrow apartment.

It will be seen from this that affairs with Harold Kenrick were indeed in a parlous state. All his finer instincts, all his better self, had been swamped by his perversion of the word love. He had now turned a deaf ear to all the promptings of his better nature; he had but one motive now in life—the destruction of Hazel Harlow. On to the silent watches of the night and into the small hours of the morning he paced to and fro pondering on how he could best achieve his base ends. At last towards morning an idea seemed suddenly to strike him. He stopped in his feverish pacings up and down, that had been for all the world like those of an animal in a cage, and threw himself into a chair, his eyes burning brightly as the light of a new and hideous resolve flamed up within them.

"Idiot that I was not to have thought of it before!" he muttered. "The thing is simplicity itself; fool I was not to have thought of it before! I have been wasting precious time in devising some intricate scheme, and now I have got a notion that will save me hours of waiting and deliberation. To-morrow is Friday, the last day but one of our stay in Liverpool. Can I but bring off the coup to-morrow night, next week will see Ethel installed in the part of Ruth, and then at the end of next week I shall go to her and say, 'Ethel, I have earned the right to make you my wife,' for even if Hazel Harlow be removed from the scene Venables must complete the tour for which he has contracted. Yes, I'll do it—I'll do it!"

Having thus come to so sudden a resolve he went to bed and fell asleep, and slept till ten o'clock on the morning of the next day with all the untroubled serenity of a child. In such curious garb does criminality clothe itself, the instincts of a devil are linked hand-in-hand with the reposefulness of the most perfect innocence.

The next day his first act was to seek out Ethel Montrose, who was astonished to find him suddenly transformed into apparently a very ordinary, calm, every-day individual.

"You said you did not want to be seen with me more than necessary during our stay in Liverpool," he began; "and I should not have come only as we are leaving here in two days I thought it would not matter. And besides, I've hit upon a plan that I feel sure will be the means of transferring the part of Hazel Harlow to you for the rest of the tour."

"For the rest of the tour!" gasped the girl incredulously. "How on earth can that be?"

Then something in the man's face filled her with a nameless dread.

"What are you going to do?" she cried.

"I am going to win Ethel Montrose as my wife," was the calm answer. "It's the one thing in life that, from my point of view, is worth living for, and"—his voice changed—"I have your word that you will marry me after you have performed the part of Ruth for one week. I am risking a good deal for you, Ethel, and were it not that I know you will keep your word I might hesitate before going on with the scheme I have elaborated. You will not go back upon your plighted word?"

The girl laughed nervously.

"What I promised I'll do," she said, though her heart was not in her words, and all the time she was groping about in her mind for elucidation of the mysterious plot devised by her lover. What could he be going to do? On what desperate venture was he about to embark? Surely it could not be so desperate as her suspicions would have her believe. He looked calm and cool enough, and yet his face seemed to have become strangely altered in the last few days.

For a few moments Ethel Montrose entertained the idea of going to Venables or Monteith and warning them that a scheme was afoot that had the downfall of Hazel Harlow for its ultimate object. And then that love of mystery and of power that so often strikes a dominant note in a woman of her composition, banished the fleeting resolve. She would let things take their course.

CHAPTER IV.

THE STORM BREAKS.

THE bookings at Liverpool had been exceptionally large, and Venables noted with satisfaction that he would be able on that night to put up the placard "House Full" outside the theatre. Before the commencement of the performance he and Eric were talking together in the latter's dressing-room.

"It's been a bumper week," said the manager, "and it really looks as if we are going to get away from Liverpool without having to add another horror to the long list of those that have dogged our footsteps all through. The more I think of it, the more I feel convinced that those two bogus notes that Hazel received at the beginning of the week were the attempts of some fool to perpetrate a practical joke."

"For goodness' sake don't let us shout till we are out of the wood," put in Monteith quickly. "I believe I am as much of an optimist at heart as any man living, but Heaven knows there has been little reason for optimism lately, and the worst of it is the enemies one has to combat are all snakes in the grass, so to speak. One can never really know from which side the next danger will come. If my experiences have been the average ones of the travelling actor, well, all I can say is, I wonder that the lunatic asylums of England aren't crammed full of raving maniacs who have, at one time or another, been the shining lights of provincial theatres."

Venables gave vent to an uneasy laugh.

"Well, let's hope for the best," he said; "to lapse into platitudes—what can't be cured must be endured."

At last the curtain went up on the first act of The Good Samaritan, and the first two scenes composing the act passed off without a hitch. The culminating scene of the play took place in the second act. This scene opened at a big assembly in a London drawing-room, where the guests were gathered together after dinner drinking coffee. Ruth, as the centre figure, was the rich daughter of a man who had disappeared from England when she was quite a child, and was supposed to have been lost at sea. Ruth being possessed of great wealth, had determined to devote her money to charity. In the middle of the act a man enters the room hatless, breathless, dirty and dishevelled. This is Ruth's father, who amassed his wealth by criminal means. He has come back to England, only to fall into the hands of the police. He manages to make his way to his daughter's house, acknowledges his identity, and is arrested in the midst of the fashionable assembly. Thus Ruth discovers that the money she has devoted to charitable purposes has been amassed by fraud, and she is the daughter of a convict. The curtain falls on this denouement.

Now, as this scene was a particularly trying one for Hazel, Venables had arranged that instead of a cup of the weak wash that passed as coffee being handed to Ruth, a cup of strong beef-tea should be given to her as a preparation for the very trying scene that followed. The curtain went up upon the brightly-arranged stage filled with its well-dressed crowd. Hazel was seated at the back of the stage, as she did not take up a prominent position among the characters till her great scene came. Jenny was not on in this scene, and she stood in the wings carelessly watching the countenances of her fellow-actors and actresses. Suddenly she became aware that Harold Kenrick was standing close by dressed in the garb of a footman, his part, waiting to hand round the coffee to the assembled guests. He was a man that she had never much cared about, so she drew aside without speaking. Then something in his face arrested her attention. He was looking at someone on the stage with a strange intentness, with eyes that seemed to burn as though fed by some unseen fire. She followed his gaze and found the object of his attention was Hazel Harlow. He said nothing; he only stared and stared, and Jenny could see that his lips were moving slightly, as though in answer to the active working of his brain.

"Why on earth does he look at Hazel like that?" said Jenny to herself; "is anything wrong with Hazel?"

But no, there was nothing in Hazel's appearance to warrant such a fierce scrutiny. A vague feeling of alarm and distress sprang up in Jenny's mind. There was something uncanny about Kenrick's behaviour. "He looks for all the world as if he would like to stick a knife in her," continued Miss Lovelace's thoughts.

Then he turned away in order to fetch the coffee cups and the tray upon which he carried them round. Jenny slipped back behind the shelter of a flap and watched him as he made his way to the table upon which the "refreshments" were set, ready for him to carry upon the stage. He picked up the tray, but before doing so he put his hand to his pocket and threw a small piece of crumpled up white paper upon the ground. Then he raised the tray, and at the words that represented his cue, walked pompously forward.

For a moment Jenny hesitated. Then curiosity got the better of her. She sped forward and appropriated the fragment of paper that Kenrick had flung down so carelessly. It was apparently only a creased and crumpled ball of white packing paper, and Jenny unrolled it carelessly without expecting to find anything upon it that would give her a clue to Kenrick's behaviour. But as she smoothed the paper out it was to find a red label attached thereto, a label such as chemists use, with the one word "Poison" printed in black upon it.

The one ominous word suddenly caused Jenny's heart to stand still. Like a flash her brain leapt upon the one and only solution to the business—the one and only explanation to Kenrick's strange behaviour. The poison that had been in that paper he had transferred into the cup of beef-tea destined for Hazel. Jenny did not stop to think of the why or wherefore of such an act, yet somehow she knew that her suspicions were correct. Why Kenrick wanted to poison Hazel she could not divine, but there was no time to pause and reflect over the pros and cons of the case then. Action, swift, decisive action, therein lay the only hope of saving her friend. She hurried back to her place at the wings, consumed by an overpowering fear that Hazel had already lifted the fatal cup to her lips, and that anything she might do was now too late! Ah, what was that? Kenrick had just reached Hazel. He had handed her the cup, he stood over her with his burning eyes fixed upon her face, another moment and his foul deed would have been accomplished. For one fleeting moment Jenny stood as if paralysed. She seemed absolutely incapable of action, a sort of horrid hypnotic spell seemed to have been cast over her. She could only stand and gaze and gaze with wide-open, almost unseeing eyes at the terrible drama that was being enacted before her—a play within a play. And yet how much more terrible was the reality than the fiction.

Then the mist cleared away from Jenny's eyes. She could not rush on the stage and denounce Kenrick before the whole theatre, could not rush on and announce to Hazel that the cup she held in her hand—was already on the point of raising to her lips—was poisoned. No, she must find out some way more subtly drastic than that. Then suddenly an inspiration came to her. It was her only chance. She was dressed in the garb of a middle-class shopkeeper, and might very well have passed for a servant. Throwing open the door that led into the apartment where the guests were supposed to be seated she hurried across to Hazel, just dressed as she was, and cried out in a loud voice:

"For Heaven's sake, mum, don't you go and drink that coffee; the cup you've got in your 'ands was the one I used to mix the mustard in. You'll 'ave your poor little 'eart burnt out of you if you drink it, and yet what a blessing you got that cup and not one of the fine party folk."

This piece of swiftly extemporised gag, extemporised under what trying circumstances no one save Jenny could know. She snatched the cup out of Hazel's hand, and hurriedly left the stage as a roar of laughter rang through the theatre.

As for the actors and actresses themselves they were for a few moments so completely dumfounded by this absolutely unlooked-for piece of business that it was some moments before they could recover themselves sufficiently to proceed with the play. And even when they did they were all left wondering, and Hazel in particular, as to what on earth could be the meaning of such an extraordinary performance on the part of Jenny. It really looked as if the latter had been suddenly seized by a fit of temporary mental aberration.

As she rushed towards the stage Jenny ran full tilt into the arms of Venables.

"What on earth is the meaning of this?" said Venables in a low voice. "Who gave you authority, Miss Lovelace, to interpolate scenes in the play that have no right to be there? This is not a farce."

"No," broke in Jenny quickly. "It's not, but if I had not done what I have it would have been a horrible tragedy."

"What do you mean?" cried Venables.

With a tragic gesture Jenny held out the cup that she had taken from Hazel's hand, and that still contained the liquid that she believed to contain poison.

"As a proof of what I have said," she continued, "take this cup and have the contents analysed."

A sound behind her caused her to turn her head. A figure had come stealthily forward behind the pair who stood in a recess at the back of the wings, a figure who leapt forward, and with a quick jerk, sent the cup flying to the ground, so that it fell with a crash to the floor and the contents oozed away through the dark and dusty flooring boards. It was Kenrick, still dressed as a footman, with powdered hair and smart livery, his grease-painted face showing out livid beneath the patches of colour that only made his countenance more ghastly. Venables sprang forward and seized him by the arm.

"What the dickens do you mean by that?" said Venables in a low voice of concentrated passion. "How dare you be so unmanly? What the dickens, I say, is the meaning of your conduct?"

But Kenrick made no answer. His lips worked, but no sound came.

"I'll tell you what it means," said Jenny in a low and rapid voice; "the cup that Mr. Kenrick has just broken contained poison put in there by his own hand. He wanted, for some reason or other, to murder Hazel Harlow. I found him out just in time, and now he has destroyed the evidence of his own guilt."

"It's a lie," muttered Kenrick hoarsely, finding his voice at last, and now realising to the full the horrible deed that he had attempted to carry through, and the consequences that must fall on his head, he determined on one last desperate effort to save his skin.

"It's a lie!" he repeated. "Miss Lovelace herself put the poison in the cup. She has the very piece of paper in her pocket in which the poison was contained." For in a quick flash Kenrick had realised how it was that Jenny must have found out his act of criminality.

A low cry of horror came from Jenny's lips.

"How can you be so wicked?" she said; "this paper"—producing the incriminating testimony—"you flung away after you had put the poison in the beef-tea. What reason should I have for poisoning my dearest friend? Only a monster such as you could have conceived such an idea. Have him arrested, Mr. Venables. I tell you he wanted to murder Hazel Harlow. Why did he dash the cup from my hand if, as he says, it was my hand that worked the foul deed?"

Venables made a step forward, and laid a hand upon the other man's collar.

"So you add lying to your crimes, do you?" he said, meaningly.

With a cry of baffled rage Kenrick dashed the manager aside. Like an animal at bay he glared around him seeking some means of escape, but the door that communicated with the staircase that led down to the stage-door was on the other side of the stage. The next moment his mind was made up. With a bound he reached the wings, and dashing on to the stage, he rushed madly through the thick of the crowd assembled there, for the crowning episode of the act was at hand. Knocking over two or three of the actors in his course, he sped across the stage, out through the wings on the other side, down the staircase, and out into the street beyond.

For a moment the audience sat spellbound trying to take in the meaning of so extraordinary an unrehearsed performance. Then a murmur of amazement could be heard growing in volume on every side, the culmination of astonishment was reached when the curtain, by Venables' orders, was rung down. In a few moments the manager appeared in front of the curtain.

"Ladies and gentlemen," he said, and a deep hush at once fell on the vast assembly, "I must beg of your indulgence for a few moments, but we have a temporary hitch in the performance. The fact is, that one of the members of our company has, to use a phrase which I think, fits the case best, run amok. His is only a subsidiary part, and if you will give us time to recover from the depressing episode we will endeavour to proceed with the play in a few moments."

CHAPTER V.

All's Well that Ends Well.

After the performance was over Hazel was astonished to receive a visit from her understudy, Ethel Montrose, who came into her dressing-room with a face as white as a sheet, and without explanation of any kind, flung herself at the actress' feet.

"Oh, Miss Harlow," she wailed, "forgive me, forgive me! I have been very wicked. It's all my fault; but I did not think he would do anything as terrible as that."

"What is the matter, Miss Montrose? I don't understand you. What is all your fault?"

"That Harold Kenrick tried to poison you." And then in quick, disjointed phrases the wretched girl blurted out the whole story of Kenrick's mad infatuation for herself. How that he had told her that jealousy alone kept her from playing the part of Ruth, and how that if she would only consent to be his wife he would guarantee that she took up the part for which at present she was only understudy. She confessed also as to knowing the authorship of the anonymous communications.

"But I never knew that he meant to murder you," she wailed out: "believe me, I am speaking the truth."

Hazel's soft heart was touched by such evident contrition and grief.

"Look here, Miss Montrose," she said, "let's make a bargain, you and I. Let us undertake to keep to ourselves what you have just told me. No one need ever know, and I am quite sure you did not really mean to do me any serious harm."

"Oh, you are too good—too good," said the other, still weeping; "and I thought you quite the reverse."

At that moment the door opened and Jenny entered. Noting her amazement, Hazel went up to her and said:

"Miss Montrose is in great trouble, Jenny. Mr. Kenrick was her lover, and she is miserable to think that she could have wasted her affection on such a man."

True to her word Hazel resolved to shield Ethel Montrose from any complicity in the affair that had nearly ended so disastrously for herself. Neither was her generosity ill-timed or misplaced. From that moment she had no more fervent admirer than Ethel Montrose. As for Kenrick, he had fled out into the night and away to his lodgings not far from the theatre, there to change his somewhat unusual garb for that of a sober citizen. And from that night all trace of him was lost so far as the Good Samaritan Company was concerned.

Next week the Good Samaritan Company visits Brighton, where Caldecott again appears on the scene.

That Mysterious Something.

Captain Stowe is the skipper of one of the finest bark-trimmed ships left in the merchant service. Perhaps it is because we don't see much of him, he being away at sea, that he always gets such a hearty welcome. Certainly the first point he strikes for when on shore is our cosy club room, and we give ourselves up to being entertained by his breezy tales of the sea.

"Want a sea yarn?" said he, "bless yer, I've got more than I could tell if I did nothing else from now till I take my last rest.

"Let's see, the last time I was here I promised you some experiences of the psychology of sea life, didn't I?"

"Right!" we all chorussed.

"I thought so. My memory never fails me when I remember a thing. Now I'm going to tell what, you maybe, you won't like to believe, but it's all as true as that you see me sitting here and putting down this Scotch." Suiting the action to the words.

"That's good stuff, boys," he said, smacking his lips. "I'll tell you a little story about what happened to me as a boy first, and then I'll get into some sea yarns, and see what you can make of them.

"One night, when I was a boy of eleven, I was awakened out of my sleep with a strange feeling of oppression and sat erect in bed. The room was dark, and its contents undiscernible, save where the moonlight streamed through the unshaded window and cast its radiance upon the floor.

"I looked out and saw that it was not yet near dawn; and while I gazed a shadow stole across the vision, as if a passing cloud obscured the sky. Then the light grew brighter, and the blood ceased to move in my veins.

"I could not breathe, move or speak. Only power of sight and consciousness remained to me.

"It was my father's familiar figure, unusual only because of the strange white garments which he wore. They were like some soft mantle, too delicate for human hands to make. His face was turned towards me, and the expression on it was sadder than I had ever seen him wear.

"I tried to speak, but the effort failed, and, motionless, I watched his transparent form recede, pass through the open window and dissolve in the night like a cloud of mist.

"Was I dreaming? No! A country-bred boy of eleven, I was not given to fright, and when this paroxysm of inanimation left me, the grief that flooded my eyes with tears was a reality.

"My father was dead! I was as certain of it as if I were then standing by his coffin, and at last, more from sorrow than anything else, I awoke the household and told them all.

"'You were dreaming,' they all tried to assure me, but I failed to be comforted.

"Did I not know that I was the silent observer of his coming, which was as real as my presence in the kitchen was now?

"Dawn came and I sought refuge in work.

"At breakfast a messenger came with the tidings, 'your father died just before daybreak this morning.'

"I was cool and collected. To me the knowledge of his end had been long enough.

"This was my first experience with the 'something.' I will leave others to name it. I was then a boy of eleven. During the years that have since passed I have travelled in all parts of the world. For nearly forty years I followed the sea and gained all the experience that such a life teaches, from the forecastle to the captain's berth.

"While I am no believer in spiritualism as I have seen it interpreted, and although I do not lay claim to supernatural causes and effects in the daily work of life, still I do think there is something in nature relative to mind transference that scientists have yet to learn about.

"My own experience teaches me that there is a principle of higher intellectual perception than has yet been generally cultivated. I think I must possess it naturally to an unusual degree, for my life has been protected many times by the intervention of some power I do not know about.

"The story of my father's death was literally made known to me as described above. I do not try to explain the circumstances, but I do attest the truth of it.

"At one time I was seaman aboard the 950-ton ship Astrican, Captain Webster master. He was a man nearly seventy-five years old, and although deacon of a Methodist church, was a brute on shipboard. He went by the name of old Bully Webster, and made himself generally unpopular by feeding us on beef and wormy ship's bread. We left New Orleans bound for Hull, England, with a load of cotton. The ship was a cumbersome craft, with an old-fashioned rudder that would not steer her within two points of her course.

"When well out to sea we encountered a heavy north-easter, during which four men at the wheel had all they could do to keep her steady. It lasted several days, and finally, worn out with exertion, I went below and turned in. I was asleep almost before I touched the pillow.

"How long I remained unconscious I do not know, but suddenly I was awakened as if someone had roughly shaken me. I opened my eyes, but seeing no one thought I had been dreaming and turned over for another nap.

"Again came the rough call, and a voice in my ear seemed to whisper: 'Danger, go on deck.'

"I jumped out of my berth and ran up out of the forecastle. It was very rough, and I could keep my feet with difficulty.

"Scarcely had I reached the look-out when I saw looming up almost upon us a big ship, that was of a sharper. trimmer build than the Astrican.

"I shouted at the top of my voice, 'Hard up your wheel,' and the four seamen, terrorised by the spectacle, threw her away over.

"The stranger discovered us at the same time and fell off. A mighty sea pitched us forward with irresistible force, and instead of being struck on the broadside, as we would have been, but for my warning, the old Astrican went bow on through the storm-beaten vessel, and crushed the wooden walls as if they had been pasteboard.

"She sank with all aboard almost instantly, and our own salvation necessitated prompt action with nerve.

"We were leaking forward just at the water-line, where a large hole had been stove in our bow. The upper rigging was all hanging over the side, nearly all of our top works having been carried away.

"The storm abated, but it was twelve days before we got into condition to continue on our course. Then we were badly crippled, but had good weather to aid us.

"Arriving at Hull we discharged cargo, and loaded with iron for the States. What was the power, or influence, that exerted upon me the warning I have told you? No member of the crew called me, and I am satisfied the second call was not a dream.

"Some years later I sailed as master of a brig, the Forest. When off the Jersey shore I turned in, my instruments indicating that I was fifteen miles off shore. In the midst of my sleep I seemed to hear my mother exclaim:

"'John, the Forest is among the breakers.'

"I rushed on deck and found the mate in a state of frenzy. Just ahead could be heard the roar of the surf beating upon the rocks. We were thus saved from destruction when less than an eighth of a mile from shore.

"I might cite several similar incidents. There is one that I want to tell you about, however, which can be corroborated by living witnesses.

"When I was one of the crew of a revenue cutter that lay off Porstmouth! I was on watch on the forward deck alone one night.

"Suddenly I felt someone touch my shoulder, and looking round I saw just above my head the figure of my elder brother, who was the captain of a West India brig. He seemed to pause a few minutes on the fore-yards, and then disappeared in the night.

"I immediately asked permission to go ashore, and got it.

"Hurrying to the house of another brother, who lived in Portsmouth, I said:

"'He is dead; I am sure of it. The death is father's over again.'

"They all ridiculed my statements, but two days later a letter was received from his wife conveying the sad intelligence. Getting in from a warm climate he had recklessly exposed himself to the cold and had contracted pneumonia, and died at the very time of my vision. Here was the childhood experience lived over again.

"The most wonderful experience I ever had, though, was when a California gold steamer was lost, I believe, by fire, in the Gulf of Mexico. I was master of the brig Harvest Moon.

"One day when the weather was thick, and I had stood for some time in doubt as to my exact whereabouts, suddenly I was struck on one cheek by a land bird, that, after wheeling around my head, flew by me on the other side, striking my ear with stinging force.

"Turning to the man at the wheel, I said:

"'Keep her off two points more. I think we are getting in too close to land.'

"For twenty minutes the mate and I smoked in silence. Then, upon hearing a sound, apparently from over the side, the mate jumped to the rail and shouted excitedly:

"'Good Heavens, captain, we are among a shoal of living people!'

"His words were indeed true. On the smooth surface of the gulf, incased in life protectors, were sixty or more men and women who were among the passengers of the ill-fated steamer. They had been hours in the water and had no hope of rescue, when out of the fog had come the ship so silently that they had not noticed her until she was upon them.

"Was it merely an act of chance that the little bird upon the high sea thus deceived a veteran captain? It seems to me that some other power than man's turned the ship's bows two points off the course laid down on the chart.

"The last accident I can tell you about is more mysterious than all, and can be found recorded in the history of New Bedford, where all the facts are known. Briefly, the story was this:

"A new Bedford whaler commanded by a friend of mine was sailing in the Arctic ocean one night. As the mate on deck looked into the cabin, he says he saw a man sitting at the captain's desk, writing on the log-slate. Half-an-hour later the officer went below, and there he found the command plainly written: 'Keep ship north-west by north till daylight.'

"He did as directed.

"At that hour the captain came on deck, saying, 'Who changed the course?'

"'I did,' replied the mate, 'according to your instructions.'

"'What instructions?' asked the other sharply.

"'Why, those you left on your slate,' said the mate.

"'But I did not leave any,' said the captain; and they went below and with surprise compared the log.

"Sure enough there was the order, but the handwriting was peculiarly fine and altogether unfamiliar.

"Wishing to find the man who had thus planned a very absurd joke, the captain sent for the men, one by one, and got their signatures. Not one resembled the handwriting.

"At this point the look-out shouted: 'A sail,' and soon they came upon another whale ship, the crew of which were literally starving for food.

"Giving relief, the captain of the newly-found craft tendered a receipt, the writing of which was identical with that on the log slate, written hours before in an unknown hand, in the wide ocean, miles away from human life.

"This, perhaps, some of you can explain. I cannot, however. Was there not a mission to be accomplished by that mysterious order: 'Keep ship north-west by north until daylight?'" GEORGE DAY.

SEEN YOUR PHOTO IN SHORT STORIES?

IF SO, YOU WILL GET £5.

HERE IS THE SCHEME.

We have in our possession a considerable number of photographs of men, women, and children of all grades of society secured for us by our agents, who have scoured the United Kingdom for this special purpose.

Each week we publish five of these portraits, and to each of the persons thus represented we dispatch the sum of £5, on his or her forwarding a claim on a post-card addressed to PORTRAIT DEPARTMENT, "SHORT STORIES," Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Although the persons whose portraits will appear in this competition are quite unknown to us personally, we have their names and addresses in our possession, and, therefore, a claim can be settled at once, without risk of fraud.

We may say that our agents are still at work all over the country. It is, therefore, possible that your portrait may appear at any moment without your knowing it. So you should watch SHORT STORIES.

Is your portrait here? If so, drop us a post-card, and get £5. Five more portraits will appear next week.

All claims in connection with the portraits below must reach the address already given above by Tuesday next, November 26th. Full names and addresses of the correct claimants will appear in succeeding numbers.

HOW TO MAKE A CLAIM FOR A £5 NOTE.

Simply write on a post-card these words:

> The Portrait No.......... (here put number of portrait) in the current number of SHORT STORIES is mine. Please forward a £5 note.

MY MILLIONAIRE PATIENT.

Being Extended Extracts from the Note-book of Septimus Ewles, M.D., Late Administrator of Anæsthetics at St. Andrew's Hospital, London.

PRESCRIPTIVE.

It is only after a long self-debate that I have at last decided to give to the world an account of that which has changed for me the whole course of my life, and left me, at an age when most men are revelling in the sunshine of existence, a prey to disappointment—to almost despair.

The man—the being rather, for man, as God makes man, he never could have been—the being, then, who has thus spoilt my life, who has withered for me every blossom I had hoped to rear and cherish through the years, yet lives.

Wishing him, as I do, dead, dead beyond any power to call him back to earth to torture, and to enslave me, I feel, I know that in some one of the world's many corners he still exists to trouble me.

It is nearly two years now since the scenes were played out—of the play of his own making—since he disappeared, but I am convinced, sadly convinced, that in—it may be Pekin, Benares, Kandy, or perhaps even next door to me in this city of London, he is lying low, waiting the supreme moment to crush me for evermore.

But it is not so much for what I myself have suffered, and still continue to suffer, on account of this man's cruel wickedness, that I grieve and revile the fate that originally called me into so wretched and unendurable an existence; it is for Haidée's sake, for the sake of the one woman in all the world for me—whom this monster in human shape has spirited away, where I know not—it is for her sake that I have sworn to find Siever Crafte, to unearth him, if he be alive, and to compel him to do right and justice.

I have been informed by my friend, Detective Inspector Ryan, that on the evening of June 17th, 1899, Crafte left Charing Cross by the boat train; that he was accompanied by a lady—young, dark, tall, and distinguished-looking—and that, so far as can be ascertained, he booked through to Frankfort.

Beyond that nothing has been seen or heard of him since.

Ryan, who has a personal remembrance of Haidée, is of opinion that she and Crafte's lady companion were one and the same. I do not agree with him, insomuch as my love would, I am persuaded, in no wise have submitted to being quietly carried off by one whom, I know, she regarded with the deepest loathing and detestation.

Still, the fact remains that Haidée disappeared the same day, the same hour almost as did Siever Crafte.

At three o'clock on that afternoon a note from her was handed to me at the hospital just as I was about to administer ether in a critical case. Its contents so unnerved me that my junior, Collings, offered to take the case. The note simply said:

"Dear Old Sep.,—Meet me without fail at 6.15 at the 'Cabin,' Piccadilly; usual table. I want to see you awfully! It is really important—to you, as to me. I shall be punctual, and shall look for you to be. I am both ill and sick at heart. "Haidée."

Until the "Cabin" closed for the night I waited, with what patience I might, but Haidée never came.

My one sorrow and soul-trouble now is that on that day she went out of my life; that, in some mysterious, inexplicable way, altogether beyond my power to conceive, Haidée Van Cloo, my affianced wife, vanished suddenly and completely from haunt and home.

From that day to this I have never seen her!

* * * * *

Before I depart on my quest I wish to say that what I have selected from my diary and put into rough narrative form the main events of the terrible three months prior to the disappearance of Siever Crafte and of my beloved Haidée.

This I have placed in the hands of my old friend and ex-colleague at St. Andrews, George Collings, with instructions to him to publish the same if I do not return to reclaim them within six months from the present 13th of January, 1901.

I am told that I am mad to throw up the finest professional position in London in order that I may go—as it is phrased—on a wild goose chase in search of that which, they say, is unfindable.

So be it. I am content to make this sacrifice if by so doing I may but bring myself to know that I have done what I could.

The venture is mine. Success is with Him who alone can give it.

End of Prescriptive.

Note by George Collings, L.R.C.P., lately appointed Administrator of Anæsthetics at St. Andrew's Hospital, London, vice Septimus Ewles, M.D., resigned.

Agreeably with the wish of my friend, Septimus Ewles, I have this day handed the MSS containing the following narrative to "Pearson's, Limited," who have agreed to publish the same, the said Septimus Ewles not having returned to reclaim it within the stipulated period of six months from the 13th of January of this present year.

End of George Collings' Note.

CHAPTER I.

The Almighty Dollar.

"Gentleman to see you, sir."

I glanced at the card Holmes handed to me.

"Siever X. Crafte.
New York City."

"Patient, Holmes?"

"I think so, sir."

"What's the man like?"

I had a strong prejudice against Americans, and Holmes knew it.

"Peculiar-looking, sir, rather. White as a sheet, too, and as thin as an area-railing."

"Look respectable?"

"Oh, quite, sir—if you mean money. Should say he had tons of it by the look of him."

"Well, that's no recommendation from my point of view. Millionaires—and I suppose this to be a bloated specimen of the species—millionaires are, as I think, insufferable."

"Yes, sir; and I fancy this particular specimen is all that, and a little more."

"Has he brought any introduction?"

"Yes, sir, but he sticks to it; says he'll hand it you himself."

"There! show him in, Holmes; let me get this trans-Atlantic infliction over."

The individual who, after being announced by Holmes, carefully closed the room-door himself, before my man could do so, was singular—remarkable even, in more ways than one.

Holmes' description of him was wonderfully accurate. Tall, thin, and of feature cadaverous to ghastliness, my visitor from the very first moment I set eyes on him, exercised, in no small degree, a fascination over me, at once powerful and disagreeable.

Indicating a chair, which he took, I opened the letter which he presented me, to find that it was written by a certain American doctor, with whom I had a scientific corresponding acquaintance.

Dr. Garfield was head of the leading hospital in the States, and was the greatest living authority, not only in his own country, but also the civilised world over, upon mania, more especially mania in its homicidal form.

His note to me was to the following effect:

DEAR DR. EWLES,

The bearer of this is Mr. Siever X. Crafte, of New York City, who, as he has informed me, is anxious to consult you with reference to some internal malady.

I do not know much about the man, except that he is too rich by half.

Personally, I cannot say that I like him, in fact, I have my doubts upon some psychological points in connection with him; but there certainly cannot be any harm in your seeing him.

You will quite understand, however, that I hold myself in no way responsible for him, and that you must use you own discretion and judgment in your dealings with him.

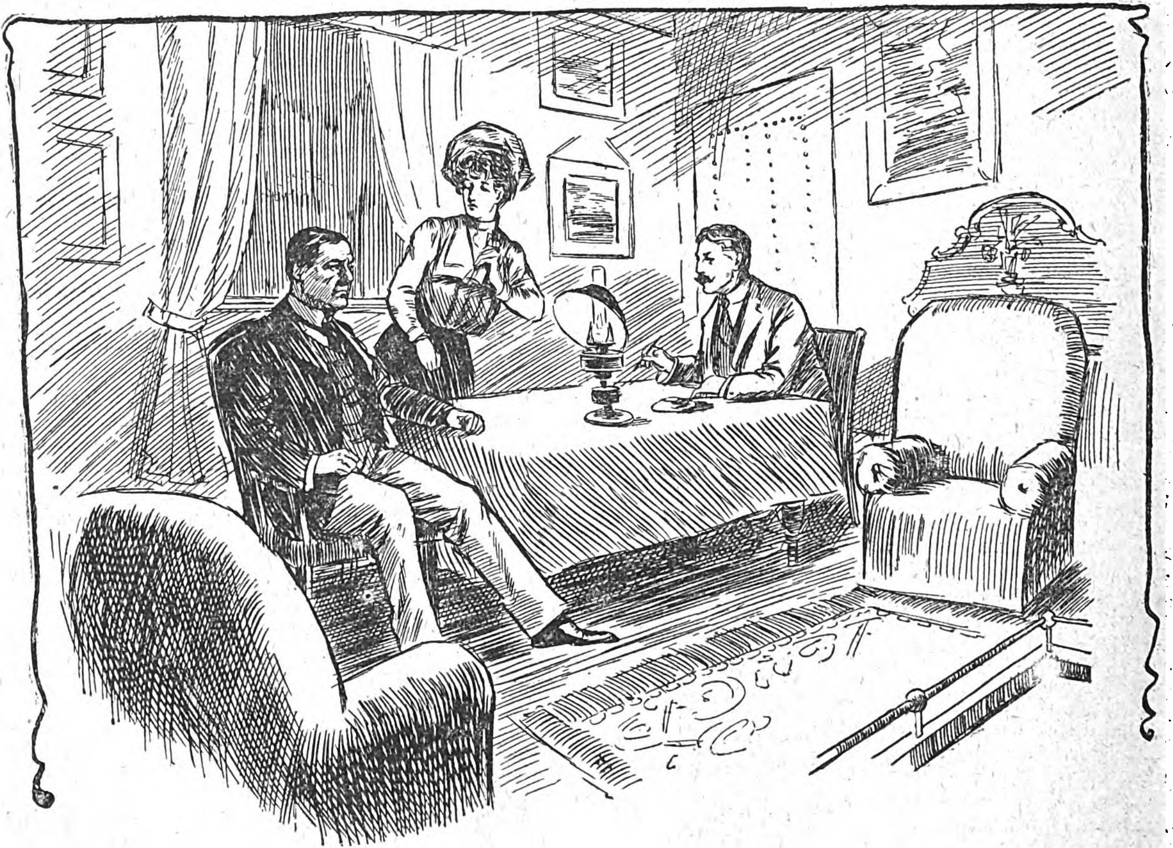
Hoping to see you on this side before long,

I am
Sincerely yours,
ENSOR P. GARFIELD.

To Dr. Septimus Ewles, M.D.

I looked up after reading the letter, to find Mr. Crafte watching me assiduously.

The man had a peculiar trick of inflating his nostrils every now and again. This, with a strange, and somewhat repulsive shrinking of his scalp, gave him a sinister appearance, by no means pleasant to contemplate.



The next moment the cheque was in her hand.

"Now, Mr. Crafte," I said, in a business-like tone, "what can I do for you? I must tell you that my time this morning is, in a way, precious, for I have to be at the hospital in less than three-quarters-of-an-hour to administer for a specially important operation."

"Is that so? Well, I don't want much. I can't sleep—just that—can't sleep—that's my trouble. Can't sleep at night, that is. In the day I go off at odd times, but it doesn't do me a bit of good."

"No, I suppose not, it never does. But Dr. Garfield intimates in his letter that it is some internal complaint that you wish my advice about."

"Garfield, like a good many other people, makes occasional mistakes, and that's one of them. Do you think that you can do anything for me?"

"I can't say," I replied, cautiously, "without making a thorough examination; and as I intimated just now, I cannot well spare the time this morning."

"Why not? Never mind the Hospital. Money is no object with me. Only put me on a natural and workable footing again, and you can name your own fee."

"Pardon me, Mr. Crafte, but that is not according to my usual practices; nor is it, if you will allow me to say so, a suggestion such as I am accustomed to have made me. I shall be pleased, of course, to do what I can for you if I am successful—well—you will be satisfied, and I—shall send you in my account in the ordinary way."

Truth to say, I did not care for the fellow's looks. They were positively ghoul-like in their bloodless insistence.

A glance at the clock told me that my time was up, but for the life of me I could not make a move. A curious numbing influence seemed to have me in its grip, rendering me powerless to act upon my own initiative.

"I will call upon you to-night at eleven," calmly and evenly said my unwelcome patient, "if that will suit you."

I was about to say that I never received anyone professionally at that hour; but, somehow, the words froze on my lips. I could only stupidly mutter a few indistinct words, which had no real meaning. "Very well, then," he repeated, "to-night at eleven."

As he rose to leave the room we both heard a voice in the hall—a silvery, ringing voice—asking for me.

Then Holmes entered to say that Haidée—my Haidée—wished to see me.

"Tell my sister," I said, "that Miss Van Cloo is here."

I looked for my American visitor to depart, but Mr. Siever Crafte stood, hat in hand, quite oblivious of the conventionalities, as I interpreted them, and, coolly awaiting developments, as it seemed to me.

Then he said, "Van Cloo! Van Cloo! It would indeed be extraordinary if the young lady should prove to be Miss Haidée Van Cloo."

"The young lady is Miss Haidée Van Cloo," I replied, not over courteously, I am afraid.

"Ah, then we are friends," he continued. "That is, I met Miss Haidée in Paris last fall at our ambassador's. The General made us mutually known."

What was it that made me hate this presuming Yankee so? What right had he to talk so familiarly of my little girl?

Another second, and verily, I should have said and done something which I should afterwards have regretted. I was, however, saved in time, though in a way that filled me, upon reflection, with a righteous feeling of uncontrollable jealous anger.

"Sep! just a moment!"

She stood, framed in the doorway, a picture to me of delight.

Siever Crafte smiled, a set, marble-hewed smile, his white face gleaming whiter, in startling contrast to his black clothes.

But it was Haidée's face that told the strangest tale.

Before I could answer her, she had seen and recognised the other.

"Mr. Crafte!" she stammered, and drawing nearer to me. "You here?"

"Yes," he said, with a slight inclination of his head, "and delighted, Miss Van Cloo, to renew our acquaintance."

"Haidée," I then managed to say, "Celia is expecting you upstairs. Mr. Crafte, I shall look for you to-night at eleven."

He took this as a dismissal, and in another moment Haidée and I were free of his presence.

"Sep! This man! What does he do here?"

"He comes as a patient, recommended by my friend Dr. Garfield of Philadelphia."

"Then, have nothing to do with him, Sep—have nothing to do with him!"

"But why, my darling, why?"

"Why!" she almost screamed. "Why; because I know him to have the power to make you—to make me to do his wicked will, whatever it be!"

CHAPTER II.

THE BLANK CHEQUE.

WITH the punctuality of the Evil One (for the devil, they say, is punctual to a fault), my new acquaintance presented himself as the clock struck eleven.

He had evidently been either dining out or amusing himself at the theatre, for he was in evening dress.

I should say here that, late in the afternoon, I had received a supplementary letter by mail from Dr. Garfield. It was an amplification of the one handed to me by Siever Crafte, but with a pregnant addition, which set me thinking.

"Siever Crafte," it ran, "is a very rich man. Still, no one exactly knows how he acquired his dollars. He follows no kind of business or profession; has never followed any.

"He came, a perfect stranger, to New York, from the west, some ten years ago. He at once proceeded to cut a good figure in Society, spending money freely, right and left. Of course he failed to get within the charmed exclusive circle of the Four Hundred, that was only to be expected, for to succeed in so doing, you must be able to produce and prove your birth-strain, as well as your 'pocket' balance-sheet.

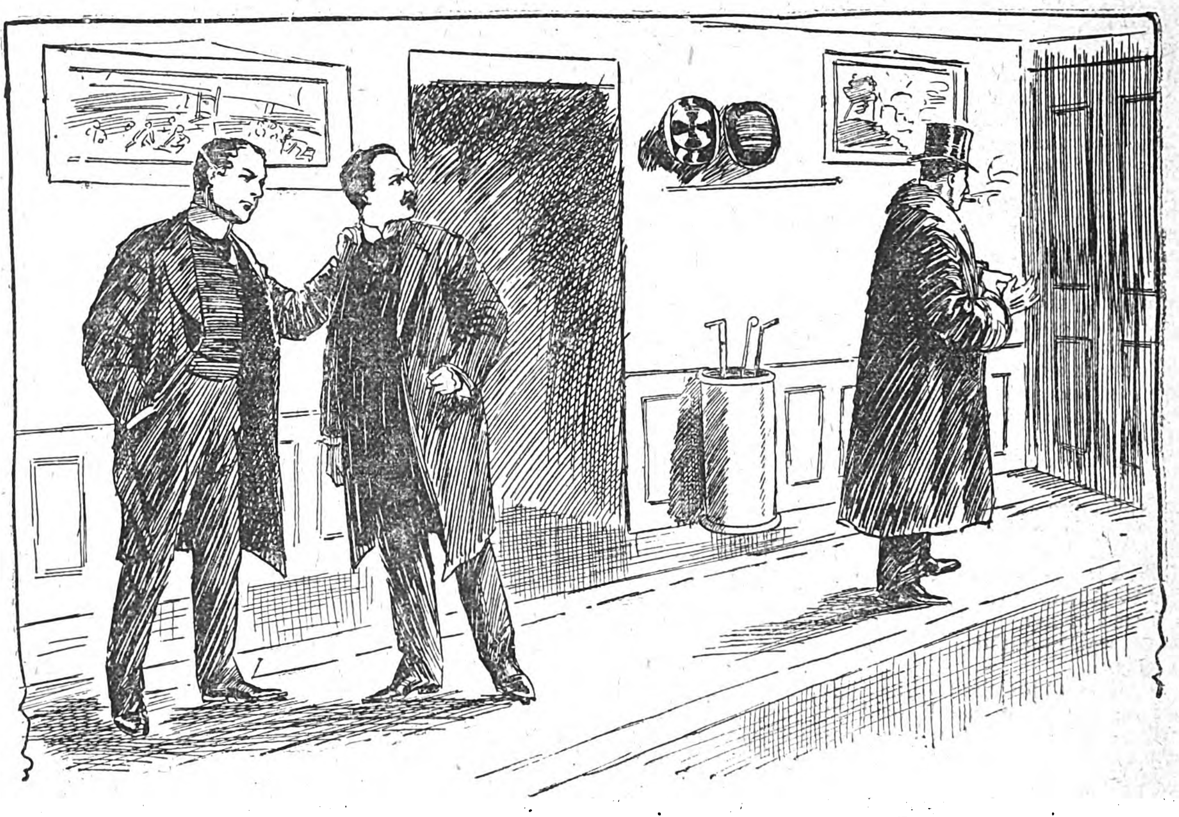
"Siever had no difficulty in giving ample and conclusive evidence of his wealth; but, with regard to his ancestral tree, he couldn't show a leaf or a twig of it.

"I'm rather sorry that I sent him to you, but you can easily drop him, should he prove troublesome.

"One thing about him I must caution you against, and that is his undoubted power to over-ride weaker wills than and by his own.

"I am not quite satisfied that he is in the habit of using this power illegitimately, but would not trust him too far in that direction."

So far Dr. Garfield; and, putting it alongside Haidée's extraordinary statement, I was on the alert, as I thought, when my patient put in his late appearance.



"But I didn't know that he was a friend of mine."

We had the table between us; the reading-lamp I always use in the evenings being placed so that I was in shadow, while my visitor stood out, silhouette-wise, in the beam of light.

At first he talked of insomnia, in connection, more especially, with himself. Then the conversation insensibly drifted into the subjects of psychic force; hypnotic influence, and so on.

Once or twice I caught myself looking fixedly at him, he, the while, gazing steadily into my eyes.

Then I remembered the warning I had but now received, and by a great effort of will, wrenched my attention away from him.

This, as I have said, happened more than once; each time I succeeded in switching myself, as it were, from off him, he manifesting an impatience, not to say irritability of demeanour, not in any way warranted by the subject-matter of our talk.

"Dr. Ewles," he said at length—and I noticed that it was close upon midnight—"what would you do with a million dollars—two hundred thousand pounds sterling—if you had it?"

He shot the question at me so unexpectedly, that, for the moment, I could not answer him.

I needed all my nerve now, for I felt myself unconsciously surrendering myself to a will-influence, greater than my own, and which I was becoming less and less able to resist.

I could not take my eyes from those other eyes which glowed like coals of fire from out that corpse-like mask.

"A million dollars!" he went on. "Just imagine what it is capable of purchasing. Fifty times that amount have I, and yet, I cannot sleep—cannot even enjoy life as can, and does a wretched clerk or salesman upon his miserable pittance of ten dollars or less a week.

"Perhaps had you a million, to do with as you listed, you could tell me something which would open my eyes."

As he spoke he drew from the breast pocket of his coat a folded piece of bluish grey paper.

This he deliberately spread out before him on the table, smoothing it, as if it were of inestimable value.

It was a blank cheque on the Burlington Street Branch of the Bank of England.

Suddenly, I experienced that whatever will-power I possessed, had passed temporarily away from me, and that I was responding to the stronger thought—touch of an influence I could not fight against.

"You see this cheque?"

"Yes."

"Well, you will fill it up for the sum of two hundred thousand pounds."

Mechanically, I reached my arm across the table, and drew towards me the oblong piece of bluish-grey paper.

Pen and ink were on the table.

"Fill up," said Crafte again, "for two hundred thousand pounds."

I did so, and the cheque lay before me, made out to my order, and crossed "London and County," my own bankers.

It has always been a mystery to me what the object of this man could have been in thus hypnotically compelling me to do that which he could just as well have done himself; and also, why he should have desired to give me, (if he did really so desire) the benefit of so vast a sum of money.

I say give, for I should never have cashed that cheque. I should have imagined that every coin of it was white-hot with a heat infernal.

But there was another who, like-minded with myself, would none of that, the mere touch of which we both instinctively held to be pollution.

Haidée had remained with my sister since the morning, having agreed to stay, as she often did, for a couple of days.

That she did so now, was a wonderful link in the chain of current events.

Hearing no sound from the drawing-room above, I had concluded that the two girls had retired long before.

It was while I was in a maundering semi-stupid fashion studying the precious slip of paper lying in front of me—a slip of paper which contained in itself possibilities far above the most exaggerated dreams of the average man, that the slight crack of the room door, half-woke me to returning consciousness.

Crafte's back was towards the door, but I, who faced it, could, brain-dulled though I was, distinctly see the form of Haidée pass into the room; sweep swiftly across the beam of light coming from the reading-lamp, and move in my direction.

The next moment the cheque, snatched with lightning quickness from off the table, was in her hand.

Crafte had sprung lightly to his feet.

"Miss Van Cloo!" he said, "this is a little extraordinary isn't it?"

Haidée, one hand upon my shoulder (I was still sitting, in a dull, dazed sort of a way, my limbs, when I tried to rise, seeming heavy as lead), the other having the cheque crumpled up within it, answered him not a word. Her eyes were, unusually for her, ablaze with contemptuous wrath.

Then she spoke to him.

"Mr. Crafte," she said, "Dr. Ewles does not require your money, for which—if I know you at all—(and you well know that I do) you will assuredly exact a terrible consideration."

"Doctor! this young lady is mad!"

"Sep, dear, do not heed him! I know what I do! See here!" and the intrepid girl lifting defiantly a spirit cigar-lighter, touched with it a corner of the cheque, which, in a flash, lay a little heap of grey ash on the table-cloth.

Crafte now looked me steadily for a second between the eyes, and I felt a rapid return of mental and physical vigour. I had come to my right mind.

The whole scene, as I have described it, is indelibly impressed on my memory. I can see it as plainly to-day as I could then.

The American said no more, but demanding of Holmes, who stood in the doorway, summoned by my ring, his hat and overcoat, left the house.

The reaction upon my darling took the form of violent hysterical sobbing.

"Sep!" she at last said, "you don't know from what I have saved you!—you don't know!"

CHAPTER III.

THE SATANIC SHADOW.

From that night onward, until his disappearance three months after his first visit to me, this mysterious man of millions, this incarnation of mad malignity, haunted me beyond endurance.

True, he never again entered my house—did not even call there; but he nevertheless made his baleful presence felt in such subtle, secret ways that I knew no rest, no peace.

My colleagues at the hospital, more especially my great chum Collings, came at last to notice that I was, physically and mentally, falling to pieces.

When administering chloroform or ether my hand would tremble, and my whole body would be damp with a nervous sweat, which threatened near-at-hand weakness, and probable total collapse.

"My dear fellow," Collings said one day. "You can't go on like this. You won't tell us what is the matter. Come! what is it? We would any of us stick at nothing to put you right."

"I know that, George," I answered him, "but neither you, nor anyone can straighten this matter out for me."

I had another trouble, too. Haidée seemed different. Not exactly altered, but—different.

I saw but little of her during this trying time.

She shut herself up in her studio out Kensington way, and not even my sister Celia, her old schoolmate, could penetrate her seclusion.

I was tortured to know what it all could mean.

As for Siever Crafte, he was always with me. His bloodless, cruel face met me wherever I went.

One day I saw him deep in chat with the physician-in-chief at St. Andrew's. I was passing through the main lobby at the time.

"Ah, Ewles!" said the big man shortly afterwards, "that is a most remarkable man, that friend of yours—Crafte, I think his name is. Most remarkable man! He speaks most warmly of you, too!"

"Does he?" I replied wearily. "But I didn't know that he was a friend of mine. I've only seen him twice to speak to. He came to me with an introduction from Garfield, of Philadelphia, the 'mania' man, you know."

"Dear me! Well, I thought you and he were quite intimate, from what he said. I've promised to take him round to-morrow, and explain things here a bit to him."

I came across him once or twice in this way at St. Andrew's, but neither of us spoke.

At parties, meetings, gatherings of all kinds, alike social and public, I met him, and whether or not I was mistaken I cannot say, but I always fancied that people after he had gone, looked askance at me.

Gradually I was conscious that friends and acquaintances became cold and distant; that the world—my world—was not as it had been towards me; was, in fact, dropping away from me.

I must ever except Collings from this list of the disaffected. He, dear old fellow, was always loyal and true.

How I became firmly and absolutely convinced that Siever Crafte was the moving spirit in all this shall now be told.

Sleeplessness at night had now seized upon me for a victim. Throughout the long hours I tossed and turned until my brain reeled again.

Tortured beyond degree one night I put on my hat and sallied out into the street. It was a fine night; the sky was studded with stars, but there was no moon. I wandered on and on, until I reached the bit of embankment by Westminster Bridge.

As is well known, just opposite the St. Stephen's Club entrance, on the other side of the road, the pavement for a short distance has two levels, one going parallel with the Embankment roadway, the other sinking a few feet as an approach to the steamboat pier.

I had crossed over from the club corner, and, leaning my arms on the upper parapet, looked down to the lower level. I had heard voices issuing up from there, and perhaps this had something to do with my action.

"I have hitherto failed completely," said a voice I rapidly recognised as that of Siever Crafte, "in getting this doctor-fool entangled in my enterprise; but I think I have got a bit even with him. The few hints I have dropped here and there have done their work. This Anglo-Dutch girl, however, it is who is the great spoke in my wheel. She knows too much. When in Paris last year I became foolish over her, and showed my hand. She is clever enough, too, to know her power, and to use it when she gets the opportunity."

"I should not have given you credit for such soft giving of yourself away," said a deep bass voice in reply.

"Well, we are all foolish sometimes. Unfortunately, this little lapse of mine, from the line of common sense, may have disastrous consequences."

"Not if you, or rather we, succeed in carrying out your idea to-morrow. It is the only way out of the difficulty, and if a hitch occurs I can see nothing but ruin for you."

"There must be no hitch. If you do as I have instructed you the young lady will be silenced, our medical friend reckoned with, and yours truly safely on the way to fresh fields and new pastures."

The voices ceased. My first intention was to descend the steps on the left and confront the plotters; but I quite forgot that steps on the right provided another exit from the lower level. By the time I reached the spot where the two had stood there was no one there.

I rushed up the right-hand steps just in time to see two men enter a hansom on the clock-tower side of the bridge, and drive off rapidly westward.

It was hopeless to track them. The next best thing was to find Ryan, my detective friend, but he was absent, I found on inquiry, on professional business no one knew where.

I decided, therefore, to wait till the next day, when he would probably be free to help me. But here again I was doomed to disappointment. Ryan's man-hunt took him to New York, and before I could see him he had left town for Liverpool.

Then came the little note from Haidée to me at the hospital, the subsequent fruitless waiting for her at the "Cabin," and my own determination to-day, two years nearly, after the flight of Crafte and the disappearance of my love, to seek these two if I have to go to the uttermost parts of the earth to do so.

No one will hear of me until I tread once more on English ground; then, and not till then, will I open my lips to tell of those things which I now go to encounter. I take up the trail at Frankfort. RALPH ENDERBY.

The Widow's Choice.

HAROLD SIMPSON and Archibald Capper had been friends for years. They both lived in the same boarding-house at Bayswater, and they travelled to the City every morning together by 'bus or tube according to the weather. Both were bank-clerks in different banks, and both were bachelors.

Whether it was the pernicious influence of the money which each in the course of his business had daily to see and to handle, is not certain. But what is certain is, that each, having attained something like the age of fifty, was imbued with a particularly strong characteristic, which characteristic has been aptly summed up in the phrase—"an eye to the main chance."

No mistake about it, both Mr. Simpson and Mr. Capper had eyes of that kind. But it didn't affect their friendship one whit. On the contrary, it seemed to draw them closer together. Thus it happened that they belonged to the same "Social Club," had the same circle of acquaintances, and, on every hand were looked upon as inseparable friends.

This friendship, fostered by long acquaintance with each other's likes and dislikes, might have remained for ever, had not the inevitable woman come between them.

She came in the form of a widow—fair, forty, but not fat. Quite a slim thing, indeed, with a face that might have belonged to a woman ten years her junior. Charming in manner she was, as well as in features. Her eyes were perfect—the kind that draw men to them whether they will or not; and Mrs. Peterson—that was the widow's name—knew how to use them. In addition, it speedily became known that she had money, and a good deal of it.

In a week from her arrival, every man Jack in the Belle Vue Boarding House was, figuratively speaking, on his knees to her.

Not even excepting those two confirmed bachelors, Simpson and Capper. They, indeed, were amongst her most ardent admirers, though a peculiar kind of shyness kept them from betraying that fact to other people. Even from one another they, for a time, concealed the state of their feelings.

But being so much together it was obviously impossible for them to do so for long. It was, therefore, not very surprising when, late one evening, after the remainder of the boarders had retired to rest, Simpson should remark to Capper:

"Charming woman!"

"You mean Mrs. Peterson? Yes, very charming."

Both were silent for a moment, puffing reflectively at their pipes. Simpson wondered vaguely why Capper should have known to whom he referred; Capper, equally vague, tried to imagine why Simpson had made his statement without connecting it with a name.

Simpson broke the silence.

"The sort of woman one would like to settle down with for life."

"Yes, if one were of the marrying sort."

"Of course," said Simpson.

"Quite so," added Capper.

They lapsed into silence again.

"We are getting on in life, and are confirmed bachelors, it's strange, isn't it?" Simpson asked, blowing out a cloud of smoke.

"Very strange," replied Capper laconically, blowing out another cloud.

"Do you know, Capper, I sometimes feel as if—as if——"

"So do I, Simpson—so do I!"

"A home of one's own, with the woman of one's heart, you know, Capper——"

"I know, Simpson—I know!"

They were silent once again. Only the pop of their lips around their pipe-stems broke the silence. At length Simpson murmured:

"Charming woman!"

"Very charming woman!"

"Do you know I admire her immensely?"

"So do I!"

Simpson half dropped a suspicious eye on Capper.

"Sometimes," he pursued musingly, "I think that she—in a way—you know the way women have—admires me. Curious creatures, women!"

"Very!" returned Capper drily.

The whole of Simpson's suspicious eye dropped on Capper now. But he removed it at once, and went on:

"Capper, I have known you a good many years, and you and I have been intimate friends. Capper, I want to tell you a secret!"

Capper rose from his chair slowly, and looked Simpson full in the face.

"Simpson," he said, and upon his face was an unusual pallor, "I too, have a secret to tell you!"

Simpson rose now. The two bachelors faced one another. Simpson spoke.

"Capper, I am in love!"

"Simpson, I also am in love."

"Capper, I adore Mrs. Peterson."

"Simpson, I worship the ground she walks on."

"As I before said," Simpson remarked, "I have grounds for believing she reciprocates my affection."

"She said she had never enjoyed music so much in her life as when I sang 'Come into the Garden, Maud,'" retorted Capper.

"She has done all that a modest woman can do to show she cares for me," rejoined Simpson hotly.

"She told me she liked my conversation," Capper said, keen on keeping his end up.

"Oh, that's a mere triviality," Simpson chipped in, triumphantly. "She told me I reminded her of her late husband!"

"Not much of a recommendation to a widow, is it?" asked Capper cynically.

Again there was a silence, both men fuming and glaring at one another.

Gradually both their tempers cooled a little. They sat down, still maintaining the most dogged silence, deep in thought.

At length Simpson spoke.

"Capper!"

"Simpson!"

Is your photo on page 652?

Both looked up, and their eyes met.

"Capper," said Simpson brokenly; "it's the first quarrel, I think, that we've ever had?"

"Simpson," returned Capper, snuffling a little; "it is."

"Capper, a dramatic moment in our lives has arrived. We are in love!"

"Deeply!"

"As you say, deeply. That would not matter, but the trouble is, we are both in love with the same woman."

"The same angel," murmured Capper.

"Capper, I thank you for the correction. It is perfectly justifiable. We have both fallen in love with the same angel; we both worship at the same shrine—the feet of Mrs. Peterson! Capper, can you deny it?"

"Simpson, I cannot!"

"Ah! then may I assume that, like myself, you have so far worshipped in silence?"

"You may."

"Good! Then Capper, I have a plan to propose. We are old friends, and it is at such moments as these that we need to stand together. You will listen to my plan, Capper?"

"Simpson, I will."

"It is this, that neither of us shall propose to her whom we mutually regard as an angel, for the space of one month."

"And what then?"

"After that time we each write a letter offering her our hands and hearts, and post them at precisely the same moment. Then we abide by her decision. Do you agree, Capper?"

"Simpson," returned Capper emotionally, "you have spoken as a gentleman and a friend. Your plan is fairness itself. I agree to it."

"I am glad," returned the other, "because it is fair to Mrs. Peterson as well. She is evidently well disposed towards us both, and a verbal proposal from either of us would probably lead to her accepting whichever of us uttered it. By sending letters simultaneously, it will give neither of us an advantage over the other, and Mrs. Peterson will be left to choose between us. And by her decision, Capper, we will faithfully, if sadly, abide, eh?"

"Simpson, you have expressed the case exactly. If you are the lucky man, I will wish you joy with all my heart."

"And I you!" returned Simpson fervently.

* * * * *

Very conceited were these two old bachelors. Each thought his own chances of gaining the widow's affections were certain.

And here, let it be said, that their intended proposals were by no means of a disinterested kind. Though they never for a moment allowed one another to think it, it is probable that the widow's good looks alone would never have attracted them. It was the fact that she possessed a goodly balance at the bank that interested them; for has it not been said that both Simpson and Capper had an eye to the main chance?

The first week of the intervening month passed quietly enough. The elderly rivals, without breaking their contract, each paid the widow marked attention at every opportunity. Simpson seemed to come in for his share of encouragement, and was once more told of his resemblance to the late Mr. Peterson. Capper, on his side, was made happy by the praises which the widow bestowed on his singing and upon his conversation.

All went merry as the much-quoted marriage-bell, to which, indeed, both rivals felt certain all these things were preliminary.

But then came a startling announcement. It became known one day that Mrs. Peterson was about to leave the Belle Vue boarding house. She was taking a house of her own in Shepherd's Bush.

To Simpson and Capper the news came like a thunderbolt. Unless they spoke to the widow, here was an end to all their fondest plans. So, at any rate, it seemed at first.

But not for long. For that same night Simpson managed to get Mrs. Peterson on one side, and had such a tete-a-tete with her as revived his hopes to a point of "moral certainty."

The widow seemed tenderer than ever when replying to his reference to her impending departure.

"Oh, but surely, Mr. Simpson," she said, "because I am leaving here, that is no reason why we should end our friendship?"

The look she gave him made Simpson utter a most devout:

"I'm sure, my dear Mrs. Peterson, I sincerely hope not!"

"On the contrary," pursued the widow, "I trust that you will honour my house with your company very often." Then, after a pause, during which she cast upon Simpson a look of something with a smile in it, she added: "With you by my side, Mr. Simpson, I could almost imagine my poor dear husband had come back to life! You are so like him, you don't know!"

Simpson would have spoken there and then; would have carefully dropped upon one knee and have poured out from his fifty-year old heart all the love that was pent up in his breast. But he didn't. He remembered his compact with Capper. He must wait till the month was up.

Lest it should be too soon taken for granted that Simpson was the object of the widow's affection, let her talk with Capper that very same evening be recounted.

"I'm sorry you're going," Capper remarked simply. "Very sorry. I shall miss you awfully."

Mrs. Peterson cast upon him a look of something like reproach.

"But surely," she said, "you are not going to let a difference of domicile keep us apart? I am looking forward to the time when I shall be charmed in my own drawing-room by that voice which you know so well how to use."

Capper's heart bounded within him. He, too, felt tempted to prostrate himself at her feet and to signify his willingness to go on singing "Come into the Garden, Maud" for ever. But he, too, remembered his promise, and he, too, held his peace.

Both Simpson and Capper were secretly delighted. Each afterwards separately recalled the details of their respective interviews, just narrated, and each thought that he was preferred above the other by the fair widow. But neither communicated to the other these ideas at first. That they experienced them was, however, abundantly evidenced by their demeanour of suppressed jubilation, whenever they discussed the question of their declaration of love.

The time for this declaration was now rapidly approaching.

"Capper," said Simpson a week or so after the departure of Mrs. Peterson for her new home. "Wednesday next will decide our fate! On that day the month is up, and we dispatch our missives to the object of our affections."

"We do, Simpson," returned Capper.

"Capper," pursued Simpson, "we are old friends; we came to an agreement regarding this matter that afforded us the utmost satisfaction. We agreed to abide by her decision and, whatever it might be, to bear no animosity against one another, but simply to wish each other joy?"

To which the laconic Capper returned:

"Simpson, we did."

"That being so," said Simpson, "I feel it my duty, Capper—as an old friend, you know—to let you down lightly."

"What do you mean, Simpson?" asked Capper, looking up anxiously.

"I mean, Capper, that you ought to be prepared for a disappointment. I have reasons to believe that Mrs. Peterson will accept me." And Simpson smiled confidently as he remembered his last talk with the widow.

"Simpson!" returned Capper, and there was a tinge of triumph in his manner as he, too, recalled the details of his conversation just prior to her departure. "Simpson, you are sanguine, which is a pity. Had you not broached this part of the subject, I should not have mentioned it—out of respect for your feelings. But since you have raised the point, I feel bound to tell you that I don't think you stand the remotest chance. Mrs. Peterson undoubtedly prefers me."

"Pah!" exploded Simpson.

"Pooh-pooh!" retorted Capper.

And then the two, each confident of his own chances, started saying extremely rude things in a nice way to one another, till it was time to retire for the night.

* * * * *

The eventful Wednesday evening arrived. The two old bachelors met in the smoking-room after dinner. For a few minutes they were silent. Simpson shot a furtive glance at Capper. Capper shot a similar missile at Simpson. Then Simpson said:

"Capper, the time has come!" and sighed.

"Simpson, it has!" and Capper sighed too.

"Capper, I am going to my room to write my letter."

"Simpson, so am I."

"We will meet here again in half-an-hour."

"Certainly."

They bowed in silence to one another, and each retired to his room, ostensibly to write out his proposal of marriage to Mrs. Peterson. As a matter-of-fact, each had his letter already written, having devoted the best part of the last fortnight to its composition. But they had told one another no word of this.

For the hundredth time, Simpson, in the privacy of his own room, perused his epistle.

As he finished the eloquent outpourings of his soul, he sealed the letter with a sigh of satisfaction.

"She can never resist me," he said to himself. "Capper has no chance."

Capper, in the privacy of his room, read his letter, too. In his eye there was a look of triumph.

"This letter," he mused, "would win any woman! Simpson, you will soon hear of me as Mrs. Peterson's second husband!"

He sealed his letter and descended to the smoke-room.

"Finished?" queried Simpson, who was already there.

"Finished!" returned Capper. "I propose that we go and post them."

Arm in arm and rather slowly, they sauntered down the street to the pillar-box. Then each, with an outstretched hand, dropped his letter in.

"To-morrow!" observed Simpson solemnly, "our fate will be decided."

And Capper assented.

They were back at the boarding-house ten minutes later. On the hall slab, as they entered, were two letters—one for each of them.

Both hearts beat with pleasure as they eagerly scanned the handwriting, but both delayed opening their missive till they reached the privacy of the smoking-room.

"This is from Mrs. Peterson," remarked Simpson, with subdued triumph.

"So is this!" returned Capper, flourishing his letter.

Then as they broke the seal, both were silent.

"She invites me to dinner next Tuesday!" cried Simpson, ecstatically, reading.

"So she does me!" Capper returned.

"There's a postscript to mine," Simpson went on. "—sh, what's this? O—h—h!" Simpson suddenly went pale and plumped into a seat.

At the same moment Capper did precisely the same thing.

Both letters fluttered to the ground. This is how they read, with the necessary alteration of name:

"Dear Mr. Simpson,—Will you do me the honour of dining here on Tuesday next at seven o'clock? I am so longing to renew our pleasant friendship. Yours sincerely—ISABEL PETERSON.

"P.S.—I hope to introduce you to Major Pombridge, to whom, you will be pleased to hear, I am to be married shortly."

"Capper," said Simpson in a broken voice, after a brief pause, "we have made asses of ourselves!"

"Simpson," replied Capper in tremulous tones, "we have!"

"She is a flirt!" said Simpson.

"She has trifled with my affections!" returned Capper.

"We can't go to the dinner, of course?"

"Of course not, now we've sent those letters."

"I don't think I cared for her much," said Simpson, in a "sour grapes" kind of way.

"I'm beginning to think it was a mere passing fancy on my part," Capper returned.

And then the two baffled old bachelors lapsed into silence, and smoked and pondered on what might have been.

SYNOPSIS OF FIRST CHAPTERS.

Richard Seldon, a convict, escapes. In a train he meets Cyril Roylance just back from Australia, whom he murders and impersonates. He assumes the rôle of squire, and pays attention to Doris Dale.

While visiting the Dales, the butler is murdered by Seldon and two accomplices, but he so manages that the guilt is fixed on Jack Branscombe, Doris' lover. Branscombe is away from home when the verdict against himself is pronounced.

CHAPTER XVI.

The Fraternal Nubbleys.

In the boughs that shaded the village school, and in the ivy that clothed it like a mantle, the birds were singing, making gentle music to the children's morning hymn, and the morning sunshine was drying the tear drops that the dew had left on the now smiling faces of the flowers. The flowers were pleasant to look upon, and the harmony made by the song birds and the children was pleasant to listen to.

That was why the two old gentlemen who had taken the quaint old cottage contiguous to the school house were sitting out in the old-fashioned garden in the sunshine. They were two nice old gentlemen, not long ago they had been looked upon as two strange old gentlemen, and about nine days ago the Fallowfield villagers had greatly wondered about them, and why they had chosen Fallowfield wherein to sojourn. But the nine days' wonder had worn itself out, and the two strange old gentlemen had become accepted facts—facts all the more gratefully accepted because they were evidently pretty well-to-do old gentlemen, and liberal to boot.

Not that they were exactly refined, in fact, both in manner and speech they were somewhat rough and ready, but Fallowfield tolerated the rough in consideration of the ready, for, whatever their bounds, socially, educationally, or otherwise, their means appeared to be unlimited, the source thereof being generally reputed to be the colossal sum awarded by a certain railway company for compensation in respect of the injuries sustained in an accident on their line by the old gentleman who, at the moment in question, was being wheeled along the cottage garden by the other old gentleman, which injuries, combined with rheumatism, necessitated that wheeling. Everybody said how good and kind it was of the other old gentleman to wheel his brother about in that bath-chair, how tender-hearted he must be, and grown-up people pointed out the two old gentlemen to little boys who were quarrelling as examples of what brothers ought to be. "Mr. Nubbley never picks up bricks to throw at his brother," they said, "he wheels him about in the sunshine in a bath-chair because he likes to listen to the beautiful birds and look at the beautiful flowers." For it should be mentioned that the brothers were known in Fallowfield as James Nubbley and Joseph Nubbley.

"Yes," said Mr. James Nubbley, "brother Joseph is partial to what he calls the beauties of nature, and seeing as 'ow he can't take his walks abroad to enjoy 'em, in course it's my bounden duty to wheel him amongst 'em, and begging pardon, was it the burglary over at Dalehurst Grange as you was talkin' about?"

"No, Mr. Nubbley," replied one of the villagers, volubly and excitedly, "it's nearer home this time. The gang, for gang of 'em there must be, have broken into Brettelby Court."

"And where may that be?"

"Why, about two and a half miles along the Fallowfield road. Our Squire was dining there last night, and on their way back from Brettelby, no doubt it was the same lot, they broke into Fallowfield Hall, and no doubt meant to murder the Squire. As it was, they half-killed poor Mr. Chandler."

"Deary me!" ejaculated the man in the invalid chair. "Brother James, whatever is the world a-comin' to with such a lot of wicked people in it? Have they got any clue?"

"Nary bit o' one," was the answer. "That detective chap from London, he's up there making inquiries and takin' instructions from the Squire; but lor! it seems to me these London police are all very well for dealing with swell mobsmen, but our own constabulary's best to deal with a desperate lot like there is hiding round this countryside. What do you say, Mr. Bingle?"

This last question was addressed to, just as the remark prefacing it was made in deference to a burly individual of severe and self-conscious demeanour, who, halting, returned the respectful salutation of the company with a very proper condescension. And this individual, after the question had been duly deferentially repeated, replied:

"What I thinks is this, Bob Challoner, I thinks, other people thinks what they likes and I also has my opinions," and the group exchanged glances, as who should say: "There's a deep one for you; ah! he could tell us something if he only liked to open his mouth."

The brothers Nubbley meantime interchanged glances, and the one in the wheel chair inquired, after a pause:

"And did they get any stuff; I mean, any plate or money away from the Hall?"

"Not a scrap seemingly," said Bob Challoner, the village gossip; "did they, Mr. Bingle?"

"Now, look here, Bob," said that ornament to the county constabulary, pointing a warning finger, "you know as I'm in a responsible position, and don't you go asking me a lot of unresponsible questions; and, likewise and also, Bob Challoner, you just be careful what you're a-talking about, 'cause in times like these people in unresponsible positions has got to be careful about going about saying unresponsible things."

Mr. Challoner, duly crushed, subsided with becoming humility, and very properly and respectfully begged Mr. Bingle's pardon, and expressed a hope that he hadn't said anything that he oughtn't to have said, but that if he had he humbly apologised and likewise bowed, whereupon Mr. Bingle intimated loftily that there was no harm done for the matter of that, but that, mysteriously, people ought to mind what they said about matters they didn't understand. The brothers Nubbley nodded approval, and when Mr. Challoner had in some confusion shuffled awkwardly away followed by his companions in the direction of the Roylance Arms, Mr. James Nubbley remarked, sagely:

"As you say, Mr Bingle, sir, parties in your responsible position has to be very careful what they says."

"They has, Mr. Nubbley."

"And what they listens to."

"You're right, sir; you're a man of the world, Mr. Nubbley."

"There's a bit of a nip in the air this morning, don't you think, Mr. Bingle, sir?"

"I was noticing it comin' down the road, Mr. Nubbley."

"Was you now, really? What a coincidence! My brother Joseph was just asking me if I'd step inside and bring out the bottle of 'square face' just to keep that cold snap away from inside the chest, Mr. Bingle."

"And he's a werry good judge, Mr. Nubbley. Ah, you has to be very careful, Mr. Joseph, setting still, as you unfortunately has to, to take a little nip of something now and then to keep the circulation going. And a great consolation it must be, sir, for you to 'ave a brother like Mr. James, a-studyin' your every want."

"It is, Mr. Bingle, and I'm grateful accordin'. James is werry thoughtful, and he knows my ways; knows how I likes to see the flowers a-growing in the garden and along the roadside, and the lambs a-friskin' in the fields. Why, if my brother James was to see a lamb a-friskin', he'd hurry home as fast as he could pelt to take me out in this old bath-chair afore it had done friskin' Here he comes with my drop of 'square face.'"

"Yes, here he comes, what an active man he is!" said Mr. Bingle, and then with an air of the most intense surprise as a dwarf tumbler was placed in his hand: "Why, Mr. Nubbley, sir, what's this for? You've brought three glasses!"

"Which I have," replied brother James, "in the 'opes as you'll do us the honour of joining us in a nip." Then, filling the glasses, he continued: "Mr. Bingle, sir, my respects; brother Joseph, here's my regards." Then, smacking his lips, after emptying his glass, he observed blandly: "How sweet it is to hear the little children a-singing of their little songs!"

"It is," assented Constable Bingle, "and that's a drop of real Hollands, Mr. Nubbley," and he produced from his tunic pocket a well-seasoned briarwood pipe.

"Do me the honour of trying a pipeful of mine," said Mr. James Nubbley, taking up the tobacco canister and a couple of churchwardens from beside the bath-chair and filling them. The three filled their pipes, Mr. James re-filled their glasses, the three emptied these, and the ponderous importance and severity of the representative of the strong arm of the Law palpably relaxed.

"It's a very rum start," Mr. James hazarded, "this job up here," and the stem of his churchwarden described a semi-circle with a mile or so of woodland, pasture, and arable between the spot and Fallowfield Hall.

"You're right, it is," said Mr. Bingle mysteriously.

"These London chaps seem to be a little bit off the line, eh?" said Mr. James with a significant nod, and Mr. Joseph from the wheel chair, pointing his churchwarden impressively, said:

"Now, brother James, you know what Mr. Bingle said just now about his responsible position and irresponsible folks asking irresponsible questions. You look after Mr. Bingle's glass and leave such serious matters as his business alone. He knows what he knows, you let him alone for that."

"Oh, that's all right, Mr. Joseph," replied P.c. Bingle. "There's no harm in Mr. James making a remark. In course, I am a responsible party, so to speak, but I draws a distinction between intelligent gentlemen like you.—(Thank you, Mr. James; my! this does warm the chest and werry good likewise for the infernal—I mean internal organs)—and the likes of that there fellow Challoner. And you ain't far wrong, Mr. James. These 'ere parties down from London who, with all their swagger and any amount of money at their command, don't seem such flyers at the game when it comes to settling down to work."

"Downright duffers," asserted Mr. James, "by the side of men like you."

"Well," said Mr. Bingle, "here we are. Rossiter lets young Jack Branscombe slip clean through his fingers, 'cause there's no doubt it was him as got out of the train at Mattingham the other day in a travelling cap and ulster; and, before that job's barely a week old, here's Brettelby Court broken into, the pick o' the plate cleared away, and nobody none the wiser till they begins to look for the silver urn to make the breakfast coffee, and then finds enough had been carted away to stock a silversmith. And in less than no time the thieves is cross-country making a very, very early morning call at Fallowfield Hall."

"Good gracious!" said Mr. Joseph. "How on earth do they do it? However can they get over the ground?"

"But what I can't make out is what on earth was Mr. Morgan Chandler doing when he was found?"

Mr. Bingle placed one finger to the right side of his nose, winked his left eye, and said, with a mysterious nod:

"Bicycles!"

Mr. Joseph Nubbley gave a convulsive start. For a moment his cheeks expanded as he clapped his hand to his mouth, seemingly having swallowed a cloud of tobacco smoke.

"Oh! bicycles?"

"Yes, Mr. Nubbley, bikes."

"Not motor-cars?" inquired Mr. Joseph Nubbley almost severely.

"Tut, tut, no!" replied P.c. Bingle, "we should 'ear 'em, even if we didn't smell 'em, and they leave tracks. Don't you see? The man with the bike he can hide his tracks, he can dismount and carry his bike, he can wheel it over the footpath, and take it across a field of grass," and Mr. Bingle nodded and winked again. The brothers Nubbley exchanged glances.

"What did I tell you?" said James. "Didn't I say as if they'd got this man at Scotland Yard things would be different?"

"You did, James," Joseph acknowledged, with the air of one anxious to render due acknowledgment to a correct forecast. "You certainly did, and I can't deny it."

"But what I can't make out," Bingle went on, warmed to his subject by the approbation and the "square face," "is what on earth was Mr. Morgan Chandler doing where he was found?"

"Where was that?" asked Joseph.

"Oh, of course, you haven't heard the rights of it. When Squire Roylance's alarum woke him he jumped up, and to his horror, found Chandler, his resident land steward, lying stretched on the floor in a pool of blood that had flowed from two severe wounds in his head. He rang for assistance, the doctor was sent for, and they brought Chandler to, but all they can get out of him was that he heard burglars in the Hall, got up and dressed, saw, he believes, three, but he's certain at least there were two, men enter the Squire's room. He rushed in to warn the Squire, and one of 'em took him by the throat and the other smashed him over the head with a crowbar."

"Did he recognise any of 'em?"

"Yes," replied the police-constable, "it appears he swears one of them was Jack Branscombe."

The two brothers exchanged glances.

"He won't swear to the other one," Bingle proceeded, "but he says he believes it's somebody who owes him a grudge."

"Somebody what owes him a grudge? Who's that?" asked Mr. James.

The police-constable Bingle relapsed into sphinx-like mystery. He had observed Joseph replace the stopper in the square-faced bottle, and, looking at his watch, found it was later than he thought.

"I've got my ideas," he said, "but, of course, I've got to remember my responsibility. Good morning, gentlemen!"

He strode off, somewhat rapidly, for he had just observed Ned Fletcher loafing along the village green in the direction of the Roylance Arms.

And he meant to ask Ned Fletcher a few questions, one of them being where he had spent the night.

When he had gone, James looked at Joseph and whistled, and Joseph, returning James' glance, mysteriously winked.

"Strikes me," said the man in the invalid chair, "Dick's guess ain't quite so wide; young Branscombe's playing a bit of our game on his own."

"Dry up," whispered the other, "here's the kids a-comin' out of school. How beautiful, my brother, is the 'appy face of childhood to gaze upon! Cher cully, don't that school missus, Miss Morrison I think she calls herself, seem to remind you of somebody you've seed afore?"

"Yes," replied Joseph, "I've been trying to fix her face, but I expect it's only a coincydence. She ain't a bad-looking sort of party, and it's only natural, brother James, for you and me to feel sympathetic towards her, seeing as 'ow all the little kiddies love her so, and you and me is as fond of little kiddies as we is of flowers, and sunshine, and little lambs."

And as the children trooped past the gate, brother Joseph placed the square-faced bottle under the apron of the invalid chair and beamed.

And while he beamed, along the winding road past the school-house and the cottage, there came a man on horseback. It was the Squire of Fallowfield, and with due respect the brothers Nubbley lifted their billycock hats, and brother Joseph deflected the sinister eyelid. The Squire courteously acknowledged their salutation, riding by with a face set and imperturbable. Casually he drew his handkerchief from his left cuff, smoothed his black moustache, then rested his right hand, still containing the handkerchief, on his right knee; and Joseph, turning to James, said:

"D'ye see, Cully! You've got a better headpiece nor me. What's that mean in what you and him call the code?"

"That, my brother," said the other, "is the signal, 'lie low, danger ahead.' Hullo, there's the sky pilot droppin' in at the school-house again. It's a werry beautiful thing, my brother, to see a young man like that taking such a lively interest in the eddication of the young."

"To say nothing of the interest he takes in the school-missus. Oh, my brother, there seems to be a bond of sympathy between that young man and us. His inclination seems to turn so natural to everything what's bright and innercent."

CHAPTER XVII.

Doris Makes a Confidant.

The Rev. Gerald Hastie having knocked, and a musical mellow voice having said "Come in," entered.

"Good morning, Miss Morrison. I'm not intruding am I? Only I was going by and I remembered one or two school matters I wanted to mention."

"I'm quite glad to see you," said the schoolmistress. "I've got quite a heap of things to talk to you about."

A HUMAN FINGER-POST.

The sight of a woman neatly dressed and in the best of health and spirits acting as finger-post and directing people on their way, is rather a novel one. Yet this is what, in a figurative sense, Mrs. R. Ziegler of 2 Withnall St., Wigan, is doing daily. Chas. Forde's Bile Beans for Biliousness restored her to health when she had been in a terrible condition for five years; and all whom she hears of suffering as she did she points to the way of escape. To a Wigan Examiner reporter, the other day she said:—"My illness lasted upwards of five years, and in my debilitated state I used to have a feeling that life was scarcely worth living. For days together I was afraid to eat anything, as directly afterwards I was seized with the most horrible pains and other distressing symptoms of indigestion and biliousness. The least effort brought on shortness of breath, and left me for some time as weak as a baby. Palpitation also alarmed me considerably, so that I was really afraid to move. I had pains in my back and side, due to liver and kidney disorder. Then I was weighed down with a dull, tired feeling, making me take quite a melancholy view of life. Frequently my trials were increased by a splitting headache, and chronic constipation was a still further source of trouble. I had medical advice and medicine on many occasions, but with no good result; as in a day or two I became worse than ever. At last, when I was in the depths of despair, I saw in the paper the wonderful manner in which Chas. Forde's Bile Beans for Biliousness had cured a case just like my own. I thought, perhaps, they might do me some good at least, and I commenced a course, forthwith. Very glad am I now that I did so, for a few boxes have made me feel like a new woman. The pain in the head and back very soon went, and I found my appetite gradually returning. There was no more of that depressing, uncomfortable feeling after meals. At nights I slept very much better, and when I arose in the morning I felt refreshed and equal to the day's tasks. My increase in strength was very marked. It was a great relief to me to have no more of the palpitation. That has now gone entirely. I now feel better in health than I have done for years, and this I owe entirely to Chas. Forde's Bile Beans. I can conscientiously recommend them to other sufferers."

Bile Beans are superior to all medicines for palpitation, indigestion, biliousness, buzzing and pains in the head, pains in the chest, back and side, fulness after eating, dizziness, sleeplessness, piles, constipation, liver and kidney disorders, nervous and general debility, female ailments, pimples, colds, chill, rheumatism, and as a preventative of influenza. All chemists stock Bile Beans, or a box may be obtained, post free, from the Bile Bean Manufacturing Co., 119 and 120 London Wall, E.C., upon receipt of prices 1s. 1½d. or 2s. 9d.

FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.

"Oh, that's ripping!" Then hastily relapsing into a more suave and clerical tone, he added: "I mean, how truly fortunate that I happened to decide to look in. And how are the kiddies, I mean, the children getting on?"

"They're as good as gold. Of course, they're live children."

"You'd think so if you'd been passing Branberry's orchard just now, ahem!"

"What! my children? Tell me, who were they?"

"Couldn't if I would, wouldn't if I could; whenever I hear sounds of brats up to mischief I systematically look the other way."

"But it's very, very wrong of you," said Miss Morrison, trying not to smile, "and you ought to know better."

"I know I ought, but I don't. You see, I've been there before myself, many a time; I mean to say one is reminded on reflection of the frequency of one's own lapses. Er—let me see, did you say you'd made the stationery account agree?"

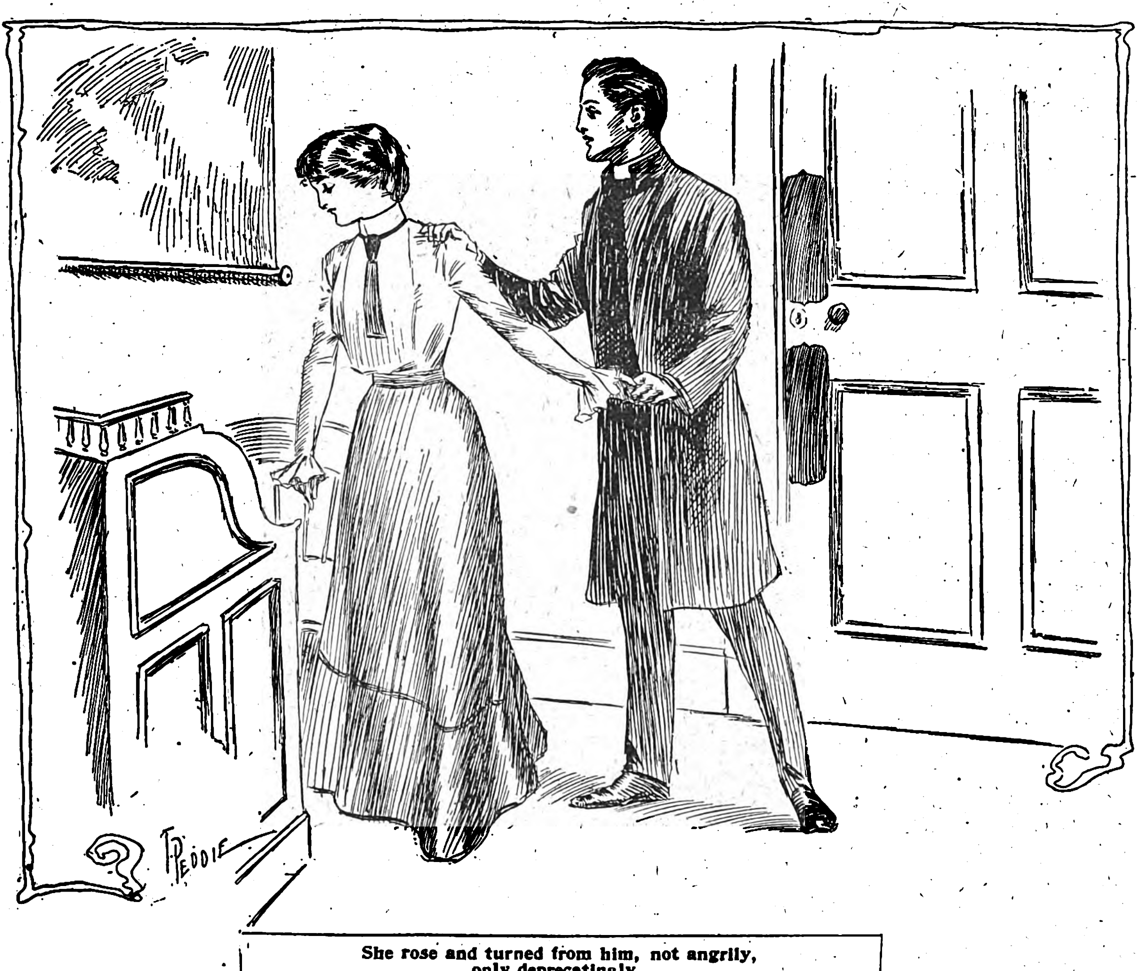
And then they went into figures, though Miss Morrison noted with surprise that the curate of Fallowfield was, for a man who had taken mathematical honours at Cambridge, the unreadiest reckoner she had ever encountered, and perhaps it was because Gerry Hastie's eyes kept roving from the figures inside the red lines on the blue paper to the more interesting figure of the lady whose accounts he was checking. Certainly, the schoolmistress, looking up occasionally from long "tots" with the question, "What do you make it?" found the curate's eyes resting on her with an earnest expression, which somehow brought a deeper rose tint to her comely cheeks. But those tiresome accounts at last disposed of, they chatted on other subjects, Gerry dilating ruefully and in detail on the discomforts of bachelors and the helplessness of a young man at the mercy of an elderly lady, and Miss Morrison sympathised.

"I say, that's a nice old racket, I mean to say, a dreadful state of things, up at the Hall," said the curate.

"I heard something of it from the children, what dreadful things keep happening! There seems quite an epidemic of crime in the neighbourhood."

"Yes, it's a rum start, I mean, it's a bit strange, isn't it. One thing's pretty certain, there's a gang, and a desperate gang, working this district."

"Undoubtedly. And do you think Mr. Branscombe is really at the head of it? It's so shocking to think of



She rose and turned from him, not angrily, only deprecatingly.

SMALL-POX AND DEAFNESS.

SMALL-POX, in common with other contagious or exanthematous diseases, scarlet fever, and measles, is a fruitful cause of deafness. The inflammatory processes which affect the membranes of the middle ear in this disease may, in some cases, produce simple catarrhal deafness, but the most frequent result is a purulent condition, with formation of an abscess, perforation of the ear drum, and a discharge from the ear. A third a very rare form of deafness, appearing as a complication of small-pox, is caused by changes in the structures of the labyrinth or internal ear, and is produced through the effect of the disease reacting, through the circulation, upon the terminal filaments of the auditory nerve.

These three forms of deafness, resulting from small-pox, do not differ in their treatment from aural diseases due to other causes, and although generally considered obstinate in character, the results obtained by the Drouet treatment show that all but a very small percentage are curable. Further information on the subject will be found in the "Journal for the Deaf," which can be obtained free by post by addressing the Secretary, 72 Regent's Park Road, N.W. This publication gives the symptoms of the various forms of deafness and a resumé of upwards of 200 cured cases. Among the cases lately reported as cured by the Drouet treatment the following are of great interest. The first case illustrates how completely the hearing can be restored, although there may be numerous complications. Mr. H. L. applied to the consulting physician of the Drouet Institute for the treatment of deafness complicated by nasal, Eustachian, and middle ear catarrh, anchylosis of the ossicles, labyrinthian and tubal tinnitus, and discharge from the ears. After a course of the Drouet treatment, under the direction of the consulting physician, a letter conveyed to the Institute his surprise at the results obtained:

Exeter, Oct. 6th, 1901.

Dear Sirs,—I am astonished at the remarkable effect of the Drouet treatment in my case. The discharge has entirely disappeared, my voice has a clear ring, and my hearing has become so acute that I can detect the least sound, which means something to me in my occupation, as I have the superintendence of thirty hands in this establishment. Yours truly, H. L.

(Full address of this patient can be obtained from the Drouet Institute.)

When the Rev. John L. Meredith applied for the Drouet treatment, the consulting physician found that the deafness was of a chronic catarral nature, and obstinate in character, as previous special treatment had failed to effect a cure. Under the Drouet treatment, however, as prescribed for catarrhal deafness, the result was satisfactory, as expressed in the following letter:

Fritwell Vicarage, Banbury, July 22nd, 1901.

Dear Sirs,—You will be glad to know that the treatment as prescribed by your consulting physician has had a curative effect. I do not require any more treatment, and shall be pleased to publicly recommend the Drouet Institute for Deafness.—Yours truly, JOHN L. MEREDITH.

Mrs. E. Green, in forwarding the Patient's Report Form, filled out with a description of the case of her child, aged five years and nine months, gave a history of earaches, followed by discharge from the ears, and deafness. This is one of those cases where, if the ears do not receive proper attention, the ailment takes a chronic course.

Fortunately, Mrs. Green, unlike the majority of parents, realised the importance of the case, and placed her child under the Drouet treatment, and, as shown by her letter, a complete cure was obtained:

Lincoln, Aug. 23rd, 1901.

Dear Sir,—I thank you for your letter this morning, and am glad to be able to say my child has quite recovered from the deafness and discharge from the ears, and does not need any more attention.—Thanking you for your kind advice and treatment, yours truly, E. GREEN.

The case of Mr. George Ryder is interesting as an instance of a cure of catarrhal deafness of ten years' duration. When he asked for treatment by correspondence with the Consulting Physician of the Drouet Institute, the difficulty in hearing was so great that the ticking of a watch could not be heard at all with the left ear, and only when within two inches of the right ear. There was the usual history of deafness creeping on gradually, and almost imperceptibly, which is found in cases of chronic catarrhal deafness, with greatly increased difficulty in hearing following the constant succession of colds in the head, to which Mr. Ryder was subject. He suffered much from noises in the ear and dizziness. Appropriate treatment was prescribed and carried out faithfully by Mr. Ryder, under the directions of the Consulting Physician, as given in correspondence, from time to time, with the result that a perfect cure was reported, as follows:

Bishop's Cottage, Woodcock's Hill, Rickmansworth,
Aug. 27th, 1901.

Dear Sirs,—I beg to thank you for your kind letter, also for the great interest you have taken in my case, and I am very pleased to say that I am quite cured. Before I began the treatment I was quite deaf in my left ear, and could only hear the ticking of my watch two inches off with my right ear, and after only going under the treatment you advised me to follow for two months, I was cured. I shall only be too pleased to recommend it to my friends.—Yours faithfully,

GEORGE RYDER.

Nerve deafness, and the formation of adhesions restricting the movement of the ossicles, the minute chain of bones contained in the middle ear, produce a condition that is regarded as almost incurable; yet this was the cause of deafness in the case of Mr. W. J. Saich, who reports himself cured completely, after a careful course of treatment under the direction of the consulting physician of the Drouet Institute. Let it be added that Mr. Saich had been deaf for years, and given up hope of ever obtaining a cure. His letter speaks for itself.

13 Tennyson Road, Stratford, London, E.,
Sept. 24th, 1901.

Dear Sirs,—I am glad to say that the noises in the head have entirely disappeared, and that the hearing has been restored. You can use my name as an endorsement of the Drouet treatment, and I shall recommend to you anyone that suffers from deafness.—Yours faithfully, W. J. SAICH.

The original letter, with all the others of which extracts have been given above, may be seen in the Autograph Room of the Drouet Institute, where hundreds of letters emanating from grateful patients are kept. The Autograph Room is open to the public every day, except Sunday, from ten a.m. to six p.m.

Let us state again that a copy of the "Journal for the Deaf" will be forwarded gratis to any applicant. All persons affected with a disease of the ear, nose, or throat should read it, and also ask for the report form, which will allow them to submit their case to the Drouet Institute. This form is sent free of charge, and the advice given is always gratuitous. For all additional information write to the Secretary of the Drouet Institute, 72 Regent's Park Road, London, N.W.

Personal consultations are held daily, except Sundays, from two to four p.m. In this case a fee is charged for examination. Special consultations may also be had at any time by making an appointment with the Consulting Physician.

such a nice fellow, and in his position and with such a romantic interest attaching to him, being implicated in such wickedness. What is your opinion?"

"My opinion, no, not merely my opinion, my firm and absolute conviction is that Jack Branscombe has no more to do with the attack on Morgan Chandler, or with the plate robbery at Brettleby Court, or with the murder at Dalehurst Grange than you or I had."

"But his strange and sudden disappearance, the finding of the weapon in his grounds?"

"Yes, yes, I'll grant that. I'll grant appearances are against him. Yes, there's a chain of circumstantial evidence long enough and strong enough to hang any man, if men were convicted unheard, but we've got to hear some day his side of the story."

"What, when he's caught?"

"No, I prefer to say when he's found, for I believe Jack Branscombe is either dead or under duress."

"I'm so glad to meet somebody who believes in his innocence. I somehow can't think such a nice fellow guilty."

"And I'm glad too to hear you speak like that about my friend, for Jack Branscombe and I were sworn chums, and I'm certain that so good a sportsman couldn't be so bad a man. And then again, Miss Morrison, do you think such a dear girl as Doris Dale, and isn't she a plucked 'un, could love a man who could do such things as that?"

Somehow a strange expression, almost a painful one, came into the winsome, comely face of the schoolmistress, the rose tints for a moment died away from it, leaving it all cream.

"I don't think she could," she said slowly, "if she knew; and yet I can understand there being cases of women loathing evil deeds and yet loving evil men."

"What! After they've found them out?"

"Well, yes, even after they've found them out," and the beautiful grey eyes seemed fixed in a far-away gaze, the gaze of one whose mental vision penetrates the vista of the long ago; so that she seemed oblivious of the ardent gaze that Gerald Hastie was concentrating on her face.

"It seems to me," he said gently, very earnestly, "that the trust and love of a good woman would turn even a bad man towards better ways. I think that any man, good or bad, or middling, would be all the better for the thought that a dear, sweet woman loves him. I know I'm not a very good man, nothing like what I ought to be according to my calling and my cloth, but I am sure that if I could only think that you believed in me, cared for me; oh! if I could only think you loved me, there's no temptation I could not resist and no ordeal that I could not endure."

And, love giving him daring, he took her hand; but she rose and turned from him, not angrily, only deprecatingly.

"No, no!" she said in a choking voice. "You must not dream of that. Gerald Hastie, I do believe in you, and, in a way, I do care for you as a dear, dear friend, I honour you as a brave, faithful Christian gentleman; only—never, oh please! never, never speak to me or think to yourself of being anything more to me than a dear and trusted friend."

"But why—why?" he asked with all a lover's blindness to any reason that he should not gain his heart's delight.

"Gerald," he said, looking him straight in the eyes, "you would grant me any favour in reason that I might ask?"

Feeling that he could do much for her, not merely in, but out of reason, he replied: "Yes, ask what you will for it is granted before you ask if it be in my power."

"It is this," she said. "Please never ask me—why!"

He went his way with, for a while, a bowed head and heart, for he had learnt to love this winsome-faced schoolmistress with the tender face and patient ways; he, the strapping, alert, young athlete, a healthful type of young English manhood, whose wooing would have been welcomed in many quarters, socially and substantially higher, and he would have been more or less than what he was, a thorough man, had he not felt his disappointment. But his was not a nature to despair or to rail at the inevitable.

"There is some obstacle," he said to himself as he strode along the country lane. "I have promised not to ask her; perhaps all in good time that obstacle may cease to be; whether or not, she will always let me be her trusted friend, and that in itself is a happiness to be prized."

He was aroused from his reverie by the sound of wheels and his own name called in a woman's voice. He looked up and returned the greeting of Doris, who was driving alone in her pony chaise. In compliance with her request, he stepped in and took a seat beside her.

"Oh,, Gerry dear," said Doris, "it's you I've been wanting to see for days."

"And for days I've been on the point of coming to see you, Doris, only you've had so much trouble I thought you'd like best to be left alone."

"I wish my father were of your way of thinking; dad's very good, but he's one of those who believe the best antidote to a bereavement or other crushing sorrow is a dance or a play."

"I know," said Gerald briskly, "the sort of chap who'd go to a farcical comedy in the evening to forget a funeral in the afternoon. But, Doris, have you any news?"

She was silent for a moment, and he went on: "I'm afraid something very, very serious has befallen Jack, or he'd never be so foolish as to lend colour to the accusations against him by hesitating for one moment to come forward and face them."

"Do you think it is unwise, Gerry, for him to lie low, assuming that he is doing so voluntarily?"

"Unwise! My dear Doris, it is insane. Why, do you know that this latest depredation early this morning, about midnight, at Fallowfield Hall, is laid to his charge?"

"Which proves," said Doris triumphantly, "that in voluntarily absenting himself he is neither unwise nor insane, for he is proving that these terrible acts are the works of others."

"Possibly, if he has reliable evidence that he was elsewhere at the time, but how's he going to prove that? Why, Doris, how strangely you are talking. I believe you know something of his whereabouts. Tell me, for I am his friend and yours, is he safe and sound?"

"He is safe so far, Gerry, that the bloodhounds are not yet on the trail, though they are nearer to it than they imagine, are crossing and re-crossing it without picking up the scent. Gerry, I know I can trust you, and oh! it will ease my heart to share my secret with somebody else," and pulling the pony into a walk along a lonely lane, she told Gerald Hastie where Jack lay in hiding. He listened in amazement.

"You brave girl!" he said, "you are breaking the law, but I believe you're helping the ends of jsutice; you've made one thing clear, that Jack had no part or parcel in last night's affairs, for at that very silent hour when you tell me you, taking advantage of its very silence, took drink and victuals to him, he must, had he been implicated in the events at Brettelby Court and Fallowfield Hall, have been miles away. But it won't do for him to stay there, Doris. Sooner or later he would be caught, and the fact of hiding would be assumed as evidence against him."

THE MOST ASTOUNDING WORK OF MODERN TIMES.

EVERY year thousands of new books are published. They are read and forgotten. But once in a hundred years a new book appears which THE WORLD IS WAITING FOR. It contains some new truth which alters the history of mankind. Such a book has been issued, and is pronounced by the Press to be the MOST REMARKABLE WORK OF THE CENTURY. You will read it. If not to day, then some other day, for sooner or later it will be read by all men and all women. The writer of the book is Professor Boyd Laynard, who is now recognised as the greatest living authority on personal hygiene. The name of the book is "SECRETS OF BEAUTY, HEALTH, AND LONG LIFE." Its sale is rapidly approaching copies.

The publishers have issued a popular edition, at a price within the reach of all, so that the book may find a place in every home. The work is arranged in 127 chapters, the whole of which (in the popular edition now offered to the public) is bound in one volume. The book, although published at Two Shillings, will, if ordered direct from the Publishers, be forwarded to readers of SHORT STORIES, carriage paid, at the low discount price of

ONE SHILLING AND SIXPENCE.

Among the numerous subjects dealt with, the following are but few. A complete syllabus, showing the contents of the whole of the 127 CHAPTERS, enumerating upwards of 500 SUBJECTS and divisions of subjects, can be had free on application to the Publishers:—

The way we make our own faces—Secrets of face transformation—Changeableness of beauty and its causes—Some strange facts concerning the variableness of beauty—"Odd-faced" beauty—The countenance the counterpart of the mind—How pleasing expressions become permanent—How a person's habitual look is acquired—How permanent expressions can be transformed—Metaphysical secrets of keeping young and preserving a youthful appearance—The author's investigations into the causes why some individuals look younger than others at a certain age—Discovery of a great metaphysical secret—Wonders of the skin—Effects of mental emotions upon the skin—Bad complexions and their causes—Diet that spoils and diet that improves the complexion—General care of the complexion—Construction, growth, and wonders of the hair—Why hair falls out—Premature greyness: its causes and prevention—General care of the hair—Superfluous hairs and how to treat them—Wrinkles: their prevention and treatment—Freckles, tan, and blackheads—Oily skin, dry skin, and loose skin—How the nose can be improved—Protruding ears and their treatment—Offensive breath—Anatomy of the teeth—Why teeth decay—General care of the teeth—Tallness, and how to attain it—Round shoulders and how to cure them—How to acquire a full chest—Perfect form and figure: their proper proportions—Thinness, and its treatment—Excessive stoutness—Care of the hands—Care of the feet—Physiognomy; or, the art of reading character from the face—Mental influences upon health—Power of the mind over the body—Influence of the mind in curing diseases—How the mind can cause dyspepsia—Effect of the direction of thought to the heart—How real diseases often supervene upon fancied ailments—How violent passions injure health—Laughter as a medicine—Ailments cured by laughter—Wonders of digestion—Relative value to our bodies of the principal articles of food—Fruits and vegetables as medicine: their various influences upon the physical system—Health-preserving diet and its consistency—Diet favourable to mental exertion and intellectual culture—Influence of various foods upon our passions and propensities—The influence exerted by the mind upon the appetite and digestion—Some perilous articles of food—Exercise and its relation to health—Baths and bathing: their influence upon health—The way we breathe, and how it affects our health—The marriage state, and its influence upon health—Statistics showing the comparative vitality of married and single persons—100 professions, trades, and occupations: their respective influences upon health and long life—Sleep, and its relation to health—Insomnia, and its treatment—The eyes, and how to preserve them—The ears and hearing: how to prevent deafness—The voice: its cultivation and preservation—Memory, and how to improve it—Sudden failure of memory—Rules for cultivating the memory—Influence of diet upon memory—Stammering, and how to cure it—Prevention of disease—Nervousness—Blushing: its physiology and treatment—Rules of life for attaining longevity—Compendium of the mental, moral, physical, and external influences that lessen the years of our earthly existence—How to live to a hundred—Premature old age and its causes—Short biographies of 30 modern centenarians, whose ages range from 115 to 185 years—General principles that can be laid down for the anticipation of longevity—The eight signs of long life.

Short Stories That . . . . . . Make You Laugh.

We devote every week space in Short Stories to pithy, humorous anecdotes similar to those which appear in these columns. To those readers who submit storyettes which are used, a six shilling novel will be awarded. The anecdotes may be either original or selected; in the latter case, the source MUST be stated. Attempts must reach the Storyette Editor, Short Stories Office, Henrietta Street, Strand, London, W.C., by Monday, November 25th. Postcards only, please. The prize of £1 1s. for the best storyette published this week has been won by Miss F. Ray, of 9 Reynoldson Street, Durham Road, Sunderland, whose contribution is denoted by an asterisk thus.*

Professional Instinct.

HUSBAND (the father of six daughters): "Come, Rosa, there is a gentleman in the drawing-room who wants to marry one of our daughters. He is a wine merchant." Wife: "A wine merchant. Heaven be praised. Then he will be sure to select one of the older brands!"

It Wasn't Dark Enough for Gas.

A SERVANT who had suffered from toothache very severely was sent by her mistress to a dentist to have the tooth out. On the following morning the mistress asked her servant if she had had the tooth out with gas. "No, mum," replied the servant, "I got there in plenty of time to have it out in daylight."

He Had To Return It.

SMALL BOY: "I picked up a shilling in the road today, father." Fond Father: "And you restored it to the owner, I suppose?" Small Boy: "Yes, sir." Father: "That's a good, honest boy." Small Boy (conscience-stricken): "Well, father, you see I couldn't very well help it. The man had me by the ear and wouldn't let me go!"

Closely Connected.

"Is the editor-in-chief in?" asked a stranger, as he sauntered into the office at eight o'clock in the morning. "No, sir," replied the doorkeeper, kindly, "he does not come so early. Is there anything I can do?" "Perhaps so. Are you connected with the poetical department of the paper?" "I am, sir." "Oh, what do you do?" "I empty the waste-paper baskets, sir."

The "Board of Health." *

A COUNTRYMAN walking along the streets of London found his progress stopped by a barricade of wood. "What's this for?" said he to a person standing by. "Oh, that's to stop the fever from spreading," replied the other, by way of being jocose. "Ah," said the countryman," I've often heard of the Board of Health, but I never saw it afore."

That Was All.

A LITTLE five-year old boy recently came home from school, which he had only been attending a few days, and his mother asked him what he had been doing. "Writin' M's and shakin' awful," was the child's pathetic reply, which meant that a long course of M's in a copy-book he had gone through had tried his nerves. "Well, how do you make an M?" his mother asked. "Oh, you go up a hill and down a hill, and up a hill and down a hill, and stay there."

No Danger!

IT was during the small-pox scare, and a number of people were waiting in a health office to be vaccinated. "What is your profession?" asked the doctor, speaking to a well-dressed man. "I am a detective," was the reply. "A detective, eh!" exclaimed the doctor, "then you'll not need to be vaccinated, because there is no fear of you catching anything."

He Had Tried It.

MRS. WALLACE: "Did you read about that poor man who stole a loaf of bread, and made the defence that he was starving?" Mr. Wallace: "Was it home-made bread?" "What has that to do with it?" "Because, if it was, he was lying. A starving man would not have the strength to run away with a loaf of home-made bread."

Appreciated.

"AH!" said the editor, as the young poet came in, "that last thing was good. We were much pleased with it." "Well, in that case," said the poet, "I will withdraw what I said in my letter about not liking the way you treated me, and declaring that I should send you no more of my work." "Oh, that's all right," replied the editor, with heartless cruelty. "That letter is what I referred to."

Unkind.

"I WENT in to bathe," said the story-teller, "but before I was long in the water I saw a huge double-jawed shark making rapidly towards me. What was to be done? When he was within about a yard of me I faced round, dived under the shark, and taking a knife from my pocket, killed him with one stroke." "But did you bathe with your clothes on?" asked an astonished listener. "Well," answered the story-teller reproachfully; "well, I do think you needn't be so particular!"

Worked Splendidly.

BROWN: "What puts you in such a good-humour this morning?" Robinson: "I've just got a patent for my new infallible ink eraser. I wouldn't take £10,000 for it." "Didn't you get a patent last year for inventing an indelible ink?" "I did, and I sold it for £6,000, and now I've invented an eraser that will even remove writing done with my own indelible ink." "What are you going at next?" "I'm going to invent another indelible ink that can't be erased with my new eraser. I tell you, there is money in this patent business if you only go about it the right way."

Mistaken Identity.

THERE is a pretty story told of the late Lord Granville at a naval review. Though advanced in years, as in honours, he was accustomed on such occasions to don a simple costume of navy blue and a peaked cap, in which it is not everyone who looks like one of his Majesty's Ministers. In this dress he took his station at the foot of the ladder by which the members got on board their vessel, as he wanted to see some of his friends. Mr. C——was one of them, and as he descended with his daughter his lordship held out his hand. Mr. C—— did not see it, being engaged in conversation with someone behind him, but the young lady did. "Papa," said she, turning to her father, "here is the man for the tickets."

THE EDITOR'S PAGE.

A Half-guinea Fountain Pen will each week be awarded to the reader who is the sender of the most interesting query answered on this page.

"J. C. K." writes that he has been sending attempts for the Storyette Competition for some time, and has not yet been successful in obtaining a prize. He lives at Liverpool, which he says I seem to have forgotten in making awards, as during the last two years the first prize has only twice gone to Liverpool.

It is not my fault, "J. C. K.," that Liverpudlians are not so successful as you think they should be. I have no grudge against them. Each anecdote is carefully read and the prize is awarded to the sender of the best. Don't give up trying because you have not yet won a prize. Your perseverance is sure to be rewarded some day—perhaps when you least expect it.

ONE of my correspondents sends me the following interesting anecdote: "Fifty years ago a man was driving a drove of ducks before him down Old Street, St. Luke's, E.C., allowing persons who bought to choose the ones they would have. I stood at my door as they passed and selected two of them. There are now between six and seven thousand vehicles, besides tramcars and 'buses, passing and repassing through the same street daily."

Truly the times have changed!

Two more claims have been made in connection with the Photo Competition this week, and £5 notes have been sent to:

MRS. CRASK (No. 26),
27 Maidstone Road,
Lowestoft.

MR. GEO. R. SIMS (No. 28),
12 Clarence Terrace,
Regent's Park,
London, N.W.

IT will be observed that one of the winners this week is Mr. G. R. Sims, the well-known playwright and journalist. He had no idea that his photograph was in Short Stories until he saw it there. That may be exactly the case with you. So keep your eye open every week when Tuesday comes round.

ADVICE TO READERS ON VARIOUS MATTERS.

(Replies to Correspondents.)

"BENEDICK" wants to know why the "best man" at a wedding is so called. "I should have thought," says "Benedick," "that the man about to be married might at least be called the best man, even if in actual fact he were the worst present."

The "best man" is a survival of the days when a bachelor must capture the girl of his heart and carry her off to the altar by main force, if he wished to marry her—a custom which still obtains in some savage countries. Obviously, then, it would be to his advantage to have a few friends handy to keep the ground in case of opposition; obviously, also, he would choose men of brawn and substance—in fact, the "best men" obtainable. Now that the preliminaries are conducted with more decorum, one "best man" is sufficient. His duties consist in finding the ring at the critical moment, and assuring the groom from time to time that his tie has not worked up behind.

"JACK" has been arguing with a friend as to the number of diseases to which the human frame is liable. His friend says 150, and he says more like 1,500.

You are nearest, although a long way off. There are altogether about 2,400. When a man gets rheumatism, though, he begins to think that the whole lot have struck him in a heap. I know.

"HOUSEWIFE" writes: "What a tremendous amount of tea must be wasted every day in this country through insufficient or careless brewing! Can you give me any idea of the quantity?"

I believe it is estimated that at least ten per cent. of the total quantity used is absolutely wasted by careless brewing, chiefly exemplified by the addition of water which is not boiling, and which, consequently, fails to extract the invigorating properties of the tea-leaf as it should. A great deal of waste, too, is caused by persons putting more tea into the pot than is necessary. It will very often be found that when a party of three or four has to be supplied with tea, enough leaf is used to, with proper brewing, satisfy the needs of twice as many people. Ten per cent., indeed, is a very low estimate of the amount of waste; but even granting that it is not exceeded, it is a wonderful example of the tremendous aggregate result of numerous small acts of carelessness, for, assuming it to be exactly correct, the weight of tea which is thus literally thrown away daily in this country amounts to more than 115 tons, which, at a low average price of 1s. 6d. per pound, would represent a value of nearly £20,000.

"GIRLIE" asks if it is a fact that pressing the upper lip is a preventive of sneezing?

Yes, that is so; and if you are an observer of human nature, you will have noticed that sneezing is anything but prevalent amongst engaged couples.

"F. H." asks: "Has there ever been a King of the Isle of Wight?"

In the fifteenth century a Duke of Warwick was created King of the Isle of Wight by Henry VI. The latter placed a crown upon the Duke's head with his own hands, but as the honour did not carry with it the lordship of the island, which was held by the Duke of Gloucester, and was not continued to the descendants, it must be regarded as an empty one.

Adventures of an Actress.

THE ADVENTURES OF AN ACTRESS.

XVII.—AN OLD MAN'S DARLING.

By DONOVAN MART.

CHAPTER I.

In a conspicuous position upon a hoarding in a Brighton street, was a poster, the portrait of a beautiful girl, with auburn hair and blue eyes, merely a face, yet a wonderful testimonial of the colour printer's art. Beneath the portrait were the words: "Hazel Harlow, the famous actress. For six nights only at the Theatre Royal."

Before the advertisement two men had come simultaneously to a standstill. Both stood regarding the picture in silence. Each was as different from the other in appearance as it would be possible to conceive.

The one was very old, with a benign, almost child-like expression, and long white beard falling over his breast. The other was a man of uncertain age, somewhat shabbily dressed, his eyes hidden behind blue spectacles, his face clean-shaven, his hair long and tawny in hue, a curious combination of shabby gentility and ostentatious carelessness of attire.

The old man's eyes seemed riveted to the poster. Then his lips moved almost mechanically. The other man edged nearer to him, to hear fall from his lips the mysterious words:

"At last! At last! It must be! It must be!"

In a moment the eavesdropper's appearance of careless nonchalance vanished. He looked furtively around him. It was midday and there were very few people about, due to the fact that the season of the year was early winter, and that a raw wind blew gustily and penetratingly from the north-east.

"A beautiful face that!" said the younger man carelessly. "And to think that the owner of it is an actress!"

The old man gave a sudden start, as though surprised in the midst of the most poignant reflections. Then he turned round slowly and fixed his glance upon the intruder.

"A beautiful face, indeed!" he echoed dreamily; "there are none who should know it more thoroughly than I."

"Do you know Miss Hazel Harlow then?" asked the other curiously. "How comes that about?"

There was a far-away look in the old man's face. He had almost the appearance of a person in a trance. There was something uncanny in the way in which his pale-blue eyes fixed themselves upon the face of his interlocutor.

For a moment or so he said nothing. Then, in a low voice, speaking as though the words were dragged from him against his will, he said:

"Her name is not Hazel Harlow. She bears quite another name than that. And to think that after all these years I should see her face gazing at me from the walls of a hoarding."

His words produced an extraordinary effect on his solitary audience, who started violently, as though he had been the recipient of a galvanic shock, and then, recovering himself with an effort, muttered:

"Who is she, then? And who are you?"

Again came a momentary hesitation on the part of the aged stranger. Again it seemed as though he were struggling to keep pent-up within himself the thoughts that surged through his mind. Then, with the same far-away look in his eyes, he murmured:

"She is my daughter, and I must claim her!"

"Your daughter! Imposs—" Then the unkempt stranger checked himself. A hundred sinister thoughts were surging through his brain. "Look here," he went on almost roughly, "let us come to some quiet place where we can have a quiet talk about this extraordinary affair. Perhaps I can be of assistance to you. If she is your daughter, she ought to be restored to you. I would help you willingly. What do you say?"

"Yes! yes! She ought to be restored to me. I have been without her so long! And how I have hungered for her!" The old man turned eagerly to his unknown ally. "Will you really help me?" he murmured. "Can I trust you?"

"You can! You can! There is a small tavern not far from here where we can be quiet and unmolested. When I have heard all I shall know more what to do."

Like a man in a dream the old fellow allowed himself to be led away by the importunate stranger, who, conducting him through three or four streets, finally came to a pause before a small public-house not far from the King's Road, to boldly walk inside and ask for refreshments and a private room.

His demands were speedily complied with.

"And now that we are alone," said he, "eat and drink, and tell me your story."

"But can I trust you? I am an old man, and almost friendless. A poor old man, too. Say that you will respect my confidences as sacred."

"You can trust me implicitly. And if I can I will help you. It was Providence that ordained we should meet. Come, to your tale."

The man spoke incisively, with almost the ring of command in his voice. The grey-beard passed his hand almost wearily through his white hair, and began, in a low, constrained voice, the recital of his tale:

"Many, many years ago, when I was quite a young man I fell in love with a woman. We were married and lived happily for some years. Then my wife died, leaving me alone in the world with one child—a little girl—on whom I lavished all the wealth of my affections. The years passed on and she left childhood's paths for those of budding womanhood. Then came a terrible event into my life. She disappeared, leaving a note to tell me that she had fallen in love with a man, and gone to marry him. She was only a slip of a girl, too young, I had thought, to think of such things. From that day to this I have never set eyes on her, and now it is her portrait I see smiling down at me from the hoardings of Brighton. There is my story. Now you can understand what I meant when I told you her name was not Hazel Harlow."

Silence followed the simple story. Its hearer seemed too much amazed for speech. He could only sit and stare at the old man like a being bereft of his senses.

"Then what is her name?" he muttered mechanically. "Who is she?"

"Her real name is Miriam Lee," came the quiet answer, as though the speaker saw no cause for surprise or, indeed, noticed that his words had had any such effect. "That is my name, Lee—Gideon Lee."

"Miriam Lee!" the stranger muttered dazedly; "not Hazel Harlow, but Miriam Lee!"

"Yes. And you will help me get her back—my little Miriam. You have promised me you will."

Gideon Lee's words had an extraordinary effect upon his companion.

"Help you!" he cried, springing to his feet; "of course I will. Nay, more, I'll see that your long-lost daughter is restored to you. Come, tell me where you live, and all about yourself. But we must be cautious. She'll not come to you unless you set about your work becomingly. Otherwise, why did she leave you, and why has she never communicated with you all these years?"

The old man looked at the speaker hungrily. He was evidently only too ready to receive advice.

"Yes," he echoed dreamily. "We must be cautious. My little Miriam! After all these years!"

CHAPTER II.

The afternoon was already far advanced when Gideon Lee and his unknown, unexpectedly-found ally parted, to meet again, as had been arranged, on the next day.

As the stranger found himself alone again he made the best of his way to an obscure street in Hove, to admit himself into a dingy house, from the front window of which dangled a fly-blown placard, bearing the one word "Apartments."

The stranger entered a room on the first-floor, and, carefully locking the door, proceeded to at once effect a metamorphosis as startling as it was irregular.

His blue "goggles" were removed, the tawny wig that disguised his close-cropped hair was removed, and he stood in his true guise, that of a middle-aged, dark-eyed, dark-haired man, with his cruel mouth made more cruel by the coal-black eyes above it. A small fire was burning in the grate of the room, which had no features to render it in any way different from the usual type of apartments such as are to be met with in cheap sea-side lodging-houses.

The man flung himself into a chair before the fire, and poking the embers up into a blaze, drew forth a cigarette, and began to smoke with almost vicious energy.

"So this is where your 'love' has led you, Horace Caldecott!" he muttered; "this is the result of all your efforts. Instead of a mansion in town and the enjoyment of wealth that is at least your own, you are forced to hide in a Brighton lodging-house like a hunted fox in a hole. Curse everything! And curse especially that officious fool who calls himself Eric Monteith. But for him Hazel Harlow might have been yours by now, and you might have been footing it with the best of them, instead of hiding here with detectives watching round your London house and a price upon your head. And what have you gained by it all? Nothing! Absolutely nothing! And yet"—his voice changed—"I love Hazel Harlow; aye, love her with an all-consuming passion. To think that after all I've gone through she is still as far away from me as ever. Wait a bit, though! What about this old madman, Gideon Lee? Can it be that Fate means to make up for everything by this new turn of the wheel?" He rose to his feet, and began pacing feverishly up and down the narrow chamber.

"It's about the last card," he went on, "and yet I'm ready to risk all in playing it. If only Gideon Lee plays his part properly he'll be the unconscious means to deliver Hazel into my hands. What else is there left for me? How little did I dream, years ago, when I first saw Hazel Harlow, that my life would be ruined by the very passion that grew up within me at the sight of her fresh, fair young beauty. And yet it's true. The only thing that I care for in all the world has—notwithstanding all I have attempted—been denied to me. They say that the more difficult a thing is to attain the more essential it becomes to the would-be attainer. I have lost my soul, as it is, for Hazel Harlow. Shall I, then, lose it for nothing? No, a thousand times no. Fortune has put Gideon Lee in my path; if I can use him to attain my ends, so be it. Yet I must be cautious. No breath of my being in Brighton must assail Hazel's ears. And when I strike it must be with certainty that the blow will fall. Gideon Lee! Is he maniac, or does he really believe the story he told me? Time will show that. He's fully primed now, and if only he obeys my orders Hazel shall be, must be, once more within my power. And this time—" He broke off abruptly and passed his hands across his feverish eyes.

Thus ran the unhappy wretch's stormy thoughts. Notwithstanding all that he had gone through, all the misery his base passions had encompassed, the pitiable ebb to which his own fortunes had been reduced, the fever of his desires still burnt brightly within him. It was Hazel, and Hazel alone, towards whom his every instinct turned.

With the cunning of a snake he had followed the track of the Good Samaritan Company, taking good care to let no trace of his presence be known to Hazel or her friends and counsellors. Ever since his last desperate venture at Nottingham he had known that no effort would be spared—even if he had not realised so much before—to run him to earth. And were he to be taken he knew that a long term of imprisonment awaited him.

And now Fate had thrust forward Gideon Lee upon the stage of his base drama. To the old man he now looked to be the means of delivering the unsuspecting Hazel into his hands. He had found a cat's-paw. He would take good care to make use of it.

Yet he had reckoned without Gideon Lee.

CHAPTER III.

Brighton sea-front wears a very different aspect in November to its summer garb. In August crowds of excursionists, trippers, German bands, and holiday-makers in general, all combine to endow it with an atmosphere of life and jollity.

But in November only a fashionable few walk up and down the marine parade, few that is compared with the summer throng, and yet infinitely more "swagger" and select.

Hazel Harlow and Jenny Lovelace were among those walking upon the front one morning in the middle of the week devoted by the Good Samaritan Company to "London-by-the-Sea."

The two actresses were talking gaily to one another, both infected by the keen vigour of the sea air.

"I wish we were here for a fortnight," said Hazel.

"So do I," echoed her companion fervently. "That's the nuisance of being 'on the road.' Just as a nice place is reached it's a case of 'move on' before one has time to really settle down."

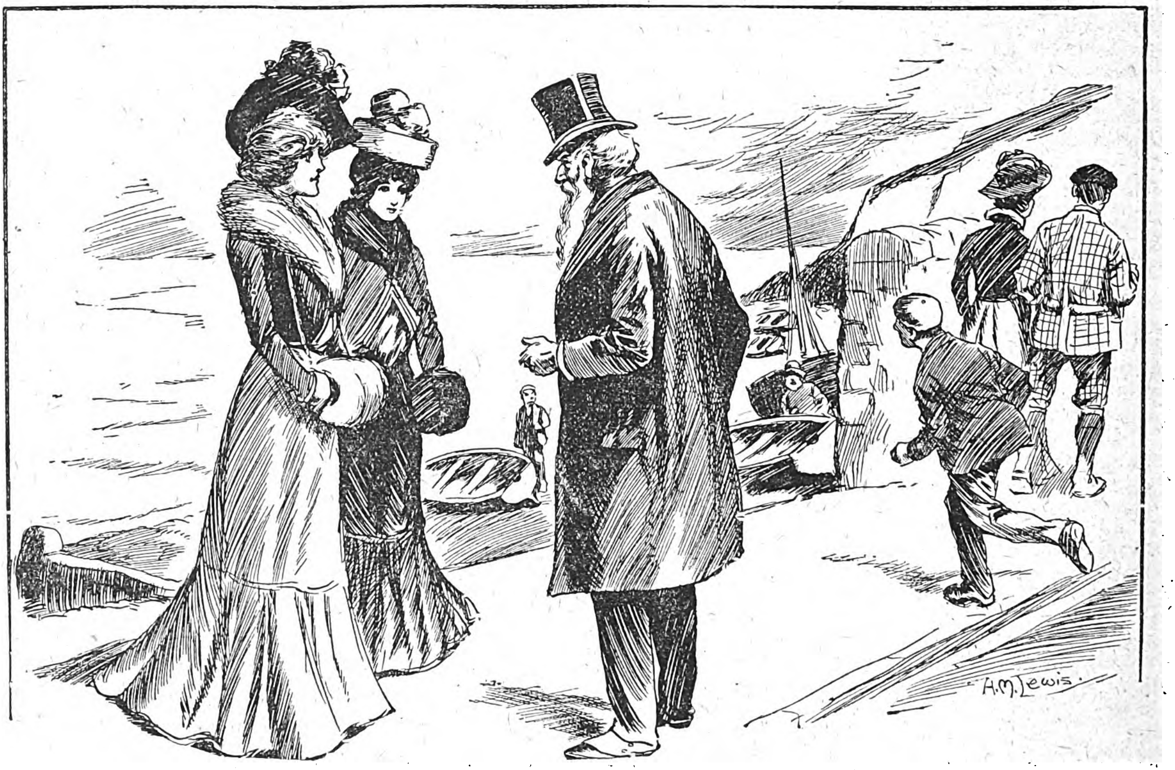
The two girls had, just as Jenny finished her speech, been preparing to retrace their steps, by reason of the fact that they had come to the end of the long promenade by the Hove sea wall, when suddenly a voice in Hazel's ear caused her to halt.

She turned round to find an old man at her elbow, a man with long white beard and a face like a winter apple, with two remarkably clear, pale-blue eyes set beneath bushy white eyebrows.

"Pardon me for intruding myself upon you," he said, in a mild, rather tremulous voice, "but I am, I must be, addressing myself to the lady known as Miss Hazel Harlow?"

Surprised though she was, there was still such an undeniable tone of gentle friendliness in the old man's voice, that Hazel could only answer gently:

"I am Hazel Harlow. How can I serve you?"



"No harm shall come to you, if you will only put yourself into my hands."

"By granting me a very great favour," came the soft reply; "and in granting that same favour you will be at the same time, I believe, benefiting yourself. It is not much that I have to ask you—only that you will let me drive you to my house in Rottingdean in my carriage." And he pointed to where a handsome carriage and pair was drawn up against the curb on the opposite side of the road.

"But you are a perfect stranger to me," she stammered. "I don't understand."

"Not so much a stranger as perhaps you imagine," came the quiet answer; "believe me I wish you no harm; on the contrary, I wish you only the best and the brightest that life can offer. You can trust me without reserve, my dear." He spoke almost with fatherly tenderness.

Hazel's brain was in a whirl. She turned to Jenny, as if for guidance in this unexpected episode, and Jenny, who had followed the conversation with the greatest interest, was almost as much astonished as was Hazel herself. And yet it seemed impossible to connect this beautiful old man with anything sinister or base.

The old stranger looked wistfully into Hazel's face.

"I am an old man," he resumed quietly; "an old man who has seen much trouble in a long and not altogether uneventful life. You are young and beautiful, and when your eyes are opened you will understand why I have asked you to accompany me to my home. Believe me, I repeat again, no harm shall come to you if you will only put yourself into my hands. If you do it will only be for your own good."

Feminine curiosity now got the better of Hazel's latent suspicions. There was something irresistibly pathetic in the way the aged stranger spoke. It was impossible to connect him with villainy.

"Very well," Hazel said. "I will come with you. I will trust you, for I feel sure that you do not mean me any harm."

"God bless you for that!" came the answer. Then Hazel turned to Jenny.

"Have no fear, Jenny," she said. "I am sure this old gentleman means me no harm."

Jenny was too much astonished to offer any opposition to her friend's intention, and yet it was not without a slight feeling of foreboding that she watched her accompany the old man to the elegant equipage, enter, and drive away along the sea front.

"I wonder if I have done right in letting her go?" she murmured to herself; "but surely that old gentleman is incapable of wickedness. I wonder what he meant by saying it was only for Hazel's good? Who knows? Perhaps it is. Perhaps he has become smitten with Hazel, and wants to leave her all his fortune. He seems a nice old man. Ah, well! let's hope for the best."

In the meantime the carriage was bowling swiftly along towards Rottingdean. But little conversation passed between Hazel and her companion on the drive. The old stranger seemed curiously preoccupied, and little inclined for conversation, though every now and then his old hand would take hold of Hazel's and pat it gently, almost lovingly, accompanying the gesture with a glance of tender solicitude at the beautiful face beside him. Thus the farther they drove the more mystified Hazel became as to what on earth could be the meaning of this extraordinary excursion.

Eventually the carriage reached Rottingdean, and entered the lodge gates that opened on to a long carriage drive leading to a big white house set amidst the trees. The old gentleman helped Hazel to alight, and the door of the mansion was thrown open. In a moment a fierce baying resounded through the house, and six great wolf-hounds dashed forward and began fawning round their old master and Hazel, who shrank back in some alarm at so unlooked-for a welcome. But the great dogs seemed gentle enough, and at a word from their master slunk away whence they had come.

Gideon Lee, for he of course it was, conducted Hazel into a beautifully furnished room with a great open fireplace, from which a huge log fire threw a cheerful warmth into the apartment.

Carefully closing the door, Lee motioned Hazel to a seat. Then he turned to her, and she saw that his eyes were full of tears.

"At last, Miriam," he murmured brokenly; "at last you have come back to me, after all these years!"

Hazel stared at the speaker in the blankest astonishment. What on earth could he mean?

"Miriam?" she echoed faintly. "Why do you call me Miriam?"

"Oh, there is no need for further deception," came the answer; "we are here alone now. You are back in your old father's home; the old father who has waited and yearned for you so long; who has hoarded up his money and all these beautiful things for you. I knew it was you when I saw the poster in Brighton. Ah, Miriam, you should never have run away from me; but now you have come back to me, you won't leave me any more."

Hazel rubbed her eyes. Was she dreaming? The old man might as well have been talking Greek. What was all this about Miriam, the daughter who had run away from home?

"But my name is not Miriam," she said gently, "my name is Hazel—Hazel Hazlow—and I am the daughter of a farmer who lives in the Midlands. You must be labouring under some delusion if you think I am someone else."

A puzzled expression came into the old man's face. He looked fixedly at the beautiful girl before him.

"No, no," he said excitedly; "I know I am not making a mistake. You are Miriam, my long-lost daughter Miriam!" He went across to a bureau that stood at the far side of the room, and, after fumbling about in a pigeon-hole, produced a daguerreotype, a relic of the days when photography was in its infancy.

"See, here is your mother's portrait," he said. "You are just like what she was at your age."

Mechanically Hazel took the leathern case inclosing the portrait in her hand. It was the face of a very beautiful woman, but so far as she could see, there was very little likeness between herself and the original of the daguerreotype.

Gideon Lee looked at her fixedly as she regarded the portrait. She handed it back to him, and said:

"This is not the portrait of my mother. There must be some mistake!"

"Why do you say that? Why do you say that?" murmured the old man; "when you know that you are Miriam Lee, my daughter. Why do you persist in denying it when all that I have is yours. Now that I have brought you back to share my home with me; to be the light of my declining years, and never to leave me again—never, never, never!"

Hazel now began to feel vaguely alarmed. It was plain that the old man was possessed of the idea that she was deceiving him; that she was really the Miriam Lee, his daughter, whom, as he said, he had lost, so long ago. How could she convince him of the truth and escape from a position that she began to realise might lead to an awkward development? Vainly she cast her eyes about as though to seek some elucidation of the mystery. The old man noted her action.

"No, no!" he said, with a strange ring of cunning in his voice; "you can't escape, Miriam. I haven't brought you back home to send you away again. You stay with me now; you have been away long enough. Think how happy we will be together here, you and I, Miriam, my daughter, my little queen." And he advanced to her side and taking her hand with an almost reverential air, he raised it to his lips.

Hazel was a prey to the most mingled feelings. She could not help feeling somewhat drawn towards this curious old man, who, she became momentarily more and more convinced, was suffering under a delusive vision. She could not feel alarmed, because it was evident that did she but humour him, he would only treat her with the affection and respect that he evidently felt due to his returned child. Yet she was rather perturbed in her mind as to how she was to give him the slip.

"But think," she said, coaxingly, "I cannot stay with you now for always. I have no things here, and besides I must play at the theatre to-night. I have other obligations to think of."

"The first obligations of a child are towards its parents," answered Gideon Lee, brushing her pleadings aside; "and I have been waiting for you so long that I cannot let you go lightly now. No, Miriam, you must stay with me."

These words convinced Hazel of the truth of what she had already suspected, namely, that the old man's mind was unhinged. She regretted now the kindly impulse that had led her to accept his invitation. The case was beginning to assume a rather serious complexion. This old man, gentle and harmless as he seemed to be, might perhaps turn out to be possessed of qualities quite the reverse of pleasant if she persisted in attempting to thwart his purpose. Thank goodness, it was early in the day yet; perhaps later on she might find some means of making good her escape.

CHAPTER IV.

It is perhaps needless to state that Horace Caldecott had been a witness of the meeting between Gideon Lee and Hazel upon the sea-front. Disguised as a seedy tramp he had lurked about watching with the intentness of a hawk. But his amazement was profound when he saw Gideon Lee escort Hazel to the elegant carriage and pair and help her inside. He watched the carriage drive away in the blankest astonishment.

"What on earth is the meaning of that?" he muttered to himself. "Who is this old fox, Gideon Lee? I thought he was some seedy old chap living in a little one-storied cottage at Rottingdean. There's more in this than meets the eye. Let me recall the conversation we had together the day before yesterday. He seemed as innocent and as helpless then as a baby. 'How am I to get my daughter to come home with me?' were his words. And what did I say? I said, 'It will be useless for you to go up to her and say, Miriam Lee, you must come back to your old father,' or anything like that. 'You'll have to use strategy in this game, Mr. Lee. If the girl had wanted to come back to you she would have come back of her own accord long ago'—for of course I wasn't going to tell him that I knew his Miriam was really Hazel Harlow. 'No,' I said, 'you must go up to her and ask her to come and see you at your cottage, and pitch some high-flown yarn that would get her to come back to you.' And he seemed to swallow it all up; thanked me most profusely; hoped I would come to Rottingdean and be introduced to his dear daughter. Told me the time when he was going to try and find her. And now he turns up in a carriage and pair and drives off Hazel like a duchess. There is something in this that I don't quite understand."

The crafty villain felt somewhat uneasy as he realised that he had been duped by Gideon Lee. Yet on maturer reflection, he thought it possible that Gideon Lee, whom he had already come to look upon as a harmless old lunatic, had other designs upon Hazel than those he had given out.

"Perhaps he wants to kidnap her," thought Caldecott, "and get a reward. If that is his game, well, it will suit me as well as any other. Anyhow, the best thing I can do is to get out to Rottingdean itself and look about me. Anyhow, this is pretty plain; there's only a doddering old idiot between me and Hazel Harlow, and Rottingdean is not a big place. If it is only Gideon Lee I've got to tackle, well—" an evil glance came into his cruel eyes.

But in his estimate of Gideon Lee, Horace Caldecott was woefully outside the mark. The awakening awaiting him was to be a rude one indeed. He determined to traverse the few miles that lay between Brighton and Rottingdean on foot. It would look suspicious if he, in his character of a seedy tramp, were to be seen driving in a hired vehicle. Besides, it was not yet noon, and he felt confident that, for a few hours at least, Hazel Harlow would be unable to escape from the old man's clutches. As he stepped out along the road he had plenty of food for reflection. The evidence that he was able to deduce from the unimpeachable testimony of his own eyesight, namely, the presence of the two-horse vehicle, made it quite obvious that Gideon Lee was not the poor old pauper he had first imagined him. No. It seemed much more likely that he was a man of means, and therefore inhabited one of the big houses in the neighbourhood of the little Sussex village. He felt that his first work in Rottingdean would be to discover, by means of careful inquiries, who Gideon Lee really was and where he lived. He would then be able to formulate some scheme for carrying out his own fell ends.

"If Hazel learns that the old fool thinks himself her father and intends, as I know he does, to keep her with him at all hazards, it would of course be imperative for her to find some means of escape." He mused. "Here comes my chance. So long as the hue and cry is not raised in Brighton by the members of the Company, and that officious fool, Monteith, I am all right. But still, if she does not turn up at Brighton again this afternoon they will probably send out to look for her. No, if anything is to be done it must be accomplished as soon as possible. Thank goodness, I am very adequately disguised, and if I can step in and rescue her, well, it will be a case of out of the frying-pan into the fire, before she realises who her rescuer is."

He reached Rottingdean in the midst of a driving drizzle of rain, having fully matured his plans on his walk. He stopped at a cottage outside the village, and knocking boldly at the door, was confronted by a man in his shirt-sleeves, evidently a farm labourer.

"Good afternoon," he said blandly; "can you tell me if there is a Mr. Gideon Lee living in Rottingdean?"

The man stared at him, evidently taken aback at being accosted with such a gentlemanly voice by a man whose clothes belied his speech, for Caldecott was still in the shabby clothes he had assumed to throw any would-be tracker off the scent.

"Why, yes," answered the man, "if it is old daft Lee you mean. He lives up at the White House. You can see the lodge gates up the road there."

"And what sort of a man is he?" asked Caldecott casually.

The other shrugged his shoulders.

"A rum one if ever there was one," he replied. "As rich as blazes, and quite off his chump from all accounts."

Caldecott hesitated. Then he put his hand in his pocket and produced a sovereign.

"Do you feel like earning that?" he said.

The man's eyes glistened.

"It depends," he replied cautiously. Then, unable to contain himself, he blurted out. "You're a rum one to go about throwing sovereigns away. What may your game be, governor?"

The other laughed.

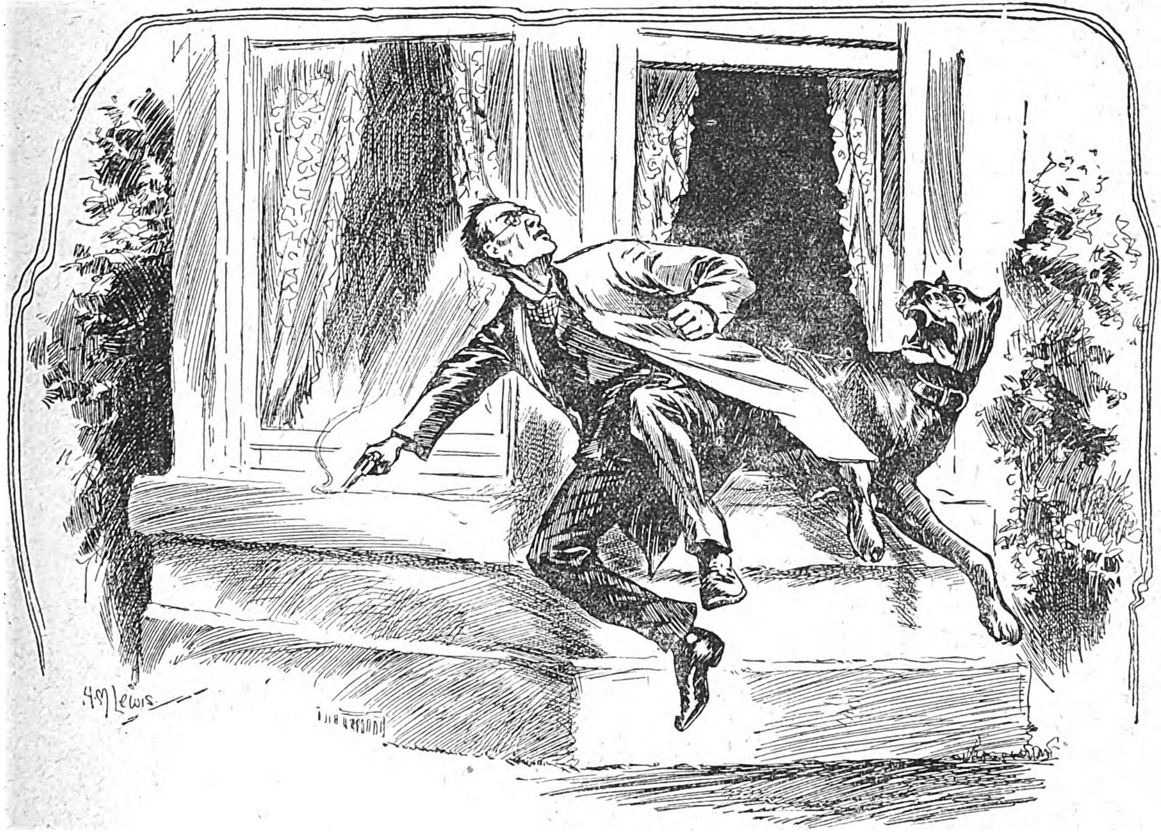
"Ask no questions and you'll hear no lies," he said curtly. "It's a free country, and I suppose I can go about as I like."

"Right you are, governor, no offence," retorted the fellow; "how do you want me to earn that sovereign?"

"Before long," answered Caldecott, "someone is sure to come along and ask the same question that I have asked you just now about old Lee. Yours is the first house in the village, and naturally they will come to you first. The man will probably be a tall, clean-shaven, well-dressed young fellow, and it's very important for old Lee's sake and my own that he should have dust thrown in his eyes. If you will stay here and keep your eyes open, and tell him that no such man as Gideon Lee lives in Rottingdean, well, I'll make that sovereign two, and give you this one as earnest money. I think you'll admit that that is an easy way of earning a bit of money."

The man hesitated. It was a strange request, and although cupidity urged him to close with the offer at once, caution counselled him to adopt wariness. Caldecott noticed his hesitation.

"You needn't be afraid," he said; "you are not implicating yourself in any way. A smart man like you need have no fear that you can't get out of a little hole like that."



He tore open the window and sprang out like a man possessed, the other dog still at his heels.

The man's hesitation fled to the winds before the plausible rascal's words.

"Right," he said; "hand us over the sovereign and I'm your man."

Caldecott smiled, and tendered him the coin. "And remember there is another waiting for you," he said, "if you do as I tell you." And with these words he disappeared in the direction of the White House.

The entrance gates through which Hazel had driven only an hour or so previously were, to Caldecott's disgust, locked. A high hedge shut off the grounds of the house from the road. It seemed at first glance as though there was no possible means of obtaining ingress to the place. But having come so far on his enterprise, Caldecott determined not to let anything stand in the way of the furtherance of his plans. He hurried on along the side of the hedge until at last he came to a place where the bare screen, reft of its summer foliage, was much thinner than it had been near the gate. Even then it was only after some difficulty, and not before his shabby clothes had suffered still more, and he, himself, had received sundry scratches on hands and face, that he was able to crawl through the hedge and into the garden grounds.

With extreme caution he crept out into the open, and across a huge sweep of lawn fringed with cedars and other trees. At first he had determined to try and enter the house by stealth, but on maturer reflection he decided to go boldly up to the front door and demand to see Mr. Gideon Lee. It had of course come to him as an immense surprise to find the old gentleman living in such a splendid mansion, though his astonishment had been tempered somewhat by the pair-horse carriage that had conveyed Hazel out of Brighton.

He walked up the drive where it swept round the head of the lawn and advanced boldly to the door to peal vigorously at the bell. In a few moments the door was opened and, to Caldecott's infinite amazement, by Gideon Lee himself. So surprised was he at this unexpected meeting, that for a few moments he could only stand mutely upon the doorstep and gaze into the beautiful old face before him.

"Well," said the old man blandly, "and what may you want here?" He seemed to have entirely forgotten the meeting that had taken place between himself and Caldecott in the obscure Brighton tavern; to have forgotten, indeed, the very existence of the man who was now confronting him. Caldecott was quick to see this. Fully cognisant now of the fact that the old man was not entirely responsible for his actions, he determined upon cutting his cloth to suit his customer.

"I must have a word with you, Mr. Lee," he said; "and that is why I have come to you so unceremoniously. What I want to say to you concerns your daughter Miriam most acutely."

"My daughter Miriam!" the words seemed to let loose the floodgates of the old man's warped intelligence. "What can you have to say about her? She has only just come back to me."

It was now plain beyond all doubt that Gideon Lee had not the faintest recollection of ever having met this man before.

"But can I see you alone?" continued Caldecott in a quiet voice. "My business will not wait."

"Yes, yes; come inside. We can talk alone in the study."

"And your daughter, where is she?"

"Oh, you cannot see her. But come, let me hear what you have to tell me!"

Caldecott said no more. He perceived that the old gentleman could not be forced to do anything against his will, and so in silence he followed Gideon Lee.

The old man ushered him inside the study and closed the door.

"Now then," he said, "I am at your service. What have you got to tell me about my daughter Miriam?"

"Why this," said Caldecott, in an impressive voice, "that unless you are very careful your daughter Miriam will not be here with you for very long. There are people on her track, people who wish to take her away from you, who wish her harm, and that is why I have come here to-day."

A dazed look crept into Gideon Lee's eyes. The other man's words seemed to have suddenly reduced him to the helplessness of a little child.

"What can I do to save her?" he wailed. "What can I do to save her?"

Quickly the thought flashed through Caldecott's mind, "now is my time, the old man is perfectly imbecile; he will do anything I tell him, if only I harp on the same string sufficiently. The house seems quiet enough; there are evidently but few servants about. I must act quickly, for time is precious, and even now Monteith and his crew may be off on their precious lead's track."

Then he turned to Lee.

"Do," he said hoarsely; "there is but one thing to do. Let me take charge of your daughter for you; at any moment those who wish to take her away from you may be here. Put her into my charge, and I will hold her for you until her pursuers have disappeared again. That is your only chance of saving her."

The effect of his words on Gideon Lee was, however, absolutely the reverse of what he had anticipated. A sudden light blazed up in the beautiful old eyes as Lee sprang forward and cried out in a voice of thunder.

"Take my darling from me, never, never, never! I have been without her all these years, and now that she has been given back to me, do you think I will deliver her up into the hands of a stranger? No, no! a thousand times no! If that is all you have to say to me, you can go whence you came, and leave me to fight my battle alone."

Caldecott shrank back in amazement before such an outburst.

"Go!" repeated Gideon Lee; "go, or——"

His last sentence was never finished. Goaded to sudden fury at this check to his schemes Caldecott flung himself at the venerable figure and hurled him to the ground. The poor old head struck a chair-back in his fall that effectually stunned him; motionless he lay upon the carpet at his assailant's feet.

"Have I killed him?" muttered Caldecott in some alarm, bending down over the prostrate figure. "No, he is only stunned." He turned round with the look of a wild animal in his face; "well, I must take the law into my own hands," he said hoarsely, "and find where Hazel is for myself."

He turned towards the door, but before he could reach it it was opened from without and Hazel entered the room. The scene that met her gaze brought a quick cry from her lips. Horror-stricken she stood and gazed at the hated face before her, and from him her eyes went to the prostrate body on the carpet. With a low cry Caldecott sprang forward:

"Ah, Hazel," he muttered; "so you have come to me of your own free will."

With a scream that echoed through the house the girl shrank back.

"Help! help!" she cried. And help was at hand from an unexpected quarter. The pattering sound of quick, lithe feet, accompanied by a quick snarling sound fell on Caldecott's ears, and the great gaunt wolfhounds bounded into the room and flung themselves straight at the villain's throat. With a scream of terror he struck out blindly at his unexpected assailants, and then leaping back in blind terror, rushed towards the window at the end of the room, the hounds leaping up and mouthing fiercely at him with blood-curdling snarls. He felt the deadly fangs of one of them pierce the sleeve of his coat and draw blood upon his flesh. With a howl he raised his pistol and fired it point-blank at the animal's head. Then in quicker time than it takes in telling, he tore open the window and sprang out like a man possessed, the other dog still at his heels, for his bullet had found a billet in the brain of one of his attackers.

CHAPTER V.

"Where am I? What has happened?" Those were the first words of Gideon Lee on returning to consciousness. He was lying upon his bed, and over him bent the beautiful face of Hazel Harlow, whose one soft white hand was upon his brow, and who was holding a cup of some cool liquid in the other. He gazed in a bewildered fashion into the fair face.

"Who are you?" he murmured. "Your face seems strange to me."

Hazel's heart gave a great throb. What could be the meaning of such a complete change in the old man's behaviour as regards to herself?

"I am Hazel Harlow," she said in a gentle voice; "you have met with an accident. I am here to nurse you."

"A nurse! an accident!" There was a look of absolute bewilderment in the speaker's eyes.

"Yes, yes; but don't try to speak now. Just lie quiet."

"You are very good to me, Miss Harlow. I will try and keep quiet now." Then he went on. "You have a sweet face; you remind me somehow of my lost daughter Miriam."

His words gave Hazel the clue to his behaviour. She saw it all now. Before his accident Gideon Lee had been a witless being possessed with a single idea, the recovery of the daughter who, it afterwards transpired, had died years before, but whom the old man had always looked upon as being alive, and had waited and waited for her return, though those about him knew that such a thing could never be.

Hazel had heard of such things happening. How that a sudden accident would bear fruit afterwards as the means whereby recovery of sanity was achieved, and that was what had undoubtedly happened in Gideon Lee's case. The blow that had deprived him of consciousness had, as it were, struck some cord in the poor diseased brain that had acted as an antidote to the previous disaster that had deprived him of his real understanding. A doctor was sent for and fully indorsed Hazel's suspicions. Gideon Lee was as sane as the sanest.

As for Caldecott, when he sprang madly out of the window with the wolf-hound at his heels, blind, unreasoning terror took the place of the sinister designs of a short time previous. He had still another cartridge in his revolver, and with this he dispatched the second hound, and then fled away to be heard of no more at present. But to show how correct his suspicions had been as to the course pursued by Eric Monteith, the latter did actually drive into Rottingdean with Jenny later on in the afternoon of that same day, when still no signs of Hazel were forthcoming, and did inquire at the cottage for Gideon Lee. True to his word, the labourer stoutly maintained that there was no such man as Lee living in Rottingdean. Eric looked surprised, as well he might, but Jenny was not to be put off with such an assertion.

"The man is lying," she said, in a low voice. "I feel sure of it somehow. He has some reasons for the lie. Let us make inquiries elsewhere."

The man overheard her words and flushed a dull red. He had not bargained for this, and he realised at once that if further inquiries were to be put on foot the whereabouts of Gideon Lee must necessarily be discovered so in a blundering, stupid way, he suddenly said:

"What name did you say?"

"I did not say any name," said Eric. "I merely asked you if there was a white-haired old gentleman, in well to do circumstances, living in Rottingdean, and you answered 'No.'"

"Well, I was wrong," came the sullen answer. "There is an old man living in Rottingdean, a rich old man too, named Gideon Lee. You can see the lodge gates of his house right away up at the end of the road there;" and then he muttered, as if thinking aloud, "anyhow, I got a quid."

Eric's quick ear heard the words.

"Got a quid," he repeated; "what do you mean by that? Who gave you a quid? Here, you had better speak up and say what you are driving at. It will be the worse for you my man, if you don't, for I'm not a sort of person to stand much nonsense."

"A chap came along here some time ago and gave me a quid not to tell you anything."

"And what then?" Eric repeated sharply.

"Why, then he went off to old Lee's at double quick."

A sudden feeling of fear thrust at Monteith's heart.

"Come on, Jenny," he cried, and sped away down the road towards the lodge gates as fast as his legs could carry him with the result that he soon outdistanced Jenny, who hurried after him as quickly as her skirts would allow. The horse and trap Eric left standing outside the cottager's abode.

"Well, I'll keep an eye on the horse, anyhow," muttered the man audibly. "Perhaps I'll make another five bob over that job. Twenty-five bob won't be bad for a day's work."

The lodge gates were open as Eric came up to them; he sped down the drive and up to the front door of the house, noting, to his absolute amazement as he did so, the dead body of a huge wolf-hound lying in the middle of a flower-bed close to the house. He pealed at the bell, the door was opened by Hazel herself in walking attire.

"Why, Eric!" she cried; "how came you here? I was just going to the inn at Rottingdean to see if I could hire a conveyance to take me back to Brighton."

Then, in as few words as possible, she told him the story of what had happened, and how that Caldecott's base scheme had been the means of giving Gideon Lee back his reason. Of course what she and the others never knew was the true story of the meeting of Lee and Caldecott as narrated at the beginning of this story, and as the old man's memory failed him with all the details as regarded this they were never to know the true facts of the case, but the indisputable fact remained that Gideon Lee had regained his senses. When he died some years later he left his property to the girl who had been unconsciously the means of giving him back his reason.

The following week the Good Samaritan Company visits Cardiff. While there Hazel is suddenly summoned to London by her father's solicitor, and she has an unpleasant adventure which will be fully described in next week's Short Stories.

SEEN YOUR PHOTO IN SHORT STORIES?

IF SO, YOU WILL GET £5.

HERE IS THE SCHEME.

We have in our possession a considerable number of photographs of men, women, and children of all grades of society secured for us by our agents, who have scoured the United Kingdom for this special purpose.

Each week we publish five of these portraits, and to each of the persons thus represented we dispatch the sum of £5, on his or her forwarding a claim on a post-card addressed to PORTRAIT DEPARTMENT, "SHORT STORIES," Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Although the persons whose portraits will appear in this competition are quite unknown to us personally, we have their names and addresses in our possession, and, therefore, a claim can be settled at once, without risk of fraud.

We may say that our agents are still at work all over the country. It is, therefore, possible that your portrait may appear at any moment without your knowing it. So you should watch SHORT STORIES.

Is your portrait here? If so, drop us a post-card, and get £5. Five more portraits will appear next week.

All claims in connection with the portraits below must reach the address already given above by Tuesday next, December 3rd. Full names and addresses of the correct claimants will appear in succeeding numbers.

HOW TO MAKE A CLAIM FOR A £5 NOTE.

Simply write on a post-card these words:

> The Portrait No.......... (here put number of portrait) in the current number of SHORT STORIES is mine. Please forward a £5 note.
> (Name and full address.)

Persons represented must claim for themselves. Claims made by other people on their behalf will be ignored.

THE PARTNERS.

THE warm light of an October day was falling over mountain and valley as Mark Wilson slowly made his way up the rocky gorge that lay in the heart of the Black Range. The patient little burro which he led was loaded with his prospector's outfit, provisions to last him two weeks, and a Winchester rifle.

"It's strange what could 'a' become of Ben Armstrong," said Mark, as he picked his way along the margin of a little stream that came bubbling merrily from the hills. "Somethin' must 'a' happened ter him, er he'd 'a' been back afore now."

Leaving his burro, he climbed to a little elevation and scanned the valley closely, but no trace of his missing partner could be seen. Returning to his burro he continued his course up the valley.

Mark Wilson and Ben Armstrong had been prospecting among the mountains of South-western New Mexico for several months, but ill-luck seemed to follow them. Ben had found Mark at Kingston dead broke, and had given him assistance in the way of furnishing him with money to pay his board, and pay the expenses of a prospecting trip into the mountains. Finally the two had drifted into the little town of Bluerock without enough money to buy a meal. They managed to obtain work of the more fortunate miners, but this was not suited to their plans, and one day Ben had said:

"Mark, I don't like this idea of wearing our lives out workin' for other people, when we might be makin' a forchun of our own by keepin' up our prospectin'. Now, s'pose one of us keeps at work hyar ter keep us in grub, while the other goes a-prospectin'. We can do it easy enough, an' who knows how soon we may stumble upon a forchun."

"That's my idee exactly," responded Mark, and from that day the two had worked and prospected alternately, but ill-luck seemed to follow them. Once, when Mark returned from a week's prospecting trip without having discovered so much as the colour of gold, Ben grew despondent, and complained bitterly of their bad luck.

"'Taint no use, Mark," he said, complainingly. "We ain't never goin' ter strike anything—that's my opinion. I ain't got no courage to prospect any more, and I reckon there's nothin' left fer us but ter tramp back ter civilisation where we can get enough ter eat, if nothin' more."

"Gettin' discouraged don't help matters," replied Mark. "As fer me I hain't never had no luck, but I jist keeps peggin' away, an' some time, mebby, I'll run on to a streak o' luck and meek my pile. But I'm powerful onlucky, and mebby if you go out prospectin' this time, an' leave me ter work hyar we'll have success."

"I reckon ye're right; ye're powerful onlucky. I'll try it once more, an' if I fail, I'll strike fer the States."

And so the next morning Ben departed on his prospecting tour, expecting to be gone but a week, yet at the end of two weeks he had not returned. There had been a band of Apaches seen prowling among the hills a week after Ben's departure, and fearing that harm had come to his partner, Mark had packed his effects and gone in search of him, taking his tools and a supply of provisions a'ong.

"Pore feller," said Mark, as he made his way up the valley, "he must 'a' fell inter the hands o' some o' them hostiles——"

He stopped abruptly, for in rounding a clump of bushes, he came suddenly upon a man busily engaged working in the bed of a small stream. So absorbed was he in his work that he did not hear the approaching steps till Mark was almost upon him. Then he rose quickly, and turned to confront the intruder.

"W'y, bless my soul, it's Ben!" exclaimed Mark joyfully, advancing to grasp his partner's hand. At the same instant his eyes fell upon a heap of dull yellow nuggets lying at Ben's side. A single glance told him that they were gold.

A gasp of joy came from Mark's lips.

"It's gold—it's gold!" he cried, in a sort of ecstasy. "Our luck's changed at last—no more diggin' an' sweatin' now fer just enough to live on fer us!"

In his excitement and joy he was about to throw his arms round his partner, but Ben pushed him aside and drew back, an angry light shining in his eyes.

"What aire ye doin' hyar, an' what do yer want, Mark Wilson?" cried Ben, with a gesture of impatience.

Mark stopped abruptly, amazed, stupefied at his partner's strange conduct. His hands dropped helpless at his side.

"W'y—what—what's the matter, Ben?" he said at length, the astonishment upon his face deepening.

"Matter?" responded Ben, "matter enough, Mark Wilson! What do ye mean by follerin' me out hyar?"

"What do I mean? W'y, Ben, I came ter look fer ye—ain't I yer pardner, an'——"

"My pardner? Not you! Didn't I tell ye ye war unlucky? An' I tell ye now that I don't want nothin' more ter do with ye! Clear out o' this! 'fore you have all the sneaks in Bluerock nosin' round hyar!"

He made an angry gesture with his hand as he spoke, while a strange, greedy light shone in his eyes as they wandered to the nuggets that lay at his feet.

Mark Wilson had staggered back as if he had received a heavy blow. He put his hand to his face as if to shut out the sight of his partner's angry face. Then he spoke, his voice sounding strangely hoarse.

"Ben, do ye mean this?" he asked, "ye must be only jokin'—I can't believe it—'taint like ye, Ben."

A bitter oath escaped Ben's lips.

"Git out o' this, I tell ye!" he cried savagely. "I tell ye agin, I don't want nothin' ter do with ye! I found this gold an' it's mine—all mine! Git out o' this, I say—do ye hear?"

He laid his hand on his pistol as he spoke, a savage glitter in his eye.

Mark fell back a step or two. His face grew deadly pale, and he made an involuntary movement towards the pistol in his belt. But a sudden change came over his face; his hand fell at his side, and there was a reproachful look in his eyes.

"Ye don't mean ter shoot me, Ben," he said in a choking voice. "If ye say the gold's your'n it's your'n." I—thought we were pardners—but no matter. Ye found the gold, an' I reckon it's your'n."

He turned abruptly, and taking the rein of the burro moved slowly down the cañon.

Ben stood watching the retreating figure, a look of exultation on his face, but gradually his face softened.

"Mebby I wor a leetle too hard on him," he muttered, "but he's powerful onlucky. An'—I found the gold—it's mine. But I don't mind—"

He stooped down, and picking up a small nugget hurried in pursuit of his retreating partner. Mark heard a step behind him, and turned to find that Ben was approaching.

"I don't want ter be hard on ye, Mark," Ben said, "but it's only a pocket I've found—there ain't no more in the gulch, fer I've looked it all over. Hyar, take this, it will meck ye a leetle grub stake."

He threw the nugget at Mark's feet as he spoke. Mark stood looking at him a moment in silence, emotion written upon his countenance. He shook his head slowly.

"No; 'tain't mine," he said. "I'm pore—I'm onlucky but I ain't no dog ter pick up a bone that's throwed ter me. Keep it—it's your'n," and with this he turned abruptly and was gone.

It was nearly noon on the following day when he reached Bluerock. Stopping his burro in front of the cabin that had been occupied by himself and Ben, he entered. Gathering together a few effects that belonged to him, he carried them into a deserted cabin a short distance away.

"I reckon I'll just camp in hyar till I git a stake," he said, and kindling a fire in the rude fireplace, he began to prepare his dinner.

That evening, just as night was coming down over the little town of Bluerock, Ben Armstrong arrived at his cabin, and hurriedly removed the sacks of gold that were fastened to the animal's back. Conveying these into the shanty, he concealed them under a pile of rubbish in a corner of the room.

"I reckon thar ain't no more trampin' among the hills for Ben Armstrong," he said, rubbing his hands with satisfaction as he glanced towards the gold.

He made a light, and glancing about the cabin, continued: "I reckon Mark's moved his traps—I don't see 'em hyar. Waal, I can't say that I'm sorry, for he might be holdin' it ag'inst me that I hadn't used him right. But didn't I find the gold, an' ain't what I find mine?"

Late that night he was awakened by hearing the sound of some one moving about in the room. Instantly he thought of the sack of gold concealed in the corner, and quickly sprang from his bed. He saw the dark outlines of the form of a man and sprang forward to grapple with it, but at that instant he received a heavy blow upon the head, and sank down unconscious.

When his senses returned it was daylight. Weak and dizzy, he staggered to his feet, with only a vague and confused memory of what had taken place. With a vague fear he went to the corner where he had placed the bags of precious nuggets. They were gone; a deep groan came from his lips, and staggering to the door, he threw it open. Some miners were passing, and calling to them, he told them of the robbery that had been committed.

The news created a great deal of indignation among the miners, who were accustomed to look upon such an offence as the gravest that could possibly be committed, and in a short time a crowd had collected at the cabin.

No one seemed able to offer a clue as to who the robber could be till half-an-hour later it was discovered that Mark Wilson was gone and also a horse belonging to Jim Muggins, who lived near by the cabin where Mark had taken up his abode the day previous.

"It's Mark's work, the ugly scoundrel!" exclaimed Ben. "He was the only one who knowed I had the gold an' he's gone and robbed me of it."

"That means a rope if we ketch him," said one of the men as they made ready to go in pursuit of the robber. That Mark Wilson was the one who had committed the robbery there was no doubt in the minds of the inhabitants of Bluerock, and if he were caught summary punishment would be meted out to him.

"Bring some hosses, boys," said Ben. "We must overtake that cuss afore he gits out o' the country."

While the horses were being brought, he seated himself upon the door-step, and took a deep pull at a bottle which one of the men had given him.

"That kinder nerves me up," he said, "but that was a wicked blow that skunk gave me. Makes me feel kinder dizzy yit, drat his ugly hide."

Half-an-hour later, Ben Armstrong, accompanied by the city marshal and two citizens of Bluerock, spurred their horses up the narrow defile that led across the mountains.

They had ridden some three miles when the marshal brought his horse to a sudden stop.

"Look thar, boys," he said, pointing to a clump of bushes where a riderless horse, saddled and bridled, was cropping the grass, "that's Jim Muggins' hoss, shore as shootin'!"

"So it is," affirmed Ben, "the one rid off by the robber. Hello! what's this?" The speaker suddenly reined in his horse, and dismounting, stood bending over the prostrate form of a man that lay in a lifeless heap on the margin of the trail.

The others quickly dismounted and came to Ben's side. The prostrate man was lying upon his face, dead to all appearances, his lifeless hands still grasping the three heavy bags of gold. They turned him gently over, and gazed at his pallid face.

"It's Mark Wilson!" cried Ben, "an' here's the gold he stole from my cabin."

"I reckon ye're about right," said the marshal. "But he's done fer, I allow."

"What's happened to him?" asked Ben.

"Hoss throwed him, I 'low," responded the marshal. "Leastways, he's done fer, if I'm any judge—which saves him from comin' under the jurisdiction of Judge Lynch."

A feeble moan came from Mark's lips, and he opened his eyes and gazed blankly about him.

"W'y, he ain't dead—quick, give me yer canteen, Ben," exclaimed the Marshal, and kneeling beside the injured man, he bathed his face with water, and forced some spirits between his lips. As he did so, he gave a quick gasp of surprise.

"Look, boys!" he cried, "there's the mark of a bullet, or my name ain't Sug Martin!" and he pointed to an ugly wound in Mark's breast, from which the blood was still issuing. "What's the meaning of this? I tell yer thar's something wrong—somethin' about this business that we don't understand!"

The four men gazed at each other in blank surprise.

"So thar is," said Ben, "but look, he's comin' to, an' mebby he can tell us how it happened."

Mark opened his lips and spoke in a feeble whisper: "It's all right, fellers," he said, "I got the gold, but he gave me a shot that's finished me."

"Who was it shot ye? How did it happen?" asked the marshal.

"It was Zeb Conner," replied Mark, speaking with an effort.

"What! do ye mean Zeb Conner, the desperado that was run out o' town about three weeks ago?"

"Yes," went on Mark. "I seed him prowling around Ben's cabin last night, an' I watched fer 'im. He got the gold an' was makin' off with it—my pistol snapped an' he got away—I followed 'im on Jem Muggins' hoss—I overtook him up thar on the mountain—we both fired at once—he's lyin' dead up there in the trail—I got the gold from 'im an'—an' was bringin' it back when I found I'd been hit by his bullet, and fell down hyar. It's all right, Ben, I've saved yer gold—but—but I'm powerful onlucky—he's done fer me—"

His eyes closed, his voice ceased, and he lay as if already dead.

Ben seated himself in the grass and lifted the wounded man's head, and placed it in his lap, a look of sorrow and compassion on his face.

The marshal and one of the men hurried up the mountain trail. In a short time the former returned.

"It's jest as Mark said, fellers," he exclaimed. "Zeb Conner's lyin' up thar—only he's not dead—but wounded perty bad. Sez he got the gold and would er got away with it only fer Mark. I left a guard over him, and if I ain't fooled we'll have a chance for lynchin' yit, but it won't be Mark. Pore feller! How is he, Ben?"

"He—he can't last long," replied Ben in a husky voice. "He's saved my gold fer me, fellers," he went on, "me, that's treated him like a dog! We were pardners an' when I found that gold—something—the devil, I reckon, whispered that it was all mine, an' I went back on—on my pardner!"

The dying man moaned feebly and spoke in a whisper, but he was sinking rapidly, and it was plain his mind was wandering.

"Hyar's got the gold—I've brought it back," he said. "Give it ter Ben—tell him that Mark—but never mind—he done me a good turn once; but I—I was onlucky—" His voice died away.

A choking sob came from Ben as he bent his face down to Mark's ear.

"Pardner," he said, his form shaking with emotion, "I want yer ter live—the gold's all your'n, Mark—I don't desarve it—it drives me mad—made me treat ye like a dog—ye that war my pardner. Speak to me, Mark—pardner—take the gold, it's all your'n—"

His voice died in a sob of anguish.

"It's all right now," said the wounded man in a faint whisper. "I've got the gold an'—I'll take it ter Ben. What's that pressin' and burnin' my breast?—blood! It wor Conner's bullet. I'm done for, but they all sed I wor onlucky—"

There was a faint fluttering of the lips, and Ben Armstrong's unlucky partner lay dead in his arms.

CHAPTER I.

"Dulcie, what has Happened?"

"Not a great deal of difference, Mortimer, except that the gramophone has displaced the musical-box and the cinematograph the peep-show. But the fair itself is just as I remember it twenty years since."

"Come, come," was the answer; "my dear Eustace, you are not going to pretend that you had any knowledge of Steeple Garston Fair at the early age of nine?"

Eustace Lane smiled, and his stern, rather melancholy features softened into an expression of thoughtful amusement.

"You were a virtuous little boy then, Phil," he said; "and I—I was the worst kiddie in Dame Jessamy's school at Garston Royal. One fair-day I played truant and tramped here. By Jove, how frightened and enchanted I was! I must have a glimpse of the genuine hurly-burly—these are nothing but the outskirts."

"Very well," assented his companion; "though if your precious arm gets damaged, you mustn't ask me to face Joan. A man with a splintered elbow has no business in a crowd."

"Rubbish!" declared Lane; "it's as right as a trivet, only your wife's taste for nursing has to be humoured. All the same, you will either have to support me in a judicious degree of rebellion or I make for South Africa and liberty. The mine is in full swing now and I shall be needed."

Philip Mortimer studied the speaker.

"I believe," he retorted, "that you are yearning to find yourself back at the Cape. Joan vows there is some special attraction—of a romantic nature."

Lane shrugged a pair of broad shoulders.

"Mrs. Mortimer," was his comment, "is an inveterate sentimentalist, and fancies everybody to be in the power of Cupid. She forgets that my work lies in South Africa, among stamps and batteries. This confounded elbow brought me to England against my own desire, and now it is on the mend the object of my visit is accomplished."

"On the mend, no doubt," admitted Mortimer, glancing at the brown wrist supported by the loop of a silk handkerchief on the engineer's breast; "but you're yet not delivered from the specialists."

"Pshaw!" cried Eustace Lane; "the whole thing disgusts me. Nice sort of hero I am. The bullet which did the mischief was a criminal's and not a Boer's, and my experience of the war is confined to guard duty on absurdly safe lines of communication, and several months in the enteric wards of base hospitals. I didn't anticipate when I joined the Light Horse that I should leave it unwounded and return to the mine to be shot by a common safe-robber. A truce to me and my grievances; let us investigate the wonders of Steeple Garston Fair."

Philip Mortimer yielded to his friend's determination, and they went forward through the crowd of country folk and gaping sight-seers.

On each side the mob of rustics pushed and jostled between stalls of rough construction and rougher decoration that bordered narrow aisles of clayey soil, cut into ruts by wheels and beaten to mud by iron-shod hoofs, and the no less ponderous attacks of human feet. A patent roundabout, a large circus-marquee—inclosed by a ring of travelling cages—and a cheap theatre, towered over their smaller competitors of wood and canvas, and the blowing of horns, the shouting of showmen, and the din of the steam-organ, mingled in a fierce clamour.

Further off, horses neighed, cattle lowed, the voices of sheep and pigs blended with the uproar, and the occasional shrill fanfare of a riotous donkey pierced the hubbub.

"Don't you suppose," asked the engineer, who had recovered his cheerfulness amid this quaint carnival, "that you ought to buy a yard or so of pink ribbon for Mrs. Mortimer? Who ever heard of a loyal swain returning from Steeple Garston in fair-week without a fairing for his Angelina?"

"My dear Lane," was the tolerant response, "fairings are a tribute bachelors must pay. If you hanker after pink ribbons, purchase a stock of them, not for Joan, but to carry south for the future Mrs. Lane."

The other frowned—a frown that ended in a sigh.

"There is no prospect," he said curtly, "of my creating such a——"

Eustace Lane stopped, his gaze was following down the crowded species of alley a girlish figure whose trim prettiness and shy self-possession contrasted with the plump good looks of the country lassies near her, and drew not a few appreciative remarks.

"Hullo!" cried his escort; "feeling queer? Slip out of the crush; I thought it would be too much for you."

The engineer ignored the well-meant advice; he roused from his absorption to mutter a rapid sentence, muffled by the prevailing clamour. Yet he did not cease his keen observance of the retreating form.

"Phil," he said, "either there are two people in the world more alike than twins, or a person has passed us whom I imagined to be six thousand miles away; I must be sure which it is, Phil—coincidence, or—Dulcie."

With this intimation Eustace Lane began to thread the groups of rustics that lounged in front of the show-booths and their vociferous proprietors. Mortimer tracked him vigilantly. Lane himself was pursuing the figure which had flitted by them an instant before. It was that of a young and graceful woman, clad in a loose, dark ulster; a tiny heel, twinkling under the hem of the long garment, betrayed neat, even coquettish, shoes of tan. A second touch of elegance in her toilet was a black velvet toque, relieved by a cluster of violets, and the rolls of chestnut hair visible to Lane and Mortimer were smooth and characteristic.

The engineer, swerving dexterously among the uncouth multitude, contrived to get on a level with the subject of his attention, and Mortimer saw that he sprang to her, forcing a path in a fashion ominous for his splintered elbow. Struck by a profound curiosity at the latter's unwonted excitement, Philip Mortimer imitated his proceedings; the friends came face to face beside the wearer of the violets and the black velvet.

"Heavens, Dulcie!" gasped Eustace Lane; "what are you doing in England, and in this tag-rag-and-bobtail, alone?"

A strange light leapt into the hazel eyes which looked up at the astounded engineer—a light that revealed an overwhelming joy, tinged with embarrassment and alarm. The profile of their owner was regular and delicate, her mouth firm and sensitive, her cheeks, at the moment, flushed.

"Mr.—Mr. Lane!" she stammered, "is it really you? I thought you were in South Africa—oh," she broke off, "you have been wounded!"

Lane winced. "A mere accident," he said; "nothing in the least heroic. As for being in South Africa," he added, "I believed you there; is your father in England also? And how, by all that is wonderful, Dulcie—Miss Calderon, do I meet you here?"

Eustace Lane had made his hasty and significant correction after a nervous glance at Philip Mortimer.

Dulcie Calderon drooped and her colour faded.

"Grandad brought me from the Cape," she faltered; "did you not learn of father's death? It was six months ago, in a fight at Kraalfontein. He had been transferred to Kitchener's Scouts; his company was surrounded by the Boers on a march, and father was one of the first shot." The words trembled, and the narrator's lashes were wet.

"I'm sorry," murmured the engineer; "it's news to me. I was stewing in the Orange River Colony on the lines of communication. Then I went back to the mine and helped to start operations again, but got winged in a struggle with some scoundrels who had designs on our opening clean-up. That drove me home to have a tendon transplanted—I was promising myself to be in Capetown, hunting you out, in a couple of months time. I never dreamt of—of your father coming to any harm."

He stood lost in a sorrowful reverie. Dulcie's gaze stole to the interested countenance of Philip Mortimer. Lane observed it and wakened from his meditations.

"This is Miss Calderon, Phil," he said, "the daughter of as honourable a gentleman and as true a friend as ever set foot in stirrup. Miss Calderon, Mr. Mortimer has been a chum of mine since boyhood."

Philip Mortimer acknowledged the introduction by a cordial hand-clasp.

"Charmed to make your acquaintance, Miss Calderon," he assured her; "won't you allow my wife to share the pleasure. My place is at Garston Royal, Lane is staying with us, and we should be delighted to see you and—your grandfather."

"Thanks, Phil!" put in Lane eagerly; "yes, do, Miss Calderon. By the bye, I have never met your grandfather; I doubt if I realised you had one. I must call on him—where can I do so?"

Mortimer was watching his companion acutely—the engineer seemed to be as nervous and confused as a small boy at a children's ball. He surmised that the reason for Eustace Lane's perturbation was the old and romantic passion of which the South African had been speaking so disparagingly.

The girl, thus warmly welcomed, strove in vain to conceal her own agitation and distress.

"Mr. Lane," she said, "you mustn't think of seeing me any more or of calling on grandfather. I wish you had not noticed me just now—many things have happened since we knew each other at Johannesburg, Mr. —Mr. Mortimer is very kind, but it wouldn't be right of me to do as he wishes."

"Dulcie!" cried the engineer, aghast, "I don't comprehend you in the least. What is it that has happened? You are ill; you are unhappy, cannot I help you?"

"No, no, please!" and Dulcie Calderon shrank from him. "I must go. I am late already. Good-bye, Mr. Lane; good-bye, Mr. Mortimer."

Eustace Lane would have protested against her ultimatum, but she checked him with so beseeching a gesture that he paused, despite himself. While he hesitated, with a swift, backward glance at his grief-wrung visage, and a cold little bow to Mortimer, she slipped away, and was swallowed up by the crowd.

The engineer leant heavily upon his friend and was silent. At length he roused himself and began to move onward in a slow, mechanical manner, suggestive of the strain he was putting on his powers of self-control.

"You can work it out, Phil," he muttered; "she was the solitary girl I ever took a fancy for. I imagined her in Cape Colony, and wanted to get back to search for her. What is the meaning of her presence in this bedlam, and of the mystery with which she chooses to surround her position? Not that she shall shake me off so; her eyes said she was glad to meet me, if her lips didn't. I must have time to consider—let's strike out of the din."

Mortimer assented, and they strode down the thronged aisle between the booths. Half-way along it bent at a wide angle, and in the angle was a tent of new white canvas with a wooden erection, by way of front, crossed by a blue and red balcony. The hoarding was hung with pictorial advertisements of the entertainment to which the tent was devoted, and from the platform of the balcony, a short, red-bearded fellow in a khaki suit and slouch hat proclaimed its merits by the aid of a huge speaking-trumpet.

"The great Calderon," shouted the wielder of this instrument, "the renowned and only Calderon, the Pistol King! Fresh from South Africa, where he has been loyally serving his country. Admission threepence and sixpence. Walk in and witness the exploits of the Pistol King, in collaboration with his beautiful grand-daughter, the Belle of Johannesburg!"

At this point the crier halted for breath; Eustace Lane was staring at him incredulously.

"Walk in and see the great Calderon!" bellowed the showman, who had regained the thread of his announcement; "he will shoot a shilling out of the fingers of the Belle, he will outline her in pistol shots on a plank target, he will remove an apple from her head with a single cartridge. See the Belle of Johannesburg dance the crystal dance to an accompaniment of shattered glass and flying bullets; see the great Calderon shoot the pips out of a ten of hearts!"

Lane gripped his friend's wrist and dragged him to the entrance of the tent; the engineer's jaw was set and his face pallid.

"It's her for a thousand, Phil," he said sternly; "her and her grandfather. If Dulcie were nothing to me, yet Dick Calderon, her father, did me many a good turn; he wouldn't sleep in his grave did he know that his child was posing publicly in a fair for her bread."

Eustace Lane reached the curtained-doorway, threw a coin to the attendant, and stalked into the shadowy structure. The cheaper parts were packed, the dearer sparsely tenanted. The engineer and his ally chose a couple of chairs in the rear row—before them was a blank series of similar seats, beyond, a low stage and a scene-drop.

As they took their places a bell rang, the scene-drop rose, and a very tall man, with hair and moustaches of a grizzled yellow, stepped to the footlights and spoke a few memorized phrases, so casually delivered as almost to be inaudible. He, too, was dressed in khaki, but wore high boots instead of the cloth putties sported by the trumpeter outside.

"The dickens!" whispered Lane, in his friend's ear; "do you know who that is?"

"The Pistol King, no doubt," said Mortimer, scanning the powerful frame of the orator.

"Impossible," responded Eustace Lane; "he must be an assistant or something. Calderon will come on later with his—his granddaughter. No, that's the scoundrel I've been wanting these three months—the beggar that winged me and shot the manager of the Bilboa Deep dead in his tracks. I only got a glimpse of the villain, but I could pick him out of a regiment, and that man on the stage, masquerading in the King's uniform, is he."

"Go—go easy, Eustace," Philip Mortimer warned him; "didn't you spot the painted atrocities at the door? The man on the stage is Calderon himself. He has gone to the table and is loading a pair of pistols. And here—here comes your little sweetheart herself."

It was true, the girl they had overtaken and conversed with on the fair-ground had appeared behind the footlights and joined, at a sort of gilded bench, piled with weapons, the moustached and booted performer concerning whose identity Eustace Lane had made so singular a discovery. Dulcie Calderon had abandoned her ulster and stood to attention in a khaki skirt and military blouse with leather gaiters. But she had donned neither paint nor powder.

Catching up a pack of cards, she selected several, and retreated to the left of the stage. Unconcernedly she extended them one by one at arm's length, while the marksman, from the opposite side, shot out the pips with unerring accuracy. Dulcie did not flinch or change colour, not even when a silver coin was placed between her finger-tips, to be removed by a bullet, nor when the promised apple was sent spinning by the same agency. The engineer watched, horrified yet fascinated. At last the Pistol King strode to the middle of the stage.

"While the target is being adjusted for the trick in which I outline by bullet holes the figure of my granddaughter," he said, "that gifted young lady will dance her famous——"

He stopped—his glance had fallen upon Eustace Lane. A second the two gazed into one another's faces, the engineer's white and set, the marksman's calm and smiling, and then the speaker finished.

"Her famous crystal dance," he concluded, and turned to the table for a couple of revolvers. But Dulcie Calderon was contemplating the audience with a fixed and anxious stare; she, also, had perceived the presence of Eustace Lane. A moment she looked at him, as if affrightedly, before passing from the stage.

"Did you notice that?" asked Mortimer cautiously; "he saw and recognised you."

"Yes," said the engineer, in a similar fashion; "and so did Dulcie. There she is back and going to dance, poor child! Mortimer, what ought I to do? Calderon is a murderer, and Dulcie is his granddaughter; it would be horrible to betray him."

Mortimer did not answer—he was engrossed by the performance that had begun on the stage. Dulcie had reappeared in a gay frock of pink tinsel, with a silk Union Jack for apron. Evidently her khaki garment was made to slip on and off over it.

The feature of the dance consisted in the rhythmic tossing up, almost to the iron roof of the stage, glass balls of an opaline tint, which were shattered by the upward shots of the marksman's revolvers. The Pistol King moved round the dancer in a deliberate circle. A limelight was played upon the performers, and the sparkle of the broken balls and the crack of the cartridges was effective enough.

The marksman reached the centre of the stage, firing as he went. Suddenly his shoe seemed to slide on the boards and he staggered, bringing his arm to the level. The revolver was discharged—a figure started upright in the audience—to reel and fall, overthrowing a dozen chairs.

The figure was that of Eustace Lane, and the bullet had struck him in the chest.

CHAPTER II.

THE FACE IN THE TREE.

"MY dear fellow, do go slow; Joan, prop him up on the other side. There's the sunniest bit, at the end of the verandah."

Philip Mortimer walked gently along the covered wooden terrace that skirted the front of his pleasant, unpretentious country residence and overlooked a large old-fashioned garden. Eustace Lane moved with him, supported on his friend's strong arm and aided by a plump, fair-haired little matron in a smart morning-gown.

"Nonsense," he said; "you will turn me into a perfect child. Joan, will you never understand that I am quite convalescent and able to get about by myself?"

Mrs. Mortimer shook her head reprovingly, as she helped to deposit their patient in a wicker chair, and proceeded to arrange a pile of cushions.

"We are not going to risk a set-back, my reckless cousin," she told him; "if you don't choose to be obedient we shall condemn you to a couch in the library. Remember this is a special privilege and you must be grateful. Why Phil has even obtained permission for you to smoke."

"Has he, though?" exclaimed Eustace Lane, a flush of masculine satisfaction mounting to his wan cheeks; "that is good! I suppose I have some cigarettes, at least I had. when——"

The engineer stopped abruptly, thrust a hand into his bosom and brought out a flattish silver case, rounded to fit the curve of the owner's body. The metal was dented and scratched. Lane contemplated it with an odd expression on his thin features.

"A bit of luck this happened to be in my upper pocket," he observed drily. "Phil, may I trouble you for a match?"

His friend struck a vesta and held it. Eustace Lane drew a couple of deep breaths, enjoying the familiar flavour.

"Sit down; sit down!" he broke off to say; "you people must drop the habit of waiting on me—I won't have it."

Mrs. Mortimer snapped her fingers at him. "That for your 'won'ts'!" she cried, "you are not your own master yet, by any means. Well, I must go and give some orders. I suppose you will want a trifle of lunch about noon. Phil, you can stay and talk to him for ten minutes, and then he is to be left to his cigarettes and a book while the sun lasts. Au revoir, you rebellious invalid; I have to make sure that your fish is fresh and your chicken tender."

She flitted away and vanished through an open window. The two men glanced at one another, and Lane shut the silver receptacle with a click.

"Phil," he asked, between the puffs of the fragrant smoke; "how long is it exactly since——"

"Three weeks," said Mortimer, lighting up himself; "and if the bullet hadn't been clean it would have been longer, for it swerved off your case there and cut up your chest to some purpose. I had a most instructive glimpse of your fourth rib when the surgeons were dressing the wound—the groove torn by the bullet had bared the bone. How's your elbow, my hero of many tribulations?"

"As right as ever," answered the engineer, bending the joint referred to, "I conclude, with my laying in bed so much. By the bye, Phil, let me comprehend the public aspect of all this—where—where are the Calderons?"

"I—I've no precise knowledge," said his friend; "of course your getting hit was universally regarded as an accident. What you told me about the beggar could not be described as evidence, and it would have been the dickens of a job to prove that Calderon's foot didn't slip by chance—dash it, I wouldn't suspect him myself had you not recognised him for the fellow who cracked your elbow and shot your manager. But the authorities could hold no inquiry if you didn't succumb, unless an accusation were lodged against Calderon. And, on account of Miss Dulcie, I felt you'd rather I raised no fuss."

Eustace Lane put out an impulsive hand and grasped his companion's.

"You were quite correct," he murmured; "a thousand thanks, Phil."

The dissolving cloudlets stole silently from the lips of the smokers—both had relapsed into meditation. At length Mortimer spoke.

"Lane," he began, "perhaps you ought to be told something. Not that I believe it wise, but I can't be disloyal to you, even for your own sake. Miss—Miss Calderon has called every day during the last three weeks to ask, ostensibly on behalf of her grandfather, after your condition."

The engineer's cigarette fell to the floor of the verandah—he crushed the glowing tip and took another.

"Every day!" repeated Eustace Lane; "yet the fair must be over long ago."

"Yes," said Mortimer. "To be honest, I fear she walks a considerable distance. But she will reply to no questions, accept no refreshment, permit no sympathy. The nearest town is four miles off and boasts a low music-hall. Driving through it recently I noticed an advertisement of Calderon's performance—he is starring there."

Lane's mouth set and his eyes moistened.

"Phil," he muttered, "she—she—seems not to be indifferent to me."

"It may be a blind on her grandfather's part," urged Mortimer, with reluctance. "He could do no better if he wished to lend countenance to the view that his shot at you was accidental. Your recovery though, threatens his neck. You might, to be sure, keep his secret out of regard for Miss Dulcie, but he does not dream probably, that you are interested in her. On my honour, Eustace, I don't like the situation—it's too full of risk. That's what reconciled me to telling you of Miss Calderon's apparent devotion, and so increasing your fit of the tender passion. Either you must have Calderon arrested, or you must go back to South Africa."

"And leave Dulcie to the life of a strolling player," added Lane; "no, Phil, I'm not the sort. It is a bit of a puzzle, but I shall try to ferret out some less ignoble solution of the problem than flight."

Philip Mortimer consulted his watch; its verdict led him to start from his seat, draw a tall screen round the invalid's chair, push a bamboo table to the latter's side, and toss his match-box upon it.

"Well," he rejoined, "I'll allow you to tackle the enigma forthwith. I've a horse ill, worse luck, and the vet promised to run in about this time. Ta-ta, and don't be too chivalrous in your decision; you have evidently to deal with a ruffian as desperate as he is quick-witted."

Thus saying, Mortimer descended the verandah steps and strolled past the gable of the house towards the stables—a stalwart, cheerful, placid figure. The engineer looked after him.

"Dear old Phil," murmured Eustace Lane; "one of the best, the very best—where are those matches of his?"

A vesta spurted, the wisp of paper and tobacco—forgotten in the gravity of the just terminated conversation—was coaxed to a glow, and the convalescent puffed reflectively under the mellow radiance of the September sunshine.

His reverie was disturbed by a sudden sound, and he turned in his chair. The action hurt the newly-healed muscles of the engineer's chest, and he winced. The next instant a shock of surprise and delight had displaced the pain. Before him, on the path that stretched out to the garden entrance, stood Dulcie.

To the most casual observation she was fatigued and dusty—the slipping of a tired foot upon the gravel had served to indicate her presence, as the suppressed exclamation wrung from Lane by his rapid change of posture had aroused her to his.

Eustace Lane sprang up and advanced to the edge of the verandah. Reaching it, he staggered and clutched at the trellis for support. Dulcie darted across the lawn and mounted the wooden platform—his palm sought her shoulder, she was obliged to stoop under his weight. She caught at the seat he had abandoned, dragged it near, and helped him to sink into it.

There was ice-water on the table close by, Dulcie poured some out and extended the glass to him. Lane drank a mouthful as she held the vessel.

"It's—it's nothing," he gasped. "I've grown weak with confinement, that's all."

He took the glass and set it down, still holding her hand. "Dulcie," he said, "you have come miles. Don't deny it, there isn't a bus and you are exhibiting in Market Garston."

The girl leant on a pillar of the verandah, trembling.

"I—I had to," she faltered; "it would have been awful if he had killed you, I never knew him miss except then—he always told me he couldn't."

"So you are only here out of regard for him?" asked Eustace Lane coldly. "He may even have sent you."

"N—no," stammered Dulcie Calderon; "he—he doesn't suspect where I am. He has looked in the Journal every morning, though—there have been regular reports how you are. But I—I wanted to be certain."

The engineer clasped her small fingers, damp with perspiration. "And you have walked eight miles a day for three weeks to inquire," he murmured. "Dulcie, I wonder whether you would have regretted me much if I had died?"

Dulcie shuddered. "Don't, don't!" she pleaded: "I have dreamt about it! But you are better," she urged, falling on her knees beside him to scan his face; "you are really going to get well again, Mr. Lane."

"Of my wound, yes," admitted Eustace Lane, gravely; "but I have a serious type of heart disease, Dulcie. I am afraid that is incurable."

The listener blanched to her forehead.

"Oh," she whispered, "how terrible, how terrible!"

Lane studied her white features.

"It is not so very serious," he reassured her, smiling: "not at all dangerous, unless—unless I receive a great disappointment. Hearts in love do sometimes break, Dulcie, and it is love that is my heart complaint. You would not break my heart, would you, dear, if I were to ask you a momentous question and beg you not to say 'No'!"

Dulcie Calderon recoiled.

"Please don't!" she besought. "I'm not fit—I'm not a lady! I might have been if father hadn't been shot and granddad hadn't taken me. I wish you hadn't seen me, now, or at the fair—I do, indeed. Good-bye, Mr. Lane, I must go—I shouldn't have come."

"You are the one woman I shall ever wish to marry," declared the engineer, maintaining his grasp upon her; "I loved you in Johannesburg before the war. I went through it for your sake; I was going back to South Africa to find you again, and if I failed, to seek my quietus at the muzzle of a Boer rifle. Dulcie, you can't reject me just because you have shared your grandfather's mode of earning his bread."

The girl, still on her knees by the chair, resisted Eustace Lane's attempt to detain her; she was strangely pallid and resolute.

"You—you don't understand," she said; "it's as much as your life is worth to have anything to do with me. You will get yourself murdered."

Dulcie bent towards him shaking fearfully.

"Granddad hit you on purpose," she added. "I saw it in his face—he was looking at you the whole of the time I danced. And after I heard him talking with Mr. Lomas—the man who shouted in front of the tent at the fair. I ought to tell you that they said, and will, though I wanted not to. They think you are dangerous in some way, and if you do not die of your wound they agreed that you should be murdered later on."

The Pistol King's granddaughter paused a moment—her self-control threatened to desert her.

"I don't know why," she continued, "but they hate you, especially Mr. Lomas. He—he is anxious to marry me, and granddad encourages him. Yet I won't, not if they kill me for it. Never mind me, Mr. Lane, you must get abroad at once, while you are safe."

Lane rose, lifting her to her feet.

"Poor child," he observed, "the Law will defend me and I will protect you. We will have Lomas gaoled and your grandfather shall meet with a worse fate. I recognised him that day as the murderer of Isaacson, the manager of the Bilboa Deep mine. He shall expiate that crime without adding another to it, as he endeavoured to do in order to annihilate my testimony—I having been the solitary witness of the deed."

Dulcie sprang off the shallow ledge of the veranda, horrified.

"No, no!" she protested; "you mustn't, you mustn't! You would have him hanged—it would be frightful. Father made me swear to stick to granddad and stand by him always, he isn't as bad as folks imagine. No, you must get abroad, that is best, and I will think of you all my life. Don't speak to me, I can't bear it!"

She put her hands to her ears and fled athwart the irregular grass plot to which she had descended. Lane followed her, but her hasty footsteps had already carried her through the distant gate into the road.

As she disappeared the foliage of a lofty oak by the garden rails began to rustle and quiver. The engineer perceived among its swaying branches a sullen visage and a stunted figure. They were those of the man he had seen proclaiming the Pistol King's ability at Steeple Garston Fair. Doubtless he had been spying upon the interview that had taken place between Eustace Lane and his colleague's granddaughter—the girl whom the former now knew that he coveted for his wife.

With a fierce effort Lane hurried down the path to the wicket by which Dulcie had made her departure. The walk was lengthy and he himself weak. He arrived at the exit to discover that both Miss Calderon and the presumed spy had vanished.

CHAPTER III.

"When Rogues Fall Out——"

"My good man, I don't want to witness his performance, I wish to learn where he lives! surely you know that much about him?"

Philip Mortimer fidgeted in a tawdry ante room at the narrow window of a provincial box-office. He had stooped, the better to peer within.

"Sorry, sir," said the attendant, "but it's quite against our rule to give artists' addresses—you can see for yourself that it wouldn't be reasonable."

His interviewer put a hand on the brass money-plate of the window, fingers down. There was a faint click, when he lifted it, a half-sovereign lay upon the metal. With a smile and a casual gesture the other party to the discussion took up the coin.

"Thank you, sir," was the recipient's brief acknowledgment. "I mustn't do as you ask, all the same. But if you were to inquire of the first barman at the 'Rainbow'—over the road—he would tell you."

The amateur diplomatist nodded, and hastened out of the music-hall. A Ralli car waited at the kerb, and in it sat Eustace Lane, composed and upright, though very pale. His friend paused at the step.

"Dropped on a trail," he said; "another moment and we shall be running it down."

He traversed the mean thoroughfare and passed in at a wide entrance under a gaudy sign.

The engineer trifled with the reins and studied a neighbouring clock. It pointed to the second quarter after one—not much time had elapsed since that pathetic parting which had been so singularly spied upon.

At last Philip Mortimer emerged from the "Rainbow," to spring into the car and shake the cob to a trot.

"Got it!" he declared; "and now, my dear Eustace, if you'll try to keep cool, we will probe this affair to its depths. You are sure that the fellow you saw descend from the tree was the same you noticed at the fair?"

"Absolutely!" assented Lane; "they had had her tracked, therefore they suspected her. If they conclude, as they will, that Dulcie has been betraying them, who can say what will happen to her? I—I dare not guess."

"Nonsense!" objected Mortimer. "Calderon is her own kith and kin—he would not have her injured."

"Let us hope not," murmured the engineer, and the palm that rested on the edge of the car clasped and unclasped in the keen agony of his suspense.

They stopped in front of a dingy lodging-house at which they alighted, and in answer to their ring a female head peered at them above a balustrade at the back of the lobby.

"We wish to see Mr. Calderon," said Eustace Lane sharply.

"On your right," responded the owner of the head, which ducked out of sight without more ado.

Lane stepped forward, taking precedence of his friend, and turned a knob at his elbow. It gave access to a bedchamber, correctly if dingily furnished. On the opposite side were folding-doors, slightly ajar, and through which there penetrated the sound of voices.

Through a crack in the door they looked into the room, which contained a table at one side, covered by the remains of a meal. Near it lounged Calderon, stirring indolently a cup of tea, and behind him, trembling and alarmed, stood Dulcie.

In the centre of the room—his legs straddling and his hands on his hips, was planted the man whom Eustace and Mortimer had seen at the fair, and whom the former had detected in the act of spying upon himself and Dulcie.

"Granddaughter or no granddaughter," they heard him say, "she's a little traitor, and I'll have her made to smart for it. The hussy! I watched her cuddle and fuss over him as if he'd been a six months' baby. The fool wanted to marry her, and she told him she wasn't fit for him. Split on both of us, she did, and warned him to do a guy while there was time."

The Pistol King stroked his moustache and whistled softly; he was a massive figure, despite his years, and not without a certain ease and grace. He threw down his spoon and turned to the girl behind his chair.

"Dulcie," he said, "is Lomas right; do you—do you care for this Mr. Lane?"

"Care for him!" put in the other: "oughtn't I to be a good judge. You don't suppose I enjoyed her little flirtation, do you?"

"I spoke to my granddaughter, Job Lomas," retorted Calderon, coldly. "Have no fear, my child," he added; "hawks don't pick out hawk's eyes—if he be your lover he is secure from me. Why should I break your heart and risk my neck to no purpose? Tell me the truth, are you fond of Lane?"

A moment Dulcie struggled with her pride and maidenly reserve. Then she hid her face and burst into tears.

"I—I have always loved him," she sobbed.

"Don't you see, Lomas," said the Pistol King. "I acted hastily in potting this fellow—he would have kept silence for Dulcie's sake, he will keep it now. No one wants to drag his sweetheart's name through the mud of a public trial, with an execution for a relative of hers at the end of it."

Job Lomas uttered a howl like that of a wild beast.

"And where do I come in?" he snarled. "She protects you from your share in our bit of business at the Bilboa Deep and I lose her. You promised me I should have her if I would leave working on the cross and take to the show racket. Well, I've done it, and I'd peach on you and knife her before I'll give her up. So have your choice between settling Lane and chucking me."

By way of lending point to his ultimatum he pulled out a dagger-knife and opened it. Calderon rose leisurely from his chair, poised the mass of wood and upholstery on high, and dashed the weapon out of the bully's hand. Job Lomas flung himself on it, caught it up, and threw the steel blade—javelin fashion—into the Pistol King's face.

It passed upwards into the left pupil, and, with a groan, the marksman toppled to the floor as Lane and Mortimer dashed in to seize and pinion his antagonist.

When they lifted up the Pistol King his jaw was set in a horrible grin—the last expression that his handsome dissipated countenance would wear on earth.

* * * * * *

Job Lomas was hanged by the public executioner in Market Garston gaol, after a trial that sorely puzzled the readers of the newspapers. But little evidence was required to convict him of murder, and Eustace Lane did his best to keep the memory of the Pistol King unsullied by the exposure which he had so richly deserved. For Dulcie Calderon was then the guest of Mrs. Philip Mortimer, and his betrothed. Besides, he could not help a feeling of tolerance for the rogue who had so calmly attempted his life in an inspiration of diabolical craftiness, and afterwards granted it as calmly to the tears of a woman

A RUINED INVENTION.

Mr. Bugge, who styled himself on his cards "Inventor," hurried from the backyard into the kitchen, where his wife was just washing up the dishes from breakfast.

"Where is that file?" he asked hurriedly of his wife, as he looked nervously in several directions.

"What file?" she asked, putting her arms akimbo and still holding the dish-cloth in her hand.

"Why, the file I was using a couple of days ago and hid down here somewhere. If I can get that coupling made a little stronger this thing is going to work and then Hooray! Farewell to poverty!"

His wife looked steadily at him and the suspicion of a sneer was on her face. Then she threw the dish-cloth on the table, and began as follows:

"Look here, Bugge, I'm getting pretty well tired out with this silly nonsense. You call yourself an inventor, and what in the world have you ever invented, I'd like to know? You run round the house like something crazy and look wild-eyed enough to be put in a cage, and yet there is never a farthing coming from any your 'inventions,' and, for my part, I declare I think I've married a maniac." This last remark was accompanied by a stamp of the foot.

"Oh! now, come, dear," said the busy Mr. Bugge; "don't talk like that. You know that I'm working hard on this machine, and you must realise that I've got too much sense to get to work on a thing unless there is big money in it. Now, let me describe it to you. Here is a locomotive in these days going along at comparatively a snail's pace, puffing and blowing, throwing out cinders and smoke, endangering the crops in its path and ruining the clothes of the passengers it is drawing.

"Now look at my liquid air locomotive with its millions of horsepower, its unlimited speed, its absolute cleanliness and its minimum of danger. Just think of speeding along at the rate of 600 miles an hour instead of sixty. Then, my dear, but painfully obtuse Mrs. Bugge, think of the day when your dear husband, whom you now so cruelly characterise as a maniac, becomes chairman of the Liquid Air Transportation and Railroad Company. Think of the magnificent private car in which we will tour this great and beautiful land! Let yourself be wafted mentally into the luxurious and palatial private offices which will be erected for my sole occupancy. Think——"

The front door bell rang, and the wife hastened to see who was at the door. She returned in a moment, with a slip of paper in her hand and a gleam of triumph in her eye.

"Look here!" she said, coming up close to Mr. Bugge, and holding the paper before his eyes, "look at that bill from the grocer's, and we can't get another thing until it is paid! Look at it!—look at it, will you, and then tell me about your gorgeous offices and your private car. You had better get into somebody else's private office and push a pen for awhile, even if it's only a pound a week you make, instead of depending on the poor little bit that I have to feed you and keep you throwing away your time on such drivelling foolishness as you've just been telling me about. Now, if you want any dinner you drop that lot of trash out there and get your other things on. Then you march yourself down to the centre of the city and look up some of the situations that are advertised in the morning paper.

"That child," continued Mrs. Bugge, warming up to the subject, "wants a new pair of shoes, and its poor little feet are on the ground. And yet, there you stand and trifle away your time. You never think of doing a hand's turn that would bring you in a few shillings."

"But, my dear," began the inventor, when he was interrupted by his wife.

"No, I am not your dear, unless it's your dear slave, who works her hands off for you and who scrubs and cleans and mends to keep the things from falling apart. Don't talk to me—I'm a slave, that's what I am."

"But, Mrs. Bugge," remonstrated the inventor in a tender tone, "just have a little more patience. I know you have a great burden on your shoulders with these household duties, and I know that you are rarely able to get out of the house; but just wait and some of these fine days—only a little while away now—I'll be able to give you the finest of dresses, the most expensive of bonnets; you shall ride in your own carriage, and the little one will have a dozen pairs of shoes if necessary."

"I wish I could believe you," said the wife doubtingly. "Well, I might just as well keep it up a little longer, but I feel in my bones that your wasting you're time, and that all this is foolishness."

"Indeed, it's not foolishness."

"I say it is," said Mrs. Bugge, getting back to her original temper rapidly; "and I won't stand it. You've got to go to work, and that mighty quick."

"But let me finish my liquid air engine," protested Mr. Bugge, meekly.

"Let you finish it!" shouted Mrs. Bugge, loudly. "I'm the one to do that. I'm tired of all this foolishness and nonsense, and now you've got to go to work. Watch me while I finish your liquid air engine, or whatever it is."

So saying, Mrs. Bugge went to the coal-hole and secured the hammer. Then she rushed into the old stable that her husband used as his workroom. There on the floor stood the invention, nearly all put together. Mrs. Bugge raised the hammer and let it fall, while her husband tremblingly watched her through the half-open door. One blow broke through a bar of metal and caused the top to fall off, and the second rap threw bits of the liquid air engine in every direction. As she struck the last blow and completed the wreck, she turned and saw her husband, but as he was no match for her at any time, and certainly not when she had a hammer in her hand, he fled.

"You'd better run!" she called after him. Mr. Bugge redoubled his pace.

"Don't you come back here till you've got a job!" was the last thing the inventor heard as he scaled the front railing of the house.

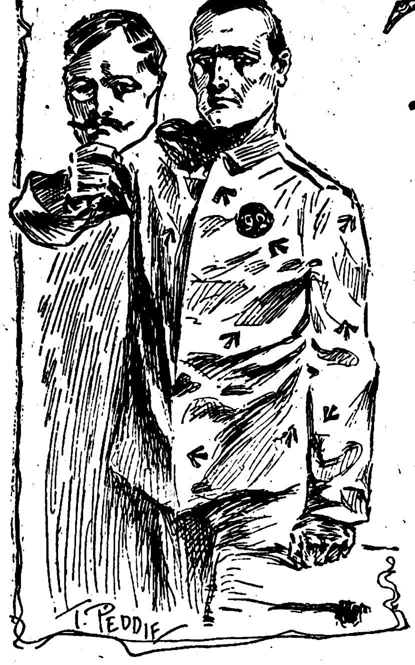
DEAD TO THE WORLD



By

Henry T. Johnson.

Author of "Cruce Vincit," "The Pride of the Ring," etc., etc.

PRINCIPAL CHARACTERS.

Richard Seldon (Tiger Dick), an escaped convict who murders and then impersonates Cyril Roylance, of Fallowfield Hall.

Harcourt Dale, a near neighbour of Roylance.

Doris Dale, his daughter.

Jack Branscombe, a young farmer, in love with Doris.

Inspector Rossiter, a detective from Scotland Yard.

Rev. Gerald Hastie, curate of Fallowfield.

James and Joseph Nubbley, two brothers living in a cottage near the school at Fallowfield; they are known to Seldon.

Miss Morrison, the schoolmistress.

THE THREAD OF THE STORY.

Seldon, aided by two friends, also ex-convicts, murders Barker, the Dale's butler, but the guilt of his death is fixed by circumstantial evidence on Jack Branscombe. He then organises a series of robberies at the principal houses in the neighbourhood of Fallowfield Hall. Branscombe is hidden by Doris in a secret chamber at Dalehurst Grange.

CHAPTER XVII. (continued.)

"I know—I know, I've thought of all that," said Doris. "What, what else is to be done, what alternative is there other than rushing headlong into the trap, into that trap whose jaws are set with prison locks and prison bars?"

"Too true," replied Gerald Hastie, "and we must think it out. But there's one thing certain, you mustn't run the risk you've taken any longer."

"But who else is there to dare anything for him but I, who love him? All his friends have turned against him."

"No, not all, I haven't."

"But what can you do, Gerry?"

"I think I can face danger as well as a girl. The harboring of suspected criminals is not quite in my line, but the charity that thinketh no evil is, and I cannot, will not, think evil of Jack Branscombe. So this is my plan, Doris. You must see to-night that the coast is clear, and just about midnight Jack must get away from the Grange and make his way across the fields to my cottage. I'll be his custodian, there'll be less danger, and what danger there is will be faced by a man instead of by a girl."

"Oh, Gerry, Gerry, you're arguing just as he argued. It makes him mad to think of me running the risk; he wants to go straight out into the world and face it. I wouldn't hear of his plan, but I will listen to yours, because I think there's safety in it."

"And now, Doris, put me down. My way lies towards yonder cottages. By Jove! Doris, I always knew you were a brick; now, my girl, I know you for a heroine."

He alighted from the basket chaise and made his way down a side lane on a visit to some cottages. And Doris, waking her pony into a trot, proceeded along the hedgelined lane. And from the further side of one of those hedgerows a man, whose crouched form had been silently stealing along level with that pony chaise, stood still, and, pushing aside his tweed cap, scratched his head.

"Eh! but this is a rum start," soliloquised Ned Fletcher. "Dang me, there's a bit o' sport in this. Man alive! I've been used to a bit of hidin' mysen in bracken, and in ditches, and in boughs. I've been in hidin' for my liberty, but never for my life. I'll not give the game away, twouldna be sport to do so, but dang me! if I don't tell the squire—'twill amuse him."

CHAPTER XVIII.

"Mr. Rossiter Receives a Message."

Thanks, possibly, to that abnormal thickness of skull with which his intimates generously credited him, Morgan Chandler, some sixteen hours after the receipt of those two merciless head blows, was in a fair way of recovering from them. He had regained consciousness for some hours, and the doctor had scouted any apprehension of brain trouble, he also alleging the disproportionate density of the casket in relation to what it contained. The first to hint at such trouble was Chandler's master, and what suggested it to him was the injured man's persistency that Jack Branscombe was his assailant, whereas, as a matter of fact, his master knew better. Further questioned as to the identity of the other of his assailants, Morgan Chandler mysteriously hinted that it was someone who owed him a grudge, someone whose line of business led him to be abroad o' nights. No, he would name no names at present, but there would come a time when squire would see how he had been misled and the sort of party he'd put his trust in."

"Very well, Chandler," said the Squire, "keep quiet and don't worry, and when you're quite well you and I will have a long field day on the estate accounts."

And then Chandler hastily and emphatically clapped his hands to his head and vowed that he was suffering from concussion of the brain, and that it would be days, perhaps weeks, before he was able to bring his mind to figures.

"And how long, Squire, do you think 'twill be before they collar that murdering young villain?"

"I can't say, Chandler, but you must make haste and get well so that you can give evidence against him."

"Ah, I'd like to be doing that," said Chandler; and the Squire, leaving the sick man's room, hummed softly to himself:

"Not the least doubt of it, Mr. Chandler; you'd like to see him in the dock and give evidence against him to avert the possibility of his doing so against you," and going direct to his land steward's office in the eastern wing he once again went through various ledgers and day books and compared the accounts posted with the vouchers on various files.

"You've been playing a tall game, Mr. Chandler, and for pretty big stakes! I wonder you haven't feathered your nest better. I wonder what you have done with all the money. It hasn't gone on the gee-gees, no, nor the cards—that sort of investment's too solid for you, my friend; these bundles of correspondence point to riskier gambling. The bucket shopkeeper, not the 'booky,' has benefited by your picking and stealing. You've dabbled in differences instead of S.P., but they're very much alike underneath, the grain runs very much the same only there's some variety in the veneer."

Forraging through account books, invoices, vouchers, and schedules, he came again and again upon discrepancies, suspicious erasures, and other evidences pointing unmistakably to fraud and embezzlement on a huge and systematic scale.

"I've got him set," he muttered. "There's enough here to clap the handcuffs on him, and yet, though I must get rid of him, that isn't the wisest way. I've been quite close enough in touch with magistrates, detectives, and constables of late, too close for my liking, too close to be safe; the fox may sometimes be safe close to the kennels, but he doesn't talk to the hounds. No, Richard, you must clear this fellow out, but not that way."

"Mr. Rossiter, sir," said the servant.

"Oh, yes, I'd almost forgotten," and he hastened to the handsome reception hall, glorious with skin rugs, mammoth vases, antlers' horns, spears, battle axes, and other trophies of sport and battle, and greeted his guest cordially, like, as that guest remarked later on, "one of the right sort."

"And real swell as he is," Mr. Rossiter declared next morning, "he made me feel just as comfortable and at home as if we'd been pals all our lives. And, my! he knows how to put a dinner on. Yes, he can do himself very well, Mr. Cyril Roylance can, if he has lived the best part of his life up country in Australia. Ah! that port of his! It'll always be one of my most exquisite memories!"

"Well, any news?" said the Squire, tucking his serviette inside his collar, preparatory to attacking the turtle soup.

"Well nothing particular at present, sir; at least, nothing I can say much about."

For it was Mr. Rossiter's way to be mysteriously reticent—when he had nothing to report.

"Try a little milk punch," said the host, and the guest complied without a murmur.

"What do you make of Chandler's story?" inquired the host.

"Simply confirms what I've said all along," replied the guest, "young Branscombe's in it."

"But he's the last fellow in the world one would have thought so desperate. You'll try the suprême de sole à la Morney?" Then to the servant, "The Hochheimer to Mr. Rossiter."

"Well, you know, sir, in my line of business it ain't so extraordinary perhaps to meet with people that lead double lives as it would be in yours. Excuse me making the remark, Mr. Roylance, but this hock is a wine; I'm very partial to a hock."

"You're naturally a good judge. A keen brain and a keen palate very often go together, Mr. Rossiter. So you credit Chandler's story, and you don't think the shock of the affair has at all unhinged him?"

"I'm certain that Jack Branscombe was in your house last night, I'm certain he's hiding somewhere in this district. I can't say I've got a tangible clue yet, but I think I'm getting warm. He's a desperate villain. I don't despair of clapping the bracelets on him yet."

"Here's to your success," said the other. "Here come the capons, and, take my advice, try a glass of champagne over a slice of this York ham. What line did you say you were going on?"

"It's really a pleasure to talk to you, Mr. Roylance, you're so appreciative. Well, I'm going on this. It's pretty clear one of Branscombe's gang means giving him away."

A servant entered, handed the Squire a slip of paper. He glanced at the name, and said:

"I will be down in a moment." Then to his guest: "I say, Rossiter, you won't mind excusing me for just a few minutes, one of my hands wants to see me on an urgent estate matter?"

"By all means, Mr. Roylance. I like it all the better you not standing on ceremony with me, puts me more at ease, sir, having regard to our respective positions; and business is business, sir, and has to be attended to whether it's my business or your business."

"You're a very kind and sensible fellow as well as a clever one, and, remember, the wine's with you."

Mr. Rossiter, settling himself down again into his seat as the door closed behind his host, beamed as one at peace with all the world, and, smacking his lips, remarked:

"Mr. Roylance, you're right, the wine is with me, likewise, I'm with the wine."

"Now, Fletcher, what's this mysterious message?" said the Squire, walking into the little ante-room of the library which he used as a sanctum. "You surely haven't brought me down from my dinner table on a trifling matter?"

"No fear, Squire," said the other. "I think thee'll say so when I've done."

"Well, cut it short; cut the cackle and get to the horses."

"Which it weren't a horse, Squire, it were a pony."

"Oh, rats! Mine's only a figure of speech. You haven't come to me at my dinner time to bother me about people's ponies. Come, man, the yarn."

"I was saying, sir, it were a pony."

"Oh!"

"Miss Dale's pony."

"Whew! What?"

"Her was driving it in the chaise along the road; t'young apprentice parson chap were walking along; he'd come from the school-house; they say he be courtin' the mistress."

Another whistle from the Squire of Fallowfield.

"Miss Doris asked him to take a seat aside her, and I trudges along t'other side o' the hedge; 'tis a way I've got, you know, Squire, born of my business, of trudgin' along under the lee of a hedge with my head down and my feet never crackin' a twig."

"Very useful habit, Fletcher, for keepers—or people who are keeping out of the way of keepers."

"Eh! t'Squire, 'ee will have his joke. I'll admit I've found useful as a keeper what I learnt afore I was a keeper. And as they talked I listened."

"And what did you learn?"

"I larnt where young Mr. Branscombe's a hidin'."

"You did! Tell me. The reward shall be yours if he's nailed."

"I weren't thinkin' about the reward, Squire, somehow reward don't come into my mind when it's a question o' servin' you, as kept me from bein' turned out on the roadside and give me honest work."

There was a strange look in the Squire of Fallowfield's face.

"By Gad!" he whispered, "if this man knew to whom he was talking! Knew me for what I am! Perhaps if I'd met more like him in other days I might have been different."

"I was thinkin', Squire, of you and young Branscombe fightin' it out for the same lady, beggin' pardon for makin' so bold, and like the mouse that helped the lion I thought I'd jump at the chance o' helpin' the gentleman that helped me. He's hidin' somewhere in Dalehurst Grange."

"Dalehurst Grange! Impossible, man!"

"Nay, sir; 'tis a queer old place, the Grange. Parties comes down from Lunnon at times to paint it and photygraph it. It's been writ about in books and in history. There's been strange things done theer in bygone times, duels fought, aye! and, years ago, I've heerd say one lot of soldiers stormed it and fought right well with another lot as held it. 'Tis honeycombed with underground passages, and they say there's strange recesses in some of the galleries, hid with sliding panels. Anyway, with her own lips I heard Miss Dale tell the parson's apprentice she had Branscombe in hiding there, and I heard him and her arrange he was to leave there at midnight by the lych gate in what they call Lone Lad's Lane, and make his way 'cross country to where the parson's apprentice lodges," and Ned Fletcher told to his now by no means impatient listener all that he had heard in the ambush of the hedgerow; then prepared to depart, when the other stopped him, and, seating himself at a table, took up a pen and a sheet of notepaper. Then he paused.

"No, it won't do to write on this heading, nor yet on a water mark that he can recognise," he muttered. Then he rummaged in his waste paper basket, picked out a circular, tore off the clean sheet, scribbled a few lines, and folded it into slip note form.

"Now, Fletcher," he said, "here's a sovereign for what you've done, and here's a sovereign for what you've got to do. Take this to Stonecrop Cottage, where Detective Inspector Rossiter lodges, and slip it under the door."

"But, Squire, they told me as Mr. Rossiter were here."

"Don't you know," the other exclaimed, with that black scowl for which Fletcher had so wholesome a respect settling on his face, "that I employ you to carry out my orders, not to question them."

"Beg pardon, sir," and Fletcher, with a tug at his forelock, departed to obey the bidding of the one man in the world for whom he cared two straws.

It was a beautiful moonlight night: indeed, at times it seemed to Detective Inspector Rossiter, as he spun along in the Squire's dogcart on his homeward way, that two moons or even more were shining.

"By George!" he soliloquised, "I've enjoyed my evening. Talk aboura a host! Talk aboura dinner! That sherry with the hors d'œuvres! And that Beaune! and the champagne too," and he gently carolled:

"Glorious drink is good champagne."

"But of all the wines in the world that port of his! And there a case of it gone up to my little digs. in town, that will make 'em open their eyes, some of 'em." Then gravely: "I say, coachman, you bear this in mind, you're a younger man than I am, and you may think of my words in years to come when I'm away, p'raps, far, far away; you've got a real good guv'nor, as good as they make 'em, and don't you forget it, and don't you ever leave him. Hullo, here we are, Cronestop Cottage, I mean to say Sonecrops Scottage. What do you mean, mind the step?"

"I only mean, sir, it's a bit of a way down from the cart, and it's a very little 'un. No offence, sir."

"Course not! Good night, coachman. Here's half-a-crown, and mind what I told you. Good night—mind the step indeed!" he muttered as he felt his way by the palings to the cottage door, took out his latch-key, and entered.

What was that white patch on the sanded red tiles? He picked it up and took it into the little sitting room and placed it beside the lamp, open and perused it, then swiftly he tore off his coat, waistcoat, collar, and necktie, rushed into his bedroom, filled the tin bath, plunged head and shoulders into it, rubbed himself dry quickly and vigorously.

"By George! if I'd only kept the cart waiting! No, perhaps it would be best afoot. He took from a cabinet a small phial, poured three drops into a tumbler of water, which clouded and curdled in an instant, drank it off at a draught, and in a moment was a sober man. Once again he perused these lines:

"Watch for Jack Branscombe along Lone Lads Lane from twelve to half-past, midnight."

"I've just got time to get there if I start now, but if I wait to get assistance I may miss him. I'll go now, I'll tackle him single-handed. I never saw the man yet I couldn't—except Dick Seldon, and he's dead. I knew—I knew there was a split in the camp, and that split in their camp is going to win me the battle."

CHAPTER XIX.

A Chase—And a Check!

Once again he went out into the moonlight and made his way by devious ways towards Dalehurst. At last he

REMINISCENCES OF THE CRIMEAN WAR,

Mr. Samuel Olsen, of 500 Slade Road, Stockland Green, Erdington, near Birmingham, has now reached the advanced age of 69 years. He can remember well the Crimean War, and has many very interesting reminiscences of that period, but he cannot remember any intervening time when he could say he was in good health, or even that he felt well, until Chas. Forde's Bile Beans for Biliousness restored his long lost health. Speaking the other day to a Birmingham Telegram reporter, Mr. Olsen said:—"For the past 38 years I have suffered from constipation, and during that time have never known what it was to feel well. I could scarcely eat my food, and never had any relish for it. Then I continually had headaches, while the pains in my side and stomach were almost unbearable. At times I got very low and despondent, feeling my life to be a perfect misery. I tried a number of doctors, and took all sorts of patent medicines, but neither doctors nor medicines ever did me any permanent good until I tried Chas. Forde's Bile Beans for Biliousness. I saw them advertised in the papers and decided to give them a trial. Almost immediately after beginning with them I felt a little better. That made me hopeful and I persevered with them, with the result that I can now eat my food with relish, and am better in every way. I used to always feel tired at night and thoroughly exhausted in the morning. In fact, I cannot remember the day when I did not come home and have to go to sleep. Now I can get up at five o'clock in the morning, and feel fresh and well throughout the whole day. Formerly I could scarcely walk from Newhall Street to John Bright Street (about half a mile). Last Monday I was out walking for three hours and a half and did not feel any the worse for it. I am recommending Bile Beans to all my friends. My wife has also taken them for indigestion and spasms, and has received great benefit from them."

Without doubt constipation is the source of manifold ailments. For this disorder, for blood impurities, pimples, and face sores—which are often a direct result of it—for indigestion, anæmia, liver and kidney disorders, headache, colds, chill, debility, nervousness, female ailments, pains in the chest, buzzing in the head, rheumatism, and as a restorative after influenza, Chas. Forde's Bile Beans for Biliousness are unequalled. All chemists stock them, or you may obtain direct from the Bile Bean Manufacturing Co., 119 and 120 London Wall, London, E.C., by sending prices, one and three halfpence or two and ninepence per box. Bile Beans are sold only in sealed boxes; never loose.

FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.

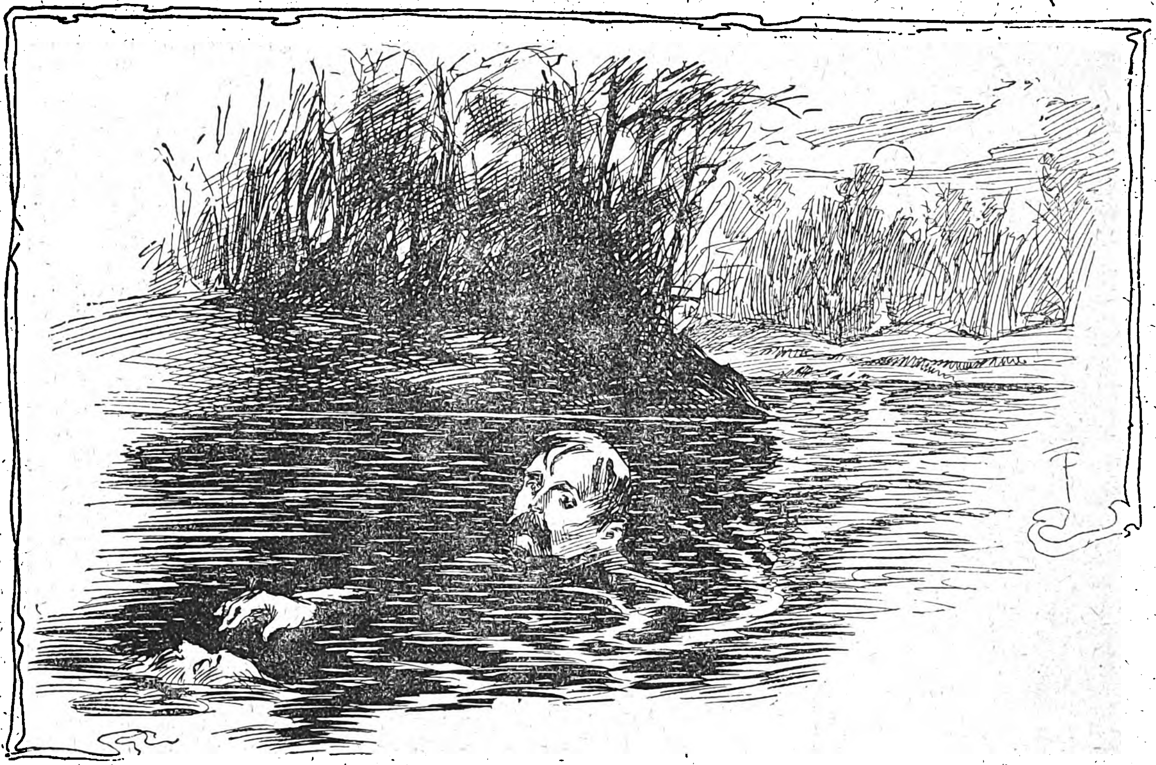
reached a fir plantation bordering upon Lone Lads Lane and crept through it in spite of undergrowth and bracken, till, somewhat scratched and torn, he reached the five-barred gate leading to the road.

"To think I should have been away from the cottage to-night," he soliloquised, "of all nights in the year. Oh! I'd have given anything, I'd have missed anything, even the Squire's port, to have been at my place when that letter came. If I'd only heard a footstep along the garden, heard it being pushed under the door, I might have had two birds, and now"—he looked at his watch, "I shall have to be smart or I may not secure even one."



A few swift strokes, and just as that mass was sinking 'neath the tide he caught it.

At last he emerged out of the inky darkness of the trees and undergrowth into a clearing, and, beyond a small patch of sward, there was a five-barred gate leading into Lone Lads Lane. His heart gave a great leap, he was just in time, for there in the moonlight he saw stealing along close to the opposite bank of the road a crouching form, clad in a closely-buttoned ulster and a peak cap, pulled close down, hid his features; whoever it might be, whether it was Jack Branscombe or not, it was undoubtedly the form of the man whose description had been sent from Mattingham—it was the man he wanted. Taking a swift run, he vaulted the five-barred gate, sprang into the road, and shouted:

"Stop! I command you to stop. You are John Branscombe, and you are my prisoner!"

He made a rush towards his quarry, sprang upon him, and the man he challenged, turning swiftly round to face him, they closed.

"You are my prisoner," he repeated.

"Not yet!" exclaimed the other, and as they swung round in their struggle the light fell on the other man's face, and Rossiter, recognising the features, knew that it was indeed John Branscombe that he held.

"I tell you again, you've got to come with me."

"No, no!," the other replied. "If I come with you you've to take me. Let me go—I tell you I'm innocent, I swear I am innocent, and I will not be taken. I'll prove my innocence first, then I'll surrender."

"You'll surrender now. Cease struggling, I mean to take you!"

"No, I tell you I'll not be taken alive."

"Then, by heaven! I'll take you dead!"

The grips loosened from each other's biceps, each pressing forward, their hands met and locked behind each other's shoulders, and swiftly, suddenly, Jack Branscombe swung his would-be captor from his feet, swirled him round, doubled himself as it were beneath him, and, with a swing, sent him over his shoulders, and Rossiter crashed with all his weight into the road, while the man who had escaped him set off at full speed.

But Rossiter was a brave man and, scrambling to his feet, he set off after the other, followed him along the lane, through the gap in the hedge, across the grass meadows, and, breathless as he was, a great shout escaped him, a shout of exultation. Yes! he had him now, there in the moonlight, just as he reached the top of the swell in the meadow, he beheld the gleaming of the silver ribbon of river right ahead of his quarry. Surely that would stop him, for the channel was deep and the current notoriously swift and strong.

Jack Branscombe pressed on and on, reached the sedgy margin of the swirling waters, there was a splash, and he had disappeared beneath them and presently had come up again to the surface and was striking out with all his strength for the opposite bank.

But Rossiter, racing up, was not to be denied. He too plunged into the ice-cold racing stream. He too struck out, and by the time the man he chased had reached the opposite bank he had reached the centre. And then, suddenly, a cry escaped him as he felt the icy chill strike upon his heart and brain, as well as on his limbs like a knife! Cramp, like iron shackles, held his bent elbows to his side. He spun round in the swirling torrent, and his face gleamed white and deathly in the cold, blue moonlight as, ceasing swimming, he was born along by that fierce, full-flowing tide.

Jack Branscombe, hearing that cry, paused half-way up the bank and looked back at his pursuer, listened to his despairing cry. "He's done—he's drowning," he muttered. "And he's a man, he's threatened my liberty, striving to drag me to an unjust doom; but he was only doing his duty, he doesn't know, but God knows all, and in God's sight I shall be indeed a murderer if I speed hence and let him die!"

And, brave, true man as he was, forgetting all except that his fellow man was vainly struggling there in peril, he rushed along the bank till he had overtaken that helpless form born by the rushing stream, then plunged in. A few swift strokes, and just as that mass was sinking 'neath the tide, he caught it, clutched the drowning man, lifted his face above the waters, and now pushing, now dragging, striking now with this arm, now with that, but always with those legs of iron muscles, he got him to the side, dragged him out, sat him on the bank, undid his collar, and taking a flask from his pocket put it to his lips.

A little while and Rossiter's eyes opened; a big shiver ran through his frame.

"It's you—you who saved me?" he murmured. "You, I was trying to drag to prison, perhaps to the gallows."

"Yes, I saved you. I swam back and risked being taken because I wouldn't let you drown. Listen, man, you were only doing your duty, but man to man, do you think that the man who did what I did could be a murderer?"

"By heaven, I can't think it!"

"Or a liar?"

"Too big a man to be a liar."

"Well, then I'll tell you. I, who have risked what I have to save you, I tell you on my word of honour I am innocent."

"Yes, yes, but innocent or not, get you gone—get you gone before my strength comes back. Oh, man! get clear away; duty's duty, but heaven send it mayn't be mine to clap the irons on those strong wrists that held me above that ice-cold cruel tide."

And with a gulp in his voice he watched the man he had pursued plunge once again into those black and swirling waters, watched him with strained eyes clamber out on the other side, then, turning round, he threw himself full length in the grass, hiding his face in his folded arms.

"No, no!" he murmured. "I'm done—I'm done—I'm too dead beat to follow, too dead beat to even watch which way he goes."

HIS REVENGE.

"Ha! you refuse me, do you, Miss Hamtagg?"

"I do, Mr. McStab," said the young lady, coldly.

"Then listen to me, Rachel Plickergy Hamtagg!" he hissed. "I swear you shall bitterly repent it!"

Wild whistled the bleak wind. Dismally moaned the huge elm tree that rasped and scratched itself against the cruel edges of the tiles on the cornice, and gruesomely groaned Algernon Fitz-Thompson MacStab, as he stole forth in the dead of night to the ancestral smoke-house in the back yard.

"I'll show her!" he muttered between his teeth.

From beneath his coat he drew a compact bundle of letters, cut the string that bound them together, struck a match, made a bonfire of the collection, and watched them slowly consume to ashes.

He was burning letters written in happier days to Rachel Hamtagg. She had returned them to him.

"This is so sudden," said the widow, blushingly, "and so unexpected. I—I thought your visits to our house were for the purpose of seeing my daughter."

"She is too young," replied the visitor decidedly. "I told her so last evening. We parted in a friendly spirit but I gave her to understand as delicately as I could that I should not call to see her any more. This is sudden, it is true, but I trust none the less agreeable. May I not venture to hope?"

"Why, sir, I——"

"And now, my dear," he said, at the expiration of a happy half-hour, as he gently lifted her head from his shoulder, "I should like to see your—or perhaps I ought now to say our—daughter, to tell her of this happy event."

"Shall I call her?"

"If you please, my dear."

"Rachel," said Algernon Fitz-Thompson McStab, pleasantly, "you will be glad to know, I dare say, that I am to be your father. You may go, Rachel. Please close the door, my child, as you go out."

He: "Do you like animals?" She: "Would you feel flattered if I said yes?"

Mr. Jones: "Madame, let me tell you that facts are stubborn things." "What a fact you must be," replied his wife.

"You say that you saw that chicken killed?" "Yes sir." "Then you must be a good deal older than you look."

Tourist (to yokel): "Can you tell me if I shall pass the 'Red Lion' on my way to Ashcombe?" Yokel: "Well—er—you might, but I shouldn't."

Rev. Mr. Arlington: "You should always be particular about details, Miss Tucker. It is the little things that tell." Nellie: "I know that. I have three small sisters."

"Jimmy, my child," the fond mother exclaimed, "don't eat so much of that lobster salad. You'll be ill to-night." "Well, ma, if I am you'll know what's the matter with me, anyhow."

"What on earth are you engaged to three men for?" said Blanche to Sue. "You can't marry them all." "No," replied Sue, "but by working up a little competition among them I can probably induce one or the other to hurry up and earn enough to marry on."

Vogeler's Cures

Mr. GEO. R. SIMS'
HAIR RENEWER.

Called by him "TATCHO."
(Romany: "GENUINE," "GOOD," "TRUE.")

And why, pray, is the successful poet, playwright, and journalist an eminent authority on hair restorer? Eager for an explanation, a Daily Mail representative sought out Mr. Sims. . . .

Now Mr. G. R. Sims, as many people know, is one of the busiest men in the kingdom, but hastily affixing his signature to a letter, he looked up and extended a characteristically cordial welcome. Then he said: "I will explain. I found that I was rapidly going bald. Not seriously, you understand, but the thinning out was sufficiently marked to set me thinking out a remedy. I went to two specialists, both of whom cheerfully assured me that I should be absolutely bald in two years.

"Then I discovered the preparation which is now placed upon the market. I found that I had hit upon a remedy capable of working wonders. Look at my hair now, isn't that convincing evidence of the value of my preparation.

"Ladies confirm my good opinion of it as a dressing for daily use. Mrs. Brown Potter, whose beautiful hair is the admiration of the entire lady world, writes that she uses nothing but 'Tatcho.' There is nothing to prevent every woman from making her hair silken in texture and bountiful in volume, for she can obtain a bottle of 'Tatcho' now in every town or even village."

In order that the public may be able to test the superlative value of Mr. Geo. R. Sims' discovery, the Company is issuing large 4/6 size test bottles post free for 1/10, under plain cover, one of which may be had on application. Please cut off the corner of this advertisement where marked, and send with name and address, legibly written, to the—

Short Stories That . . . . . . Make You Laugh.

We devote every week space in Short Stories to pithy, humorous anecdotes similar to those which appear in these columns. To those readers who submit storyettes which are used, a six shilling novel will be awarded. The anecdotes may be either original or selected; in the latter case, the source MUST be stated. Attempts must reach the Storyette Editor, Short Stories Office, Henrietta Street, Strand, London, W.C., by Monday, December 2nd. Post-cards only, please. The prize of £1 1s. for the best storyette published this week has been won by Mr. D. O. Jenkins, of 18 Windsor Street, Trecynon, Aberdare, whose contribution is denoted by an asterisk thus.*

His Trouble was Different.

"COME, old man," said the kind friend, "cheer up, there are others." "I don't mind her breaking the engagement so very much," said the despondent young man. "But to think that I have to go on paying the instalments on the ring for a year to come yet. That is what hurts me."

He Couldn't Bring it.*

A LITTLE boy went to a school for the first time at the age of six. On entering the school the master took out a book to enter new scholars' names and addresses. When the boy was asked the number on the door of his home he didn't know, so he was told to bring it next day. On entering the next day he was asked if he had brought it. The boy replied: "No, sir, it was nailed too tight to the door."

He Missed His First.

A SPEECH which had a pathetic as well as an amusing side is said to have been made by an old "down South" farmer on the occasion of his second wedding. "Neighbours," said he to those who had witnessed the simple ceremony, "you all know this good friend that's consented to marry me is something of a stranger in our town. Now, I feel kind of insufficient, being only a man, to make her acquainted with everybody as quick as I'd like to, so I'm a-going to depend on you women folk," he added, with a confiding smile at the members of the gentle sex, "to make her feel at home among us, just as my first wife would do if she was here to-day. I miss her consid'rable all the time, but more'n usual on an occasion like this."

An Enthusiastic Engine-driver.

I HEARD the other day of an engine-driver, employed on a little out-of-the-way line, who was exceedingly fond of football. One afternoon, the signals being against him, he pulled his train up, and then found that two schools were playing a match in the field just in front of him. The engine-driver was so intent on watching the game that he forgot all about the signal, and so did not see that it had been put down. A fussy old gentleman in the train, however, noticed that the signal was down, and called to the guard to know why the train was at a standstill. The guard went to the engine-driver. "What are you up to, Bill? Can't you see the signal down?" "Is it?" said the engine-driver, without looking up; "then you go and tell the chap in the box to shove it up again. I'm going to see this match out!"

The Sailor and his Watch.

"PAPA," said a little boy to his father, "are not sailors very small men?" "No, my dear. What gave you such an idea? Some sailors are very large and powerful men. What makes you think they are small?" "Because," said the little fellow, "I read the other day of a sailor going to sleep on his watch."

He Waited for Instructions.

A FEW years ago the native station-master of an out-of-the-way railway-station in India was suddenly attacked by a fierce man-eating tiger, made bold through hunger. The startled assistant immediately rushed to the telegraph office, and wired to the European station-master at the next place on the line as follows: "Tiger on platform, eating station-master. Please wire instructions."

They Followed Precedent.

A VISITOR from another town had been invited to address the village Sunday-school. "I am reminded, children," he said, "of the career of a boy who was once no larger than some of the little fellows I see before me. He played truant when he was sent to school, went fishing every Sunday, ran away from home when he was ten years old, learnt to drink, smoke tobacco, and play cards. He went into bad company, frequented stables and low tap-rooms, finally became a pick-pocket, then a forger, and one day, in a fit of drunkenness, he committed a cowardly murder! Children," he continued, impressively, "where do you think that boy is now?" "He stands before us!" cried the children, as with one voice.

Nursing His Fame.

IN a certain skirmish an officer got a slight scratch on his leg. The wound was a matter of great glory to him, and he nursed it through after days, growing lamer with every fear that the memory of his bravery might pass out of mind. One day, late in life, as he sat nursing his leg and pondering the glorious past, a young man, visiting the family for the first time, approached and sympathetically remarked, "Lame, Colonel?" "Yes, sir," after a pause, and with inexpressible solemnity; "I am lame." "Been riding, sir?" "No,"—with rebuking sternness—"I have not been riding." "Ah, slipped down on the pavement?" "No, sir," with actual ferocity. "Perhaps, then, you have sprained your ankle, sir?" With painful slowness the old man lifted his pet leg in both hands, set it carefully on the floor, rose slowly from his chair, and, looking down upon the unfortunate youth with mingled pity and wrath, burst forth in the sublimity of rage, "Go and read the history of your country, you confounded young puppy!"

ADVICE TO READERS ON VARIOUS MATTERS.

(Replies to Correspondents.)

"J. R." has been told that there is a dandy fish, so-called because it dresses itself up in some peculiar fashion in seaweed, and he wishes to know if this is so.

I do not find that there is any fish of that name. What "J. R." is probably thinking of is the "swell fish," so named, not because of the manner in which it entwines itself in seaweed, but because it is capable of inflating itself like a ball by swallowing air. Numerous specimens are to be found in the seas of most parts of the world.

"M. S." asks: "What is the steepest incline a man can walk up unaided by his hands?"

This depends entirely upon the surface of the incline, and upon the fact whether the man is barefooted or wearing boots. Under ordinary circumstances, however—that is to say, a man fully clothed, going up a macadam road—an angle of about fifty degrees is about as much as he can manage.

"Y. O."—The largest combs built by bees are to be found in India; they are as large as the door of an ordinary house. They hang from the branches of trees and from projecting ledges of rock. Bee-hunting is a profession in India, and the hunters are very clever. The usual method is to ascend the tree and get above the comb, then lower a stick, with a bunch of ignited leaves at the end, under the busy creatures, who are soon driven away by the smoke. The hunters pass ropes round the comb, cut it away from the limb from which it depends, and lower the comb to the ground. Vast quantities of honey and wax are obtained in this way.

"H. L. U." asks: "Will the hide of a cow or the hide of a horse yield the most leather?"

To the uninitiated it would certainly appear that the horse, being the larger animal, would produce the most leather, but this is not the case. From an average cow's hide thirty-five pounds of leather can be obtained, while the hide of a horse is only good for half as much. Comparatively speaking, the horse is exceedingly thin-skinned, while a cow is as tough in its natural outer covering as it is in its restaurant steaks, if such a thing be possible.

"SECOND."—Your question is one which is received very often at this office, and should anything happen to prevent its arriving on any day, the members of the staff are almost as much depressed as if they had lost a dear relative. Here is the answer again, and really for the last time. Two balls, one of wood and one of lead, and of unequal weight, dropped from the top of a tower at the same time, will reach the ground at the same instant. The reason for this is that the resistance offered by the air to all solid bodies is the same, whatever their nature may be.

"GRACE" is in sore trouble. She has recently had bequeathed to her, among other things, a number of beautiful pearls. Several of these have no lustre whatever, and are of a dull grey colour, and the local jeweller tells "Grace" that these particular ones have lost most of their value. She adds: "I have tried polishing them, but it is of no use. What is the matter with them?"

Your pearls are what is called "sick." In all probability they have been locked up in some strong box for years past without getting a glimpse of daylight or breath of air. If this is the case you should expose them every day for some time to the sun, and moisten them occasionally. They are "dead" if at the end of a month there is no perceptible change in their tinge. If this happens they have no intrinsic value worth speaking of. Odd as it sounds, pearls, like mortals, require plenty of air and sunshine to keep them in good health, and the more perfect the pearl the more likely it is to be attacked by mortal illness.

"LADDIE."—The most useful household commodity is undoubtedly salt. Besides being employed to season eatables, it is a simple remedy for earache, toothache, and headache; it will make cream freeze and butter come, it will take ink-stains out of cloth of any kind, it may be applied to cuts and wounds, to counteract frost and snow, to manure the ground, to ease the itching pain caused by irritable skin diseases, to produce vomiting or stop it as you please; in fact, it seems to be in every way indispensable.

"NELLIE" has broken off her engagement with a young gentleman after they have been corresponding for five years. She is anxious to know how his letters ought to be returned.

Why not employ a furniture removal van, and get the whole thing over in one journey?

"HOUSEWIFE" has been reading a paper in which the fact is mentioned that allowing the sun to shine on mirrors is injurious to them. "Can this really be true?" she asks.

Most decidedly it can. The action of the rays of light on the quicksilver which backs a looking-glass has the effect of finally rendering it incapable of reflecting an image. Therefore, "Housewife," keep your looking-glass away from the sun—and from the daughters also, if you are able.

"JENNY P." writes: "Will you please be kind enough to tell me if bread can be made with sea-water, and if so, are there any benefits to be derived from eating a loaf of the kind?"

My first impulse was to smile at your query, "Jenny P.," but the smile soon died out, for on inquiry I find that bread made in the fashion you describe is exceedingly nourishing, and especially so for those persons who suffer from wasting diseases. The bread is not at all salt, but, oddly enough, has a sweetish taste. Of course, the sea-water is allowed to stand undisturbed for a long time before being mixed with the flour, so that all impurities may have an opportunity of sinking.

"T. E. R." asks: "In which European country is the largest proportion of the population married?"

From the published statistics it appears that Hungary leads the way with 407 out of every 1,000. France comes next on the list, whilst the smallest proportion is found in Portugal, where only 310 out of every 1,000 of the population taste the bliss of wedded life.

THE ADVENTURES OF AN ACTRESS.

XVIII.—THE LAST WILL AND TESTAMENT.

By DONOVAN MART.

CHAPTER I.

"A TELEGRAM for you, sir; three letters for Miss Harlow."

Such was the greeting that met Eric Monteith, Hazel Harlow, and Jenny Lovelace, as they entered the Theatre Royal, Cardiff, on the first morning of their arrival in the Welsh town.

Eric tore open the orange envelope with the feeling of misgiving that an unexpected telegram always brings with it to the recipient.

"Come to me at once," he read, "am very ill—Alice."

An expression of consternation left his lips. The telegram bore the London postmark so it was evidently his sister who had wired for him.

"I must go at once," he said, half-aloud.

In the meanwhile Hazel had listlessly torn open her own correspondence.

One of the letters ran as follows:

"Chancery Lane, London, W.C.,
"November 19th.

"DEAR MADAM,—My client, Mr. Edward Harlow, has requested me to write and inform you of the fact that he is seriously ill, and, indeed, desires to put his affairs in order in case of the untoward event of his early demise. Mr. Harlow has acquainted me with the affair that led to your leaving his roof and taking up the theatrical profession, and under the circumstances he is anxious to bring about a speedy reconciliation. I should, therefore, esteem it a very great favour if you would, as soon as your duties will permit of such a step, come with all speed to London, and confer with me here upon the subject. It would be exceedingly inadvisable for you to proceed to Honeycote without first consulting me, for reasons which it is much better to express verbally than in writing.

"Trusting to hear from you soon, believe me, dear madam, very faithfully yours, "JAMES MURDOCH."

Hardly had Hazel finished reading this somewhat extraordinary epistle when Eric turned to her and said in a low voice.

"My sister Alice is ill, I shall have to return to London at once."

And then noticing that Hazel's face had suddenly become imbued with a strange pallor, he continued: "But what is the matter, Hazel? Have you had bad news, too?"

In answer Hazel put the letter she had just read into his hand. He read it through carefully, and then said quickly, "This is indeed serious. Do you know Mr. James Murdoch?"

"Yes," replied the girl, "he is my father's lawyer, and one of the few friends with whom he has remained on terms of intimacy."

"Then that settles it," said Eric.

And after arranging with Venables as to their absence, they prepared for their journey to the metropolis, and as it would be evening before they could arrive at Paddington and Eric had begged Hazel to accept the hospitality of his sister's house. To this she had of course thankfully acceded. As the train whirled them out of Cardiff Hazel drew out the letter she had received from Murdoch, and re-read it carefully.

"It is rather an extraordinary letter," Eric said looking thoughtfully into her face, "I suppose there is no possible chance that it is still another vile plot to entrap you. But one thing, it cannot be the blackguard Caldecott's hand and brain that inspired it, for we know that he was in Brighton last week, and fully occupied with the mystery of poor old Gideon Lee."

"And besides," broke in Hazel, "Murdoch and Caldecott are sworn enemies. Mr. Murdoch hated the Squire, and I remember that they had a big scene some years ago at Honeycote. No, I can't help thinking that it is genuine, because Murdoch and my father have always been great friends, and I know that in a case like this the first man to whom my father would go would be Murdoch himself."

"Still, for safety," said Eric, "I think that if possible I'll come round with you to Chancery Lane to-morrow morning, and see if I can't get a word with Mr. James Murdoch. Of course it all depends upon my poor sister. I do hope and trust that she is really not so bad as the telegram would have me believe."

CHAPTER II.

JAMES MURDOCH was sitting alone in his private office in Chancery Lane. He was a grey-haired, hard-featured man, with keen grey eyes, and sparse, though vigorous frame, the beau ideal of an acute London solicitor. He was sitting at his desk, upon which was a pile of papers, holding in his hand a document that was in fact, the last will and testament of Edward Harlow, of Honeycote. Stripped of its legal phraseology, the will was as follows:

"I, Edward Harlow, do hereby leave my farm and all my money to my daughter Hazel Harlow under the following conditions. If, at the expiration of six months from this date she be still unmarried, the whole of my property shall go to her with the exception of two hundred and fifty pounds that I leave to my friend and legal adviser, James Murdoch. If, on the other hand, my daughter marries she is only to receive one half of my fortune and the farm, the rest to go to the aforesaid James Murdoch, but if, before the expiration of the six months she should marry or demise, the whole of my property is to go to James Murdoch."

The lawyer threw the paper down upon his desk.

"A most extraordinary will," he muttered, "and on the face of it a foolish one. Now there is one thing that Harlow doesn't know. He doesn't know that James Murdoch is on his last legs, and that if something doesn't happen before the expiration of six months there will be nothing for it but the Bankruptcy Court. But if Edward Harlow has made a fool of himself, there is no reason that Jim Murdoch should do the same. Why, just think of it. There is only a girl's life, my boy, between you and a very respectable little fortune. To-day is Monday; the girl would have got my letter in Cardiff this morning. Ten to one she will be here early to morrow. Is there any hitch in my plan? I don't think there can be. She comes here, disappears, and, well, I, of course, know nothing about her disappearance. It's a big risk, but there's a big stake in view."

At that moment there came a knock at the door. Murdoch thrust the papers away into the desk and cried curtly, "Come in." A clerk entered.

"A gentleman to see you, Mr. Murdoch, Dr. Vanstone."

"Show him in."

The clerk retired, and the next moment Dr. Vanstone entered. He was a small, insignificant looking little man, with a white pinched face adorned with a fair beard and moustache, and with a pronounced cast in his right eye. Altogether a most unprepossessing specimen of humanity.

"Ah, Vanstone," said the lawyer pleasantly, "charmed to see you. I hope you have good news for me."

Vanstone sidled up to the lawyer's desk, and drawing up a chair, sat down at his elbow.

"It's all right," he whispered. "I've got all the papers and the certificates. It's merely a question now of getting the bird into the snare."

"Good," answered Murdoch. "Let's have the details of the business."

"Well," went on the other, still in a whisper, "from this moment there is no more Miss Hazel Harlow, but the lady's name is Miss Cynthia Fallowfield. Here is a copy of her birth certificate," and he drew a paper from his pocket, "and a deposition from her guardian that her parents are dead, and that she is who she is. She has been living for the past twenty years quietly abroad with her guardian; a month or so ago she had a serious illness, with the result that when she recovered she was found to have lost her reason, and to believe that she was a Miss Hazel Harlow, an actress who had been forced to leave her home by the persecutions of a stranger. The hallucination grew on the girl so strongly that at last her guardian had her examined and procured medical affidavits to the effect that she was insane. I have all the certificates, and masterpieces they are, all executed by a little man in Shoreditch who makes a speciality of such matters. The legal part of the business is of course in your hands, and as regards my remuneration, well, I need not remind you of the adage, my dear Murdoch, honour among——professional gentlemen."

Murdoch took the papers and examined them carefully.

"These seem all right," he said briefly, "but you have not yet told me where the hospital is that is to harbour Miss Cynthia Fallowfield?"

"At the villlage of Whitton, near Hounslow. The proprietor of the—er, establishment is a personal friend of mine, a Dr. Whitaker Johnson, whom you can perfectly trust as being a reliable man."

"If he is a friend of yours, my dear Vanstone," broke in the lawyer with a harsh sneer, "the recommendation speaks for itself. As regards you remuneration, as soon as Miss Har——, Miss Fallowfield, I mean, is safely under lock and key, you shall have your thousand pounds. And of course I need not impress on you the fact that if you get talking about this business you will probably find a trip to Portland, and a sojourn with His Majesty for a good many years will be your only rewards. We are both in the same boat, my dear Vanstone, and it's sink or swim with the pair of us. Of course, if Miss Fallowfield should happen to—er—succumb to her disorder while at Whitton, well, so much the better for us."

CHAPTER III.

WHEN Eric and Hazel arrived at the former's house in Bayswater, it was to find that Alice Monteith had been prostrated by a sudden attack of brain fever, and that her condition, although not absolutely hopeless, was still alarming enough to convince the doctor that her life was seriously in danger. And when Tuesday morning came and the doctors plainly told Eric that his sister's life might flicker out at any moment he realised that it would be impossible for him to accompanyHazel to the office of James Murdoch. He impressed upon her most urgently the necessity for caution and advised her not to go down to Honeycote until she had returned and consulted him upon what the lawyer had told her.

This injunction Hazel promised to carry out and shortly after breakfast called a hansom and drove away to Chancery Lane.

As she mounted the stairs that led to Murdoch's office, a closed vehicle pulled up against the kerb outside, and remained there as though waiting for some one inside the building.

Murdoch's offices were on the first floor, occupying three rooms, communicating the one with the other, though there was a private door opening out of the rearmost one, the lawyer's sanctum, that allowed him to leave the building without going out by means of the clerks' ante-room.

Hazel was evidently expected and was at once conducted to Murdoch's room. He rose as the actress entered, and advancing, shook her warmly by the hand.

"It is a long time since I had the pleasure of seeing you, Miss Harlow," he said suavely. "I can only regret the cause that brings you here to-day, notwithstanding the fact that the same reason gives me the pleasure of renewing your acquaintance."

Hazel bowed. She never liked the man, and his bland words rang falsely in her ears.

"How is my father, Mr. Murdoch?" she asked coldly. "And why have you asked me here to-day?"

The lawyer motioned her to take a seat facing him. She sat down, with the result that her back was turned towards the private door mentioned above.

"I am afraid that my poor old friend, your father, is sinking fast," replied Murdoch throwing as much gentleness as he could into his hard unsympathetic voice. "It would be false kindness to deceive you on this point, Miss Harlow. Indeed, so bad is he that I felt it would be best for me to ask you here first before proceeding to Honeycote."

"But if he is as ill as you say, surely it would have been best for me to proceed there before coming to you. I take it that you only wish to discuss business with me. Could not that have kept a day or so? If my father is dying, common humanity demands my presence by his bedside."

"Not altogether," came the cold answer. "Will you be so good as to draw your chair up to my desk and give your very earnest attention to a document that I must show you," and opening a drawer the lawyer drew forth a bundle of legal-looking papers, carefully bound round with pink tape, and upon the outside of which Hazel could read, "Re Harlow Settlements."

Hazel complied with the request. The drawing forward of her chair drowned the faint sound made by the cautious opening of the door behind her. As Murdoch unbound the papers and selected one from amongst them, which he laid down before his unsuspecting victim, a man slipped inside the room. It was Vanstone, the rascally accomplice of the foul plot already in progress.

Not by the faintest sign or gesture did Murdoch betray the fact that he had heard his confederate enter.

"I want you to study this paper very attentively, Miss Harlow" he said decidedly.

Hardly had the words left his lips before Vanstone had sprung forward with the agility of a panther. He flung his left arm round Hazel's throat from behind, checking the scream of terror that rose to her lips with all the diabolical cunning of a professional garroter.

With his other hand he pressed a white cloth to her nostrils. The pungent smell of ether filled the dingy apartment. Her incipient struggles against this unknown terrible adversary were doomed to die at birth.

"Neatly done," muttered Murdoch, rising as he spoke, "Is the carriage below?"

"Yes. I must ask you to support Miss Fallowfield, as she must now be called, upon the other side. We can then help her down the stairs, and if we meet any one, you can say that your client has been taken with a sudden fainting fit."

As Vanstone spoke he drew a veil of thick net from his pocket, and fastened it securely across the unconscious girl's face. Then, as directed, Murdoch took hold of her under one arm. With Vanstone on the other side she was half-carried, half-dragged to the door, and out into the passage that led to the head of the stairs.

CHAPTER IV.

As luck would have it, towards mid-day Alice Monteith's fever took a turn for the better. The doctor was able to assure Eric that she was now really out of danger.

As can be well imagined, his relief was unbounded.

His thoughts turned towards Hazel. To his ill-concealed uneasiness he had heard nothing from the girl since her departure after breakfast, and, as the report about Alice was now so favourable, he determined to set out himself for Chancery Lane and learn from Murdoch where she was.

It was two o'clock when he reached the lawyer's office, to find to his chagrin that Murdoch had not yet returned from lunch. To his inquiry of the clerk as to whether a lady had interviewed the solicitor this morning, he was politely informed that such had been the case. Miss Harlow had been the name of the visitor. She had remained closeted with the lawyer for perhaps half-an-hour, and had then departed in a cab—whither the man was not able to say. Mr. Murdoch would doubtless return shortly. Would Mr. Monteith wait for his return?

Concealing his annoyance and general uneasiness at what he heard, Eric decided to wait. There was an unpleasant atmosphere of uncertainty about the matter that gave the young man pardonable ground for alarm. For had not Hazel promised to return to Bayswater before taking any further steps in the matter? And if she had only been half-an-hour with the lawyer, she would have had time to return twice over in the time that had elapsed. At about half-past two Murdoch returned. Eric at once took an instinctive dislike to the man, notwithstanding the fact that he was received with almost elaborate politeness. Murdoch was urbanity personified.

"I will be perfectly frank with you, Mr. Monteith," he said. "The reason I asked Miss Harlow to come and see me before first going to her father's bedside was because there was a legal flaw in Mr. Harlow's will that required adjustment, and that could only be done by a personal interview between Miss Harlow and myself. I would take you still further into my confidence, but you must know as well as I do that such a thing would be perfectly out of the question. A lawyer may not discuss his clients' affairs with strangers, no matter who they be. All I can say then is that Miss Harlow came here, discussed the affair under consideration with me entirely to my satisfaction, and left."

"And she did not confide in you where she was going?"

The lawyer shrugged his shoulders expressively. "I should not presume so much," he answered suavely, "as to counsel so eminently haughty a young lady as Miss Harlow as to what she should do, outside the immediate requirements made necessary by the fact that I am her father's oldest friend and legal adviser. And as you are probably aware the relations between father and daughter were not of the most cordial—are not, I should say."

"Then you did not advise her to proceed at once to her father's bedside? If he is your oldest friend, surely the least you could do would be to endeavour to bring about a reconciliation between him and his only child?"

The lawyer's crafty eyes narrowed vindictively.

"I might take exception to your tone, sir," he said icily, "were it not for the fact that I am convinced that it is nothing less than real personal interest in Miss Harlow that makes you cross-examine me so closely. The best advice I can give you is that you yourself travel down to Honeycote—there is a train at four o'clock this afternoon from Paddington—and find out by personal investigation whether Miss Harlow has gone to her father's side."

Smarting under a sense of ignominious defeat Eric drove rapidly back to Bayswater, faintly hoping that Hazel might have returned in his absence. But as we can well understand, there was no trace of her there, and as his sister was still on the mend, he determined to take Murdoch's sneering advice and take the four o'clock train to Honeycote. It was after all probable that if old Harlow was dying his daughter had thrown every other consideration to the wind, and had hurried to his side.

The train seemed to crawl to the little wayside station, and it was half-past six when Eric leapt out of the train upon the deserted platform, and inquired of a lugubrious porter if there was any chance of obtaining a vehicle to drive him to Harlow Farm.

As luck would have it, a countryman from an outlying farmstead beyond Harlow's place had driven in to meet the train, and offered to convey Monteith to his destination, an offer that it is needless to say, was accepted with alacrity.

The man was plainly interested to hear that so well-dressed and obviously gentlemanly a personage as Monteith was bound for Harlow's Farm.

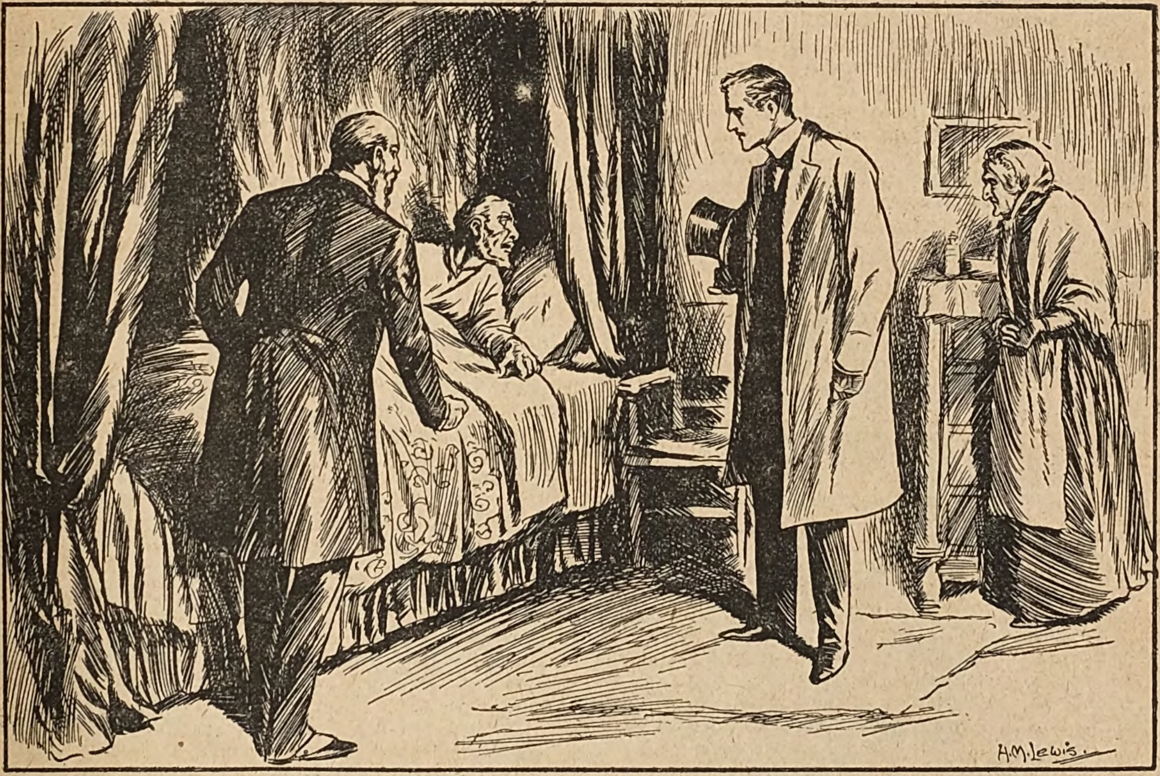
"I suppose you know he's dying, sir?" the fellow said, as they drove onward along the lonely country road.

"Yes," came the quiet answer. "It is that fact that brings me here to-night. Can you tell me what he's suffering from?"

"Well, sir, to tell you the truth, 'e's allus been a 'ard liver 'as 'Arlow. It's the effect of drink 'e's dyin' from as much as possible. Ever since 'is daughter left 'im, tho' it was 'is own fault that she ran away, e's taken to the bottle more than ever. And then 'e 'ad a rumpus with Squire Caldecott. And then the Squire disappeared, and we've 'eard all sorts of wild tales about 'im. They say 'e'll never dare show 'is face about 'ere again, though I never heard the rights of the story. But it seems rather a wonder that Miss Hazel 'asn't come down here now that she knows, as she must, that her father lies dying."

"Then she's not down here?" Eric tried to keep his voice calm, and to stifle the dread that caught suddenly at his heart.

"No, sir. But there's Harlow's Farm up there yonder to the left. My way lies straight ahead. Good night, sir, and thank you," for Eric had slipped a piece of money into his expectant hand.



"I'll! my little Hazel ill! Then I shan't see her again this side of the grave."

The young man followed the directions, and speedily drew up outside the old farmhouse.

So this was where Hazel had been born. Here she had passed her childhood's days, to fly away before the cruelty of the parent who from all accounts lay dying within. Where could she be now? Mechanically Eric advanced to the front door of the farmhouse and knocked gently at the weatherbeaten portal.

The door was immediately opened by an old woman upon whose face were traces of recent tears. There was no hall, and Eric found himself gazing into the old farm kitchen.

"Yes, sir?" said the old woman inquiringly. "What might you be pleased to want?"

Monteith hesitated, somewhat at a losst ok now how to begin.

Then he said, "How is Mr. Harlow?"

"Sinkin', sir! Sinkin' fast," came the reply, with a sudden burst of tears. "The doctor's within. It's piteous to hear him. He keeps asking for Miss Hazel. Why don't she come? Why don't she come?"

"I come from Miss Harlow," broke in Eric, not altogether truthfully, yet actuated to make the statement by a sudden resolve to shield Hazel from the heartlessness he knew her to be incapable of, and that he knew would be imputed to her unless he were to say something on her behalf. "She is ill, and cannot come. She asked me to come here for her. Believe me, she would be here if it were possible."

"I knew it! I knew it!" wailed the old dame, her tears breaking out anew. "I knew my sweet Miss Hazel was not capable of such conduct without a cause. Come inside, sir, come inside. Master must hear this from your lips."

Eric followed her inside the house, and up a steep flight of oak stairs devoid of carpet, and so into a long, low chamber.

At one end of the room was a huge four-poster bed, by the side of which was the local doctor. Upon the bed itself Eric saw the picture of a man, an elderly, grizzled haired, red-faced being, who lay moaning upon the couch, his gnarled hands gripping the sheets with convulsive grip.

The doctor looked up, and a puzzled expression came into his face as he saw this tall, well-dressed stranger enter the death-chamber.

"I come from his daughter," Eric said, in a low voice. Faint as the words were, the dying man heard them.

"Who are you?" he said faintly, "her husband, or what? Why hasn't she come herself?"

A dull wave of colour reddened Monteith's face.

"Your daughter is exceedingly ill herself, Mr. Harlow," he said gently, though it cost him an effort to utter the lie that he felt he must voice.

"Ill, my little Hazel ill! Then I shan't see her again this side of the grave." Harlow's voice had grown strangely gentle. The approach of death had chased away the roughness of his habitual tone. "Draw ye nigh, doctor, and you, sir, whoever ye be. I'm going fast now, and before I go I want to put everything straight. The last will I made ain't a straight one. I want to make another, and to get you two to witness it. Paper and a pen, quick, before it is too late. Write just what I say: 'I leave all my property unconditionally to my daughter Hazel Harlow, except two hundred pounds for Martha Jelfs, my housekeeper.' Have you written that, doctor?

"Then let me sign it quick. So! Now do you two gentlemen put your names. I reckon that will be legal enough. I've been a bad lot. Put down your head, closer, doctor. It's gettin' dark. Give my love to Hazel, and tell James Murdoch from me——" But the message to the lawyer was never completed. Before he could finish his sentence Harlow was dead.

CHAPTER V.

When Hazel Harlow recovered consciousness, it was to find herself in a small barely furnished room, with a window covered with frosted glass set up high on the wall. She was lying upon a couch, while over her bent a woman little more than a girl.

"How do you feel now, Miss Fallowfield?" asked the stranger, who was dressed, it is worthy of mention, in a kind of uniform similar in certain respects to the garb adopted by hospital nurses.

Hazel gazed at her in amazement. "Why do you address me by that name?" she asked wonderingly. "My name is Harlow, Hazel Harlow Do you mind telling me where I am?"

The other laughed. "Oh, of course," she said somewhat mockingly, "I forgot. You are Miss Hazel Harlow, an actress, and you are continually being persecuted by a man who wants to marry you!"

"You seem to know all about me," continued Hazel, her wonderment deepening. "Why then did you call me Miss Fallowfield a moment or so ago? And you have not yet told me where I am." Her gaze swept the bare little apartment. "Am I in a hospital? If so, why? Ah!" She gave vent to the cry because the memory of what she had gone through in the office of Murdoch came back to her with overwhelming distinctiveness.

The other looked at her curiously.

"Yes, you're in hospital," she said slowly, with a faint intonation on the last word. "And you're to stay here until you know that you're Miss Fallowfield, and have forgotten all about the rich lover."

The colour ebbed away from Hazel's face. While the other had been talking her thoughts had been busy. She was rapidly piecing together the links in the chain that had bound her so suddenly to the horrible truth. At that moment a horrid scream, the cry of a wild beast it almost seemed, rang out from a room near to hers.

She put her hands to her ears and uttered a moan of agony. "It is no dream, then," she muttered hoarsely. "I see it all now. I am in a mad-house. But why? Why? Why?" Then she turned to the girl, whom she now realised was her keeper, and flinging herself upon the ground, wailed out: "Save me, oh, save me, I implore you! I am not mad, I swear it! I have friends who will pay you well if only you will aid me to escape. I am Hazel Harlow, I swear it"—but the other put up her hand.

"It is not a bit of use your exciting yourself, Miss Fallowfield," she interposed quietly, "why there is a lady here who has offered me millions of pounds if I will help her to escape. Another said she would make me Queen of England. You know you are sent here for your good, to try and cure you from all the foolish hallucinations that torment you. So take my advice and keep your mouth shut about Hazel Harlow." With which she went to the door and left the room abruptly.

For a few moments after her departure Hazel sat motionless, staring before her with wide-open vacant eyes.

Could it be true? Could this be the real explanation of Murdoch's wicked attack? For what reason could he have committed so dastardly a crime?

Then her poor overtaxed brain broke down beneath the strain of attempting to solve the horrid enigma. She flung herself down upon the couch and burst into a paroxysm of wild tears.

Suddenly the door of the room opened for the second time. She did not trouble to raise her head, thinking it was only her keeper who had returned. Then a soft voice fell on her ears. "Don't give way like that, Miss Fallowfield," it said; "No one wishes to do you any harm."

At the speech Hazel sprang up anew with blazing eyes. "It is all a horrible conspiracy," she cried, "a conspiracy to drive me out of my mind."

The new-comer was clad as the other attendant had been. Her face, though pale and worn, had a sweet expression. There were faint tinges of grey in her dark hair.

She looked at Hazel intently for a few moments. Then a slight cry left her lips. "Listen," she said in a low voice, "can you tell me what happened at Newcastle some time ago in connection with the theatre there?"

There was something in the woman's voice that brought the colour back to Hazel's face.

She made a swift movement across the room, and laid her hand upon the arm of the other.

"Your question tells me that you know who I am," she said in her low sweet voice. "The Newcastle theatre was burnt to the ground, and it was only by a miracle that my life was saved. Your face tells me I am right. You know that my name is not Fallowfield, that a vile conspiracy has taken away my name, and thrust me into this terrible place!"

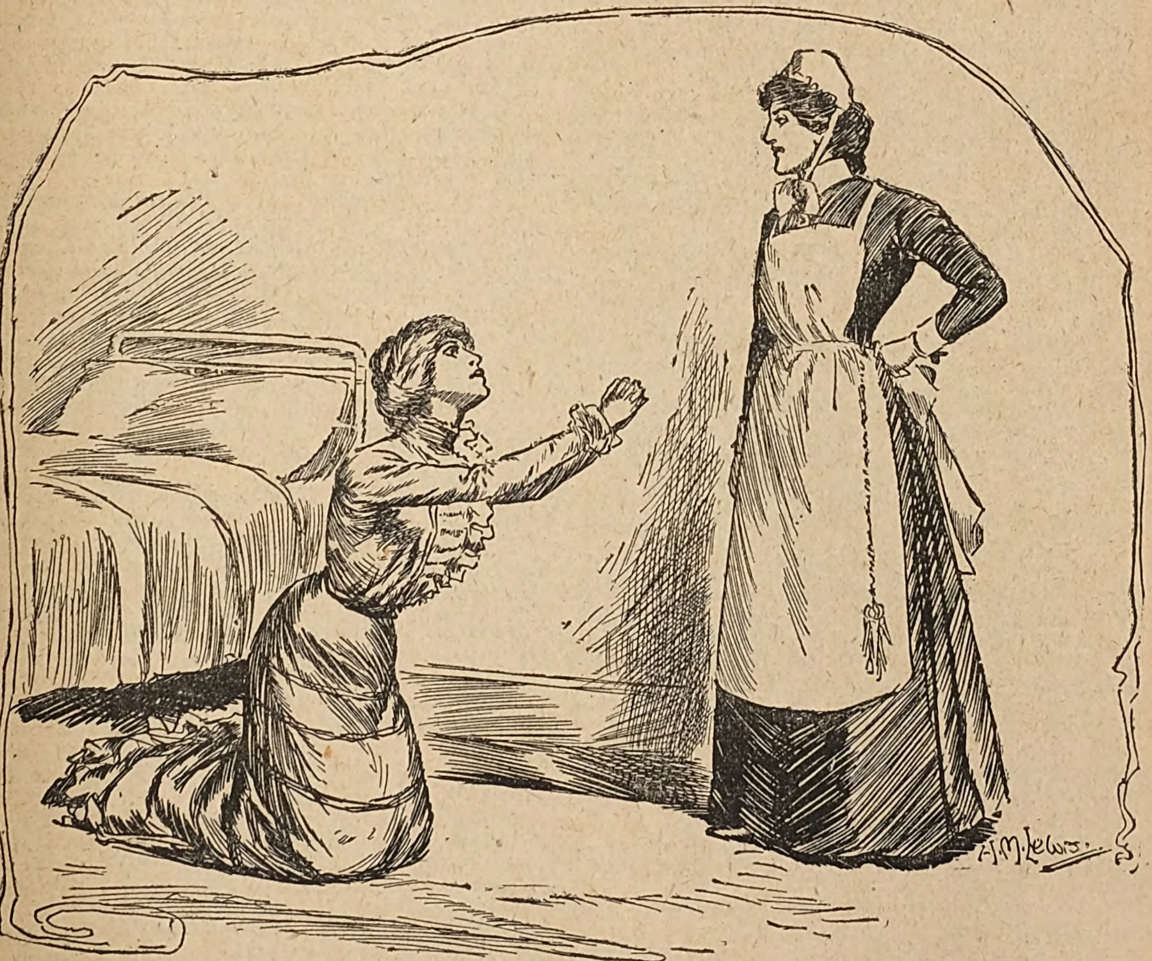
"For the love of Heaven do not speak so loud," came the answer, in a terrified whisper. "Yet it is as you say. I was in Newcastle that week, and I saw you act. I know there cannot be two such faces as yours in England. Yes, you are, you must be, Hazel Harlow. What does it all mean? What does it all mean?"

"It means that I am for some reason or other the victim of some horrible conspiracy. But thank God that at last I have found a friend. And you are my friend. I know it. Listen, and I can tell you how you can help me. Write to Mr. Eric Monteith, at 36, Chester Place, Bayswater. Tell him I am here He will save me and reward you for your goodness."

"I will, I will," answered the woman brokenly. "For I know that you are indeed Hazel Harlow."

CHAPTER VI.

It was quite out of the question for Eric to return to London on the night that had witnessed the death of Edward Harlow. A shakedown was found for him in the farmhouse kitchen, but, as can be well imagined,



"Save me! Oh, save me, I implore you. I am not mad, I swear it!"

there was little sleep for him that night. When morning came he departed to London by the first train, the same that had conveyed Hazel to London on her flight from the farm a few months ago, and in his pocket was the last will and testament of the man whose death bed he had attended. As can be well imagined he was all anxiety to get home for two reasons. Firstly there was his sister Alice still ill. Secondly, he was in hopes of hearing news of Hazel. It was eleven o'clock before he reached London; he found to his relief that his sister was still on the mend, and that there was no word from Hazel, neither had anything been heard of her.

Monteith was almost at his wits' end to know what to do, that there had been foul play somewhere there could be no doubt, but whether it was the hand of the villain Caldecott that was traceable in the affair, or James Murdoch, had yet to be proved. The finger of circumstance pointed very strongly to the latter. Accordingly Eric made a fair copy of the will that bore Harlow's signature, and stowed the original carefully away in his strong box with his other private papers, and then determined to seek out Murdoch and confront him with the document, for he had now strong suspicions that it was Murdoch who had somehow done away with Hazel, in connection with the will that the dead farmer had revoked in his last moments. And had not Harlow's last words had reference to the lawyer? As he had expected, Murdoch refused to see him, but Eric was not to be put off thus. Before the clerk in the outer office could prevent him he had swung open the inner door that led into the ante-room that had in its turn access to Murdoch's own sanctum, to enter the lawyer's own office without the least ceremony.

Murdoch was seated at his desk. As Eric swung into the room he rose to his feet with an evil scowl.

"May I ask the meaning of this unwarrantable intrusion?" he snarled.

"Certainly," came the cool answer, "read that." And the young man flung the copy of the will upon the lawyer's writing-table.

Almost against his will, and impelled by an overpowering curiosity, the lawyer picked up the paper and read the document carefully through. His face showed but little surprise.

"Well," he snarled, "what does this play-acting mean? Anybody can write out a few sentences upon a piece of note paper."

Eric gave vent to a grim laugh. "Not so fast," he said. "That piece of note paper is a true copy of Edward Harlow's last will and testament. As you will doubtless see it post-dates all others, and is witnessed by Dr. Jeffreys and myself, who were both present at your late client's death-bed."

"It's a lie," almost howled the solicitor, springing to his feet and throwing off the last rag of self-control in his rage. "It's a lie! A put-up job to try and bounce me, but you needn't think to deceive me with your flimsy pretexts." And with an oath he tore the document through and through.

Eric watched him with a face of iron.

"I'll make you eat those words before you are much older, Mr. Murdoch," he said icily, "and I don't leave this office until you have told me what you have done with Miss Harlow."

His coolness recalled the other to his senses. With an effort he sank down into his seat again, though his face was deadly pale, and there were hard lines upon his forehead, and round his cruel mouth.

"You must excuse my outburst, Mr. Monteith," he said, in a changed voice, striving to appear once more the calm cold man of business. "The fact is I have had a lot of trouble lately in connection with Miss Harlow and her affairs, and, indeed, I was just on the point of writing to you to tell you that I thought I had a clue to the whereabouts of the young lady in whom you seem to be so strongly interested. The fact of the matter is that when she let my office yesterday (I have ascertained this from inquiries) she did not drive away in a cab as I supposed, but was seen to walk away with a gentleman in the direction of Holborn. That is all the clue I have to what became of her. I am indeed sorry, because if the will that you have in your possession is really a genuine one, it will be but little good unless Miss Harlow can be found. Of course I shall do all in my power to discover her whereabouts. I have already communicated with the police and with your aid we shall no doubt hear something of her before long."

During this speech Eric's eyes had never left the man's face. He knew that the lawyer was lying; he felt convinced he was wilfully deceiving him as regards the true explanation of Hazel's disappearance. It was as much as he could do to restrain himself from flying at the lying rascal's throat and endeavouring to shake the truth out of him by main force.

At that moment, fortunately for Murdoch, a client was announced. Eric was quite averse to making a scene under the circumstances, especially as he had such little data to go upon.

In the outer office was a District Messenger boy with a note for Monteith. Eric tore it open. It was an urgent appeal from the doctor to return at once, as his sister Alice had developed symptoms of a serious relapse. Eric ground his teeth in silent impotence. In the face of such an appeal there was no help for it. He must return at once to Chester Place. He arrived back to find Alice unconscious, a condition in which she remained for some hours, hovering precariously between life and death. One of the most famous specialists in London was summoned, and towards three o'clock the sick girl rallied; for the present her life had been saved.

A letter came for Monteith by the afternoon's post, written in an evidently feminine hand, and with the postmark of Whitton on the envelope. Listlessly he tore it open, but the moment his eyes glanced down the page at the written matter it contained, his heart leapt up within him. This is what he read: "Mr. Eric Monteith is urgently wanted at Pelham House, Whitton, as soon as possible after receiving this. He will there hear news of Miss Hazel Harlow."

That was all, but it was enough. Waiting to reassure himself that his sister was indeed better again, he dashed out into the street and hailing a passing hansom, directed the driver to Pelham House, Whitton.

"Why, that's beyond Hounslow," said the man sullenly, "I ain't going to drive right out into the country." But Eric leapt into the cab.

"Five pounds if you are there before five o'clock," he said. The cabman's demeanour changed. His eyes brightened at the prospect of such a bait, and he lashed up his horse, which was soon careering away in the direction of Hounslow. At the village of Whitton it was necessary to make inquiries for Pelham House.

"Oh, that's an asylum," answered the policeman they asked. "First turning to the right at the end of the street, and then the first big iron gates on the right again."

An asylum! Eric's blood boiled at the words. In a few minutes the panting horse was pulled up outside the gate, just as a distant clock chimed the hour of five. Eric pulled a couple of sovereigns out of his pocket.

"Wait here," he said to the man, "I hope to be back again before long."

He tugged furiously at the wrought-iron bell pull dangling at the side of the grim cast-iron gateway. A porter in uniform came out of the lodge just inside the gates and peering through the gate, asked Eric his business. A half-sovereign was thrust into his hand.

"Let me in," said Eric, "It's a matter of life and death." The palm oil worked wonders; the gates were flung open, and Eric stormed inside and dashed headlong down the drive towards the house, a severe red-brick mansion that must in Georgian times have been the abode of some court gentleman.

Again Eric pealed at the bell, another attendant threw open the door and looked in some surprise at the well-dressed breathless young man who confronted him.

"I must see the superintendent of this place at once," said Eric. Hardly were the words out of his mouth than a frock-coated, venerable-looking gentleman issued from a room at the back. "Yes," he said blandly, "What can I do for you?"

"Give me a word in private."

"Certainly, pray come this way." And the superintendent of the establishment, for such he was, ushered his unknown visitor into a comfortable ante-room leading out of the hall.

"First of all," began Eric, "do you know Mr. James Murdoch?"

"Perfectly," answered the other, "I presume you mean the solicitor in Chancery Lane."

"I do. Have you had any communication with him lately?"

The doctor knit his brow. "Really, my dear sir," he answered blandly, "I do not feel at liberty to discuss my private affairs with a perfect stranger."

"Then let me speak," came the hot answer. "My name is Monteith, and I have just come from the office of James Murdoch. I am personally acquainted with the young lady named Miss Hazel Harlow, whom I have reason to believe is incarcerated in this establishment under another name. You must know ever since the publication of Charles Reade's famous novel how strenuous the Government of this country were to revise the lunacy laws, and you must know, better than I do, what the penalties are for the false detention of persons who are absolutely sane. If you refuse to comply with my request and allow me to see Miss Harlow, I will set such a nest of hornets buzzing about your ears that will spell ruin to you, and the carrying on of this establishment."

The other man went pale to the lips at Eric's outburst.

"But my dear sir," he cried deprecatingly, "I am an honourable man, and I assure you that this establishment is carried on under the most careful lines. After what you have said I will be frank with you. Some time ago I had a letter from this Mr. Murdoch asking me if I would undertake the guardianship of a young lady whose trustee he was, and whose name was Miss Cynthia Fallowfield. He sent me papers fully attested by a medical man to the fact that this young lady was insane, and that she was suffering from delusions that she was a Miss Hazel Harlow, who was being continually persecuted by a rich lover. Miss Fallowfield had been educated abroad, and her parents were dead. The matter was investigated, and no flaw could be found and yesterday morning Miss Fallowfield was brought here by Dr. Vanstone, who is a man with a large practice in London."

"The black-hearted brute," broke in Eric, "I see it all now. Will you let me see Miss Harlow, who I assure you is an actress who has won great renown for herself in the provinces."

The doctor touched an electric bell at his side. An attendant appeared.

"Bring Miss Fallowfield here at once," said the superintendent curtly, giving of course the name by which Hazel was known in the establishment. The man retired, and in a few moments the door opened again and the same woman whose hand it was that had written the note to Eric, and who had so providentially recognised Hazel from seeing her in Newcastle, entered the room, preceded by the much ill-used actress herself. Hazel was very pale, but as she caught sight of Eric's face, the colour came back to her cheeks. She darted forward and flung herself unrestrainedly into her saviour's arms.

"Thank God," she muttered brokenly, "Thank God you have found me at last."

* * * *

When, early on the morning after Hazel's deliverance from the asylum the police were sent round, at Eric's instigation, to James Murdoch's office, it was only to find that the ruffian had given them the slip and had fled away never to be heard of again. Vanstone was apprehended and sentenced to a long term of imprisonment, while the superintendent of the asylum was severely reprimanded and mulcted in a heavy fine for his carelessness in not having more fully investigated the antecedents of the girl whom he had received into his establishment.

Alice Monteith recovered, thanks to the untiring devotion of Hazel, who gave up the remainder of the week to nursing her lover's sister back to life. And in Hazel herself a great change had taken place. Eric's unswerving devotion and knightly loyalty to herself had at last borne fruit, the seeds of love had taken root in her heart and were blossoming forth into full fruition, though the time was not yet come when she felt that she could unveil her feelings, and give Eric the reward he so ardently longed for.

Next week the Good Samaritan Company visits Bradford, and Hazel is the indirect means of the discovery of a fearful tragedy, details of which will appear in next week's Short Stories.

THE WHITE JASMINE.

The "Imperial Bagdad," the city of the powerful Caliphs of the East, was in mourning. The shops were closed, and the bazaars with their thousand curiosities brought from far-off regions, did not gladden the eyes of the passers-by. At the mosques, men and women, prostrated on the stone floor, prayed fervently to Allah; for the flower and pride of Bagdad, the morning star, Leila-Radyah, the beautiful, the daughter of the Caliph, was dying—dying slowly of an unknown disease, and all the science contained in the vast Caliphate of Bagdad, or the gold spent by her frantic father, had been powerless to bring back to her cheeks the beautiful roses of health.

All the men skilled in medical science in Bagdad, magi from Persia, sages from Egypt, who had acquired in a wonderful way the secrets of medicine possessed by the ancient Egyptian priests, learned physicians from the Greek Empire; all had tried their knowledge and skill on the princess, and endeavoured to bring her back from the shadowy world she was soon to enter; but after awhile they gave up in despair, and declared that only Allah, the great Allah, could restore her to health; then the Caliph, to whom Leila-Radyah was as the light of Heaven is to the soul, bowed his head in mute grief, and with Eastern humility exclaimed, "Allah-il-Allah, it is fate."

One day, when the sun was sinking in the far West a traveller entered Bagdad through one of the gates which looked towards the side of the rising sun; a man advanced in years, his swarthy skin, and bright youthful eyes contrasting oddly with the snowy whiteness of his beard and hair. His dress, travel-worn and stained, and made in a different way from the prevailing way in Bagdad, indicated that he came from a long distance. The man approached an Arab standing at a street corner and said with quiet dignity:

"Take me to the palace of thy master, the Caliph."

The Arab answered simply.

"Come with me," and the stranger followed in his footsteps.

When at the door of the palace the traveller dismissed his guide, and said to the guard:

"I wish to see the Great Caliph; tell him that a 'Wise Man' from far-away India has come to cure the Princess."

The soldier took him to the Caliph, for he had orders to immediately introduce into the royal presence anyone coming on such an errand as this.

With great majesty and solemn countenance, the "wise man" advanced towards the Caliph. When at the foot of the throne he stopped, crossed his hands on his breast, and without kneeling, bowed profoundly three times, then waited for the sovereign to speak.

"What dost thou want?" asked the Caliph.

"Mirror of the faithful! Defender of the true faith, the fame of thy might and power hath reached even to the banks of our sacred river—the purifying Ganges; also of how thy daughter, the flower of Moslem, was ill and dying, and earthly science was powerless to save her from crossing the dreadful bridge; but I, O King! can save her."

"How can that be?" asked the Caliph in wonder. "Thou hast not even seen her."

"Thou hast said it, but the stars have revealed to me their secret, and I can save her from death. Take me to her."

On a couch, surrounded by her female slaves, amid cushions and silks of damask, lay Leila-Radyah, pale as moonlight; the two midnight stars which in health lighted her face were heavily veiled by her eyelids. She was supremely beautiful, even at her dying hour.

The Hindoo approached her couch, and with his hand touched lightly her forehead. She opened her eyes and closed them again, sinking immediately into the usual stupor.

Then the "Wise Man" walked towards the exit of the room and the Caliph went with him. The Hindoo walked by the side of the monarch, silent and thoughtful, and when they entered the throne-room, asked from the sovereign a secret audience.

Hastily dismissing everyone, the Caliph prepared himself to hear what the stranger had to say.

The Hindoo began to speak in a low impressive voice carrying conviction and hope to the heart of the poor father.

"It is decreed by Fate, that the Princess, thy daughter, leave this world for the one promised to the faithful, when four times the moon shall have shone full in the midnight sky; but Allah has left thee one hope. Only one thing can save her; and the remedy is as difficult to obtain as her illness is mysterious. Art thou ready to make every sacrifice?"

"Yes; if thou canst do aught for her, speak, and if she lives I will give thee gold, and land, and slaves; I will make thee wealthy; more, even her hand in marriage thou shalt have."

"No, King, I ask nothing, and only wish to return to my country when the Princess is cured. Gold has no charms for me, nor woman any allurements. Her hand must be the reward of her saviour; for I will only indicate what will cure her, and a young, vigorous man must go in search of it. Listen to me, O great Caliph!

"Far away in the West, in the region of the setting sun, is a land; the fairest land in this mortal world. Its name is Hispania. In this country the sky is always blue and pure. Its mountains shine like precious stone when stricken by the morning sun; soft breezes from the sea fan the leaves of tall, stately trees, and amid their foliage sings the bird with the flute-like voice, a song of love to the stars above. The ground is covered with a carpet of moss and flowers, with here and there a tiny rivulet, crystalline as a diamond, descending from the mountains and making its way towards the sea.

"In this paradise of earth cultivated by the hands of an houri, grows a beautiful white flower, exhaling a fragrance like unto that of the breezes of Heaven; if any one can go to that far-off land, and bring this heavenly flower to Bagdad before thy daughter dies, then she will live; for its perfume means life and health to her. Have this fact proclaimed through all thy kingdom and let those who wish to undertake the perilous journey go, and may Allah grant that they return in time."

Through all the kingdom the criers proclaimed the news, that if any man, however humble or poor he might be, could obtain and bring the wonderful flower from the Occident, he would have as a reward the hand of the beautiful Leila-Radyah.

Three powerful princes who loved Leila-Radyah started on the long journey in quest of the life-giving blossom.

The first, young and handsome Prince Ali, perished in the burning sands when crossing the Arabian desert.

The second, a nephew of the Caliph, Hassan, decided to make the voyage by water; so, on reaching the Mediterranean shore, embarked, and a few days later fell captive into the hands of pirates. He was set at liberty after paying a heavy ransom, and, tired of suffering misfortunes, returned to his native land.

The third, Ab-de-Rhaman, was a prince of the royal house of the Omnyades, a dynasty which had been overthrown by the grandfather to the present Caliph. Ab-de-Rhaman was young and handsome; Princess Leila-Radyah was the soul of his soul, and she also loved him, but the Caliph had sworn never to give his daughter to the young prince; but now, should he go and bring the magic flower, when the beautiful Leila rose from her couch she would belong to him, for the Caliph had promised her hand to her saviour, and a Caliph never breaks his word once given to his subjects. So he started from Bagdad toward Hispania with his heart full of love for his Princess. Well he knew the perils and difficulties that he would encounter on the way; but what cared he for all the hardships he would have to suffer, if only he could come back to Bagdad in time and with the beautiful blossom in his hand.

He crossed the desert of Mesopotamia and reached the seashore. He engaged passage in a Greek vessel bound for Gallia and Hispania, but a tempest threw him on the coast of Africa. Nothing daunted Ab-de-Rhaman continued his way on foot. He suffered hunger and thirst; he was taken prisoner but he escaped, and at last, leaving behind the burning sands and barren rocks of the African soil, he crossed the narrow sea between the African continent and Hispania. That night the moon shone full in the midnight sky for the second time. He stood on the rock of Jabel-Tarik, and gave thanks to Allah.

Beautiful beyond description was Hispania. The sky was bluer than the Indian sapphires, and the ground was carpeted with bright-hued flowers.

The kingdom of the Goths was established in Hispania, and Ab-de-Rhaman saw that the women wore their faces uncovered, Their eyes were of the colour of the sky, and their hair like sunbeams. Yet he saw no woman as beautiful as his Leila-Radyah.

The people spoke in a strange language and could not understand him, so they took him to a wizard, who passed his time collecting flowers of the field during the day, and at night looking at the stars from the top of an old turret.

The astrologer spoke to Ab-de-Rhaman in his own language, and it was like sweetest music to the ears of the exiled prince. He told the wizard his story, and received from his hands a beautiful pure white blossom with petals as white and soft as the silks of damask, and a perfume like unto that of Paradise.

The magician gave him a box of sandal-wood, of curious workmanship, inside of which the flower should be placed that it could reach the Eastern city fragrant and fresh.

How the Prince treasures his little casket, containing the life-giving flower. He thanks Allah, and then saying farewell to the astrologer, starts on his eastward journey.

Hardships, misfortunes are nothing to Ab-de-Rhaman; he has only one thought, to reach the Queen of the East, Bagdad the beautiful, before the moon has shone full for the fourth time in the midnight sky.

Night and day he presses to his heart his treasure, the sandal-wood box, with the health-giving flower inside; and at last one day, Ab-de-Rhaman sees, with the first rays of the morning sun, the minarets crowned by the crescent of the queenly city of Bagdad.

He hears the imam, who from the tall minarets calls the people to their morning prayer, and sees that the gates of the city are thrown open, then, taking off his tattered shoes, the Prince falls on his face, and gives thanks to the mighty Allah; for to-day is the last day of grace, and in the night the moon will shine full for the fourth time in the midnight sky.

He enters the city. No one knows him, so soiled and torn are his garments, and his hair and beard long and unkempt. He goes to the presence of the Caliph, and kneeling before him, says:

"Behold, oh great king! mirror of the faithful, son of our great prophet! Behold I bring here the flower that will cure the Princess Leila-Radyah," and the Caliph asks in wonder, for he had lost all hope of ever having the flower:

"Who art thou?"

"I am the Prince Ab-de-Rhaman," and the Caliph bows again his head, and says "It is fate," then, "Follow me."

Together they go to the bower of Leila-Radyah, and see her beautiful pale face. Now she hardly breathes but the "Wise Man" from India approaches her couch, gives utterance to some mysterious words, then places the white blossom beneath her nostrils, and calls her spirit from the shadows.

She opens her eyes, and the blood comes back to her cheeks and lips; then they know that she will live; but the beautiful white blossom, fresh and fragrant a minute before, is withered and yellow.

There was great rejoicing at the wedding of Leila-Radyah and Ab-de-Rhaman; but after awhile the Prince yearned again for a sight of that beautiful far-off land, which was the image of Paradise; and so it came to pass that he, at the head of a great army, crossed Africa, conquering everything on his way, and crossed again the straits of "Jabel-Tarik," and defeated the effeminate Gothic King Rodrigo.

Beautiful Hispania was conquered and submitted to the Saracen rulers, and Ab-de-Rhaman was the first Caliph, the founder of the great Caliphate of Cordova, reigning many years in glory with his beautiful Sultana Leila-Radyah.

The wonderful sandal-wood box was preserved to the last of the Saracenic rule in the mosque of Cordova, then it was lost, but the jasmine was always considered by the Moslems, in Spain, a sacred flower.

A Mother's Agony.

I was sixteen yeares i' that yeare o' th' flood at Hampton, whereby my father, Robert Moody, came to 's end—his boat and he being lifted inland, they sayd, almost in sight of our home, and then drawn down to death by th' mighty arm o' th' deep seas. Well I mind our home. 'Tis a small place where three littel pines stand in a row, the length of a meadow from th' common field and oure next naybur—a solid, low house under big trees, and well set about with palisadoes—the Garrison House they began to call it that yeare.

My mother, Mistress Betty Moody, could scarce abide in oure house before my father's dreadfull daye—so fearsome was she of redskins. For alle th' world doth know that in that yeare—'twas ten yeares before King Charles died—th' red men harried all New England. After th' flood she grew so passionatelie afeared that if a hen did but cackle on a stone step th' cloud would grow upon her features like a sea turned upon th' land, and she would catch up th' babe, glancing fearfullie at my brother cutting wood or hoeing the patch, and me upon th' dye-tub knitting. And of moonlit nights she would stare from our lattice upon the deepe woods.

"Child," she had said to my brother often, as we all peered together, ready dressed for a flight, "does that bush move? 'Tis th' color of th' pale ground."

The Indians forayed in white, to shimmer along in th' silence of the moon like vapors lying next the ground."

"Deare my mother," my brother would say, looking bigge as he could, but trembling, too, though he sayd 'twas because the April night was chill, and the woodpile too small for a brave heat, "hast thou not me? And the Garrison-House so near!" Robert alwaies added this last, though he was a brave dark boy, like our father in 's face, straight-browed and looking with level eyes. He would cry when he fondled the babe such nights—'twas a sweet girl babe and white like our mother. And finally, when one night came a man riding hard to tell that Watohantowet—who had long disputed boundaries—was on the war-path with manie braves, my brother was fain for alle his serious talk to lay hold of as many trenchers as he could carry, and order me to bring the bed, our mother following with her babe.

There came no Indians, and we went back i' th' home next day. But the spring was hard to bear. Robert did well; but one day i' th' last o' spring he came and did throw himself on th' floor in a sweat.

"Rose!" saith he, "there is but one hen with a whole suit of feathers," saith he. Indeed, a murrain had settled upon our poor fowls, giving them naked crops and backs which blistered i' th' sun. "And all th' maize be yellow," saith he. "There is no hill that is good and greene; and thou knowest how I have watered it!"

It was a hot afternoon, with a shore wind. Our mother's hair clung to her pretty temples in littel damp rings, as she sewed at th' bed valence, sweet with lavender—our mother was e'er dainty in bedding.

"Lie, rest, my good lad," saith she. "When th' sun's down Rose and I will help carry water. I know how to dig about th' roots. Thou shalt not lose thy maize!" And she smiled tremulously as one's still civil to acquaintance on th' day of one's distress.

When that it was coole, our mother was as good as a' word, carrying full piggins from th' spring with haste for fear o' th' babe's awakening. After shoes were bad and they did tear upon the stony dirt, th' skin reddening i' th' slits; but so she only flew the faster, her arms straining with her loads. Then would she fall to and dig, while th' damp settled, and th' frogs i' th' pools clamoured. And then in, when we could see a blade no more, with hand at her back, bedraggled and footsore, but with kinde white looks at Robert and me as we raked th' ashes off th' stick and warmed th' bread.

But our maize was ne'er to be harvested. Another fell story came to Hampton of more Indians coming from inland. Anell I wot how my mother paled and screeched "Robert! Robert!" when the naybur body told it, smoothing her pinners by oure hearthe. My brother rushed in from th' patch; but he saw, and I did, 'twas our father she was calling.

I sat me down to spin next day, my stint being marked for me. 'Twas a fayre morning, and Robert, outside, went back and forth like th' shuttle i' th' web i' our field. And mother she put on th' crape shawl—'twas foreign, and flowered most beautifully—and taking th' babe in her arms, she starts for th' beach for an airing. I can see her yet when I close my eyes—slender, of a willowy shape, hurrying across th' fields i' th' salt ayre—th' little white bundle in her arms.

Now, she did go to a hairy captain of a great smack i' the harbour, and says she with a curtsey—our mother was aye mannerlie:

"I am Robert Moody's wife and I have in mind to live at th' shoals. Wilt carry out my gear?"

But he looked with a weary face at my littel mother.

"Best stay on th' mainland, good wife! Thou dost not know what is life on th' Shoals! Thou canst not help pull in a trawl!" said the man.

"No, but my son can," said our mother quickly, and lifting her timid eyes. "He is fifteen, and brawny."

"Oh, if thy son can work!" said th' captain. And th' bargain was clinched by th' crape shawl for 's dame.

Oure mother did plan this flitting because those seven islands, nine miles from land, had been a sure refuge from red men. Dreadful folke of th' seas went there, but Indians never.

In another weeke we were far from our hollyoaks and our dear rustical porch. The Toppans o' th' Garrison House helped us off, even running with a flitch of bacon when we were upon th' load, Mr. Toppan seeming in a browne studdy over my mother's glittering eyes; but he said nothing. Our gear was woefullie broken in th' handling, Robert breaking the green beaker as we crowded upon th' smack—he having th' glass in 's hands for safety. Oh, th' intolerable smells of our craft as we went rockin' and dipping over th' green waves! We could say but naught and cover our heads close as th' sailors advised for sickness, till at length, when Robert and I came up for breath like fishes, lo! great and small fields before and round us set upon the sea like th' stones i' th' splendid ring upon Lady Pickering's finger. But, alas! Hampton was now a littel rimme of a wurld of water.

Our home on th' Shoals was a close chamber of a miserable hut, our bed with its hangings occupying half th' space. Onlie one pane i' the casement, and that upon a prospect, oh, dolefulle! of th' deep seas. We all thinned for th' swete fresh ayre of Hampton, and th' cleanliness and th' quiet and th' pleasant smells, sights and sounds. Our mother satte alle day at her wheel, and I at her feet, hetchelling flax and tow. And th' puny babe between us, minded too little sometimes. Then would come in Robert, with a great fish perchance, or a kettle of clams, and would take up th' precious mite into his leathern jerkin, not o'er clean to touch, and kiss and hug her till th' tiny maid's frocks were alle rumpled. 'Twas plain to see this wild life suited Robert. He liked th' sea. But tho' th' life pleased him, it harmed him, foul words beginning to stick in 's memory and fall from 's tongue.

The end came. One night we were stirred from sleep by a horrible face at our casement. 'Twas of a foul man, drunk ever, and sprawled upon th' rocks continuallie—'twas sayd he was to have been hanged on the land, and did never dare step off the Shoals.

"Wake, woman!" bellowed th' harsh voice. "Look, all of ye."

And as we huddled at th' casement he pointed o'er th' heaving waters, reflecting a full moon to a flock of canoes like swimming birds. We could see dark forms i' them, steering with arrowy paddles.

"Oh, what shall I do?" shrieked our mother. "Oh, what shall I do?"

"Do?" yelled th' man; "hide thee! Hark ye! Hark ye! There's no time for boats, but there's a clift i' th' rocks back o' th' fish house. Thou'll know it by th' big balanced rock where th' babes play with kickshaws; 'tis below." And th' face was withdrawn.

"And thou?" I screamed after him.

"God a mercy, wench!" cried he, as he ran to other houses; "there be forty lurking places on Star."

How ghost-like were th' rocks; and th' booming sea was frightfullie neare this crevice to which we crept upon oure knees, letting each th' other down painfullie therein. Our mother drew herself in as far as she could, lying flat and face down upon th' slimy floor. I next, pressed close, and Robert valiantlie near th' mouthe of th' poor rift; 'twas soe small we were scarcely out of th' moonlight. So we crouched and quivered together till awful sounds began to rise, somewhat dulled by th' dashing waves anext us. Then Robert did creep in more, and our mother pushed us both to th' farthest and she, with th' babe, did lie upon us, guarding us.

But now th' poore babe unable to move its legs, and half-smothered in our mother's kirtle, began to roar lustilie. Oh, th' horror o' th' time! Again and again our mother tried to feed it, but it would not eat, and its cries were shriller and more shrill. We both turned in an agonie to look toward the unconscious little thing that was calling death our way; but our mother writhed herself out o' th' cave, went headlong forth into th' pit at 's mouth; then back anew upon us, trying with more than mortal endeavour, to still th' child; then forth again. Then a sharp wail, like a cat's cry when it is grasped by th' legs for killing, a thud, a shower of warm drops and flinty bits in oure faces, and oure mother drew herself in alone.

I cannot tell how terrible that night was! By times th' redskin went scampering and yelling o'er the rocks, smells of smoke drifting down e'en to us. Robert would put up a cold hand, touching us for companionship. But our mother replied naught in kind, as she lay upon us her whole length, making no sound, whether a sigh or a groan; but drawing long breath ever and anon, like one that is coming back to life.

'Twas light enow to see each th' other's face when she did draw herself out o' th' cave. All noise had long ceased. We children following, stiff, sore, and appalled, came upon her wordless, with a blood-stained bundle i' her lap.

Then up started she and darted out o' th' rift like a flame to th' smoking town. Alack! Our kind heralde had found no lurking place. Robert stumbled o'er him in th' ashes. Shoalers were landing from other islands, and to them our sad mother went straightwaie with her story, sparing herself not at all. I have seen death, but never have I seen anie sight so woefull as her drawn, tortured mouth and th' tale coming from lips that refused to close over her teeth.

There was silence; but 'twas dreadfull to see how all fell awaie from our deare littel mother.

When the tiny body was wrapped i' my kirtle waiting with th' other dead for th' trench to be deep enow, he did look fearfullie upon it with a long, shuddering "How could I?" and then clasping us wildly, "How could I not?"

A great armed dame from Smutty Nose opened wide her arms to our mother's littel figure, drawing her into them from our clinging hands and kisses.

"Thou poore soule!" saith she. "'Twas human nature," saith she. "By Heaven!" swore she, slapping a thigh roundly with her mighty hand. "There be not a mother on th' islands who would not have done th' same were she valiant enow; and yet—thou poor mouse!" and th' big mannish dame cried over my mother's hidden pretty head. And when all's o'er, 'tis she who leads my mother to a boat.

'Twas pitifull, oure mother's meekenesse amid universal blame; for when they did rebuild on Star nobody bade us return—day by day th' dames paddled over from Smutty Nose to watch th' progress of their new huts, and never a word to us—to our red-faced dame's high and loud displeasure.

Soe, as 'twas plain my mother was thought a piece of ill-luck and dreaded upon th' Shoals, we came again into the white curve of Hampton Bay, this time gearless as well as houseless, but by favour of th' Toppans, getting into our small home again in th' calm inland. Methinks I never knew how sweete a picture is th' country till I saw it then, after soe much paine. Th' sun shown with yellow light on th' mown grass and men were threshing th' nut trees and children and women were putting the nuts in baskets. And Mistress Toppan sent in honey i' the comb and bread hot o' th' oven to our supper. She sent it. Good-wife nor maiden came much to us then nor thereafter.

"Sis," saith Robert one day, stretched out like a wild beast along th' limb of our apple-tree, "dost know that th' court 'n Portsmouth are to find a true bill aga'nst mother?"

"What true bill?" I cried, feeling frozen.

"For th'—th' baby," stammered my brother. "And oh! to think I am strong; and my poore mother soe littel and weak, to hang!" and he stopped, choking.

"Thee need'st not fear that, lad," said Mr. Toppan's mellow, friendly voice behind us. We started, and Robert tried to hide 's tears. "I saw to a verity thy poore mother was distracted before she left us," saith he; "and I am much to blame that e'er I allowed her out o' my wife's sight."

Robert looked at him with a glance of his dark eyes like a caress. Sweet words were seldom on Robert's lips—they were hidden treasures for our mother alwaies—but the darting glance was thanks.

"I know, lad! I know!" saith Mr. Toppan, sighing. And again softly, "I know!"

People did not gossip of us long neither, leaving us to our shrinking selves by reason of a grand new arrival in Hampton—an officer from South, with a band of black footmen, and beginning the finest wooden house o' th' land around, set on a hill, and visible white and statelie from th' sea. 'Twas painted a white; the onlie painted house inne New England. General Moulton loitered about Hampton as his house built, spending doubloons. He never bargained, 'twas said. Did he have a need of aniething, 'twas bought, and no questions of price. These things would Robert and I heare when at work in barn and kitchen, soe few came to sit by mother on oure settle, where she sat all day long ailing. Not forty, and yet with streaks in her hair, and a looke in her eyes not to be worded.

A day in May, while mother and I were sprinkling th' darke, ill-smelling linen on our bleach-ground, there rides up th' general, in black velvet. His lips were thick, and his nostrils wide, but he was comely.

"Art thou th' dame who maketh linen sheeting?" saith he; "I do desire a web."

My mother was overjoyed at so greate an order—we had none too much i' the cupboard—and she hurried around her web on th' grass, patting and praising it and babbling with more liveliness than for a yeare, of its merits and its defects. But th' gentleman was silent, looking at me instead o' th' linen.

As we sat in the gloaming, came a black with curds and creams neatlie layd upon a silver dish "for Mistress Rose Moody." I cared more for the fayre dish than th' curds, and even mother liked to trye a littel off th' embossed side o' th' platter, Robert finishing all, with a boy's greediness.

'Twas thus th' next daye and next. And by th' next th' old wives i' all Hampton grew nayburly, but th' maids did seem thrice distant and cold to me.

Th' next was wild weather; th' rain that th' wind drove aslant our lattice freezing i' th' falling. Robert had been forth, and did sit steaming on th' hearth, mending's fork as he dried. And our mother upon th' settle in a thick coverlet. 'Twas dull i' th' room and, not over-warm neither. And I at th' loom.

There came th' sound of horse's feet and a knock, and General Moulton in our porch bowing low, cobwebby, soaked lace falling down over 's strong white hands as he doffed his hat to me. But Robert was soure and looked not from th' fork-teeth.

"Sweetheart," saith the general, following me to th' loom across th' uneven floor, "wilt wed with me? Thou must go with thy linen."

My dry tongue let me talke not, but love and loyaltie to our mother stirred Robert.

"General Moulton," saith he, with a flaming face, "dost know who thou'rt asking? Hampton doth set us apart," saith he bitterlie.

"And why?" saith the general fiercely. "Thy mother could not hurt a flea commonlie. Who can say what he will doe in a fearfull peril? She will be my mother, and she will come and see us happy; it may tend to make her soe. Ay," saith he, "sweet Rose, wilt come upon th' hill, thou, and th' mother, and Robert?"

Robert looked at me jealouslie. "I shall earn a man's wage i' th' year," he muttered tremulouslie. 'Twas not a moment! and yet we did read each th' other i' that glance. He dropped his eyes.

"Rose is good," came quietlie, yet to start one, from th' settle, where my mother sat in a strange unmannerlie silence. "And thou art good to love our poore Rose—my girl that hath no gear but a mother's shame!"

And she hid her thin face, trembling and tearlesse.

* * * * *

'Tis nine years I have been General Moulton's dame. From my great room I look off o'er the breathlesslie quiet countrie to the banks o' sunsmitten clouds sailing landwards. 'Tis th' same landskip.

Am I happy? I should be; for Robert by General Moulton's favor hath an education and a shippe.

Methinks, at times, old Cæsar knoweth th' general better than his wife doth. My husband goeth awaie yearlie for weekes, and on's return seemeth to adapt himself to a new life. I have found there be spaces of his mind where he chooses to be alone. I make no comment. He hath raised me to a fair station—as high as of anie private gentlewoman of th' colonies.

But once, a wild-looking man came for entertainment. He was a practiser of th' black art—it was soe sayd—and as I handed him a cup of amber drink in th' porch I did beg him for my fortune.

"Thou hast had a strange one," saith he, viewing me strangelie. "Thou art here i' the warm world. Ask nothing further."

But I pestered, and would not be gainsayed. But, at last, up waves he his empty cup.

"Look, an' thou must!" saith he. "Thy will must be my law in thine own house."

Alack! th' rim of th' cup expanded and parted, and there was my husband sitting in my fayre room, but wrinkled; and a handsome girl hung about him. Then all became blurred like an image i' a stirred pool, and I was but staring into th' cup.

"Thy husband is to be twice matched," said th' man grimlie, and with a mocking reverence.

I wish I had not looked i' th' cup. And yet th' black art is fiends' pleasure. God rules. And still, would I had not this to think of; for I love th' day and my house, and th' ordering o' my maids.

Down i' th' graveyard mother's mound is greene. Mayhap she did feel this once, in her turne.

The fashion of this wurld passeth awaie.

M. MOULTON.

SEEN YOUR PHOTO IN SHORT STORIES?

IF SO, YOU WILL GET £5.

HERE IS THE SCHEME.

We have in our possession a considerable number of photographs of men, women, and children of all grades of society secured for us by our agents, who have scoured the United Kingdom for this special purpose.

Each week we publish five of these portraits, and to each of the persons thus represented we dispatch the sum of £5, on his or her forwarding a claim on a post-card addressed to PORTRAIT DEPARTMENT, "SHORT STORIES," Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Although the persons whose portraits will appear in this competition are quite unknown to us personally, we have their names and addresses in our possession, and, therefore, a claim can be settled at once, without risk of fraud.

We may say that our agents are still at work all over the country. It is, therefore, possible that your portrait may appear at any moment without your knowing it. So you should watch SHORT STORIES.

Is your portrait here? If so, drop us a post-card, and get £5. Five more portraits will appear next week.

All claims in connection with the portraits below must reach the address already given above by Tuesday next, December 10th. Full names and addresses of the correct claimants will appear in succeeding numbers.

HOW TO MAKE A CLAIM FOR A £5 NOTE.

Simply write on a post-card these words:

> The Portrait No.......... (here put number of portrait) in the current number of SHORT STORIES is mine. Please forward a £5 note.
> (Name and full address.)

Persons represented must claim for themselves. Claims made by other people on their behalf will be ignored.

THE OWNER OF "VARNHAGEN."

HAVING seen the vanity of most earthly things, Sir Peveril Wynter, diplomatist and sportsman, had the idea that other people might like to see it too, and to that end set about writing his reminiscences. Fate directed that I, Rosalys Brown, of Miss Wiggins' Typewriting Bureau, in Cockspur Street, should be selected as his amanuensis, and so, from ten to four each day for some time, I "took down" the aged baronet at the gloomy old family mansion in Brook Street.

That is to say, I dutifully sat, pencil and note-book in hand, prepared to perform my part of the contract, for a certain number of hours each day; but my temporary employer preferred the excitement of quarrelling with his two sons, Mr. Arthur and Mr. Guy, abusing his doctor, storming at his man, and generally providing a little wholesome fillip for the household, to proceeding with the task in hand.

In this way I had ample time to look about me, and being a young person of some observation, I quickly came to some interesting conclusions.

First, I discovered that I disliked Mr. Guy, and liked Mr. Arthur. (Mind, I merely said "liked.") Their estimable parent, be it noted, disliked them both with impartial thoroughness. Lady Wynter was a pale-haired nonentity with a perpetual cold, who did not count in the house, and merely put in a perfunctory "Oh, Peveril!" when the old man was particularly violent in his denunciation of the rest of the menage.

I could not quite make out Dr. O'Connor, the baronet's medical attendant. He was quite young, rather handsome in a dark, Celtic way, and his manner was boisterous out of Sir Peveril's room, and flippant inside it. He used to come every day, for the old man was possessed with the idea that he was fast sinking into the grave, and that nothing but the most assiduous care would keep him out of it for very long. He seemed to look forward to the doctor's visits, though he very often abused him thoroughly while they lasted.

"Thank goodness you've come, O'Connor," he would growl. "My two dutiful sons have been in, with faces as long as from here to Pall Mall, boring me to death. Come on; say something to make me laugh, or you won't come here again." This was when he was in a particularly good humour.

One thing that struck me as strange about this peculiar household was that Dr. O'Connor and Mr. Guy were always—in common phrase—as "thick as thieves," behind Sir Peveril's back, while the doctor, wth true Celtic pliability, did not hesitate to cordially concur in anything derogatory which his interesting patient might utter against the young man. I set myself to pierce the meaning of this odd friendship between the youthful doctor and his patient's son. Mr. Arthur, I discovered, treated O'Connor as a mere piece of furniture; which did not enhance his popularity in that direction. One thing united father, son, and medico—and that was a passionate love of sport, especially racing. "Varnhagen," the pick and pride of Sir Peveril's stables, was entered for the forthcoming Derby; and I never heard so much horse-talk in my life as I did during the days I spent at the Brook Street house. Nor was Sir Peverli the least eager and animated of the party when the conversation veered round to the inevitable subject.

The social barometer at Sir Peveril's generally pointed to "unsettled," but the great storm burst soon after my arrival. Dr. O'Connor, lounging in his usual free-and-easy manner at the side of Sir Peveril's couch, was entertaining him with some spiteful gossip from the clubs, the old man, huddled among his pillows, looking, as usual, as if nothing about him were living but his scornful and piercing black eyes. The doctor, gliding without a change of tone, from one subject to another, dropped a brief remark, which made Sir Peveril's withered face work convulsively.

"Is that so?" he asked, in a harsh whisper.

"I'm told so on very good authority," laughed the doctor carelessly, while his eyes glittered with malice.

"We'll see," growled the baronet. "Send Mr. Arthur to me, will you," he said to the man who answered his bell.

He took no notice of his son's greeting.

"What d'ye fancy for the Derby?" he asked abruptly, fixing his eagle's gaze on the young man's face.

The latter looked somewhat embarrassed.

"Well," he blurted out at last, "I rather think Quickstep has a chance."

"Ugh!" grunted his parent. "And you're backing it, I suppose?"

"Not exactly," said Mr. Arthur.

"Not exactly!" roared Sir Peveril, in a terrible voice. "What fool's talk is this? Why aren't you backing our own horse, ye unnatural young hound? What d'ye mean by it? Isn't a horse from your own father's stables good enough? Why don't you fancy Varnhagen? Will you be so good as to tell me?"

"I can't help it," said the young man desperately, while a troubled look came into his clear blue eyes. "I simply don't think Varnhagen can win. But all the same, I wouldn't think of backing anything else—much as I need money."

"That's a lie!" shouted his venerable sire. "Get out of my sight, will you? Young monster, trying to spoil the market for your own father! Pretty pair of son's I've got! Guy's a brute, and you're a fool, and worse!"

Exhausted with passion, the baronet sank down among his pillows, while his son, pallid to the lips, turned without a word and left the room. I never admired Mr. Arthur so much as at that moment. He quivered under his terrible old father's reiterated insults as if they were blows, but controlled himself sufficiently to refrain from reply. The doctor had discreetly strolled to the window during the brief scene between father and son, and I could see his shoulders shaking with ill-suppressed mirth. Once more I puzzled over the obvious dislike he bore for Mr. Arthur. After this interview he and the other brother appeared more intimate than ever, and one would frequently find them in earnest converse. They were an ill-assorted pair;

Dr. O'Connor clever, sardonic, witty, the other heavy, dull, and silent.

I only remember one remark with which he honoured me.

"I say, you're lookin' rippin' to-day," he was pleased to observe, after a prolonged inspection of my appearance. After which he proceeded to demonstrate his approval in a practical manner, for which he got his face severely slapped.

"Serve you right, young man," said O'Connor, coming out of Sir Peveril's room at the moment when I administered the chastisement. They called each other by their christian names these two. "Come on, don't be a fool, Guy," the doctor went on, taking his interesting friend's arm, and leading him away.

Derby Day came in the usual order of things. Shall I ever forget it? I turned up at Brook Street at ten o'clock, having received no instructions to the contrary.

As I anticipated, there was not much work to do. Sir Peveril was in a state of nervous excitement, which made him peculiarly cantankerous; and if all the wishes he uttered concerning the Brook Street household had been promptly attended to, the end of all parties concerned would have been more dramatic than pleasing. I met Mr. Arthur on the steps. His usually sunny face was somewhat clouded, but he greeted me with no lack of cheer.

"Well," said he, "I'm off to Epsom to see poor old Varnhagen beaten." This in the most flippant manner.

"I do hope it won't be," said I.

"Sure to be," answered my employer's son. "I'm sorry because the governor will be in such a bait about it. The poor old chap's set his heart on winning a Derby. Good-bye, Miss Brown," as the hansom jingled up.

To my surprise I found Mr. Guy at home. He and Dr. O'Connor lingered affectionately round the invalid baronet, bearing the avalanche of abuse which descended upon them with the constancy of martyrs. Gradually the old man grew weaker, his voice failed him as the morning wore on, and he could only rave in a husky whisper, and shake a waxen fist at his son and his medical man.

"Why do you excite yourself so, Peveril?" whispered his lady-wife in her feeble way. "You only tire yourself out, you know, and that's so bad for you."

It was about twelve o'clock when I went to fetch a book from the library. Shall I ever forget what I saw when I returned to Sir Peveril's room? The old man was lying back among his pillows motionless. O'Connor and Mr. Guy bent over him. Soon the former raised a pallid, awestricken face to Guy as I stood in the doorway, and I saw him form one word with his lips.

The son shuddered convulsively, and the two men walked towards the centre of the room.

"It's—it's fearfully sudden," muttered the son.

"I always knew that it would come like this, Sir Guy," the doctor whispered back, with an emphasis on the prefix.

"Shut up about that now," hissed the new baronet shuddering anew. "Let us tell them."

The doctor's face grew hard as granite.

"Not yet," he said, placing an hand on his friend's shoulder. "You forget."

"What? Speak out, man," replied Guy in his heavy way, searching the other's face with his dull eyes.

I felt sick with horror and excitement, my heart thumped as if it would burst my ribs.

But I looked and listened—listened and looked, with tense attention.

"If the nominator of a horse dies before the race is run—" began O'Connor, as if he were impressing a lesson on a child—"the nomination is void, and—"

"I know all that," interrupted the other. "But—"

"Look here," said the doctor sharply. "If Varnhagen does not win this Derby, I am ruined. It may matter little to you, but I am a poor medical man, and I have invested my all in this horse. I fancy you see why I cannot afford to let this be known till after the race is run. You will help me, of course?"

"I won't," snapped Guy sullenly.

"I tell you you will," hissed O'Connor, with a savagery in look and tone that froze the blood round my heart. They were blind and deaf to everything, so I slipped softly as a cat into a curtained window-seat, whence I could see and hear.

This is what I saw. The door was locked. Then the doctor and the other villain lifted the inanimate body of the baronet into a large easy-chair, which they wheeled to the window. The drooping head was supported by pillows, and the hand folded in as natural a manner as might be on the lap. The windows stood wide open, and any passenger in the street might easily see Sir Peveril Wynter calmly enjoying the balmy noon-tide air, and looking remarkably well, considering his great age, and invalid condition.

The son was moaning and shivering with horror as he went about his hideous task, but the other ghoul was perfectly calm. His breath came somewhat thickly, and one drop of moisture glittered on his pallid forehead, but that was all.

"Bah! How white he is!" muttered the doctor, as he contemplated the still figure in the chair. There were geraniums in the window-boxes. O'Connor took some of the vivid petals and crushed them in his hands. Then, as his accomplice turned away with a sob of horror and covered his face, the doctor coolly smeared the marble cheeks with the colour thus obtained. I with difficulty repressed a desire to scream aloud at the utter brutal callousness of the villain.

Then, taking chairs as far away from the window as possible, this precious pair began their watch, fortified with a decanter of brandy.

How those hours of horror dragged away I cannot tell. I thought I was going mad. Fearful of attracting the attention of the two men, I was forced to remain well-nigh as motionless as the figure at the window. The physical agony of cramp was added to the mental torture I was undergoing.

It seemed endless days before an excited newspaper-boy dashed down the quiet street, waving a contents bill like a banner.

"Derby winner! Speshul!" he shouted.

"What's won, boy?" cried the doctor, tossing him a coin.

"Varnhagen, Quickstep, Salerno—one, two, free, sir."

A loud gasp of relief burst from Guy.

The doctor wiped his pale forehead.

Old General Brent came stamping along the pavement.

"Afternoon, Sir Peveril!" cried the old warrior, waving a buckskin glove at the window. "Glad to see you looking so well."

"That's one outside witness," muttered O'Connor, with a sinister smile.

"Don't," whimpered his accomplice, feebly. "Who'll tell 'em now?"

"Leave it to me," said the doctor, striding from the room. Then everything reeled about me, darkness fell, and I fainted.

* * * * *

My bewildered senses could hardly grasp the meaning of the strange scene I found being enacted when I recovered from my silly fainting-fit.

The room was filled with people—or so it seemed to me, in my dazed state.

"Better now?" whispered a voice in my ear. It was Mr. Arthur, who, with the tenderness of a woman was bending over me.

I pushed him away.

"Don't," I said ungratefully, though I felt extremely weak, and greatly inclined to burst into tears. "Poor Sir Peveril——"

"Hush, it's all right," said Mr. Arthur soothingly.

And then a well-known voice fell on my ears.

It was Sir Peveril's.

The old man was sitting in his accustomed place, his eyes bright and piercing as ever, were fixed on the tall, defiant figure of O'Connor, who stood with folded arms in the centre of the room, looking his patient steadily in the face. He was deadly pale, but his lips wore their own habitual sneer, while such malignity burnt in his eyes as made one's blood run cold.

"Fool," said Sir Peveril, in a harsh whisper, "you, who pretend to medical knowledge, cannot tell catalepsy from—the other thing! Gone, was I? Dead, eh? And I heard every word you pair of blackguards were saying. Move, or speak, I could not, but I could hear—ha! I could hear, and much too plainly for some people's convenience. Now get out of my sight, you carrion crow!"

I did not hear the rest of the baronet's little oration for here I quietly fainted again.

I believe, however, that those interested in such subjects will find a more detailed account of the case in Professor Haydon's very learned and exhaustive work on "Catalepsy and Apparent Death," published a few years back, in two portly octavo volumes. I have told all that I know about it, just exactly as it occurred

V. Dryden.

A DUSKY HEROINE.

Whenever I hear a man say that he would like to have the experience of a ride by the side of the driver of a railway locomotive, a little shiver passes through me as I remember my own. It is a long time since that adventure, but the recollection of it is still vivid; and this is not to be wondered at, considering the exceptional character of the ride.

It is scarcely necessary to say that I was a young man, for older men rarely have the energy that takes them into such circumstances. My love of adventure had made me ship before the mast, and it made me leave the ship and try a cruise ashore in the company of a young French sailor; then it came about that we found ourselves in Algeria at a time when the French were having trouble with the natives, and the services of two likely young fellows were accepted at once.

Like a genuine British tar, I soon made friends with my comrades, who just as quickly forgot their prejudice against Albion, so far as I was concerned, and taught me a little of their own tongue and a little of the native lingo which they had picked up.

I was sent up country a bit to take part in the scrimmages with the Kabyles, and very soon had all I wanted in the way of fighting.

It was not very entertaining work after the novelty had worn off; we had chiefly to protect the lines of communication as best we could—the railway lines and telegraph wires, and so on—with no fight of a bigger sort than a skirmish. I had a great contempt for the savages, when I began, but I was compelled to admire their bravery and certain other good qualities; and, although they were not angels, I asked myself why I had mixed in the quarrel between them and the French. It certainly did not concern me.

This train of thought led me to side with the Kabyles to some extent; that is, I did what I could to soften the harshness of the treatment meted out to them by my comrades on occasions. As for myself, I have let a man off with a hiding instead of a piece of lead or a few inches of steel, after having explained to him in a mixed lingo that he had better let others do railway and telegraph engineering work in future.

One day a small party of six, including myself, came upon a man who seemed to be tampering with the rails round a bend, and of course he was seized and interrogated. He insisted that he was not guilty of the charge, that he was doing something very innocent—I didn't understand enough to know what he was saying exactly—and that he was not a warrior, owing to a slight lameness.

My comrades laughed, saying that lameness did not prevent a man from doing harm in other ways than fighting; they were incensed by the murder of a soldier on the previous day, and were determined to wreak vengeance upon all who fell into their hands. In spite of the protests of the native, they tied him to a tree and made ready to shoot him.

Now I believed the fellow's story; I felt certain that he had not been tampering with the rails on that occasion; there was something about the man's face that took my fancy and made me accept his denial. He had a noble mien. I was convinced that he would have scorned to deny the act had he really committed it, or about to do so. A cursory examination of the rails showed me that nothing had actually been done. I made up my mind to intercede.

But I became angry when I found that they intended to have some sport; they intended to fire separately at him, not to kill him, but to wound or to terrify him by firing at points close to his body. That made my blood hot and I stepped deliberately in front of the human target and dared them to fire.

I had my own rifle against my shoulder in a twinkling, and the men knew enough of my character to understand that it would not be safe to defy me. So we had a parley, and in the end the native was allowed to go free. He thanked me with stately dignity, and limped away.

I imagined that I should be court-martialled, but my comrades did not report the incident, probably fearing that they might be punished for cruelty—for that sort of thing was not permitted officially, although it may have been winked at sometimes, when it was done quietly.

That act of kindness was repaid to me not long afterwards, as I will explain.

I was one of a small detachment sent farther inland, some six days later, to quell an outbreak in a part that had been quiet till then. We found the task a much tougher one than was anticipated, and had to ask for more men. We found ourselves split up and continually fighting.

About a score of us were fairly cornered in a hastily constructed "fort," without provisions, and with precious little ammunition. We held the Kabyles at bay till they managed to fire the woodwork of which our "walls" were chiefly composed, and then we had to make a sortie and fight for it.

I do not know what became of my comrades, but I fear that they were all killed. I fought like a demon and forced a passage through the enemy, but just as I thought I had got clear, I fancied that something went wrong with my head, and I did not remember any more till I found myself bound and in an upright position.

It did not take long for full consciousness to come back, although my head throbbed and ached, and there was a crowd of Kabyles round me, making a most awful row.

Judge of my surprise on discovering that I was standing in the cab of a locomotive, bound to the side by a strong rope that must have been of European manufacture. No trucks were attached to the engine, but the driver was at his post, ready to move the lever and set it going. What did it mean?

Seeing that I had recovered my senses, the natives became more merry than ever, and began to bustle about in a manner that suggested preparation for a festival. My first notion was that they intended to make the driver go slowly while they took pot shots at me; then it occurred to me that they would send us both along the line to a spot where the rails had been taken up, and so bring about our death. The driver would have more chance than I, but I supposed that the Kabyles would take care that he did not escape. Still, it would be more agreeable to be dispatched by a spear or a ball than to lie helpless in the cab of an overturned engine and be scalded to death, for instance. I looked towards the driver again, hoping that he would glance round at me and so give me an idea of what was to happen, but he remained motionless.

Presently a native clambered on the engine and gave some orders in a low tone to the driver. The latter moved the lever and the native made haste to jump off, falling in a heap on the ground. Notwithstanding my terrible position I laughed, which drew a howl of rage from the mob.

The engine moved slowly forward, and the driver turned for the first time and came towards me. But he did not look at me as he walked to the edge.

"What does it all mean?" I inquired in French.

"It means that the engine will gather speed every second and take you to that bridge," he replied, without turning his head. "I could not help it; they forced me and would have killed me as well as you if I had not agreed to work the lever."

Then he jumped off the moving engine and I was left to conjecture concerning my fate when the bridge was reached.

In such moments as those, how rapidly do one's thoughts chase each other through the mind. I saw, mentally, that the train had been captured and its protectors killed or driven to flight; the man who was needed to set the engine in motion had been caught and his life spared for some purpose; then I had fallen into their hands—the one whom they evidently remembered as having been responsible for the deaths of several of their number, the only one of the little band who had cut through their lines, and they had devised a horrible death for me.

I knew what he meant by the bridge. The metals had been laid across a chasm by means of wooden supports in the form of high trees, further supports had been provided by using other trees as crutches, sloping from a lower level in the sides of the rock to the trees on which the metals rested. It was a rough affair, but it served the purpose, and care had been taken that the strain should not be too heavy. There were no cross pieces so you looked down between the lines, and outside them, into the depths of the chasm.

This bridge had been weakened or destroyed, then, and I was to be dashed into the abyss! As I realised this horrible fact, I returned to my immediate surroundings; all these reflections had passed through my brain very rapidly and the engine had only carried me a few yards from the natives. It was getting up speed, however, and I should soon be at the bridge. I tried to think how far off it was, but I could not recall the distance.

What was that? For a second a thrill of fear shot through me, and my heart seemed to stop beating. Something had scrambled along the floor of the cab, or had clambered on to it. The natives raised a shout, and the next instant there arose from the floor a form that stood before me as a Kabyle girl, panting from excitement and want of breath. I forgot all in my amazement and stared at her.

I had not rescued any lovely native maiden, and knew nothing of this one. I must be dreaming or mad.

A cry came from the girl's lips as she felt in her belt.

"I have dropped it! I have lost my knife!" she moaned, and sank on her knees in despair.

I understood some of the words, and they were sufficient to make the meaning clear to me. I shall give her remarks in intellectual language, but I will state here that they were made in a mixture of language which it would be futile to reproduce.

The engine had now gained momentum and was rattling along. I comprehended that she had clambered on to the floor of the cab at the risk of her life in order to save mine. The natives were not attempting to follow, possibly because they regarded our deaths as certain in any case.

"Turn the lever!" I commanded, seeing a chance of safety. I spoke in English, forgetting myself in the excitement of the situation. Of course she shook her head. I tried to tell her what to do in the medley of tongues generally used by me, but this command required more precision of speech than the mere asking of food, especially as I could not back it up by gestures.

"The bridge is burning—you will die!"

I understood that, but the thought of death was lost in the admiration I felt at the fact that she did not mention herself. What had I done to merit such devotion?

"Jump off!" I cried, shaking my head violently to emphasise my meaning.

She made a negative sign. I tried to tell her what to do with the lever, using copious details, and at length I succeeded. She went closer and pointed to it, then moved her finger in different directions till I nodded affirmatively. I heaved a sigh; there was yet hope of life.

But she could not turn it. The engine was an old thing, and either the lever had got wedged or the driver had done it on purpose. She flung herself on her knees in front of me and began to gnaw at the cords that bound me.

I had no knife about me which she could find and use. I strained at the cords in vain. I knew that at the rate we were going we must soon reach the bridge; it was all over with me.

"Jump off while you can!" I cried once more, even though I recognised that it meant death or mutilation to do so.

"You saved my father! I asked them to let you go; they refused. I save you!"

So she was his daughter! But she could not save me.

She was tugging at the knot now with her lovely white teeth and her slim fingers alternately. They had been well tied, those cords! I turned my head to look ahead and my heart throbbed more quickly as I caught sight of a thin column of smoke. That was the bridge—and there was death!

"Pull!" I shouted frantically. Now that the end was so near I clung to life.

She tugged with teeth, fingers, and nails till the blood came, and all the time we were rushing to destruction. Heavens! a knot was giving! A piece of stick lay on the floor, and this she used instead of her fingers as soon as there was space to insert the end. One knot undone, but the engine getting nearer and nearer the bridge. She worked frantically and I writhed in agony at my helplessness; we were rushing to destruction, yet I could do nothing.

Another knot, but we were close to the bridge, and there was yet a third knot to untie. The girl tore at it with her teeth, while I kept my eyes fixed on the rapidly nearing bridge and my senses on the tension of the cord. Was there yet a chance? I felt the cord give a little, and I shrivelled myself, as it were, to gain space to withdraw my arm. Hurrah! I shouted as I dragged an arm free, tearing the sleeve from the shoulder.

Only a short distance from the chasm now. I could see that the metals were still in position, but the supports were burning, and I could not expect that the engine would go over safely. The natives must have smeared those huge trunks with some substance that would enable the flames to get a firm hold.

Both arms free! It was the work of an instant to get out of the cord, but that instant had brought us to the bridge and the engine rushed on to the single line that spanned the chasm amid the flames. I freed myself from my bonds as we left the solid ground, and at the same moment the girl gave a terrified cry and jumped. I could not stop her, and she disappeared from my sight—for ever!

Crack! I took my only chance and sprang from the falling engine with the object of clutching at one length of line that still remained in position between the land and the upper end of its first crutch. Down, down, down! Oh, the horror of that second which seemed like eternity. I can recollect that I made a frantic clutch—and missed!

Down! But only for a yard, and then I gripped the sloping crutch, which was charred in places, but no longer burning. My desperate plight gave me strength, and I clambered up the support to the line and crawled along that to land.

I lost consciousness after that, and, as I discovered later, had an attack of brain fever. I was found by a company of soldiers and well cared for, and finally sent to a hospital near the coast. When I was well again I was conveyed to Marseilles with other invalids, and it was not long before I journeyed home, with the intention of settling down.

I often regret that I do not even know the name of the girl who gave her life out of gratitude for my having saved her father's. Perhaps he had been a helpless spectator of the preparations for sending me to destruction, and had seen his daughter go with me. Oh, yes, there is a good deal of heroism and nobility of character among such races!

A ride on a locomotive? Ugh! Don't!

Uncle Horace and the Baby.

With the callousness of a bachelor, Horace declared that all babies looked alike to him—but that was before his sister Lill came home for a visit and brought her baby. The day she was to arrive Horace was even unkind enough to say that he would be glad to see Lill, but that he wished she would leave the baby behind. "A baby always keeps a house all stirred up," he complained; "they are either crying or hungry or sleepy or in some abnormal state, and you are expected to sympathise with all their woes." His mother only remarked severely, in reply, that he had once been a baby himself, and one of the very worst she had ever "brought up."

When the triumphant procession arrived, bringing Lill and the baby from the station, Horace kissed his sister and then stared at the white bundle in her arms.

"Now, I know you are simply dying to see the baby," she said, and began removing layers of gauze veiling from the face of the infant. When the little pink face was uncovered Horace nerved himself to look and think of some flattering remark that would satisfy the mother. He went up gingerly.

"By Jove! It's really pretty, isn't it?" he cried, in untactful surprise.

Lill and the other members of his family, from his father down, all looked at him resentfully:

"Of course it's pretty—it's a beautiful child!"

Horace tried to retrieve himself.

"I mean that it's nice to look at—not red and squashy-looking. It can open its eyes too, and it's all fuzzy on top of its head."

These unhappy observations only dragged him lower in the esteem of the family.

"Please call my baby 'she' and not 'it'!" Lill said resentfully. "You needn't be so surprised, either, because she is pretty!"

Horace tried to explain anew that he really admired the baby, but he was in disgrace. The family elbowed him away from the baby, and left him out of the conversation with ostentatious neglect.

But the baby—with the perversity of its sex—took a great fancy to uncle Horace. It soon preferred him to any other member of the family, and would even leave its mother's arms for his. When she saw him or heard his voice she smiled ecstatically and gurgled like a little brook. This sort of thing won Horace. From a stately indifference to his niece he came to be her wildest champion. He gave her all sorts of gifts, from a rattle to a tiny ruby ring; he learnt to talk the goo-goo language and he became a perfect nuisance in his whist club, where he would stop the lead while he told stories of the beauty and cleverness of the baby.

One evening Lill put the baby to sleep, turned the gas low in the room and went downstairs to join the family in the library. She stole upstairs again in about half an-hour to see if the child were covered and still sleeping. The family were startled by a shrill scream. Lill came flying downstairs to say that the baby was gone. Everybody said this could not be so, and they went upstairs with her to search for the baby, who couldn't walk and could only crawl across the room at about a snail's rate of locomotion. But the baby was gone, nevertheless. The family were quite sure no one had come in at the front door since Horace went out to his whist club, just after his sister had left the baby. Some kidnapper had stolen in by the back stairs or climbed over the porch—none of the family was really surprised that the baby had been stolen, for they believed so firmly in its beauty and cleverness that they were sure that everybody must covet it.

The grandfather hurried to the police-station, the aunts went out to give the alarm to the neighbours. Lill and her mother sat down alone by the empty cradle and gave themselves up to their grief. There was the sound of an opening door and footsteps on the stairs. Horace came into the room carrying the baby in his arms. It was wrapped in its cloak and a blanket.

"Oh, you've found my baby!" Lill cried. She and her mother implored him to tell how he had got it away from the kidnappers. They begged to know the story.

Horace was bewildered.

"Why," he said, "I just wrapped the baby up and slipped over to the whist club with her. I wanted to show her to the fellows. I was afraid you wouldn't let me take her if I asked, you are in such a fright about her. They thought her a little darling, too!"

"And so you were the one that took the baby?" Lill cried. "And you took her to the whist club in her nightgown? And I was nearly wild."

The other members of the family were sent for. The police were told they weren't wanted after all; and the neighbours were assured that the baby was safe.

Lill held the baby in her arms. Her mother and sisters stood on guard round her.

"To think, Horace," she said mournfully, "that you could take the baby over to your whist club in her nightgown, when she has a lovely real lace dress! How could you?"

- Inspector Rossiter, a detective from Scotland Yard.
- Rev. Gerald Hastie, curate of Fallowfield.
- James and Joseph Nubbley, two brothers living in a cottage near the school at Fallowfield; they are known to Seldon.
- Miss Morrison, the schoolmistress.
- Morgan Chandler, the steward at Fallowfield Hall.

CHAPTER XX.

An Early Morning Find.

Young, strong, hale, and alert as Jack Branscombe was the stress of the struggle, the chase, the three successive immersions in the ice-cold river, and the desperate battle with its tide had begun to tell terribly plainly. His saturated garments hung and clung heavy as lead, close and dank as river weeds, his joints began to stiffen, his teeth chattered, his breath came and went in painful, fitful gasps, and something at his heart seemed strained almost to snapping point. But he pressed on almost mechanically, feeling rather than reasoning that there was danger in yielding to the impulse to fling himself to earth, and, lying there, let Fate work its will with him. It would never do to seek Gerry Hastie now, he vaguely reasoned. To do so would be to risk not only capture, but needless trouble for a true friend, embarrassment, perhaps serious trouble to Gerry. He must get clear of the district before he approached a railway station; yes, even before he bought clothes to replace the cold, soaking garments hanging and clinging to his limbs.

Therefore he pressed on doggedly, until at last Mother Nature, thwarting his plan as she often thwarts schemes less vague and more possible, had her say in the matter. She said little, but what she said was to the purpose. Simply, "Stop! Sink to earth! Lie there!" And Jack Branscombe, utterly exhausted, overwrought, dead beat, resistlessly obeyed. Down he crashed in the long lush grass of a pleasant meadow, his limbs giving way. He vaguely meant to lie there just a few minutes till strength and wind came back to him, only Nature said one more word, "Sleep!" and strive as he might, being mortal man he could not disobey. So slumber locked him fast until eastward the darkness began to lift, the grey softened to purple, the purple faded into lilac and great beams of gold and crimson came up and touched and tinged the clouds, and by-and-by the eastern sky was ablaze with gold and saffron glory. And the birds that had begun to twitter had left off twittering and had burst into joyous song. The dews were glittering in the strengthening sunlight, jewels innumerable adorning Nature's garb of greens, and browns, and golds, and from far off cottage chimneys, tiny red dots on the landscape, came tiny twirls of blue-white smoke and scent of burning wood.

Mary Morrison, wearing her stoutest laced boots and gathering her skirts, freely displaying, because no one was there to revel in the view of them, her exquisitely turned ankles, a big rush basket on her arm, set across the fields in quest of mushrooms and blackberries just as the sun began to rise. And before the sun was well above the skyline her dimpled hands were black, blue, and crimson, and her basket was a quarter filled with rich, glistening big berries of that black which is richest of all, whether in art or Nature, because of the red which it conceals, and another quarter with drab and creamy-coloured mushrooms, some stem uppermost, displaying recesses of rich red brown. As the schoolmistress rambled through the fields she caught the contagion of Nature's own waking gladness, the sun shone in her eyes and in her heart, and she sang blithely as if in answer to the morning carol of the birds.

And then all at once the song died on her lips, the light in her eyes, the bonnie pink in her comely cheeks.

"Merciful heavens!" she exclaimed. "What can this mean?"

There, right at her feet in the long grasses a man was lying, his face upturned to the sky, lying there so still that for a moment she deemed that he was dead. Instantly terrible events of recent occurrence in the district flashed across her mind. Had she happened on the result of some new crime? But for all her gentleness, Mary Morrison, nerveless shadow of womanhood, her courage had been proved in many a crisis wherein her charges had been threatened by danger by infectious fever and other danger. In a moment she was on her knees beside the man lying there, raising his head in her hands.

"What has happened? Has there been an accident. Are you ill? Rouse yourself!" she cried. Then a colder chill clenched her heart as, gazing closer into the features, she recognised—

Jack Branscombe!

Yes! it was he, the suspected murderer for whom the hue and cry was rampant throughout the land. What should she do? Hasten back to the village and give the alarm? That seemed the first step dictated by human law, perhaps by justice. But another voice was speaking to the heart of Mary Morrison, humanity was whispering to womanhood.

"Speak, speak! Are you ill? Your forehead's like fire white as you are. You mustn't stay here, you'll die!"

Opening his eyes he cast a dazed look round.

"I won't be taken—I'm innocent!" he cried with a convulsive effort to struggle, then fell back with a groan, and his eyes dimly recognising her he said: "Am I dreaming? Through the whirling mist I see a face, a kind, sweet face that I seem to know."

"I'm Mary Morrison the schoolmistress."

"Oh, yes, yes; and you think I'm a thief and a murderer. You're sure of it; I read it in your eyes."

"No, no, law and justice insist those not proved to be guilty are innocent. Tell me, can I help you?"

"No, no, nobody can help me. All the world's against me."

"Don't think that; there is One Who rules all the world."

"And at times it has seemed to me that even He has forsaken me."

"No, no, you must never think anything so wicked as that. Tell me, can I help you? You are in a fever, your limbs are shivering with ague. What can I do?"

"Best leave me here to die. I don't want to bring trouble on others. I'm weary of it all, innocent though I am of what I'm charged with, let them take me, do what they will."

"You are innocent? I am glad to hear you say that. John Branscombe, because I've known and thought of you as a type of what was good and true in manhood."

"I swear it by all that is sacred, I swear that I am innocent."

"And I believe you. Come, let me help you. Do you think that leaning on my shoulder you could walk a little way. The school-house isn't far, I'll take you there."

Slowly, painfully, with her aid, he struggled to his feet and she helped him along the meadows, until at last they reached the little house adjoining the village school. By happy chance, no one was stirring, and unseen he entered the little sitting-room, fell heavily upon the couch, and fell into a stupor which lasted for many hours.

The schoolmistress had won for herself, in that quiet little old world village, renown as a capable and experienced nurse, and all that skill, care, and tenderness could suggest she did for him: but for many hours not even these could rouse him from that death-like torpor. For Nature was demanding the overdraft he had made on her.

And Mary Morrison's mind that day wandered from lessons to the patient locked in her little sitting-room, and when the day's work was done she bethought herself as to her duty. She needed counsel, the advice of a man, clear headed and capable, and she bethought herself of Gerald Hastie. Yes, she would tell him the whole story that night after evensong, and she set out for the little village church with that intent.

And the brothers Nubbley watched her leave the school-house with interest.

"Brother Joseph," said James, "what a remarkable good-looking young woman that is; how regular she goes to church. I should think, Joseph, that young woman had got a nice little bit of savings."

"Now James," said the invalid, looking up from his wheel chair, "don't you think of entangling yourself in matrimonial ventures, not as I think you'd stand a hundred to one chance in that quarter."

"No, brother Joseph," said the other in a tone of pensive reflection, "only I was a thinkin' as 'ow if anybody was to drop into the school-house while that little lady was going to church, like the well regulated young woman she is, it wouldn't be surprising if they was to find a cash-box or something in her writing-desk, and a substantial little nest egg in it. Ah, me, my brother, what a pity it is as you're so afflicted and that in these 'ere little villages there's such a lot of busybodies about as having such a little business of their own to see arter has such a lot of time to poke their noses into other people's."

And brother Joseph from the wheel chair sighed softly and sympathetically.

CHAPTER XXI.

A Recognition.

Dim patches in the night gloom the oriel windows of the village church gleamed, from within came at times the floating swell and dying wail of the organ, ever and anon clear voices in unison chanted prayer or praise.

And once, from where he watched in the shadow of the yews, a man standing there alone heard from within a voice declaring:

"The wages of sin is death," and he muttered with an evil sneer: "That's why everybody dies!"

Clear through the evening gloom a childish treble voice soared heavenwards alone, followed by a burst of harmony as other voices joining, took up the anthem strain. And then the voices died away.

And the man who listened there in the gloom of the night and in the darkness of his sin hardened his heart, and yet some secret spell retained him there to listen.

"Cursed be he that taketh reward to slay the innocent."

"Amen."

In rebellious thought he was scoffing there at all he listened to, and yet he stayed and listened until one final burst of sound from the organ and one last lingering "Amen" floated through the open porch, then was followed by the feet of returning worshippers. Then he slunk away—to wait further away in other shadows.

Gerald Hastie, striding after the service through the little God's Acre, was wondering why his plan had miscarried. What had happened to Jack Branscombe? All through the night he had remained awake and on the look-out at the window of his cottage, but he had waited and watched in vain. Had Doris Dale failed to persuade Jack to escape like a wily fox at midnight from cover to cover? Had some mischance occurred? His vicar had detained him throughout the day on parochial duties, but now that the evening service was over he determined to set out straight for Dalehurst Grange and ascertain the true state of affairs.

And all at once through the gloom of the branching yews of the churchyard Doris Dale approached him.

She might have been a ghost wandering there amid the grassy mounds and mossy stones, she was so white and wan. But even the wraith of Doris Dale would be charming. He took her hands.

"Where is Jack?" he asked. "Why has he not come to me?"

"What!" Doris gave a little terrified cry. "Has he not been to you, have you not seen him?"

Hastie shook his head.

"Then something terrible has happened," Doris went on. And she told how at midnight she had dispatched Jack from Dalehurst Grange.

He strove to cheer her, suggesting all manner of possibilities. Doubtless Jack had valid reason for departing from the programme they had arranged for him. He might have done so to avoid encountering someone, friend or foe, likely to recognise him, or for a hundred other reasons. One thing was certain, he had not fallen into the hands of those on the look-out for him, or the news would have been ringing through the land.

They hushed their voices, someone was approaching. It was the schoolmistress.

"Miss Dale," she said, "can I speak with you?"

"Is it imperatively immediate?" asked Doris, imagining Mary's mission to be in connection with the school, of which she was a very active patroness.

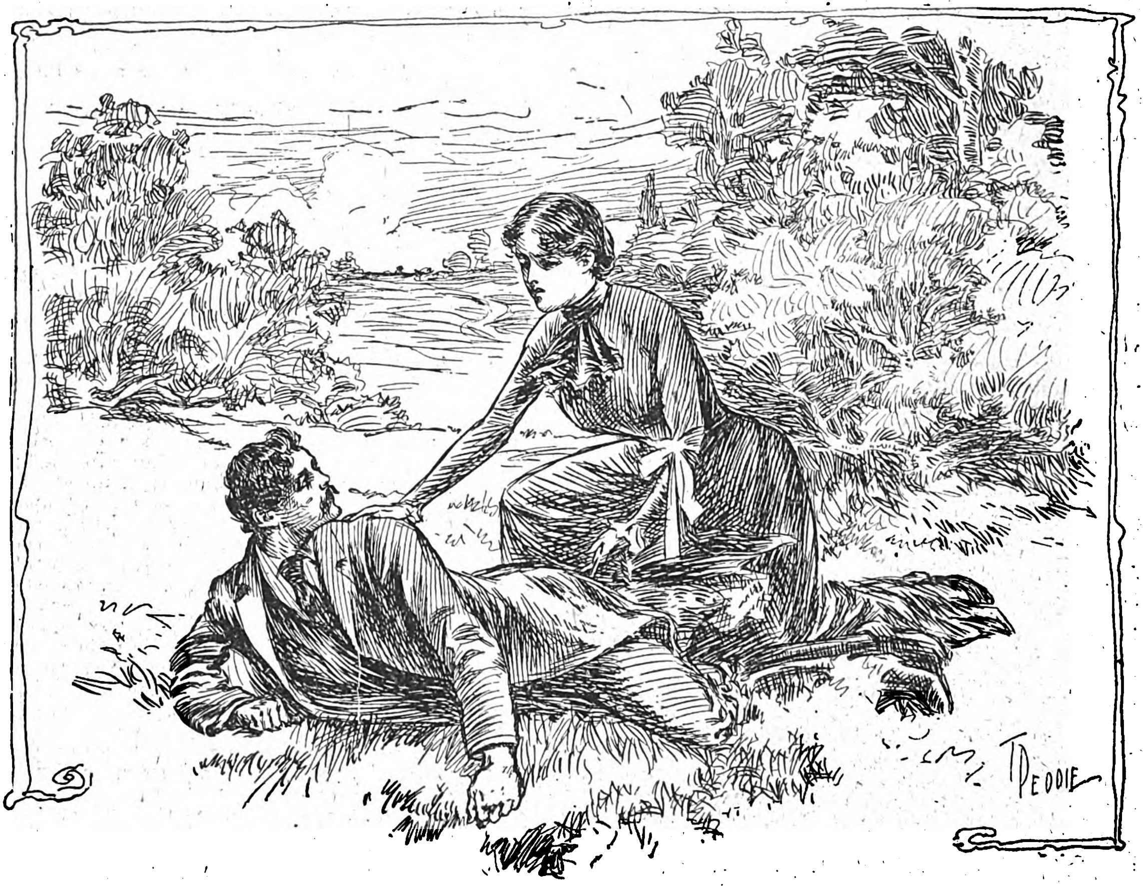
"It is indeed imperatively immediate," said Mary Morrison. "Come with me to the school-house, for your own sake." Then she whispered: "And for the sake of someone dear to you."

Still under the impression that Mary was referring probably to some pet girl pupil, Doris left Gerald at the churchyard wicket and accompanied the schoolmistress to her rooms in the school-house.

Opening the door of the little sitting-room, the latter whispered: "One moment. I want you to prepare yourself for a very great surprise."

Still wondering, Doris entered, and the door was closed behind her. She gazed round the room, and her eyes fell on the haggard face of a man lying still asleep upon a couch.

"Jack!" she cried, and in a moment she was on her knees beside him.



"Oh! yes, yes; and you think I'm a thief and a murderer. You're sure of it—I read it in your eyes."

Is your photo on page 719?

"Doris, Doris!" Awakening from troubled dreams to the bliss of her sweet presence, he sprang up and clasped her in his arms.

An hour or so later she left the school-house to seek Gerald Hastie, tell him of Jack's whereabouts, and ask and consult with him as to the next steps to be taken. Mary Morrison walked with her a portion of the way. Then said, with a smile:

"Now I must get to my patient."

"Mary," said Doris, "heaven will bless you for your goodness to him. Tell me one thing, say you believe him innocent; I want you to believe him innocent. Let the world think what it will of him, I want those who are good and true themselves to believe that he is good and true."

"I will try to believe it for your sake," said Mary. "Yes, though so many circumstances appear black against him, till he is found guilty everyone——"

"Is to be presumed to be innocent. Oh, yes! I know—I know, that is the platitude of stereotyped, conventional tolerance. That isn't the believe I mean. Oh, Mary! you knew his nature before all this terrible business happened. Do you think a man's nature could so have changed?"

"Alas!" replied the other, speaking rather to herself than to her companion, "so many men, and, perhaps, women too, have two sides to their nature. Ah, you are younger than I; you cannot understand a man seeming a Sir Galahad and being Mordred."

"My Jack," cried the girl passionately, "is more than Galahad, more than Lancelot; oh, yes! far truer than Lancelot. He is my Arthur, my perfect knight, my king! Oh! I can read not so much in, as between your words, something of a story. You have loved, and love has turned to pain. You have loved someone who should have been what you believed him, all truth and honour, and your idol has been broken, crushed. Ah! you are crying. Mary, dearest Mary, forgive me. No, dear, it was not the idol that was broken, it was your heart broken and crushed by the man you worshipped."

The girls were weeping on each other's shoulders now—sisters in tears.

"But you must not judge all men by him, dear Mary," said Doris. "Oh! what a shame that a love like yours should have gathered tears for its requital. If Fate had only thrown your ways and his apart, and earlier yours and someone else's together."

"Doris, Doris!" cried Mary pleadingly, her tears shining on cheeks now scarlet.

"Mary," whispered the other, "tell me, won't there ever be a chance for dear, true, brave, loyal Gerald?"

"No, no!" cried Mary hastily.

"Why should your life be always lonely?"

"It is not lonely, dear, nor yet quite sorrowful, for if love and happiness and love's delight have flown, Fate has left the memory of days that were. Good-night."

Each went her way, Mary returning alone to the school-house.

Out of the gloom of the overhanging trees there crept a figure that followed Mary Morrison—like a shadow. Very like a shadow, the shadow that had darkened her life. For a while it followed in her track, then suddenly stopped, turned back, lit a cigar, and soliloquised:

"What's the little game? What have she and Doris been discussing—the school and the kids? No, women don't cry about other people's kids as a rule, they save up most of that for their own. Surely they weren't discussing me? No! she wouldn't give me away—wouldn't dare? Oh, yes, she'd dare, she's got nerve enough, only she isn't built that way."

"Good-night, Squire."

A deferential voice, broken by a hiccough gave the greeting.

W. E. WATTS & CO. LTD., Whitminster Works. Offices: BRISTOL.

"Good-night, Bingle," was the reply. Then he went on, sotto voce:

"I wonder if she does suspect? Her eyes gave almost a start of recognition. I must find out, but I must be careful how I go to work."

As Mary approached the school-house she heard a long, low whistle, and a man who had been standing by the gate walked quickly away. To this incident alone she attached little importance, and she was hastening down the narrow path of the little garden when, in the darkness, she caught sight of the vague outline of a moving form.

"Who is that?" she shouted, and it sprang up and made for the gate. "Who are you, what do you want here?" she went on, bravely turning back to the gate.

But the figure had now reached a low stone wall, and was scrambling over it. Swiftly as she now turned she was not in time to effect her bold purpose, for she was as brave as she was gentle, to seize him.

He had leapt into the road and was gone, disappearing in the night.

But she had caught one glimpse of his face, and she knew that the intruder was one of the brothers who lived at the cottage along the road.

And, strange to say, it was the one who was wheeled about in the invalid chair.

What—what did it mean? What could he have been doing there? Innumerable questions, suggestions, fancies, ideas, flashed through her brain. Were those two strange men, they whose occupation consisted of smoking and gossiping, in reality detectives on the track of Jack Branscombe?

Entering the school-house she sought the sitting-room, her guest was sitting up.

"Ah," he said with a smile, "you've come in at last. Was that you at the door just now?"

"No," she said. "Tell me, what do you mean?"

"Some five or ten minutes ago I heard someone as I thought fumbling at the door for the latchkey, surely that was you?"

"No, no!" she answered, more amazed than ever.

"Mary," said Jack Branscombe, "while you've been gone I've been thinking, forming my plans. I must leave here."

"But where are you to go?" she asked. "Surely at least you will wait till Doris and Mr. Hastie have discussed what is best for you to do?"

"No!" he answered. "There is one thing I cannot endure; the thought that I am, even for a while, for my own safety exposing a girl to danger. It oppressed me when hiding at Dalehurst Grange. Every hour that I am remaining here, innocent man though I am, I am risking your being charged with harbouring a fugitive from justice. I am now recovered from my exhaustion, and I will pursue my journey, let it lead where it may, and when the time is ripe for me to prove my innocence I will surrender to arrest."

And she could not dissuade him. All he would do was to agree to communicate with Doris through her, if, and when he got clear. But at midnight, come what might, he would leave the school-house.

The night crept on and the beautiful silver moon sailed up, flooding the earth with a soft light, clear almost as noon. Jack, rested, invigorated, gripped Mary's hand gratefully ere bidding her good-night.

"I shall never forget what you have risked for me, Mary Morrison," he said, "and one other gracious kindness I will ask you."

"If it is in my power I will grant it," she said.

"Believe me innocent."

"I do—I do!"

"I know my own acts, my own very folly, helped to condemn me, but I am an honest man, I swear that I am innocent; and now—good-bye."

"I will believe you and I will pray for you. But stay one moment, let me just make sure that the coast is clear."

She tripped upstairs, went to her window, gazed out on the moonlit landscape. Why, what was that? A horse and trap were standing in the road beyond, just under the elm tree. A man was at the horse's head, gazing intently along the road. And now he was ascending into the cart. Yes, yes; those for whom he was looking were arriving. Two others hastened up, climbed, one on to the tailboard, the other up alongside the man who held the reins, and this last set the horse going and for a moment lifted the fur cap to wipe his brow.

So that just as, with muffled hoofs and pneumatic tyre, muted wheels, that strange trap drove past the school-house, in the cold blue moonlight, Mary Morrison saw clearly as a moon the face of the man who held the reins.

And recognised that face, and recognising it, went down on her knees and, wringing her clasped hands, uttered a bitter cry.

"Oh, God in heaven! Now I see it all—what shall I do—what shall I do?"

CHAPTER XXII.

The Humiliation of Mr. Rossiter.

Detective Inspector Rossiter had kept his own counsel regarding that futile cross-country man hunt. In the first place a miss, even by a hair's breadth, in matters of capture, as in others, is as good, or as bad, as a mile. Secondly, his belief in Jack Branscombe's guilt was considerably shaken by Jack Branscombe's behaviour.

"I've known 'em game," he reasoned to himself, "game as pebbles, and I've known 'em generous in a way, that not being difficult seeing that what they have generally belongs to somebody else, and staunch to their pals, but no, they're not quite that sort. There's many a man would have thought twice; yes, would have thought till it was too late to do anything else but think, if he saw even his friend or brother struggling at night in the middle of that cruel, cold, dark, swift river. But with a drowning man in pursuit of him, to bring him to trial for his life, it's only a grand man could do that; too grand a man to go sneaking into people's houses while they're asleep, the man who came back after me just in time," and he shuddered as he thought of those dark, icy waters so nearly closing over him. "He couldn't have served that old man at Dalehurst Grange like that. Yes, sir?"

He started, conscious of the shadow of something towering over him, and, looking up, addressed this last remark aloud to possibly the tallest man he had ever set eyes on, or, rather, up to.

"I beg your pardon, but do you happen to know Gerry Hastie?"

"Well," said Rossiter, "I'm a comparative stranger down here——"

"If you don't know Gerry you must be," said the other, "because, being British, you're bound to be a sportsman of some sort, whether your line is cricket, croquet, football, billiards or boats, steeple-chasing or skittles, and being British born you'll know the game. You'll play it or you'll look at it, or read about it, or talk about it; but, being British, you've got cricket in your blood, and you'll know Gerry Hastie."

"Of course," said Rossiter, his face lighting up, "you mean the Rev. Gerald Hastie who plays for the county and the M.C.C. He's the curate down here."

"That's the chap," said the other, his face lighting up, "and is he as smart as ever at the wicket?"

"Just as smart as ever," Rossiter replied enthusiastically: "Follow this road till you come to the Fallowfield Arms, then right across the green, past the church on the left and the school-house on the right, further on take the lane to the left, and you'll find his cottage, for, real gentleman and grand cricketer that he is, he lives very quietly.

"You've sized up the man," said the other, "I thank you very much. I suppose you couldn't spare time to accompany me as far as the Fallowfield Arms?"

"Not this morning, sir, thank you," said Mr. Rossiter, placing his hand in a grip which enveloped it. "I'm just now engaged on rather pressing business." And he went on his way.

Arrived at Fallowfield Hall, he found the Squire still in his dressing gown, pacing the morning room, pulling at the inevitable cigar and occasionally the big tumbler of brandy and soda.

"Any news, Rossiter?"

"Nothing in particular, sir."

"What!" And the tone of apparent unconcern changed to one of intense surprise. "You haven't caught—I mean," hastily, "no news of Branscombe yet?"

"Not a shadow, sir."

"It's a very serious matter, a desperate man like that being at large. Have a cigar, Rossiter?"

"Thank you, sir," said the other, selecting one from the cabinet. "By the bye, Mr. Roylance, are you quite certain in your own mind that John Branscombe is the man I want?"

A deep red flush for a moment came to the other's cheeks, then died away.

"I don't understand," he said, fixing just a glance on the detective as a fighting man might on an antagonist. Then, after a pause, "Is there any reason to doubt your own original theory?"

"Yes, sir," said the other.

"What is that reason?"

"I'm not quite prepared at present to say. The object of my call was, if possible, to have a little chat with Mr. Chandler."

"Very well," said the other, "you'll find him in the steward's room. By the bye, have you found any clue to his assailant?" There was a slight tinge of sarcasm in the tone which nettled the detective.

"I don't know, sir," he said. "I may be strong on the right trail yet, but I think I've got away from the red herring."

"Now what the dickens did he mean?" said the Squire of Fallowfield, his teeth biting deep into his cigar. "What's he going to pump Chandler about? As for him, it would have been best to have settled him then and there; I thought I pretty well had when I left him there, perhaps it's as well not, my hands are quite red enough. Besides, he's a wrong 'un, I know he's a wrong 'un, and he half knows I know it, and that gives me the pull. I might find a straight man in his place awkward, a straight man might have asked more questions and mightn't have been so glad to leave me quite alone. Richard, my friend, beware. Is Rossiter quite such a fool as you take him for? I wonder—I wonder if she's seen through the game, if she's been talking. Come what may, I must know."

30 YEARS OF AGONY FROM INDIGESTION ENDED.

ANOTHER BILE BEAN TRIUMPH.

"Your Bile Beans have done me more good than anything I have ever tried before," wrote Mrs. H. McNair, of 11 Eliza Street, Patricroft, Lancashire, to the proprietors of Bile Beans for Biliousness.

The real weight of this simple testimony lies in the fact that the lady has spent half her life—she is now 66—in experimenting with useless preparations to find relief from the terrible agonies of indigestion, and when a "Warrington Examiner" reporter called at her home the other day to hear her story he was shown a cupboard full of every imaginable medicine and pill which had in turn been proved worthless. Bile Beans alone were equal to the task of curing her of a disease of such long standing.

"Mine was a painful case," she said to the reporter; "my stomach was so weak that I was afraid to touch food, and I began to waste away. I had no strength or energy left in me, and housework was entirely out of the question. I continued to grow weaker, and lost hope of ever being better. This distressing condition lasted up to a few months ago, when I received a booklet telling of some cases as bad as my own which Bile Beans had completely cured. Why should I not try them, too? I had a few Beans given, and they relieved me so perceptibly that I underwent a course. I began to be more able to get about, without feeling depressed or exhausted; and after giving the Beans a fair trial they entirely cured me.

"My appetite is now as healthy as it could be, and I do not fear the pain and uncomfortable feeling I always experienced before and after eating. The Bile Beans have now cured me of the indigestion completely. They have been a veritable God-send, nothing would persuade me to be without them in the house. I have strongly advised my neighbours to take them, for they have noticed the good Bile Beans have done me."

BILE BEANS FOR BILIOUSNESS

Have been found an undoubted cure for HEADACHE, INFLUENZA, COSTIVENESS, PILES, LIVER TROUBLE, BAD BREATH, RHEUMATISM, LIVER CHILL, INDIGESTION, DIZZINESS, BUZZING IN THE HEAD, FULNESS AFTER EATING, CONSTIPATION, LACK OF AMBITION, DEBILITY, ANÆMIA, FEMALE AILMENTS, PIMPLES, and a host of other ailments that owe their origin to defective bile flow, assimilation, and digestion. They will also be of great service in Nervous Disorders, Loss of Appetite, Shortness of Breath, Blotches on the Skin, Liver Chills, Scrofula, Insomnia, and Troubled Sleep. They act quickly in restoring females to health, and for a general aperient and tonic remedy they are almost unequalled.

IMPORTANT WARNING.

Bile Beans are NOT sold LOOSE, being put up in sealed boxes only.
All others are fraudulent imitations, and you are warned not to accept any but the genuine.

A FREE SAMPLE.

The proprietors have so much faith in the efficacy of Bile Beans that they will forward a SAMPLE FREE and a book on liver and digestive ailments, if you send your name and address, and a penny stamp (to cover return postage), along with the accompanying coupon. Address: The Bile Bean Manufacturing Co., Central Distributing Dept., Greek Street, Leeds.

BILE BEANS.
Short Stories. Dec. 1901.

Bile Beans for Biliousness.

Short Stories That . . .
. . . Make You Laugh.

We devote every week space in Short Stories to pithy, humorous anecdotes similar to those which appear in these columns. To those readers who submit storyettes which are used, a six shilling novel will be awarded. The anecdotes may be either original or selected; in the latter case, the source MUST be stated. Attempts must reach the Storyette Editor, Short Stories Office, Henrietta Street, Strand, London, W.C., by Monday, December 9th. Postcards only, please.

The Greatest Vice.

MISTRESS (to servant, who is about to throw away an old lamp): "What is the matter with that lamp, Bridget? Does it smoke?" Bridget: "I don't know nothin' 'bout whither it smokes or drinks; but it goes out noights, mum!"

He Knew.

A BEFOGGED individual was groping his way down one of the side streets leading off the Strand when he suddenly bumped up against a man coming from the opposite direction and of him he asked: "Can you tell me where this street leads to?" "Yes," replied the other, "it leads into the river. I have just come out of it."

Why He Wanted the Soap.

MOTHER: "Mercy! What dirty hands!" Little Boy: "I think if you had ten dozen cakes of Apple's soap in the house, I wouldn't be so slow about using it." "Ten dozen cakes? Why, that would cost thirty shillings." "I know. Apple and Co. advertise that the boy selling the greatest number of cakes will get a bicycle free."

Breaking it Gently.

"REALLY, Mr. Stalate," she protested, "you have given me four hours of your time this evening." "Why—er—upon my word! So I have. The hours pass like minutes when I am with you." "You were telling me that since your promotion your time is valuable." "Yes." "Well, papa doesn't allow me to accept expensive presents from young men."

Hardly Suitable.

FIRST ACTOR: "I hear that the orchestra in your theatre were sacked in a body the other night; what was the matter?" Second Actor: "Why, they spoilt the best situation in the whole play. You know the court scene, where the hero is sentenced to death?" "Yes." "Well, they were told to play something appropriate, and the judge had no sooner put on the black cap than the idiots struck up 'Where did you get that hat.'"

How He Managed It.

THE Manager of the Company (at the gallery entrance): "Now, here, you boys, here's a ticket for each of you, and sixpence apiece. And if you don't make a noise like the interior of a cooper's shop after every act, and applaud the leading lady, I'll have the doorkeeper throw you downstairs; do you see?" The same Manager (appearing an hour later before the curtain, in response to thunderous applause): "Ladies and gentlemen, I would it were in my power to express my pleasure and surprise at this cordial "——etc.

Knew It Was Meat.

CHILD OF EIGHT (returning from school): "Mamma, we have been reading of such dreadful times. I should not have liked to live then, and I am sure you would not, for people were tied to a leg of mutton, and after gunpowder had been put round they were all blown up?" Mamma: "Are you sure it was not a stake they were tied to?" Child: "Oh, yes, mamma, it was a steak! I knew it was meat of some kind."

Preparing for Company.

JEWELLER: "Here, sir, is a clock which will, I think, please your æsthetic taste. At precisely ten o'clock every morning a chime of bells rings, and a bird hops out and sings a carol." Customer: "I will take that if you will make a few changes in it." "With pleasure." "I have a daughter, and I want the clock for the room where she entertains her company. Make it so that at eleven o'clock at night a milkman's bell will ring, and a newsboy will skip out and yell, 'Morning papers!'"

Poor, Abused Man.

PERHAPS it might be better for Mr. Smith if he were more observant, or, possibly, more something else. The other morning when he started off to town, his wife gave him an important letter to post, and when he returned in the evening it was in his pocket. "Henry," inquired his wife, just as he had settled himself comfortably, "did you post that letter I gave you this morning?" "You don't suppose, love, that I would carry it about with me, do you?" he replied, in as smooth a tone as he could muster. "I don't suppose anything else," she said, suspiciously; "where did you post it?" "In the box round the corner, love; I did it at once, dear, so I would be sure not to forget it." She jumped up suddenly. "Henry Smith," she exclaimed, "give me that letter. They moved that box to the far side of the square a month ago."

A FURTHER batch of photographs will be found on page 719. Tell your lady friends of this, as they are not sending in their claims nearly so frequently as the men. This week six times as many claims were received from men as from ladies.

IN a fortnight's time the Christmas Double Number of Short Stories will be on sale, and as there is likely to be a big demand for it, you had better tell your newsagent at once to save you a copy. The price will be twopence. It will consist of sixty-four pages, containing the first instalment of a splendid New Serial, and Christmas Stories and Competitions to suit all tastes. The design of the cover, too, will be particularly appropriate to the season of the year. Don't forget to order your copy at once.

So many readers have written to me lately asking me to start the Brain Gymnasium again that I have decided to accede to their request. The first batch of puzzles will appear in the Christmas Double Number.

ADVICE TO READERS ON VARIOUS MATTERS.

(Replies to Correspondents.)

"J. C." has recently made the acquaintance of a young lady, but as his business keeps him late in the evening he cannot take her out to places of amusement. He wants to know whether, if he pays her expenses and she goes with lady friends, he ought to be considered "mean."

I don't see that there is the slightest cause for your being considered "mean," "J. C.," under the circumstances. It would, of course, be very different if your business did not keep you late, and you preferred paying her expenses and letting her go with lady friends to going yourself with her; in that case she would have good cause to complain. If she really wants to go out and does not approve of your arrangements for her welfare, I should think it would be better to cease paying her any attention, though if you really care for her I would suggest that you try to get an evening off now and again, so that you can take her out yourself.

"J. G. A." lives with a friend who is very irritable and much given to worrying, even over trifles. He wants me to advise him on the matter of a remedy.

This is not an easy thing to do, "J. G. A.," as I am not a medical man. What I would advise you to do, though, is to get him to play games with you. Chess is a game on which all one's thoughts must be concentrated when playing, and if he were to join you in that he would not have the opportunity of brooding over real or imaginary troubles. If neither of you know chess, try ping-pong, or one of the card games which two can play. Don't give him a chance to worry and he will soon get over the habit. I hope you will write to me again telling me how my suggestion works, after giving it a fair trial.

"MARTHA" writes to ask me how she can cure her little girl of rough, noisy behaviour. She is four years old, and "Martha" feels that she ought to be setting a good example to the other two children.

Be gentle with her, "Martha." Show her a good example, and don't check her unless she is too noisy. Children ought to be such happy little souls, for in years to come they have more than enough of sorrow and trouble. One of the saddest sights on God's earth is to see a wee child made prematurely old and careworn by those who should be foremost in promoting its happiness. Set her to do some simple thing for you, read to her, or tell her a tale when she seems to be getting beyond your control. Every child loves to think that she is helping "mother."

"K. B. M."—The "Blue Peter" is a three-cornered flag with a white square in the centre. The word "Peter" is a corruption of the French word "partir"—to go. The flag is hoisted as a signal to anyone in the town to whom any member of the crew owes money, that the ship is about to sail, and thus give them an opportunity of collecting the amounts due, and also to tell anyone on shore belonging to the ship to come on board. In the Navy in olden times it was a recognised custom that debts could be paid by the "fore-sheet," that is to say, if any member of the crew could evade his creditor until the fore-sheet was run up, he might content himself that no claim could me made against him for anything which he had purchased at the port from which the ship was about to sail.

"MAB" is in trouble about her lover. When she is out with him he seems to return her affection, but she has heard that he walks out with someone else, and once she met him with another girl. He passed it off with a joke, but she feels very unhappy.

Well, "Mab," I should advise you to wait awhile; very likely there is nothing in it. On the other hand, if you have certain proof later on that he is in the habit of walking out with other girls, I should certainly give him up.

"J. O'R."—You're quite wrong. Cats can swim if they only care to exert themselves sufficiently. The ancient Egyptians used to fish with them on the Nile, according to the representations on walls and so forth that have come down to us, and I myself have known a tabby to dive into a pond when in full cry after a rat. I don't say that a cat will go in and swim about for pleasure like a dog will; the spectacle she presents afterwards is too sorry a one for her dignified nature.

"IVYROE" asks my advice on the following point: She is in love with a young fellow who loves her very dearly, but her father and mother think that she ought to look out for someone better, as he is only a singer on the stage. She feels sure she will never care as much for anyone else.

I see no reason why you should give him up, "Ivyroe." After all, being a public singer is no disgrace, is it?

"MASHERLAND." — The usual method adopted to remove grease spots from a coat is the application of blotting-paper and a hot iron, but it is by no means the most efficacious. Here is a better recipe. Take a few drops of strong brandy or spirits of wine and rub it in with the hand. By this means the wax is reduced to powder and can be removed without leaving the slightest trace.

THE Fountain Pen has this week been awarded to Mr. J. Coxon, Mayfield Rd., Ashbourne, Derbyshire.

Printed by HORACE COX, Bream's Buildings, London, E.C., and published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON LTD., Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

"87 Alexandra Road, Norwich, October 19th, 1896.

Gentlemen,—In reference to Trilene Tablets, I may say that my wife found the greatest possible benefit from the use of them; their action was rapid, and exceeded our utmost expectations, as they were also most beneficial to the respiratory organs. My wife was many years growing so stout, but although the disease was, I consider chronic, the Tablets soon reduced the same completely. You have our united thanks, and if I can do anything to promote your interests I will freely use my utmost endeavours to do so.

"Yours faithfully, J. R. CANHAM."

Mrs. DARNLEY SMITH, Landscove Vicarage, Ashburton, writes: "Trilene Tablets have reduced my weight very much. I am so much lighter in every way, and better in health."

COUNTESS SECKENDORFF, of Berlin, writes: "The Tablets greatly benefited me personally, and I am recommending them to friends."

MISS CHATTERTON, 7 Salisbury Villas, Banstead, Surrey, says: "I weighed 12st. 8lb., but am now 11st., and getting much better."

Nurse CROUCHER, at Mrs. Bennett's, 14 Buckleigh Road, Streatham, says: "I lost 9lb. from the box I took."

"77 Hindhill Street, Heywood, February 5th, 1898.

"Gentlemen,—I have not quite finished the box of Tablets and am 21lb. lighter. The change is great, and several friends are beginning the treatment, which not only reduces fat but strengthens rheumatic joints—such has been the case with me.

"Yours sincerely, M. A. HEYWOOD."

Mrs. D. BURTON, of Silverleigh, Tunbridge, writes: "I am very pleased with difference in size, my friends all telling me how much thinner I am getting."

Miss NORTHLEDGE, The Laurels, Riseholm Road, Lincoln, says: "The Tablets reduced me 1st., so that I am cured."

"West Cornforth, Ferryhill.

Mr. WM. USHER says: "A sister of mine, who was 17st., was greatly reduced by your Tablets to 15st."

Extract from The Lady, September 3rd, 1896: "Many stout persons have suffered untold agonies in unavailing efforts to reduce their bulk, either by means of severe dieting, or by taking more or less deleterious drugs; but all these pains would have been saved if they had only invested in a box of the wonderful Trilene Tablets, which are quite harmless, containing neither mercury, arsenic, nor any other mineral poison, and which are an unfailing cure for obesity."

MRS. T. BOSTON, Cambridge Villas, Clifford Street, South Wigston, says: "I congratulate you on your wonderful Tablets. My weight at first starting them was 11st. 7lb., and I now weigh 9st. 11lb."

Mr. McLEOD, 44 Calside, Paisley, writes: "I have been cured. If you want to know my weight now, it is 10st.; reduced 1st. 8lb., and I am quite content."

A. M. PRATT, of Ongar House, Ongar, says: "My weight is so much reduced it is unnecessary to take more. The reduction of weight was from 12st. 6lb. to 10st. 4lb."

Mrs. H. COX, 28 Watnall Road, Hucknall Torkard, writes: "The box of Tablets has reduced my weight 1½ stones."

Mr. WALKER, 236 London Road, Hazelgrove, Stockport, says: "I have used one box and am 14lb. lighter. Send another soon as possible."

Col.-Sergt. WHITTLE, of East Lancashire Regt., Burnley, Lancs., says: "A man in our regiment in 1891 lost several stone from taking your Tablets."

Mrs. E. ALEXANDER, 102 Dixon Street, New Swindon, says: "They have reduced me quite 2 stone, and I am now quite cured."

Mrs. W. A. RADFORD, of High Street, New Brinsley, Eastwood, writes: "Before taking Tablets I was 46 inches round waist, now I am 32 inches. I hope soon to be 23. I could hardly move or get up, now I get about easily. Please use this as you wish."

Countess FURSTENBERG, of Germany, writes: "They act speedily and well."

The Princess LIECHTENSTEIN writes from Landsberg, Austria: "Pray send me your excellent Tablets."

Mrs. WEAVER, of Greenpits Villa, Ross, Hereford, writes: "I am reduced from 13st. 8lb. to 11st. You may use this if you like."

Mrs. CROSSLEY, of Rose Hill, Torver, nr. Coniston, says: "There is a very decided diminution of fat. I am delighted, and cannot speak too highly in praise of Tablets. My heart is better, and I can breathe so much easier. You may refer to me as often as you like."

Lady C. CONRAD writes from Wiesbaden: "I am very pleased with your Tablets."

Mrs. TAYLOR-ROBINSON, of Tweed Green House, Whalley Range, Manchester, says: "I feel so much lighter and better since taking your Tablets, and am so much thinner that I hardly recognise myself."

Miss A. LONG, of 9 South Parade, Waterford, writes: "Your Tablets have reduced me 14lb."

Miss A. DAWSON, 62 Orchard Street, Weston-super-Mare, says: "Glad to say the Tablets have sufficiently reduced me. I shall always recommend them."

Miss F. L. BALL, 47 Chesterfield Road, St. Andrews, Bristol, writes: "I am quite cured through your Tablets. They improve the figure, and greatly relieve shortness of breath."

Miss PATIENT, of Woodberry, Theydon Bois: "Feel great benefit from Tablets I have lost 2st., and am sufficiently reduced."

Mrs. DREW, of 1 Bellevue Gardens, The Nursery, Devizes, writes: "I took Tablets some years ago; they soon reduced me and I have not got stout since Send me a box for my mother."

CHAPTER I.

"A GREAT sensation has been caused in the circles of Society lately by the strange disappearance of the beautiful Mrs. Wingfield, wife of the famous R.A., Gilbert Wingfield. Mr. and Mrs. Wingfield were so well-known in London, and the devotion of the pair to each other, a fact so patent to all their friends, that great sympathy has been aroused for the bereaved artist. We are unable to say any details of the mysterious occurrence before our readers as the affair is naturally kept as secret as possible. Mrs. Wingfield was a daughter of the famous Sir Hector Dawlish, the explorer. The matter is engaging the utmost attention of Scotland Yard, who have so far, however, been unable to throw any light upon the unfortunate lady's whereabouts."

"Now that has the makings of a very pretty little case," said Kempton Bond, and he threw down the Daily Express, from which newspaper he had culled the above item, and proceeded to light a pipe.

Kempton Bond was a detective who had attained to some degree of eminence in his profession, not by any of those meteoric achievements so dear to the heart of the writer of sensational detective fiction, but by sheer attention to detail, which he himself maintained was the only road to success in his dangerous calling.

It was a cold winter morning, and his simple little office in the Adelphi had a particularly cosy look. A bright fire burnt on the hearth, throwing a cheerful glow upon the plain red walls, hung with a few fine engravings.

For some time the detective sat motionless, merely exhaling huge clouds of tobacco smoke. Neither was he engaged in thinking out some abstruse problem in connection with his profession. It was Kempton Bond's way to let nothing come between him and his moments of relaxation, which were not, it must be confessed, ever of very long duration.

For perhaps ten minutes he smoked on in silence. Then there came a sudden knock at his door. He did not trouble to say 'come in,' for he knew perfectly well that the knock was merely the prelude of an entry, and only a matter of form.

A man glided into the room and said in a soft voice, "Sir Hector Dawlish to see you."

Bond jumped to his feet, and his listlessness vanished.

"Show Sir Hector up, Sefton," he said curtly.

The factotum retired. In another moment or so he reappeared, followed by a slim old gentleman of about medium height, with a soldierly carriage, and bronzed, weather-beaten, clean-shaven face.

Sefton glided out of the room and shut the door. Bond motioned his visitor to a chair with a silent gesture. It was always his custom to allow the first word to come from his clients.

The old gentleman sat down, then he said in precise high-bred tones: "I expect you know what I have come about, Mr. Bond?"

"The strange disappearance of Mrs. Wingfield, I presume," answered the detective quietly.

"Yes; and with your permission I will, without wasting time in further preliminaries, proceed to tell you all I know of the affair.

"My daughter was married to Mr. Wingfield about ten years ago. It was a love match, and I may as well tell you, contrary to my wishes, as I have always looked upon artists and actors with rather an indifferent eye. Mere prejudice, I know, but still there's the thing. However, the marriage, though childless, has, so far as I know, been a happy one. My son-in-law has always given me the idea of having been an exemplary husband, and I have never heard a breath of suspicion against him, though of course, as you know, I have been out of England a good deal. Still, my daughter's letters were always happy and reassuring. And now suddenly comes this bolt from the blue. My daughter has mysteriously disappeared, and left a note to say that she has gone off with another man, whose name is not divulged in the letter."

Sir Hector paused, and though he spoke firmly and concisely, Kempton Bond was far too good a judge of character not to observe that beneath the calm exterior lay all the anguish of a stricken father's heart. He looked keenly into his client's face, and then said slowly:

"But you do not believe yourself that that is the true fact of the matter? I take it that you feel that there is some other factor in the case, that you think there is some other explanation to account for Mrs. Wingfield's disappearance."

"I do, I do!" cried the old man, throwing his assumed cloak of punctiliousness to the winds. "I feel sure that my daughter would be incapable of so terrible a crime. She was my all, Mr. Bond, ever since her mother died, and it went to my heart to give her up, even though I knew I could not always keep her by me. And now, though everything points to her guilt, yet I cannot, I will not believe it, until I hear it from her own lips. There has been foul play somewhere, I know it. Sift this mystery to the dregs, Mr. Bond, and I will give you anything you like to ask of me that is in my power to give."

"If it is possible for human capability to do so, Sir Hector, I will. I would do my best to help you if only for my professional reputation," replied the detective. "I will first of all see Mr. Wingfield. You see as the case stands I have really so very little to go upon. He might be able to give me useful information. I will then see you again, and report to you what I have discovered."

CHAPTER II.

THE house occupied by Gilbert Wingfield was in Kensington, and had been, in the days when the fashionable London suburb was only a tiny village on the outskirts of the Metropolis, an old manor house, though it had been done up thoroughly by its present occupier, and presented but few characteristics, internally, at all events, to tell of its pristine self.

The artist was in his studio when Kempton Bond was announced, a splendid oak-pannelled chamber, with numerous canvases, finished and unfinished, round its mellow walls.

The artist received the detective with the chastened air of a man who has not yet recovered from the effects of a grievous sorrow. There were dark lines under his big black eyes. His mouth was disguised by a silky black moustache and pointed Vandyke beard. Undeniably a handsome man.

Kempton Bond did not waste much time in coming to the point. He briefly explained that Sir Hector had visited him that same morning, and had requested him to take steps to discover the whereabouts of the missing lady. To which Wingfield listened in silence, though when the detective had finished, he shook his head sadly, as though to say "all the detectives in the world won't give me back my lost wife."

"I take it you desire me to go on with the case, Mr. Wingfield?" Bond asked, almost sharply.

"Most certainly," answered the artist with alacrity "and if you can restore my wife to me or unearth the villain who has wrecked my domestic happiness—well, I am a rich man, and should be prepared to pay your price, whatever it is."

The detective was silent for a moment, then he said: "Who do you yourself suspect, Mr. Wingfield, as the villain who has run off with your wife? For surely there must be some one at whom you can point the finger of suspicion?"

"You are wrong, Mr. Bond," came the quick answer, "I most solemnly swear to you that there is no one upon whom I can fix suspicion. If you had known my wife you would understand my point exactly. There is no one whom I would sooner have sworn was more the soul of rectitude and honour than she."

"Perhaps you will show me the note that your wife wrote to you telling you that she had gone off with another man?" said the detective, going off upon another tack.

The artist went across to a corner of the studio, to where a fine old Sheraton bureau was placed. From a pigeon-hole he drew forth what turned out to be a piece of note-paper, upon which was written in an eminently feminine and refined hand the following words:

"My dear husband,—For dear you are, and dear you always have been in spite of all that will happen. When you get this I shall be far away. I have left home with one I love not wisely, but so well that I must sacrifice my honour, and, I fear, your happiness, to my passion. Do not try to find me. Try only to forget the woman who was once your loving Wife."

"Before passing my opinion," Bond said slowly, "I should be much obliged if you would let me see some more specimens of Mrs. Wingfield's handwriting. It need not be anything of a private nature, though I am sure that you will absolve me from any feeling of mere curiosity. But the case is one that is more perplexing than any I have yet been engaged upon, and I cannot afford to let any chance slip by that may help me in my investigations."

"I will give you a letter of my wife's," answered the artist without any hesitation, "I am convinced you only ask me to do so for perfectly adequate reasons," and after again rummaging a little in the bureau, he handed the detective a note, evidently in the same hand as the other.

"Perhaps you will be so good as to allow me to keep these two documents for the present?" said Bond. "They will, of course, be shown to no one but myself, in fact, I think that it would be best for the sake of safety that you write me a note confirming my retention of the letter that was left you by Mrs. Wingfield. I should then feel that I had your sanction to my course of action."

The artist elevated his eyebrows.

"Is that your usual custom, Mr. Bond?" he asked. "I am so utterly unused to detectives and their ways that you must pardon the question."

"Such is customary," came the imperturbable answer, "though of course—" but Wingfield put up his hand.

"You shall not find me wanting in manners, Mr. Bond," he cried, and sitting down at his desk, he wrote a short note, as desired.

A few moments later Bond took his leave for the present. Yet as he made his way out into the gloomy street he muttered to himself:

"Perhaps you mayn't be quite so calm next time we meet, Mr. Gilbert Wingfield. You're one of the coolest customers I've ever come across, but I may have a trump-card up my sleeve that will force you to throw down your hand."

CHAPTER III.

IN accordance with the completion of the tour that had been arranged the Good Samaritan Company found itself at Bradford once more with a full cast, for Hazel Harlow and Eric Monteith, fresh from their week in London, had rejoined the company in accordance with their agreements.

The death of Hazel's dissolute father had made a great change in her fortunes. For somehow or other the defunct farmer had managed to amass a considerable fortune. And so Hazel, despite all the cravings she had had, had come to the determination to retire from theatrical life after the completion of the present tour in three weeks' time.

What was responsible for this sudden reversion in her feelings? What influences could have been at work to make her so suddenly renounce the chances of becoming pre-eminent in the profession she had voluntarily adopted, and in which she had already secured so strong a foothold?

The answer was to be found in the one word Love. At last what she had longed for so ardently had come to pass. She was in love, and with a man worthy of her whole-hearted affection, who had proved his own unswerving loyalty and devotion to her in a thousand ways. And had he not risked his life for her more than once? At last Eric Monteith was to win his reward.

Yet though Hazel knew in her heart of hearts that at last Love had set his foot upon her destiny, she had not dared to voice her feelings to the world.

It was a raw, cold winter's afternoon, and already darkness had set in. Hazel and her friend and fellow-actress, Jenny Lovelace, were making their way along the gloomy streets towards their lodgings, when suddenly their attention was attracted by the faint sound as of someone weeping.

The wailing noise appeared to come from the ground. Both paused instinctively, and looked around, their sympathies awakened.

A little lad, wretchedly clad, was huddled up on the doorstep of a deserted house, weeping bitterly. Hazel stooped down, and said in a voice of infinite pity: "What's the matter, little boy? Why do you cry so?"

The mite stopped crying and looked up in the sweet face bending over him. Then he said in a voice still choked with weeping:

"Mother's ill. She sent me out for a doctor. And I'm so hungry," and again his tears broke out afresh.

Hazel and Jenny exchanged glances. Their eyes filled involuntarily at the sight of such grief in one so young. Then Hazel spoke again, spoke with all the spontaneity of her kind young heart:

"Will you take us to your mother, little boy?" she said. "Perhaps we can help her!" The little fellow, he was a pretty child despite his rags, sprang up at once. "I will take you to her," he said confidingly, "it's not far."

He conducted the two girls along the street, and then turned into one of far meaner aspect, to dive down a narrow court debouching from this thoroughfare.

It was quite dark up the alley, and the actresses drew closer together for mutual support. Suddenly a faint beam of light disclosed their little guide, who was holding a fragment of candle, stuck in an old bottle. He had mounted a rickety flight of stairs at the head of which he stood, before a half-open door.

The girls, swallowing the natural repugnance they felt at being in such unsavoury surroundings, mounted the crazy stair-way, and followed the child inside a narrow room.

In the corner of the squalid apartment was a bed, or an excuse for one, that seemed to be made chiefly of old sacks. Upon this miserable pallet was the body of a woman, whose face they could but dimly see in the gloomy light of the solitary dip.

"Archie," said the voice of the sick woman, "is that you? What a long time you've been, dearie."

The voice, though faint, was not a common one. Hazel advanced to the side of the pallet, and stooping, said in a low voice: "You are ill? We have come to help you."

With an effort, the sick woman, who had been lying with her face to the wall, turned round and gazed up into the beautiful young face, into the glorious blue eyes that were transfigured with the divine light of pity.

"Who are you?" she muttered hoarsely. "You have a sweet face, but you cannot help me. I'm dying."

Hazel caught her breath, "At least let me go for a doctor," she said.

"All the doctors in the world can't save me," came the answer, and Hazel thought she had never heard a human voice fraught with such agony. "I'm dying of consumption, and I shouldn't care if it wasn't for Archie." Then the voice changed. "Sweet lady, will you do a dying woman, who hasn't a single friend in the world, a last favour? It is much that I shall ask you, yet if you will promise to do what I ask you will at least have the satisfaction of knowing that you have eased the soul of a woman dying friendless and alone."

A wail from the little boy, who had crept to the foot of his mother's bed, brought Jenny to his side. She put her arms about him. The dying woman threw her a look of the deepest gratitude. Then she turned to Hazel.

"Bend down," she muttered. "There is much to say, and but little time to say it in. I was born for better things than this. My father was a well-to-do North Country merchant. I was a governess in London. There I met and fell in love with a man. We were married in secret according to his desire. Then Archie was born, and my husband left me. He had grown tired of me, and I, who loved him only too well, rather than live with a man who made no pretence of desiring to acknowledge me as his wife, left him, and returned home, to find my father dying of the same disease that is killing me, and a pauper.

"After his death I came to Bradford and found employment in a mill as a wool-carder. By dint of the most strenuous exertions I managed to make just enough to keep my boy and myself out of the Union. But the hard work and the unhealthy atmosphere of the factory soon began to tell on my lungs, with the result that God has sent you here to listen to a dying woman's confession. Under my pillow you will find my marriage certificate and the name of my husband. I don't know where he is now, but perhaps you will be able to find him. I shouldn't care for myself if he was never to hear of me again, but there is Archie. Perhaps he will do something for the little one."

Then she raised herself upon her arms, and called out in a loud voice: "Archie, darling, come to me!"

In a moment the little lad was on his knees beside the miserable bed, and the poor wasted arms of his mother were round him.

"Good-bye, little son," she murmured, "tell—your—father—" but the words were never finished. For Death had cut the sentence short.

Underneath the pillow of the dead woman were the papers she had mentioned. Hazel took these forth with reverent hand.

"I shall take these papers, Jenny," she said gently, "and give them to Eric. We had better fetch a policeman and tell him about this poor woman. As to the little boy, what shall we do with him?"

"Take him with us," cried Jenny spontaneously, speaking as her warm heart bade her, her eyes wet with tears.

"Yes," answered Hazel solemnly, no less moved than her comrade had been. "We will take him with us. For somehow I can't help looking upon him as a sacred trust."

The Grand Christmas Double Number will be ready next week. Price 2d.

CHAPTER IV.

Kempton Bond sat in his cosy office at an open bureau. Before him lay three documents that he was studying intently.

"That was rather a cute dodge of mine," he muttered, "getting Wingfield to write out that acknowledgment of his wife's letter. I don't think he tumbled to the real reason that made me ask him for it, that it was because I wanted a specimen of his natural handwriting. I'm beginning to see daylight faintly. In the first place I believe that the surmise I pitched on first of all as being the only one likely to lead me anywhere is correct.

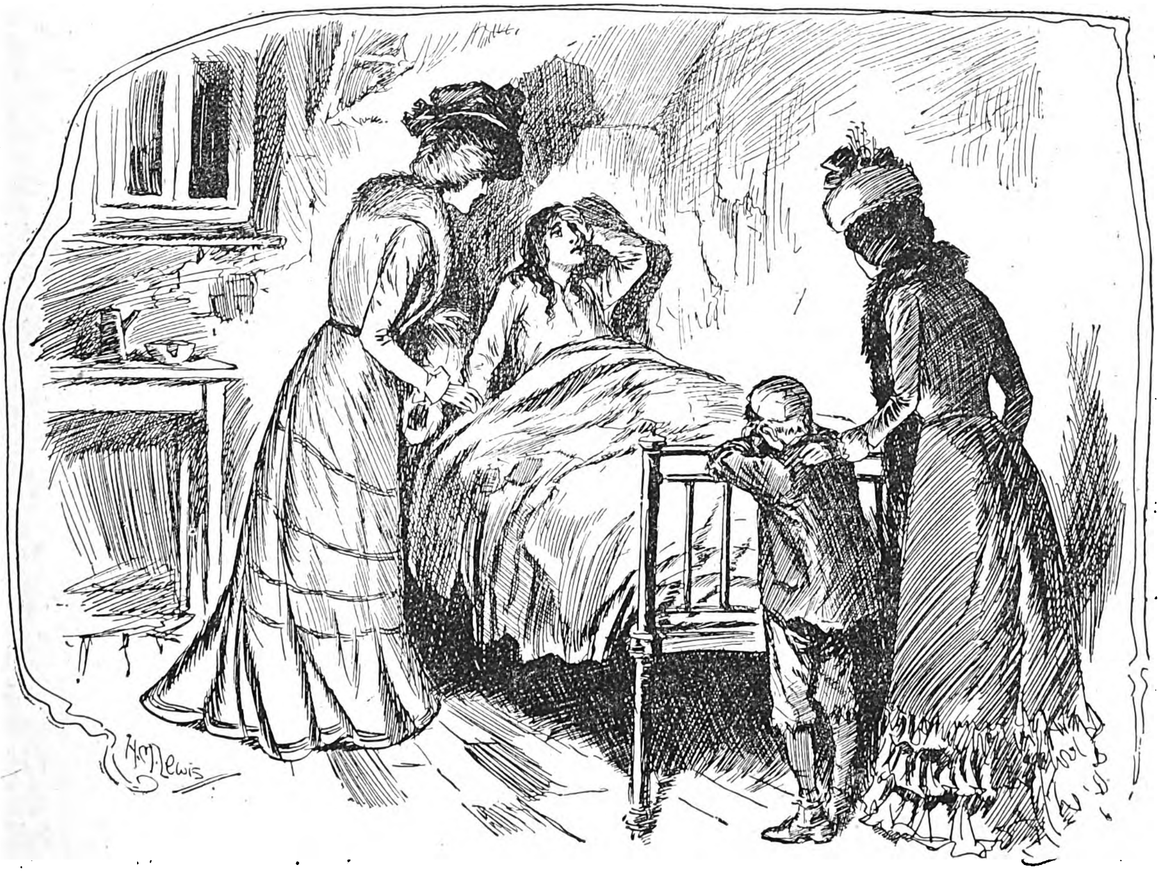
"From the conversation I had with Sir Hector, I take it his daughter would be the last person in the world to run off with a strange man. Why, from all accounts she was as devoted a wife as ever lived. And in spite of what you said, Mr. Gilbert Wingfield, that there is no one upon whom you can fix suspicion, I don't believe you, and that's flat.

"Now, is this last letter of Mrs. Wingfield's a forgery? At first I thought it was. But now that I come to compare it closely with this other one of hers, I'm bothered if I can make up my mind. If it is a forgery, well, there's only one man who can have been responsible for it, Wingfield himself. And against that, there's the argument that he has no reason that we know of for wishing his wife out of the way." The detective rose to his feet, and lighting a pipe, began pacing thoughtfully up and down the room.

"Confound it all!" he resumed, after a few moments silence. "It strikes me there's not so much daylight ahead after all. If the note is not a forgery, well then Gilbert Wingfield is a man who has been wronged, and there's no more to be said. If it is a forgery, then the arti must have some solid reason for wishing his wife out of the way, and I shall have to try some other tack to find out what's at the back of it, and we shall have to rout out the past history of the gentleman. If I were one of your pet detectives that can tell who a man's tailor is from the way his trousers are turned up, well, the thing would be as good as done, but I'm not Sherlock Holmes! Makes very good reading, but I should very much like to measure blades with him in real life."

At that moment Sefton entered with a letter. The missive bore the Bradford postmark. "I seem to know that hand-writing," said Bond, and tore open the flap.

There was a letter addressed to the detective, and one or two inclosures.



"There is much to say and but little time to say it in."

The Grand Christmas Double Number will be ready next week. Price 2d.

He read the letter through carefully with kindling eyes.

"Well, here's something that licks creation," he said slowly, "Never tell me again that there's nothing in coincidences. I've had some surprises in my life, but I don't think I ever remember anything like this," he thrust the papers into his breast pocket and rang a bell.

In a moment Sefton appeared.

"I'm going round to Sir Hector Dawlish's," the detective said curtly, "I don't know when I shall be back."

Sir Hector was at home. He occupied chambers in Jermyn Street. "Well, Mr. Bond," he said eagerly, as the detective was ushered into his room, "have you any news for me?"

"I have indeed," came the grave answer, "and I want you to be prepared, Sir Hector, for intelligence of a very grave and startling nature."

The baronet caught his breath.

"I only beg that you will not keep me in suspense, Mr. Bond," he cried. "Believe me, I am prepared for anything."

"I will not attempt to beat about the bush," said Bond, "I must preface my news by telling you that your daughter has no right to the title of Gilbert Wingfield's wife. The artist had already a wife living when he married her."

Every vestige of colour fled from Sir Hector's face as he heard this terrible indictment against his son-in-law.

"Merciful Heaven!" he muttered brokenly, "how do you know that?"

"By means that are nothing less than miraculous. With your very kind attention I will read to you a letter that I have but just received from a friend of mine in Bradford, a Mr. Monteith, who is at present the member of a theatrical touring company, but who is a man of gentle birth, and whose testimony is absolutely unimpeachable."

"A letter! May I beg of you to read it to me at once?"

The letter from Eric was as follows:

"Dear Mr. Bond,—I expect you will be surprised to hear from me, and doubtless more so when you have perused this letter. My excuse for writing to you must be that you are the only man I know likely to be able to sift the matter to its dregs, while I am sure that if any man can repair a terrible wrong to those who have no means of doing so for themselves you are that man.

"Last evening, Miss Hazel Harlow, whose name will probably be familiar to you, and her friend, Miss Lovelace, were the chief actors in as sad a little drama of every-day life as can well be imagined. They were walking along the streets when a poor little lad accosted them and begged them to accompany him to the bedside of his mother, who was dying. This they did, to be just in time to witness the poor woman's death.

"Before she died, the poor woman, who had seen better days, intrusted into Miss Harlow's hands the papers that I inclose with this letter. This she did in the hopes that the father of her little boy might be found and induced to do something for the poor little orphan. I can tell you no more about the man than that his name is as is set forth on the marriage certificate: Gilbert Wingfield, the same name as that of the well-known R.A.—"

"And the same man," concluded the detective, handing, as he spoke, the tattered register, all that had been left to the poor dead woman to bind her to the past, to the astounded and horrified Sir Hector.

The baronet looked with almost lack-lustre eyes at the incriminating document that stated that a marriage had been duly solemnised between Gilbert Wingfield and Henrietta Lambert at the registry office in John Street, Clerkenwell.

"But how do you know it's—he?" asked Sir Hector in a low voice, "there's nothing here to say who he is."

In answer, Kempton Bond handed a faded piece of note-paper to the baronet.

"Because this was also under the dead woman's pillow," he answered quietly.

"This," was yet another letter, a love-letter that began, "My darling Hetty," and ended up "Your ever loving Gilbert," merely a few burning sentences between the beginning and end of the epistle, breathing undying love and affection, love that had brought the recipient to a terrible and unhallowed grave.

"His writing," muttered the stricken Sir Hector. "Oh, to think that such villainy exists. My daughter—my poor darling daughter—terribly sinned against, yet not, I'll swear, sinning. Where are you? Where are you?"

"Gilbert Wingfield is the only man who can tell us that," answered the detective gently. "I would have you be of good heart, Sir Hector. We are still groping for light, though of course this new discovery has put a powerful weapon in our hands to use against Wingfield. With your acquiescence I will go round to his house at once, and endeavour to wring the whole truth of the story from his lips."

CHAPTER V.

As on the first occasion when Kempton Bond had presented himself at the artist's house, Wingfield was in his studio alone.

The detective was at once struck with the haggard, almost wild look, on the artist's face. He had the appearance of a man who was suffering from the effect of intense mental strain.

He received the detective almost listlessly, and did not even trouble to rise from the chair in which he reclined in the studio. His dark eyes were supernaturally bright, with a far away look in them that Bond could not but notice.

"I have come to see you, Mr. Wingfield," began Bond incisively, "with a piece of news in my possession that has considerably modified the first impressions I had on embarking on this case. I have learnt something about your past life that makes me very uncertain how to proceed."

He paused to note the effects of his preamble. A faint colour came into the face of the other man. He assumed an upright posture in his chair and said, with an evident effort, "May I ask you to be slightly more explicit?"

"Very well," came the clear answer, "I have to tell you that I know of your first marriage with Miss Lambert, in Clerkenwell, on the 15th of February, 1889, and that your first wife was still alive when you married Miss Dawlish."

But if Bond had expected Wingfield to exhibit any feelings of fear on hearing this terrible indictment of his conduct, his anticipations were to receive a severe shock.

The Grand Christmas Double Number will be ready next week, Price 2d.

The artist made no sound of any kind. He seemed to have relapsed into the state almost of torpor that he had been in on Bond's arrival. He merely sat motionless and gazed vacantly before him.

The detective, used to all manner of men as he was, had to admit to himself that at last he had chanced upon a being totally different to any one else he had seen in all his long experience.

Then, to his amazement, he discovered that Wingfield was talking gently to himself. It was indeed improbable that he had heard the last sentence addressed to him. The single question he had put to his visitor had evidently cost him an effort. He had put it and relapsed once more into the inner recesses of his own thoughts.

Bond leant forward. The artist was speaking so softly that it was all that he could do to hear what was being said. The words he did hear, however, were as follows:

"To have so nearly achieved success only to fail. Why won't my strength last? And it would have been such a masterpiece, a triumph before which the finest Wiertz or Hogarth would appear a tawdry daub. To be so near—to have fame—almost in my grasp, only to see the jade slip by me. For somehow I feel that I shall never do it now.

Suddenly the artist rose from his seat, and an expression came into his face of more terrible ferocity than any Bond ever remembered to have seen portrayed on human countenance. Like a panther he crept across the room towards a great canvas that was set in one corner of the studio, his eyes roving furtively from side to side, with vacant cunning. Instinctively the detective rose as well. In an instant the madman, for such he undoubtedly was, came to a dead halt. Then he swayed for a few moments like a drunken man, to fall heavily into Bond's arms, foaming at the lips with unmistakable frenzy.

The detective deposited the unconscious body upon a couch, and tore to the bell-pull, which he tugged with all his strength. The pealing summons brought more than one servant into the room in evident alarm.

"Take your master to his room," cried Bond authoritatively, "and run with all haste for a doctor. I'm afraid he's very ill."

The helpless body was carried out, and Bond found himself alone in the studio. With startling alacrity he locked the door, thus securing himself from intrusion.

Then he threw himself into a chair and gave himself up to the deepest thought.

"You're in deep water now, Kempton Bond," he said to himself, "and if you're not very careful you'll be out of your depth. 'A triumph before which the finest Wiertz or Hogarth would appear a tawdry daub.' Those were his words, and that's where I shall find the keystone to this dark business. He's mad, mad as a hatter. The question is, how long has he been insane. I was once in the Musee Wiertz, in Brussels, and I shall not easily forget the terrible pictures that are in that gallery. And Wiertz was mad, too"—barely had the thought flashed through his brain before he had leapt to his feet with a stifled exclamation.

"I think I'm beginning to see daylight now," he went on.

He sat down in the chair lately occupied by Wingfield, and tried to remember all the details of the brief scene that had led up to the crowning end of the short act.

"After he had spoken, what did he do?" continued the detective. "He rose to his feet and set off in the direction of that big canvas. He moved like a man with a purpose, too, as though he were making towards some fixed part of the room."

He hurried towards the great canvas, and pulled it aside, half-expecting to find a door concealed behind the obstruction. But he was doomed to disappointment. There was nothing there but the panelling that ran in like fashion all round the fine old chamber.

"Wait a bit. This room wasn't built yesterday. This house was old, long before you were born, Kempton. This oak panelling is two or three hundred years old. I've heard that this very house was an ancient country manor-house in days gone by. It's more than likely that there is a secret chamber here. If so, by Jove, there's your explanation of what the madman started off with: 'To have so nearly achieved success only to fail. And it would have been such a masterpiece! Good Heavens! The very idea is enough to curdle your blood!" and with his quick brain working thus at express speed, the detective hastened to put his new-born theory to the test.

His keen eyes ran round the room. Then he advanced to the panelling and began tapping it sharply upon the surface that had been covered by the huge canvas. At one place the wood seemed to give out a distinctly hollow sound. His heart began to beat fiercely.

But the surface of the oak was smooth and devoid of any protuberances. The panelling was about seven feet high. Along the top of it ran a cornice, below which were plain wooden dentals.

He reached up and ran his fingers along the top of the cornice.

The dust lay thick upon the smooth surface of the wood. It was evident that he would derive no inspiration from that point.

His fingers strayed to the dentals. He felt each one in turn, starting with one a considerable distance from the place that had given out the hollow sound.

Ah, what was that? A loose one. He tugged at it. Yet though it seemed loose, it defied his utmost endeavours to remove it.

He reversed the action and pushed it upward. The result was electrifying in its unexpectedness.

A heavy rumbling sound, as of a big door swinging back upon rusty hinges, followed the effort.

The next moment, and the panel immediately to his right seemed to fall inward, and a rush of cold air came out into the warm studio.

Something remarkably like a groan fell from the detective's lips. The sound marked the realisation of all his worst forebodings.

For fully a minute he stood motionless, regarding almost vacantly the black cavity in the wall that led whither he dared not guess. Then, pulling himself together with an effort, he addressed himself anew to his self-imposed task.

"It's got to be gone through with now," he muttered, "cost what it will."

A flight of stairs led upwards from the black void. Bond put his hand in his pocket and produced a tiny electric glow-lamp, a thing he never allowed himself to be without.

He switched on the little light, and flashed the bright though diminutive beam into the cavity. The steps led upwards for some considerable distance, though exactly how far he was unable to determine.

He mounted the stairway with quick firm footsteps, to find his progress barred by a door that, to his chagrin, was locked.

But Kempton Bond was a man of ready resource, as, I venture to think, has already been sufficiently proved. He took a small steel instrument, bright and deadly looking, from some recess on his person, and applied the point of the jemmy, for such it was, to the quaint old lock.

A sound of splintering wood followed, for the timber was rotten with age. The next moment and the door flew open as though by magic.

He found himself in a long, low chamber, lighted from above by a kind of skylight. The room was furnished in Eastern style, with sumptuous Kabyle mats upon the floor, and hangings of rare Persian fabric on the walls.

In one corner was an easel, draped with a cloth. Behind the cloth could be seen the protruding corner of a large canvas.

Bond tore back the concealing drapery from the easel and a cry of horror fell from his lips, as the canvas beneath stood open to his gaze.

It was only the portrait of a woman, life-sized, and unfinished, though what there was was enough to explain the reason for the detective's exclamation. Never had he seen a human face so limned, never would he have believed it possible that any artist could have set down in paint so ghastly a presentment of human agony.

The face was bloodless. The scarlet lips, fearfully vivid by reason of the pallor displayed upon the rest of the countenance, were slightly parted. The eyes were wide open, and it was here that the painter had achieved his most terrible success. With dreadful fixed glare they stared out from the dead canvas like living animate organs. No words can express the horrible ghastliness of those tortured eyes.

Kempton Bond threw back the cloth over the painting with a shudder. A faint groan fell on his ears. The sound acted upon him like a strong tonic. "Thank Heaven," he murmured. "I'm in time after all."

He wheeled swiftly round. In the corner opposite the veiled canvas was an erection that he had cursorily noticed on first entering the room, and that closer inspection proved to be the facsimile of a small Arab tent, quite in keeping with the other appurtenances of the chamber.

It was held up at its four corners by elaborately gilded poles, round which were draped hangings richly embroidered in gold and silver filigree.

The detective, without a moment's hesitation, flung back the costly hangings. Inside the quadrangular erection was a couch, upon which lay the body of a woman, whom Bond recognised in an instant as the poor tortured model of the portrait.

This, then, was the explanation of the terrible mystery.

CHAPTER VI.

THE conclusion of the affair is best told in Bond's own words in a letter to Monteith.

"The full explanation of the ghastly business is as follows: Gilbert Wingfield was, and had been a maniac for a considerable number of years. His mother had died in a madhouse, and the germs of the hereditary disease had lain latent in his brain for a long time, to finally blaze out with unrestrained fury.

"More than once it has been proved by the confession of the poor woman who was not his wife, though he had married her, that he was possessed of hypnotic powers. He at last conceived the terrible idea of painting a portrait that should embody in every detail the true presentment of human suffering. With this end in view he determined to procure a model who should really suffer the agonies he wished to portray.

"He therefore hypnotised his wife and got her to write the letter that announced that she had gone off with another man—this explains what I was sure of, namely, that her hand and no other had penned the note in question—and conveyed her away to the secret chamber, the existence of which, incredible though it may seem, was only known to himself.

"But his horrible devices did not stop there. Having thus thrown dust into the eyes of those likely to discover his maniacal plan, he proceeded to experiment upon the unhappy woman with all sorts of drugs, and thus got the model for the terrible portrait that I found.

"He is now under restraint. Miss Dawlish, as she may now be called, is with her father, who is going to take her abroad, for as you can well imagine, the shock to her nerves and constitution generally has been terrible.

"As regards the little Archie, provision will be made for him from Wingfield's estate. That is the one bright spot in the terrible affair—leaving out Miss Harlow's crowning act of mercy—that the child will at least be provided for. And from all accounts, a thing indeed to be thankful for, the little fellow seems to be untainted by his father's terrible malady. He is to be trained for the Navy.

"You can use your own discretion about telling Miss Harlow the true facts of the sad story. My advice to you is—don't, or at least wait until after you are married.

"And, by-the-by, when is that happy event coming off? Mind you don't forget to send me an invitation to the wedding.—Ever yours sincerely,

"KEMPTON BOND."

Eric read through the letter with the keenest attention. When he came to the end of it the colour rushed to his face.

He laid down the missive and gazed thoughtfully out into the murky street.

"We leave Bradford to-morrow," he soliloquised, and in two week's time the tour will be at an end. "Dare I take advantage of the augury contained in Bond's letter? Heaven knows my love for Hazel has never waned, though I have said nothing more about it to her since that day when she told me that although she had regard for me, she had not the love I wanted.

"It's three o'clock now. I'm sure to find Hazel at her lodgings. She won't be out on such an afternoon as this," he gazed out upon the street, along which a driving drizzle of sleet was sweeping.

Then he rose to his feet with an air of sudden determination. In a few more minutes he was hurrying along the wet pavement.

A faint blush rose to Hazel's face as Eric was announced.

Jenny, with that rare tact that some women possess intuitively, rose from her chair and slipped noiselessly from the room before Eric had had time to enter.

The young man entered the room, and his face displayed the pleasure he felt at finding the girl he loved alone.

For a few moments they talked desultorily about the trivialities of the moment. Then suddenly Eric leant forward in his chair.

"Hazel," he said earnestly, "in another fortnight our tour will be over, what are you going to do then?"

Hazel did not answer for a moment. Then she looked up into her lover's face.

"Mr. Venables has made me a very flattering offer to continue with him," she said, trying to speak calmly, "but I am undecided whether to accept."

"Then what do you say to letting me decide for you?" broke in the young man eagerly. "Won't you entertain an offer from me?"

"From you?"

"Yes, Hazel. The offer of going on tour with me for life? I've waited so long for you, darling, will you marry me, Hazel?"

He read his answer in her shining eyes. The next moment he was on his knees beside her chair. His arms were round her. Their lips met. Love had beaten down all obstacles.

A faint cough caused Eric to spring to his feet. The next moment Jenny stood in the room before the plighted lovers.

"You'll ask me to the wedding, Eric?" she said demurely. "Oh, you lucky, lucky man. If ever any one ought to be congratulated, you're he."

Eric's brain was in a whirl. He could hardly realise that what he had longed for so ardently, for so many weary months, had really come true.

"Ask you to the wedding? I should think so," he said soberly. "But you must get Hazel to tell you when that will be."

Hazel's troubles seemed nearly over now. But the series of catastrophes that had dogged her footsteps for so long were not quite over. She had forgotten that she had still one enemy who would never forget or forgive her for having thwarted his base desires, a man who put himself beyond the pale of society by his fierce attempts to entrap her. She was still to be reminded of the existence of Horace Caldecott.

MY FORGERY.

WHEN, at the close of the year 1876, I returned from Texas, having succeeded in losing two of the five thousand pounds which had come to me at my father's death as my share of his personal property, I felt some doubt as to how I should dispose of myself, my time and my talents. Of the latter I had become a little bit distrustful of late, for they certainly had not served me well, when brought face to face with the exigencies of agricultural life in the far West; and I resolved that I would think twice or thrice before committing myself to another venture. As a matter of fact I thought a great many times, but my thinking did not come to much, for I had been idle for six months, when one day in the coffee room of an hotel in one of the large towns in the north of England, which I will call Longborough, I came across my father's old friend Francis Merrick, the accountant of the well-known firm of Langton, Merrick, Gibbs, and Stuart.

"You don't mean to say that it is you, Mr. Richard?" said he, when I held out my hand to him, "you are the very last man I expected to see, for I thought you were thousands of miles away. Did you get tired of the American farm?"

"Yes, I did," I answered, "or else the American farm got tired of me. I know I lost as much money as I thought I could afford to lose at once; so I came home, thinking I might as well lose my next thousand in England."

"A very sensible idea. I suppose you have begun already. What are you doing now?"

"Oh, I am very discreet now. I am not losing money, only spending it."

"Ah, living a lazy life? Very nice thing for the time; I shouldn't mind a couple of months of it myself, but it doesn't pay in the long run. What are you going to do now—something, I suppose?"

"I should be glad enough to do anything; but what is there I can do?"

"Well, you can do a great many things; the question is, what will you do? Just now, for instance, I could give you plenty of work in the office in helping us with the winding-up of two large estates we have got in hand, and the experience you had some years ago at Wellbridge would make it fairly easy to you; but of course you wouldn't come. If you will, I'll give you £200 a year willingly."

"Done," I replied; "it is a bargain; when shall I come?"

"You don't mean it?" said Merrick incredulously.

"Indeed, I do. I was never more serious in my life."

"Very well, then, come on Monday," said he, and I assured him that I would, and that he might expect to see me at nine o'clock.

Our compact had hardly been made when he was called away, and as soon as my own business was concluded I went home, and much surprised my wife by telling her what I had done. She was not only surprised, but a little hostile, for she evidently considered the clerkship decidedly beneath her; but I laughed so persistently at her scruples, that she soon became really, or apparently resigned.

At half-past eight o'clock on Monday morning I got into a train at the little roadside station near the suburban villa, which was our temporary home, and before nine I was at the office of Langton, Merrick, Gibbs, and Stuart. Merrick was there, and he welcomed me with his usual jolly laugh. It was, he said, before his usual time, but he had come down early to see whether I would put in an appearance, though he confessed that he had not expected me. I was taken to a private room, and a junior clerk brought in several baskets appallingly full of papers. Merrick explained to me part of what was needed to be done; and the experience to which he had referred, which had been gained in connection with a small estate of my father's, helped me the rest. The business was a long and somewhat complicated one, but in about a fortnight I had got through it. I then took in hand a similar piece of work, and performed my second task much more quickly. As I put into Merrick's hand the final statement, I asked him what I was to do next.

"This is all the business of this kind," he said, "that we have in hand just now; but I will tell you something that I have been thinking about for the last two or three days. You know that since poor old Marshall, our cashier, died so suddenly six months ago, Mr.

Stuart has been keeping the cash; but he is anxious to give it up, and we have been looking out for a cashier. Now, if you will take the post it is there for you, and you will have £300 a year to begin with. What do you say?"

I told him I could say nothing then, but that if he would leave the matter open for twenty-four hours I would consider it, talk it over with my wife, and let him know my decision in the morning. On the morrow I informed Merrick that I accepted the offer; and I was at once installed in a room downstairs, with a door and a window opening into the general office, and a private door leading into the corridor. I was not long in getting into the routine of the work, nor was I long in making some discoveries of unsuspected complications in the inner life of the firm. It had originally been founded by Mr. Langton, and my friend Merrick, after serving his apprenticeship, had become his partner.

Mr. Langton's health had more or less failed while he was comparatively a young man, and a paralytic stroke at last put a stop to all his business activities, and as the business was then growing beyond Mr. Merrick's control it was determined to take in as additional partners Mr. Langton's nephew, John Gibbs, and the senior clerk, David Stuart, whose long acquaintance with the affairs of the clients of the firm was really as valuable as the capital which might fairly have been expected from an incoming partner.

Mr. Gibbs, who considered himself the representative of the altogether incapacitated Mr. Langton, had become dissatisfied with the results of the partnership, the offer of which he had, in the first instance, hailed as an extraordinary piece of luck. He considered that the measure of influence he exerted and the amount of profit he drew, were altogether incommensurate with his deserts; and that if Mr. Merrick, who, so far as the outside world was concerned, was really the firm, could somehow be removed out of the way, he would then gain the position to which he was entitled. He had taken Mr. Stuart into his confidence, and infected him with his views, and it did not require much astuteness to see that instead of Mr. Merrick's partners being real allies, they were traitors in the camp. Even from me, a comparative stranger and outsider, they took very insufficient pains to conceal their feelings; and I soon became convinced that if at any time they had an opportunity of inflicting a blow upon him personally, without injuring the firm, he would certainly not be spared.

It is, as we know, the unexpected that always happens, and when the opportunity came, it came in a way upon which the conspirators, as I may call them, could not have calculated. Apart from his connection with the firm, Mr. Merrick's business habits and legal knowledge had rendered him much sought after by the directors of joint-stock undertakings, and there were several large companies in Longborough for which he performed secretarial duties. On inquiring for him at the office one morning, about seven months after my acceptance of the post of cashier, I was told that he had gone to a meeting of directors, and that he would not be back for two hours. My usual luncheon-time came, and I was just running down the steps which led from the door of the corridor in which our offices were situated to the street, when a cab, which had been driven very quickly, suddenly stopped, and Mr. Merrick put his head out of the window.

"I am glad I have caught you here," he said, "for I have not a moment to lose. A telegram has come which makes it necessary that I should start for Brussels by the next train, and I have not had time to countersign these cheques." Here he pushed two cheque-books into my hand. "They have been signed by two of the directors; but of course they must have my signature as well. I can't possibly sign them now; so you must go to the bank and get Mr. Grey to accept the signature of the firm, and then Mr. Gibbs or Mr. Stuart will sign them for you."

"But suppose Mr. Grey won't consent?" I inquired; for I knew that if anything went wrong the company might lose its credit, and Merrick his reputation for ever.

"Oh, tell him he must," said Mr. Merrick, whose principal failing was a habit of making sure that things would go right; "tell him he must, and there is no doubt that he will."

"Well, but if he won't, how am I let to you know? What will be your address for the next three days?"

"I can't tell you, but I will wire to-morrow. Tell Mr. Gibbs I shall certainly not be later than Tuesday, and that I hope to be back on Saturday. It will be all right, you'll see. Good-bye." And the cab drove off, leaving me standing on the pavement with feelings that were decidedly the reverse of comfortable.

I determined that before going to luncheon I would call at the bank, see Mr. Grey, the manager, and set my mind at rest. I was fortunate in catching him, and still more fortunate in finding him in an accommodating frame of mind. I stated my business and waited for his reply with an anxiety which I tried not to show.

"Well, Mr. Radford," he said, tickling his upper lip with the feather of his quill pen, as his habit was, "of course it is not strictly business-like—a little irregular, you know—but still, I should like to oblige Mr. Merrick, and, in short, you may tell Mr. Gibbs or Mr. Stuart that the signature of the firm will be honoured, and it will be all right."

Mr. Grey's words brought my bad quarter of an hour to an abrupt end. A great weight was removed from my mind; that being gone, Richard was himself again, and I ate a hearty luncheon, feeling perfectly at ease. My worry, as I thought, was over; little did I imagine that in a more aggravated form it was yet before me. I went back to the office, and for about a couple of hours was engaged upon some work which I was bound to finish that afternoon. I then took the cheque-books to Mr. Gibbs, told him the circumstances, and said I should be glad if he or Mr. Stuart would sign the cheques either at once or during the morrow, as I should have to begin paying them out early on the morning of Wednesday, which was the following day.

Instead of at once consenting, he said he would not take the cheque books then, but would think over the matter, and would speak to me in the morning. This struck me at the time as rather an odd proceeding, but nothing more. I must have been very stupid, for in spite of all that I knew I frankly confess that not until I lay down on my sofa to enjoy my after-dinner pipe, did it really occur to me that he was contemplating a refusal. The idea, once conceived, was too horribly reasonable to be got rid of, and I spent a wakeful and a wretched night. In the morning my worst fears were realised. When I saw Mr. Gibbs he said he had been thinking the matter over, and had come to the conclusion that it would not be advisable to give the signature of the firm. I reasoned, expostulated, and put before him in the strongest words the probable consequences, both to Mr. Merrick and the company, of his unreasonable refusal; but the long-waited-for chance had come, and he was not going to let it slip. At last I said:

"Well, if you won't do it, Mr. Stuart will; I shall ask him."

"Ask him by all means," he said, coolly turning to his newspaper, "but it will be of no use. I have been talking to him about it, and he quite agrees with me. He won't sign, you'll see."

It was now impossible not to perceive that it was a concerted plot, and hope nearly died within me; but I was not going to leave Merrick to the mercy of these Philistines without making a fight for him. I turned on my heel without a word, and walked into Mr. Stuart's office.

It was, as Mr. Gibbs had predicted, of no use. Mr. Stuart refused to sign, and declined to give any reason for his refusal. I was now nonplussed, but I would not quite abandon hope. A telegram from Mr. Merrick might come any moment, and then I could wire to him for instruction in this unexpected crisis. Eleven struck, then twelve, then one; and I dared not wait any longer. I felt I must now act upon my own responsibility; so I locked up my books, put on my hat, and hurried to the bank to lay the matter before Mr. Grey. I told him the story and he listened quietly.

After I had finished he was silent for some time, and did nothing but tickle his lip in a more than usually irritating manner. At last he said:

"It is very awkward indeed. I can't advise you at all; I am perfectly helpless in the matter. Of course the cheques must be countersigned—you know that as well as I do; and if the firm won't sign, we must have the signature of F. W. W. Merrick."

I thought that he put the thing in rather curious language, and when I met his eye he was regarding me with what I may call an expressionless expression, as if he had purposely emptied his face of all meaning, and were laying it before me as a problem to be solved.

"What did you say?" I inquired, simply to give myself time to think.

"I said," he answered, speaking more slowly and decisively than before, "that those cheques must have the signature of F. W. W. Merrick."

"But," said I, "Mr. Merrick is in Belgium."

"Of course he is, and that is the difficulty," said Mr. Grey, now regarding me with an odd look which seemed to inquire, "Is this fellow who professes himself to be a friend of Merrick, a fool or a coward?" I hope I am not quite either; and by a sudden flash of intuition I saw the nature of the suggestion which had been so ingeniously made for me. I sprang to my feet, and exclaimed:

"All right, Mr. Grey; thank you very much; it will be managed no doubt. Good day."

"You are quite welcome," said he; "but after all I have told you nothing that you didn't know before. You see we must have a signature of someone."

As our hands met, our eyes met also, and there was no doubt that we understood one another.

I went back to the office in an unusual state of excitement, but I got through my work as usual, and did not leave for home until the regular time. I took with me the two cheque books and about half-a-dozen letters and other documents, on each of which appeared the signature which Mr. Grey had told me so emphatically he must have—the signature of F. W. W. Merrick.

I rather alarmed my wife by eating and drinking half my usual quantity; but I had business before me which required that both head and hands should be up to the mark, and I was not going to run the risk of putting them out of order. Dinner concluded, I went upstairs to my little library, lighted my pipe, opened and placed on the table one of the letters from the packet, and after studying the signature for some time to familiarise myself with its lines and curves—with what art critics call "the spirit of handling"—I took from a drawer a sheet of foolscap, which I began laboriously to cover with the best imitations I could manage to produce.

The signature was by no means an ordinary one, for it had a number of eccentric and apparently purposeless flourishes, and at first it seemed rather chance work. There would be a few unmistakably poor and wooden attempts, then a fairly free and good one, and so on. Gradually, however, the number of failures began to decrease; at last almost every one I produced was all I could desire, and after working steadily for about two hours, I decided my preparation was complete.

I then opened one of the cheque books with the name of my absent friend and employer. There were about a hundred and seventy of them in all, and the total amount represented was over twenty thousand pounds. It was after midnight when I joined my wife, who had been waiting for me in the drawing-room, wondering what had kept me so long. I told her that I had been doing some office work which I was bound to have ready for the morning; and after taking a couple of glasses of whisky to steady my nerves, and insure my having a good night's rest, went off to bed with perfectly easy mind.

I did not feel so easy the next morning when, about half-an-hour after my arrival at the office, the earliest of the company's creditors presented himself and asked for his money. The conviction that I had possibly ruined myself in endeavouring to save Mr. Merrick forced itself upon me, and I felt strongly tempted to throw the cheque books into the fire, but I had gone too far; I had crossed the rubicon, and I might just as well burn my boats at once. The utterly commonplace and unsuspicious manner in which creditor number one examined his cheque, folded it up, and placed it in his pocket-book helped to set me at ease. Number two disturbed me less, and with number three I felt quite comfortable. Still my nerves were on the stretch, for I knew many of the cheques would be presented that day, and I could not help feeling terribly eager to know how they would be received at the bank.

I turned rather sick two or three times when the recipients seemed to examine their cheques rather curiously; and at last came a horrible moment. About one o'clock my door opened, rather hastily it seemed to me, and a man entered to whom I had given a cheque for a hundred and seventy pounds and a few odd shillings only half-an-hour before. He held the cheque in his hand, and I thought, "it has come at last, they have refused to cash it," my heart almost stopped, but I managed to say, with an appearance of coolness:

"Well, Mr. Judson, what can I do for you now?"

"I have come about this cheque," he said, but I knew that only too well.

The Grand Christmas Double Number will be ready next week. Price 2d.

"What about the cheque?" I asked, "it's all right, isn't it?"

"Well, it's right, and it isn't right," he replied. "It seems that my partner, Mr. Wills, has a private account against the company for forty-three pounds ten, and Mr. Merrick promised it should be included in this settlement; but this is only the amount of the regular monthly bill."

"If that is all," said I, "tell Mr. Wills to set his mind at rest"—words cannot tell how grateful I was to Mr. Judson for having set my mind at rest—"there is a cheque for him here. The accounts were really separate, and they have been kept separate to avoid confusion. He can have it now if he will come for it."

This little scare upset me for the afternoon, but I had no similar shock. The cheques were paid out, and as I heard nothing of them I took it for granted that they had been honoured. Many had been called for, many had been sent away, and when Monday morning came I had fewer than a dozen left, and they were only for small amounts. I was involved in some perplexing calculations when I heard someone enter, and looking up, I saw Mr. Merrick.

"Here I am," said he, in his usual free and easy manner; "how are you, and how have you got on?"

"I am pretty well," I replied, "and I have got on better than I might; but I have had a queer time of it."

"Queer time of it?" he asked. "Queer, in what way?"

I looked him full in the face and said—

"Mr. Gibbs and Mr. Stuart refused to sign the cheques of the Longborough Metal Company."

"Refused to sign!" he exclaimed, with a countenance from which all colour had fled; "what do you mean?"

"I mean what I say," I returned; "but we had better go into your office, and I will tell you all about it."

I took the cheque books with me, and said:

"Don't be uneasy, I have managed everything. All has been paid but several trifling matters, as you will see."

He opened the cheque books, stared at the counterfoils, stared still harder at the few cheques still remaining and then asked excitedly,

"What's this? This is my signature, sure enough, but I never wrote it."

"Of course you didn't," I said, "I wrote it. I wrote a hundred and seventy-three of them."

"But it's forgery," he said.

"Just so," I replied.

"And the punishment for forgery is penal servitude."

"Exactly; but no one can proceed against me but you, and I don't think you will."

"I should think not. By Jove, Richard, you've saved me from those scoundrels. I shall never forget this to the last day of my life. I don't know what might have happened if those cheques had not been ready. But what made you think of it?"

I told him the story as it has been told here, and he immediately suggested that Mr. Grey must be seen at once. I assented, and in a few minutes we found ourselves in Mr. Grey's office, face to face with the manager and his everlasting lip-tickling quill.

Merrick began, "We have come, Mr. Grey—" when he was interrupted by Mr. Grey himself, who put up his hands and said,

"What does it matter why you have come? I don't want to hear. I would rather not hear; and, as a matter of fact, I won't hear. I think you had better go without trying to tell me anything. It is much the wisest thing to do, I assure you."

Merrick was taken aback at this reception; but I was only amused, and said.

"Mr. Grey is right, depend upon it. There are things it is of no use talking about, and we may as well go."

It was indeed, Hobson's choice, so we left the manager to himself and to his titillating quill, and adjourned to a neighbouring hotel, where, over luncheon, the story was told again with greater fulness of detail. Merrick thanked me again and again for what I had done, and in the excess of his gratitude made me an offer which was particularly tempting to me as I was then situated, but which I did not think it right to accept until it was repeated in a calmer mood a few days afterwards. The result of my acceptance was to bring us into very unreserved relationship with each other; but, though we became more intimate than it is the lot of most business friends to be, there was one subject on which we could never be induced to talk, and away from which he always turned the conversation when it seemed to be leading in that direction. Need I say that the forbidden theme was my forgery?

THE CHARMED DAGGER.

I was not surprised when my doctor told me that I needed a change of air—a few weeks spent in some quiet place where I might rest up from my large law practice. I was feeling fagged out, and when an invitation came from an old college friend of mine to visit him in a remote village I lost no time in availing myself of it. It had been many years since I had seen Kennon Deering, but I found him just the same good, warm-hearted fellow I had known in college. He had never married, and the greater part of his life had been spent in travel; in fact, his foot had trod almost every portion of the earth's surface.

Several days after my arrival, while chatting over our cigars and coffee, he asked suddenly if I was an admirer of curios. Now, if I have a hobby, it is curio collecting, and I hastened to inform him of the fact. Immediately he conducted me to what he called his museum.

He possessed a most interesting collection, and what impressed me most was the unusual number of daggers. One in particular attracted my attention, and on the impulse I removed it from its sheath. The blade was about six inches long, but of the most curious colouring. Somehow there seemed a strong fascination about this little weapon. A thrill seemed to run through my whole body as my fingers closed over the handle, and then the sensation changed to a feeling that was horrible. I was suddenly possessed of a desire to bury the flame-shaped blade in my heart, and in a moment I would have done so had not my host grasped my wrist with such force that the dagger fell from my fingers.

"And now to explain," he said, as I sank giddily upon the nearest chair. "The weapon is one with a history, simple, yet terrible. Each man who has ever possessed one has sooner or later taken his own life or the life of another. It has been in my possession some months, and this is the first time it has been handled."

"For Heaven's sake, destroy it!" I gasped.

"No," he replied; "I prize it as a curiosity too much for that. It is over a thousand years old, and, so far as I am concerned, there is no danger. I know the secret of resistance."

* * * * *

A year went by, and I had heard from Deering but once, by a letter in which he had stated that he was off for a foreign country. One morning, to my surprise, a letter came, in which he said that he had married lately, and both he and his wife wished me to pay them a visit in their new home near Liverpool. To this I wired my acceptance.

The home that my friend now occupied was truly a small-sized palace. Everything that money could buy adorned it. Books, paintings, statuary, costly furniture, rich tapestries, all that heart could desire was there. Mrs. Deering was the most beautiful woman I believe I have ever seen, and as charming in manner as she was handsome. So far as I could see their match was all that could be desired, and the days passed pleasantly in their society. One day, at dinner, Mrs. Deering turned to her husband with the remark that Frank Chesely had written and said he would visit them for a week or so. Deering made no comment on the news, but that it was anything but pleasant to him I could plainly see.

In due time Chesely arrived, and from the moment I laid eyes on his dark, sneering countenance I knew we would never be friends. The feeling of dislike, I am sure, was mutual, and it was not many days before I noticed that my friend had changed from one of the merriest, most talkative of men to one moody and preoccupied. This struck me more forcibly when we were in Chesely's company, and I wondered at it.

One morning Deering and myself were in the smoking-room, one door of which led out on to a little side porch. I had stretched my legs comfortably over a chair and was half-asleep, when suddenly the sound of voices startled me from my doze. It was Mrs. Deering and Chesely.

I looked at Kennon. He was breathing heavily, fast asleep. It is needless for me to repeat the conversation between the woman who was this man's wife and the man who was a guest in his home. Suffice it to say that the relationship between the two was not mere friendship.

At dinner that night Kennon Deering was in high spirits. He laughed, he joked, his wit was sparkling and keen. His melancholia had vanished, and, to my utter amazement, he was more than gracious to Chesely.

The latter was surprised at this sudden turn of affairs, I easily noticed, and Mrs. Deering herself glanced questioningly at her husband more than once. During the meal my host turned to Chesely with the remark that, as soon as dinner was over, he would like to show him his museum, as he understood he was fond of curios.

In a short time we had finished our cigars and Deering led the way to his treasure box.

Something in Deering's manner struck me as being unnatural, and as his cordiality increased towards his false friend the latter's uneasiness became more apparent. However, in spite of this fact he seemed astonished and interested in the sight before him, and when my host pointed out his unique assortment of daggers he seemed to appreciate the great feature of the collection to even a greater extent than I had. But the knowledge of the influence that one among that number exerted caused me to shudder.

"By the way, Val," suddenly remarked Deering, "let me show you my latest acquisition, a suit of Persian armour."

I followed him to the other side of the room, leaving Chesely reading the descriptions under each specimen, and was examining the new curiosity when a muttered oath, the first words of which caused me to turn and stand rooted with horror, told too plainly the meaning of it all.

We saw Chesely standing there, saw his hand raised, saw something glitter, and Frank Chesely lay on the floor still and dead. I rushed to his side.

In the wound I recognised the flame-shaped weapon. It was the accursed dagger I had handled with such strange results.

I looked up and met the eyes of Deering. In that glance my worst suspicions were confirmed. His sleep had only been feigned. And this visit to the museum—was it chance?

SEEN YOUR PHOTO IN SHORT STORIES?

IF SO, YOU WILL GET £5.

HERE IS THE SCHEME.

We have in our possession a considerable number of photographs of men, women, and children of all grades of society secured for us by our agents, who have scoured the United Kingdom for this special purpose.

Each week we publish five of these portraits, and to each of the persons thus represented we dispatch the sum of £5, on his or her forwarding a claim on a post-card addressed to PORTRAIT DEPARTMENT, "SHORT STORIES," Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Although the persons whose portraits will appear in this competition are quite unknown to us personally, we have their names and addresses in our possession, and, therefore, a claim can be settled at once, without risk of fraud. Already nineteen claims have been paid since the competition started.

Is your portrait here? If so, drop us a post-card, and get £5.

All claims in connection with the portraits below must reach the address already given above by Tuesday next, December 17th.

Full names and addresses of the correct claimants will appear in succeeding numbers.

HOW TO MAKE A CLAIM FOR A £5 NOTE.

Simply write on a post-card these words:

The Portrait No.......... (here put number of portrait) in the current number of SHORT STORIES is mine. Please forward a £5 note.

THE FERGUSSON FEUD.

A Tragedy of Errors.

CHAPTER I.

The Advertisement in The Times.

"Should this meet the eye of Charles James Fergusson, supposed to have resided, from 1887 to 1898, somewhere in the State of Pennsylvania, U.S., and since the latter year to have lived for some time in the neighbourhood of St. Heliers, Jersey, he is earnestly requested to communicate at once with the undersigned—

"Messrs. Deane and Frobisher
"(Solicitors),
"184, Bedford Row,
"London, W.C."

The man who read this announcement in The Times, of February 4th, of this present year of grace, would not at first sight seem to have been one who could possibly have had any interest in, or connection with, the matters referred to therein.

The place was a certain Free Library in the south-east district. The assembled frequenters of the reading-room were none too clean or respectable, so that the individual in the last stage of shabbiness almost, was in no way conspicuous or noticeable.

He was apparently between thirty and forty in actual years, but his unkempt overgrowth of iron-grey hair and beard, his sunken cheeks, and general air of physical decadence, stamped him at once as being unnaturally and prematurely old.

The advertisement in question irresistibly attracted him; he could not get away from it.

"I never was in America," he muttered under his breath. "While as for Jersey, I know no more about it than what I've heard and read."

He tried his pockets (or the apology for them) but failed to find that for which he sought.

"If I had a piece of paper now," he said to himself again, "I'd copy it."

A second search proved as futile as the first, resulting only in a dirty scrap, absolutely useless for the purpose.

"Well, at any rate, the address of the lawyers is easy to remember—'Deane and Frobisher, Bedford Row.' The names seem familiar, but I can't make out in what way."

It was getting towards dusk, and Charles James Fergusson left the Library, and slouched out into the wet streets. As he shuffled along westward, he communed with himself.

"It's too late to do anything to-day; besides, I must prepare myself to answer questions. Say to-morrow afternoon. It will be a ticklish thing to tackle Messrs. Deane and Frobisher in this garb, and state. The clerks mayn't let me get near the principals. Still, I won't give in to the first knock under."

In the course of an hour and a half he was outside the St. James' Restaurant in Piccadilly. He had barely stood there five minutes when a hansom drove up. Out of it stepped a gentleman in evening dress.

The newcomer appeared to have some difficulty in finding silver enough for the fare. Gold he had—a handful—and the sight of it made the eyes of the wet and ragged object watching by the kerb dilate with envious longing, and his lips crack and parch with the thought even of all that gold would buy.

Evidently of an impatient and irritable temperament, the gentleman at last suddenly handed up to the driver half-a-sovereign, telling him to keep the change, and walked into the restaurant.

Charles James Fergusson was, in his way, a bit of a fatalist, and at the same time a grumbler where his own bad luck was concerned.

The two states of mind are somewhat inconsistent, but in this particular instance, inconsistency was regarded much in the light of a virtue, and cherished accordingly.

The tramp certainly envied the gentleman; that was only natural; but he also tried to believe that, out of sheer pity for his misery, Fate had in immediate store for him that which would in all likelihood put them, tramp and gentleman, on a common footing.

Then something happened.

Casting his eyes on the ground, Charles James saw lying on the wet pavement an oblong piece of white pasteboard—a visiting card.

The gentleman must have dropped it when seeking for silver. Picking it up, and taking it to a street lamp, he read upon it a name, which startled him not a little, inasmuch as it was his own.

"Charles James Fergusson.
206, Belgrave Road, S.W."

The address was not his, but the name—there was no mistake about that.

"I've an idea. I'll take a walk in that direction and wait for my double. There is no knowing what might come of it."

Time was when shabby Charles James was a wearer of evening-dress suits, and a good customer at the Cafe Royal, and at Frascati's. Time was when, left a more than moderate fortune by his father—a West-end curio dealer in a large way of business, he lived in purple and fine linen for such time as the money lasted.

In an evil day, however, he took to the turf, and reckless betting, and as that way ruin lies, he but fulfilled the good-natured prophecy of those who stood by and watched his career, and "came a cropper." He had not the energy to rise again, but drifted lower and lower, till he eventually touched bottom.

"Perhaps, if I work it right, this swell will help me. If I could but make myself presentable why, I'd have no difficulty with the 'devil's own!' I'm sure I've heard their names before. Frobisher!—Frobisher!—that's it! I know now! There used to be a sharp, nip-featured little man, precise as an old maid, come to see me—years ago—at old Mumble's school at Chiswick. He'd ask me questions; if I'd been a good boy, but never a word about my parents. At the time I thought that odd; but I remember that when I told the governor, he bid me be civil to old Frobisher. You may depend there's something in it! and Charlie Fergusson is going to be a rich man—a man of dollars—a millionaire!"

In his excitement he shouted out at the top of his voice, and the constable on point duty in Grosvenor Place eyed him suspiciously.

The Grand Christmas Double Number will be ready next week. Price 2d.

Half-past ten by the lodge clock at Hyde Park Corner.

"I don't suppose this reflection of me—this fine Mr. Fergusson—will get home over early, so I can take it easy. But I mustn't hang about, or I shall be run in for 'loitering with intent.'"

It was just eleven when he slowly passed the door of 206, Belgrave Road. At one period a semi-fashionable street, it is now the residential haunt of the well-to-do bachelor civil-servant, and leisured man.

Contriving to keep his eye on the house, the while affecting not to "loaf" in a way that would attract unwelcome official attention, the wastrel thought himself fortunate when, at a few minutes past midnight, a cab drove up to 206, his Piccadilly namesake descending from it.

Curiously, he had the same difficulty as before in finding silver. This gave our expectant friend his opportunity, for, crossing the road, he stood in the shadow of the cab waiting events.

"Hullo! What do you want?"

The hungry-looking, impossible individual said nothing in reply, but cooly surveyed his questioner with a shrewdly criticising glance that left not even the smallest personal detail out of its calculation.

Charles James Fergusson, briefless barrister-at-law, and sometime special foreign correspondent of the Daily Scarifier, was rather amused than otherwise at this other eccentric being's peculiar conduct.

"If," said he, "you are hard-up and want something, why don't you say so? Here! here's a couple of shillings for you. No, by Jove! there isn't, it's only one. I've no more silver. Good-night!"

He took out his key-chain, and turned to ascend the steps of the house.

"Half-a-minute! Mr.—er—Fergusson," said the poor Charles James.

"Eh! How do you know my name?"

"You shouldn't drop your cards about. It isn't surprising, you know, if one gentleman picks up a card that another gentleman has dropped, that the name of gentleman number two should become known to gentleman number one."

"Ah! you are a humorist, I see. Well, come inside, and—and talk. I don't feel up to laughing in the street."

The policeman on his beat quickened his steps as he saw the shabby, slouching figure pass up the steps in the wake of the opera-hatted, dress-coated gentleman. He deemed it to be a case for investigation.

As he came abreast of the portico he flashed his bull's-eye on the incongruous pair.

"All right, sir! D'you want me?"

"Oh, no, policeman; this is—is a friend of mine coming in for an hour's chat."

"Oh, indeed, sir! beg pardon! Good night, sir."

"Good-night, constable."

The policeman was only half-convinced; but, knowing the gentleman at 206, thought it must be all right, even if it did look a bit queer.

"He didn't like your friend's looks," said the visitor, with a half-smile and a smothered chuckle, as they entered the front dining-room, and, seating himself without invitation in the most comfortable chair he could find.

"No," returned his host, turning the gas in the chandelier up full. "You can't quite blame him, though, can you?"

This stalwart young fellow—he looked to be about three or four-and-thirty—stood nearly six feet, and seemed born to pass uninterrupted and good-naturedly through life, along the primrose way. His guest was manifestly of this opinion, for he found himself being almost irresistibly attracted towards this fortunate possessor of his own name.

The rich man, first feeding the poor man, turned him, as it were, inside out in true lawyer-like style, strangely refraining, however, from inquiring his name. Perhaps he thought the name of a man like his visitor, was immaterial and unimportant.

"Who's that?"

"Who's who?"

"Who's that the portrait of—there, over the mantel, who is it?"

"I don't know how the picture can possibly interest you; but, since you ask, it is—or was—my father."

The other walked deliberately across to where it hung, and, after looking at it attentively for a minute or two, gave vent to a long, low whistle.

"If that's your father," he said, "then your grandfather must also have been mine, for he is as like as a twin to the man that called me son."

"What is your name?"

"Charles James Fergusson, of that ilk."

"I believe you to be a liar! and that until you read my name on my card, you never so much as heard the name."

"That's unkind! to call a man a liar just because he claims to be himself. If it comes to that, I'm inclined to think that you are the impostor, and that you've no more right to my name than has a South Sea Islander!"

"You are an impudent rascal," angrily replied the other. "But——"

He suddenly stopped short, and turning pale to ghastliness, dropped inertly into the nearest chair, his head falling forward on his breast.

Charles James, the social pariah, the outsider, was no heartless vagabond. The helpless condition of his companion touched and roused him. In a flash he took in the situation—more especially the dangers of it—to himself personally.

He gently lifted up the stricken man's head, but there was no intelligence, no speculation in the glassy eyes. A stertorous catching for breath; a gurgling like to the death-rattle in the throat, and in less than three minutes from his seizure Charles James Fergusson, of the Middle Temple, barrister-at-law, lay back in a huddled heap in his chair—dead—stone dead.

To say that the other was altogether collected and uninfluenced by the awful suddenness of the catastrophe, would be to say that which is untrue. To get safely away from the house without being observed, was, however, his first thought when he saw that all was over.

Then he looked hurriedly about him, and, for the first time, noticed, lying upon the big bureau, standing open in the corner by the window, a bulky letter, foolscap-size, ready for posting.

Casting one half-terrified glance at the dead man, he moved over to the desk and lifted the letter. As he did so, his brain conceived the idea that the packet contained information which, if he acted upon it, would give him a fortune.

Slipping the letter into his pocket, and stealing softly across the room again, he listened intently on the threshold, but heard nothing to alarm him.

The Grand Christmas Double Number will be ready next week. Price 2d.

In another second he had reached the street-door—opened it—closed it again, and was in the street.

Not a soul was in sight; and as Big Ben boomed out the quarter past one, he halted under a lamp, and read the superscription on the envelope.

It was addressed to—

"Messrs. Deane and Frobisher
(solicitors),
"184, Bedford Row, W.C."

CHAPTER II.

The Story of the Feud.

In the smoke-room at Fergusson Peel, sits the master, ill at ease.

The old Border stronghold, dating back from Will Armstrong's time, and even before, has been altered, or rather added to out of all recognition. The old tower, or "peel," still stands in all its ancient ruggedness, but the comparatively modern house is entirely apart from it. Fergusson is situate in the Scottish borderland, midway between Jedburgh and Hawick—classic ground, every inch of it. The ghosts of the old cattle-raiders are vulgarly supposed to haunt the district, and the huge rusty knocker on the ruinous iron-studded oak door of the keep, is popularly credited with being subject to a midnightly tattoo by the uneasy spirit of Outlaw Will on stormy nights in winter-time.

Two months have wholly changed the outward man of Charles James. He, to all appearance, is not the same person who, but nine weeks ago, stood under a gas-lamp at one o'clock in the morning, in the Belgrave Road, London, deciphering the name and address upon the letter he had only just before abstracted from under a dead man's sightless eyes.

The clean-shaven face and closely-cropped hair; the suit of well-fitting grey clothes, had transformed him. His own mother, were she alive, would not have recognised him.

And yet he is mind-disturbed and restless.

He has satisfied the lawyers, and the law; has entered into peaceful possession of lands and money, which have laid dormant and unclaimed for over fifty years, yet is there a fly in the ointment—a something he knows not what—that spoils his enjoyment, and makes against satisfaction.

Before him on the table is the identical paper which, two months ago, he carried off from the house in Belgrave Road. Its contents certainly enabled him to establish his claim, as, without it, he would have been completely at sea on almost every vital point.

One thing, however, troubles him, if anything more than any other, viz.—that nothing has ever been publicly made known of the Belgrave Road tragedy. The newspapers were silent; there was no record or account of an inquest; and when, a month after the event, inquiries were made on his behalf at 206, the house was found to be empty and to let; no one knowing anything of the late tenants. There was nothing, therefore, to be done, save to accept things as they were, and to make the best of them.

He was now, for the fifth or sixth time, acquainting himself with the contents of the stolen letter, which consisted of several pages of closely-written manuscript.

Briefly epitomised, the story was this:

On the eve of the defeat of Charles I. at Naseby in 1645, two brothers, sons of Sir James Fergusson, an ardent loyalist, quarrelled over the daughter of a certain Puritan preacher—one Caleb Hare. The elder, Charles James, had known the girl longer than had his brother Henry, although Sir James was equally resolved that neither of his sons should marry her.

Charles James, the first-born, was in command of a troop of horse in Sir Marmaduke Langdale's regiment, and though he was at home for a few days, was summoned to rejoin the army at almost a moment's notice. Henry was more of a student than a soldier, and it is to be feared, took advantage of his brother's enforced absence to press his own suit with pretty Naomi Hare. To do this effectually, he found it necessary to so far dissemble with his sweetheart's father as to consent to join the Roundheads under Fairfax. The old minister's objections vanished entirely when Henry assumed steel skull-cap and broad-sword on behalf of the Parliament, and a marriage, all unknown to Sir James, took place early one morning in the pastor's little house on the banks of the Coquet in County Northumberland.

It was a servant of the Fergusson Peel household that carried the news to Charles James at dawn on the day of the fatal fight. The infuriated young man swore, on the cross hilt of his sword, never to cease from the pursuit of vengeance till that vengeance was satisfied. Hot upon the information as to the marriage came the word that Henry Fergusson had joined the ranks of the Parliament men, and would be opposed in arms to his brother in the ensuing struggle.

All through the day did the elder seek the younger. Once he saw him through the dust and press of battle, but the opportunity passed, and Charles Fergusson was saved the guilt of deliberate fratricide. Then came the final rout, and with Cromwell and his Ironsides at their heels, the King's men fled the field, and, as it proved, the cause. Charles James escaped and, though he went through unnumbered vicissitudes, managed to reach a safe hiding-place. On the Restoration he came into his own, his father having died soon after the execution of the King; but the bitter feud between the brothers was, if anything, intensified by time. He married late in life, but it was a loveless match, one child, a son, alone surviving. Named Charles James according to family tradition, the boy in course of time succeeded to the family honours and estate. Henry's eldest son subsequently joining William Penn in his great American colonising scheme.

And so it went on, generation after generation, the two branches keeping up the feud out of sheer family pride. At last, in or about the year 1845 the two sons, and only children of the then representatives of the Fergusson family, went out into the world, and were never more heard of. Inquiries were made in every direction, but without result, and until the present year, when the firm of solicitors, Deane and Frobisher, unexpectedly discovered a clue to the missing heir.

The paper went on to give some particulars as to the barrister Charles James Fergusson's eleven years sojourn in Philadelphia, as special correspondent of the London Daily Scarifier. He had been "called," but had never practised, sailing for the United States almost as soon as his fees were paid. The short stay in Jersey was also touched upon, bringing the account to a close.

To put it broadly, the conscience of the man in possession was troubling him. He knew that he had gained his ends by fraudulent masquerading, and that, though the man he was virtually personating was dead, he held his present position solely by criminally false means.

The Grand Christmas Double Number will be ready next week. Price 2d

To get away from himself he determined to return to London, and the amusements and distractions of the metropolis to seek to exorcise the fiends of remorse and self-reproach.

Town was full to the brim, and everywhere was crush and clink and glitter. As yet, he knew nobody, nobody, that is, of any social importance, and was, therefore, thrown entirely upon his own resources. He was, however, successful in getting elected to a fairly good club, through the good offices of young Deane, the son of the senior partner of the Bedford Row firm. This gave him something to do, and an object in life of a sort, and brought him one or two acquaintanceships, which promised to develop into friendly intimacies.

A Major Galbraith, Seaforth Highlanders, retired, held the first place in his esteem, to all appearance the good feeling being mutual. The Major was a grizzled veteran—a widower with three daughters, the elder of whom was a charming girl of twenty-three, or thereabouts. Fergusson was introduced to her by her father at Epsom, the acquaintance very soon becoming, for him, the one thing for which to live.

Up the river to Henley in a steam launch, and down by road to Richmond, only fed the fire, until he could hold back no longer, but opened his whole heart to her.

"I know," he said, "that I am far too old for you, dear; but if you could look over that, I would devote my life to you—would do all that a man may do for your happiness."

"Mr. Fergusson," she said, "I am not sure that that which you deem to be an obstacle, is one in my eyes—is really so."

"Then I may hope?" he asked, in a tone that betrayed how much her answer meant to him.

"I think you may," she replied, looking down, and threading and unthreading her fingers.

After that it might have been thought that he would imbibe a brighter spirit; would regard the future with a certain amount of sanguine anticipation.

As a matter of fact, it was the reverse with him.

She had told him in an outburst of womanly confidence that it was because he was a good man that she was going to marry him; while he knew in his heart-of-hearts that he was a liar! a thief! an utter and shameless impostor!

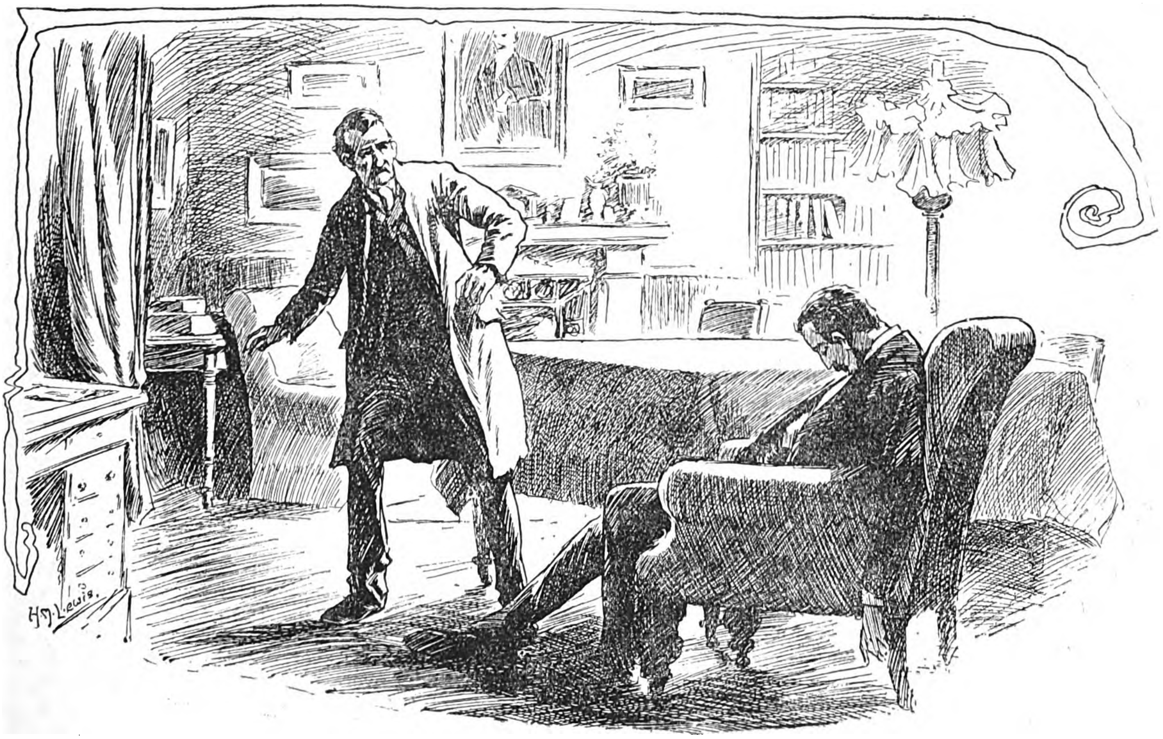
So it was, therefore, that her avowal gave him no real comfort, brought him no peace.

One day it chanced that he made an appointment to meet Hilda Galbraith at Charing Cross Station, and to go with her to inspect a house some thirty miles down the line, in Kent.

While waiting outside the booking-office, the sudden rush of porters and ticket-examiners, and the increase of noise and bustle, announced the arrival of the Continental train.

He had turned to watch the arriving crowd, when the face, thin and drawn with illness, of a man, who was supported on either hand by a hospital nurse and a man-servant, and who was slowly coming towards Hilda and himself, made his blood almost cease coursing through his veins.

It was a pale face: the face of a man who had but lately passed within hailing distance of the "dark valley."



Casting one half-terrified glance at the dead man, he moved over to the desk and lifted the letter.

The Grand Christmas Double Number will be ready next week. Price 2d.

It was the face of that other Charles James Fergusson—the man whom he had seen die in the house in Belgrave Road.

CHAPTER III.

Face to Face.

"And you do not mean to prosecute this man?"

"No; I do not mean to prosecute him."

"Then you will pardon my saying, Mr. Fergusson, that I, both as a lawyer, and as a man, consider you to be altogether wrong in not doing so."

"I daresay; and I suppose, as a matter of strict law and justice, that I ought to make my supplanter pay roundly for his certainly impudent assumption of my rights and privileges; but—I don't intend doing anything of the kind."

Old Mr. Deane shrugged his shoulders, and expressed, by the uplifting of his hands, and the turning down of his mouth corners, that he quite disclaimed all responsibility in the matter, and regarded his client as lacking even the commonest of common sense.

But he was to be even more astonished.

"Not only," declared Mr. Fergusson, "will I not punish this man, but I purpose leaving him in quiet possession of that which, though crookedly, he undoubtedly cleverly acquired. I have good reason to believe that he was, and is, absolutely unaware of his real connection with my family as a lineal descendant of old Henry Fergusson, who won Naomi Hare by a trick, and by going over to the Parliament side."

"If," interrupted Mr. Deane, "this be so, why the fellow is your cousin, and next in succession to yourself."

"Precisely! and as I have gear in plenty—through my mother—while this poor beggar, who evidently believed me dead when he appropriated that letter, if I turned him out, would practically be on the world again, without a shilling, and without a place to lay his head. Why, I'll just let him stay where he is."

"Then all I can say is, that you are a fine fellow! if you are a fool to yourself."

"Thanks! Perhaps you are right as to my being a fool, but it takes a wise man, you know, to make one; while even a fool may be so only in appearance. Mr. Deane, I have a request to make of you."

"Shall be only too happy to oblige you."

"Well, then, I want to manage this business myself, and in my own way. I don't wish my cousin to get an advance inkling of my intentions."

"Very good! very good! Not a word shall reach him from this office, you may depend."

"Then that's all right; and I leave London to-night for Fergusson, to which place I understand my relative has suddenly retreated."

Early the following morning a stranger alighted at Jedburgh Station, and forthwith engaged a trap to take him to Fergusson Peel. He had no luggage beyond a small Gladstone bag, and was accompanied by a manservant, who attended upon his master with the most devoted solicitude.

The distance being about fourteen Scotch miles, it was past midday when the "Peel" was reached.

"Mr. Fergusson, is he at home?"

"Yes, sir; your name?"

"My name? Oh, James—Mr. James, of London."

"Robert," said the visitor to his companion, when the servant had gone to inform her master. "You will come with me as far, that is, as the room door. I will manage then, and you will wait for me in the hall."

"Mr. Fergusson does not know your name, sir, but he will see you."

Robert took his master's arm, and helped him along to the door of the smoke-room, and left him there. The visitor turned the handle of the door, and entered the room.

The man who stood before him, in all the self-abasement of detected guilt, trembled so that the intervening table, upon which his hands leant, visibly shook.

"Mr. Fergusson," said barrister Charles James, in much the same genial, hearty tone as he had used that February morning in the dining-room in Belgrave Road, "they say that dead men tell no tales. Now I am here to deny that, and refute the theory entirely, for I have a tale to tell, which will be the best possible evidence against the truth of the proverb."

The other Charles James could not speak. He was fascinated by this man returned, as it seemed to him, from the dead. His tongue clave to the roof of his mouth. It frightened him; and he took it as being the just reward of his wrong-doing. Then he learnt how, on that night, the man he deemed dead was but in a trance-like fit, from which he emerged, in a few hours, to a serious illness of several months' duration. Through it all his memory was a blank, and he recollected nothing prior to the sudden heart-seizure.

He told his dazed listener how that he had been alone in the world ever since the age of twelve years, and, until he came across some papers of his late father's on his return to England from Jersey, was in complete ignorance of his own connection with the Fergusson's of the Peel. As soon as he could be moved he went, accompanied by a nurse and his man, to the South of France, from where he had returned four days previously.

"And this is not all," he continued, smiling; "I have found, through a sure channel, that you are the direct and, indeed, only living descendant of Henry Fergusson, who was the main cause of the feud, which has come down to almost recent times. You and I, therefore, ought, in order that the old tradition may be duly observed, to fight out the vendetta to the bitter end. What say you?"

"I don't understand! You say nothing of what I have done; but now that you are here I will go, and leave you to your inheritance."

"I don't fancy you will, when I say that I am myself about to leave again for the Pyrenees, never, so say my doctors, to return more. The best thing, therefore, you can do, is to stay where you are, and to drink my health every Halloween night with a brimmer, and three times three."

"But I don't deserve this!"

"Do we, any of us, get all that we deserve? I know I don't. Robert!"

His man opened the door and came into the room.

"Give me your arm to the trap. Good-bye, namesake! I shall always remember you as a fellow of infinite jest. Good-bye!"

He reached out his hand across the table; the other took and wrung it, till the sick man's face became whiter, and his fingers tingled again. It was the sound of wheels upon the gravel drive that told the one that the other had gone out of his life for ever, and that with his going had gone too—also for ever—the spirit of the family feud.

CHAPTER XXII. (continued.)

MEANTIME, Rossiter was pacing the little room in the east wing used as an office by Morgan Chandler, who was seated in a swivel arm-chair at a roll-top desk.

"The head better to-day, Mr. Chandler?"

"It's healing," growled the steward, pressing his hand very tenderly on the bandages he still wore, "but the pain's far from gone, the pain never will be gone till I bring them as did it to justice."

"The mystery is how they entered. The Squire's window was fastened and intact."

"Yes," said Chandler, "it seems to me they must have got in by the far end window in the corridor."

"The lights were switched off when you entered the Squire's room?"

"Yes."

"You're sure Branscombe was one of the men you saw?"

"Certain sure."

"Certain sure? And yet, you know, it was very dark."

The other paused in some confusion. "'Twere he, right enough," he said.

"And the other?"

"I'm not so sure."

"But you've let fall vague hints that you knew the man."

"Rossiter," said the other, wheeling suddenly round, "I'm not my own master here now, somebody else is master."

The detective nodded, and Chandler went on:

"I've got enemies here, enemies who've got the ear of the man who's master now and who'll lose no chance of paying off old scores."

"I can understand that."

"Now, can I talk to you certain sure that what I say will go to neither them nor him?"

"Man to man, what you tell me I'll tell to neither man nor woman."

"Well, then, there's one man employed on this estate, and in the confidence of the master, who owes me a grudge; a man who before he was an under keeper and night watcher was a well-known poacher, loafer, and brawler, a man whose work nowadays is to lie low by day and be abroad by night."

"I know the man you mean," said the detective, "Ned Fletcher," and with a pencil he scribbled a stenographic sign on his shirt cuff. After a few moments' silence he suddenly asked:

"What was your quarrel with Branscombe about?"

"Who told you there was a quarrel?"

And the detective, surer now of his ground, said: "Never mind, I know there was one."

Morgan Chandler was dealing with a detective who might, or might not, be in possession of the facts.

"A man in my position," he said cautiously, "nearly always has disputes of some kind with tenants and dealers."

"Oh, I know all that," said the detective, feeling his ground, "rows about accounts," and he knew from the other's shifty eyes that the shot had gone right home, the shot suggested by what he had learnt of the other's nature.

"Who told you?" he exclaimed hotly.

"Never mind. But it was a bit of a relief to you, Chandler, when he disappeared, wasn't it?"

"I'm not going to be cross-questioned like this, as if I was a thief instead of him," exclaimed the other angrily, "and, look here, Mr. Detective, I wish you good-bye! There's the door."

"Yes, there's the door," said the detective, opening it as he spoke, "but as to good-bye, suppose we say au revoir?"

And he left the steward's office, left Fallowfield Hall, remarking confidentially to himself: "Tom Rossiter, have you mistaken your vocation, oughtn't you to be scaring crows in a field or perforating stamps with a punching machine in a Government office, or on some other soft job requiring the brains of a rabbit? Chandler's lying about Branscombe, and lying because he himself's a thief; he's faking the estate accounts. But what was he doing in the Squire's room? Why didn't he touch any one of the bells? Ring up any one of the servants by just pressing a button? I wonder was he there—because he'd been cooking accounts? Is he lying about Fletcher, too? Who brought that strange letter to my place? Who sent that telegram on the day of the inquest? By Jove! what I thought was a split in the camp seems a deep move to put me on the wrong scent."

Looking up, he saw coming in an opposite direction the man who brought the telegram!

The man whom Morgan Chandler accused.

"Many a random shot goes home," he reasoned swiftly, "I'll ask the man who delivered the telegram if he knows anything about the letter."

By this time they had met. Fletcher was touching his cap; the detective wheeled round in answer to the "Morning, sir."

"Stop, Fletcher, you silly chap! Why didn't you wait for an answer to the letter you brought me?"

"I wasn't told to, sir," the man blurted out.

"Why, he said he told you to wait."

"What, the Squire, sir. He told me to shove it under the door and come away and say nowt about it."

"Oh! of course, of course, I was thinking of another letter that came earlier in the day. I beg your pardon, Fletcher, good morning."

And he walked along hastily, almost at a racing speed, to work off the pent up excitement with which his very frame vibrated.

"The Squire—the Squire! What's it mean—what's it mean?" he muttered. "Oh, you've been wide—wide—wide; you've been played with, fooled, Tom Rossiter. You're a disgrace to the Yard; you must never show your face back there till you've undone the tangle you've been making for yourself. By Jove! Tom, I think you're picking up one of the ends, you're picking up——"

"Hullo, Mr. Rossiter, any luck?"

The Grand Christmas Double Number will be ready next week. Price 2d.

It was Bingle, the local constable, and he was in a sarcastic mood, and Bingle's moods were always defined; they were not merely engraved, they were dug.

"Surprised you sharp London chaps ain't done something to open our eyes down here, bein' chaw-bacons" (the term had been passed on by some 'good-natured friend').

"Patience, patience, Mr. Bingle, that's what we have to practice in our profession."

"Yes, we've been patient enough, sir; as them two genelmen brothers, Mr. James and Mr. Joseph Nubbley, was a sayin'. 'patience is a virtue, and it's one as is werry useful in the police force.'"

"Pity the brothers Nubbley haven't got business of their own to mind instead of poking into other people's," snapped out the detective, and Mr. Bingle, who had been partaking of the hospitality of the square faced bottle, the joint possession of the brothers Nubbley, remarked with dignity:

"The brothers Nubbley is genelmen, Mr Rossiter, real genelmen, hindependent; not folks as gives theirselves airs, if they do come from London. Between you and me, Mr. Rossiter, as to their pokin' their noses into the business as brought you from London, if they couldn't have done no more, they couldn't have done much less, for all you comes from Scotland Yard."

"Why, you hob-nailed village pump washer! You public-house loafer! Go home and sleep off the drink that people treat you to to hoodwink you!" shouted the now angry Rossiter.

And the other, pulling himself up erect as possible, which wasn't very, said:

"All right, Mr. Rossiter, it's Hollands for the chaw-bacons guarding the village pump, but it's choice old port for the Criminal Vessi—vesti—"

No, he couldn't master it. He stalked away, hiccoughing "'partment" with all the dignity and directness of motion at his command, or what there was of it. And Rossiter, looking straight in front of him along the road, noticed the brothers Nubbley as usual basking in the sun in the little garden fronting their little cottage, James leaning on the mossy stone wall, Joseph reclining in his invalid chair, each puffing at his long churchwarden, and the detective reflected not only on the beautiful simplicity and calm of the picture, but also on the circumstance that the brothers Nubbley, in conversation with his rural colleague, had passed remarks.

Rapt in these reflections, he turned into the Roylance Arms, in the tap-room whereof were seated Bob Challoner and sundry boon companions, congenially occupied in the discussion of liquid refreshment and affairs local and public. Strangely enough, their conversation dropped as the inspector entered, and the party looked at each other in some amount of self-consciousness and confusion.

"Mornin’ Mr. Challoner," said Rossiter with unwonted suavity, "you'll take a mug of ale with me?"

Bob emptied his mug and expressed his willingness to repeat the operation with celerity.

"And perhaps your friends will join us?" said Rossiter, which suggestion also was adopted with unanimity.

"I want you to do me a favour, Challoner," said Rossiter. "I've a little terrier down at my digs, and I want to try him with a rat. Do you think you could get one for me, and do you think you could bring me one or two in a trap?"

"That I will, sir," said Bob, fired with visions of yet more ale. "Shall I leave 'em at your lodgings?"

"No," said the detective promptly, "I want you to bring them here."

CHAPTER XXIII.

A Chum from "Down Under."

"Cooee!" Startled by the long piercing call Gerald Hastie removed his pipe from his lips, his feet from the mantelpiece, the rest of himself from the easy chair, laid down his book, and went to the window.

"It can't be!" he exclaimed. "And yet, whether it can or not, there's only one man in the world as long as that."

In a moment he was at the door, in another was gripping one of the biggest and cleverest hands that ever gripped the cane handle of a bat. This done, the nonchalance of the Anglo-Saxon race asserted itself. The stranger had come from the other end of the earth, but just as if he had dropped in from over the road, Hastie was saying, "Geoff!"

"Gerry!"

"Come in and sit down, old man. How goes it? Will you have some grub?"

"No thanks. If you've got some good beer."

In a few moments a college pot crested with a white foam was on the table, a big tobacco jar beside it.

"Now light up, and let's have the news, but before you start you'll let me put you up here, won't you?"

"Just for a night or two, Gerry," said the other, filling a big briarwood. "Of course, you guess I've come home to arrange matters for the team next year; got anything very good to meet us?"

"Well, yes, there's Jessop and Stoddy, he'll never grow stale, and there's Mac and Abel, and some new blood from the 'Varsities."

"And your old self as cat-like as ever."

"Well, old man, a man's got to be wide awake with a cornstalk like you who can straddle halfway down the pitch with one foot inside the crease."

"Well, you'll want your best. We're sending a hot lot from Australia. So much for what's bringing me home. Now I've come to Fallowfield to kill two birds with one stone, that is to look up two pals, your dear old self and a man I knew down under. Of course you know him, a chap named Roylance, made a big lump as a Colonial, came back to take up a family estate. One of the best, isn't he?"

"The fact is," said Gerald, "I can't say I know much about him, he rather fights shy of persons, but he seems all right, sits a horse well."

"Then he's learnt something. That's one thing he never could do in the bush, we used to guy him awfully for it."

"What!"

"Well, never mind, he's one of the right sort for all that. I'm glad to hear he's got home all right because—well, I'm not superstitious or anything of that sort, but I had a bit of a dinner with Cyril the night before he sailed. He was as sober as I am now, but I never knew a chap so despondent. I'm not tiring you?"

"No; go on."

"He was frightfully pale, and when a fair man's pale, he is—well, he's pallid——"

"Fair! My dear chap, his hair is as black as your hat; blacker, that's brown."

"Gerry, my young friend, it strikes me the keenness of observation which used to spot a Proctor's bulldog at a mile in the old days has had the edge taken off it. But I was going to tell you. The night in question Cyril said to me: 'Geoff Heseltine, I'm going a long journey. I'm going back to the home I was born in, the home I left when I was a little kiddie.' 'And good luck to you,' says I, 'wish I were you. What are you sighing for?' For you'd have thought the poor chap was going to a funeral from the grizzling style of him. 'My dear old chap,' he went on, 'when I get back I shall feel like a stranger, a stranger in the house which belonged to my people for three hundred years, a stranger in the district. Do you know there's only one individual whose features I can call to mind, and that's a little girl with a face like one of the cherubs in Sir Joshua Reynold's picture; and bless my soul! she'll be by this time a grown-up young lady with her hair taken up and her frocks let down. Somehow I think I should know her, but I doubt if she'd know me.' 'Well,' says I chaffing, 'if she's grown up as nice as she was when she was little, tell her you've got an old pal who's just dying for a dear little English lady to take pity on him, for better or for worse.' 'Geoff, old man,' he said, 'somehow I've got an idea I shall never reach the old home and I shall never see the little girl.' 'What's the matter?' said I, and I filled his glass with champagne. But, Gerry, old fellow, something in the fellow's face, in his eyes, in his voice, took all the chaff out of me, and I felt for the moment as serious as he was. 'My lad,' said he, 'call it presentiment, premonition, second sight, clairvoyance, superstition; call it what you like, mark my words! I'm setting out for my home in England, I shall never reach that home, I shall never see that girl.' Well, of course, I laughed at the chap, as I shall laugh at him again before long, because it's all turned out skittles, anyway, as far as his reaching home is concerned; of course, I can't say whether he's seen the girl."

"Oh, yes," said Gerald Hastie, "he's seen the girl."

"Well, you're talking about as cheerfully as he was," said Geoffrey Heseltine. "Upon my word, I don't know whether it's the damp of the climate, but you home Britons, you are not boisterously hilarious."

"He's seen her, he's fallen madly in love with her, but he was too late, and he's in an awful temper about it."

"Hum! First thing I should think ever happened to put Cyril Roylance in a temper."

"Really? How different you and I estimate him!"

"Well, never mind about that, his presentimental rubbish has all turned out as I anticipated, in both particulars. So I've got to give him something back."

"Did you bet on it?"

"No; only he was so up to his eyes in his idea that he did this: He said, 'Geoff, old man, I haven't a relation in the world that I know about or care about, the only soul whose welcome I'm looking forward to is that little girl with the hair of spun sunshine and the eyes that bring bluebells to mind. Now, I'm so certain that something's going to happen to me, whether on sea or land, whether by rail or road, that I've made out this. It's a will Geoff, my last will and testament. Don't laugh, dear old chap, no, don't laugh at me. By that will I've given the English home that I know I shall never reach to the dear little girl whom I know I shall never see, and I place it in your hands to see at the proper time that it is carried out.'"

And Geoffrey Heseltine, taking from his breast pocket a document indorsed in German text and legal caligraphy, said: "There it is, old man, and I shall give it back to the dear old chap within a matter of hours. Read it for yourself, there's nothing private."

"He must have been thoroughly imbued with his presentiment, or whatever else we may call it," said Gerald after perusing the two closely written pages. "I say, Geoff, he must have thought a lot of you, judging from these half-dozen lines on page two."

"Oh, yes," said the other, "I shall lose a thumping legacy, and on my soul, Gerry, I shan't be sorry, for to tell you the truth, the dear old man was so earnest I caught half the infection of it, and it's quite a relief to me to know he's reached his English home after his long exile and his long, long journey. And now, after all this pow-wow, give us another pull of beer."

He took up the flagon, gazed at the old college arms, and then they fell to talking about the dear old days, when Plancus was Consul.

CHAPTER XXIV.

THE SQUIRE MEETS ONE WHO KNOWS HIM—AND ONE WHO DOESN'T!

"RICHARD SELDON!"

They were standing face to face, and she called him by his name. He who had set out to seek her met her midway on her errand, which was to seek him, to plead with him, to command, if need be, that he should quit his evil ways. He tried to evade the challenge.

"Really!" he said. "There's some mistake. You are mistaking me for someone else; you know that everybody has a double."

"I know some men lead a double life. You are Richard Seldon—my husband."

He tried to smile, to treat the affair with levity, only something in her face paralysed the effort.

"Moreover," she said, "you are living the life of Richard Seldon, doing the work of Richard Seldon; it is you marauding this countryside, robbing, housebreaking—oh, God forgive you, Dick, murdering. I thought you dead; that was better than to know you as you are."

"Hush!" he said, with an evil look in his face that had made men call him Tiger Dick.

"Oh! you may threaten, you may strike me; it wouldn't be the first time, Dick, because you know you can be very cruel——"

"Cruel! If you attempt to give me away I'll twist your neck!"

"Very well, then," she said, "kill me if you like and have done with it. My life's hardly worth living with the weight of the knowledge of the life you're leading on it; kill me if you will."

The something better in his nature, tiger that he was, the consciousness that she stood before him, a defenceless, unresisting woman, yes, unresisting were he to clench those iron hands of his upon her neck, made him pause, in some measure ashamed. It had been his one weakness in the eyes of his desperate fraternity, that he, so terrible to the strong, had been so contemptuously indifferent towards the weak.

"Look here," he said, "Pollie, you let me go my way, I'll let you go yours."

"But where's your way leading, Richard?"

"What's that to you?"

"It's this to me. You and those with you have fastened the odium of your wicked deeds upon an innocent man; you may even bring that man, guiltless as he is, to the gallows, and he is very dear to one who is very dear to me—one who has been kind as a sister to me—whom I love and cherish as a sister."

Knowing whom she meant and that what she said was truth, the flames of jealous hate blazed up in his heart. Once more in a fury, and seizing her wrists, he said:

"Go your own way, I tell you. Leave me to mine. Baulk me, and by all that's sacred——"

"Oh, Dick! Dick! is there anything sacred to you? Don't swear by what is sacred with the blood of your fellow man upon your soul."

"I tell you," he exclaimed, hoarse with passion, "there's nothing I'll stop at if you try to baulk me."

"Dick Seldon," she said, "I know you for a remorseless man, daring and strong, but I tell you to do your very worst. I will not stand by and see you carry out your plan to send a guiltless man on to the scaffold that you may lead the girl who loves him to the altar of the God you have so grievously offended."

"Ha! ha! there you are!" he laughed sardonically. "It's your cursed woman's jealousy that's stirring you to make mischief. But you shan't—you shan't. I'm a desperate man playing a desperate game for desperate stakes, and there's no card in the pack too desperate for me to play. Why, curse you! do you think I'll let you stand in my path with your sanctified ways and your aggravating sanctimonious sermons. I tell you, what I have I'll hold against the world, and what I want I'll take, and the men or women who stand between me and what I want stand there at their peril."

"Dick! Dick!" she said, clasping his arms as he seized her and dragged her towards the deep pool beside the churchyard wall, "kill me if you like, but I will do this with my last breath—I'll pray for you; I'll do all I can, as I've done from the beginning, to lead you from your evil ways. Oh, Dick! there was a time you loved me, once on a time you said for my sake you'd try to turn your feet to other ways, to shake off the bonds of sin that held you."

Nearer and nearer he dragged her to the margin of the pool.

"Dick! Dick! don't you remember that day when I was quite a girl, when in the garden of my father's house you wooed me and won me, telling me I was the fairest rose of all. I told you then I would love you all my life. Dick! you're strong, even among strong men, and I'm but a weak woman. Throw me in that deep and silent water and let me drown, but then remember whenever you linger on the brink of crime, with my last breath I prayed to God for you."

He looked down at her face, remembered the hour and the garden that she spoke of, how the sun shone, not only in that garden, but in his very heart: how different he felt that day to whatever he had felt before or since. And all of a sudden his arms dropped to his sides, he bowed his head, a sob burst in his throat.

"Oh, Heaven!" he said, "why was I born?"

She was silent, knowing in that moment that even as the rod of Moses smote the rocks and the spring gushed forth, so on his heart a touch of something not of earth had wakened a latent spring.

She took his arm, away from the pool, away from one crime she led him.

"Dick! Dick!" she said, "compose yourself; pull yourself together. See, someone's coming."

They walked along, side by side. Mary bowed, and he raised his hat in response to the salutation of two men, the curate and another. They passed on.

Gerald Hastie was for the moment lost in a reverie. What was the meaning of that evidently confidential tête-à-tête between Cyril Roylance and Mary Morrison? Was it possible that his own love was unsuccessful because he had a rival—a rival with a broad domain and a big rent roll? "No, no! she isn't like that," he said. "If she cares for him, she cares for him, not for his estate; besides, he's the Squire, the patron of her school, of course there are hundreds of matters for them to discuss." Then suddenly he roused himself from his dream, and turning to his companion, said:

Kneeling on his captive's chest Rossiter shouted: "Bingle, seize the other."

"Dear, dear! I'd quite forgotten. Why, bless my soul! why didn't you speak to him?"

And the man from Australia repeated, "Speak to him? To whom?"

"The man who passed—your friend, Cyril Roylance, the master of Fallowfield Hall."

"Cyril Roylance! Why, man, I thought you were dreaming a minute ago, and now I'm sure. That's no more the Cyril Roylance from whom I parted less than six months ago in Sydney Harbour than it's you or I."

CHAPTER XXV.

A WONDERFUL CURE.

THE scornful smile on the moist lips of Police-Constable Bingle occasioned by the appearance of the man from Scotland Yard, grew even broader as he observed what the man from Scotland Yard was carrying, and, affecting not to be aware of his approach, Mr. Bingle proceeded along the road, retraced his steps, returning to the garden wicket of the brothers Nubbley, to whom, as a matter of fact, some few minutes earlier he had been relating the substance of his conversation of the previous day with the man in question.

"Blowed if here he ain't a-comin'," he said behind the back of his hand. "And what d'ye think he's carryin'?"

The brothers exchanged glances.

"Don't you think, brother Joseph," said James, "I'd better take you indoors? It gets a bit chilly for you, brother Joseph, settin' still."

"No, don't go yet," pleaded Mr. Bingle; "do stop and listen to this. What do you think he's a-carryin'?"

"Don't know," laughed Joseph rather weakly. "I think, brother James, if you don't mind p'raps it would be wiser for me to go indoors. You see, when you've got chronic rheumatiz tying your legs up into sailor's knots after an accident, Mr. Bingle, you has to be careful."

"Yes, I quite understands, sir," said Mr. Bingle, "only if you'll let me prescribe for you I should advise you to take a nip out of that there bottle o' yours; just the right sort to keep away a chill, and blest if I ain't feelin' a little bit chilly round the small of the back."

Brother Joseph took the hint, also the suggested nip, and the square faced bottle was passed over the wicket to Mr. Bingle. And by this time Rossiter, who had quickened his footsteps, was alongside the garden wall.

"Morning, Mr. Rossiter," said Bingle, returning the square-faced bottle to Mr. James Nubbley and bestowing a wink of the deepest significance on both brothers.

"Good morning," replied Rossiter, with a cheerfulness which somewhat surprised the rural constable, having regard to the nature of their previous meeting. And he nodded genially to the brothers Nubbley.

"I suppose you don't happen to have seen anything of Branscombe or any of his gang?" Bingle inquired with another wink at the brothers.

"Wish I had," replied the detective with a sigh.

"Ah, we lots of us wishes for lots of things that don't come along lots of times," said Bingle. "But hello! I see you have made a capture of some sort at last," and he pointed to the cage carried by Rossiter, wherein half-a-dozen big buck rats were restlessly darting to and fro.

"Ah, yes," said Rossiter curiously, "I've got a little fox terrier at my place and I want to try him at a rat or two, and friend Bob here was good enough to get me these," and he nodded his head in the direction of Bob Challoner, who, with three or four companions, was loitering along towards them.

"And a werry good idea," said Bingle, delighted at the augmentation in the numbers of the audience whom he meant to regale by baiting the man from Scotland Yard. "I must say as 'ow I do admire the way you genelmen from London goes about your work, it's such a lesson to us chaw-bacons. You see when we sets about a job we goes tearing up and down the country all hours of the night arter our men, but you genelmen from Scotland Yard what's sent down here to take our work out of our 'ands, bless my soul! what do you do? When you're supposed to be getting on to the trail of one of the audaciousest gangs of criminals as was ever at large, why you settles yourself down to a nice little country holiday with a day or two's ratting in between."

"Well, you see, Bingle," said the other, when the laugh for which Mr. Bingle had been playing to the gallery had been duly awarded, "you see we all have our different ways of working; you've yours, I've mine. Bless my soul! How clumsy I am," for as he spoke he let fall his pipe over the wicket into the cottage garden.

"Well," chuckled Bingle, with another glance at the gallery, "I ain't going to be so unpolite as to contradict yer."

And in the midst of a second meed of merriment at his expense, Rossiter, disregarding Mr. James Nubbley's "Don't trouble, sir, allow me," lifted the latch of the wicket and was inside the garden stooping for his pipe. He picked it up and replaced it in his pocket.

"Well, anyway, Mr. Bingle," he said in a somewhat appealing tone, "after all, there is a bit of sport in seeing a smart dog setting about a good strong rat or two, and these look strong enough, don't they, Mr. James?"

"Very strong," said brother James admiringly.

"Yes, they're all right, aren't they, Mr. Joseph?" and he held them up to the inspection of the brother in the invalid chair.

"They're very fine rats," said brother Joseph, moving his face aside, "if you don't mind, Mr. Rossiter, not too close. I can't abear the sight of rats, and I ain't over partial to the smell of 'em."

"But these are beauties," said the detective, holding them directly over the invalid chair, "and did you ever see such a clever cage as this?"

"Yes, very simple, but do be careful with it," for the detective was handling that cage in a most imprudent manner.

"You know, the cleverest things always are simple," he said. "Look here, you just twist this handle and you slip back this catch, and the door swings right back as easy as—hullo! look out—why, blest if it ain't slipped back now—look out—look out!" for even as he spoke and fumbled with the bars the door of the cage which he was holding end up swung back and half-a-dozen big buck rats flopped down in a shower on to the occupant of that invalid chair.

"Help—help—murder!" shouted brother Joseph as the fat rats flopped upon him, some outside, some inside the apron.

And in a paroxysm of terror and repulsion he flung back the apron of that invalid chair, out of which he jumped with the agility of an acrobat.

"By Jove!" shouted Rossiter. "What price rats for curing rheumatism! And they've done something else, my friend, they've disarranged your whiskers," and with a grab at the white flowing, silver-haired frame of brother Joseph's face, he snatched it bodily away. In another moment his hands were on the man's throat and the man was on the ground on his back. Kneeling on his captive's chest, Rossiter shouted: "Bingle, seize the other," for brother James, after gazing for a moment, staggered and speechless at what had been going on, had turned and was looking wildly round to choose which way he should make a bolt for it.

"Seize him, I tell you!" shouted Rossiter. "Let him go and that tunic's off your back before the day is out!"

Meantime, Bob Challoner, vaulting the wall, had collared brother James.

"You've gotten to stop, measter. Ah! Mr. Rossiter's after trapping more than rats. I've got him sir," and by this time Bingle, recovering from his stupefaction, had rushed through the gate and laid his hand, too, upon the man.

"Mind, you'll be responsible Mr. Rossiter!" he said, failing even now to understand.

But a fierce swift blow, flush in the face, from brother James, paradoxically half-stunned and quite awakened him.

"That's your game, be it! Hold on to him, Bob! I've got him," and in a moment he had twisted the other's wrist and forced his arm behind his back. "Now lads," he shouted, "help up along with 'em to the lock-up. Ah, Mr. Rossiter, I thowt you an' I 'ud get hold of summat or somebody with this job, between us."

"Mind what you're doin'," gurgled brother Joseph, and Detective-Inspector Rossiter said sternly:

"I know what I'm doing, I take all responsibility. I arrest you, Joshua Branner and Barnaby Plumb, on the charge of wilful murder of John William Barker. I warn you that anything you say may be used in evidence against you, and I call on all civilians here to assist me in arresting these men in the name of the King."

CATARRH OF THE NOSE AND THROAT IN RELATION TO DEAFNESS.

In considering catarrh of the nose and throat as a cause of deafness, let us first fix in our mind some important facts as to the structure, the functions, and the anatomical relations of the Eustachian tube. This tube is a fibrous canal which connects the nose and throat most intimately with the cavity of the middle ear. It has a lining of delicate membrane, which is continuous at one end with the mucous membrane of the ear, and at the other with the membranous lining of the nasal cavities and of the throat. Any inflammation, therefore, of the nose and throat has at once a direct way open to affect the hearing, by extending along the membrane of the Eustachian tube into the middle ear.

The physiological function of the Eustachian tube is also affected by catarrh of the posterior portion of the nasal cavities and of the upper part of the throat. In its normal condition this tube permits air to penetrate to the middle ear, and thus preserves an equilibrium between the pressure of the external air and that contained within the aural cavity. When there is swelling of the membrane around the opening of the Eustachian tube the opening of the canal is closed, thus preventing the air from penetrating to the middle ear. The external air pressure then becomes greater than that of the cavity of the middle ear, with the result that the ear drum is forced inward, interfering with the movements of the minute chain of bones, so essential for conveying sounds to the nerve of hearing. Should this condition of the Eustachian tube continue, an obstinate form of deafness results from adhesions, which bind down the chain of bones and the tympanic membrane, or drumhead, so firmly that their response to the vibrations of waves of sound becomes very feeble, and even impossible in very chronic cases.

A still more complete description of deafness in its relation to catarrh and various other causes will be found in the "Journal for the Deaf," which can be obtained free of charge on application by post to the Editor, 72, Regent's Park-road, London, N.W. The "Journal for the Deaf" also contains an account of a large number of cases of Deafness cured by the Drouet Treatment. The success of this new system, although already widely known, gathers still greater fame from the reports of cures recorded during the past month. From the October records the following are selected as illustrations for this brief treatise on deafness complicated by catarrh:

It would be difficult to find a more obstinate and complicated case of deafness than that described on the Patient's Report Form forwarded to the Drouet Institute by Mr. A. Adams, 22 years of age, of Westbourne-square, London, West. The deafness, in this case, was so great that the ticking of a watch could not be heard, unless pressed close to the ears. There were continuous noises in the head, occasional aching in the ears, and constant discharge. The discharge began when the patient was eight years old, and followed as a result of scarlet fever. Later the deafness was further increased, as a result of catarrhal complications. Mr. Adams had, at several times, tried treatment for the ear trouble, consulting no less than eight doctors, but without beneficial results. On July 7, of this year, Mr. Adams began the treatment prescribed by the Drouet Institute's Consulting Physician, and, as a result of faithfully pursuing the treatment, was able to report a complete cure as follows:

15, Delamere-crescent, Westbourne
Square, W., Oct. 29, 1901.

I should have sent my final report before, but thought I would wait and see if the ears still kept well. I am glad to say they have, and I now can hear a watch tick at arm's length in both ears, and the discharge has entirely stopped.—Yours faithfully,
A. F. ADAMS.

A second report, a week later, is still more interesting:

15, Delamere-crescent, Nov. 6, 1901.

I wish to write and tell you that I am quite cured of my deafness, and also noises in the head, and that the discharge is quite stopped. I feel quite another person now, as I always felt miserable before. I went to five or six different doctors and hospitals, and they did not do me any good. Had a bad ear since I was eight years old. I then went to Toronto, Canada, and also went to two doctors there, but they did not do me any good; but am glad to say that I am cured now by using your treatment, and shall send anybody to you that I know is suffering.—I remain, yours very sincerely,
A. F. ADAMS.

The case of Miss Jane Macdonald, of Glasgow, will be of the greatest interest to those afflicted by catarrh of the nose and throat. In this case the ailment was attributed to having taken a chill, a cause which produces the majority of catarrhal troubles. There were the usual symptoms of discharges from the nose and throat, sneezing, a thick, swollen feeling in the throat, and great difficulty in breathing through the nose. The local doctor, whom she consulted, told her that the obstruction to breathing was caused by a catarrhal inflammation of the membrane inside the nose, of so severe a character that the sides of the nasal cavities touched each other, and thus left no passage. Previous treatment having failed to cure her, after two years of suffering, she decided to place her case in charge of the Consulting Physician, who prescribed the appropriate Drouet treatment by correspondence. Miss Macdonald's first course of medicines was forwarded to her early in September, and, after following out the physician's instructions several weeks, she reported herself completely cured as follows:

4, Leckethill-street, Springburn, Glasgow.
Oct. 21, 1901.

Dear Sir—I have discontinued the use of your medicines for a week now, and I am happy to say that I am perfectly satisfied with my condition, and my nose and throat are now perfectly well.—Yours faithfully,
JANE MACDONALD.

The original letter, with all the others of which extracts have been given above, may be seen at the Autograph Room of the Drouet Institute, where hundreds of letters emanating from grateful patients are kept. The Autograph Room is open to the public every day, except Sunday, from ten a.m. to six p.m.

A special feature of the Drouet treatment is that patients who cannot come to London to be examined are enabled to receive advice by filling up a pathological report form, which allows them to state explicitly their case. This form may be had, free of charge, with a copy of the "Journal for the Deaf," by writing to the Editor, Drouet Institute, 72, Regent's Park-road, N.W. In fact, all the persons whose cures have just been reported were treated by means of the pathological form, and never saw the Consulting Physician who prescribed for them.

It is, however, always advisable when possible to be personally examined at the Drouet Institute, 72, Regent's Park-road, London, N.W., where consultations are held daily, except Sunday, from two to four in the afternoon. Special consultations may also be had at any time by previous arrangement. For all personal consultations a fee is charged. Any advice by correspondence is absolutely free, as are also the consultations given by means of the report form.

Short Stories That . . . . . . Make You Laugh.

We devote every week space in Short Stories to pithy, humorous anecdotes similar to those which appear in these columns. To those readers who submit storyettes which are used, a six shilling novel will be awarded. The anecdotes may be either original or selected; in the latter case, the source MUST be stated. Attempts must reach the Storyette Editor, Short Stories Office, Henrietta Street, Strand, London, W.C., by Monday, December 16th. Post-cards only, please.

A Way of its Own.

TOURIST: "Fine morning, Sandy. What's the day going to be?" Sandy: "Well, I'm thinking it'll may be rain." Tourist: "But the barometer is rising, Sandy." Sandy: "Aye, but it's verra little heed the weather hereabouts pays to the barometer."

Consolation for a Sweetheart.

"DON'T cry so bitterly, darling," said the policeman to the weeping fair one. "I can't help it." A tender heart beat under his blue coat, and he murmured: "Even though I'm removed to another beat, sweetest, fortune, I trust, will be kind to me; so wipe away your tears. I will meet another cook, and I will remember to love her, if only for your sake."

A Life Ill-Spent.

"AH, yes, his was a wasted life," sighed the bald-headed gentleman. "How?" inquired a friend, "was he dissipated? Had he antipathy for work? Was he a gambler, a lover of fast horses, a——?" "Nay! Nay!" interrupted the bald-headed gentleman. "None of these, but worse, far worse: he spent his life endeavouring to raise vegetables which should remotely resemble the gorgeous specimens he had seen in the seedsman's catalogues."

Not Realism.

YOUNG AUTHOR: "Would you call my novel realism or romance?" Friend: "What does the heroine say when she accepts the hero?" Young Author: "Oh, she says, 'Yes, dear George, we will tread life's path together, one in heart and purpose, bearing each other's burdens, sharing each other's grief, doubling each——'" Friend: "Oh, that's romance of the first water. A real girl would no more think of making a speech on such an occasion than of singing a song, or dancing the Highland fling."

Seeking Information.

A NUMBER of well-disposed and wealthy residents of the West-end of London started some classes for the purpose of giving instruction in science to their less fortunate fellows who lived in the neighbourhood of Whitechapel. One evening quite a small crowd came together to hear a discourse on "Air," which was to be delivered by a gentleman who had the misfortune to be extremely bald-headed. The lecturer was furnished with a good supply of interesting diagrams, with which he used every means to make his address instructive. In fact, he soon flattered himself that he had thorougly succeeded, for even the youngsters seemed to pay great attention to what he had to say. When his peroration was in full swing, he remarked: "It is quite impossible for any person to live without air." The lecturer's collapse was, however, very speedy, when a sharp-witted urchin shouted: "'Ow about yerself, guv'ner?"

How a Tragedy was Avoided.

"YOU had a row with Grisby to-day, I understand." "Not much of a row, fortunately." "How did it occur?" "Why, he called me a stockbroker, a swindler, and numerous other disagreeable names." "What did you say?" "I told him that for twopence I would horsewhip him." "Did he give you the money?" "No; he had nothing but two penny stamps, and I never take stamps."

To Their Mutual Benefit.

"YOUR little girl is sickening for the measles; please fetch her away at once," was the distressing news sent by the mistress of a West Riding board school to the wife of a working man, whose child showed unmistakable signs of illness. Soon after, the mother strolled leisurely into the school-porch, wiping a pair of soap-smeared hands on the edge of a discoloured apron. "Poor little lassie!" she said, kissing the ailing child on both cheeks. "She's looked bad for three days, but I didn't want to have her at home sooner than I could help, 'cos her cot's very handy for foldin' clothes on, and the oftener the doctor comes to her the more washin' I'll have to take in to pay him. But I knew you wouldn't be too keen on sendin' her back, marm," she went on gratefully, addressing the mistress. "If only a few more of the children can manage to catch the measles, the school will have to be shut up right away, and think what a long Christmas holiday you lucky teachers will get."

A Cabby's Dodge.

SHE was an American, and alighted from the Continental mail at Charing Cross. To a deeply interested hansom-driver, the last arrived girl from Chicago put the question: "Say, hackman, can you get me through to the Hotel Cecil under half-an-hour? My friends will be waiting for me there after half-past six." "Well, miss," replied the guileless cabby, "it's a fairish long drive, but I'll do it all right." Whereupon he lashed up his horse, and proceeded at a break-neck pace down Whitehall, then back along the Embankment, finally bringing up within the stipulated time his over-driven steed, with heaving flanks, at the entrance of that great caravanserai so favoured by our American cousins. "Oh, janitor," said the lady, as she, after her luggage being removed, swept through the portals of the "Cecil," "please pay the hackman; he has driven me such a long way, and at such a pace, too. Look at his poor horse." "Where have you come from, cabby?" said the porter. "What, Charing Cross only? Here you are then—fare and two trunks, one-and-four." The hansom-driver slowly drove away.

I would ask my correspondent who signs himself "An Old Reader, of Hackney, N.E." (he carefully omits his name and address—for fear of a visit from the Fighting Editor, doubtless), to refer to any of the winners in the Photo Competition—all of whose names and addresses are on this page—as to its genuineness. I am sure they would all be only too glad to prove to him that they have received the £5 as promised. My correspondent says he has been a reader of Short Stories for a good many years, which makes me all the more surprised that he should imagine for a moment that any of the competitions are not genuine. The kindest construction I can put on this letter is that a virulent attack of "sour grapes" has prompted its sending—the writer of it saying that his attempts in competitions have never been successful.

Will "C. J. McM.," of Belfast, please read the reply to "J. C. K.," published on this page in the issue dated November 23rd.

Any attempts sent in for the Storyette Competition in envelopes are disqualified. Humorous stories which are too long to be written on a postcard are quite unsuitable for insertion.

Advice to Readers on Various Matters.

(Replies to Correspondents.)

The matrimonially inclined will doubtless be interested in a problem which has been sent for my solution by a young lady who signs herself "Arnish," and about which she is apparently deeply concerned. If a girl has two lovers, whom we will call for convenience X and Y, and supposing the one she likes best is not the one who likes her best, what ought she to do? X is madly in love with her, and she would be madly in love with X "were t'other dear charmer away." As it is, she won't marry X because of Y, and she can't marry Y because he won't ask her to, and is so wrapped up in the study of metaphysics that he is absolutely impenetrable to hints.

The position is certainly an awkward one, but it seems to me that there is only one way out of it. The girl ought to marry X. Waiting for Y in the hope that he may realise what he is missing seems to be making a lottery of the thing, and lotteries, as we all know, are wrong.

"W. S." wants to know why it is that the weight of precious metals is always spoken of in ounces.

It has always been customary, right away from the very early days, to describe precious metals by weight in ounces. It dates from the first stage of mining. Silver and gold are found in very small quantities, and as fast as they are found a weight is given to them. If this practice were not followed, and miners waited till sufficient metal was found to call it pounds, mining operations would soon get into a hopeless muddle. Gold in bars and silver in ingots are always weighed and sold in ounces—they are precious metals. When they are minted the nomenclature is changed into grains.

"R. C. D." and his friend are in a dilemma. They both love the same girl, and she shows the same affection for them both. They don't wish to quarrel over the matter, and would be glad to know what they can do.

Why not toss up which shall go first and ask her to be his wife? If she cares more for the other one, she can easily refuse the first; and if, on the other hand, she prefers the first-comer, she can just as easily say so. Perhaps she does not care for either of you in that way.

Half-an-acre for bread, two and a half for animal food, one-eighth for beer, cider, etc., one-fiftieth for vegetables, and an equally small proportion for luxuries.

THE LOVERS OF YVONNE

By RAFAEL SABATINI.

THIS NEW SERIAL STARTS TO-DAY.

CHAPTER I.

OF HOW A BOY DRANK TOO MUCH WINE, AND WHAT CAME OF IT.

ANDREA DE MANCINI sprawled, ingloriously drunk, upon the floor. His legs were thrust under the table, and his head rested against the chair from which he had slipped; his long black hair was tossed and dishevelled; his handsome, boyish face flushed and garbed in the vacant expression of idiocy.

"I beg a thousand pardons, M. de Luynes," quoth he in the thick, monotonous voice of a man whose brain but ill controls his tongue. "I beg a thousand pardons for the unseemly poverty of our repast. 'Tis no fault of mine. My Lord Cardinal keeps a most unworthy table for me. Faugh! Uncle Guilio is a Hebrew—if not by birth, by instinct. He carries his purse-strings in a knot which it would break his heart to unfasten. But there, some day my Lord Cardinal will go to Heaven—to the lap of Abraham. I shall be rich then, vastly rich, and I shall bid you to a banquet worthy of your most noble blood. The Cardinal's health—perdition have him for the niggardliest rogue unhung!"

I pushed back my chair and rose. The conversation was taking a turn that was too unhealthy to be pursued within the walls of the Palais Mazarin, where there existed, albeit the law books made no reference to it, the heinous crime of lèse-Eminence—a crime this for which more men had been broken than it pleases me to dwell on.

"Your table, Master Andrea, needs no apology," I answered carelessly. "Your wine, for instance, is beyond praise."

"Ah, yes! The wine. But, Heavens, Monsieur," he ejaculated, for a moment opening wide his heavy eyelids, "do you believe 'twas Mazarin provided it? Pooh. 'Twas a present made me by M. de la Motte, who seeks my interest with my Lord Cardinal to obtain for him an appointment in his Eminence's household, and thus thinks to earn my good will. He's a pestilent creature this la Motte," he added, with a hiccough, "a pestilent creature; but, by Heaven, but his wine is good, and I'll speak to my uncle. Help me up, de Luynes. Help me up, I say; I would drink the health of this provider of wines."

I hurried forward, but he had struggled up unaided, and stood swaying with one hand on the table and the other at the back of his chair. In vain did I remonstrate with him that already he had drunk over much.

"'Tis a lie," he shouted. "May not a gentleman sit upon the floor from choice?"

To emphasise his protestation he imprudently withdrew his hand from the chair and struck at the air with his open palm. That gesture cost him his balance. He staggered, toppled backward, and clutched madly at the tablecloth as he fell, dragging glasses and bottles with a deafening crash on to the floor.

Then, as I stood aghast and alarmed, wondering who might have overheard the thunder of his fall, the fool sat up amidst the ruins, and filled the room with his shrieks of drunken laughter.

"Silence! boy," I thundered, springing towards him. "Silence, or we shall have the whole house about our ears."

And truly were my fears well grounded, for, before I could assist him to rise, I heard the door behind me open. Apprehensively I turned, and sickened to see that that which I had dreaded most was come to pass. A tall, imposing figure in scarlet robes stood erect and scowling on the threshold, and behind him his valet, Bernouin, bearing a lighted taper.

Mancini's laugh faded into a tremulous cackle, then died out, and with gaping mouth and glassy eyes he sat there staring at his uncle.

Thus we stayed in silence whilst a man might count mayhap a dozen; then the Cardinal's voice rang harsh and full of anger.

"'Tis thus that you fulfil your trust, M. de Luynes," he said.

"Your Eminence," I began, scarce knowing what I should say, when he cut me short.

"I will deal with you presently and elsewhere." He stepped up to Andrea, and surveyed him for a moment in disgust. "Get up, sir!" he commanded. "Get up!"

The lad sought to obey him with an alacrity that merited a kinder fate. Had he been in less haste perchance he had been more successful. As it was, he got no farther than his knees when his right leg slid from under him, and he fell prone among the shattered tableware, mumbling curses and apologies in a breath.

Mazarin stood gazing at him with an eye that was eloquent in scorn, then bending down he spoke quickly to him in Italian. What he said I know not, being ignorant of their mother tongue; but, from the fierceness of his utterance, I'll wager my soul 'twas nothing sweet to listen to. When he had done with him, he turned to his valet.

"Bernouin," said he, "summon M. de Mancini's servant and assist him to get my nephew abed. M. de Luynes, be good enough to take Bernouin's taper and to light me back to my apartments.

Unsavoury as was the task, I had no choice but to obey, and to stalk in front of him, candle in hand, like an acolyte at Notre Dame, and in my heart the profound conviction that I was about to have a bad quarter of an hour with his Eminence. Nor was I wrong; for no sooner had we reached his cabinet and the door had been closed than he turned upon me the full measure of his wrath.

"You miserable fool," he snarled. "Did you think to trifle with the trust which in a misguided moment I placed in you? Think you that, when a week ago I saved you from starvation to clothe and feed you and give you a lieutenancy in my guards, I should endure so foul an abuse as this? Think you that I intrusted M. de Mancini's training in arms to you so that you might lead him into the dissolute habits which have dragged you down to what you are—to what you were before I rescued you—to what you will be to-morrow when I shall have again abandoned you?"

"Hear me, Eminence," I cried indignantly. "'Tis no fault of mine. Some fool hath sent M. de Mancini a basket of wine and——"

"And you showed him how to abuse it," he broke in harshly. "You have taught the boy to become a sot; in time, were he to remain under your guidance, I make no doubt but that he would become a gamester and a duellist as well. I was mad, perchance, to give him into your care; but I have the good fortune to be still in time, before the mischief has sunk farther, to withdraw him from it, and to cast you back into the kennel from which I picked you."

"Your Eminence does not mean——"

"By Heaven, I do!" he cried. "You shall quit the Palais Royal this very night. M. de Luynes, and if ever I find you unbidden within half-a-mile of it, I will do that which out of a misguided sense of compassion I do not now—I will have you flung into a dungeon of the Bastille, where better men than you have rotted before to-day. Great Heavens, do you think that I am to be fooled by such a thing as you?"

"Does your Eminence dismiss me?" I cried aghast, and scarce crediting that such was indeed the extreme measure upon which he had determined.

"Have I not been plain enough?" he answered with a snarl.

I realised to the full my unenviable position, and with the realisation of it there came over me the recklessness of him who has played his last stake at the tables and lost. That recklessness it was that caused me to shrug my shoulders with a laugh. I was a soldier of fortune—or should I say a soldier of misfortune?—as rich in vice as I was poor in virtue; a man who lived by the steel and parried the blows that came as best he might, or parried them not at all—but never quailed.

"As your Eminence pleases," I answered coolly, "albeit methinks that for one who has shed his blood for France as freely as I have done, a little clemency were not unfitting."

He raised his eyebrows, and his lips curled in a malicious sneer.

"You come of a family, M. de Luynes," he said slowly, "that is famed for having shed the blood of others for France more freely than its own. You are, I believe, the nephew of Albert de Luynes. Do you forget the Marshal d'Ancre?"

I felt the blood of anger hot in my face as I made haste to answer him.

"There are many of us, Monseigneur, who have cause to blush for the families they spring from—more cause, mayhap, than hath Gaston de Luynes."

In my words, perchance, there was no offensive meaning, but in my tone and in the look which I bent upon the Cardinal there was that which told him that I alluded to his own obscure and dubious origin. He grew livid, and for a moment methought he would have struck me. Had he done so, then indeed the history of Europe would have been other than it is to-day. He restrained himself, however, and drawing himself to the full height of his majestic figure he extended his arm toward the door.

"Go," he said, in a voice that passion rendered hoarse. "Go, Monsieur. Go, quickly, while my clemency endures. Go before I summon the guard and deal with you as your temerity deserves."

I bowed, not without a taint of mockery, for I cared little what might follow; then, with head erect and the firm tread of defiance, I stalked out of his apartment, along the corridor, down the great staircase, across the courtyard, past the guard—which, ignorant of my disgrace, saluted me—and out into the street.

Then at last my head sank forward on my breast, and deep in thought I wended my way home, oblivious of all around me, even the chill bite of the February wind.

In my mind I reviewed my wasted life, with the fleeting pleasures and the enduring sorrows that it had brought me, or that I had drawn from it. The Cardinal said no more than truth when he spoke of having saved me from starvation. A week ago that was indeed what he had done. He had taken pity on Gaston de Luynes, the nephew of that famous Albert de Luynes who had been Constable of France in the early days of the late king's reign; and he had made me lieutenant of his guards and fencing-master to his nephews Andrea and Paolo de Mancini, because he knew that a better blade than mine could not be found in France, and because he thought it well to have such swords as mine about him.

A little week ago life had been replete with fresh promises, the gates of the road to fame (and perchance fortune) had been opened to me anew, and now, before I had fairly passed that gate, I had been thrust rudely back, and it had been slammed in my face because it pleased a fool to become a sot whilst in my company.

There is a subtle poetry in the contemplation of ruin. With ruin, itself, howbeit, there comes a prosaic dispelling of all idle dreams—a hard, a grim, a vile reality.

Ruin! 'Tis an ugly word. A fitting one to carve upon the tombstone of a reckless, godless, dissolute life such as mine had been.

Back, Gaston de Luynes; back to the kennel whence the Cardinal's hand did for a moment pluck you; back, from the morning of hope to the night of despair; back, to choose between starvation and the earning of a pauper's fee as a master of fence.

CHAPTER II.

The Fruit of Indiscretion.

Despite the dejection to which I had become a prey, I slept no less soundly that night than was my wont, and, indeed, it was not until late next morning, when someone knocked at my door, that I awakened.

I sat up in bed, and my first thought as I looked round the handsome room, which I had rented a week ago upon receiving the lieutenancy in the Cardinal's guards, was for the position that I had lost and of the need that there would be ere long to seek a lodging more humble and better suited to my straitened circumstances. It was not without regret that such a thought came to me; for my tastes had never been modest, and the house was a fine one, situated in the Rue St. Antoine at a hundred paces or so from the Jesuit convent.

I had no time, however, to indulge the sorry mood that threatened to beset me, for the knocking at my chamber door continued, until at length I answered it with a command to enter.

It was my servant Michelot, a grizzled veteran of huge frame and strength, who had fought beside me at Rocroi, and who had thereafter become so enamored of my person, for some trivial service he swore I had rendered him, that he had attached himself to me and my luckless fortunes.

He came to inform me that M. de Mancini was below and craved immediate speech with me. He had scarce done speaking, however, when Andrea himself, having doubtless grown tired of waiting, appeared in the doorway. He wore a sickly look, the result of his last night's debauch; but, more than that, there was stamped upon his face a look of latent passion, which made me think at first that he was come to upbraid me.

"Ah, still abed, Luynes?" was his greeting as he came forward.

His cloak was wet and his boots splashed, which told me both that he had come afoot and that it rained.

"There are no duties that bid me rise," I answered sourly.

He frowned at that; then divesting himself of his cloak he gave it to Michelot, who, at a sign from me, withdrew. No sooner was the door closed than the boy's whole manner changed. The simmering passion of which I had detected signs welled up and seemed to choke him as he poured forth the story that he was come to tell.

"I have been insulted," he gasped. "Grossly insulted by a vile creature of Monsieur d'Orleans' household. An hour ago, in the ante-chamber at the Palais Royal, I was spoken of in my hearing as the besotted nephew of the Italian adventurer."

I sat up in bed, tingling with excitement at the developments which already I saw arising from his last night's imprudence.

"Calmly, Andrea," I begged of him; "tell me calmly."

"Heavens, man, how can I be calm. Ough! The thought of it chokes me. I was a fool last night—a sot. For that, perchance, men have some right to censure me. But to think that a ruffler of the stamp of Eugène de Canaples should speak of it, should call me the nephew of an Italian adventurer, should draw down upon me the cynical smile of a crowd of courtly apes—pah! I am sick at the memory of it."

"Did you answer him?"

"Gracious! I should be worthy of the title he bestowed upon me had I not done so. Oh, I answered him—not in words. I threw my hat in his face."

"That was a passing eloquent reply!"

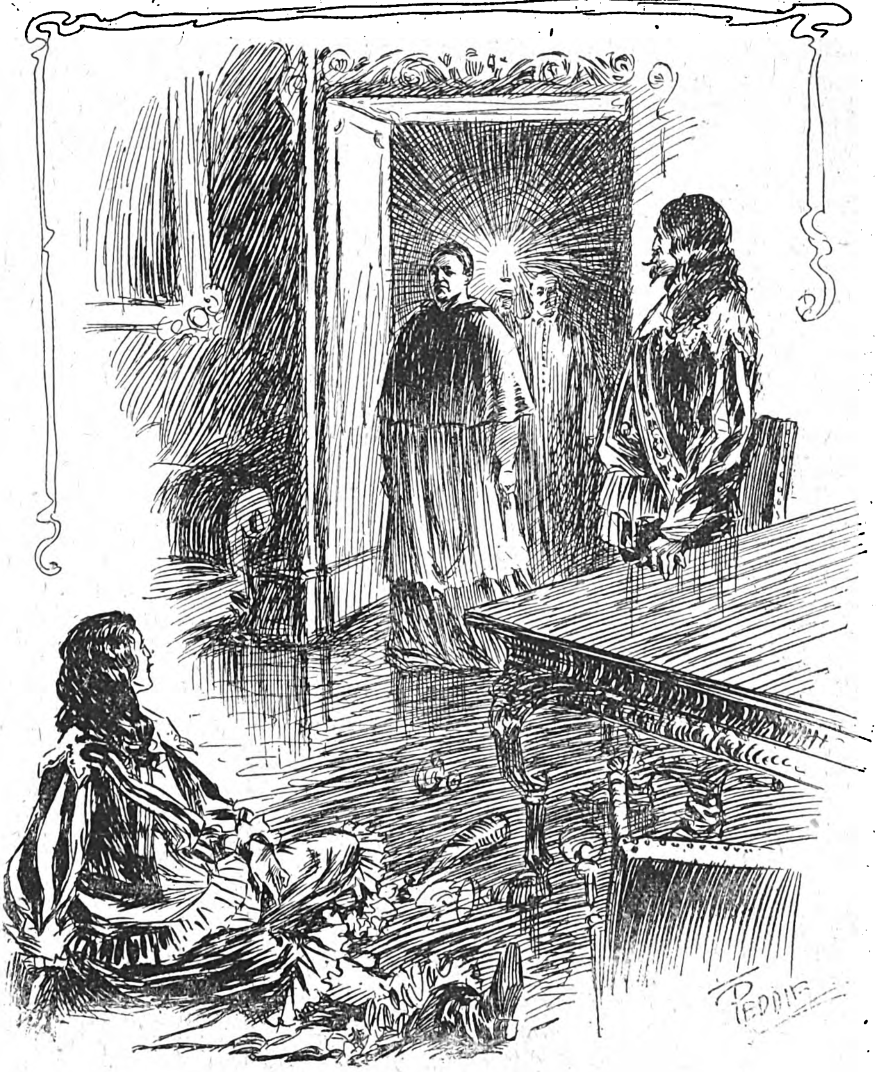
"So eloquent that it left him speechless with amazement. He thought to bully with impunity and see me slink into hiding like a whipped dog, terrified by his blustering tongue and dangerous reputation. But there," he broke off, "a meeting has been arranged for four o'clock at St. Germain."

"A meeting!" I exclaimed.

"What else? Do you think the affront left any alternative?"

"But—"

"Yes, yes, I know," he interrupted, tossing his head. "I am going to be killed. Verville has sworn that there shall be one less of the Italian brood. That is why I have come to you, Luynes, to ask you to be my second. I don't deserve it, perhaps. In my folly last night I did you an ill turn. I unwittingly caused you to be stripped of your commission. But if I were on my deathbed now,



With gaping mouth and glassy eyes Mancini sat there staring at his uncle.

and begged a favour of you, you would not refuse it. And what difference is there 'twixt me and one who is on his deathbed? Am I not about to die?"

"Well, I hope not," I made answer with more lightness than I felt. "But I'll stand by you, with all my heart, Andrea."

"And you'll avenge me?" he cried savagely, his Southern blood a-boiling. "You'll not let him leave the ground alive?"

"Not unless my opponent commits the indiscretion of killing me first. Who seconds M. de Canaples?"

"The Marquis de St. Auban and M. de Montmédy?"

"And who is the third in our party?"

"I have none. I thought that perhaps you had a friend."

"I! A friend?" I laughed bitterly. "Pshaw, Andrea, beggars have no friends. But stay; find Stanislas de Gouville. There is no better blade in Paris. If he will join us in this frolic, and you can hold off Canaples until either St. Auban or Montmédy are disposed of, we may yet leave the three of them on the field of battle. Courage, Andrea. While there's life, there's hope."

My words seemed to cheer him, and when presently he left me to seek out the redoubtable de Gouville, the poor lad's face was brighter by far than when he had entered my room.

Down in my heart, however, I was less hopeful than I had led him to believe, and as I dressed after he had gone, 'twas not without some uneasiness that I turned the matter over in my mind. I had, during the short period of our association, grown fond of Andrea de Mancini. Indeed, the wonted sweetness of the lad's temper and the gentleness of his disposition were such as to breed affection in all who came in contact with him.

In a way, too, methought he had grown fond of me; and I had known so few friends in life—truth to tell, I fear me that I had few of the qualities that engender friendship—that I was naturally prone to appreciate a gift that from its rareness became doubly valuable.

Hence was it that I trembled for the boy. He had shown aptitude with the foils, and derived great profit from my tuition, yet he was too raw by far to be pitted against so cunning a swordsman as Canaples.

I had but finished dressing when a coach rumbled down the street that halted by my door. Naturally I supposed that some one came to visit Coupri the apothecary, to whom belonged this house in which I had my lodging, and did not give the matter a second thought until Michelot rushed in, with eyes wide open, to announce that his Eminence, Cardinal Mazarin, commanded my presence in the adjoining room.

Amazed and deeply marvelling what so extraordinary a visit might portend, I hastened to wait upon his Eminence.

I found him standing by the window, and received from him a greeting that was passing curt and cavalierly.

"Has M. de Mancini been here?" he inquired peremptorily, disregarding the chair I offered him.

"He has but left me, Monseigneur."

"Then you know, sir, of the harvest which he has already reaped from the indiscretion into which you led him last night."

"If Monseigneur alludes to the affront put upon M. de Mancini, touching his last night's indiscretion, by a bully of the Court, I am informed of it."

"Pish, Monsieur! I do not follow your fine distinctions. Possibly this is due to my imperfect knowledge of the language of France, possibly to your own imperfect acquaintance with the language of truth."

"Monseigneur!"

"Faugh!" he cried half-scornfully, half-peevishly. "I came not here to talk of you, but of my nephew. Why did he visit you?"

"To do me the honour of asking me to second him at St. Germain this evening."

"And so you think that this duel is to be fought? That my nephew is to be murdered?"

"We will endeavor to prevent his being—as your Eminence daintily puts it—murdered. But for the rest, the duel, methinks, cannot be avoided."

"Cannot!" he blazed. "Do you say cannot, M. de Luynes? Mark me well, sir, I will use no dissimulation with you. My position in France is already a sufficiently difficult one. Already we are threatened with a second Fronde. It needs but such events as these to bring my family into prominence and make it the butt for the ridicule that malcontents but wait an opportunity to slur it with. This affair of Andrea's will lend itself to a score or so of lampoons and pasquinades, all of which will cast an injurious reflection upon my person and position. That, Monsieur, is, methinks, sufficient evil to suffer at your hands. The late Cardinal would have had you broken on the wheel for less. I have gone no farther than to dismiss you from my service, a clemency for which you should be grateful! But I shall not suffer that, in addition to the harm already done, Andrea shall be murdered by Canaples."

"I shall do my best to render him assistance."

"You still misapprehend me. This duel, sir, must not take place."

I shrugged my shoulders.

"How does your Eminence propose to frustrate it? Will you arrest Canaples?"

"Upon what plea, Monsieur? Think you I am anxious to have the whole of Paris howling in my ears?"

"Then possibly it is your good purpose to enforce the late king's edict against duelling, and send your Guards to St. Germain to arrest the men before they engage?"

"Faugh!" he sneered. "And what will Paris say if I now enforce a law that for ten years has been disregarded? That I feared for my nephew's skin and took this means of saving him. A pretty story to have on Paris' lips, would it not be?"

"Indeed, Monseigneur, you are right, and I doubt me the duel will needs be fought."

"Have I not already said that it shall not be fought?"

Again I shrugged my shoulders. Mazarin grew tiresome with his repetitions.

"How can it be avoided, Eminence?"

"Ah! Monsieur, that is your affair."

"My affair?"

"Assuredly. 'Twas through your evil agency he was dragged into this business, and through your agency he must be extricated from it."

"Your Eminence jests!"

"Undoubtedly 'tis a jesting matter," he answered with terrible irony. "Oh, I jest. By Heaven, yes. But I'll carry my jest so far as to have you hanged if this duel be fought—aye, whether my nephew suffers hurt or not. Now, sir, you know what fate awaits you; fight it; turn it aside; I have shown you the way. The door, M. de Luynes."

CHAPTER III.

THE FIGHT IN THE HORSE MARKET.

I LET him go without a word. There was that in his voice, in his eye, and in the gesture wherewith he bade me hold the door for him, that cleared my mind of any doubts touching the irrevocable character of his determination. To plead was never an accomplishment of mine; to argue, I saw, would be to waste the Cardinal's time to no purpose.

And so, I let him go, and my curse with him, and from my window I watched his coach drive away in the drizzling rain, scattering the crowd of awe-stricken loiterers who had collected at the rumour of his presence.

With a fervent prayer that his patron saint, the Devil, might see fit to overset his coach and break his neck before he reached the Palace, I turned from the window and called Michelot.

He was quick to answer my summons, bringing me the frugal measure of bread and wine wherewith it was my custom to break my fast. Then, whilst I munched my crust, I strode to and fro in the little chamber and exercised my wits to their utmost for a solution to the puzzle his Eminence had set me.

One solution there was, and an easy one—flight. But I had promised Andrea de Mancini that I would stand beside him at St. Germain; there was a slender chance of saving him if I went, whilst if I stayed away, there would be nothing left for his Eminence to do but offer up prayers for the rest of his nephew's soul.

Another idea I had, but it was desperate; and yet so persistently did my thoughts revert to it, that in the end I determined to accept it.

I drank a cup of Armagnac, cheered myself with an oath or two, and again called Michelot. When he came, I asked him was he acquainted with M. de Canaples, to which he replied that he was, having seen the gentleman in my company.

"Then," I said, "you will repair to M. de Canaples' lodging, in the Rue des Gesvres, and ascertain discreetly whether he be at home. If he is, you will watch the house until he comes forth, then follow him, and bring me word thereafter where he is to be found. Should he be already abroad before you reach the Rue des Gesvres, endeavour to ascertain whither he has gone, and return forthwith. But, be discreet, Michelot. You understand?"

He assured me that he did, and left me to nurse my unpleasant thoughts for half-an-hour, returning at the end of that time with the information that M. de Canaples was seated at dinner in the "Auberge du Soleil."

Naught could have been more attuned to my purpose, and straight-away I drew on my boots, girt on my sword, and, taking my hat and cloak, I sallied out into the rain and wended my way at a sharp pace towards the Rue St. Honoré.

One o'clock was striking as I crossed the threshold of the "Soleil" and flung my dripping cloak to the first servant I chanced upon.

I glanced round the well-filled room, and at one of the tables I espied my quarry in company with St. Auban and Montmédy—the very gentlemen who were to fight beside him that evening—and one Vilmorin, as arrant a coxcomb and poltroon as could be found in France. With my beaver cocked at the back of my head, and a general bearing that for aggressiveness would be hard to surpass, I strode up to their table, and stood for a moment surveying them with an insolent stare that made them pause in their conversation. They raised their noble heads and bestowed upon me a look of haughty and disdainful wonder—such a look as one might bestow upon a misbehaving lackey—all save Vilmorin, who, with a coward's keen nose for danger, turned slightly pale and fidgeted in his chair. I was well-known to all of them, but my attitude forbade all greeting.

"Has M. de Luynes lost anything?" St. Auban inquired icily.

"His wits, mayhap," quoted Canaples, with a contemptuous shrug.

He was a tall, powerfully built man, this Canaples, with a swart, cruel face that was nevertheless not ill-favored, and a profusion of black hair.

"There is a temerity in M. de Canaples' rejoinder that I had not looked for," I said banteringly.

Canaples' brow was puckered in a frown.

"Ha? And why not, Monsieur?"

"Why not? Because it is not to be expected that one who fastens quarrels upon schoolboys would evince the courage to beard Gaston de Luynes."

"Monsieur!" the four of them cried in chorus, so loudly that the hum of voices in the tavern became hushed, and all eyes were turned in our direction.

"M. de Canaples," I said calmly, "permit me to say that I can find no more fitting expression for the contempt I hold you in than this."

As I spoke, I seized a corner of the tablecloth, and with a sudden tug I swept it, with all it held, on to the floor.

Heavens, what a scene there was! In an instant the four of them were on their feet, as were half the occupants of the room, besides, whilst poor Vilmorin, who stood trembling like a maid who for the first time hears words of love, raised his quavering voice to cry soothingly, "Messieurs, Messieurs!"

Canaples was livid with passion, but otherwise the calmest in that room, saving perhaps myself. With a gesture he restrained Montmédy and St. Auban.

"I shall be happy to give Master de Luynes all the proof of my courage that he may desire, and more, I warrant, than he will relish."

"Bravely answered!" I cried, with an approving nod and a beaming smile. "Be good enough to lead the way to a convenient spot."

"I have other business at the moment," he answered calmly. "Let us say to-morrow at——"

"Faugh!" I broke in scornfully. "I knew it! Confess, Monsieur, that you dare not fight me now lest you should be unable to keep your appointments for this evening."

"By Heaven!" exclaimed St. Auban, "this insolence passes all bounds."

"Each man in his turn, if you please, gentlemen," I replied. "My present affair is with M. de Canaples."

There was a hot answer burning on St. Auban's lips, but Canaples was beforehand with him.

"That will do!" he cried. "You go too far, sir, with your 'dare' and 'dare not.' Is a broken gamester, a penniless adventurer, to tell Eugène de Canaples what he dares? Come, sir; since you are eager for the taste of steel, follow me, and say your prayers as you go."

With that we left the inn, amidst a prodigious hubbub, and made our way to the horse market behind the Hotel Vendôme. It was not to be expected, albeit the place we had chosen was usually deserted at such an hour, that after the affair at the "Soleil" our meeting would go unattended. When we faced each other, Canaples and I, there were at least some twenty persons present, who came, despite the rain, to watch what they thought was like to prove a pretty fight. Men of position were they, for the most part, gentlemen of the Court, with here and there a soldier; and from the manner in which they eyed me, methought they favoured me but little.

Our preparations were brief. The absence of seconds disposed of all formalities; the rain made us impatient to be done, and in virtue of it Canaples pompously announced that he would not risk a cold by stripping. With interest did I grimly answer that he need fear no cold when I had done with him. Then casting aside my cloak, I drew, and professing myself also disposed to retain my doublet, we forthwith engaged.

He was no mean swordsman, this Canaples. Indeed, his reputation was already widespread, and in the first shock of our meeting blades, I felt rumour had been just for once. But I was strangely dispossessed of any doubts touching the outcome; this being due, perchance, to a vain confidence in my own skill, perchance to the spirit of contemptuous raillery wherewith I had from the outset treated the affair, and which had so taken root in my heart that even when we engaged, I still, almost unwittingly, persisted in it.

In my face and attitude there was the reflection of this bantering, flippant mood; it was to be read in the mocking disdain of my glance, in the scornful curl of my lip, and even in the turn of my wrist as I put aside my opponent's passes. All this Canaples must have noted, and it was not without effect upon his nerves. Moreover, there is in steel a subtle magnetism which is the index of one's antagonist; and from the moment that our blades slithered one against the other, I make no doubt but that Canaples grew aware of the confident, almost exultant mood in which I met him, and which told him that I was his master. Add unto this the fact that whilst Canaples' nerves were unstrung by passion, mine were held in check by a mind as calm and cool as though our swords were baited, and consider with what advantage I took my ground.

He led the attack fierce and furiously, as if I were a boy whose guard was to be borne down by sheer weight of blows. I contented myself with tapping his blade aside, and when at length, after essaying every trick in his catalogue, he fell back baffled, I laughed a low laugh of derision that drove him pale with fury.

Again he came at me, almost before I was prepared for him, and his point, parried with a downward stroke and narrowly averted, scratched my thigh, but did more damage to my breeches than my skin. In exchange I touched him playfully on the shoulder, and the sting of it drove him back a second time. He was breathing hard by then, and would fain have paused awhile for breath, but I saw no reason to be merciful.

"Now, sir," I cried, saluting him as though our combat were but on the point of starting, "to me! Guard yourself!"

Again our swords clashed, and my blows now fell as swift on his blade as his had done a while ago on mine. So hard did I press him that he was forced to give way before me. Back I drove him, pace by pace, his wrist growing weaker at each parry, each parry growing wider, and the perspiration streaming down his ashen face. Panting he went, in that backward flight before my onslaught, defending himself as best he could, never thinking of a riposte, beaten already. Back, and yet back he went, until he reached the railings and could back no farther, and so broken was his spirit then that a groan escaped him. I answered with a laugh—my mood was lusty and cruel—and thrust at him. Then, eluding his guard, I thrust again, beneath it, and took him fairly in the middle of his doublet.

He staggered, dropped his rapier, and caught at the railings, where for a moment he hung swaying and gasping. Then his head fell forward, his grip relaxed, and, swooning, he sank down into a heap.

A dozen sprang to his aid, foremost amongst them being St. Auban and Montmédy, whilst I drew back, suddenly realizing my own spent condition, to which the heat of combat had hitherto rendered me insensible. I mastered myself as best I might, and dissembling my hard breathing, I wiped my blade with a kerchief, an act which looked so calm and callous that it drew from the crowd—for a crowd it had become by then—an angry growl. 'Tis thus with the vulgar; they are ever ready to sympathise with the vanquished without ever pausing to ask themselves if his chatisement may not be merited.

In answer to the growl I tossed my head, and, sheathing my sword, I flung the blood-stained kerchief into their very midst. The audacity of the gesture left them breathless, and they growled no more, but stared.

Then that outrageous fop, Vilmorin, who had been bending over Canaples, started up, and coming towards me with a face that was whiter than that of the prostrate man, he proved himself so utterly bereft of wit by terror, that for once he had the temerity to usurp the words and actions of a brave man.

"You have murdered him," he cried in a strident voice; and, thrusting his clenched fist within an inch of my face, "Do you hear me, you knave? You have murdered him!"

Now, as may be well conceived, I was in no mood to endure such words from any man, so 'twas but natural that for answer I caught the dainty Vicomte a buffet that knocked him into the arms of the nearest bystander and brought him to his senses.

"Fool!" I snarled at him. "Must I make another example before you believe that Gaston de Luynes wears a sword?"

"In the name of Heaven——" he began, putting forth his hands in a beseeching gesture; but what more he said was drowned by the roar of anger that burst from the onlookers, and it was like to have gone ill with me had not St. Auban come to my aid at that most critical juncture.

"Messieurs," he cried, thrusting himself before me, and raising his hand to crave silence, "hear me. I, a friend of M. de Canaples, tell you that you wrong M. de Luynes. 'Twas a fair fight. How the quarrel arose is no concern of yours."

Despite his words they still snarled and growled like the misbegotten curs they were. But St. Auban was famous for the regal supper parties he gave, and to which all were eager to be bidden; and amidst that crowd, as I have said, there were a score or so of gentlemen of the Court, who, with scant regard for the right or wrong of the case, and every regard to conciliate this giver of suppers, came to range themselves beside and around us, and thus protected me from the murderous designs of that rabble.

Seeing how the gentlemen took my part, and deeming, in their blessed ignorance, that what gentlemen did must perforce be well done, they grew calm in the twinkling of an eye. Thereupon St. Auban, turning to me, counselled me in a whisper to be gone whilst the tide of opinion flowed in my favor. Intent to act upon this good advice, I took a step towards the little knot that had collected round Canaples, and with natural curiosity inquired into the nature of his hurt.

'Twas Montmédy who answered me, scowling as he did so.

"He may die of it, Monsieur. If he does not, his recovery at least will be slow and difficult."

I had been wise had I held my peace and gone; but like a fool I must needs give utterance to what was in my mind.

"Ah! At least there will be no duel at St. Germain this evening."

Scarce had the words fallen from my lips than I saw in the faces of Montmédy and St. Auban and half-a-dozen others the evidence of their rashness.

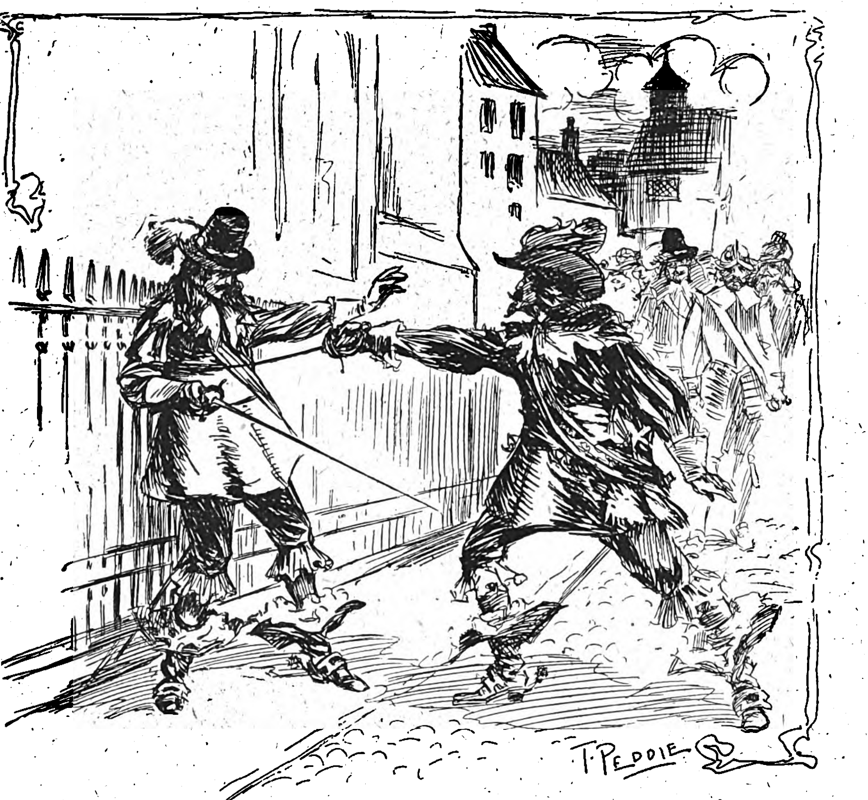
"So!" cried St. Auban in a voice that shook with rage, "that was your object, eh? That you had fallen low, Master de Luynes, I knew; but I dreamt not that in your fall you had come so low as this."

"You dare?"

"Heavens! I dare more, Monsieur, I dare tell you—you, Gaston de Luynes, spy and bravo of the Cardinal, that your object shall be defeated. That, as God lives, this duel shall still be fought—by me instead of Canaples."

"And I tell you, sir, that as God lives it shall not," I answered with a vehemence not a whit less than his own. "To you and to what other fools may think to follow in your footsteps, I say this, that not to-night nor to-morrow, nor the next day shall that duel be fought. Cowards and poltroons you are, who seek to murder a beardless boy who has injured none of you.. But, by my soul, every man who sends a challenge to that boy will I at once seek out and deal with as I have dealt with Eugène de Canaples. Let those who are eager to try another world make the attempt. Adieu, Messieurs!"

And with a flourish of my sodden beaver, I turned and left them before they had recovered from the vehemence of my words.



Then eluding his guard, I thrust again, and took him fairly in the middle of his doublet.

CHAPTER IV.

Fair Rescuers.

Like the calm of the heavens when pregnant with thunder was the calm of that crowd, and as brief as it was; for scarce had I taken a dozen steps when my ears were assailed by a rumble of angry voices and a rush of feet. One glance over my shoulder, one second's hesitation whether I should stay and beard them, then the thought of Andrea de Mancini and of what would befall him did this crowd vent its wrath upon me decided my course, and sent me hot foot down the Rue Monarque. Howling and bellowing, that rabble followed in my wake, stumbling over one another in their indecent haste to reach me.

But I was fleet of foot, and behind me there was that which would lend wings to the most deliberate, so that when I turned into the open space before the Hotel Vendôme, I had set a good fifty yards betwixt myself and the foremost of my hunters.

A coach was passing at that moment. I shouted, and the knave who drove glanced at me, then up the Rue Monarque at my pursuers, whereupon, shaking his head, he would have left me to my fate. But I was of another mind. I dashed towards the vehicle, and as it passed me I caught at the window, which luckily was open, and drawing up my legs I hung there despite the shower of mud which the revolving wheels deposited upon me.

From the bowels of the coach I was greeted by a woman's scream; a pale face and a profusion of fair hair flashed before my eyes.

"Fear not, Madame," I shouted. "I am no assassin, but rather one who stands in imminent peril of assassination, and who craves your protection."

More I would have said, but at that juncture the lash of the coachman's whip curled itself about my shoulders and stung me vilely.

"Get down, you rascal," he bellowed; "get down, or I'll draw rein."

To obey him would have been madness. The crowd surged behind with hoots and yells, and had I let go I must perforce have fallen into their hands. So instead of getting down as he inconsiderately counselled, I drew myself farther up by a mighty effort, and thrust half my body into the coach, whereupon the fair lady screamed again, and the whip caressed my legs. But within the coach sat another woman, dark of hair, and exquisite of face, who eyed my advent with a disdainful glance. Her proud countenance bore the stamp of courage, and to her it was that I directed my appeal.

"Madame, permit me, I pray, to seek shelter in your carriage, and suffer me to journey a little way with you. Quick, Madame! Your coachman is drawing rein, and I shall of a certainty be murdered under your very nose, unless you bid him change his mind. To be murdered in itself is a trifling matter I avow; but it is not nice to behold, and I would not for all the world offend your eyes with the spectacle of it."

I had judged her rightly, and my tone of flippant recklessness won me her sympathy and aid. Quickly thrusting her head through the other window, "Drive on, Louis," she commanded. "Faster!" Then turning to me, "You may bring your legs into the coach if you choose, sir," she said.

"Your words, Madame, are the sweetest music I have heard for months," I answered drily, as I obeyed her. Then, leaning out of the carriage again, waved my hat gallantly to the mob, which, now realising the futility of further pursuit, had suddenly come to a halt.

"I hope we shall meet again, gentlemen," I shouted. "Come to me one by one, and I'll keep the devil busy finding lodgings for you."

They answered me with a yell, and I sat down content, and laughed.

"You are not a coward, Monsieur," said the dark lady.

"I have been accounted many unsavoury things, Madame, but my bitterest enemies never dubbed me that."

"Why, then, did you run away?"

"Why? Why, because in the excessive humility of my soul I recognized myself unfit to die."

She bit her lip and her tiny foot beat impatiently upon the floor.

"You are trifling with me, Monsieur. Where do you wish to alight?"

"Pray let that give you no concern; I can assure you that I am in no haste."

"You become impertinent, sir," she cried angrily. "Answer me, where are you going?"

"Where am I going? Oh, ah—to the Palais Royal."

Her eyes opened very wide at that, and wandered over me with a look that was passing eloquent. Indeed, I was a sorry spectacle for any woman's eyes, particularly a pretty one—splashed from head to foot with mud, my doublet saturated and my beaver dripping, with the feather hanging limp and broken, whilst there was a rent in my breeches that had been made by Canaples' sword. I take it that I had not the air of a courtier, and that when I said that I went to the Palais Royal, she might have justly held me to be the adventurous lover of some kitchen wench. But unto the Palais Royal go others besides courtiers and lovers—spies of the Cardinal, for instance—and in her sudden coldness and the next question that fell from her beauteous lips I read that she had guessed me one of these.

"Why did the mob pursue you, Monsieur?"

There was in her voice and gesture, when she asked a question, the imperiousness of one accustomed to command replies. This pretty queenliness it was that drove me to answer, as I had done before, in a bantering strain.

"Why did the mob pursue me? Hum! Why does the mob pursue great men? Because it loves their company."

Her matchless eyes flashed an angry glance, and the faint smile on my lips must have tried her temper sorely.

"What did you do to deserve this affection?"

"A mere nothing—I killed a man," I answered coolly. "Or, at least, I left him started on the road to—Paradise."

The little flaxen-haired doll uttered a cry of horror, and covered her face with her small white hands. My inquisitor, however, sat rigid and unaffected. My answer had confirmed her suspicions.

"Why did you kill him?"

"Why," I replied, encouraging her thoughts, "because he sought to kill me."

"Ah! And why did he seek to kill you?"

"Because I disturbed him at dinner."

"Have a care how you trifle, sir," she retorted, her eyes kindling again.

"Upon my honour, 'twas no more than that. I pulled the cloth from the table whilst he eat. He was a quick-tempered gentleman, and my playfulness offended him. That is all."

Doubt appeared in her eyes, and it may have entered her mind that perchance her judgment had been over-hasty.

"Do you mean, sir, that you provoked a duel?"

"Alas, Madame! It had become necessary. You see, M. de Canaples——"

"Who?" Her voice rang sharp as the crack of a pistol.

"M. de Canaples."

"Was it he whom you killed?"

From her tone and the eager, strained expression of her face, it was not difficult to read that some mighty interest of hers was involved in my reply. It needed not the low moan that burst from her companion to tell me so.

"As I have said, Madame, it is possible that he is not dead—nay, even that he will not die. For the rest, since you ask the question, my opponent was indeed M. de Canaples—Eugène de Canaples."

Her face went deadly white, and she sank back in her seat as if every nerve in her body had of a sudden been bereft of power, whilst she of the fair hair burst into tears.

A pretty position was this for me; luckily it endured not. The girl roused herself from her momentary weakness, and seizing the cord, she tugged it violently. The coach drew up.

"Alight, sir," she hissed. "Go! I wish to Heaven that I had left you to the vengeance of the people."

Not so did I; nevertheless, as I alighted, "I am sorry, Madame, that you did not," I answered. "Farewell!"

The coach moved away, and I was left standing at the corner of the Rue St. Honoré and the Rue des Bons Enfants, in the sorriest frame of mind conceivable. The lady in the coach had saved my life, and for that I was more grateful, perchance, than my life was worth. Out of gratitude sprang a regret for the pain that I had undoubtedly caused her, and the sorrow which it might have been my fate to have cast over her life.

Still, regret, albeit an admirable sentiment, was one whose existence was usually brief in my bosom. Heavens! Had I been a man of regrets, I might have spent the remainder of my days weeping over my past life. But the gods who had given me a character calculated to lead a man into misfortune, had given me a stout heart wherewith to fight that misfortune, and an armour of recklessness against which remorse, regrets, aye, and conscience itself, rained blows in vain.

And so it befel that presently I laughed myself out of the puerile humour that was besetting me, and finding myself chilled by inaction in my wet clothes, I set off for the Palais Royal at a pace that was first cousin to a run.

Ten minutes later I stood in the presence of the most feared and hated man in France.

"What's this?" cried Mazarin as I entered his cabinet. "Have you swum the Seine in your clothes?"

"No, Eminence, but I have been serving you in the rain for the past hour."

He smiled that peculiar smile of his that rendered hateful his otherwise not ill-favoured countenance. It was a smile of the lips in which the eyes had no part.

"Yes," he said slowly, "I have heard of your achievements."

"You have heard?" I ejaculated, amazed by the powers which this man wielded.

"Yes, I have heard. You are a brave man, M. de Luynes."

"Pshaw, Eminence," I deprecated, "the poor are always brave. They have naught to lose but their life, and that is not so sweet to them that they lay much store by it. Howbeit, Monseigneur, your wishes have been carried out. There will be no duel at St. Germain this evening."

"Will there not? Hum! I am not so confident. You are a brave man, M. de Luynes, but you lack that great auxiliary of valour—discretion. What need to fling into the teeth of those fine gentlemen the reason you had for splitting Canaples, eh? You have provoked a dozen enemies for Andrea where only one existed."

"I will answer for all of them," I retorted boastfully.

"Fine words, M. de Luynes, but to support them how many men will you have to kill? Pah! What if some fine morning there comes one who, despite your vaunted swordsmanship, proves your master? What will become of that fool my nephew, eh?"

And his uncanny smile again beamed on me.

"Andrea is now packing his valise. In an hour he will have left Paris secretly. He goes—but what does it signify where he goes. He is compelled by your indiscretion to withdraw from Court. Had you kept a close tongue in your foolish head—but there, you did not, and so by a thoughtless word you undid all that you had done so well. You may go, M. de Luynes; I have no further need of you. And thank Heaven that you leave the Palais Royal free to go whither your fancy takes you, and not to journey to the Bastille or to Vincennes. I am merciful, M. de Luynes—as merciful as you are brave; more merciful than you are prudent. One word of warning, M. de Luynes. Do not let me learn that you are in my nephew's company, if you would not make me regret my clemency, and repair the error of it by having you hanged. And now, farewell!"

I stood aghast. Was I indeed dismissed? Albeit naught had been said, I had not doubted since my interview with him that morning that did I succeed in saving Andrea, my rank in his Guards, and thereby a means of livelihood, would be restored to me. And now matters were no better than they had been before. He dismissed me with the assurance that he was merciful. It would have been as merciful to have hanged me.

He met my astonished look with an eye that seemed to ask me why I lingered. Then, reading mayhap what was passing in my thoughts, he raised a little silver whistle to his lips and blew softly upon it.

"Bernouin," said he to his valet, who entered in answer to the summons, "reconduct M. de Luynes."

I remember drawing down upon my bedraggled person the curious gaze of the numerous clients who thronged the Cardinal's antechamber, as I followed Bernouin to the door which opened on to the corridor, and which he held open for me. And thus, for the second time within twenty-four hours, did I leave the Palais Royal to wend my way home to the Rue St. Antoine with grim despondency in my heart.

I found Michelot on the point of setting out in search of me, with a note which had been brought to my lodging half-an-hour ago, and which its bearer had said was urgent. I took the letter, and bidding Michelot prepare me fresh raiment that I might exchange for my wet clothes, I broke the seal and read:

> A thousand thanks, dear friend, for the service you have rendered me and of which his Eminence, my uncle, has informed me. I fear that you have made many enemies for yourself through an action which is like to go unrewarded, and that Paris is therefore as little suited at present to your health as it is to mine. I am setting out for Blois on a mission of exceeding delicacy, wherein your advice and guidance would be of infinite value to me. I shall remain at Choisy until to-morrow morning, and should there be no ties to hold you in Paris, and you be minded to bear me company, join me there at the Hôtel du Connétable, where I shall lie to-night.
> Your grateful and very devoted
> Andrea.

So! There was one at least who desired my company! I had not thought it. "If there be no ties to hold you in Paris," he wrote. Ha, ha! A change of air would suit me vastly. I was resolved. A fig for the Cardinal's threat to hang me if I were found in his nephew's company.

"My suit of buff, Michelot," I shouted, springing to my feet, "and my leather jerkin."

He gazed at me in surprise.

"Is Monsieur going a journey?"

I answered him that I was, and as I spoke I began to divest myself of the clothes I wore. "Pack my suit of pearl gray in the valise, with what changes of linen I possess, then call Master Coupri, that I may settle with him. It may be some time before we return."

In less than half-an-hour I was ready for the journey, spurred and booted, with my rapier at my side, and in the pocket of my doublet a purse containing some fifty pistoles, best part of which I had won from Vilmorin, at lansquenet some nights before, and which moderate sum represented all the monies that I possessed.

Our horses were ready, my pistols holstered, and my valise strapped to Michelot's saddle. Despite the desperate outlook of my fortunes, of which I had made him fully cognisant, he insisted upon clinging to me, reminding me that at Rocroi I had saved his life, and that he would leave me only when I bade him go.

As four o'clock was striking at Nôtre Dame we crossed the Pont Neuf, and going by the Quai des Augustins and the Rue de la Harpe, we quitted Paris by the St. Michel Gate, and took the road to Choisy. The rain had ceased, but the air was keen and cold, and the wind cut like a sword-edge.

CHAPTER V.

MAZARIN THE MATCHMAKER.

'Twixt Paris and Choisy there lies but a distance of some two leagues, which, given a fair horse, one may cover with ease in little more than half-an-hour; so that as the twilight was deepening into night we drew rein before the hostelry of the Connétable, in the only square the little township boasts, and from the landlord I had that obsequious reception which is ever accorded to him who travels with a body-servant.

I found Andrea installed in a fair-sized and comfortable apartment, to the original decoration of which he added not a little by bestowing his boots in the centre of the floor; his hat, sword, and baldrick on the table; his cloak on one chair, and his doublet on another. He himself lay toasting his feet before the blazing logs, which cast a warm, reddish glow upon his sable hair and dainty shirt of cambric.

He sprang up as I entered, and came towards me with a look of pleasure on his handsome, high-bred face that did me good to see.

"So you have come, de Luynes," he cried, putting forth his hand. "I did not dare to hope that you would."

"No?" I answered. "Truly it was not to be expected that I could be easily lured from Paris just as my fortunes are nearing a high tide, and his Eminence proposing to make me a Marshal of France and create me Duke. As you say, you had scant grounds for hoping that my love for you would suffice to make me renounce all these fine things for the mere sake of accompanying you on your jaunt to Blois."

He laughed, then fell to thanking me for having rid him of Canaples. I cut him short at last, and in answer to his questions told him what had passed 'twixt his Eminence and me that afternoon. Then as the waiter entered to spread our supper, the conversation assumed a less delicate character, until we were again alone, with the table and its steaming viands between us.

"You have not told me yet, Andrea, what takes you to Blois," quoth I then.

"You shall learn. Little do you dream how closely interwoven are our morning adventures with this journey of mine. To begin with I go to Blois to pay my respects to the lady whom his Eminence has selected for my future wife."

"You were right then in describing this as a mission of great delicacy."

"More than you think. I have never seen the lady."

"Never seen her? And you go a-wooing a woman you have never seen?"

"It is so. I have never seen her; but his Eminence has, and 'tis he who arranges the affair. Ah, the Cardinal is the greatest matchmaker in France. My cousin Anna Martinozzi is destined for the Prince de Conti, my sisters Olympia and Marianne he also hopes to marry to princes of the blood, whilst I dare wager that he has thoughts of seating either Maria or Hortensia upon the throne of France as the wife of Louis XIV., as soon as his Majesty shall have reached a marriageable age. You may laugh, de Luynes, nevertheless all this may come to pass, for my uncle has great ambitions for his family; and it is even possible that should that poor, wandering youth, Charles II. of England, ever return to the throne of his fathers, he may also become my brother-in-law. I am like to become well connected, de Luynes, so make a friend of me whilst I am humble. So much for Mazarin's nieces. His nephews are too young for alliances just yet, saving myself; and for me his Eminence has chosen one of the greatest heiresses in France—Yvonne St. Albaren de Canaples."

"Whom?" I shouted.

He smiled.

"Curious, is it not? She is the sister of the man whom I quarrelled with this morning, and whom you fought with this afternoon. Now you will understand my uncle's reasons for so strenuously desiring to prevent the duel at St. Germain. It appears that the old Chevalier de Canaples is as eager as the Cardinal to see his daughter wed to me, for his Eminence has promised to create me duke for a wedding gift. 'Twill cost him little, and 'twill please these Canaples mightily. Naturally, had Eugène de Canaples and I crossed swords, matters would have been rendered difficult."

"When did you learn all this?" I inquired.

"To-day, after the duel, and when it was known what St Auban and Montemédy had threatened me with. My uncle thought it well that I should withdraw from Paris. He sent for me and told me what I have told you, adding that I had best seize the opportunity, whilst my presence at Court was undesirable, to repair to Blois and get my wooing done. I in part agreed with him. The lady is very rich, and I am told that she is beautiful. I shall see her, and if she pleases me I'll woo her. If not, I'll return to Paris."

"But her brother will oppose you."

"Her brother? Pooh! If he doesn't die of the sword-thrust you gave him, which I am told is in the region of the lung and passing dangerous, he will at least be abed for a couple of months to come."

"But I, my dear André? What rôle do you reserve for me that you have desired me to go with you?"

"The rôle of Mentor, if you will. Methought you would prove a merry comrade to help one o'er a tedious journey, and knowing that there was little to hold you in Paris, and probably sound reasons why you should desire to quit it, methought that perhaps you would consent to bear me company. Who knows, my knight errant, what adventures may await you and what fortunes? If the heiress displeases me, it may be that she shall please you; or mayhap there is another heiress at Blois who will fall enamoured of those fierce moustachios."

I laughed with him—at the improbability of such things befalling. I carried in my bosom too large a heart, and one that was the property of every wench I met, for just so long as I chanced to be in her company.

It was no more than in harmony with this habit of mine that when next morning in the common-room of the Connétable I espied Jeanneton, the landlord's daughter, and remarked that she was winsome and shapely, with a complexion that would not have dishonoured a rose petal, I permitted myself to pinch her dainty cheek. She slapped mine in return, and in this pleasant manner we became acquainted.

"Sweet Jeanneton," quoth I with a laugh, "that was mightily ill-done. I did but pinch your cheek as one may pinch a sweet-smelling bud, so that the perfume of it may cling to one's fingers."

"And I, sir," was the pert rejoinder, "did but slap yours as one may slap a misbehaving urchin's, so that he may learn better manners."

Nevertheless she was pleased with my courtly speech, and perchance also with my moustachios, for a smile took the place of the frown wherewith she had first confronted me. Now if I had uttered glib pleasantries in answer to her frowns, how many more did not her smiles wring from me? I discoursed to her, in the very courtliest fashion, of cows and pullets, and such other matters as interesting to her as they were mysterious to me. I questioned her in a breath touching her father's pigs and the swain she loved best in that little township, to all of which she answered me with a charming wit, which would greatly divert you did I but recall her words sufficiently to set them down. In five minutes we were become the best friends in the world, which was attested by the protecting arm that I slipped round her waist as I asked her whether she loved that village swain of hers better than she loved me, and refused to believe her when she answered that she did.

"And I, sir, did but slap yours as one may slap a misbehaving urchin's, that he may learn better manners."

Outside two men were talking, one calling for a farrier, and when informed that the only one in the village was absent and not like to return till noon, demanded relays of horses. The other, probably the hostler, answered him that the Connétable was not a post-house, and that no horses were to be had there. Then a woman's voice, sweet yet commanding, rose above theirs.

"Very well, Guilbert," it said. "We will await this farrier's return."

"Let me go, Monsieur," cried Jeanneton. "Some one comes."

Now for myself I cared little who might come, but methought that it was like to do poor Jeanneton's fair name no benefit if the arm of Gaston de Luynes were seen about her waist, and so I obeyed her; but not quickly enough, for already a shadow lay athwart the threshold, and in the doorway stood a woman, whose eye took in the situation before we had altered it sufficiently to avert suspicion. To my amazement I beheld the lady of the coach, she who had saved me from the mob in Place Vendôme, and touching whose identity I could have hazarded a shrewd guess.

In her eyes, also, I saw the light of recognition, which swiftly changed to one of scorn. Then they passed from me to the vanishing Jeanneton, and methought that she was about to call her back. She paused, however, and turning to the lackey who followed at her heels, "Guilbert," she said, "be good enough to call the landlord, and bid him provide me with an apartment for the time that we may be forced to spend here."

But at this juncture the host himself came hurrying forward with many bows and endless rubbing of hands, which argued untold deference. He regretted that the hostelery of the Connétable, being but a poor inn, seldom honoured as it was at that moment, possessed but one suite of private apartments, and that now occupied by a most noble gentleman. The lady tapped her foot, and as at that moment her companion, who was none other than the fair-haired doll I had seen with her on the previous day, entered the room, she turned to speak with her, whilst I moved away towards the window.

"Will this gentleman," she inquired, "lend me one of his rooms, think you?"

"Alas, Mademoiselle, he has but two, a bedroom and an antechamber, and he is still abed."

"Oh!" she cried in pretty anger, "this is insufferable! 'Tis your fault, Guilbert, you fool. Am I then to spend the day here in the common room?"

"No, no, Mademoiselle," exclaimed the host in his most soothing accents. "Only for an hour, or less perhaps, until this very noble lord is risen, when assuredly—for he is young and very gallant—he will resign one or both of his rooms to you."

More was said between them, but my attention was suddenly drawn elsewhere. Michelot burst into the room, disaster written on his face.

"Monsieur," he cried, in great alarm, "the Marquis de St. Auban is riding down the street with the Vicomte de Vilmorin and another gentleman."

I rapped out an oath at the news; they had got scent of Andrea's whereabouts, and were after him like sleuth-hounds on a trail.

"Remain here, Michelot," I answered in a low voice. "Tell them that M. de Mancini is not here; that the only occupant of the inn is your master, a gentleman from Normandy, or Picardy, or where you will. See that they do not guess our presence, the landlord, fortunately, is ignorant of M. de Mancini's name."

There was a clatter of horses' hoofs without, and I was barely in time to escape by the door leading to the staircase, when St. Auban's heavy voice rang out, calling the landlord.

"I am in search of a gentleman named Andrea de Mancini," he said. "I am told that he has journeyed hither, and that he is here at present. Am I rightly informed?"

I determined to remain where I was and hear that conversation to the end.

There is a gentleman here," answered the host, "but I am ignorant of his name. I will inquire."

"You may spare yourself the trouble," Michelot interposed. "That is not the gentleman's name. I am his servant."

There was a moment's pause, then came Vilmorin's shrill voice. "You lie, knave. M. de Mancini is here. You are M. de Luynes' lackey, and where the one is, there shall we find the other."

"M. de Luynes?" came a voice unknown to me. "That is Mancini's sword-blade of a friend, is it not? Well? Why does he hide himself? Where is he? Where is your master, rascal?"

"I am here, Messieurs," I answered, throwing wide the door, and appearing, grim and arrogant, upon the threshold.

Merciful Heavens! Had they beheld the devil, St. Auban and Vilmorin could not have looked less pleased than they did when their eyes lighted upon me, standing there surveying them with a sardonic grin.

St. Auban muttered an oath; Vilmorin stifled a cry; whilst he who had so loudly called to know where I hid myself, a frail little fellow, in the uniform of the gardes du corps, stood now silent and abashed.

The two women, who had withdrawn into a dark and retired corner of the apartment, stood gazing with interest upon this pretty scene.

"Well, gentlemen," I asked in a bantering tone, as I took a step towards them, "have you naught to say to me now that I have answered your imperious summons? What! All dumb?"

"Our affair is not with you," said St. Auban curtly.

"Your pardon! Why, then did you inquire where I was?"

"Messieurs," exclaimed Vilmorin, whose face assumed the pallor usual to it in moments of peril, "methinks we have been misinformed, and that M. de Mancini is not here. Let us seek elsewhere."

"Most excellent advice, gentlemen," I commented. "Seek elsewhere."

"Monsieur," cried the little officer, turning purple, "it occurs to me that you are mocking us."

"Mocking you! Mocking you? Mocking a gentleman who has been tied to so huge a sword as yours? Surely—surely, sir, you do not think——"

"I'll not endure it," he broke in. "You shall answer to me for this."

"Have a care, sir," I cried in alarm as he rushed forward. "Have a care, sir, lest you trip over your sword."

He halted, drew himself up, and with a magnificent gesture, "I am Armand de Malpertuis, lieutenant of his Majesty's Guards," he announced, "and I shall be grateful if you will do me the honour of taking a turn with me outside."

"I am flattered beyond measure, M. Malappris——"

"Mal-per-tuis," he corrected furiously.

"Malpertuis," I echoed. "I am honoured beyond words, but I do not wish to take a turn."

"Good Heavens, sir! Don't you understand? We must fight."

"Must we, indeed? Again I am honoured; but, Monsieur, I don't fight sparrows."

(To be continued.)

A FALSE ENTRY.

"HERE we are at last, father. Now do please be careful what you talk about, and above all, try to forget that such things as sausages exist, or, at any rate, that you have anything to do with them."

"I'll try to, Effie, I'll try to, my dear, but when I've thought about them for the last thirty years it's a bit hard to put them out of my mind now, but I'll try my best, my girl."

The train stopped, and Effie Larkins and her father got out, to fall the prey of the motley group of porters, commissionaires and envoys of the various hotels of Lausanne. He was a jolly-looking, grey-haired man of perhaps fifty-five or sixty, and she a lively, if not actually pretty, brown-haired, brown-eyed girl of twenty-three or so.

And while an English-speaking porter is piloting them and their luggage safely through the Customs, we may as well learn how they found their way to Switzerland, and why Mr. Larkins was forbidden to forget that the succulent dainties known as sausages, existed.

Samuel Larkins had begun life as an errand boy in a sausage shop, he had worked hard and prospered, and for many years now he had himself been the owner of a large shop in the Borough devoted entirely to the sale of sausages, of which he was also the maker.

"Larkins' sausages" enjoyed enormous local favour, and Samuel Larkins was quite rich enough to indulge his only daughter in any reasonable wish. Her wish was to visit Switzerland, and so they came. His wife was dead, and Effie, his only child, the apple of his eye. She had been educated at an excellent school, and on her return home, could not but be struck by the very homely surroundings and manners of her father.

She would have liked to move from the neighbourhood, but on this one point her otherwise indulgent father was firm. He had lived over his sausage shop for twenty-five years, he had brought his wife home to it on their wedding day, Effie had been born there—"and I'll die there," he asserted, so Effie was forced to content herself by effecting a complete metamorphosis of the shabby rooms and old-fashioned furniture, with the sole exception of the room behind the shop which was her father's particular sanctum, and into which even she never penetrated. He adored his daughter, and lavished all he could upon her.

For himself he would have preferred remaining in London and superintending the making and selling of his sausages, but he realised that young people need change, and as he could not bear to be parted from Effie, he bought the tickets, made the journey, and found himself safely arrived at the end of it.

His daughter's warning was perhaps needed, for her father took an honest pride in his occupation, and was fond of boasting that nothing but the best ingredients found a place in his sausages.

The luggage passed, they took a carriage and drove to the pension where they had engaged rooms. A short time after their arrival, according to the Swiss law, whereby the authorities must be at once supplied with the name, address, and occupation of every visitor, the proprietor brought up the visitors' book. This was an anxious moment for Effie. With all her fastidious little heart she hated the idea of being in any way connected with sausages. At home, of course, everybody knew it, and disguise was useless, but here, what need to proclaim the fact? She watched her father write "Samuel Larkins, London," and then his pen travelled on to the space headed "Occupation." The first "s" of the hated word was formed before her resolution was made.

"Stop," she called out suddenly, "I will put it," and before the bewildered man could speak she had changed the "s" into a "g" and, according to the visitors' book, Samuel Larkins had no other occupation than that of being "a gentleman."

His expostulations were coaxed away. "It doesn't really make any difference," she assured him, "no one will trouble to read it. It is only a joke, you can't make the page all untidy by scratching it out," and the adoring father gave in, though not without some qualms as to the sin of inscribing what he bluntly called a lie.

The time passed delightfully at Lausanne, with trips on the blue lake, excursions to the neighbouring towns, a visit to Montreux to see the "Fete de Narcisses," where one is driven to believe that all the narcissi in Switzerland have found their way to the sunny little town, so assailed is one on every side by the sight of them, and the scent of their sweetness. There were several excursion parties made up by the visitors at the pension, and Effie and her father were always invited to join, for she was an amusing, thoroughly nice girl, and he had a certain bluff heartiness about him hard to resist.

He kept his word faithfully to his daughter, and the much-disliked word had not been spoken, so she breathed freely, and gave herself up to enjoyment.

The people staying in the pension were an endless amusement to her; there was an old English lady (to be found, surely, in every pension abroad) who, by virtue of long residence has come to regard herself as queen of the house, who arranges excursions, makes conversation, and graciously sets, or tries to set, newcomers at their ease, who holds a species of court in the salon each evening, and believes herself to be a person of some importance. Then, too, there was the ultra-English lady, who aggressively aired their superiority over all others to a roomful of foreigners, but who found nothing good once the shores of Britain were behind her.

There was also the fussy dame, the vagaries of whose digestion were a source of keenest joy to her, of woe to her neighbours when compelled to listen to her account of them. She "enjoyed bad health," as an old Wiltshire woman once happily expressed it, and sat at meals with a pair of scales by her side, with which she conscientiously and obtrusively weighed every mouthful. There were yet other types; the lady who sat waiting (figuratively speaking) to be cheated, who disputed every item of her account and talked for an hour on the thieving propensities of the entire Swiss nation, because her laundress charged fifteen instead of ten centimes for washing a collar.

The list might be extended almost indefinitely if it were not wearying and almost pathetic to find so many women with no object, no interest in life, save the petty scandals and trivialities of pension existence. In the whole pension there was only one man, but he, in the opinion of the ladies, made up for being the only one, by possessing a title.

The Honourable Robert Murgatroyd was the nephew of the fussy lady with the interesting digestion, and he was in Lausanne to regain his strength after a severe illness. He found the pension woefully dull, and welcomed the arrival of the Larkins with enthusiasm. From the rooms they occupied, and their mode of living he could not fail to see that they were well off, and his aunt did not omit to impress it on him.

"The old man," she said, "mayn't be much to look at, but he is a gentleman—I know, because I looked in the visitors' book. It is odd he speaks so badly and gets so often confused over his grammar and aspirates, but I suppose he was badly educated. However, the girl is very nice, and as she is the only child, she will come in for all the money, and I am told he must be really very well off."

But Robert Murgatroyd was no fool. He felt sure that Effie's father was no more a gentleman either by birth or education, than he was a Turk, and he had no intention of doing more than amuse himself with a quite unknown girl, possessing an impossible father. So he talked to her in a low-toned voice in corners, gave her flowers and bon-bons, and in fine made himself so agreeable that poor Effie, simple as a child, innocent as a baby, quite thought he was in love with her, and wove happy dreams of herself as the Honourable Mrs. Murgatroyd.

Her father was equally guileless: he regarded the flirtation with which Robert Murgatroyd filled up his many dull hours as genuine love-making. He had visions of Effie in a golden coronet, driving in a carriage and pair, perhaps even with four horses, to visit him in his sausage shop. So vague were his ideas about Society that he even believed she might be called the Honourable Lady Effie.

So he dreamed on in his loving, ignorant way, and Effie, though she hardly loved, yet was fascinated and charmed by the brilliant young man.

But one day a look in her eyes which had never been there before, an inflection in her voice which he had never before heard, warned the man that he had gone far enough. He packed his luggage, and left that night for England.

That same night, while Murgatroyd was settling himself comfortably in the Paris express, Mr. Larkins sat in his room, thinking deeply, and somewhat miserably. He could not help knowing that he was unpolished and uncouth as compared with other people in the house, and he had lately taken into his head the idea that Murgatroyd despised him. Personally he cared nothing for the young man's opinion, but he believed Effie loved him, and her happiness was the one thing he most desired. He half suspected that Murgatroyd knew and sneered at his business, and he felt that while he was in evidence his daughter might never receive a direct proposal. The result of his meditations was a letter which was handed to Effie the following morning, with another in an unknown handwriting, when the maid brought her coffee.

"From father," she thought wonderingly, "whatever made him write to me? Can he be ill?" and she tore the envelope open. Tears sprang to her eyes as she read the few badly-expressed, strangely-spelt words, in which her father told her he could never be good enough to have to do with the wife of what he called "a honourable gent," how he was sure Murgatroyd was withheld from proposing to her by his presence, and how he intended to return to London without delay, leaving her in the care of Mrs. Stanton, the proprietress of the pension, who would gladly look after her.

"And you needn't be afraid, my dearie," the letter finished, "I won't come to the wedding or nothing, and it will be as if you had no father except for settlements, and that I'll see to well, for you're all I have in the world, and that's why I'm going, because he won't propose while I'm here, and I love you too well to stand in the way of you being made a lady."

Effie sat and cried, never before had she realised the deep love her father had for her, never till now, when, for what he thought her advantage, he proposed giving her up. All the oddities of speech and manner which had often irritated and offended her were forgotten, and she remembered only his sterling goodness, and unfailing love and tenderness. Murgatroyd did not enter her head at all.

Impulsively she threw on her dressing-gown, and ran to her father's room, where he was stuffing his belongings into a portmanteau in a sad and preoccupied way. She threw her arms round his neck. "Father, my dear, good, kind little father, how could you think I could live without you. If Mr. Murgatroyd wants to marry me, he must be friends with you too."

Her father did not answer: he was so delighted to find how she loved him, that his voice was trembling, and he could only stroke her hair and kiss her.

Suddenly Effie remembered the other letter, which she still held in her hand, and she tore it open.

"Dear Miss Larkins,—I am obliged to return to England on urgent business, and have not even time to say good-bye to you. I am very much obliged for all the pleasure I have had in the society of your father and yourself during my visit here.

"With kind regards to him and yourself, believe me to remain, yours sincerely, ROBERT MURGATROYD."

"Look," she cried, "that is what you would have liked me to take instead of you. He meant nothing: I understand it all now. He was only amusing himself with me because he had nothing else to do. Thank Heaven I never grew to really love him. Oh, father, I am tired of Lausanne, let us go home."

"Yes, little girl, we'll go home to-day. I'm tired of being abroad, too. Give me old England. Never mind, my darling, don't bother your pretty head any more about it; run away and pack."

They left Lausanne that evening, but before going Samuel Larkins said to his daughter.

"Effie, there's one little thing I'd like to do. You know when we first came you wrote down in the book that I was a gentleman. It's been on my mind ever since; it seems to me nothing but a false entry. I'd be happier if it was altered."

And Effie, understanding now that to be written down a gentleman is not always a proof of being one, agreed.

"You shall do just as you like, dear father," she said tenderly, "it was only my silly vanity that made me write it."

So the book was obtained, and the alteration made, and to this day those who stay at the Pension X. may, if so minded, turn back the pages of the visitors' book to where is written "Samuel Larkins, London, gentleman," but the last word is scratched through, and over it is written in slightly tremulous characters, "sausage-maker."

CLAUDIA ASHTON.

LIKE A KNIGHT OF OLD.

It was of no use Peggy crying, she couldn't go. Millions of tears, she assured herself despairingly, would make no difference—she couldn't, couldn't go!

The certainty with which she said, almost screamed, this truth might have shown her to be a philosopher, had she not at the same moment proved herself to be so very much the reverse, by burying her face deep in the tumbled bed, and doing her best to shed another million or so of these same "idle tears."

As there was no one at hand to sympathise with her she presently stopped and took breath, then wrestled fruitlessly with her pocket for a handkerchief, and failing to find it either on or under the bed, sighed grievously, and in sheer absence of mind wiped one poor red eye with the sheet and the other with a wisp of hair that was hanging wet and matted on her forehead.

The most bitter part of it all was, that the day was so brilliant; the little white clouds looked like wings of doves nestling against the deep blue of the sky, and her window, high though it was in the schoolhouse, could not keep one rustling branch of an elm from whispering and waving at the lowest pane. Birds lived in its hollows and were twittering and carolling there, the children's voices below in the orchard were laughing in expectant happiness—one called her name—and yet, oh, it was hard, she couldn't go.

"If I'd been bad-tempered now!" broke out Peggy afresh, addressing herself to the round knob of the bedstead, but turning her eyes away as suddenly, finding its brazen surface but a poor reflector. "If I'd been bad-tempered like Archie or had broken the best looking-glass like Polly Walker, it would be right, quite right. But just because I hadn't a pair of boots! Oh, dear, oh, dear, why must I be punished when it isn't my fault?" And finding, as so many of her elders daily do, no answer to this sad question, she began crying afresh, but more gently, as if getting used to her sorrow.

The door opened without a knock, and Bessie the one maid, looked in, drying her hands on her coloured apron.

"Is there no way Miss Peggy, dear? Till my month comes round I've nothin' but what I stand upright in, but my heart ached while I packed their sangwidges. I b'lieve I cried on the salt, and spilt the lot!"

"No, Bess, thank you. It can't be helped. Nobody's to blame, and I wouldn't have mother know—but, oh, isn't it horrid to be poor?"

"And this a lady's school, that's the worst. Else you might run barefoot to-day, and be as happy as a bird."

Peggy was silent, turning over in her mind many things, principally questions to which her puzzled brain had no answer whatever. Life seemed such a tangle already, and a cheap school a never ending—so it seemed—and drudging misery, lit up, however, and saved as it were during the monotonous holidayless year by about three dazzling red-letter days. On these, the father of a large family of boys and girls took every one in the house up the mountains behind the orchard for a picnic on which wonderful occasions the word "Allowance" was banished, and peace, plenty, liberty and laughter were the order of the day, the children forgetting in the freedom of the hour the narrowness and rigour and meanness awaiting them on the morrow.

Bessie's next remark, though meant kindly, was not a happy one.

"Missis 'ud no doubt lend you a pair—she's got two—if your mother didn't owe her such a lot for—"

The blood flew into Peggy's face with a rush, and her eye—quite tearless now—flashed up indignantly into the placidly astonished face of her humble friend.

"Shut up!" she cried, or rather commanded, in loud hysterical tones. But upon Bessie jerking from the room and slamming the door, Peggy—her strength quite gone—hugged her knees with her long arms in an agony, and hid her burning face down on them.

"Oh, mother—mother, dearie—if you only knew!"

Half-an hour passed, but she did not move. Her thin shoes worn down at the heel, and "out" at each little toe had both somehow shuffled themselves off and left her feet uncovered; for Peggy's dress was still short, too short for a girl in her sixteenth year.

She had heard it all so cruelly, so clearly through the open window, the preparations, the dragging of the luncheon baskets by the boys—Archie and his big brother Jim—along the gravel path, the skurrying of many feet down the stairs, Hettie's voice calling to Laura, Laura's to Polly, and Polly too happy for ordinary spoken words, singing back a reply. Then the hasty careless good-bye shouted to her and Bessie, amid more laughter and chatter, the voices finally dying away, leaving silence, broken only by the songs of the birds, which seemed so much to her that Peggy threw her frock over her head to shut the glad sounds out. So effectually did she do this, so drowsily overcome was she by all that had happened, that a loud heavy tread in the hall below, on the stairs, outside on the landing, at her very door, failed to rouse or even reach her. A quick decided rap followed—but there was no answer; a sharp rattle of the handle had been repeated three times before Peggy, wondering—her heart a little fluttering for it seemed as if help had come, peeped over the hem of her dress and set her back resolutely to the window. Then she cried in a succession of little gasps—

"Jim, not you, really! Silly old boy—come in." The handle gave one more twist, and the door was flung back, rebounding against the wall.

Yes it was Jim, hot from running, his face red and shining, his curly hair rough and disordered, his best blue tie awry, his eye—which matched it in colour—after one comprehensive glance fastened upon the mat, his hands behind him.

Peggy said not a word, but a little light, half-hope, half-merriment, glimmered in her eye. It was not in her mind to be coquettish with Jim, but neither was she going to help him at all, so she just folded her hands and waited. A minute he stood bearing it, his cheek growing a duskier red, his chest visibly heaving, his right foot shuffling a grotesque pas seul round his left. He snatched another look at Peggy, pulled his cap over his eyes still intent on the mat, and blurted out:

"Come along out of that, Pegs! I'm not going without you."

"I was wondering if you could, Jim—and after a year's absence too! But you dear silly old boy, I can't go barefooted like Mrs. Kelly's children. They'd send me back if I did."

"I know they would," growled Jim.

"Well, then, I can't go. You couldn't carry me to the top of Grube!"

Peggy ducked her head, conscious of having laid a trap, and Jim looked up at the landing ceiling as if in search of it. The spirit of his first compliment hung upon his lips, but so utterly confounded and paralysed them that it never escaped beyond, and when, after a pause, he did speak, his voice sounded quite gruff—almost angry.

"Carry you! I suppose you think me a fool, Peggy; but I'm not, and you're not a baby either. I ran back to tell you to come, and I've brought you a pair of my boots to come in. Here they are. The hand behind threw itself forward with a swing, and deposited them with a mighty thud at her feet. Peggy looked at them a moment silently, and at her shame-faced deliverer still panting as if for breath, and then burst into a merry little peal of laughter. It was not to be wondered at either, considering how pretty and arched her foot was, how slender and how small, and to picture them encased in such rough coverings. They had row upon row underneath of bright nails, and the leather was of that strong kind requiring no lining, long strips of the same substance brown and unbreakable hung from brass hooks for laces, and solid masses of metal almost covered the heels. Many a time Peggy had laughed at them, and at their like hanging in lines outside the Douglas shoemakers' shops, and as she slid, almost jumped into this pair of Jimmy's, her glee knew no bounds.

In the midst of laughter, which still had some traces of tears in it, she bestowed a little impetuous kiss upon the hard crinkled top edge of each, and then seizing Jim's reluctant hand, would have rewarded it in like manner had he not been too quick for her and jerked it away.

But he knelt at her feet and tied the laces round them and stowed away the ends quite tidily.

"Worst of it is, your foot's so small," said he at last. Then turning his eyes up to hers for the first time—

"But I swore you should go, Peggy, and so you can now. And if the brutish things do hurt, I'll—well, I will carry you all the way back!"

* * * * *

The weight was only fun at first, and the curious roominess which allowed her toes free action even while her ankles were stung by the tightness of the laces (which alone prevented her from dropping off her boots altogether) was a subject of merriment to them both for the first hour. It is true they rather rubbed her heel awkwardly, and they had a trick also of throwing her forward on her knees unexpectedly, but Jim was ever ready to help her, and succeeded in less than an hour in getting her up the steep hill to where the whole party was resting, previous to unpacking the luncheon baskets.

Peggy, at sight of them, grew grave, and suddenly sank, not this time extending her hand with "just to be helped."

"No, Jim; oh, I can't. Let me rest; the heather is like a soft bed, and—oh, each foot weighs a hundred pounds!"

Nobody regarded her much except Nettie, who, with a pleasant little smile, came down to know how it had all been made possible, and then returned with Jim for sandwiches and cake. Shouts of laughter followed her narration, and two of the boys came down to inspect "Madame Peggy's big boots." But before they could reach her, long quick striding steps over-took them, and in another moment they retraced theirs, howling.

Peggy lay on her back, the soft heather almost covering her and rising inches above her head. She forgot she was in pain; everything was so beautiful.

"Clever boy, you got here first. But why did they cry? You hadn't a hand to hurt them left."

"No," responded Jim laconically, "but I had a foot!"

The corners of Peggy's mouth twitched, but she asked no explanation, and perched up on one arm, contentedly munched a sandwich. Jim poured out a glass of water, holding the bottle on high that he made quite a fine "head."

"Guess who's up there with them," he said then.

She paused on the verge of another bite.

"Not—— Oh, Jim, don't say it's Charlie Sparrow!"

Noting her tone of concern he immediately became curiously hard and even callous; ungrammatical as well. He set his teeth and spoke through them.

"Yes—him." And then appearing to entirely forget her presence, deliberately, slowly and exasperatingly, demolished two more sandwiches and three pieces of cake without looking at her.

Now Peggy's case was a hard one. For she had told her own heart for at least half-a-year, and had even confided the same to Laura not a month back, that she had a hero, and that hero's initials were C. S.

She had moreover learnt "Charlie is my darling," until she knew every word of it and every little turn of its pretty tune. In that dreary school, where he was a visitor sometimes in the summer, he brought the sunshine more surely than the season did to this lonely girl, who treasured his every kind word, and magnified his slightest acts of courtesy into almost deeds of chivalry. Once, indeed, he had saved her from being beaten; once again he had taken her away into safe hiding while he mended with his own hand a tear in her frock, while she stood by trembling, frightened and helpless, although superlatively happy.

He had told her she was like his sister, his favourite sister too, and when she had cried because he was going away a year ago he had put his arm round her and had kissed her—once, twice—on the forehead, and had begged her to remember him for another year.

She was thinking of that now; of how she'd often pictured his visit, she knowing before and fully prepared, with a new dress two inches longer and more womanly in make, her hair daintily arranged and tied with ribbon, and on her feet sweet clocked stockings, and—oh, dreadful—oh, terrible—disaster of disasters! she was about to meet him now, her hero, her darling, in the same old worn dress, her hair rough and untied, and on her feet these hideous lumbering comic boots of Jim's!

Far away into the heather she threw the crust of bread in her hand, and up in a moment she stood erect, though wincing with acute pain.

"Jim, dear, help me! I mean to go back—he hasn't seen me—he is only just joining them; perhaps he doesn't know I'm here. Quick! I can't let him see me!"

With a resolve to bear unflinchingly the cutting pain in her feet and ankles, she tore quickly past him down the incline at a break-neck pace, her hands clenched, her face a-flame, her hair flying round it!

With one lightning look of anger at the cause of all this change, Jim sprang up and in a moment overtook her.

"Peggy, stop! Oh what a fool I was—your feet are bleeding! What a blind idiot I was! I never knew—oh, Peggy, forgive me!"

"You dear old Jim, how should you know. Girls have such silly soft feet, and—oh, Jim——"

"What is it, Peggy?"

"Can one die of pain in one's toes and heels, do you think? It's just like being tipsy—and it's all going to my head! What's that?"

Jim looked back and was again ungrammatical. "That's him!" Then under his breath, "dash him!" But Peggy did not hear. Far behind them rang a clear voice calling her name, and the music of it made her little heart thump and her little brain whirl.

"Peggy!" it cried "Peggy, dear, stop!"

But she only ran the faster.

"Jim—take my arm—just to reach my room—see the house is in sight. Only to pass the firs now, and then the orchard, and then—oh, dear—oh, Jim, save me!"

The hands unclenched, the heavy feet dragged and stumbled, her eyes drooped and closed, and in a moment more she lay quivering and senseless at his feet.

Jim knelt, and with his penknife cut from top to bottom the tightly drawn laces, and then, so gently that his hand twitched as he did it, he lifted each foot out of its cruel prison, calling himself the hardest names he knew the while. Directly after, Charlie had caught up to him, and was kneeling too, holding Peggy's inanimate hand.

"I am sorry for this, Jim. Poor little girl—and on the holiday too. I wonder what's caused it."

"Why, I have, if you want to know!" said Jim fiercely. "She's got no boots, and I couldn't see her left behind, so made her wear mine. And I wish somebody 'ud knock my brains out with the thick end of 'em!"

Charlie bit his lip, but slipped hisa rm very kindly through Jim's, not at all rebuffed by his rough reception.

"I hope to do something better than that for you, Jim. But first, Peggy. We can't leave her here. Her poor little feet can do no more walking to-day. I am taller than you, and two years older. I'll carry her home."

Charlie was springing lightly up without noticing the gathering storm in the other's face. Before his hand again touched Peggy's, before he could well realise what had taken place, he found himself in an instant thrown backwards on a bed of rough brake or coarse fern. Jim stood above him irate and towering.

"Touch her if you dare! It's through me she's lying there, as if she was dead—it's through me she has lamed herself, and is cut and bleeding, and it will be through me, and only me, that she shall get back home."

Without any pause or word of apology he stooped and picked her up, letting her lie stretched across his arms like an infant, and with a few steady long strides was out of sight.

Everyone was kind that night to Peggy.

* * * * *

"That is the best of being a little ill," she said. "People half believe they love you then."

"Some of them do," whispered Charlie, and Peggy's eyes grew wistful and dreamy, thinking of the going back for good in the autumn, and of how near his house was to her own dear home. But it was not his name she mentioned when she spoke next, for a pang like remorse made her heart heavy.

"Where's Jim?" she said, and Charlie rose to look for him. She caught his wrist:

"Are you angry with him at all?" But he only laughed.

"Angry? No. I deserve more than I got for attempting to take his place."

Jim came, confused and silent.

"Good night, dear Jim."

"Good night, Peg."

She raised herself as well as the bandaged feet would let her, and opened her arms wide.

"Jim—you dear, dear Jim! Let me kiss you!"

He stooped to her and her arms twined round his neck and held him close, but he never returned her kiss, and there was no smile on his lip when she released him.

"Good night, Peg," he said again, and then, turning to Charlie, "I behaved like a cad to you to-day, I beg your pardon," went by him abruptly and left the room.

* * * * *

"Good night, Peggy."

"Good night, Charlie."

"Soon I shall see you, when you go home, every week—sometimes twice in the week. Do you look forward to it as much as I do?"

She closed her eyes.

"Oh, so much!"

"Then, good night again, and—and—give me a kiss too.!"

But Peggy, with scarlet cheeks, pushed him from her.

"No, not you."

"Why, a moment ago—Jim——"

"So different—ah so different! He's like my brother, he knows that. People always kiss their brothers, and——"

"Well, I don't want to be your brother." Charlie hesitated a moment, and then threw himself down by her sofa. "Peggy—darling little Peggy, will you—will you be my sweetheart?"

"Oh, Charlie—not really!"

"Yes, really. True to me till you get to be a woman—beyond that—true always. True as that needle in the little compass I gave you which never swerves or alters."

Peggy raised her hand from where it hung by the sofa and pressed her finger on the middle button of her frock, whispering, her head half-buried in the cushion:

"It's under there, Charlie. It's been there ever since."

"My own dear Peggy. Then—then, have you a kiss for me now?"

JESSIE ROUTH.

CHRISTMAS STORYETTES.

He wasn't Generous.

Father: "Your schoolmaster can't be such a mean man as you make out. I notice his son has all the Christmas toys he can possibly need." Tommy: "Why, those are what his father takes away from the other boys."

He was Sorry.

Teddy: "I wish I hadn't licked Jimmy Brown this morning." Mother: "You see how wrong it was, don't you, Teddy?" Teddy: "Yes, 'cause I didn't know till the afternoon he was going to have a big Christmas cake."

Lazy Boy!

Little Frank wrote a letter to Santa Claus, in which he asked that genial old soul to remember him with sundry articles which he desired. But he put in a proviso that is worth noting: "Don't put anything in my stocking. It is too much work to take 'em out. Lay 'em on the chairs."

Freddy's Letter.

"Mamma," said Freddy, "I am going to invite Santa Claus to my Christmas party." "Very well," replied mamma. And Freddy sat down and wrote: "Dear Santa Claus,—You presents are desired at my house on Christmas morning.—Your loving little friend, Freddy Fosdick."

Sold.

Jones had been entertaining a few friends at dinner. Ordering coffee to be served in the library, he led the way to that apartment. Taking down a sword that was hanging on the wall and brandishing it with much affectation of martial ardour, he said: "Never, gentlemen, shall I forget the day when I drew this trusty blade for the first time." "And where was that?" asked a curious guest. "Why, in a Christmas raffle."

A Christmas Story Boiled Down.

It was Christmas Eve. Streets—brilliantly lit shop windows—toys—gay crowds—snow on the ground—everybody out—Christmas. Jane Allalone wandered all alone—crowd—sweet, sad face, wistful eyes. Five years before, James Goodygoody—Christmas Eve—betrothed to Jane—sailed away—India—ship lost—never heard of—foundered on coast of Africa. Jane held on to hope and her sewing machine—never would marry—pined away, &c. William Badbody—rich, corrupt, dissipated—mortgage on Jane's mother's house—foreclosure. Away villain! Rather poverty, crusts, &c. Turned out of doors—homeless. Down by the dark river—about to make the fatal plunge—in fact, Jane did plunge. But just then the ship, with Captain James W. Goodygoody, which had not been lost at all, came sailing up to the dock, loaded to the water's edge with china, silk dresses, and tea. Captain Goodygoody saw Jane struggling in the water. He fished her out with a boat-hook and hauled her on board his own good craft. "My Jane!" "My James!" The cook dried her at the galley-stove, and although soaked with salt water, she looked as fresh as a daisy. In fact, Jane was a daisy, and don't you forget it. They were married on Christmas Day.

He wanted to Know.

Bobby: "How are you goin' to keep Christmas Day?" Tommy: "Dunno. Is there any way to keep it so it'll last till next one comes?"

It Depended.

Fond Aunt: "Well, my dear, what shall I get you for Christmas?" Six-year-old Nephew (patronisingly): "It all depends upon how much money you have."

She liked to Know their Cost.

Miss Bright: "What, shopping again! Mercy! but what a lot of presents you must be making this year!" Miss Flight: "I never give presents; am opposed to it on principle. But I do like to go round and price things. It is so gratifying, you know, when you make a visit after Christmas, and are shown the presents that have been received, to know just how much the things cost."

A Feminine Talker.

Small Boy: "Mum wants a loaf of stale bread ter make stuffin' with for our Christmas turkey." Baker: "We have no stale bread left." "No bread?" "Nothing but fresh bread." "Gimme a loaf." "But you said your mother desired stale bread." "Yes." "This isn't stale." "Mum's run acrost th' street to talk with the neighbours 'bout th' goings-on at Mrs. Blinker's last night, an' it'll be stale by the time she gits back."

Under the Mistletoe.

Gertie (who had just been kissed by Arthur under the mistletoe, which he had discovered hanging in the hall): "Oh, Arthur, you wicked wretch! To take advantage of me like that! I wish I knew who hung it there; I'd—I'd pay them out, that's all!" Arthur (to little brother, later on in the evening): "Tommy, I am going to take Gertie away from you soon. Will you mind?" Tommy: "Not in the least, Mr. Popp. Sis and I are not friends now." Arthur: "How's that?" Tommy (heedless of Gertie's killing glances): "Oh, she boxed my ears for tipping her off the chair when she was nailing up that mistletoe in the hall!"

A Christmas Terror.

The stout man with a large package beneath his arm hurried through the crowded thoroughfare, closely pursued by a small man of haggard aspect, with a thick stick in his hand. On and on, relentless as the ticking of a clock, the forlorn man dogged the other, and those who passed him heard an occasional word drop from his lips, indicative of despair, of awful terror. Finally some of the crowd turned and followed the pair, determined not to miss the fun. The crowd grew larger, and finally a bold man went up to the person of haggard countenance. "What's the matter?" he asked. The little man turned. "Matter?" he echoed. "See that man with a bundle? He is my next-door neighbour, and in that bundle he has a cornet which he has bought for his small son at Christmas." But the crowd waited no longer. It surged ahead with relentless fury and left him to work out his own vengeance, and when peace had been restored the remains of a battered man and a battered cornet lay upon the pavement.

COMPLETE SHORT NOVEL.

CINDERELLA ROGERS.*

. . . By Tom Gallon. . . .

"Hobson!"

"Yes, sir?"

"Bring me the morning paper—any one will do."

The trim, stolid man-servant slipped out of the room, and returned almost immediately with a carefully folded newspaper, which he held out to his master, and then drew back near the door and stood passively waiting. The master, seated in a deep chair near the fire, impatiently turned the leaves, and began at last frowningly to scan the advertisement columns. The servant coughed, and glanced at the plain silver watch he drew from his pocket.

"It's nigh on to seven o'clock, sir," he ventured at last.

"I know."

"And you dine with——"

"Yes—yes; don't worry. I'm not going. I'm not going anywhere."

"Very good, sir."

Martin Chaloner got up and stood before the fire, still with his eyes fixed upon the paper. A tall, brown-faced man, quite young, with kindly, grey eyes, and certain humorous lines about his mouth; a man who bore the look of having seen much, of having been, indeed, an unobtrusive and somewhat amused spectator in the big playhouse of the world, where so many men and so many women strive together, and fret out their little lives upon the same stage.

"Look well at me, Hobson," he said at last, without removing his gaze from the paper.

"Yes, sir."

"You've known me for a good many years, I think; saw you ever a being so unfortunate?" He spoke in the same quiet, matter-of-fact tone, half-absently and without looking at the man.

The servant coughed again, and smiled a little behind his hand.

"Well, sir," he ventured deferentially. "I would scarcely 'ave been so bold as to put it quite that way. A gent as 'as, in a manner o' speaking, all as the 'eart could desire——"

"Oh, you think that, do you? You think that the power to write a cheque for any sum I may require, chambers in a fashionable quarter of town, a host of acquaintances, and a pretty wide experience of life, mean all that the heart could desire, eh?" He glanced over the top of the paper keenly at the man for a moment and then glanced down again. "You're no philosopher, Hobson."

"No, sir," replied the man humbly.

"Frankly, Hobson, I'm tired of it all—tired of all the dull round of things, the certain knowledge of what is to happen day by day, and the people I am to meet, and the clothes I am to wear. For want of a better expression, I might say that I am in search of a new sensation. You don't understand that, I suppose, Hobson?"

"Can't say as I do, sir," replied the man, looking at his master with his head on one side. "I've found, sir, as a man gets on best by takin' wot Providence sends him day by day and sleepin' sound o' nights. New sensations is apt to upset a man, sir, in a manner o' speakin'."

Martin Chaloner laughed softly, and the lines about his mouth deepened. "Well, I dare say you're right, Hobson," he said, "from your point of view. You've been a good faithful fellow ever since you joined me first, years ago, and I—hallo! what's this?" He was reading one of the advertisements with a little more eagerness than he had hitherto displayed.

"Nothing the matter, sir, I 'ope?"

"Oh, no; nothing's the matter." He hesitated a moment, and then glanced up at the man. "Just go and pack a bag for me with things enough for—let us say—a week. I can send to you for some more if I want them. Hurry up!"

"Goin' away, sir?"

"Yes; I'll give you the address presently. Look sharp with those things."

Left to himself, Martin Chaloner read the advertisement which had attracted his attention over again softly.

> A LADY, from pecuniary considerations, is anxious to receive a gentleman as paying Guest in her home. Refined and cheerful society. Select neighbourhood. Address, etc.

"Sounds dull enough," he muttered. "It's perfectly idiotic on my part, even to contemplate such a thing; but it'll be a change, and somehow"—he looked at the paper frowningly—"there's something that seems curiously to attract me about it. There are dozens of advertisements of the same type, and yet I find myself turning again and again to this one. What does it mean? I am not a superstitious man, but——"

He sat with puckered brows, pondering over it for a long time, and at last got up, and flung the paper from him, and began to stride up and down the room.

"What a fool I am!" he ejaculated, with something that was almost a sigh. "After all, Hobson was right; I'm supposed to have everything that the heart could wish for, as he tersely expresses it; and yet I am contemplating going into a lodging-house—for that's what it means I suppose—on the chance of some adventure turning up. As if any adventures ever came to a man in that way, save in books. Here we are, within a fortnight of Christmas; and I've got the pick of half-a-dozen places where a lonely man may be happy, and I don't want one of them. What's the matter with me? Am I, despite all my philosophy, beginning to cry out on the hollowness of things; beginning to feel there's something deeper under life than anything I have found? Oh, Martin Chaloner, Martin Chaloner!" he put his head for a moment between his hands and sighed, "your old cynic of a father left you his fortune, and some of his beliefs in the emptiness of all things; your gentle mother left you her heart. And the two make a bad mixture, my boy."

Still uneasy and undecided, he picked up the paper again, and sought out the advertisement, and re-read it. "After all, it might prove to be rather good fun; to drop into the midst of people who know nothing of me—to disappear, as I have disappeared before, and yet to be within a cab drive of everything. That's better than bolting across seas, and more out of the common. Well, it doesn't matter much either way; I'll toss for it."

He spun a coin in the air, whispering to himself, as he covered it with his hand: "Heads I'm a paying guest; tails I go to Lady Bertha's."

It was heads. He put the coin in his pocket, laughed softly, and rang the bell.

"My bag ready, Hobson?" he asked as the man appeared.

"Quite ready, sir."

Martin Chaloner cut the advertisement from the paper, sat down at his desk, wrote the address, and then handed it to the man.

"This in case of emergency," he said. "I might return to-morrow; I might not be back for a month. If anyone comes you might say that I've gone away, and you haven't the least notion where I am. Keep all letters until my return. If anything very important happens, wire to me. Do you understand?"

"Perfectly, sir." The man hesitated and coughed nervously. "Perhaps I might make bold to say, sir, that I 'opes, if you ain't back before, that you'll 'ave a merry Christmas, sir."

Martin Chaloner laughed. "Do you think I am going away to be merry?" he asked. "I am going to see how other people contrive to be merry, if it's possible. Merry, indeed! Call me a hansom."

The address given in the advertisement was in a quiet street in the neighbourhood of Regent's Park. The house he discovered to be a large, old-fashioned one, somewhat dingy-looking, and with an unmistakable air of faded and down-at-heel gentility about it. He dismissed the cab, and stood for a few moments on the steps of the house, with his bag beside him, looking up and down the empty street. "Well, this is a mad proceeding," he muttered to himself; "if it weren't that Hobson would think I was more off my head than usual, I'd go back again, and dine comfortably, and go to Lady Bertha's for Christmas. No, hang it! I'm sick to death of Lady Bertha and all the lot of them, and I may get some fun out of this."

He rang the bell somewhat viciously, feeling half inclined to run away the moment he had done so. But the thing had to be gone through with now, and he stood his ground. A decidedly untidy servant opened the door, and he mentioned the advertisement; she backed against the wall, and motioned to him to enter He went in, absolutely determined in his own mind to be out of the place within the next five minutes, and speeding back to his own comfortable quarters. For the house was stuffy, and close and sombre, and the room in which he was left was filled with hideous atrocities in the shape of furniture and decorations which filled his soul with depression. But the door opened, and in an instant all his resolutions of flight were gone, and even the depressing, sombre room seemed to take on a new aspect. A young girl had entered, and softly closed the door behind her, and stood nervously watching him, as if waiting for him to speak.

She was small and slight, with an oval, delicate face, and big wistful brown eyes. She was dressed very neatly, in black—a dress which had obviously been worn a long time. Despite her quiet attitude and the gravity of her face, she was so entirely different to anything about her, and seemed so little more than a child, that Martin Chaloner felt the ridiculous nature of his quest and of the situation generally more keenly than ever, and faltered, and hesitated to speak.

"You called in answer to the advertisement, I think?" she said at last; and her voice was just the voice he would have expected to issue from those lips.

"Yes; I only saw the advertisement to-night," he began, lamely. "Are you—are you——" He stopped in confusion, not knowing how to complete the question.

"Mrs. Trigg asked me to see you," she replied quickly. "She is—is not very well." Martin had a vision of the lady of the house hurriedly preparing to receive a visitor, and smiled and nodded. "Perhaps you would like to see the rooms," she added nervously.

"Oh, I daresay they're all right," he replied carelessly; "but I suppose I'd better see them, though I'm giving you a frightful lot of trouble, I'm afraid," he added.

She flushed quickly, and looked at him with something of surprise. "Oh! there's no question of trouble," she replied quietly. "It's a part of my duties."

The rooms proved to be fairly comfortable, although it is probable that Martin Chaloner did not very carefully examine them; the terms he agreed to at once. That night, as he sat in front of a very smoky fire, in an easy chair which belied its name, and which had one castor off, he smilingly communed with himself.

"Well, I've seen Mrs. Triggs—tall, bony, severe, pious, with a quick eye to the main chance; I've seen Master Triggs, of some twenty summers, who lives on his mother, and wears loud clothes, and smokes abominable cigars; I've observed Miss Triggs, who has a general air of curl papers in the morning, and holes in her stockings. I suppose Mr. Triggs has passed into the shades. Happy man! But what—in the name of all that's wonderful—is that girl doing here? She can't be one of the family; perhaps she's a poor relation. But that's not possible, either; I'll swear she hasn't a drop of their blood in her veins. And yet I suppose she must be a poor relation, or they wouldn't snub her so dreadfully. I must try and find out."

He lay awake that night a long time thinking about her, and fell asleep at last, to dream of her. He was awakened late next morning by a soft tapping at his door. At first he did not remember where he was; but it dawned upon him quickly, and he cried out from the shelter of the bedclothes to know what was the matter.

"Would you like your breakfast brought up to you?" was the question he heard from the other side of the door; and the voice he recognised as that of the girl who had filled so large a part of his thoughts during the past few hours. He hurriedly sat up in bed, and called out that he would, if it would not give her any additional trouble. Then, as he heard her light feet moving away from the door, he scrambled out of bed, and began to dress hurriedly.

He was just passing out into his sitting-room as the girl entered it by another door, bearing a heavy tray, on which his breakfast was set out. He went forward quickly to take the tray from her; for a moment they looked at each other across it.

"Where's the servant?" he asked.

"This is part of my duty, Mr. Chaloner," she said quietly.

"Well, I shouldn't have had it brought up if I'd known that. Come, let me have it." There was a curious, tenderly masterful way about him, and his smile was so genial and good-humoured, that the girl relinquished the tray, and stood looking at him, and smiling perplexedly as he set it on the table and began to arrange his breakfast for himself.

"You know," he said as he set out the various things —"I've been in the habit of waiting upon myself all my life—that is to say, when I've been travelling especially; and I hate to sit still and see a woman wait on me. It isn't the right sort of thing at all, you know. There—now we're quite straight." He looked round at the girl and laughed. "Thank you very much —by-the-way—I think they call you—what was it?"

"My name is Rogers," replied the girl.

"Ah, of course; please forgive me, Miss Rogers." He hesitated a moment, and then went on more hurriedly with a sudden heightening of colour. "I should like to ask you a very plain question; if you think I'm infernally rude, don't answer it. But what are you doing here?"

She looked at him in some astonishment, and not a little distress. "Indeed, I am afraid I don't understand you," she said.

"No—I'm afraid it's horribly rude of me; but I am a little puzzled about you. You see, I only came here last night, and you—you are so different from these other people. You're not—not one of the family, I suppose?"

The question was so good-natured, and his grey eyes wore so friendly an expression that she laughed, and answered at once:

"No, I'm not one of the family."

"Ah! I'm rather glad of that."

"I am what is known as a lady-help," went on the girl, in a lower tone. "Which means, I am afraid, that I have to work harder than most servants, and am not paid quite so well; but I'm allowed to take my meals with the family."

"Well, that's a privilege, at any rate," said Martin Chaloner; "but why do you do it, Miss Rogers?"

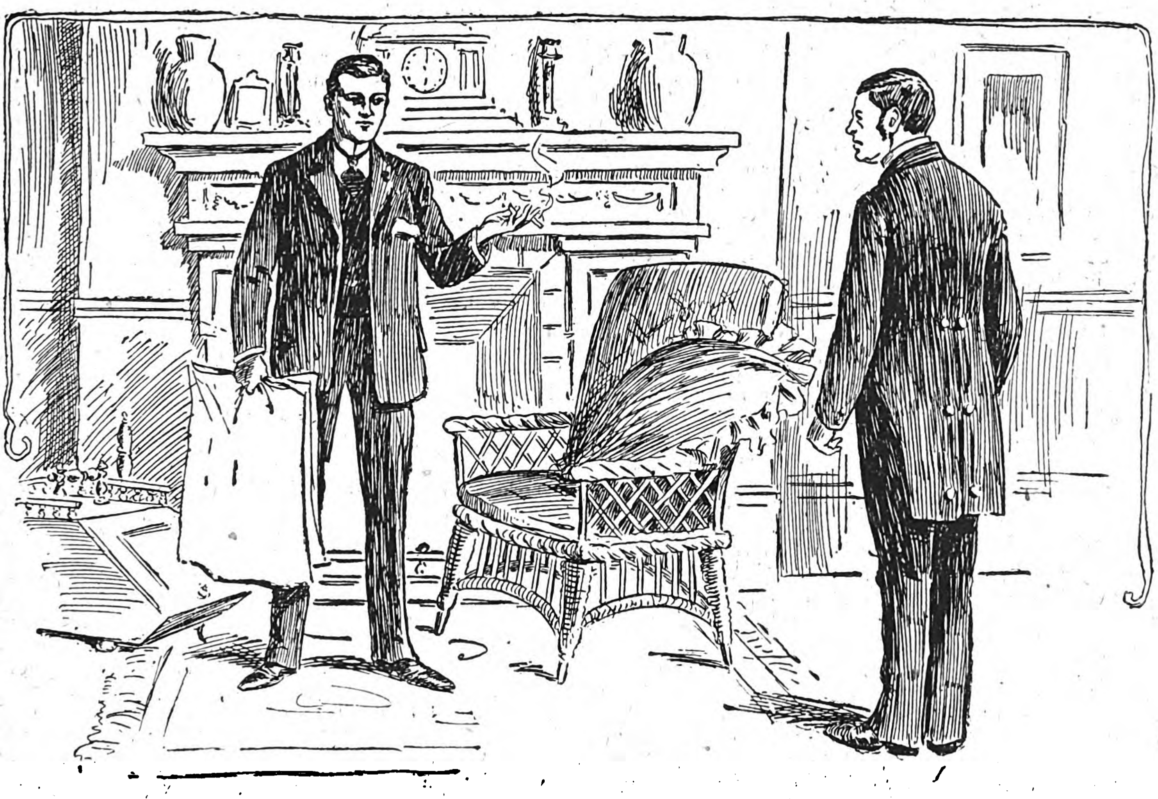
"I have my living to earn, Mr. Chaloner," she replied quietly; and that ended the conversation.

In the days that followed he became more deeply interested than ever. If ever love was born in a man's heart from small beginnings and under commonplace circumstances, it was certainly born in the heart of Martin Chaloner then. His own life had glided on so smoothly and so easily that he had never known, save from a glimpse from the outside now and then, that it had a rough and seamy side to it. And now he came face to face with a frail and delicate slip of womanhood, struggling hard and bravely for mere bread under sordid conditions, the thought of his own lazy strength in comparison put him to shame. He began to believe at last that some curious fate had brought him to the house, and put his purposeless life within the sphere of the girl's influence.

He came suddenly upon her one night, while she was strolling aimlessly, deep in conversation with an elderly man. It was a dark and cold night, with a bitter east wind sweeping the streets, and but few people were about. The two were so deep in conversation that they did not observe him; watching from a little distance he saw the girl's hands clasped upon the man's arm, and saw the man presently turn his head, and stoop and kiss her very tenderly on the lips. Martin Chaloner's feeling that this was some sacred, hidden chapter in the girl's life overcame the strong feeling of curiosity he possessed, and he turned away, wondering what this new mystery might be.

The sound of quick, heavy steps behind him roused him, and he turned swiftly, and ran full tilt against the man he had just seen with the girl. She had disappeared, and the man had been hurrying away without looking where he went. The shock was sufficient to send the stranger's old felt hat from his head; Martin saw, as he uttered a word of apology, that the man was roughly dressed, and had a shrewd, kindly face, and wisps of grey hair pushed back from the lined forehead.

Martin stooped and picked up the hat, and handed it to its owner



"My bag ready, Hobson?" he asked, as the man appeared.

"No offence, no offence, young man," said the other, in a hoarse, cheerful voice. "Thank ye kindly, sir, old Job Rogers ain't the man to take no offence, where none ain't meant. Good night to ye, sir."

Martin Chaloner stood staring after the man as he disappeared up the street. Truly he had not expected to get such an inkling of the hidden chapter of the girl's life as this. Job Rogers! The name was the same as her own; then this man must be a relative—perhaps even her father. But he thought of the girl's gentle and refined voice and manner, and dismissed that idea as absurd.

Meanwhile, with no definite object in view, he lingered on at the house in Regent's Park, with the feeling growing within him more strongly day by day, that he could not leave it and leave her behind to the drudgery of her life. He thought, half-laughingly sometimes, of the change which seemed to have come into his affairs; wondered what some of his aristocratic friends would think if they could know the story.

"Lady Bertha—fairest of widows—you used to be rather fond of me; I wonder what you'd think if you knew that I was spending my days in a lodging-house in London, and my nights in dreams of a lady-help!"

Matters came to a crisis one morning, when Martin Chaloner had risen somewhat earlier than usual, and had gone downstairs to breakfast with the rest. There were other lodgers in the house—called by courtesy "guests"—and, probably from the fact that he had little or nothing to do with them, they eyed him with no particular favour. Moreover, his appearances at the general table were rare, and he was somewhat of a mystery to those in the house.

It happened, on this particular morning, that Mr. Jack Triggs, of whom mention has been made, was in a decidedly bad humour, even for him; Martin noticed that Miss Rogers, who sat in a humble position near the foot of the table, looked somewhat paler and more nervous than usual. As he sat down, with a bow towards the girl, young Triggs scowled at him, and looked across at her.

"Now, then, Rogers, pass the cream, will you?" said that young gentleman loudly. "Why don't you attend to people?"

The girl flushed hotly and hesitated for a moment, and then stretched out her hand towards the cream-jug.

Triggs' strident voice broke in again:

"Oh, you needn't give yourself airs; you're only a servant, you know."

Martin Chaloner got up quickly, and had his hand upon the cream-jug before the girl could touch it.

"Allow me," he said quietly. He walked round to where the youth was sitting, and, before anyone was aware of his intention, had emptied the contents of the jug over that gentleman's well-brushed hair. He set the jug down, and, as Jack Triggs rose up spluttering from the table, faced him resolutely.

"Cream, I think you said," said Martin in a low voice, and looking steadily at the other. "Would you like any more?"

Mrs. Triggs screamed. Mr. Jack Triggs, forgetful alike of his personal safety and his behaviour spluttered out a string of oaths. Martin Chaloner darted out a hand, and caught him swiftly by the collar, and had him out of the room, and into the hall, and was kicking him with much vigour before anyone had fully recovered from their astonishment. Finally, with a last dexterous thrust, he sent him down the short flight of stairs leading to the kitchen, and walked quietly up to his own room.

He did not see the girl until much later in the day, when some little duty compelled her to present herself in his sitting-room. He saw that her eyes were red, as if with weeping; her voice was very low and frightened when she spoke to him. With only the hope to reassure her he sprung up and faced her, and spoke as kindly as possible.

"I'm dreadfully sorry," he said, "that you should have been annoyed by that young blackguard this morning. I really couldn't let it pass, you know. I only hope they won't visit it on you."

"I am very grateful to you, Mr. Chaloner," she said, without looking up at him. "I'm afraid, though, that they will visit it on me, as you say."

Martin Chaloner cleared his throat and came a little nearer to her.

"Look here," he said, "I hate this place, except for you, and I hate to think of your going on working here all your days for such people as these. Won't you let me help you? Won't you let me do something to——"

"Thank you, Mr. Chaloner," she said hurriedly, "but it is quite unnecessary. I am used to the work, and to the people, and such little things as that which happened this morning do not matter; they do not really hurt so much as you would think. Indeed, I shall be all right."

He suddenly put his hands on her slight shoulders, and looked down at her with such a tender smile, that when she raised her eyes quickly to his, the tears flooded them.

"Do you know, little woman," he said, "that I can't bear to think of you having to work for anyone; it doesn't seem right or fitting. Don't be afraid to look at me; I am not such an awful fellow, after all. If I ask you to do something very great and very difficult for me—will you do it?"

"I will do anything that is in my power for you," she replied gratefully.

"This is quite in your power," he said. "Now, don't jump or run away from me, because there's nothing to be frightened at. Won't you leave all this life behind, and let me take care of you? Oh, don't cover your face! I've grown very fond of you; I love you better than any woman I've ever met. And I'm a poor lonely chap, who wants someone to look after him. Won't you at least think about it?"

She tried to escape from his detaining hands, and shook her head. "No—no," she whispered; "you don't understand what you are asking. You don't know anything about me, or about my life. You found me here—a hard-working little drudge—and you're a little sorry for me, and so you say this. I shall never forget how kind you have been to me; no man ever spoke to me before as you have done. But you mustn't think of this again."

"It isn't my pity or my sorrow for you," he said, "although, Heaven knows, I am as sorry as anyone can be. But I love you better than I love anyone on earth."

She turned away resolutely, and held her hand on the handle of the door.

"Indeed, I beg that you will forget that you ever said this to me—that you have ever carried such a thought of me in your mind. There are women in this world whose lot it is to tread one quiet path, and to tread it contentedly to the end; for them are born no tragedies, and love gently passes them by. I am one of them."

"Then you don't believe what I say?" he asked.

"Yes—I believe every word of it," she replied, looking at him steadily. "And I shall remember, with pride and gratitude, all my life, that a good man loved me." She opened the door, and was gone before he could speak.

The next day he missed her; his breakfast was brought up by the untidy servant. On making anxious inquiry of that damsel, she informed him that Miss Rogers had left the house early that morning, and was "never comin' back no more."

"What a brute I am!" he thought as he sat before his untasted breakfast. "I've driven her away; that's what it is. I've persecuted her with my odious attentions, and she's gone away to escape from me. Well, there's one consolation about it, at all events; I'll turn my back on Mrs. Triggs."

He packed his bag and settled with Mrs. Triggs—quieting that lady's volubility in regard to necessary notice by paying her whatever she demanded—and quitted the house. His stolid man-servant received him as though he had just returned from a walk, and he found that nothing of any importance had occurred in his absence.

"You were right, Hobson," he said that night as he sat before the fire, and the servant was setting coffee and cigars at his elbow—"you were perfectly right. New sensations don't do. A man had better be content with what Providence sends him, and not go crying for the moon. Oh, yes, Hobson, you were perfectly right."

Nevertheless, the next day he felt more restless than ever. Whatever he did, wherever he went, the face of the girl seemed to rise before him hauntingly. He pictured her among coarse and common people doing sordid work, and rewarded by sneers and snubs; he thought of her eyes as he had seen them raised to his filled with tears. To Hobson's complete astonishment, he made up his mind on the second day after his return to go away; and started off at an hour's notice, and without any hint as to his destination.

"Sumthink is up with the master," muttered Hobson dejectedly; "I've never seen 'im like this 'ere afore. There can't be a lady in the case; the master's too cautious; but sumthink's up; 'e don't seem to be able to settle down to anythink."

Fortune took Martin Chaloner on this occasion into the country at no very great distance from London. He had determined as a matter of fact upon going much farther; but the train happened to stop at an old-fashioned out-of-the-way station on a hill, with a pretty village nestling in the winter sunlight below it, and in his usual erratic fashion, he made up his mind in a moment that he liked the appearance of the place, flung his bag on to the platform, and jumped out himself. He discovered on inquiry that there was an inn in the place, and set off to find it.

They drew nearer together over the fire.

It proved to be an old rambling place, with low ceilings, and heavy beams and sanded floors; with great open fire-places and comfortable roomy beds; one seemed to hear a shadowy blast from the old coach horns that had echoed in its courtyard in bygone days.

"This isn't so bad a place," said Martin Chaloner as he settled down after a plain dinner before the big fire in the coffee-room. "By Jove! I'll spend Christmas here, in solitary grandeur."

Sitting there in the comfortable warmth he gradually fell into a light slumber; when he awoke he was startled to see the figure of a man sitting opposite to him, and spreading out his hands to the fire. Only half-awake at first Martin Chaloner looked at the man from under his half-closed lids for some seconds, while the man looked steadily at the fire; then Martin leant forward and rubbed his eyes, and planted his hands on his knees and stared at the other, trying dimly to remember where and under what circumstances he had met him before. The man's hat was off, and was lying on the settle beside him; he was an elderly man with grey hair, and a clean-shaven, deeply-lined face. Seeing Martin looking at him, he turned about and smiled, and, making a half-clumsy bow, said:

"Which I feels as you'll excuse me a intrudin' on you, sir, but it bein' a bitter night, and a fire the thing that attracts a man in a way, I thought as I'd look in an' 'ave a glass in comfort like afore turnin' in. I arsks yer pardon, sir, for intrudin'; no offence, sir, I 'ope."

Recollection came upon Martin Chaloner in a flash; he remembered, in an instant, that this was the man he had seen talking to the girl in the dark street—the man with whom he had come into such violent collision, and who had given his name unasked as Job Rogers. Quite eagerly, he seemed to see in this again the finger of Fate, and set himself to work cautiously to question the old fellow. His suggestion of another glass was accepted, after some modest hesitation, by the other, and they drew nearer together over the fire.

"Yer see, sir," began the old man confidentially, "mine's a sort of rovin' life, so to speak—'ere to-day, and t'other place to-morrow, as the Scriptures 'ave it. The show business is my line—comes as near to the legitimate, in a way, as don't make no odds in the reckonin'—only we does it in pennies and tuppences, an' they does it in 'alf-guineas, an' 'alf-crowns. 'Ere we are, sir—that's me—that's old Job Rogers!"

He pulled out from a capacious side-pocket a showy yellow handbill, and spread it out with a look of pride.

"There we are, sir—the Great Richardson Show, as performed before Royalty—together with Varieties. The Varieties comes a bit expensive, and don't always pay as well as they might—but they gives tone to the Show—an' it's tone wot we wants."

Martin Chaloner began to get interested. "There ain't a fair in the country but wot I knows the date of it, an' the best pitch when you gits there. It's rough, an' it's 'ard sometimes, sir; but I wouldn't change with the Queen o' Hengland in 'er palace—God bless 'er. An' then, yer see"—he stared at the fire meditatively—"there's compensations."

"Compensations; I'm afraid I don't quite understand you."

The old man glanced round him cautiously for a moment, and then bent nearer to the other.

"Supposin' you was in my place, guv'nor, an' you knew that when you was a-footin' it through the bitter cold, an' the sleet, an' the mud, an' the rain—or a-trampin' arter the carawan on a boisterin' hot day, with the sun a-boilin' the marrer out o' ye bones, so to speak; suppose you could think, while people was a-lookin' upon yer as a wagabond, an' a nobody—suppose you could think as you 'ad someone, far away in London, among the swells, a-'oldin' 'er own, an' a-treadin' it with the best of them, an' a-showin' 'er pretty face for all the world to look at, an' with never a thing to soil 'er pretty fingers, an' never nothink to do the livelong day but play the pianner, and do them delicate sorts of fancy work wot ladies does when the time 'angs 'eavy? Suppose you 'ad someone like that as was a lady, an' could 'old up 'er 'ead with the best of them, wouldn't that amount to compensation?"

"I suppose it would," said Martin, slowly. "Is there someone like that?"

"Is there? I should just think there was! Years ago, when 'er poor mother died, I swore to myself as she shouldn't never 'ave the 'ardships, an' the worry, an' all the rest of it that I'd 'ad. Yer see, sir, I'm old and tough, an' I likes the life, an' I shouldn't feel comfortable-like, if I woke up in the mornin', an' didn't 'ear the 'osses movin', an' didn't know as I was in the old van. But with a woman it's different; an' there she is—Lord love yer, sir—a lady to 'er finger-tips—an' 'er ole father is proud to git a glimpse of 'er sometimes, an' to know as she's well an' 'appy. It costs a bit, I don't mind sayin'; but I don't grudge a penny of it, an' I sends it to 'er reg'lar."

He got up, and emptied his glass and put on his hat. Martin Chaloner rose also, and held out his hand; the other glanced at his face for a moment, and then grasped the hand.

"Do you stay here long?" asked Martin. "Because, if you do—you might come in and see me again."

"Thank ye, sir; I take it as werry kind. I shall be 'ere for a matter of a day or two longer. I'm pitched down at the end o' the village. Good-night, sir."

Martin waited until the old man's footsteps had died away down the long echoing corridor, and then cautiously opened the door and followed him. He heard him pass out of the front door of the inn, and heard his firm quick tread upon the frosted road outside. He threw his big coat round him, put on his hat, and followed.

"I don't know why I should dog the old boy like this," he thought, "but there's some mystery here I can't understand, and perhaps I shall find out what's become of that sweet-faced girl. I can't rest till I find her; she seems to be carrying about with her, in her little hands, wherever she is, all the best part of me—all that's worth anything. Where is she? The old man thinks she is still in London, for there can be no doubt that he spoke of her to-night. He believes her rich and happy, and I found her slaving away to earn her own living. What does it all mean?"

The night was bright but moonless; only a few stars twinkled far overhead. Martin saw the upright sturdy figure of the old man going before him down the road, and cautiously followed, keeping well in the shadow of the cottages he passed. At the end of the village was a piece of waste common land, on which were set a couple of caravans of the ordinary gipsy type, and another covered van. Some horses were tethered near by, and he heard the bark of a dog as he drew nearer.

The old man had almost reached the first caravan, in the tiny window of which a light glowed, when a figure slipped out from behind it, and came forward swiftly to meet him. Martin Chaloner drew back in the shadow of a tree, and saw the old man stop with a little cry of surprise, and then go quickly forward and take the figure in his arms, and bend and kiss the face. It was the figure of a woman.

They drew away from the caravan, and walked slowly together towards where Martin was hidden. As the girl drew away from the man, and looked up into his face in the starlight, Martin saw the face he had fully expected to see—that of the girl he had met in the lodging-house in Regent's Park. It was quite impossible for him to move without being discovered; he stood quite still, and was forced to listen.

"Daddy," the girl was saying, "you mustn't send me away from you any more; it has all been a mistake. You only did it because you loved me—because you thought that you would make me a lady, and something better than you were yourself. Dear—there is nothing, and no one better than you on earth; and I have come back to you, because I am very, very tired, and because I need you. I remember, when I was a tiny child, how I played about on the grass, among the wheels and the horses, and what a joyous life it was; we've been deceiving ourselves, you and I, Daddy, and we've got to begin again. Daddy, you won't send me back again?"

"My dear, my dear!" exclaimed the old fellow tenderly, patting her head, "you'll break my heart. What have I been working for all these days but to make you a lady; to 'elp you, an' see that you were warm an' comfortable, and that nothink couldn't ever come nigh you, to fret or trouble you. The ole show was good enough for me, dear, but it wasn't good enough for you. Come, what 'as troubled you?"

She hid her head upon his breast and sobbed out her poor little story, of how a man—a gentleman—had been good and kind to her, and had told her that he loved her; of how she had loved him with all her passionate heart in return, and yet had had to leave him, and hide herself from him.

"It's no good, Daddy. All the money in the world, and all the pretending in the world, won't ever make me good enough or fine enough to be his wife, or to take my place by his side. I love him—oh! I can't tell you how much. If I didn't love him quite so well I might have tried to forget all the rest, and have listened to him. But I couldn't do that. Let me stay with you, for a little while, at least; let me think that I am a child again, and that I never tried to pretend I was a lady."

Martin Chaloner had made up his mind that he would slip away quietly, and hear no more; but the fear of again losing sight of the girl, especially after the words he had heard from her lips, was stronger than anything else; he stepped suddenly forward from his hiding-place, and confronted them.

The girl, with a cry, clung to her father; the old man drew his arm about her, and faced the other man angrily.

"You must listen to me for a moment, Mr. Rogers," said Martin, huskily, and at the sound of his voice the girl trembled and hid her face. "When I met you to-night I had no thought that your daughter was so near at hand; I had met her in London, and had learnt to love her. I am the man of whom she speaks, and, even though she should turn from me again to-night, I shall carry the blessed memory of her words with me to my grave. I feared that I should never look upon her face again; but Fate plays such strange tricks with us, and Fate sent me here to you, and brought us again together. I am a poor, idle, wandering dog, who hasn't even the merit that you possess of earning his bread by hard work; mine was all earned for me long before I was born. But your daughter, in spite of all she says, is the sweetest lady under Heaven, and I love her; I tell her so now, in the presence of her father. And I'll never give her up"—he laughed in his old, good-humoured fashion—"if I have to take to the caravan business myself."

The old man had by this time recovered from his astonishment. He nodded his head sympathetically.

"Spoken like a man, sir," he exclaimed, "and spoken like a gentleman."

"Daddy, you won't understand," began the girl, in a low voice.

"Forgive me, it's you won't understand," broke in Martin. "But I won't trouble you to-night; you're tired and upset. Mr. Rogers"—he turned, in his easy, natural fashion, to the old man—"what are we going to do with this young lady to-night? Will you let me take her back to the inn, and ask the landlady to find a room for her?"

"Thank ye kindly, sir; that's the very thing. Now run along, my dear, an' we'll talk about it in the morning. But Lord love ye, sir"—he turned towards Martin—"I'd like to see yer in the show line."

"Don't you make any mistake, old friend; I'd make a first-rate man at the business. Come along, Miss Rogers."

The man and the girl walked for some little distance down the road without speaking.

Martin was the first to break the silence.

"I met your father by accident to-night," he said, "and he told me the whole story of his darling in London, and all that he had done for her; how he had sent her money, and how she lived as a lady, with never a day's work to do."

She hesitated for a moment, and then turned to him, and put her hands on his arm.

"Oh, won't you understand? I thought of him, working hard in all weathers for me, and I could not bear to use the money that he sent me. It's all saved up—every penny of it; and some day I'll give it back to him, and tell him all about it. When he came to see me, he would never come to the house, for fear of shaming me; I used to meet him—God forgive me—in the streets, and he believed that the big house from which I came was my home; that I lived there as an honoured guest, instead of as a servant. And that is why—because it has all been such a blunder—that I want you to forget the words I said to-night, and which you never should have overheard."

He put his hands on her shoulders, as he had done once before, and looked down into her face in the starlight.

"Are you quite sure you want me to go and forget it?" he said.

She looked at him steadily for a moment, and then suddenly crept nearer to him, and bent her face down, and kissed his hands.

"Oh; my love—my dear love!" she whispered.

He took her in his arms, and put his face down, and whispered in reply:

"Do you think I would let you go now? Do you think I would give you up? You must never ask me that again, dear."

Presently she looked up at him, with a smile flitting across her face. "You don't even know my name," she said softly.

"What is it?" he asked.

"It was a name my father loved; he never thought how foolish it might sound in other ears. My name is Cinderella."

"Oh, wise father!" said Martin, laughing and kissing her. "It's the sweetest name in all the world."

They breakfasted joyously together, the two of them, the next morning in the coffee-room of the inn, and afterwards set out to find her father. All the village seemed astir, and people were coming and going in their best clothes; and the bells of the little church up on the hill were ringing out madly.

"Do you know what to-day is?" she asked, looking up into his face.

He looked down at her and pondered a moment, and then suddenly burst out laughing.

"Why—it's Christmas Day!" he exclaimed. "I've set out twice to try and spend Christmas in a new fashion; I didn't know I should spend it in such sweet company."

It was still quite early, and they went on to the end of the village, and through the trees, and so to the common. But when they got there they stopped, and stared at each other in dismay; the caravans were gone!

Without a word to each other, they went forward quickly, and came at last to the place where they stood in the darkness the night before. Martin's quick eye detected a scrap of paper, pinned to the trunk of the tree which had hidden him. He went forward, and took it down. "It's addressed to you," he said, and held it out to her. They stood side by side, and read it together.

"My deer,—This cums to ope as you will have a mery Chrissmas. You need not wurry about your ole dad. All my dreme has cum true, deer, an the ole show will karry me as long as i need eny karrying. He is a gentleman; no one can look in his eye without knowin that. I am better movin. The old van cums nateral to me, and I carnt change now. Youll find this when I'm gorn, an the Lord knows I karry the lightest hart of eny man this Chrissmas morninge. Send yore old dad a bit of the weding cake, and he'll lay it alongside ov your mother's. Good-bye; you are a lady, arter all.—JOB ROGERS."

CHAPTER I.

On the outskirts of the pleasant city of Norwich dwelt an old couple, John and Martha Lovelace by name. For nearly fifty years they had lived in their little cottage, the home that they loved, humble though it was, the scene, moreover of the one great sorrow of their life.

It had happened twenty years ago, when John was a hale and hearty man, and there were no streaks of white in Martha's hair. The Lovelace family were then four in number, for the old couple had been blessed with two children, a boy and a girl.

Dick Lovelace had always been a wild sort of lad, always fond of playing truant at school, of roaming the countryside like an untamed colt, birds'-nesting, and, it must be confessed, poaching, when he ought to have been more profitably employed over his books. And then he had run away for good, one dark night twenty years ago, leaving an almost illegible, badly-spelt note to say that he could bear the hum-drum country life no longer, but had run off to sea.

As is so often the case with such scapegraces, Dick had been the apple of his mother's eye. She was always ready to find some excuse for his wild pranks, and more than once interposed between father and son, when John had proposed the whip as an antidote to some escapade, more flagrantly outrageous than another.

Since that day nothing had been heard of the runaway. John Lovelace had long ago given up any idea of ever hearing of the boy again. Not so Martha. In her heart of hearts she always carried the belief that some day they would have news of the prodigal.

And the daughter? What had become of her? The same spirit of restlessness that seemed to have infected Dick, had invaded her young life. True, she had not stolen away like a thief in the night, yet she, too, had shaken the dust of the parental cottage off her feet, had gone to London, and had, by dint of the utmost exertion, won a place for herself upon the stage. As Jenny Lovelace she had made her name familiar to many a provincial stage, and now the trend of events had brought her to Norwich, and the proximity of her childhood's days.

Yet it must not be imagined that Jenny had allowed herself to forget entirely the old couple who had been responsible for her existence. From time to time she had sent them presents of money, with a short note to say that she was well and happy. Sometimes too, her heart would tell her that she was doing wrong in not going down to the little cottage in person and reminding the old parents of her existence in some tangible form. And yet she never went. Neither had she confided to any one, not even to Hazel Harlow, her bosom friend, the true story of her parentage.

It was a cold December morning. A bright fire burnt on the earth and threw a cheerful glow upon the simple furniture of the cottage kitchen. In front of the fire, smoking a well-blackened clay pipe, sat old John Lovelace. Martha, like the good old housewife she was, was bustling about, making the spotless cleanliness of the place still more spotless.

Suddenly there came a sharp rat-tat at the door. The next moment the latch was lifted, and an elderly man in the garb of a postman thrust in his head.

"Mornin'," he cried cheerfully, "mornin' John, mornin' to ye, Mrs. Lovelace. I've a letter for ye. A letter from furrin' parts."

Here was a surprise indeed. A letter from foreign parts. The postman disappeared, leaving the old woman peering with an almost frightened expression at the crinkly yellow envelope, adorned with an altogether unfamiliar and novel postage-stamp.

In the meanwhile John had risen from his chair, and had placed a pair of huge horn-rimmed spectacles upon his nose.

"Let's have a look at it, mother," he cried, "Who on earth can be writing to ye from over the sea?"

But Mrs. Lovelace's face had assumed an almost ashen hue. She sank down into a chair, and murmured in a low voice: "It's Dick, John. I'm sure it must be. Who else could it be? I knew we should hear of him again. Can it be true? Can it be true?"

John Lovelace took hold of the letter and gazed with awe at the crabbed, unfamiliar handwriting. Then, with trembling hand, he tore open the cover.

"Sit ye down, Marthy," he said gently. "Let me read it out. Maybe it's from some one else."

But the first words of the letter proved how true the old mother's instincts had been.

"Dear Mother"—a cry fell from Martha's lips. "I knew it, I knew it!" she cried, and the tears streamed down her withered cheeks. "Praise God, it's our Dick. Read on, father, read on."

"Dear Mother," the old fellow went on in a voice that trembled suspiciously. "I expect you will be very surprised to hear from me after all these years. I don't even know if this will find you. I hope it will, and that you and father are still living in the old cottage. For I'm coming home to see you. I've been a bad son to you, but I've never forgot you, and I hope you'll forgive me when you see me and hear my news. I never was much of a letter writer, so I shan't say any more. In a day or so I hope to be with you for I shall be here nearly as soon as my letter, when I shall tell you all that has happened. With love to you both and Jenny, I am your affec. son, RICHARD LOVELACE."

For a few moments after the reading of this somewhat meagre note the old couple sat motionless, gazing into one another's face. It seemed almost too good to be true. Dick was coming back. The silence of twenty long years had been broken, Dick was coming back.

John was the first to speak. "He sends his love to Jenny," he said somewhat huskily. "I wonder where Jenny is, mother. We heard from her not so very long ago. She sent us five pounds. She's been a good daughter to us has Jenny. Only I wish we'd seen something of her. It's a long time since she were here. I should like to write to her and tell her that Dick's coming back."

CHAPTER II.

"I'VE a long confession to make to you, Hazel."

It was Jenny Lovelace who spoke. The two girls were seated in the sitting-room of the lodgings they had taken in Norwich in view of the week they were to spend in that city, before proceeding to London for the final engagement of the Good Samaritan Company on tour.

"A confession," answered Hazel gaily. "Well, I'll promise you that you'll find a good father confessor in me. Begin, and let me see whether I can give you absolution."

But Jenny's face was very grave. Hazel looked at her in some consternation.

"What's amiss, Jenny?" she asked sympathetically.

"First of all," came the low-voiced answer, "I've followed in your footsteps and become engaged."

Hazel uttered a glad little cry. "Oh, Jenny," she said, "who to? I only hope he will make you as happy as Eric has me"—for the announcement of Hazel's engagement to Eric Monteith had now been publicly announced—"and when did it happen? And why didn't you tell me before?"

"Because it only happened last night, between the second and third acts of the show. It's to Raymond Venables. He asked me to marry him, and though I've never said a word to anyone, yet, I've cared for him a long time, only I didn't think he cared for me. But I asked him to say nothing about it until I'd had a talk with you. For oh, Hazel—"—the girl's voice was quite the reverse of what would have been expected from a newly-engaged person—"I'm not at all happy."

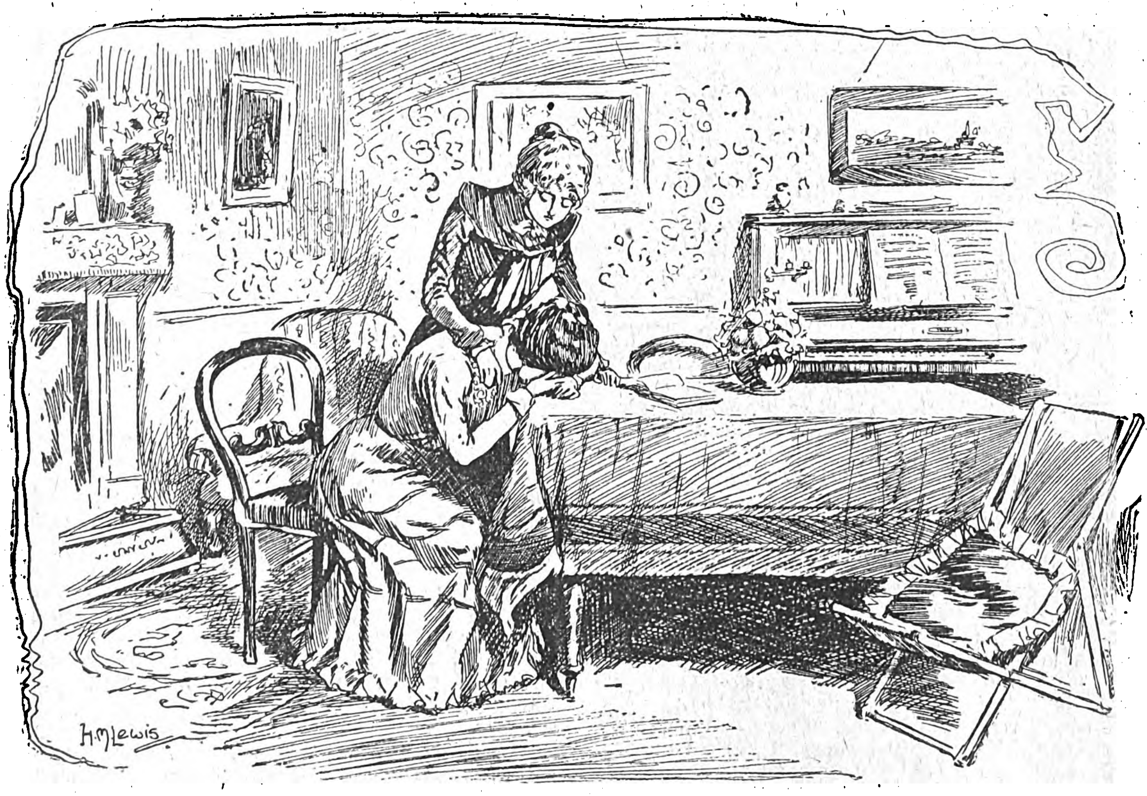
"Not at all happy!" echoed the other in a voice of real concern, rising and crossing to her friend's side. "Why, Jenny, dear, what on earth makes you talk like that? If you care for Raymond Venables, and he cares for you, surely nothing else can matter?"

"But that's not all," came the reply, in a low voice. "I've another confession to make. Haven't you ever wondered why I never spoke of my parents, Hazel?"

"No," answered Hazel stoutly, "It was quite enough for me to have you for my friend without bothering about your private affairs. What has that got to do with your engagement?"

"Just this, that Raymond thinks that I am well-born, and well connected, and I can't bear to tell him the truth that my parents are just simple cottagers, quite poor people. Oh, Hazel, I've been very wicked. And now I feel that I must tell him, and I can't help thinking that it will make a difference, that Raymond will never forgive me for not having told him before. And besides, it has been so cruel and cowardly on my part, to take no notice, or hardly any, of the poor old people that were responsible for bringing me into the world," and Jenny broke down entirely and burst into a flood of tears.

As can be well imagined, Hazel was seriously perturbed at such an outburst on the part of her friend.



Jenny broke down entirely, and burst into a flood of tears.

Little by little she drew the whole story from Jenny's lips, of the old couple living so near to the very place in which they then were, of how Dick Lovelace had run away, and how Jenny herself had followed her brother's example, though not in quite so covert a manner.

Hazel was rather at a loss to know what to say when Jenny had come to the end of her confession, and after a few moments' silence she said softly. "There is only one thing for you to do, Jenny. Tell Raymond everything that you have told me. If he really loves you he won't mind the fact that your parents are what they are. Go and see your parents and try and make up for having neglected them so long. I will go with you with pleasure. And why not ask Raymond to go too?"

"But I care for him so much," sobbed the other. "And suppose he should be angry with me for having deceived him. Supposing his love for me was to go when he found out how heartless I've been. It makes me feel a coward, Hazel."

"Then let me tell him for you?" went on Hazel. "Let me explain the whole story? And then to-morrow we will go and see your father and mother. You'll see that Raymond won't think any the worse of you because of an accident of birth.

True to her word, Hazel went off at once in search of the manager, whom she found in his office.

"Jenny has told me her news," she began, "and I need hardly say how happy I am. I think you are a very lucky man, Mr. Venables. But Jenny is not altogether happy, and I have come here on her behalf."

The manager looked puzzled, and somewhat perturbed. "Jenny unhappy?" he queried. "Why?"

In as few words as possible, Hazel explained the situation. When she had finished Venables held out his hand with a smile.

"If it's nothing worse than that," he said cheerily, "I don't mind. To be frank with you, Miss Harlow, my own father was a respectable cheesemonger in the Borough, in London. He's dead and gone now, poor old chap, and I've never talked about him, not because I was a bit ashamed of him, but merely because I don't see the use of obtruding one's private affairs into undue notice, especially on the stage. So you can give Jenny a kiss from me, and tell her just what I've told you, and we'll go and see her old people just whenever she's a mind. Why, hang it all, I suppose I ought to ask them to give their consent to my marrying their daughter."

CHAPTER III.

It was the second day after the arrival of Dick's letter. John and Martha had just finished their mid-day meal, and were seated before the fire, talking in low voices about the one topic that was now of any interest to them, the unexpected return of the long-lost son.

It was raining in torrents. Suddenly there came a knock at the door of the cottage. John started to his feet. The colour faded from Martha's face. The old couple exchanged glances. Neither spoke a word.

With tremulous steps Lovelace went across to the door, and threw it open. The wet rain blew in upon his face. A man was at the door, a tall well-knit figure, who entered the cottage almost stealthily. It was then seen that he was clad in the blue reefer jacket and trousers of a merchant sailor.

"Dick!" With a cry, Martha rose to her feet, and tottered across the room to fling herself into the sailor's arms. "Dick, my boy, is it really you?"

"Yes, mother, it's I." The voice seemed almost painfully rough. "I'm wet through. Isn't it awful weather? I've come straight on from London, and it's just as bad there."

A sharp stab of pain seemed to penetrate the old woman's heart. As for John, he could only stand as though spellbound, and regard the dripping figure before him. Was this the homecoming? Was this the way to re-enter the home that had been unvisited for twenty years?

The young man, a sturdy, brown-faced fellow enough, and by no means ill-favoured of face, turned awkwardly to his father.

"Hello, dad," he said, with an attempt at a smile, "how are you? You must excuse my coming on to you like this, but the fact is I had an accident in London. I had only just enough money to pay my fare. The fact is"—he spoke hurriedly, as though constrained to talk—"I haven't done what I hoped to do abroad. I'm stony broke. Nearly twenty years knocking about from 'Frisco to Sydney, and from Rio to the Bay of Biscay, is calculated to take the stuffing out of a fellow."

The old couple gazed helplessly at the young man, trying to take in what he meant. Then John, feeling that it was incumbent upon him to say something, remarked mechanically: "Ay, I suppose you're right, them furrin' parts must be something terrible. Why did ye run away, Dick?"

Dick shrugged his shoulders with a ghastly attempt at a smile. Then he went on in a reckless voice: "Hang it all, I don't know. I was a fool. It's a dog's life I've had, a dog's life."

Martha's tears were flowing freely now. She brushed aside the evidence of her despairing disappointment, and faltered out:

"Why, Dick, we thought—your letter said—you—"

"Yes, I know, I know," cried Dick, trying to keep his voice calm, "I wanted to let you down as gently as possible. The fact is, I've come the Dickens of a cropper. I've had a fearful streak of bad-luck! I want money, and I thought that perhaps you'd be able to help me. I'll pay it all back again in a day or two."

Dead silence followed these words. Then John advanced to the younger man's side. "Is that why you wrote to your mother," he said, in a low choked voice, "for money? You ask for money before you've told a word about how you've got on all these years, before you've even given your mother a kiss?"

"I can't help it," the sailor said fiercely. "I'm at my wits' ends. And to whom can a man come when he's down on his luck if it's not to the man to whom he owes his existence?"

This last speech proved too much for poor old Martha. She sank down in a chair, and burying her face in her hands, gave herself up to a paroxysm of weeping.

As for John, he seemed like a man dazed. He stood and looked at Dick with drawn, white face, trying to take in what it all meant. Then he cleared his throat and asked: "What do ye want money for, Dick? What bother have ye got into?"

"I can't tell you. I can only tell you this, that I'm in a fearful hole, and if I don't have a hundred pounds before to-morrow, I shall be clapped into gaol. It's no fault o' mine."

The old man answered him never a word. He turned away, and opening a door that led out of the tiny apartment, left mother and son alone.

The old woman raised her head as her husband disappeared. "Dick, Dick," she wailed, "What does it all mean? Are you really the little Dick that ran away from home twenty years agone?"

The other nodded. "I'm sorry," he began almost shamefacedly, "but Fate's been too hard for me. I can't help it. I'm broke."

"And so is my heart!" moaned the old woman. "This is the homecoming we have looked forward to so much."

"Why won't you understand?" broke in the man roughly, "What else was left for a poor broken wretch such as I to do? It's you who drove me off in the first place, and now you expect me to come back and deceive you about my real position."

"But your letter, Dick, remember what you said in that, how that—" but again she was cut short.

"What's the good of perpetually harping on the same string? It's facts we've got to deal with, not useless sentiment. I hoped when I ran away that I should come back rich, and be able to help you. But I can't, so you had much better do for me what I would have done for you if I had been able, set me on my legs again. It's only a temporary loan I want. I'll pay you back," but the re-entry of the old man cut short any further excuses which the young fellow would have put forward.

Lovelace had a coarse canvas bag in his hands, which he threw down upon the old oak table of the kitchen.

"Here's all the money we have," he said, in a hollow voice. "It's about a hundred and fifty pounds, and I thought as how it would just do to keep the missus and me from the Union. But if it is to save you from disgrace, Dick, well, you must take it, and I must try and make a fresh start."

It was for this, then, that Dick Lovelace had returned after twenty years.

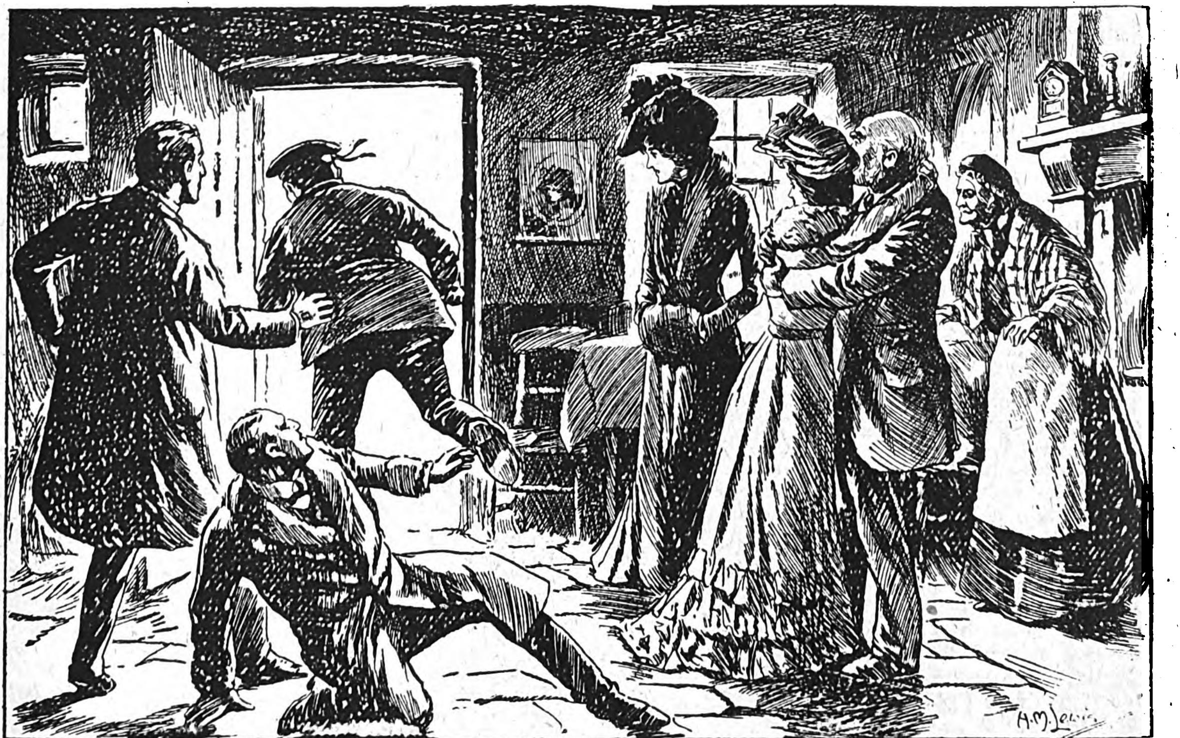
CHAPTER IV.

Upon a bed in the accident ward of the London Hospital, lay the motionless form of a man. So still he lay that the casual observer would have been perfectly justified in believing him to be dead. His grey face was swathed in a bandage, that was bound turbanwise across his forehead. Over him bent a young doctor, beside whom was standing a nurse in uniform.

"A bad case," the surgeon was saying, "and he's been unconscious all night. He's concussed badly, and there's an ugly wound upon his chest that was only prevented from being fatal by the merest accident. He may be unconscious for another twenty hours, or—" he shrugged his shoulders with the air of a man who was used to passing sentence on such desperate cases as these without more ado than that of an expressive shrug. "If there's any change in his condition, nurse, let me know at once."

The 'sister' gazed down upon the motionless figure with compassion. He was quite a young man, with thick chestnut curls behind the bandage, and a clean-shaven handsome face. His arms were tattooed profusely, for he was a sailor who had been picked up in a quiet street off the docks, and brought to the hospital for dead.

"Poor young fellow," the nurse murmured to herself. "How terribly sad to think that he should have been struck down like this." She was only a probationer, and was not yet accustomed to all the terrible scenes that the servants of a big London hospital are daily called upon to witness.



He dashed out through the door, sweeping both Eric and Venables off their feet.

Suddenly a long shuddering cry left the man's lips. He gave a faint movement. The nurse was instantly all alert.

A faint colour came back to his grey face. "I'd better call Dr. Ramsden," she muttered.

By the time the doctor returned to the sick man's bedside there was a distinct change in the condition of the patient. His lips were moving fitfully. Snatches of incoherent sentences left his mouth. The delirium that so often accompanies a bad concussion of the brain had seized hold of him.

"Keep her before it. Let her run—the dirty weather can't last—this is only half-a-gale—there's no beating to windward in this, though—" the poor fellow was evidently aboard ship once more.

Then his voice changed. "I tell you it was my fault, Bill," he murmured and so low that it was all that the doctor could do to catch what he said. "It was all my fault but when I get home again, I mean to make up for all I did—better stow away some of that canvas, sir—we shall have our sticks carried away if not," and so off again into the technicalities of a man before the mast.

Then suddenly his tones changed again, and he plunged into the recital of a story that made the doctor listen with every nerve strained, a story that suddenly gave him a clue to the whole black business that must have been the cause of bringing him into the great hospital.

It was just as if the doctor had suddenly been translated to the forecastle of a sailing-ship. The delirious man addressed him by name, the name of 'Bill.'

"Listen, Bill," he said, "and I'll tell you why I'm going back to England. Then you can judge for yourself, and you've been a good mate to me, Bill. That's why I tell you what I've never told a soul since I made my pile."

The doctor listened to the story with bated breath. Then he took a note-book out of his pocket, and made a note of what he had heard.

"This is a business for the police, not a doctor," he muttered, "but at least what the poor fellow says ought to be tested. And for the sake of what I've just listened to, I'll see the matter through myself."

True to his word, as soon as his duties would allow him, Dr. Ramsden went round to a neighbouring police-station, and laid the case, as he imagined it to be, before the divisional superintendent. The official heard him out attentively, for Ramsden was known and respected in the neighbourhood.

"There's certainly something in what you say, sir," said the superintendent, when Ramsden had finished his story, and I'll telephone to headquarters at once. From all accounts, unless the poor fellow was romancing in his delirium, the matter calls for urgent attention. Anyhow, I'll do what I can to have the matter thoroughly sifted."

CHAPTER V.

"Well, it's no good waiting for the weather to think better of itself," said Hazel. "We've waited two days now. If we go on like this we shall find ourselves at the end of our tether, and on the way to London. What do you say, Jenny? Shall we go and see your parents this afternoon? I'm longing to see them, and I'm sure you ought to be doing the same."

"So am I," answered Jenny in a subdued tone," and yet I can't help looking forward to the visit with a certain amount of apprehension. Ever since I had that talk with you about it Hazel, I've been thinking how almost criminal it has been of me to neglect them so long. And now that you and Raymond have been so good to me about it, why it makes my conduct stand out in all the more horrid a light. And yet I do long to see them and ask for forgiveness. I should like, too, to try and make up in some way for the long years of neglect."

"I'm awfully glad to hear you speak like that, Jenny," replied the other gently, "because I must acknowledge that your conduct has not been all it should have been I can't help feeling how awfully sad and lonely it must have been for them both all these years, with their only son and daughter away from them. I suppose you've never heard anything of your brother since he ran away," for Jenny had told the story of her poor old parents to her friend.

"Not a word, I'm afraid he must be dead. Oh, Hazel, how wicked and thoughtless I've been. Yes, let's go this afternoon. Raymond and Eric will be round here directly. So let's get ready."

Hardly were the words out of her mouth before the two young men were announced.

Hazel at once told them that Jenny and she were desirous of making the expedition to the cottage that had been the former's home, and needless to say, both the lovers were willing to fall in with the plans of their respective brides to be.

"But we can't walk there in this weather," said Eric, "wait till I go and fetch a carriage from the "Maid's Head," a plan, needless to say, that found ready favour with the two girls.

There was but scanty conversation between the quartette during the drive that took them through Norwich, and out into the open country. Each was fully occupied in his or her own reflections. Upon all the feeling lay heavy that they were in a way about to participate in a particularly solemn event, though as is so often the case, the reality was to be far more poignant than the anticipation.

At last the carriage came to a halt. Eric was the first to alight, to find himself standing in a lonely, rain-swept road, opposite a small thatched cottage that was set back from the road, and with a trim little garden facing it.

Giving directions for the carriage to await their coming out, Eric helped the ladies out in silence.

Jenny was very pale. "Come on," she whispered to Hazel, who stood silently sympathetic at her side, "Let us go inside."

They walked up to the weatherbeaten door, with the two men following close at their heels. The sound of voices within caused them to pause irresolutely. A man's voice rang out with startling distinctness, in rough, almost fierce accents: "Thank you, dad, it's only for a day or two. I'll repay it. It's a rum sort of home coming, but—well, what's the use of crying over spilt milk?"

To the four outside the words could be heard as plainly as though they were inside the house itself. They stole furtive glances at each other. Then another voice, a quavering and aged one, evidently a woman's, sent the blood into Jenny's face, and caused her to hold her breath in almost fear.

"But you're not going, Dick?" the old voice wailed out, "You haven't come back after all these years only to go away again?"

The words seemed to galvanise Jenny into sudden action. "Dick!" she gasped out, "Merciful Heaven, it's Dick come back! What can it all mean?" And the next moment she had flung open the door, and stormed inside.

In the centre of the kitchen, with a coarse canvas bag in his right hand, a man was standing, a young fellow with a tanned face, clad in seaman's garb. On either side of him stood her father and mother, both with grief-stricken countenances.

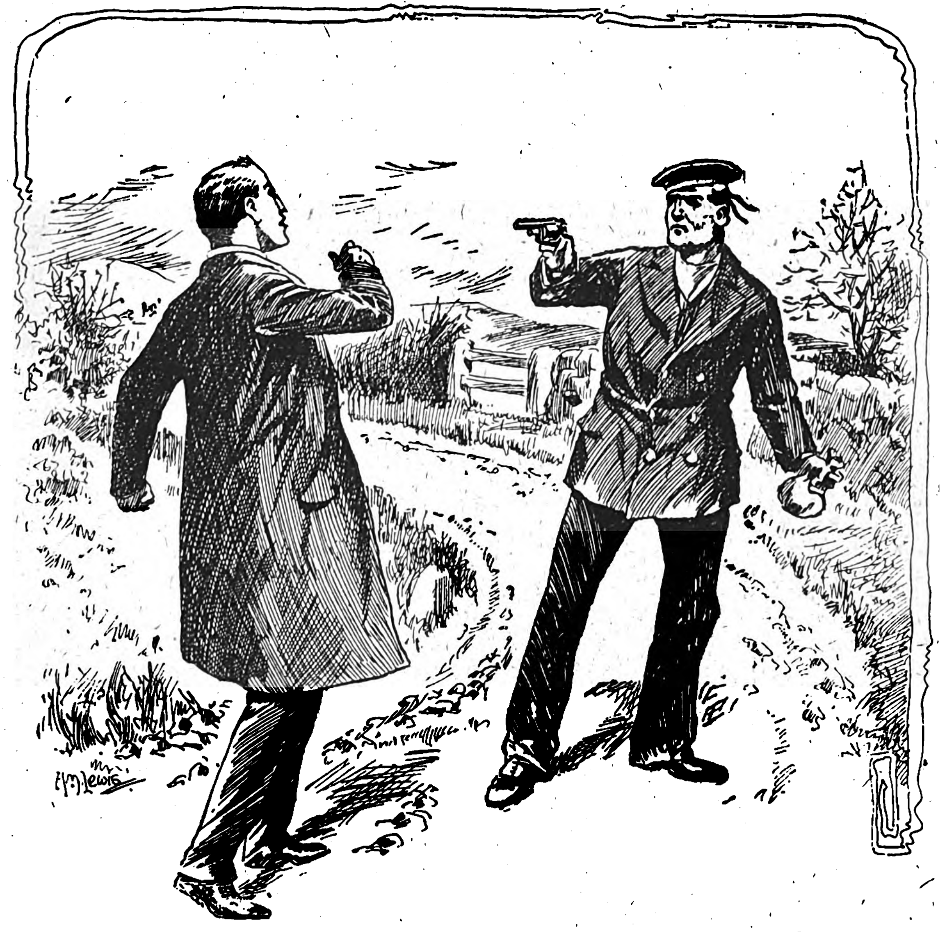
As Jenny entered, the young fellow turned round with a quick lithe action, and, seeing the other three beside her, uttered an exclamation of the purest astonishment.

"What does this mean?" cried Jenny, "Is this Dick? Father, mother, don't you know me? I'm Jenny, your Jenny, come to see you."

"Jenny!" It was John Lovelace's voice. He tottered forward, and held out his arms. The next moment Jenny's head was upon his breast.

Then Dick Lovelace did an extraordinary thing. He gave vent to a cry of rage, and springing forward, the canvas bag still clenched firmly in his right hand, dashed out through the door, sweeping both Eric and Venables off their feet with the impetuosity of his movement.

Eric found his feet in an instant. His quick brain began to have some faint glimmering of the true state of affairs. He threw one swift glance around him. The next moment he had dashed out through the open door, and was away in hot pursuit of the runaway.



The next moment a revolver was pointed at Monteith's head.

The memory of the days when he had first won laurels upon the cinder path at Oxford came back to him, as with elbows against his sides, bounding forward upon his toes with all the elegant ease of a practised sprinter, he set himself to the task of running the other man down.

It was a strange race. Neither was it long before the fugitive discovered that he was pursued.

A glance over his shoulder as he sped along the road heavy with mire, showed him the quick, strenuous figure of Monteith bounding along in his wake with his long, easy, practised stride.

"The going's more heavy than I care about," ran Eric's unspoken thoughts, "and I'm shockingly out of training for a cross-country contest like this. And that fellow can run too. I haven't gained much upon him yet. I wonder what he's got inside that canvas bag. He seems to clutch it pretty tightly. But I think I'm pulling him back slowly."

Slowly the gap between the two lessened. Inch by inch Eric drew up to the runaway. A wild feeling of exultation seized hold of him. He knew that he had worn his man down at last.

Neither was the other slow to realise this fact himself. He threw a look over his shoulder again. Another ten yards, and his unknown hunter would have closed with him.

With a cry of baffled rage and fury he spun suddenly round and faced Monteith. His hand went to his breast, the hand that was unencumbered by the canvas bag that had already aroused Eric's curiosity, and that contained, as we know, the hard-earned savings of poor old John Lovelace. The next moment a revolver was pointed at Monteith's head. But Eric saw the movement in time. He ducked quickly as the shot rang out. A bullet whistled over his head. Then, before the fellow had time to fire again, Monteith's arms were round his middle, and he was thrown violently to the ground.

His head came against a big stone in the roadway, effectually knocking out what little resistance was left in him.

The race was over, the victory was with the trained athlete.

CHAPTER VI.

When Eric got back to the little cottage, after having disposed of his captive at a neighbouring farm, securely bound until he could send the police to apprehend him, with a substantial guarantee to the farmer of his own bona-fides, it was to find that yet another actor had appeared upon the scene, in the person of a Scotland-Yard detective.

The canvas bag Eric also brought back. The story he was to hear had best be told in the detective's own words.

Doctor Ramsden was responsible for this, which was in fact the substance of the delirious man's story in the hospital.

"After the poor chap had raved a bit," the detective said, "he suddenly changed his voice. He seemed to think that he was aboard ship again, and talking to a mate named Bill. As near as I can remember, this is what the doctor said came from his lips:

"'I ran away from home twenty years ago, Bill. I left my poor old father and mother, without caring a bit what became of them. I got to South America, and there as you know, I made my pile. Thank goodness that the money's safely banked. We've been good pals, you and I, Bill, and I've told you all about the old folks, and where they live, haven't I? Yes, so sure as my name's Dick Lovelace, I'll get back to Norwich—why, what's the matter, Bill?—what's that you say? ah, my head.'"

"And then the poor fellow set to raving again, but the doctor had heard enough. He saw it all. How that the poor fellow had confided in his false friend, who must have knocked him on the head, and come off to Norwich, to try and rob the people whom he knew would be ready to believe he was their son, as they hadn't seen him for twenty years."

The detective's audience had listened to him spellbound. After he had finished, poor old Martha broke out afresh into a terrible outburst of weeping. It all seemed so unreal, so horribly incredible to her. Small wonder that her simple old mind refused to take in the full meaning of the dark story. Jenny was sobbing in her father's arms. Yet he found heart to whisper.

"Then it wasn't our Dick after all. Thank God for that."

But it was not until many weeks after that the real Dick Lovelace was enabled, when he slowly struggled back to consciousness and health, to supply the full details of the sinister story.

It appeared that the false Dick's real name was Bill Adams, and that he was the mate of the vessel that had brought young Lovelace back to England. Dick had first met Adams in Rio, and his honest heart warming up to a fellow countryman in that far-distant land, he had taken him fully into his confidence, and told him all about the old people towards whom his footsteps were now bent. Apparently Adams was a man absolutely without principle, a man, too, who was heavily in debt. He must, from Dick's story, have retained the impression that the old couple in Norwich were in far better circumstances than they really were.

For it seemed incredible that he should have risked so much for the hope of such small plunder that he could get from old John and his wife.

But Fate, had proved too strong for Bill Adams. He had shot his bolt, and his own villainy had brought him to the ground.

The old couple were rather overwhelmed when Venables told them the real reason that had brought him to see them, how that he had come to ask them if he might pay his addresses to Jenny with a view of early matrimony. It was John who answered him.

"She's always been a good daughter to us," he said after a pause, "and I hope as how you'll make her happy, sir. I'm sure our Jenny's fit to marry the highest gentleman in the land. She ain't rough, like me. She's a lady. I gives her to you, Mr. Venables, with an old man's blessing."

* * * * *

It was a clear cold morning in January. The scene is again the old cottage where John and Martha are alone.

There came a quick rat-tat-tat at the door. With surprising agility for a man of his years, John sprang from his chair and threw it open. A man entered the room, followed by a girl.

"Father, mother, it's I really this time, your son Dick come back to you safe and sound."

"Dick!" The word fell from the lips of the two old people simultaneously. The next moment the young fellow had his strong arms round them, tears of joy were running down old Martha's furrowed cheeks.

Then Dick spoke. "I've brought some one with me, mother," he said gently, "someone I want you to care for very much for my sake. I've brought you a new daughter, the woman who pulled your son back to life after Bill Adams had done his best to kill me. Maggie, this is mother and father. This is Maggie"—to the old people he spoke now—"who was my nurse in the hospital, and who has promised to become my wife."

Then Dick drew his old parents to their chairs in the chimney corner, and with his sweetheart by his side, told them the story of the twenty years he had spent out there across the seas.

"And I am rich, now," he said in conclusion, "there's no need for you to bother any more about the future. There's quite enough for all of us. I'm going to take a farm down here, and you and dad, mother, have got to come and live with Maggie and me. We've settled all that between us, Maggie and I, so you needn't think that you'll be putting us out, or anything like that. You shall have your own rooms in the house, and dad can help me to get straight, and Maggie says she wants you to teach her housekeeping, mother."

Before the end of the month, Maggie and Dick were married, and John and Martha were installed in their new quarters as their son's guests for the remainder of their lives.

The remainder of the week at Norwich passed away uneventfully enough so far as The Good Samaritan Company were concerned.

The end of the tour was now in sight. Next week would see the Company in London, to fulfil a final engagement at the Coronet Theatre in Notting Hill.

And after the tour was really over, with the dawn of the New Year, the year that was to bring such sweet content to old John Lovelace and his wife, there was to be a double wedding, when Eric and Hazel, Raymond Venables and Jenny Lovelace, were to enter upon a new life as wedded couples.

(Next week's "Short Stories" will contain the final adventure of Hazel Harlow in her theatrical career. In it Hazel will make her bow for the last time before a public of readers who have evidently followed her adventures with the keenest appreciation and interest, as the numerous letters received on the subject have testified. This episode will be found to be no less enthralling than its forerunners, relating, as it does the last desperate attempt of Hazel's most hated enemy to bring about her undoing.)

Detective Competition.

First Prize . . . £5.

Second to Eleventh Prizes 10s. each.

And Numerous Other Prizes of Books and Pencil-cases.

Conditions.

(1.) The first prize will be awarded to the competitor who sends in the most complete list. The second to eleventh prizes will be awarded to the senders of the ten next most complete lists, and so on.

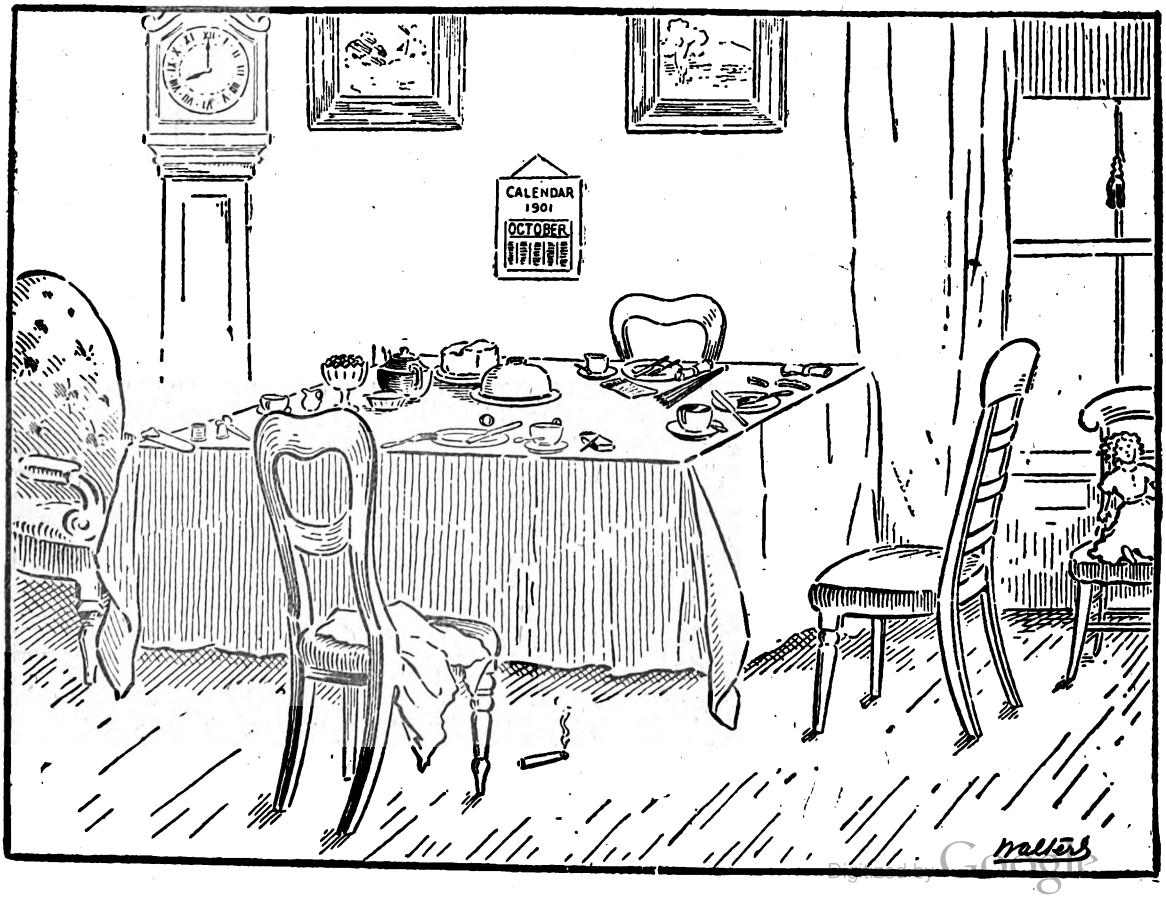
(2.) Send your attempts, written on one side of the paper only, in an envelope marked "Detective," to Short Stories, 18 Henrietta Street, Strand, London, W.C., so as to arrive by first post on Tuesday, December 31st.

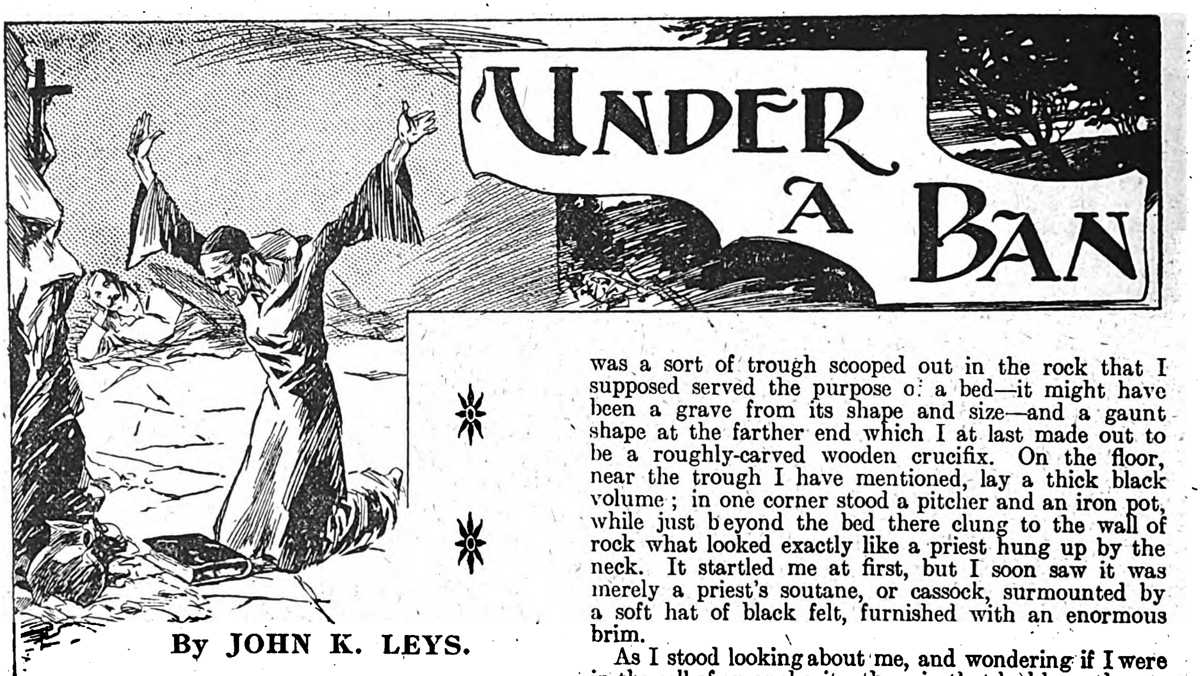
(3.) In the event of a tie, the prizes will be divided at the Editor's discretion, and competitors must only enter on that understanding.

Below is given the picture of a room from which the number of occupants, their habits and peculiarities can be gathered. What you have to do is to write your answers to the following questions.

1. (a) Number of adults, if any. (b) Why?
2. (a) Number of children, if any. (b) Why?
3. (a) Nature of meal. (b) Why?
4. (a) Who of them, if any, is left-handed? (b) Why?
5. (a) Who of them, if any, is careless? (b) Why?
6. (a) Who of them, if any, is very tidy? (b) Why?
7. (a) Who of them, if any, has a moustache? (b) Why?
8. (a) Who of them, if any, has bad sight? (b) Why?
9. (a) In which chair, if any, was a female sitting? (b) Why?
10. (a) In which chair, if any, was a young man sitting? (b) Why?

For example, the answer to question No. 7 should be written: 7. (a) The man who occupies the chair at the end of the table facing the arm-chair. (b) He has a moustache-cup before him.





UNDER A BAN

By JOHN K. LEYS.

SOME years ago I was in Mexico prospecting for silver. Silver mines were more worth having in those days than they are now; and on the whole I did pretty well. The adventure I am going to tell happened to me in the early eighties, when I was wandering, a lonely and disappointed man, among the peaks of the Sierra Madre.

It was growing towards dusk, and I should have lost my way if it had not been for the fact that all ways were much the same to me just then. I knew the direction I was going in, and that was all. I had seen nothing but some wretched coyotes all day, and had no prospect but that of camping out with only a morsel of jerked beef for supper, when I was surprised at seeing a bright flame on the mountain side, a little to the right, and some distance above me.

Without an instant's hesitation I made for the fire, thinking, of course, that it had been made by a homeless wanderer like myself; when I saw to my surprise that it was built in front of an adobe, or mud hut, such as are common in that part of the country.

The strange thing was to see a human habitation in that desolate region, some miles from the nearest village, twenty-nine from the nearest township. The hut was built under the lee of a rock which formed one of its walls. It was, in fact, what is called a lean-to. I peered about as well as the gathering darkness would allow me, but could see no one.

Quietly dismounting, I went forward, holding my horse's bridle in one hand, and a loaded revolver in the other. But I walked right up to the door of the hut without seeing any one.

I was surprised at this, for the state of the fire showed that the man who had built it could not be very far away; but I was yet more astonished when I lifted the sheet of bark that served for a door, and glanced inside the hovel. None of the rude furniture common in camp life was to be seen—no deal boxes made up to serve as tables, no stump chairs, no rough shelving, no mining tools, no whisky-bottle candle-stick. Instead, there was a sort of trough scooped out in the rock that I supposed served the purpose o: a bed—it might have been a grave from its shape and size—and a gaunt shape at the farther end which I at last made out to be a roughly-carved wooden crucifix. On the floor, near the trough I have mentioned, lay a thick black volume; in one corner stood a pitcher and an iron pot, while just beyond the bed there clung to the wall of rock what looked exactly like a priest hung up by the neck. It startled me at first, but I soon saw it was merely a priest's soutane, or cassock, surmounted by a soft hat of black felt, furnished with an enormous brim.

As I stood looking about me, and wondering if I were in the cell of an anchorite, the rain that had been threatening to fall all the afternoon came down in a torrent, a deluge that forced every living thing to seek for shelter. The fire was reduced in a moment to a heap of smouldering ashes, and my horse, poor fellow, nosed his way past me into the hut.

I backed him up against the rock, where there was just room for him to stand, and I had scarcely done so when the dark interior was made yet more dark by a tall figure appearing in the doorway.

I was in the act of forcing my steed to vacate his comfortable corner under the rock, when the owner of the hut—for it was he—stepped forward, placed a wet palm on the creature's steaming flank, and gravely shook his head. It was a sign that the animal might remain where it was.

"I'm awfully sorry I let the brute push its way in," I began; but I got no answer. I heard a fumbling in one corner, then the striking of a match, and next moment the glimmer of a wax candle-end from a tiny shelf lit up the hut.

The man now revealed was tall and spare, so tall that his head seemed to reach to the roof of the adobe—so spare that the candle-light made his thin face seem positively transparent. He wore a stained and patched cloak, now dripping with wet, but he did not seem to mind this in the least.

With one hand he took off his hat, and with the other he made a sweeping gesture, as much as to intimate that the hut and its contents were at my disposal. At the same time his face was lit up by a smile of singular sweetness. But when I began to thank him, renewing my apologies for my intrusion, his eyes fell before mine, and he stood humbly before me, his broad-brimmed hat in his hand, like a servant in the presence of his master.

The only response he made was to smile and shake his head, from which I understood that my entertainer was deaf or dumb—perhaps both.

My host now set about preparing supper. From a corner he produced a dish filled with a quantity of boiled beans, and as he placed the beans on a log which was the only furniture which the hovel possessed, he gave a glance at the ashes of the fire, as much as to say that they must be eaten cold, since the hut had no chimney. It was then, I think, that I first noticed the extreme sweetness in the expression of my host's face. It was not a handsome face, by any means, but it positively shone with what I may call an exalted, an etherealised benignity, that I felt something of the wondering devotion which one reads of the old saints inspiring in their followers. No mere physical beauty, in man or in woman, could have produced the same effect on me.

The beans, with a loaf of coarse bread, and a pannikin of water from the pitcher, formed our supper. I produced my jerked beef, and invited my host to partake of it, but with a bow of acknowledgment he declined. We sat, one on either end of the log, with the beans and bread between us, and ate our food.

During the progress of the silent meal I was struck by the emaciated appearance of my host's face and hands, and of his whole figure—a result which I attributed to the unwholesome spareness of his diet. Tearing a leaf out of my pocket-book, I wrote upon it in Spanish: "You ought not to refuse to eat meat. Your health is suffering for the want of it."

He read the paper when I handed it to him, but merely shook his head with a smile by way of answer.

Again I wrote: "I know something of medicine, and I tell you it is slow suicide," and handed the leaf to him.

For an instant a troubled look crossed the man's face, but in a moment it was gone, and the old imperturbable smile appeared again. With a shrug of the shoulders that must have seemed somewhat unfeeling, I tore up the paper, and, rising from my seat, began to get my horse out, and picket him close to the hut. The rain had now ceased, and the new moon shone through the foliage like the face of a friend.

When I returned to the hut I found that its owner had made what preparations he could for our night's rest. He had lighted a small lamp surrounded by a ruby-coloured glass, and suspended it before the crucifix at the other end of the hut. This gave us light enough to turn in by, for the candle-end had burnt itself out. From the trough-like sleeping-place in the wall my host had brought a bundle of bean-straw, which he had spread on the floor for me. I at once began to gather it up with the intention of returning it to its place: but a gentle, firm hand was laid on my arm, and I desisted, as a child might have done, without a word. Then my host held out his right hand, but suddenly withdrew it, and lay down at full length in his sleeping place.

In the middle of the night I awoke, and looked around me without stirring. At the farther end of the hut, opposite the crucifix, my host was kneeling, his arms outstretched, as the arms of the Christ before him. How long he had been kneeling there I could not tell. But after a time the strain on his muscles became insupportable; he joined his hands, and bending forward till they touched the ground and his forehead rested upon them, he remained in that posture for some time.

And then again the arms were raised, and slowly outstretched as they had been before. From time to time the low sound of a voice reached me, but no form of word, and once at least I caught the sound of a sob.

I could only lie still. To rise, even for the purpose of quitting the hut would have been to disturb and annoy the recluse, who fancied himself unobserved. I lay and watched till I again fell asleep.

When I next awoke it was broad daylight. I could hear my horse moving about outside. My host was nowhere to be seen. The remains of the dish of beans and the bread were placed within reach of my arm, as if inviting me to eat; but I had no appetite for such hard fare at that hour of the day. I went out, sat down and lit my pipe, and waited for my host. Two hours—three—went by, and he did not come. At length I was forced to the conclusion that he did not mean to return till I had gone.

I saddled my horse, but before I rode away I did a thing of which I felt ashamed while I did it. I looked at the volume I had seen lying beside my host's sleeping-place. It was a Latin breviary, and in it I found a name written: "Johannes Salvinos, Sacerdos," and below the edge of the depression that formed the bed I found cut into the stone in rude letters:

"But I, as a deaf man, heard not, and as one that is dumb, who openeth not his mouth."

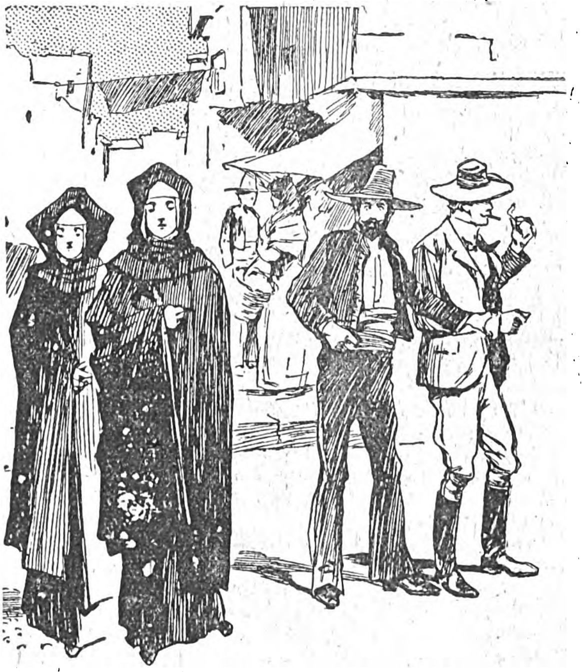
It was only natural that, at my first return to the haunts of men, I should make some inquiries about the hermit of the Sierra Madre. But I was met on all sides with looks of aversion and contempt. None seemed willing to speak of a man who was held to be for some reason accursed. And it soon became evident that little or nothing was known of the solitary. He was a priest, all were agreed, who had in some way sinned against his vows, and was undergoing punishment inflicted by his ecclesiastical superiors. None knew where he had come from, except that it must have been from a long way off.



My companion seemed struck with astonishment, and stood staring after them for a moment before going on.

No one had ever heard him utter a single syllable. He never appeared in the village except to purchase bread or beans, and these commodities were generally placed outside the door by the seller at night and removed by the purchaser before morning, so that all personal intercourse might be avoided. My heart rebelled against this inhuman treatment of a man who, my instinct told me, was better, not worse, than his fellows; but I knew that I was powerless to aid him. Indeed, I was convinced that he would not accept any mitigation of his punishment from any one. I was forced to go on my way and leave him to his fate.

Twelve months went by, and I happened to be in a Mexican town many miles distant from the lonely hut amid the mountains.

I was passing through the principal street one day in the company of a friend—Señor Vicayez—when two nuns with down-bent heads and faces, wrapped in linen like the faces of the dead, crossed the street in front of us. My companion seemed to be struck with astonishment, and stood staring after them for a moment before going on. A few minutes later the nuns crossed our path a second time, and again my friend stared at one of them as if in great surprise. As she came closer I observed her with some curiosity. She was tall and graceful, and walked as if with a natural air of command, a few inches in advance of her companion. In spite of the deathlike pallor of her countenance, and the disfigurement caused by her dress, I could see that she must have been a very beautiful woman.

"What makes you stare at that nun, Vicayez?" I asked. "One might have supposed that the brides of the church would have been safe from your all-devouring eyes."

"Don't be profane, Señor Englishman," said my friend, half in jest, half in earnest. "I know that you British have no feelings of reverence, but that need not make you talk like a pagan."

"Tell me, then, what made you stare so at that nun—the tall one—and I will apologise."

"If I looked a second time at the reverend mother, it was with surprise to see her walking in the public streets. It is the first time, I venture to say, that she has been seen outside the convent walls since she took the veil three years ago. And to think that only a short time before that Donna Isabella was the belle of the city, foremost in every gaiety, the best dancer, the most consummate flirt, the most fascinating—but there! I cannot describe her. You should have seen her!"

"And what made the fascinating Donna Isabella bury herself alive in a convent?"

"Ah! That is a strange story, and a sad one, too. Come into my house—it is close by—and I will tell you the tale over a cigar and a cup of coffee."

When the coffee had been tasted, and the cigars lighted, Señor Vicayez began by saying that after serving as an occasion for a greater number of duels than twenty ordinary girls, Donna Isabella had married one of the wealthiest and most popular of cabaleros—Señor Martin del Laguno.

"It was about a year after the wedding that the whole town was amazed to hear that the body of a cabalero of good birth and greatly respected, Señor Galtazar, had been found on the steps of the principal church with a stiletto between his shoulder blades. His pockets were empty, and a finger-ring containing a diamond of great value, which he always wore, had disappeared from his finger. This seemed to point to murder by a thief; but there were some, even then, who professed to think that the murder had been prompted by vengeance, and that the thefts had been committed merely for the sake of keeping up appearances.

It seemed as though the murderer would never be discovered, but ere Galtazar had been a week in his grave the police made a sudden swoop on one of the murdered man's chief friends, and accused him of being guilty of causing Galtazar's death. This person was none other than Donna Isabella's husband, Señor Martin del Laguno. I am safe in saying that not one person in the city had imagined that there could be a cause of quarrel between the two men, and the murder would certainly have gone undetected had it not been for some secret information given to the police. As it was, so great had been the security of the criminal that he had neglected to remove certain traces of his guilt, and proofs of it were found in abundance. It turned out that the husband was jealous—with what degree of cause will never be known. It is enough to say that no one, even among the most intimate friends of the family, had so much as suspected anything in the nature of an intrigue between del Laguno's wife and his friend.

"But the strange part of the story was that del Laguno, while disdaining to deny the accusation brought against him, asserted with angry oaths and bitter reproaches that he had been betrayed by a priest to whom he had confessed the murder under the seal of confession. He declared most solemnly that he had accidentally discovered his friend's treachery only an hour or two before he took his revenge, and that no one, not even his wife, had the smallest suspicion that there was any ill-feeling between Galtazar and himself. But, struck by remorse, he had gone one night to the church, and confessed the murder to one of the priests, who, he afterwards found, had been Galtazar's bosom friend.

"There were one or two suspicious circumstances which seemed to corroborate the wretched man's statement, the principal one being that the priest had been seen in the act of leaving the house of Galtazar's brother, who had sworn to avenge his death, at three o'clock in the morning on the day when del Laguno was arrested. Of course Galtazar's relatives and the police were equally silent, but del Laguno (with whom everybody sympathised) declared so positively, and with such sincerity of conviction, that the priest had betrayed him, that a great outcry was raised against the priest. This was intensified when the criminal declared his belief on the scaffold, reviling the priest with his latest breath. Two days after the execution, Donna Isabella Vicayez sought refuge in a convent, where she has lived ever since."

"And the priest?" I asked, with an agitation I scarcely cared to conceal.

"He disappeared. No one knows what became of him. It was whispered that he had committed suicide, like Judas. At all events, it was understood that he was dead.

"Some, however, said that, as he belonged to the third order of St. Francis, he had been handed over to the heads of the Franciscan Order to be dealt with as they saw fit. Others even asserted that the story of the false priest's death was a mere report, got up to soothe the popular rage, and prevent it from spreading to the whole priesthood."

"And the name of this unhappy priest was——?"

I fully expected the answer when it came.

"Padre Juan Salvinos."

The astonishing thing to me was that any one who had seen and known Father Juan Salvinos should have imagined for one moment that he was capable of breaking the seal of confession. I declare that of those who had condemned him not three, probably, knew him even as well as I did, and also that he had not then been purified and ennobled by years of suffering.

That the priest was innocent, I had not in my own mind the shadow of a doubt, but how to bring his innocence to light I knew not. There was one living person, and in all probability one only, who knew the truth of that story of passion and of blood, and that was the nun whom I had seen that day. To her, if to any one, I must make my appeal.

But how was I to get speech of her? I could think of but one way.

That night I went to the convent of the Companions of Jesus, and asked for the Reverend Mother. I was told that I could not see her; but I was prepared for this, and handed the lay sister an envelope which I had brought with me. It contained a sheet of paper on which I had written:

"I bring you news of Padre Juan."

The parlour in which I waited was lighted by one small lamp, which seemed to be on the point of expiring. Its rays struggled feebly with the moonlight, which streamed in through the window that looked out on the convent garden. At the farther end of the room was a grating, but I could see nothing there, for the room beyond was in total darkness.

Suddenly there came out of the darkness a faint rustle. I rose and went up to the grating. From behind it came a voice, faint, indeed, but clear as a dulcimer.

"What have you to tell me of Father Juan? He has been dead for some years."

"He is not dead!" I exclaimed. "He lives and breathes, though he is dead to the world of men. He is living in absolute solitude in a hut among the mountains, his food bread and beans, his drink water, his couch a hole in the rock. For months together, I am convinced, he does not hear the voice of man. It is life in death. And I am certain he has been unjustly condemned. If you know anything that would tend to clear him——"

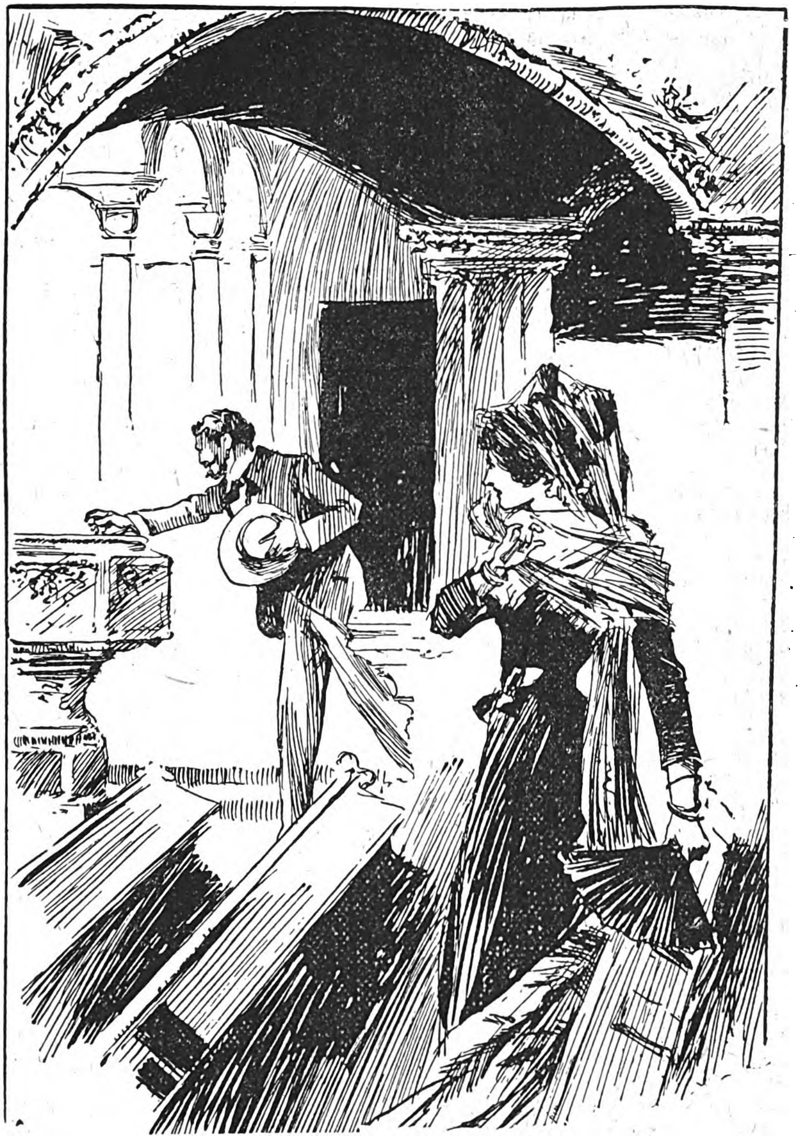
Up to this point there had been absolute silence behind the grating. But now a low moan fell upon my ears. I could see in the semi-darkness the form of a woman clothed in black standing close to the partition. Her white fingers clutched convulsively at the lattice, as though the frail woodwork had been bare of iron. Then I saw the tall figure of the nun sink lower and lower, till she fell on her knees—till she crouched under the lower part of the wall.

"Oh God, have mercy! What have I done?"

The words burst involuntarily from her lips, and I remained silent.

"I thought he was dead—they told me he was dead—long, long ago! But it is not too late. I will make what reparation I can. I will tell the whole truth. When my——"

"Pardon me, Reverend Mother," I interrupted.



"I saw him pause for a moment, and lay something on the edge of the font."

"Perhaps you forget that you are speaking to a stranger. Your confessor would no doubt advise you——"

"The whole world shall know the truth!" broke in the clear, resolute voice of the Reverend Mother. She had risen to her feet, and stood drawn up to her full height, in a sort of proud humility. "The whole world shall know what I have done," she repeated, "though I call Heaven to witness that I believed that Padre Juan was dead. But at last the stigma shall be removed. His innocence shall be made clear.

"Listen! Some days after the murder of Señor Galtazar I was in the Church of Our Lady of Sorrows, praying for the repose of his soul. It was almost dark; there was no light except the lamps before the altar and the shrine, and I was at the east end of the church, where the shadows were deepest.

"The sound of a footstep made me raise my head. I looked up, and to my amazement, I saw my husband come down the aisle. He was leaving one of the confessionals. There is little wonder that I was astonished, for except on the occasion of our marriage, my husband was never known to enter a church. He could scarcely have seen me, even if he had been looking in my direction, but as it was, he walked with his eyes bent on the stone floor of the church. He came along slowly till he reached the porch; and then I saw him pause for a moment and lay something on the edge of the font. The next instant he had passed into the porch and was gone.

"Even as I watched him, a suspicion that had before crept into my mind returned stronger than before. I felt that I must know what it was that my husband had deposited on the edge of the font.

"Softly rising from my place I stole with mute feet from column to column till I reached the font.

"I did not touch the ring. I had no need. I knew it well. It had been taken from Miguel's dead hand to make the world suppose that the murder had been committed by an ordinary thief. And now I knew that he, my husband, had treacherously killed the man I loved a thousand times better than my life.

"Yes, I confess it now! I must confess it. It was I who informed the police against my husband, that I might avenge the dead. I left the ring lying where it was, and in a minute or two I heard the priest leave the confessional, and take the ring from the spot where it was lying. He did not see me, for by that time I had crept back to my place. He believed that he was absolutely alone in the church. I understood it all. My husband had confessed his crime, and had asked the priest to take charge of the ring, and restore it to his victim's friends, seeing that it was of some value. The priest had consented to do this, and they had agreed that the ring should be placed on the font, so that the priest and penitent should not meet face to face.

"Well, I did it. I gave information to the police by an anonymous letter. And no sooner had I done this than I repented. How was it possible that I should feel remorse for such a deed all my life? He was my husband. But my repentance came too late. My husband was in prison.

"On the day of his trial I was struck down with fever. I knew nothing more till all was over. They told me that he had died reviling Don Juan as his betrayer, and I intended to confess that I had betrayed my husband; but it was a hard thing to do. Before I could call up courage enough to do it, Don Juan was removed from the city, and shortly after they told me he was dead. I suppose the bishop thought it better not to contradict the report of his death, so that the scandal might be forgotten as soon as possible. There were some who did not believe him guilty, for they say the seal of the confessional has never yet been broken. But they were few in number. The mass of the people believed him to be guilty, and I—wretched one that I am!—kept silence, and suffered his memory to be defamed. But I will make reparation. I will go to the bishop to-morrow; and this very night I will make public acknowledgment of my unnatural crime before the sisters. But that will not expiate my offence or give back Padre Juan the years he has spent in misery. Ah, me! Ah, me!"

The voice ceased. I looked up and found that I was alone.

A week later I was once more riding over the mountain slope that led up to the abode of the hermit priest. A little behind me rode two men furnished with letters from the bishop and from the Provincial of the Franciscan Order. It was an open secret that the letters contained a decree annulling the sentence and deprivation that had been pronounced against Padre Juan Salvinos, with, no doubt, many an expression of regret for the error that had been committed, and of congratulation that the wrong had at last been righted.

It was a clear morning in early autumn, and the sun shone brightly on cloud and mountain peak, on pine tree and river. I quickly recognised the place, for it had been often in my mind's eye during the months that had slipped by since I had been there. I came upon the track that led to the village, followed it up the mountain side, and at length stood at the door of the abode. I had thought how I would ride up with a laugh and a shout, and tell the patient sufferer that his long martyrdom was at an end. But, somehow, I had no heart for laughing and shouting.

I dismounted and knocked on the rough door with the handle of my whip. I expected that the door would have been opened immediately, but there was no reply. The silence was oppressive. One of my companions suggested that the padrone might have gone to the village to buy food. It seemed likely enough, but something told me that it was not so. I knocked again, and then pushed the door open.

The priest lay on the ground at the side of his rocky sleeping place. He was dead. It seemed to us that he must have died that morning. His weary eyes had closed of themselves, and I thought I could trace on the thin, pallid features the same look of patient resignation I had seen on his living face.

His right hand clasped a crucifix to his breast, and he lay so that his last look must have been fixed on the figure of Christ on the Cross at the farther end of the hut. His left arm was under his head—he lay like a tired man taking his rest.

We buried him in the nearest consecrated ground—in the cemetery belonging to the village where he had been in the habit of buying food. The people who had been accustomed to shun him as a creature accursed, now reverenced him as a saint.

By way of a headstone they put up a wooden cross, after the custom of the country; and when I saw it last I found that someone—a brother priest, probably—had carved upon it, by way of epitaph, the words which the hermit had cut on the rock on which he slept—"But I as a deaf man heard not, and as one that is dumb, who openeth not his mouth."

SEEN YOUR PHOTO IN SHORT STORIES?

IF SO, YOU WILL GET £5.

HERE IS THE SCHEME.

We have in our possession a considerable number of photographs of men, women, and children of all grades of society secured for us by our agents, who have scoured the United Kingdom for this special purpose.

Each week we publish five of these portraits, and to each of the persons thus represented we dispatch the sum of £5, on his or her forwarding a claim on a post-card addressed to PORTRAIT DEPARTMENT, "SHORT STORIES," Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Although the persons whose portraits will appear in this competition are quite unknown to us personally, we have their names and addresses in our possession, and, therefore, a claim can be settled at once, without risk of fraud. Already nineteen claims have been paid since the competition started.

Is your portrait here? If so, drop us a post-card, and get £5.

All claims in connection with the portraits below must reach the address already given above by Tuesday next, December 24th.

Full names and addresses of the correct claimants this week appear on page 831.

Simply write on a post-card these words:

> The Portrait No.......... (here put number of portrait) in the current number of SHORT STORIES is mine. Please forward a £5 note.
> (Name and full address.)

Persons represented must claim for themselves. Claims made by other people on their behalf will be ignored.

A YULE TIDE DISAPPEARANCE

By

Martin H. Potter.

Colonel Aubrey Darlington stood in his own study at Bracken Hall, intently watching the window which looked out on the lawn.

The room was in perfect darkness—just a shade or two blacker than the wintry clouds had rendered the night.

This almost imperceptible difference in the exterior and interior light, enabled the Colonel to detect two upright posts which protruded above the sill of the window. As he watched, the posts quivered; and taking this as a signal to act, he noiselessly moved from behind the curtains which had been his vantage ground and crossed to the opposite side of the room where he stood with his left hand round the little knob which would ignite the electric globes, whilst his right steadily levelled a revolver in the direction of the window.

A slight scraping became audible in the stillness; and then the head and shoulders of a man suddenly appeared outside the window.

Darlington smiled grimly as he saw some sticky substance pressed against the pane of glass just above the catch; but made no movement even when the intruder reversing his hand described a circle with the stone of a ring he wore.

A current of cold air which reached the Colonel would have told him, if he had not already guessed, that a piece of the glass had been removed.

There was a slight pause; then the catch was slipped back, the sash raised, and the man stepped into the room.

As he did so, Darlington pressed down the knob and flooded the room with electric light.

The man staggered back in surprise; then made a movement towards his hip pocket.

"Kindly keep your hands in front of you," came the voice of the Colonel in equable tones.

The intruder allowed his eyes to rest on the menacing weapon pointing directly at him, and, recognising the futility of a struggle, obeyed.

As he stood revealed, there were few signs of the orthodox "Bill Sykes" about him, if one excepted the black crêpe mask which covered the upper part of his face. His hands were small and white, seemingly more fitted to use a pen than to wield a jemmy. The Norfolk suit which covered his slender but well-knit frame was also hardly in keeping with the character.

Darlington took in these inconsistencies before he again spoke. Then it was to give another order.

"Please tip that ladder, by which you made your somewhat unceremonious entry, into the shrubbery below. I happen to know that it is beyond the strength of one man to rear it up again, so your single comrade in the enterprise will not interrupt us."

The would-be burglar hesitated.

"Do as you are told, man," rang out the Colonel's voice, this time in unmistakable menace. "When I remember that a bullet would effectually put an end to all the trouble, my fingers itch to pull the trigger. Remember, any jury would hold me justified in shooting an armed man whom I found entering my house in the dead of the night."

The man turned to the window and obeyed the behest. The consequent noise was deadened by the thick clump of bushes which occupied the surrounding ground.

As the ladder fell a figure came forward.

"You can go," whispered the man at the window, laconically, "the game is up."

He watched until his friend disappeared and then turned again to Darlington and slipped off his mask.

"There was no need to do that, Louis Cademon; I have known who you were from the first," was the Colonel's comment on the action.

"I caught a glimpse of your face at the Red Lion yesterday morning, consequently expected some such visit as this, and made preparations accordingly. Put your revolver on the table, and sit down, I want to talk to you."

Cademon muttered an oath under his breath as he obeyed. The Colonel placed his own revolver beside him.

"You know what I came for," the interloper asserted sullenly, "and that if any other means had been available I should not have condescended to this mummery," indicating the mask with a wave of his hand.

"I know nothing of the kind, Cademon," answered the Colonel sternly. "My dealings with you have taught me that you invariably prefer crooked paths to straight, and I guessed that the lapse of eight years would not have materially altered your character."

"You of all men to prate of honesty of purpose," said Cademon in savage tones.

There was quiet dignity in Darlington's reply to the taunt.

"My conduct on the occasion, if known, would bring condemnation from men of high honour, but I am going to make atonement, and whatever else I may have been guilty of I can at least say I never deserted a friend at the very moment of all others when he most needed me. You cannot say the same."

He paused for the other to reply but none came, and he continued:

"I suppose you have found out that my daughter Olive," the Colonel's eyes and voice softened as the name left his lips, "is to be married at Christmas; and have especially chosen this moment to attempt the forcing of my hand. Well, you are likely to be dismayed when you hear the course I am going to adopt. On the day before her wedding I shall place the proceeds of that enterprise in her hands. Being a woman she will in all probability guess its value, but if not I shall tell her. She is marrying a comparatively poor man, and I know that she regrets having to go to her husband empty-handed. When I say here is your dowry, my daughter, she will be rejoiced; but, when I also tell her how and where it was obtained; and that the real owner is still living, I think I know what her response will be. She loves me too well not to look charitably upon my shortcomings, but she will insist upon restitution."

"What! you will give back what we risked our lives to obtain!" exclaimed Cademon.

"What I risked my life to obtain," corrected Darlington. "Your memory conveniently overlooks the trifling fact that you backed out when the real danger came."

The younger man coloured up at the accusation, but waived the point.

"I notice that your strict honesty is coeval with your coming into the family estate," he said with a taunting smile.

"You are, to a certain extent, justified in saying that, but the estate is seriously embarrassed and many times I have been tempted to sell and use what is in that safe."

The Colonel pointed to one that was let in the wall.

"Then you do keep it here?" queried Cademon, eagerly.

Darlington nodded grimly, as he answered:

"Yes, your visit would not have been unprofitable if I had not been prepared."

"Come, Darlington. Pray re-consider your decision," urged Cademon. "There is absolutely no need for any such quixotism. Let bygones be bygones. I will grant that your danger was the greater and that therefore your share of the spoil should be larger in proportion, but you will admit that I am entitled to some. Sell it and give me £10,000 and you can rely upon my keeping my tongue quiet about the whole transaction. By these means your daughter will enjoy her dowry; your estate become freed from the mortgages and any little indiscretions of the past consigned to oblivion. It is positively criminal to talk of restitution."

There was no doubt the man was in deadly earnest. His code of honour belonged to a much lower stratum than that of the Colonel; he could not conceive any man wishing to retrieve past peccadilloes at the expense of the present.

His eyes were fixed hungrily upon the safe; greed depicted in their depths.

Aubrey Darlington was too preoccupied with his own thoughts to notice the other's demeanour; or his past knowledge of the man would have warned him against treachery.

In reviewing after events he marvelled that he could have forgotten the conditions under which the interview was taking place. He could only attribute it to the struggle with his own conscience which Cademon's suggestion had reawakened.

The intruder allowed his eyes to rest on the weapon pointing at him, and obeyed.

For years he had bitterly regretted the indiscretion which had necessitated the enterprise wherein he had fallen from the strict path of honesty; and the resolve to let his daughter be the judge as to whether he should restore his ill-gotten gains had been his only consolation. But now the temptation to let the dead past bury its dead and enjoy the wealth he had gained at the risk of his life, was once more placed before him in a plausible manner by his former confederate.

He longed to be able to give his daughter a fortune to take to her husband, knowing that it would make all the difference to her married life. Moreover he would thus retain her respect and absolute trust in his honour and integrity. As he had told Cademon, he was sure that her love would excuse and forgive his fault, yet she would never again feel exactly towards him as she had done in the past.

Then he had not exaggerated matters regarding the estate; none knew better than himself how heavily it was involved and that years and years of careful nursing were required before it could be clear. Dire poverty in the past had caused Aubrey Darlington's fall, comparative poverty in the present was likely to prevent his rehabilitation.

The battle was short but sharp. Let it be placed to Colonel Darlington's credit that he conquered.

"It is of no use, Cademon," he ejaculated, following out the train of thought. "You know as well as I do that we have no shade of right to utilise it for our own benefit. Any such suggestion is mere sophistry. The suffering and danger we went through were the legitimate means whereby the rightful owner attempted to protect his property from our marauding hands. I shall not waver one iota from the decision already arrived at. Olive shall be my judge. If she considers that I am justified in keeping the ill-gotten gains, you shall have the share you claim. But I warn you, I do not for one moment think that she will."

A still uglier look flitted across the younger man's face as Darlington finished, but it only lasted a moment, and as he rose to his feet he answered:

"I daresay you are right, but it is not of much use preaching morality to a poor wretch who is on his beam ends for a few pounds. At any rate I am unfortunately quite in your hands, so must perforce give in to what you must forgive my saying is a mere whim. Perhaps you will show me the way to your front door, as you have forced me to dispense with my only other way of egress."

The Colonel nodded and they both rose from their seats. Again a malignant look came into Cademon's eyes. He gathered himself together as a leopard does before he makes a spring on his prey. Darlington's hand was on the handle of the door and his head was turned.

Murderous thoughts were coursing through Cademon's brains. He knew the psychological moment had arrived. His limbs relaxed their tension and with a stealthy leap he was on his unprepared victim.

Slim but sinewy fingers gripped the unhappy man's throat. Knees were buried in the small of his back, feet kicked fiercely at the sinews of his legs at the very spot where a sudden blow renders a man helpless.

With a half-stifled cry he sank to the ground. Cademon's knees were now on his victim's chest, slowly but surely aiding his relentless hands in crushing all life from the helpless body.

Slowly the Colonel's eyes started from his head. His face went black and blue, his breath came in thick short gasps, another moment and he would have paid the penalty of forgetfulness with his life; but suddenly a girlish voice broke the silence.

"Take your fingers from his throat, coward, or I'll fire at you."

With an ugly oath, Cademon looked up to find a tall girl, clad in a white dressing-gown, facing him. The unmistakable resemblance to the Colonel told him that he was in the presence of Miss Darlington. She had entered unnoticed during the struggle and had secured her father's revolver from the table.

Olive was trembling with mingled fear and excitement; but the look in her face left no doubt but that she would put her threat into execution, and sullenly, the would-be assassin relaxed his grip and rose to his feet.

Without taking her eyes from Cademon, the girl seized the water jug from the table and dashed the contents in her father's face. Her action had the desired effect.

A long-drawn sigh burst from the purple lips, the eyes returned to their normal position, and in a few seconds the Colonel was once more on his feet facing Cademon.

"It was a treacherous action, but fully in accordance with your past record," he articulated, painfully.

"Shall I call for help, dad?" questioned Olive.

"No, my brave darling. There are reasons which necessitate my letting him go unpunished," her father responded. "Let me rest for a few minutes and we will see him out of the house."

Ten minutes later the three stood at the hall-door.

"You have seen my daughter, Cademon; perhaps even your crime-begotten soul will realise what her answer will be, when I tell her in a fortnight's time," were the parting words of the Colonel.

* * * * *

The remainder of that night Darlington spent on the settee in his study sleeping the sleep of utter exhaustion, whilst his daughter kept watch and ward; however, there were no further interruptions.

With the first rays of morning he awoke to a certain extent refreshed and looking but little the worse for his desperate encounter.

Olive was naturally curious as to the meaning of the awful scene she had witnessed, but was too good a daughter to desire to probe into secrets which her father evidently desired to conceal. She had heard what he had said to his assailant and knew that in due course a full explanation would be granted her.

At her father's request she assisted him in removing all traces of their unwelcome visitor, and this was sufficient hint that he did not wish the affair mentioned to anybody.

Shortly before the servants came down, the Colonel completely smashed the pane of glass which Cademon had operated on, and later in the morning let it be understood that he had done so by accident.

Up to now he had been too exhausted to inquire how it was that his daughter had appeared so providentially at the crucial moment of the struggle.

The explanation was simple. Her bedroom was just above the Colonel's study, and she had been awakened by the noise of the falling ladder.

On going to her window she had seen the stream of light proceeding from the study, and rather surprised that he should be up so late, and thinking that perhaps he might be ill, she slipped on her dressing-gown and came down.

Hearing voices she was about to return again, but at that moment she heard her father's muffled appeal for help as Cademon sprang at him, and had entered the room with the result we have seen.

Olive was too busy during the next few days to find time for much thought regarding the strange occurrence she had taken such a stirring part in.

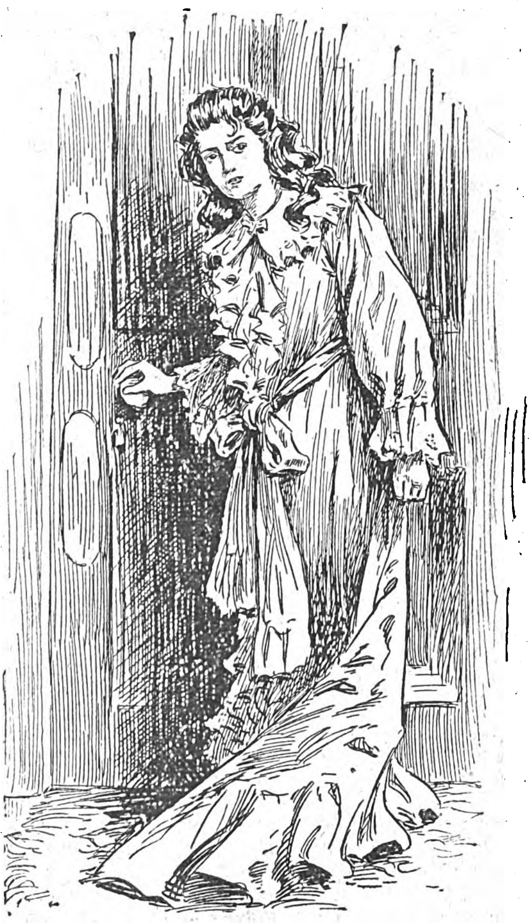
It was close on Christmas—always a stirring time at Bracken Hall—because the Colonel entertained a large house-party at that period and the arrangements principally devolved upon her.

This year would be the last she would superintend, for her marriage was to take place a few days after the usual festivities; which fact did not tend to lessen her responsibilities.

Nothing further had been heard of Cademon, and on inquiring at the Red Lion—the village inn—the Colonel learnt that he had departed with his accomplice on the night after his fruitless enterprise.

This did not cause Darlington to relax any of the precautions which he had taken against a repetition of the objectionable incident. Every night before retiring he personally paid a visit to see that the lower doors and windows were properly secured, and invariably made fast the steel shield which had been fitted to the study window.

The main portion of the guests were not to arrive at Bracken Hall till Christmas eve; but it had been arranged that Gerald Standford—the Colonel's future son-in-law—should come three days previously so that he might arrange the final details of the wedding with his coming bride and her father. In due course he put in an appearance, much to Olive's delight.



A tall girl, clad in a white dressing-gown, was facing him.

For several years it had been Olive's custom to assist in the decoration of the village church, and this year she pressed her lover into the service, and on the afternoon of the day previous to Christmas Eve they set forth from Bracken Hall with this intention.

There was every sign that England was likely to enjoy a typically old-fashioned Christmas. Snow was falling softly, gradually covering up all familiar land-marks with a white mantle.

The lovers chatted merrily as they briskly covered the ground. The conversation—which, needless to say was freely interluded with the sweet nothings which are of superlative interest to lovers, but somewhat caviare to those who cannot lay claim to the title—turned upon the old church which they were about to decorate. Olive, who was an authority upon its ancient history, spoke of the troublous times which it had seen in days gone by. Tradition claimed that it was one of the oldest buildings in the kingdom. Certainly there were records in existence which established beyond doubt that previous to its being dedicated to the service of Christianity it had served as a fortress, and in that capacity had stood more than one seige.

Even now, with its quaint old battlements it had more the appearance of a mediæval castle than a place of worship. But long ago its dungeons had been turned into crypts and its dried up moat into a churchyard.

When the lovers reached this ancient edifice, they found the cart, which had been sent on from Bracken Hall loaded with holly and evergreens, had already arrived and the material had been placed in the porch.

Several other ladies and gentlemen were also present to assist in the good cause. Very soon trailing ropes of greenery, relieved by the scarlet berries, were being fixed to the grey old pillars and black oak which formed the pews.

All the afternoon the work proceeded with unabated zeal until only the pulpit remained undecorated. By this time it was getting late, and most of the others who had got farther to go than Olive and Gerald, were getting anxious to get home in time to dress for dinner. The result was that the lovers, nothing loth to be left alone, volunteered to put on the finishing touches.

They accompanied the others to the door and saw them set forth on the journey. Then they re-entered the church. They had practically finished when Olive suddenly found that she would not have enough wire. They had already run themselves rather late; but she was anxious to finish so suggested that Gerald should walk to the verger's cottage, which was about five hundred yards away, and get a further supply.

He rather demurred at leaving her alone in the church in the partial darkness, but Olive protested that she was not in the least nervous and finally he went to do her bidding.

He was away about ten minutes as the verger could not lay his hand on the wire, but finally it was found; and having arranged to lock the church door and return the key as they passed, Gerald reached the church again.

Gerald examined the path that led to the bridge.

Passing up the main aisle which was very dimly lighted, he saw that Olive was not by the pulpit, but the fact only vaguely alarmed him. Thinking that she was probably in some other part of the building he called her by name in that lowered voice which one instinctively uses in a place of worship. No response came, and now, really alarmed, he called louder. Still no answer. He systematically searched the church from the altar to the front door, but no trace of her was to be found. The thought struck him that possibly she might have been taken suddenly ill, and made her way home alone. But there were two objections to this theory. Firstly, she would certainly have left some intimation of her intention behind; secondly, her nearest way was past the verger's cottage and she would have in all probability called in knowing him to be there.

Gerald examined the path which led to the bridge over the moat by which the church was approached. It will be remembered that snow had been falling during the afternoon, and he thought that if she had left her footmarks might be observable. But a glance told him that there was not much hope of arriving at any conclusion from this, for already his own footmarks were nearly obliterated.

The snow had perceptibly increased in depth during the last twenty minutes. Realising that he could do nothing without help, he ran as hard as he could to the verger's cottage again.

The two men returned together, and the verger thoroughly illuminated the church and assisted Gerald in another search, but still no clue to the missing girl's whereabouts or explanation of her mysterious disappearance was found.

Almost distracted, Gerald made the best of his way back to Bracken Hall.

Colonel Darlington came to the door with the servant, and his first words struck dismay to Gerald's soul.

"Why hasn't Olive returned with you?"

As clearly as he could the young man explained what had happened.

Aubrey Darlington wasted no time in useless lamentations:

"We must ride back at once, Standford," he exclaimed. "Tell them to saddle horses at once for Mr. Standford and myself; and order one of the grooms to get ready to go to the police-station with a letter."

Whilst his commands were being carried out he sat down and wrote a brief account of the circumstances to the superintendent of police in charge of the district, with instructions to wire it to the outlying stations. He also gave an exact description of Cademon, for he strongly suspected that individual of having some hand in his daughter's disappearance. He bitterly reproached himself for allowing her name to in any way enter the transaction. Remembering that his last words to the man had been an intimation that the whole affair was practically in her hands, he could see what an obvious advantage it would be for Cademon if he had her in his power. If only as a matter of revenge he would know that he could not choose a more fitting way to injure the Colonel than by striking at him through his daughter.

As Colonel Darlington and Standford galloped towards the church as fast as the two best horses in the stable could carry them, the elder man put the younger in possession of the facts connected with Cademon, and they both agreed that whatever steps they took must be started from the place where the poor girl had last been seen.

They stopped at the verger's cottage, and, hearing that he had no news, borrowed a lantern and pushed on.

Once more the church proper was minutely examined but with no result, and then, determined to leave no stone unturned, they made their way to the vaults. Here again it looked as though they were to be baffled. Indeed, they were on the point of re-ascending when suddenly the Colonel gave a low exclamation, and, seizing Gerald's arm, pointed to a part of the wall which looked quite solid.

We say looked advisedly, for, affixed in it, near the ground was a tiny piece of red cloth—Olive's dress that day had been of that colour. Passing the lantern up and down they traced a square outlined patch. It was obvious that one of the massive stones was movable and the assumption was that she had been forcibly dragged through this, and the piece of cloth torn from her skirt when the aperture was closed.

Gerald was for sending for tools and tearing it away, but a little reflection convinced Darlington that there must be some simple way of moving the stone with the added advantage that whoever was behind would probably be taken by surprise.

He examined the stone carefully and discovered a depression in the centre. This he pressed on and suddenly the whole block moved. A little further pressure with their feet and the whole stone moved away bodily, opening up the way to a long, narrow passage. They passed through in silence, Darlington placing the lamp beneath his coat.

* * * * *

To explain the incidents in their proper sequence, it is necessary to return to the moment when Olive was left alone in the church.

Her lover's footsteps had scarcely died away in the distance, when she thought she heard a rustling behind her. She turned quickly, but apparently she was quite alone, and smiling at her mistake, she continued decorating the pulpit. Suddenly there was an unmistakable rush of feet and before she could protect herself or cry out, her head was enveloped in a heavy shawl and she was in the arms of a man.

In spite of her desperate struggles, she was dragged towards the steps and then bodily carried down them. She remembered her skirt catching in something, and then her overwrought feelings gave way and she fainted.

When she recovered, she was sitting in a small cell which was evidently below the ground level, from the dampness of its walls. In front of her was a man whom she recognised as the one whom she had prevented from murdering her father.

"I am sorry to have had to bring you to such a place, Miss Darlington," said Cademon, as soon as he noticed she had recovered sufficiently to understand him, "but circumstances rendered it necessary. I may say that the length of your stay here depends entirely upon yourself.

"I must claim your attention for a few moments whilst I put the case clearly before you. Some years ago your father and I set out to rob a fugitive Indian Rajah, who had got into trouble with the British Government, of a certain rope of pearls which we had discovered he had concealed. After incredible hardships to which I, being the weakest, had to succumb, Colonel Darlington succeeded in obtaining the spoil. On his return to Calcutta he received the news that he had come into Bracken Hall, and instantly was seized with a fit of virtue, and refused to sell the pearls as previously agreed, or to give me my share. You will remember my visit to him the other night; well, he informed me that he proposed leaving you to judge whether he should return the pearls to the Rajah, who, by the way, has made his peace with the Government, or sell them for his and my mutual benefit.

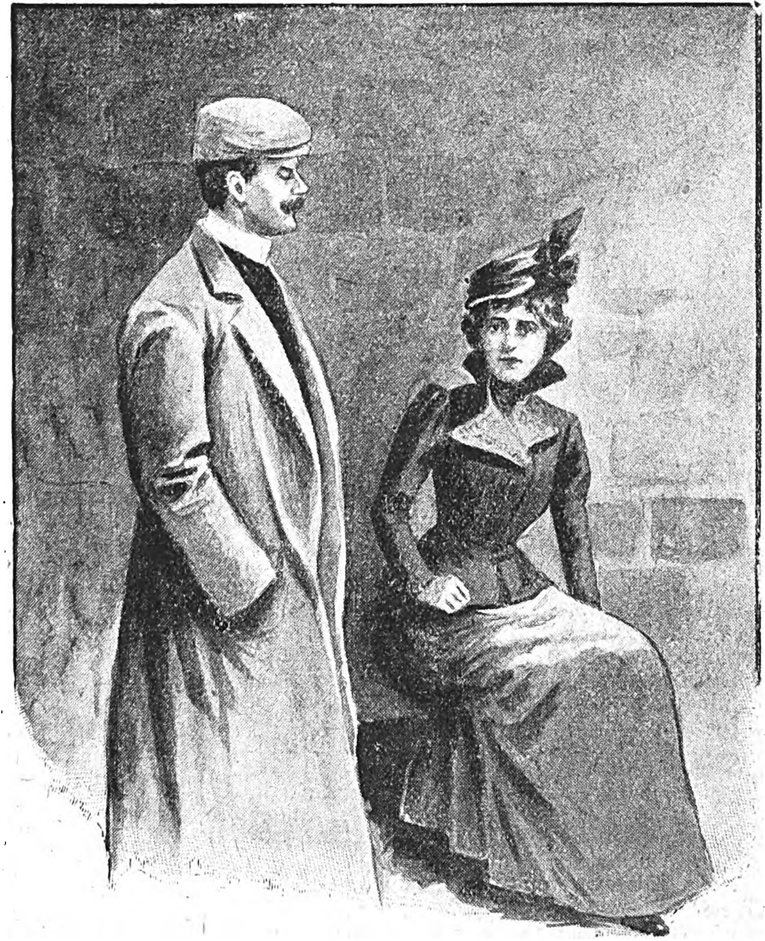
"Now, happening to discover a secret entrance to this charming place, and learning from the village folk that you were in the habit of coming here to decorate the place every year, it struck me that it offered a fitting opportunity to persuade you as to the advisability of giving an answer to his question in my favour.

"My plans were seemingly upset when I found that your lover accompanied you, but fortune was kind enough to get rid of him as you know. Let me assure you that the chances of your being found here by any searchers are quite hopeless.

"I do not wish to frighten you, but unless you take an oath to advise your father as I wish I shall be compelled to take your life for my own protection.

"I will give you half-an-hour to choose which you will do."

Olive never knew how she got through that half-hour.



She was sitting in a small cell evidently below the ground level, and in front of her was a man.

She did not waver for a moment in what her decision should be.

Grieved as she was to hear of her father's fall, she saw how anxious he was to repair his false move, and determined that even if her life was to pay the forfeit no word of hers should persuade him against restitution.

At last Cademon rose from his seat—she noticed that he held a revolver in his hand, and shuddered.

"Time is up, Miss Darlington," he said, mechanically. "What is your answer?"

"I cannot do as you wish me," she replied simply.

"Pause and reflect," he answered. "You are young to die."

"I have done so," she said.

He levelled the revolver at her.

"I shall count ten," he said.

She offered a mental prayer up to Heaven, and closed her eyes.

He had counted five. Each figure seemed to strike her funeral knell.

Six! Seven! Eight! Nine! Ten!

There was a flash and a report, but the bullet flew above her head and the voice of her lover broke on her ears.

At the crucial moment the Colonel and Gerald had burst upon the scene just in time to save her. And Gerald had dashed the assassin's arm up.

In the struggle which ensued, Cademon was mortally wounded by his own revolver and he died a few hours after.

Needless to say, the pearls were on their way to the rightful owner when the marriage bells rang out to signalise the marriage of the re-united lovers.

LOVE AND A LEGACY.

The Story of a Matrimonial Tangle and a Christmas Party that Unravelled It.

By W. NEWMAN FLOWER.

It was a chilly December morning, and a stifling pea-soup fogs wept down Fleet Street, irritating the lungs of all who were not fortunate enough to have mufflers over their mouths. Cecil Langdale, editor of the Comet, found his already questionable temper fast becoming worse beneath the atmospheric ordeal, and rushing into his office he bounced up the stairs and into the editorial sanctum.

His sub-editor, Charlie Fraser, was leaning against the window smoking a cigarette and looking out at the blocked traffic in the street.

"Beastly weather outside," he remarked, as Langdale entered.

"So it seems," replied his chief, a trifle irritably. "You don't appear to be very busy this morning," he added.

Fraser turned round sharply at this censure.

"I say, old man, you've got the hump. You look as if you were going to be married."

"What do you mean by that?" asked Langdale, filling his pipe thoughtfully and sinking into his chair. "Do you know any reason why I shouldn't be married?"

"None at all. But you're not——"

"No, no. Don't jump at conclusions, and spare your congratulations. All the same, a very curious thing has happened. I've just found out that I had an eccentric bachelor uncle, and that he's dead."

"And has left you some 'tin,' I suppose?" interrupted Fraser.

"Well, yes, but only on one condition, which makes it impossible for the cash to become mine. He always was a miserly old beggar, and I never saw or heard anything of him unless he could beg, borrow, or steal a stamp from someone to write to me with. However, I certainly must give him credit for laying out a penny a week on the Comet, and from what I can gather he was an enthusiastic reader."

Fraser walked across the room to an armchair near the fire, and sat down with his hands behind his head.

"This is getting interesting," he said.

"This morning I had a letter from his solicitors," resumed Langdale, "informing me of his death, and saying that he had left me the sum of £300 a year and a thousand pounds down if I would marry—whom do you think?"

"Give it up."

"Why, the old girl who writes our matrimonial notes under the nom-de-plume of 'Mrs. Matchem.' If I refuse, the money goes to the Society for the Preservation of Stray Cats!"

"Then you think the feline race will benefit by the bequest?" inquired the sub-editor.

"Of course. Do you think I'm going to marry—her! She must be fifty."

"Probably more," said Fraser consolingly.

"Besides, she may be married already. We send the correspondence to her, and she brings up her copy every week as regularly as clock-work, and her real name is Craig. That's all I know about her. Why, the very idea's too funny for words. Of course I shall raise a protest, or——"

A shrill whistle came at the speaking-tube.

"Who's there?" shouted Langdale.

"'Mrs. Matchem' would like to see you, sir," came the muffled reply from the lower regions.

"Send her up, please," he said, then added to Fraser: "Here she is. Of course I must explain the matter and ask for her assistance."

"In that case I'll leave you. I never have played 'gooseberry' for anyone, and I don't intend to begin it now," replied the sub. caustically, as he swung himself out of his chair and went towards the door. "Good luck, old man, and—keep your pecker up!"

He vanished, and a few seconds later an old lady sailed into the room. Her grey hair was neatly brushed back under her bonnet, and her gold-rimmed spectacles had become dimmed with the fog. Langdale felt a cold shiver run up his spine.

"Good morning," she said affably, as she approached his desk. "Fearful weather, isn't it?"

"Is it? Yes, I believe it is," he replied absent-mindedly. "Will you sit down? You've brought your 'copy,' that's right. Er—if you're not in a hurry to go—I—er—should like to speak to you."

She occupied the chair Fraser had just vacated, and allowed the tips of her boots to rest upon the fender.

"The fact is," continued Langdale with a tremor, "I've got a rather eccentric uncle—at least, he's dead now—and he's left me £300 a year and a thousand pounds down if I marry——"

"How kind. But is this information for our matrimonial page?"

"Yes—that is—no. Pray excuse my asking a pertinent question, but are you married?"

Langdale expected to see her go off into hysterics, but no sign of surprise passed over her face.

"My husband is dead, but I have seven children living," she said.

Langdale groaned.

"The conditions of the will are somewhat peculiar, he went on. "I only receive the money if I marry—pardon me—marry you."

"Me?"

"Yes. 'Mrs. Matchem' who writes our matrimonial notes has been ordained by my idiotic uncle to become my wife. Of course the idea is preposterous. We are scarcely suited to one another, are we? You're so much old—I mean we might lodge an appeal. Now, would you be prepared to see this thing through with me, and if we succeed in getting the money, sharing it without going through the superfluous ordeal of the marriage service?"

"Certainly not."

"Then you mean that I must either marry you or lose the money?"

"If your uncle has made it necessary for you to marry 'Mrs. Matchem' before his bequest becomes yours, why marry her you must. But have you spoken to Mr. Fraser on the subject? I think he could advise you as well as anyone."

"Why do you suggest him?"

"Because it was at his recommendation that this post was given to me. He knows me well."

"Very well. I'll speak to him and let you know. Good morning."

Fraser took his cue from her departure and re-entered the room.

"I suppose I may now look upon you as engaged?" he said with a laugh.

"Don't be an ass!" retorted Langdale. "Look here, I've got into a pretty mess. She won't agree to fight the case out in the courts, and insists on matrimony."

"Then I'm afraid, my dear fellow, you're cornered."

"She told me to talk the matter over with you."

"She did, did she? Well, I don't pretend to be a matrimonial agent because outside interference always ends in quarrelling, but if you'll come down to my place next week and spend Christmas with me, I'll see what I can do for you."

"All right. I'll come."

"And you needn't come alone. Don't forget to bring your sister with you. Girls are always useful in a delicate case of this kind, you know!"

* * * * *

Fraser was waiting on the doorstep to receive them, when Cecil and Mabel Langdale arrived at his suburban villa on Christmas Eve. He took his comrade by the arm, and led him off to change his clothes, for it was snowing fast, and his mother performed a similar duty for Mabel.

"We ought to have a lively time," he said, as he followed Langdale into his room. "'Mrs. Matchem' and two of her daughters are staying with us until after the vacation."

"What?" roared Langdale. "You've asked 'Mrs. Matchem' here?"

"Yes. And why not? I can assure you that the eldest girl, Elsie, is a regular stunner. You'll lose your heart in five minutes—but sorry, old man, I forgot you're no longer fancy free."

"If this is a practical joke you're playing, Charlie, all I can say is that it's rather ill-timed, don't you think so?" said Langdale seriously.

"Oh, dear, no. Christmas with your intended is always the ideal season, is it not?"

He withdrew with a chuckle, and a few minutes later Langdale followed him down into the drawing-room, where mutual introductions ensued. If his treatment of Mrs. Craig was perhaps a trifle chilly, he certainly did not visit the sins of the parents upon the children, for he sat and chatted with her two daughters all the evening, and the following day distinguished himself by monopolising the attention of the elder girl from breakfast till dinner-time.

It was not until he retired to rest that night that the recollection of his position came back to him, and he knew that the £300 a year was quickly slipping from his grasp.

He had fallen in love with Elsie Craig, but to be compelled to marry her mother and acknowledge the girl he loved as his step-daughter was absolutely too outrageous, sacrilege almost. What was more, he speedily came to the conclusion that he would not be driven into an obnoxious union, so decided to think no more of the legacy. But his loss was not destined to be altogether forgotten, for in the middle of the night a cat's concert on the greenhouse below his window woke him with a start.

“And to think that I'm robbing myself to preserve such reptiles!” he gasped. And jumping up he threw open the window, and dashed the contents of his water-jug upon his feline serenaders with more than usual zest. Then getting into bed again he soon tumbled off to sleep.

The dawn of Boxing Day brought no change in his resolve, and without telling Fraser of his decision, he followed Elsie into the small sitting-room that adjoined the conservatory when dinner was over.

“There's a rather pretty poem in there on Christmas,” she said, laying down a magazine as he took a seat on the ottoman by her side. “That reminds me, Charlie says that you're a real live editor. Is it true?”

“I am one of those unfortunate individuals,” he responded, drawing near.

“Why ‘unfortunate’? You have only to sit at your desks all day long and decline manuscripts with thanks.”

“But we have to write a good deal ourselves.”

“That is not work; it's a pleasure.”

“How do you know?” he asked inquisitively.

“Because I write a little myself. Fearful nonsense I'm afraid though.”

“Do you really? Love stories I suppose?”

“No, matrimonial notes. At least, I contribute a page to a weekly periodical on the subject regularly.”

“What!” he cried, starting up. “You're not—who are you?”

“I'm ‘Mrs. Matchem’ of the Comet, and you're my editor. I fear I've kept my secret very badly.”

“But I don't understand. Mrs. Craig—who's she?” he asked mystified, and dropping to the ottoman again.

“My mother, of course. But I'd better explain. It was Charlie Fraser who got me the work in the first instance, and we thought you'd think me so young and—and inexperienced to write matrimonial notes, so agreed that mother should take my ‘copy’ up to the office every week. I'm afraid it was very deceitful, but——”

“What a splendid idea! I knew it couldn't be your mother all the time! Please accept my congratulations on sending in such excellent work, and I hope you'll continue to write for us. Do you know, I think you must have brought about many a happy union through those notes of yours.”

“I hope so.”

“And since you seem to be so well up in matrimonial matters I'm going to ask you a question myself. I think you might answer it without waiting to put a reply in the paper. Will you be my wife?”

She inclined her head, and he saw the roses flush up in her cheek.

“But you must tell me what I wish to know first,” she bargained.

“With pleasure.”

“If you marry me do you get £300 a year and a thousand pounds down?”

“Ha! ha! I'm afraid I do! But I had made up my mind to ask you to-night to marry me long before I knew who you really were,” he replied.

“I don't mean to infer that you wished to marry me for the sake of the legacy,” she said. “Only, strangely enough, a similar bequest becomes mine if I marry you, so if you're greedy I must be accused of greed also.”

“A similar bequest?” he repeated.

“Yes, I am a distant relative of your uncle, so I suppose am a cousin—about ten times removed—to you. He knew my secret, and liked my work; indeed, I am conceited enough to say that I was a favourite of his. Nevertheless, I did not expect such a handsome legacy.”

“But are we to keep out legacies, or are the cats to have them? It all rests with you, you know.”

“I don't think the cats want them very much, do they?” she said naïvely as she turned her head away.

Half-an-hour later, as Langdale went in search of Fraser, he collided with him at the dining-room door.

“Come inside a moment,” he said. “Now, I don't know whether to thank you or kick you for the prank you've been playing, but as I've got the girl I'll do the former. Why didn't you tell me in the beginning that Elsie was our real correspondent?”

“Because I wanted some fun, and you can congratulate yourself on having afforded it me. But since I've done you a good turn—if you like to call it so—you must do me one. The fact is I've asked your sister.”

“And been ‘declined with thanks’?”

“No. To tell the truth, with your consent I'm accepted.”

“Girls are always useful in a delicate case like this!” said Langdale, recalling his comrade's remark of a few days previously.

“Except when they've got more important business to attend to!” rejoined the other with a broad smile.

DON FELIPE'S MASTERPIECE;

OR, THE CHANGED FACE.*

A STORY OF SPAIN. By VICTOR LORENZO WHITECHURCH.

OLD Don Felipe da Castro stood leaning upon his silver-headed cane under the shadow of a pillar in the side aisle of the cathedral of Valencia, listening to the deep-toned Gregorians of the choir, and ever and anon glancing at the crowd of worshippers. It was a Saint's Day, and Mass was being sung at the High Altar. Kneeling, or standing with heads bowed in prayer, was a motley group of men and women, the former radiant in the bright costumes of a couple of centuries ago, the latter draped in those graceful mantillas which still characterise the women of sunny Spain.

Don Felipe da Castro, though short and insignificant in stature, was a man to be marked out of many in a crowd. His was the face of a philosopher and an artist, marked by many a deep and thoughtful line, and sweetened by a smile that every now and then broke out around his little white moustache and pointed beard. His deep-set, mellow, dark eyes were those of one who had studied human nature deeply, who knew its faults as well as its beauties, but who had never given way to that cynicism which so often distinguishes the student of humanity. Kindliness as well as judgment shone forth in every glance of his penetrating eyes.

Advanced as he was in years, he was almost the oldest of the throng of worshippers, and he knew them nearly all. As he stood shrouded in gloom, his mind wandered at times from the priest in his rich vestments to those who knelt and stood around him. He thought of a generation that was not his own, that he was to leave behind him upon the earth, to carry on the work of the comrades of his own time. More especially, and with a touch more of pleasure than regret, did the latter thought strike him as his eyes fell upon a young man standing a few paces in front of him and towards the middle aisle. He watched the handsome, black bearded profile of Juan de Villagarcia as a father looks at his favourite son, or, as in this case, the master artist looks upon his favourite pupil. Juan de Villagarcia was a man of about five-and-twenty, in the heyday of health, vigour, and manly beauty; and more than one were the soft glances that stole in his direction from beneath the dark mantillas, in spite of the watchful care of stern duennas.

Juan de Villagarcia, in his turn, appeared to be not so much engrossed in his worship as a good Catholic should have been. His eyes were steadily directed to a point slightly in front of him. The old man followed his gaze, and an expression of pain shone forth in his face as he found the object that was engrossing his pupil's attention, a beautiful face gazing upward in rapt devotion —the face of a girl who could vie with all others in Valencia and bear off the palm of southern beauty—that of Inez Mercator. Delicate ivory hands held a string of beads, the fingers playing with them listlessly: the kneeling posture was one of grace, and it was small wonder that Juan de Villagarcia's soul was not ascending unto Heaven with the prayers of the priest, but was chained down to earth by the spell of a fair woman.

More heavily still leant Don Felipe upon his cane, and listlessly fell the "Ite Mina est" of the deacon upon his ears as he bowed his head in thought. As he raised it, Inez Mercator, accompanied by her duenna, was leaving the cathedral, and he noted the quick glance she shot at Juan de Villagarcia as she passed him, and the deep colour rising in the young man's face.

As Don Felipe da Castro stepped out into the sunshine once more he was greeted with many a graceful raising of the sombrero and a soft "Buenos dias, señor," for everyone knew him. Who was he but the greatest painter their city had ever known, the man who made his portraits live on the canvas? Proud, indeed, was the family in Valencia, or even in Seville and Madrid, a member of which had been painted by "al gran maestro," and the gentle hearts of many of his fellow townsmen ached with sorrow as they beheld their beloved artist beginning to totter towards the unknown "mañana" that awaits us all.

Courteous and dignified, the old painter returned the salutations of his fellow citizens, but with less of a smile than usual, nor stayed he to talk with any, but walked back thoughtfully to his house, entered his studio, and threw himself down upon a chair.

He might have been seated thus for half-an-hour or more, when the door of the studio was thrown open and Juan de Villagarcia himself entered the room.

"Good morning, Señor," he said.

"Ah, Juan, is that you?" replied the master. "I had almost forgotten that you were to have a lesson this morning."

"And in truth, my master, I should not have been altogether sorry not to have had one, for it happens that I am in a lazy mood to-day."

"Those who are destined for great things must never be lazy," said the old painter gravely, "and I like not to hear such words."

The young man stood somewhat abashed before this rebuke.

"I meant nothing," he said, "only one does not always feel inclined to work. Besides," he added with a charming compliment, "one never thinks of one's own possible greatness in the presence of Don Felipe da Castro. All that is greatest is his alone."

"Ah, Juan, you should remember I have reached an age when compliments fall flat. Also, I would ask you, does the presence of Don Felipe inspire you with laziness? If, indeed, I am as worthy as you say, it should rather inspire you to emulate such greatness, to make it your own after—after——"

A beautiful face gazing upward in rapt devotion.

"After what?" asked the young man anxiously.

In answer the painter rose from from his chair and placed his hand on the other's shoulder.

"My son," he said softly, "it cannot be so very long before my brush and palette will have to be resigned, before I, myself, take my journey hence, before——"

"Stop, stop, my master!" cried the young man passionately. "I will not hear you say such things. We cannot lose you."

"Listen to me, Juan," replied the old man. "Listen, and be calm. Do you not see that my greatest consolation would be to know that my work will be carried on? Do you not see the hopes I have placed in you, my son?"

"What—what do you mean?"

"Do you think that I have had no object in teaching you my art? Oh, Juan, it has been my joy to think that you will one day follow in your master's footsteps! I know it is somewhat selfish, but I have loved my work; and I loathe to leave it without the thought that you, my best beloved disciple, will take it up after me."

"Oh, my master—it is too much—I am not worthy—I know so little."

"As yet, Juan. But you have in you the making of a great artist. It will rest with yourself, with your own faithfulness and courage, to make your name great. Confess now. You love your art?"

"Yes, yes. You know I do."

"Then why is it, Juan, that of late your energies have fallen back, that your touch has lost in power and your eye in discernment. I have noted your lack of enthusiasm. Why is it?"

The young man looked in wonder at his master.

"I did not know," he stammered, but the other interrupted him.

"Juan de Villagarcia, I will show you why. You say you love your art, but that is not the only object of your affections. Behold!"

And, striding forward towards an easel upon which was a picture covered with a cloth, the old painter snatched away the covering, and there stood the beautiful face of Inez Mercator.

"You think me a wizard?" said the painter, with a smile at Juan's astonished face. "But no, it is very simple. I have been painting her portrait, and this is a study I made for my own use. The rest is palpable. I have not been a student of human nature all these years without being able to tell when a young man is in love. I could not see you both at Mass this morning without your secret being revealed to me."

The young man blushed violently for a moment, and then said:

"And if you have guessed my secret, I am not ashamed of it. What then?"

"You have made a great mistake. Nay, be not angry with me, but hear what I have to say. Donna Inez is not the helpmate for the rising young master, Juan de Villagarcia."

"Señor, señor, you know her not."

"It is because I know her, my son, that I say so. Do you think I have painted God's image for nigh on three-score years without being able to discern the evils that so often mar that image? Do you think I cannot see the mind—the very soul—beneath each face I study? You need someone who will prove more than faithful to you, faithful to your life's work. Inez Mercator will not prove such."

"It is only from you, my master, that I would hear such words. But they are false."

"They are true. It is because I love you, because I wish to see you great, that I say resign this woman for ever!"

"Señor!"

"Yes, I mean it. Choose not only between her and fame, but between her and faithfulness. She has a beautiful face! Yes. But I know the soul beneath."

The young man drew himself up, his nostrils quivering with indignation, his lips white with restrained passion, and said:

"Don Felipe da Castro, your age and my love for you make me calm. But listen. I love my work, and I love Inez Mercator, and I will be faithful to both. Yes! I take the high destiny that you have marked out for me, and from this day you shall never have cause to reproach me for idleness, nor shall you say that art suffers from love. I do not say that I can ever equal you, but I swear I will follow you. And I swear, also, my master, that I will marry the woman I love, nor shall you, or any other man, come between us."

Don Felipe listened gravely and then said:

"Enough, my son. I take your promise to me. As for the other I have warned you——"

"Say no more——."

"I will not. There is no reason in the prison of love, Juan."

And the two settled to their work. When, after the lesson was over, the young man was about to depart, he turned once to the portrait of Inez Mercator and gazed at it fervently.

"Senor," he said, "may I ask you a great favour?"

"What is it, Juan?"

"That you will give me that picture."

Don Felipe da Castro hesitated for a moment before he answered. Then he said:

"No, I will not give you that picture. It is a mere study—it does not represent her as she is."

"Oh, it is perfection!"

The old man smiled.

"You have much to learn in art and human nature, yet. There is something wanting in that picture that perhaps it is as well you should never know. But, if I am to give you a faithful portrait, I must supply it."

"Oh joy! you will finish it?"

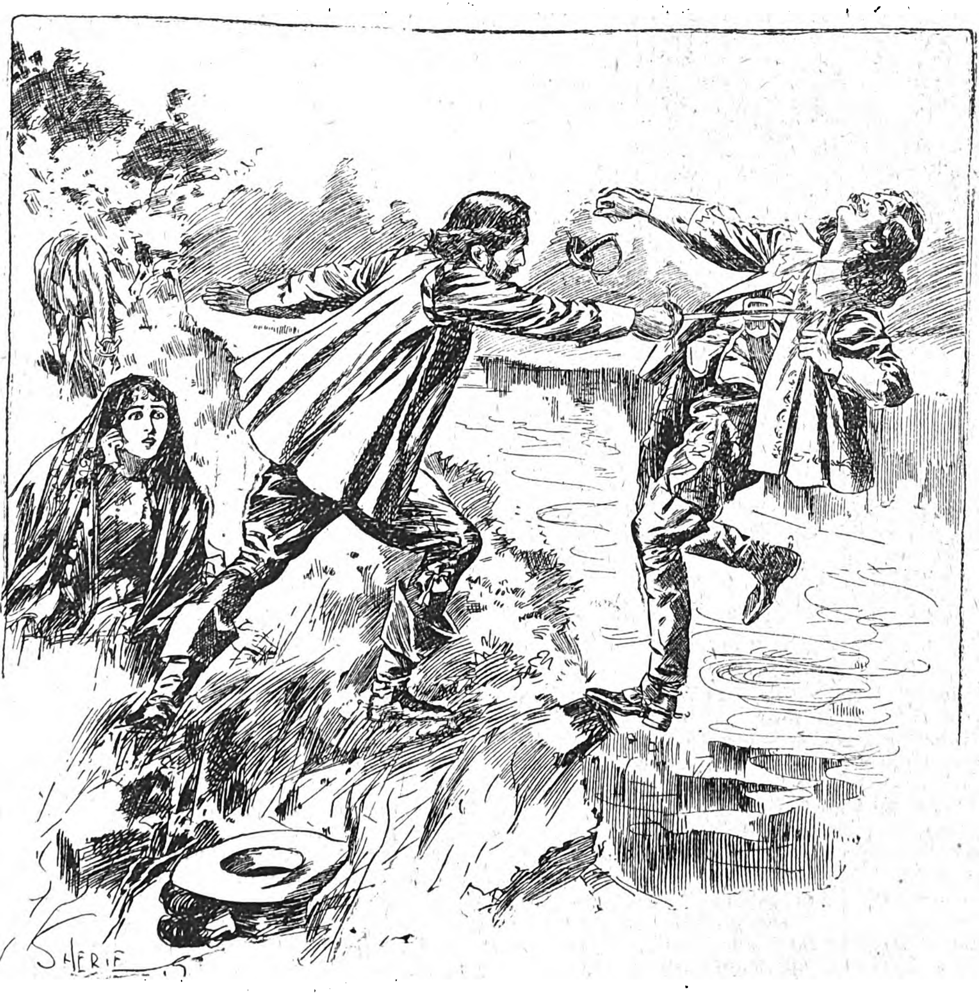
"No. But I will present you with a portrait of Inez Mercator in good time."

When the young man had departed, Don Felipe remained standing, with eyes fixed upon the portrait. Then he shook his head sadly, and turned away with a sigh.

"Alas," he said, "that when beauty is but skin deep, the instinct of man will probe no deeper!"

* * * * * *

Nearly a year had elapsed. Don Felipe da Castro had grown feebler still, and leant more heavily upon his cane as he left his house one morning, followed by a servant bearing a package, and wended his way slowly towards the house of his favourite pupil.



With a stifled moan Guadara fell backwards.

Juan de Villagarcia received him with much affection; as soon as the old man was seated he asked for an easel to be brought into the room, and bade his servant unwrap the package. Having dismissed him, he placed upon the easel a portrait of Inez Mercator.

"I have kept my promise, my son," he said, as soon as the young man had ended his profusion of thanks. "It is your wedding day to-morrow, and I have brought you a gift for it."

"Why, is it not the same portrait that I saw in your studio, Senor?"

"No, Juan, it may seem to you the same, but it is not. Listen, and do not be angry. As long as you love your wife and believe her to be worthy of your love, you will not see the difference; but if you once have cause to doubt or hate her—"

"Señor!"

"If, I say. I pray it may never be so; then, look at that picture, and remember the warning of Felipe da Castro. And now, farewell, my son, and forget not your work. As for this picture, it is the last, perchance, that I shall paint. And it may be, it is my best."

When the master was gone the pupil looked long and earnestly at the picture. Then he murmured:

"Ah, beloved! thou art all perfection. There is naught but love, and beauty, and faithfulness in thy face! Some silly phantom of the mind hath bewitched Don Felipe, but he has not reproduced it here!"

And he set his lips to the cold canvas and kissed the picture of his betrothed.

Gay was the scene in the Cathedral on the morrow; and yet there were tears in the eyes of one who watched the bridal pair bow beneath the benediction of the priest. Poor Don Felipe da Castro. Scarce two months passed, and that gay scene had changed into one of mourning as the solemn Mass for the Dead was chanted, and a coffin surrounded by blazing torches stood in the aisle, and was afterwards lowered into a spot close to where he had so often stood to worship. The great master was dead!

One man, who remained long after the crowd of citizens had softly passed out, one man, down whose cheeks the tears were running fast, despite the fact that he had only just obtained man's greatest earthly treasure—the woman whom he loved for his wife—knelt down beside the grave and prayed to God to make him worthy of the master who was no more, to help him to carry out that master's wish in his own work.

* * * * *

Five years had passed, and already Valencia was beginning to realise that the mantle of the prophet had fallen upon his disciple. Long and earnestly had Juan de Villagarcia toiled in the stony paths of art, and now his fame as a portrait painter was beginning to go forth among men. He had sacrificed much to carry out his master's wish, for it was entirely his own ambition that had urged his course onward.

But, if he was wrapped up in his work, there was one, at least, that did not interest herself so much in it. He had never thoughtlessly neglected his wife; he had never doubted her interest in him or her faithfulness for a moment. It was she who was to blame. She hated the constant devotion to work that her husband evinced. It bored her, the painting of all these pictures, the hours spent in the studio. Besides, it was not her business. A man must work, but a woman must amuse herself. And she did. Juan did not notice it. Had his been a less exalted nature, he would have experienced the need of her help in buoying him up to his work; but he was so strong, so enduring, so striving in his character, that he did not see his wife's careless attitude because he did not need her attentive one. He laboured in his studio, he gave her his spare hours. And he was happy. Alas, that he was so blind; alas, that he did not notice how she was beginning to spend her spare hours. If a woman will amuse herself, there are always men to be found to amuse her.

Late one afternoon he was standing in his studio before an unfinished picture, studying a mass of drapery arranged on a lay figure, and murmuring:

"Ah, Inez would be able to give me the correct pose. I will send for her."

He clapped his hands and a servant appeared.

"Tell the Señora I wish to see her at once."

The servant bowed and departed. He was a long time gone, and Juan began to grow impatient. When he returned it was with a pale, scared face.

"The Señora is not here."

"Not here?"

"She has gone away. Her maid says she left the house early this morning."

"Well?"

"They say she has gone with the Marquis of Guadara."

"What?"

"Señor, she left this note; they have just found it."

"Give it me. Ha! Leave the room, Carlos."

He tore open the letter and read it. Dazed and staggered, he clasped his hands upon his brow and fell on his knees.

"Ten listurica, Dios! Have mercy, oh, God!" he groaned.

In his agony of grief he remained for ten minutes or more. Then he rose to his feet and tottered to the other side of the studio where a portrait hung in the light, the portrait that Don Felipe da Castro had painted for him. In anguish he raised his eyes to the beautiful face, exclaiming:

"Inez! Inez! It cannot be true. Art thou not mine own beloved wife? Speak, and tell me thou hast not proved false—that it is all a mocking dream. Inez—if it is so—Heaven, if it is so—I have never doubted thee for a moment until now—oh, God—what is this?"

Gazing as he was upon the picture, he suddenly started back in horror, his face blanched, his eyes protruding. For as he looked upon the outline of those lovely features there slowly grew, as it were beneath and mingled with the face before him, a vision of another face so absolutely hideous that a feeling of loathsomeness crept upon his soul. Long and steadily as he gazed upon the picture, so did the awful face beneath the surface-beauty of the woman grow upon him until all loveliness had vanished from the portrait, and he saw only the soul—the dread, realistic soul—that dwelt beneath supreme.

It was the masterpiece of Don Felipe da Castro!

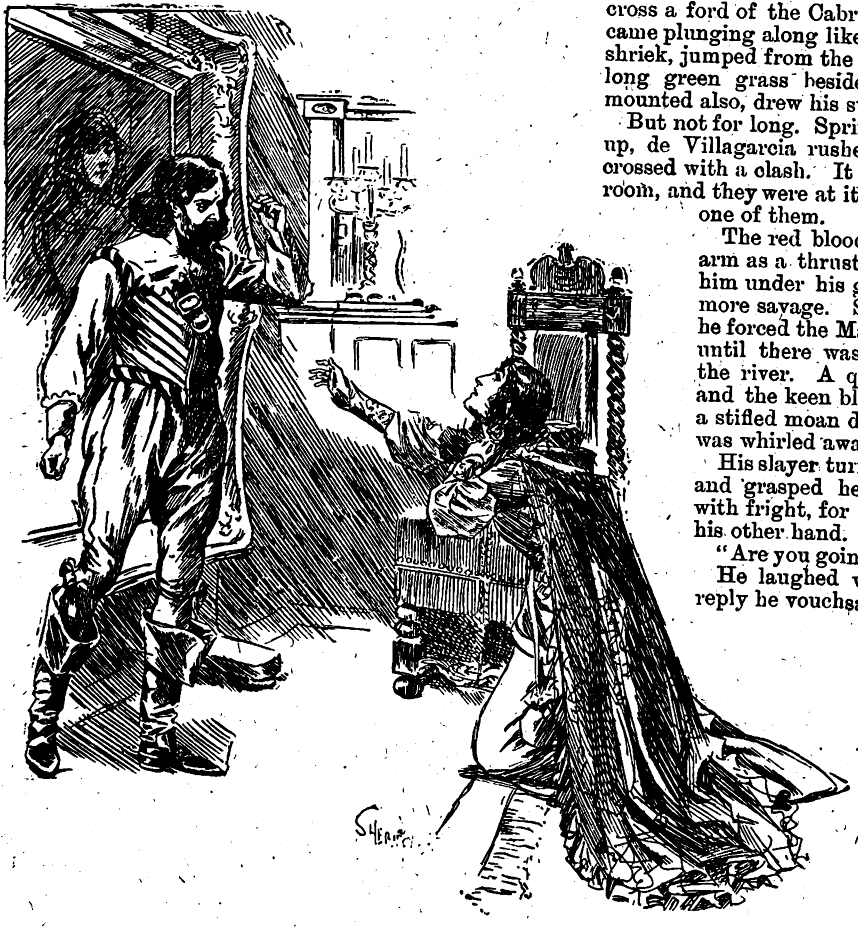
The wretched painter, on fire with grief and distraction, exclaimed:

"Oh, my master, my master, thou wert right! I see it all now. Fool, fool that I have been. Thou hadst eyes to probe where my folly could not penetrate, and thou hast painted the living soul of her I thought I loved. Thy meaning now is clear; that until I looked thereon with doubt or hatred I should never know. Oh, master, master, forgive me!"

He pointed a quivering arm at the picture.

"I see thee, Inez," he cried. "I see thee as thou art! I see thee as thou art!"

The stern implacable lesson of the man who was a master of his art and a master of the human soul besides was entering his mind. The hideous reality that the master had seen when he gazed upon that fair young face had been faithfully reproduced as he had seen it, and doubt had at length drawn it forth for another to see, and that other was Juan de Villagarcia, her husband!



“Oh, Juan! Juan! it is myself; have mercy!”

For a quarter of an hour he wrestled with the dread demons that surrounded him. Then, buckling on his rapier, he bounded into the courtyard and cried for his horse. Once more he was a man of action. The pursuit had commenced.

* * * * *

He found by inquiries they had started for Madrid on the Cuenca road. League after league he rode, gathering fresh traces of them. He had taken much money with him, and was able to obtain fresh horses. He rode all night. In the morning he drew up at a roadside posada, and found he was only an hour behind. There had been a breakdown. The Marquis de Guadara's carriage had been upset, the horses injured, and after much delay he and his companion had been obliged to proceed on a single horse, the only one obtainable, she riding with him in true Spanish fashion.

He spurred on. A pistol bullet came whizzing from behind a tree as he rode through a wood. One of the Marquis' retainers, doubtless, but he heeded it not. At length he saw them on their sorry steed, preparing to cross a ford of the Cabriel. They saw him, too, as he came plunging along like a demon. The woman gave a shriek, jumped from the horse, and buried her face in the long green grass beside the river. De Guadara dismounted also, drew his sword, and waited.

But not for long. Springing from his steed as he rode up, de Villagarcia rushed upon him, and their blades crossed with a clash. It was no match of the fencing room, and they were at it at once—fighting for the life of one of them.

The red blood spurted from de Villagarcia's arm as a thrust from the other's blade caught him under his guard. But it only made him more savage. Suddenly changing his ground, he forced the Marquis back with a furious rush until there was only a yard between him and the river. A quick feint, a lightning thrust, and the keen blade drew heart-blood, and with a stifled moan de Guadara fell backwards and was whirled away by the stream.

His slayer turned upon the trembling woman and grasped her by the arm. She shivered with fright, for the reeking sword was still in his other hand.

“Are you going to kill me, Juan?” she asked.

He laughed with scorn. That was all the reply he vouchsafed.

Then he changed the saddle of the steed he had overtaken to his own, placed her thereon, mounted himself, and the keeper of the posada, shrewd man that he was, asked no questions when he saw them both return together, for there was something in the man's face that prevented him.

They returned to Valencia. He never left her for a moment. As soon as he could he hired a carriage, sat in it by her side, but spoke no word.

At length they reached the house. Curious servants pried through peep-holes as they entered. But still he never spoke a word.

Dazed, affrighted, worn out with travel, sleeplessness and agony, the fair woman who had used him so ill was dragged into his studio, and forced into a chair before her own portrait.

And then he found his tongue.

“I am going to show you what you are,” he said. “I am going to show you as you appear to me now, to make you understand why I hate you and despise you a thousand times more than ever I loved you, why I love you no longer. I am going to make you see yourself, and hate yourself. Listen!”

And then he told her, slowly and deliberately, how Don Felipe da Castro had warned him years before concerning her, told her the story of the picture, told her how the picture had at length revealed to him the truth.

"And see," he cried, "the soul of you that lies beneath that transient beauty. Watch! I will trace its features."

Her gaze fixed with horror on the picture. At length she too saw what the master had portrayed. Falling down on her knees she shrieked:

"Oh, Juan! Juan! it is myself; I feel it now. I see the baneful lines. Juan, have mercy—don't—don't kill me! I am not fit to die!"

"Fit to die or fit to live," he cried with flashing eyes, "I care not. I only know I shall hate you for evermore. As you value your worthless life, do not leave this room."

He rushed from the room for a moment or two, and then returned with a glass of wine, which he placed on a table.

"That is poison," he said. "You have your life in your own hands. When I return I care not whether I find a corpse, or whether you have gone. I do not wish to find you here alive. You understand!"

People turned to notice the terrible look upon his face as he walked towards the old Cathedral. A priest within watched him kneel before the tomb of the master painter. The same priest returning an hour afterwards found him still there, praying earnestly.

Presently he rose and walked back to his home, with the air of a man dazed and lost to the world. Slowly he entered his studio and gazed around in the fading light.

It was empty! and the glass of wine still stood upon the table where he had left it, untouched.

He took it up, laughed softly to himself, and murmured:

"So she was afraid! Ha! ha! I thought it would be so."

He raised the glass to his lips and then paused.

"No," he soliloquised, "I don't think he would have said so. He would have called me a coward. . . . It is hardest not to do it. . . . I will not be a coward!"

Then he dashed the contents of the glass full in the face of Don Felipe da Castro's picture and turned on his heel.

* * * * *

"You've been in Spain, old chap," said Dick Harris to the friend who was with him. "Now I want you to have a look at a picture I picked up in Tarragon four or five years ago. It's in my study, so let's go there."

In a moment or two the two men were standing before a portrait of a beautiful girl.

"What a lovely face, Harris! Why, it's a perfect masterpiece!"

"It is, indeed, as I'll show you in a minute. Now, I bought that picture at an old lumber shop. No one knew anything about it, but I took a fancy to the thing, and didn't care who painted it. About a year ago I discovered something unnatural about it."

"What?"

"Well, it fell on my head, nail came out or something, and I turned upon it in a temper—you'll think me a fool—and swore at it. Then, suddenly, I saw a hidden face glaring at me beneath the beautiful one, and the strange thing is, that whenever I've looked at it since, I've only seen that hideous face—it's quite shut out the other. Can you see it?"

"No. You've hit on some curious hallucination."

"I haven't. See, I'll trace the outline—so. . . . Do you see it now?"

"Great Heavens, yes—how terrible! Stop a bit, Harris, I've seen that woman's face before!"

"Where?"

"Ah, I remember now. In a monastery near Valencia; it was a painting of Judas Iscariot, and I've often wondered why the face was that of a woman's more than a man's."

"Who did it?"

"A monk, they told me—about a couple of hundred years ago. He had been a pupil of the great painter da Castro."

"H'm! Wonder if he painted this ghastly thing to warn anybody. Let's come back and have a glass of wine. It's enough to give anybody the shudders!"

CHAPTER XXVI.

Settling Accounts.

The blow had fallen, the blow that Morgan Chandler had been apprehending ever since he set eyes upon his present master. Before then he had imagined that he had so "arranged matters" in the books that no one who had not spent years on the accounts and on the estate could lay a finger on one false figure.

But he had to meet a different type of man to what he had anticipated. A man with a brain so strong and clear that no figures seemed too big or complex for it to grapple with, none too small for him to spot them, pick them out, and sort them. And at last the long threatened ordeal had arrived, and it had actually arrived in the most truculent fashion. One evening Ned Fletcher, after a knock at the door that in itself had seemed imperative and insolent, had burst in and blurted out:

"You're to attend the Squire in the library, Mr. Chandler, and to take the balance-sheet, the profit and loss account, and the books and vouchers."

"What do you mean, blundering into my office in that fashion!" he shouted angrily, stung beyond endurance by the very look in the face of the man he hated; the man he had not long ago turned out of employment, out of his very house and home, and the man whose every look told that he had not forgotten!

"What do I mean?" asked Fletcher defiantly. "What I want to know is what do you mean?"

"Don't argue with me."

"And don't try to browbeat me! The day's gone for that, Mr. Chandler."

"You insolent vagabond!"

"No names, you're not master here now. My master's your master, and we're man to man."

"Yes, we're man to man, but we're face to face. You can't strike me from behind now," and, as often happens, rage let loose, hurled the bolt of suspicion discretion would have kept back.

"What do you mean, blame me! If thee says I ever hit thee or any other man from behind I'll strike thee face to face."

White and quivering with passion, Morgan Chandler made a blow at the other and in a moment was tripped up and sent sprawling by a neat twist that in earlier days had sent many a keeper and night watcher to grass. An oath escaped Morgan Chandler. From the end of the corridor came an imperious voice:

"What's all this clamour? What are you two men doing here quarrelling, brawling, actually fighting in my house? Confound you! If you don't both desist I'll pitch the pair of you down the stairs," and, meaning what he said, their master strode along and stood between them.

"Silence!" he shouted as each started to urge his own case. "Fletcher, get about your business, and you, Chandler, pick up those books and follow me."

Both men obeyed, Chandler, vaguely grasping at any straw which might save him, on entering the library broke out into a tirade.

"I'll not stop here to be insulted by a lout dragged off the land, to be struck in the face by the very man that I believe had a hand in trying to murder me the other night."

"Very well, my friend, it's a free country—for those who are at large! When do you want to leave?"

"This week—this very day, this very hour, now, this minute!"

"No, no! Not one minute before we've gone through your accounts."

The other in desperation strove to bluster.

"Drop that!" said his master, sternly though quietly, and closing the door he turned the key. "Sit down there," he said, and the other obeyed, though he would have given worlds for the will power to have mutinied.

Then ensued for Morgan Chandler a desperately bad quarter of an hour. Deliberately, methodically, pitilessly, the man seated at the library table went through the accounts before him, placing an unerring finger on item after item that the unjust steward had falsified.

"That is a lie! That is ten pounds less than you received! This account has been paid! The man holds your receipt, don't tell me he's forged it! He's got his cheque with your own indorsement on it, passed through your bank and his own, I've seen the entry in his pass book. You paid on this date forty-two pounds, not fifty-nine! This woman's executors demand to be refunded three quarters' rent, the receipts for which they found among the dead woman's papers."

And so on, and so on. And Morgan Chandler sat there, his heart sinking within him, hearing count after count of the indictment that perchance might mean the broad arrow and the chain gang. At first, feebly arguing and protesting, but at last, listening sullenly, despairingly.

Then his accuser closed the last book and looked him in the face, and so doing hurled like a blow at him one word:

"Thief!"

"But, Squire," the man said at last, the appeal broke from his tongue parched with terror, "you won't put me away, you'll have mercy?"

"What mercy had you on the poor devils you've sold up, lock, stock, and barrel, and turned on the road before—I came back?"

"But, Squire, I did one thing. I tried to save your life—that night I followed the robbers into your room."

"Liar!"

Another word hurled in the man's face made him blink.

"You went into that room intent on murdering me."

A paroxysm of abject terror seized Morgan Chandler. There was something terrible, something suggestive of black magic about this man, who seemed to know everything, who seemed to lay bare Chandler's brain and soul.

"Mercy, mercy, Squire—"

"Squire—Squire!"

There was a loud knocking at the door, and, the Squire unlocking it, Ned Fletcher burst into the room, quivering with excitement.

"They've caught 'em."

"Caught whom?"

"The murderers; the men who broke into Dalehurst Grange and killed John Barker."

"What on earth are you talking about?" Then exclaiming to Chandler: "Wait here one moment," he left the library, following Ned Fletcher out into the hall.

"What—what will I do? What will he do?" soliloquised Morgan Chandler. "Will he charge me? Shall I be dragged through the village to the lock-up, charged before the justices, and sent to take my trial? Oh! how the folks that hate me, and that's most that I know, will rejoice! Shall I make a bolt for it now? No, I haven't the strength nor the heart."

His eyes fell on an open trunk bearing the label of the line by whose vessel Cyril Roylance had returned to England, and the big R. in black letters. Oh! since such things as shipwrecks were, why hadn't that ship of all others been wrecked, sunk with all on board? It was open. Merely to detach his mind from the agony of suspense that was racking it, he walked across the room and looked into the open trunk, crammed with a varied collection, mostly books and papers, toilet incidentals, a cap or two, one with a cricket badge, athletic and other club rules and registers, and other miscellaneous articles. There was a copy of the "Sydney Bulletin," with red ink crosses marking one picture. His eye catching those crosses, he read the underline, "The Banderville Cricket Team who have just completed their successful Tour," and in smaller type under the figures in the front line and above those in the rear of the group were printed their names.

"Mr. Cyril Roylance." Why, the printer had made a mistake! That wasn't the Squire, and mechanically his eye roved over the group in quest of him. But in a vain quest! What on earth did it mean? There it was, in black and white in print, which was regarded in Morgan Chandler's mind with a considerable amount of reverence. It wasn't a bit like him! With a stealthy glance at the door he turned over the miscellaneous collection, which, as a matter of fact, the Squire had that morning unlocked with a view to assorting and partly destroying. What was this? A pack of cards; no, photographs. He scanned them; mostly of young fellows, many in cricket and cycling costume, one or two pictures of actresses, another, cabinet size, of that group in the "Sydney Bulletin," and one carte de visite of the very man labelled in the newspaper Mr. Cyril Roylance.

And diagonally across the right-hand corner was writing. With an exclamation of amazement, of bewilderment, of exultation, Morgan Chandler read aloud, "Yours faithfully, Cyril Roylance." And at that moment the Squire, with a strange, unsettled look in his face and eyes, the look of a hunted savage animal, entered the room, relocking the door.

The news he had heard had for the moment banished Morgan Chandler from his mind. Catching sight of him he snarled:

"Ah, yes, there's you to deal with, I'd forgotten you. Look here, my friend Morgan Chandler, I'll give you just this chance, get from here as fast as your legs can carry you, and, unless I have within twenty-four hours a wire from you that you're one hundred miles away, I'll place these in the hands of the police and——"

He paused significantly.

And the other man, with a change of demeanour, his thumbs in the arm-holes of his waistcoat, echoed as insolently as possible:

"And?"

"What's your game, my friend?"

"That's my business. Shall I tell you what your game is? It's bluff."

"You scoundrel, what do you mean?"

"What do I mean? I mean scoundrel yourself! It's bluff I say, but I've seen your cards and they ain't good enough, for there's one worth all your hand!"

And he held out for a moment the carte de visite signed by Cyril Roylance.

"No, you don't!" he exclaimed, snatching it away as the other made a dash for it.

In another moment Dick Seldon, like the tiger whose name he had won, sprang at him, but Chandler, avoiding the encounter, darted behind the desk, snatched up a letterweight, and hurled it full at the other. It struck him in the forehead, and in an instant the blood came raining down.

"Curse you! I'll lay you out. You shan't leave this room alive!"

And, knowing that his antagonist meant what he said, Chandler flew from desk to table, dodging the man who chased him, and from the table he snatched up a reading lamp, hurling that, too, at the face, the cruel face, all the more terrible because of the blood streaks lining it, of the man springing upon him.

But this time that man ducked, and the lamp went hurtling across the room, shattering against the embrasure of the windows and falling like a flaming ball, setting the lace curtains in a blaze.

"Help—help!" shouted Chandler, making one more dash, this time for the door.

But Tiger Dick was upon him, had clutched him by the throat and laced his fingers behind his neck, and was closing his thumbs upon his wind-pipe. For a moment they wrestled, then Morgan Chandler went down limp, helpless, whimpering, gasping. And the other knelt upon him.

"You've asked for it, you shall have it!" he said.

And the red mist was in his eyes, the red mist filled his brain and soul, murderer by instinct and by trade, he did his wicked work then and there.

Then he rose up, more like fiend incarnate than man, looked at his hands, they, too, were crimson now, crimson once again, looked with awful dilating eyes at what was lying at his feet; then, turning away, he glanced around him. Why, everything was crimson now, crimson flame!

CHAPTER XXVII.

The End of All.

Ned Fletcher, dispatched post haste from the Hall to the village to bring back the latest and most authentic news, trudged along dutifully, wondering why the Squire should have been so agitated by the intelligence that the detective from London had arrested those two brothers Nubbley and charged them with the murder at Dalehurst Grange, and of the strange rat cure for rheumatism effected by the zealous officer, together with the simultaneous falling off of hair.

"And him generally as cool as a cucumber, never startled by anything, but then, of course, 'twould come all the more home to him, seeing as how they went for him too, not as I can understand that there Chandler having the pluck to follow 'em up, or them clearin' out after sending him to sleep, unless as 'ow he hollered. Hullo! who's that yonder movin' among the bushes?"

He started at a jog trot across the parkland grass, heavy with the night dews.

"Who be you, and what be you doin' here?" he challenged.

"Mind your own business."

"'Tis my business. I've a right to know, and I mean to know."

"But I shan't tell you."

"Won't you. Then I'll take you to those as'll make you."

Dashing over and through a series of clumps of gorse and bracken, he sprang after the figure, now outlined against the grass land gleaming in the night, closed with it, tried the twist which had proved so efficacious in the case of Chandler. This time that back heel failed to come off, and Ned himself went heavily to earth, and his Thought She was Dying!

DEBILITY, HEART-WEAKNESS AND INSOMNIA.

COMPLETELY CURED BY BILE BEANS.

The marvellous manner in which Chas. Forde's Bile Beans for Biliousness saved a Bolton millworker's life has lately caused considerable comment in Lancashire. Ten years ago rheumatic fever left Mrs. Elizabeth Hodgson, of 13 Boundary Street, Halliwell, Bolton, with heart-weakness and general debility; and nothing was able to cure her until she took a course of Chas. Forde's Bile Beans for Biliousness. In fact, more than once she was believed to be at death's door.

To a Bolton Journal reporter who investigated the case, Mrs. Hodgson said: "I have worked as a weaver in Bolton mills since I was thirteen. Ten years ago while on a visit to Carlisle—my native place—I had an awful attack of rheumatic fever, and for a long time I was so weak that I could not lift a teaspoon to my mouth. The fever left me with shortness of breath, heart-weakness, my legs and hands were very much swollen, and I could not put my feet to the ground. Later on I was removed to Carlisle Infirmary, and nobody expected me to come out alive.

Some time afterwards I asked if I could leave, and I was told I might as well, as I should never be any better. At the end of seven weeks I was taken out of the Infirmary, and went to Cote Hill, near Carlisle, but even after that I was very ill. I came back to Bolton, and last August I got a little better and tried to do a bit of work at Messrs. Tristram's mill. It was no use, however, as I became so ill that two weavers had to take me home. They thought I was dying on the way. I really felt myself that I was done for!

I became an out-patient at the Bolton Infirmary, but I did not get better, and I kept lingering on as it were between life and death. I dreaded nights coming. I could not eat, I was always short of breath, and work was quite out of the question.

One day I took a few of Chas. Forde's Bile Beans, and next morning I felt a great change. I was able to walk about and wash-up, and I felt quite refreshed, as for the first time for a long while I had been able to sleep at night. At the week-end I got two boxes of Beans at Waller and Riley's Blackburn Road shop. I continued to take them until, after a comparatively short time, I felt thoroughly fit for work. All the people about were thoroughly amazed at the change in me.

Now I have entirely got rid of my old complaints, and feel as well as ever I did in my life. I can eat anything, sleep well, go up and down stairs without the slightest difficulty, and am weaving from morning till night, as I did before I had rheumatic fever."

adversary was making off when, across the pasture land, a group of men came hastening up. One of them turned the flash of a bull's eye full on the features of Jack Branscombe.

"Surrender!" cried a voice. And another, more familiar as well as more welcome to Jack Branscombe, shouted:

"Yes, Jack, surrender. It's all right now!"

And Jack Branscombe, walking up to the man who held the bulls-eye, said, folding his arms:

"Yes, here I am, what do you want with me?"

"Well, that's a matter to be decided later," said Inspector Rossiter. "Mr. Branscombe, it is my duty to arrest you."

"But you'll come with us quietly, won't you?" said Gerald Hastie, "you'll promise me, won't you, Jack?"

"I'll give you my word, Gerry," Branscombe replied, and the other exclaimed:

"There you are, Rossiter, I'll be answerable for him. He'll come with us, and we needn't turn back on our errand or be hampered in it."

"Seize that man," came another voice out of the darkness, and Ned Fletcher, hastening up, exclaimed: "Who are you all? Why, it's Mr. Rossiter, the very man the Squire sent me to see."

"Yes, Fletcher, I'm going to see the Squire."

"But where's the man who threw me just now? Why, here he is, and it's Mr. Branscombe. Oh! no wonder I met with a fall. But what's this mean? Aren't you going to make sure of him?"

"Shall I slip these on him, Mr. Rossiter," inquired the now deferential Bingle.

"No thanks," said the Inspector, "leave this matter in my hands. Not, however," he chuckled, "that I'm infallible, but there's no crusted port working the oracle this time, Bingle."

And his rural colleague, peace having been restored, replied:

"No, sir, nor yet none of that there Hollands. I shall never look a square-faced bottle in the face again."

"Your master's at home, then?" said the Inspector, turning to Ned, who trudging at Jack Branscombe's heels, determined he should not misuse the liberty so mysteriously given him, replied:

"Yes, sir."

"Then I'll give him a call," and, looking up at the speaker, Ned found himself walking alongside a man whose shoulders towered above his own head, and who went on:

"So that's Fallowfield Hall, the home that Cyril Roylance thought he'd never reach. How red those windows in the centre gleam?"

"By Jove! they do!" exclaimed Jack Branscombe. "And look, there's smoke and a tongue of flame breaking through one of them. They're not gleaming with light, but fire. Come along!"

And the whole party, quickening their footsteps, ran at full speed towards the terrace, and reaching the house they found the few servants on duty, tearing to and fro, setting the hydrants and hose to work.

It was the Oak Room, so called from its panelling, that was on fire, the room appropriated by the Squire as his own private study, and the old carved panelling, black and glistening with centuries, had caught like tinder and was blazing so fiercely that they had in vain tried to get along the corridors leading to the door. And, shuddering with horror, they whispered to each other that the Squire was in there.

Without a moment's loss of time willing hands placed ladders against the windows. Ned Fletcher, faithful and loyal to the man who had given him a chance, and meaning to give him this time one in return, dashed up the rungs, but, half-choked and blinded with smoke and scorched by the volcanic fury roaring from the windows, he was forced back, baffled and beaten by the rampant fire king. All hands were working with a will, Rossiter and those with him as vigorously as any.

"By Jove!" he shouted through the din, "I came out to take him, and I want to take him alive."

"Keep your eye on Branscombe," said Bingle, "mind he doesn't slip," but, turning, he saw the man of whom he had spoken stripped to the waist, clambering, hose in hand, up the ladder, fighting the fire-fiend face to face. And his next words were: "Mr. Hastie, you're right and I'm wrong, and I beg that man's pardon."

Ned Fletcher, darting up that ladder till he stood beside Jack Branscombe, said, too:

"I've done you wrong, sir, I've thought wrong o' you."

"Never mind that," shouted Jack excitedly, "what we've got to do now is to save your master if we can."

"We can't this way, sir," groaned Ned despairingly; then, suddenly, "but I think I know another way. Come along o' me, sir."

They slid down the ladder, together reached a door in the east wing leading to the offices, dashed into the now smoke-filled house, groped their way along galleries, staircases, corridors. At last they reached a room in the same corridor as the Oak Chamber, but on the opposite side. Wrapping around their heads, faces, and hands clothes saturated with water, they flung open one door, dashed pell mell across the corridor, seized the red hot handle of the other. The door was locked!

"Now, lad! Now for it!" shouted Branscombe, and they threw their joint weight against the door. It crashed open into the blazing room. There in the smoke they saw two figures, one groping in the red fog of smoke and flame, the other lying still! Jack, seizing the former, and exerting all the strength that had made him famous in the countryside, half-lifted, half-dragged it across the room back to the door.

"I'm done," his burden groaned, "who's risking his life to save mine?"

Whirling, dragging, halting, lifting him through the door and across that roaring, crackling, smoke-belching corridor into the other room, Jack half-gasped, half-shouted:

"Jack Branscombe!"

For he was not certain whether or not they would get back alive, and he meant that the man whom he knew to hate him, should, even at this last, know what he had done.

But, struggling manfully, he bore him into comparative safety, then looked around upon Ned Fletcher and, missing him, went back for him. At the door of the room he found him, more by touch than sight, on his knees and dragged him out of that raging fire to the gallery wherein his master was lying.

"I couldn't save the other," Ned groaned after a while, "for he was gone."

"Never mind, Ned, you've done your best. I think we can get this one safe away." And between them they lifted the charred, almost senseless, bundle of poor humanity, bore it away from that volcano, and so out of the great mansion so seriously threatened with demolition.

And just as Job Bingle's doubts were returning, he having missed the man so long suspected, that man scrambled down from a ground floor window along with Ned Fletcher, the pair bearing something inanimate between them.

Just then fire engines from different stations came dashing up, the brave brass-helmeted riders ceasing their warning shouts and leaping down to action in their battle with the fire king, that bravest of battles whereby peace wins victories as glorious as any claimed by war.

And, leaving this brave host of peace to fight and conquer, Rossiter and his companions busied themselves doing all they could for the man Jack Branscombe and Ned Fletcher had saved, bore him to a room in another wing unthreatened by the fire, and, having summoned medical assistance, they gathered round the couch whereon he lay.

"Who is it?" asked one of the frightened servants, and Fletcher answered in a broken voice:

"It's the Squire, the poor Squire!"

But Geoffrey Heseltine, looking down upon the pain-distorted face, said: "No, this isn't Cyril Roylance, whoever it may be."

Swiftly, deftly, they stripped his charred clothes from him. There on the shoulder, in one white space unscathed, unseamed, unshrivelled by fire, Rossiter beheld a long, deep, livid groove.

"No, no!" he said, "it's come back to me at last. I know him now. That's the mark of the bullet I almost downed him with in self defence five years ago. I've got two of the gang. I never dreamt to take their foreman. I thought him dead, that's why I never reasoned how it was his face and voice brought back old times. It's Tiger Dick! Whoever the man was they found in convict clothes dead in the River Dass, this is Richard Seldon."

The dying man's eyelids opened slowly and slightly as his own name fell upon his ears.

"Yes, you've got on the trail at last, Rossiter," he whispered painfully. "You used not to be so slow."

"Better late than never, Dick," said Rossiter gravely, and the other, with a faint flicker of the bravado which had been born in him and was living in him till this last, said, although with a gasp and a smile:

"But I've done you after all, I'm going to slip you; I shall be gone in a few minutes where you can't follow."

"I don't know that I'm particularly anxious to follow where you're going, Dick," Rossiter was saying, when Gerald Hastie raised his hand.

"Hush, hush, man. Those are not words to speed a fellow sinner to the Judgment Seat with. Richard Seldon, you have said what you know, that you are leaving this life; this, for you, unhappy life. Think, even in this last moment, can you do nothing to mitigate the evil you have done?"

"Not in your line, parson. I've been bad from the beginning."

"We're none of us good, and we've all got to go the journey you're going. Few, if any of us, are quite fit for that journey. Tell me, can we do anything to ease your pain of body?"

"No, the pain's gone now." Then, after a pause: "Thank you," and, after another pause, "Hastie you're a sportsman."

"Then can you do anything to ease your soul? Can you say anything that will lift suspicion from an innocent man? Think, man, it'll be something to have that to your account."

"Bah! my book's too heavy for me to hedge, especially now, the race is almost over. But, parson, who was it dragged me out?"

"It was me, master," sobbed Ned Fletcher, "me and Mr. Branscombe."

"Thank you, Ned. But Branscombe! S'truth! did you go in there after me?"

"I did."

"Well, you're a plucked 'un, I always knew you for that, though I hated you. Oh! I am going now. No! no! not yet. Parson, it's too late for me to do any good now, and yet, not too late to try! He dragged me out; he, the man I've tried to put away so. I'll do it with the last breath that's going from me. Listen, I downed Barker, I planted the locket Josh and Barney sneaked from Branscombe's chain. I planted it on the stairs: before that I killed Cyril Roylance in the train, changed togs with him, chucked him into the river when the train went over the bridge. I've been working this district with Josh and Barney, you've got them. I killed Morgan Chandler about an hour ago."

He fell back exhausted with the stress of speech.

"Oh! wicked, sinful man," said Gerald Hastie in tones such as none had ever heard him use before. "Think—think! you are on the threshold! While the life God has given you still burns in you, pray—pray! Utter one word! Think, one word! One supplication to the God you are about to meet for mercy."

"What's the use?"

"Because He died for sinners."

"For sinners, well, then He must have died for me. I'll take your tip, Gerald Hastie, you're a sportsman! Christ, mercy! Parson, stoop down, tell Mary I said that. She believes in him: she was named after His Mother!"

* * * * *

His head fell back just as the door opened and that Mary he had named glided into the room. Without a word, she sank on her knees, raining tears upon the charred and blistered hand. He said no other word, only for a moment the eyelids lifted again, something like a smile flitted over the pain-drawn face, and then those eyes were set in the gaze that sees no more—as we see things from here!

L'ENVOI.

So Tiger Dick cheated the gallows that Messrs. Branner and Plumb went to after all. And people began to put two and two together and relate what misgivings they had always entertained concerning him. Lord and Lady Limberg declared that they had always been certain he was a bad lot, and his lordship consulted his solicitor as to the possibility of recovering the money he was certain he had swindled him out of at cards, but the solicitor in question dashed all hopes by pointing out to him that the fellow had left no estate whatever, inasmuch as that which he had held immediately prior to his death belonged, not to himself, but to the legatee and devisee under the real Cyril Roylance's will, that was to say, Miss Doris Dale, since become Mrs. Branscombe.

For Harcourt Dale had made amends for his past injustice in so far as lay in his power by giving a free consent to his daughter's marriage with Jack Branscome, who at last stood vindicated before all the world, and Gerald Hastie made the man he reckoned the best chap in the world and the girl he considered the best girl in the world, bar one, perfectly happy by joining their hands in holy matrimony.

As for the lady he considers absolutely the best in the world, will he ever make her happy? Perhaps, for he lives up to that good old motto, Nil Desperandum!

And now the shadow has gone from her life. In the corner of the little churchyard a grassy mound marks the place where a turbulent mutineer against God's law rests, wicked though he was, within His Acre.

But there is one man who thinks of him and mourns him as a friend. That one is Ned Fletcher. He is leading an honest life by honest labour on the Fallowfield estate, for Jack Branscombe bore no malice, and Ned thinks his new master the best and kindest alive, but you can never get him to think otherwise of his late one.

And sometimes over the little churchyard wall he casts a regretful glance on that grassy mound, where sometimes there lies a handful of wild flowers, placed there by a little girl whom, once, the man who sleeps there snatched from under the horses' threatening hoofs.

THE END.

"I HEAR your husband is out of a job." "Why, he was never busier in his life." "What is he doing?" "Looking for work."

HE: "Ethel, what can it mean? Last night I dreamed that I proposed to you." SHE: "I should say that you are more sensible asleep than awake."

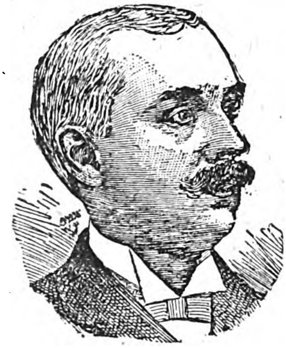
RHEUMATISM CURED

BY A REMEDY THAT HAS ENABLED MANY TO ABANDON CRUTCH AND CANE.

Trial Package FREE

On the theory that "seeing is believing," John A. Smith, of Milwaukee, U.S.A., wants everyone to try his remedy for the cure of rheumatism at his expense. For that reason he proposes to distribute 50,000 free sample packages among all persons sending him their address. Mr. Smith has suffered all the agony and torture from Rheumatism, tried all the remedies known, and yet utterly failed to find relief.

At times he was so helpless that he had to take to morphine, and after considerable doctoring he gave up in despair. He began studying into the causes of rheumatism; after much experimenting he finally hit upon a combination of drugs which completely cured him. The result was so beneficial to his entire system that he called his new-found remedy "Gloria Tonic." Those of his friends and relatives and neighbours suffering from rheumatism were next cured, and Mr. Smith concluded to offer his remedy to the world. But he found the task a difficult one, as nearly everybody had tried a hundred or more remedies, and they couldn't be made to believe that there was such a thing as a cure for rheumatism. But an old gentleman from Sequin wrote him saying if Mr. Smith would send him a sample he would try it, but as he had suffered forty-one years and wasted a fortune with doctors and advertised remedies, he wouldn't buy anything more until he knew it was worth something. The sample was sent; he purchased more, and the result was astonishing. He was completely cured. This gave Mr. Smith a new idea, and ever since that time he has been sending out free sample packages to all who apply. The result is that he is now the happy possessor of thousands of testimonials from people throughout the world who have been both greatly benefited and entirely cured by "Gloria Tonic." Prominent physicians had to admit that "Gloria Tonic" is a positive success, among them Dr. Quintero, of the University of Venezuela, to whom it was recommended by the United States Consul. In thousands of other instances the result has been the same. It cured many cases which defied Hospitals, Drugs, Electricity, and Medical Skill.



JOHN A. SMITH.

"Gloria Tonic" cured Mrs. H. Bester, of Welton, near Daventry, who has suffered for years. Mr. L. Pinkey, 3 Well Lane, Bridlington, a martyr to Rheumatism for 27 years, has been entirely cured through its use. Mr. J. Holden, of 28 Angles Road, Streatham, S.W., is an enthusiast over "Gloria Tonic." A neighbour of Mr. Holden, Mr. J. Crampton, 24 Angles Road, Streatham, S.W., says: "I can recommend 'Gloria Tonic' to all who suffer with Rheumatism, as I am thankful to say that your remedy has cured me entirely."

The following people have also been entirely cured through the use of "Gloria Tonic" attested to by testimonials which they have sent me: Mrs. J. Brewer, 59 St. Ann's Rd., Barking, E.; Mr. T. Marsh, 190 Bury New Rd., Whitefield, Lancs.; Mr. J. Metcalf, Hill Gill Farm, Mallerstang, Kirkby Stephen; Mrs. West, The Club, Surbiton: Mr. G. Chenneils, 11 Waterend, near Hemel Hempstead; Mrs. G. Hiron, 39 Stanley St., Queen's Rd., S.W.; Mr. E. Guest, Bissell St., Quinton, near Birmingham; Mrs. Sanderson, 22 West Park Rd., Newport, Mon.; Mr. L. Leyshon, 2 Gwindy Terrace, Pentrechwyth; Mrs. W. Smith, Applehouse, Tronston, Sandwick, Stromness; Mr. J. Helmsley, Hadlow Down, near Uckfield; Mr. P. Haslem, 32 Tanners Terrace, Ramsbottom; Mr. G. Mackay, Embo Dornoch, Sutherlandshire; Mr. J. Little, South Marston, Stretton St. Margaret's, Swindon.

Can I offer you better proofs of the merits of my remedy? These are only a few of hundreds of testimonials of recent date which I now hold.

On receipt of a postal card or a letter from you, mentioning this paper, you will receive by return of post, FREE, a trial package of "Gloria Tonic" a booklet on Rheumatism, and other literature of great interest to sufferers. Address—

THE MOST ASTOUNDING WORK OF MODERN TIMES.

Every year thousands of new books are published. They are read and forgotten. But once in a hundred years a new book appears which THE WORLD IS WAITING FOR. It contains some new truth which alters the history of mankind. Such a book has been issued, and is pronounced by the Press to be the MOST REMARKABLE WORK OF THE CENTURY. You will read it. If not to day, then some other day, for sooner or later it will be read by all men and all women. The writer of the book is Professor Boyd Laynard, who is now recognised as the greatest living authority on personal hygiene. The name of the book is "SECRETS OF BEAUTY, HEALTH, AND LONG LIFE." Its sale is rapidly approaching copies.

The publishers have issued a popular edition, at a price within the reach of all, so that the book may find a place in every home. The work is arranged in 127 chapters, the whole of which (in the popular edition now offered to the public) is bound in one volume. The book, although published at Two Shillings, will, if ordered direct from the Publishers, be forwarded to readers of Short Stories, carriage paid, at the low discount price of

ONE SHILLING AND SIXPENCE.

Among the numerous subjects dealt with, the following are but few. A complete syllabus, showing the contents of the whole of the 127 CHAPTERS, enumerating upwards of 500 SUBJECTS and divisions of subjects, can be had free on application to the Publishers:—

The way we make our own faces—Secrets of face transformation—Changeableness of beauty and its causes—Some strange facts concerning the variableness of beauty—"Odd-faced" beauty—The countenance the counterpart of the mind—How pleasing expressions become permanent—How a person's habitual look is acquired—How permanent expressions can be transformed—Metaphysical secrets of keeping young and preserving a youthful appearance—The author's investigations into the causes why some individuals look younger than others at a certain age—Discovery of a great metaphysical secret—Wonders of the skin—Effects of mental emotions upon the skin—Bad complexions and their causes—Diet that spoils and diet that improves the complexion—General care of the complexion—Construction, growth, and wonders of the hair—Why hair falls out—Premature greyness: its causes and prevention—General care of the hair—Superfluous hairs and how to treat them—Wrinkles: their prevention and treatment—Freckles, tan, and blackheads—Oily skin, dry skin, and loose skin—How the nose can be improved—Protruding ears and their treatment—Offensive breath—Anatomy of the teeth—Why teeth decay—General care of the teeth—Tallness, and how to attain it—Round shoulders and how to cure them—How to acquire a full chest—Perfect form and figure: their proper proportions—Thinness, and its treatment—Excessive stoutness—Care of the hands—Care of the feet—Physiognomy; or, the art of reading character from the face—Mental influences upon health—Power of the mind over the body—Influence of the mind in curing diseases—How the mind can cause dyspepsia—Effect of the direction of thought to the heart—How real diseases often supervene upon fancied ailments—How violent passions injure health—Laughter as a medicine—Ailments cured by laughter—Wonders of digestion—Relative value to our bodies of the principal articles of food—Fruits and vegetables as medicine: their various influences upon the physical system—Health-preserving diet and its consistency—Diet favourable to mental exertion and intellectual culture—Influence of various foods upon our passions and propensities—The influence exerted by the mind upon the appetite and digestion—Some perilous articles of food—Exercise and its relation to health—Baths and bathing: their influence upon health—The way we breathe, and how it affects our health—The marriage state, and its influence upon health—Statistics showing the comparative vitality of married and single persons—100 professions, trades, and occupations: their respective influences upon health and long life—Sleep, and its relation to health—Insomnia, and its treatment—The eyes, and how to preserve them—The ears and hearing: how to prevent deafness—The voice: its cultivation and preservation—Memory, and how to improve it—Sudden failure of memory—Rules for cultivating the memory—Influence of diet upon memory—Stammering, and how to cure it—Prevention of disease—Nervousness—Blushing: its physiology and treatment—Rules of life for attaining longevity—Compendium of the mental, moral, physical, and external influences that lessen the years of our earthly existence—How to live to a hundred—Premature old age and its causes—Short biographies of 30 modern centenarians, whose ages range from 115 to 185 years—General principles that can be laid down for the anticipation of longevity—The eight signs of long life.

Short Stories That . . .
. . . Make You Laugh.

We devote every week space in Short Stories to pithy, humorous anecdotes similar to those which appear in these columns. To those readers who submit storyettes which are used, a six shilling novel will be awarded. The anecdotes may be either original or selected; in the latter case, the source MUST be stated. Attempts must reach the Storyette Editor, Short Stories Office, Henrietta Street, Strand, London, W.C., by Monday, December 23rd. Postcards only, please.

He Had Already Done So.

THE blushing bride-elect was rehearsing the ceremony about to take place. "I shall expect you to give me away, papa," she said. "I'm afraid I have done it already, Caroline," replied the old man nervously. "I told your Herbert this morning you had a disposition just like your mother's."

Not a Paradise.

WESTERNER: "Goin' ter settle, are yer?" Tenderfoot: "Yes, I have come here to stay, and have already bought a home. I was attracted to this place by an item in the newspaper which said there had not been a lawsuit in your country for ten years." Westerner: "Waal, there ain't. You see there ain't no use goin' ter law when Winchester rifles is as cheap as they air now."

What Followed?

IT was little Tommy Smith's fifth birthday, and, while out for a walk with his mother, he met his Uncle Jack. Expecting a tip, he greeted his uncle with—"Uncle Jack, I am five years old to-day." To which his uncle replied: "Are you really? Well, I wish you many happy returns of the day, Tommy." Tommy being silent, his mother said: "Say 'Thank you, Uncle Jack.'" But Tommy, in disgust at not getting his expected tip, replied: "What, have I really got to say 'Fank you' when he ain't give me nuffink at all?"

Got What He Asked For.

"SAM, can you lend me a sovereign that you have no use for?" said Jim Webster to Sam Seddon one day. "Certainly, Jim; I shall be pleased to accommodate you," said Sam, handing Jim a sovereign. Jim was so surprised at his luck in getting the cash that he bit the coin to see if he were awake or dreaming, and in doing so discovered that the coin was a counterfeit. "This is a bad one, Sam. I didn't think you'd cheat me like this." "I know it's a bad 'un, Jim. You asked me for one I had no use for, and I gave it to you. What more do you want?"

Where It Hurt.

"YOU have a daughter, have you not, sir?" said a minister to an old gentleman with whom he had formed a casual acquaintance as a fellow passenger. The old gentleman essayed to answer, but the question had strangely affected him. "I beg your pardon," said the minister, "if I have thoughtlessly awakened in your mind recollections of a painful nature. The world is full of sorrow, sir, and perhaps my question recalls to your memory a fair, beautiful girl, whose blossoming young life had withered in its bloom. Am I not right, sir?" "No, not exactly," replied the old gentleman sadly. "I have five unmarried darters, mister, an' the youngest of the lot is twenty-eight years old."

Mismated.

MRS. WILTON: "I have not heard from your daughter since she married a foreign count." Mrs. Bilton: "She is very unhappy." Mrs. W.: "Too bad; but such matches usually are unfortunate." Mrs. B.: "Indeed they are. You see the poor girl knows so little of foreign languages that she drops back into English every time she gets angry, and then her husband can't understand a word she says."

Vanquished.

FIRST VENDOR OF OINTMENT: "Gentlemen, I will now illustrate to you the wonderful powers of my ointment. I was present at an accident, and a dog had the misfortune to lose part of his tail. I immediately applied my ointment to the injured member, and a new piece of tail grew, and it resumed its ordinary appearance." Second Vendor: "Gentlemen, I also was present at that accident. I picked up the piece of tail that was cut off, applied my ointment to it, and immediately another dog grew out of the end of it." (Collapse of rival.)

Advice Not Wanted.

A YOUNG man was standing at a corner of a street, peaceably smoking a cigar, when an elderly person stopped and asked him: "How many cigars a day do you smoke?" "Three," patiently replied the other. "How much do you pay for them?" continued the inquisitor. "Threepence each," was the reply. "Don't you know, sir," continued the sage, "that if you would stop smoking and save up the money, by the time you are as old as I am you might own that big building at the corner." "Do you own it?" inquired the smoker. "Well, no, I don't," admitted the old man. "As it happens, I do," said the young man. And the sage walked on.

Her Eyes Annoyed Him.

FARMER HODGE (reading novelette): "I'm out of all patience with that Gladys Fitzallwyn in the story—the way she's abusing her beautiful eyes. She doesn't deserve to have none." Mrs. Hodge: What she been doing now?" Farmer Hodge: "This book is full of it. First she threw her eyes up to the ceiling, and then let them drop on the floor; then she darted them down on a long corridor, and rested them on the cool waters of the lagoon. Then she must have called them back somehow, for it says she bathed them in sad, salt tears, wiped them, and swept them with long lashes. Once she was fool enough to rivet them on the dome, and when I left off she was fixing them on a mantlepiece."

PHOTO COMPETITION.

THREE correct claims have been received this week, and £5 notes have been sent to the following:

MISS LLOYD (No. 48),
care of W. Branscombe, Esq.,
Cintra,
Walker Road,
Harrogate.

MR. DAN LENO (No. 49),
Springfield House,
Atkins Road,
Clapham Park, S.W.

MISS E. WALES (50),
39 Gilbey Road,
Tooting, S.W.

The Brain Gymnasium.

In these competitions a prize of £1 1s. will be awarded each week to the competitor whose attempt we receive giving the correct solution of all the puzzles. If more than one is absolutely correct the prize of £1 1s. will be given to the first correct attempt dealt with.

If no lists of absolutely correct solutions are sent in, the first prize will be awarded to the competitor whose attempt is first dealt with showing the fewest mistakes.

Each week we shall award, in addition to the above, either ten of our gold-plated pencil-cases or ten popular novels, to be distributed amongst the competitors whose attempts are absolutely correct and have failed to win the first prize, or, if no complete lists of correct solutions are received, to those whose attempts show the fewest mistakes.

Write all your solutions on one side only of the paper, putting the number against each. Post the batch in an envelope marked "Brain Gymnasium," to reach the Editor, Short Stories, 18 Henrietta Street, London, W.C., by first post on Monday, December 30th, 1901.

Readers are invited to submit puzzles, acrostics, conundrums, word-squares, etc., for publication on this page. A gold-plated pencil-case will be given to each reader whose attempts are used. All attempts must be vouched for as original, and, of course, it is distinctly understood that the sender of a puzzle must neither compete in the competition nor divulge to anyone the solution. Any reader found infringing this rule will be severely dealt with.

No. 1.

ACROSTIC.

The initials of the words filling the blanks spell the name of a beautiful bird:

1. The —— river is found in South America.
2. The town of —— is situated on the Thames, near London.
3. Queen —— had more faith than the others who surrounded Columbus.
4. The —— was much too hot.
5. —— —— —— was the flower of English girls, and had a sad fate.
6. —— was the name of an early English Queen.

No. 2.

PROVERB.

My whole is a rhyming proverb containing 38 letters:

My 4, 12, 23, 19, 33 is the country where it originated.

My 18, 29, 27, 11, 24, 25, 7, 20, 9 is a holiday named in the proverb.

My 7, 4, 5, 6, 19, 22, 25, 15, 26 it is pleasant to find within doors on this holiday.

My 9, 21, 34, 28 it is pleasant to see without.

My 32, 37, 5, 25, 26, 31 is another holiday named in the proverb.

My 14, 35, 19, 30 often brightens the first holiday named, and on that day we expect to find plenty of my 1, 13, 30, 22, 17.

My 36, 2, 16, 3, 19 is a character who can 10, 4, 38 no favour on either day.

My 8 is found near the close of the first holiday and just as near the beginning of the second.

No. 3.

WORD SQUARE.

From the five words described below form a word-square:

My first, 'tis said, had power to charm,
But her enchantment led to harm;
A form of language is my second.
My third unsafe for boys is reckoned.
Stop always where my fourth you see,
And do my last if wrong you be.

No. 4.

WORD FORMING.

Form the name of the author of the last quotation from:

1. The second letter of the author of the first quotation.
2. The fourth letter of the author of the second quotation.
3. The first letter of the author of the third quotation.
4. The sixth letter of the author of the fourth quotation.
5. The sixth letter of the author of the fifth quotation.
6. The second letter of the author of the sixth quotation.

1. "The way was long, the wind was cold
The minstrel was infirm and old;
His withered cheek and tresses gray
Seemed to have known a better day."

2. "And Ardennes waves above them her green leaves,
Dewy with Nature's tear-drops, as they pass
Grieving, if aught inanimate grieves,
Over the unreturning brave—alas!
Ere evening to be trodden like the grass."

3. "In vain we seek a heaven below the sky;
The world has false but fluttering charms."

4. "Oh that I were a glove upon that hand,
That I might touch thy cheek!"

5. "No more surveying with an eye impartial
The long line of the coast,
Shall the figure of the old field-marshal
Be seen upon his post."

6. "The curfew tolls the knell of parting day,
The lowing herd winds slowly o'er the lea,
The ploughman homeward plods his weary way,
And leaves the world to darkness and to me."

7. "When the British warrior queen,
Bleeding from the Roman rods,
Sought, with an indignant mien,
Counsel of her country's gods."

No. 5.

CHARADE.

My FIRST sticks closer than a friend,
But is not half so much desired.
The poet hies him to my NEXT,
To be alone with frenzy fired.
My WHOLE most carry day by day;
Heavy or light, prove as it may,
They still would throw it quite away.

BROKEN WORDS.

No. 6.

1. Curtail a Moorish saint, and leave a bird with ornamental feathers.
2. Curtail a sweet drink, and leave a valuable wood.
3. Curtail a pitcher, and leave a sheep.
4. Curtail a conflagration, and leave an evergreen.

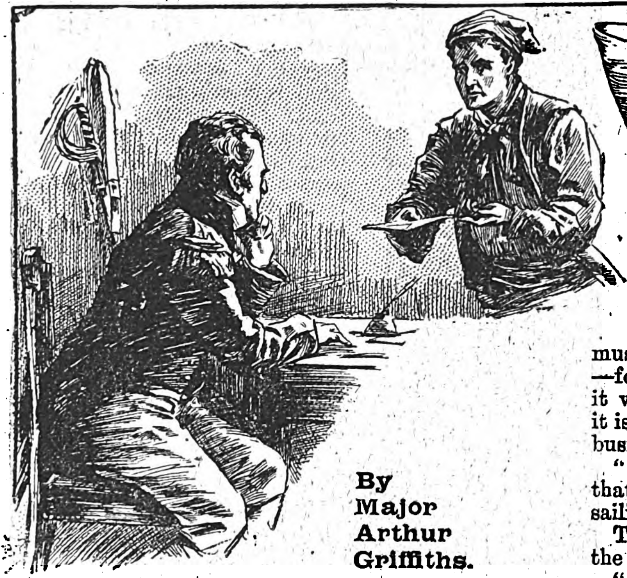
SHORT STORIES.

No. 678.] For the Week Ending December 28th, 1901. [ONE PENNY.

NOBLESSE OBLIGE.



By Major Arthur Griffiths.

ONE day late in September, 1813, a smart brigantine flying British colours was approaching the rock-bound coast of northern Spain and seeking the narrow cleft that leads into the little harbour of Passages. This picturesque town lying upon the water's edge, at the foot of rounded hills covered with hanging woods, was just then the base of Lord Wellington's army campaigning in the Pyrenees. It was crowded with shipping, for although the neighbouring fortress of San Sebastian had been captured, its more commodious harbour had not yet been utilised. So everything still came to Passages including the good ship Flaming Sword, Crunden master, deep laden with military stores, but carrying also a couple of passengers of a kind not often seen at the seat of war.

They were ladies, English ladies, unmistakably of good birth and high breeding. Something more than idle curiosity had brought them to Spain.

One was of uncertain age, although still a brisk, alert matron; her eager look and sharp voice, the keen, black eyes under dark, level eyebrows denoted obstinacy, self-will, a managing and masterful spirit. The other—young, pretty, fair-haired, and violet-eyed, soft of speech and gentle in manner—had that clinging, appealing trustfulness that wins so readily upon the sterner sex. Both were in deep mourning, for Lady Oldham, the elder, had but lately lost her husband, and the dead lord had been Ethel Hayter's guardian and her father's dearest friend.

The brigantine rounded to, and anchored a stone's throw from the shore. Presently the Commandant of Passages came off in person, answering thus courteously a letter from Lady Oldham. She had begged him to find her accommodation in the town, but he now strongly urged her to stay on board the brigantine.

"This is but a dirty, slipshod place at best," he pointed out, "and terribly crowded. Besides, the army must move forward; we shall soon leave this country—for good and all—and then your ladyship would find it very uncomfortable. Here you have a home, such as it is, and can return in safety to England when your business is completed, whatever it may be."

"I have come out to see my son; to arrange, in fact, that he should go back with me in this or the first ship sailing. He is now Lord Oldham."

This statement had less effect than she expected, for the Commandant shook his head doubtfully as he said:

"No officer can obtain leave, I fear, at this moment. The army is engaged almost daily, and there is some sharp work in prospect over there—" he waved his hand up to where close at hand the commanding range of the Pyrenees showed snowy peaks high among the clouds.

"Then he shall go without leave," cried Lady Oldham petulantly. "Don't you see, sir, that you are talking nonsense? He must attend to his new duties; take his seat in the House, marry—" she indicated the fair-haired girl, who blushed vividly and turned a little away. "He must return to England without delay. I will see the Marquis of Wellington himself. I have letters for him, the strongest recommendations, I know his mother, Lady Mornington, intimately, and all the family. I have been assured that there will be no difficulty."

The Commandant was still unconvinced.

"I question much, nay I feel sure that your son, Captain Oldham," whom I have the honour to know—she made a swift gesture lost upon the speaker—" as an officer of this army would never consent to turn his back on it at such a time as this, even if permitted. He is too good a soldier."

"You are mistaken, sir, in more ways than one," said Lady Oldham darkly. "But I will not bandy words with you, sir. The point is when and where can I see the Commander of the Forces?"

"I understand that his lordship is to be at Oyarzum, Sir Thomas Graham's headquarters, to-day. It is only eight or ten miles distant; I can provide your ladyship with mules or horses."

"Horses, please, and a guide. We will ride over at once. You will, I think, find I have some influence, and that when I have spoken all obstacles and difficulties will speedily disappear."

Two hours' pleasant ride along the slopes of the wooded hills brought them to Oyarzum, a little town of picturesque aspect, the houses white with projecting balconies and external staircases of carved wood. The guide halted at one of the houses, where a crowd of orderlies, infantry sergeants, and mounted dragoons stood around the doorway, while numbers of officers coming and going with much bustle and stir of business showed that it was a centre of interest. This was the Headquarters.

An aide-de-camp came out and made his bow civilly to the ladies. What could he do for them? To see the Commander of the Forces? Oh! but, really, his lordship should know presently—well, as soon as possible—that Lady Oldham had arrived, and that was all the aide-de-camp could promise.

"Sir Thomas Graham is with him now. Mr. Larpent, the judge advocate, is waiting, and has a formidable bundle of papers. There are numbers more. The Marquis has many pressing calls on his time. I do not feel at all certain——"

But Lord Wellington, when informed, gallantly gave the ladies the preference, and soon received them with grave, ceremonious courtesy. Yet he laughed his laugh—loud, long, harsh, but cheery—when he asked Lady Oldham what on earth had brought her to Spain? He laughed again, but not so pleasantly, on hearing the answer, and spoke out his mind with decisive abruptness.

"I can give no officer of this army leave of absence now, my lady, not for a single hour. My mind is clearly made up on that point. Of course, if Captain Oldham, I beg his pardon, Lord Oldham, chooses to send in his papers I cannot stop him, but I can tell him what I think of him, what all his comrades will think of him, and, by George, I do not think he will like to hear it at all!"

"But, my lord, I am not speaking of Captain Oldham," pleaded the mother. "He is only my second son. The eldest, now Lord Oldham, is not—not an officer. He is in the ranks, a soldier—a private soldier."

"Whew! What is this? A most extraordinary story."

"He was wild, my darling Rudolph; foolish, extravagant, a spendthrift, and he angered his father beyond pardon. Do not ask me to tell you more. But now he has at last come into his own, he is righted, and I have hurried out here to rescue him from his degradation."

"It is none, Lady Oldham, to wear the King's uniform in any grade, if he carries it honourably," said the great soldier correcting her.

"But as a common private man. Oh, Lord Wellington, surely you will spare him—now? You will set him free, give him back to those who love him so devotedly, to his fond mother, to this sweet girl who has waited for him for such long years?"

Ethel Hayter had the trick of blushing deeply under any strong emotion, and now she flushed crimson, then paled as quickly, and seemed greatly distressed.

"You are certain of this? You know for a fact that your son—Rudolph you said I think—is with this army?"

"The report reached me from a sure source. A comrade lately invalided home brought me letters from my dear son. They had been in hospital together, somewhere in Portugal."

"His name and regiment, please?"

"He called himself Crouch as I understand, and he was serving in the King's Royal Rangers."

"Ha!" cried Lord Wellington with a sharp note of surprise, and he turned quickly to finger some papers lying before him, and abruptly threw them down again. There was a long pause. His lordship looked ill at ease, distressed, and when he spoke, it was in a cold, hard, constrained voice.

"I think, Lady Oldham," he said, "you had better see your second son, Captain Oldham. I will have him sent for; he is on the staff of the 1st Division, near Irun, not fifteen miles away. An excellent young officer, by the way, very well spoken of. He can be with you at nightfall."

"I do not wish to see him—I will not see him. He has never been a good son or a good brother. It was he who set my lord against darling Rudolph; he was the cause, I know, of their terrible estrangement. Besides all this time out here campaigning, why did not Harry befriend his brother?"

"Are you sure they ever met? They have been serving in different parts of the country."

"I believe that if Rudolph had sought his brother, Harry would have repelled him. He would have been ashamed of his unfortunate brother. It would have been like Harry——"

"Indeed, it is not fair to say that, Lady Oldham!" interposed the girl, speaking for the first time, and, of course, blushing crimson.

"Can it be possible, Ethel Hayter, that you wish to take Captain Oldham's part? You, the affianced——"

"Stop, please stop, Lady Oldham! I pray you will not bring me into the question," said the sweet girl, so evidently distressed that his lordship looked at her in surprised sympathy. But he had his reasons for wishing to end this scene, and he again urged Lady Oldham to see her second son.

"He will no doubt take your tidings to your eldest son, Lady Oldham. And after all he is the proper person to do so."

"Oh, no, no. Let my darling Rudolph come himself. Do I beg, beseech, implore you. You have only to give the order. One word from you would bring Rudolph to me."

"If he were within reach, yes; if he were—were—in a position to go to you."

"What can your lordship mean? Tell me, for Heaven's sake tell me. Has he come to any harm? He is not wounded, not ill, not—surely he has not been killed?"

"On that I can positively reassure your ladyship. He is alive; I am certain of that, alive, and for the moment well; none of us can boast of more than that, from hour to hour. But the rest, the details, you must hear from Captain Oldham."

"But you will give him back to me, dear lord, Rudolph, I mean? May I count upon that? You will promise that?"

"You shall hear from me to-day, to-morrow, soon; I can say no more. But now you must really pardon me, I cannot prolong this interview. I am much occupied, I have many people to see. I would strongly urge you to return to Passages, stay on board ship, and wait for Captain Oldham's arrival. He will prove a comfort and support to you, I feel sure. Good day."

The moment the ladies had left, Wellington summoned his military secretary, the most trusted and confidential member of his staff.

"Here's a pretty kettle of fish, Fitzroy. A Lady Oldham has been here—oh, you know all about it, hey? But you do not know that this precious son of hers, is one of the five deserters we took inside St. Sebastian. Crouch, of the Royal Rangers. I have his papers," he rapped his knuckles upon the table. "Here are the proceedings of the general court-martial which has sentenced him to death."

"My conscience, how horrible. That is if your lordship means him to be shot?"

"It is my duty to confirm these proceedings. An example must be made. His was the worst case of all. Besides, I could not pardon him, alone. They must all suffer, all or none, and I repeat the example is necessary."

"Does she know?"

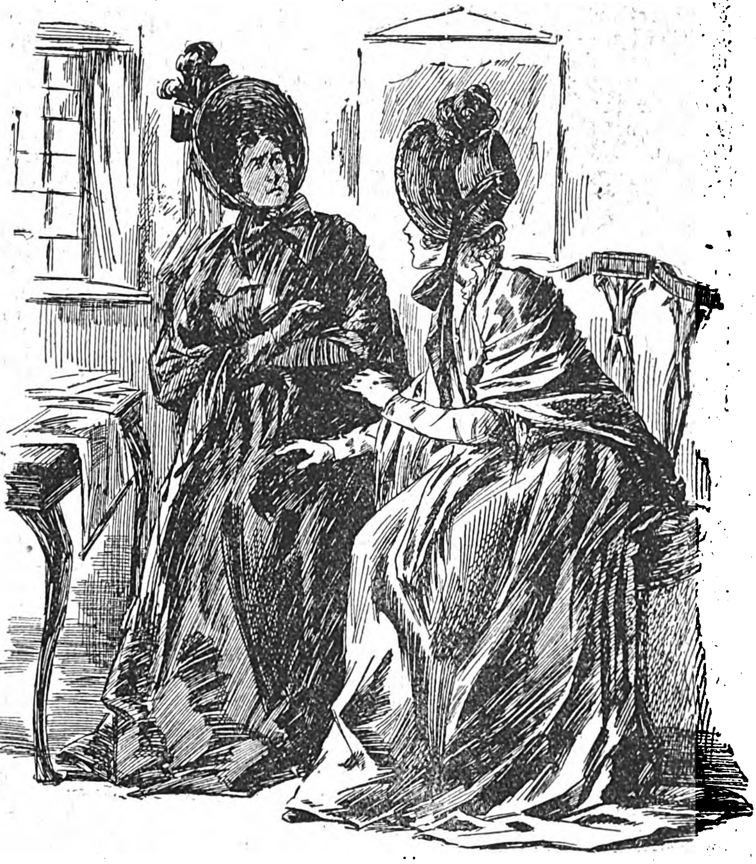
"How could I tell her, man? Faith, I have enough unpleasant things to do as it is. No. She has another son out here, of the 105th. It must be his business. Let him be fetched from Irun; send off a Dragoon, and when the fellow comes tell him the whole story."

"Yes, my lord. But I am deuced sorry for him," said Lord Fitzroy Somerset in a tone that also showed he was sorry for himself. "There is no hope, no chance, I suppose for these men?"

"No, Fitzroy, none. They were traitors all, and



"Stop, please stop, Lady Oldham. I pray you will not bring me into the question."

must abide by their own acts. Do not speak of it again. You only annoy me. The law must take its course."

As the shadows were lengthening from the broad-eaved houses of Oyarzun, Harry Oldham rode into the town. A summons to Head Quarters in the Military Secretary's own hand bore urgency on the face of it, while behind was the pleasurable forecast of something good in the wind. Selection for some special service, some hazardous adventure with a new opening for distinction.

The reality was a shock, as painful as it was surprising. His father dead, his mother in Spain, with Ethel Hayter, his old love, from whom he had been long estranged; chief of all, his brother Rudolph, the plague of the family, reappearing after years of absence, and under the bane of death for a degrading and disgraceful crime.

But Harry Oldham showed no weakness when Lord FitzRoy broke the news to him as gently as he could. He had something of his mother's nature, but in the best sense; where she was self-assertive, he was firm and strong. He favoured her too in his looks, had her dark flashing eyes, her dark hair. Rudolph, on the other hand, was like his father, who had been rather yielding and invertebrate. By the strange rule of contraries, each took to his or her opposite; Lord Oldham was fonder of his second son, as Lady Oldham was of the elder brother.

"Can I see him, Lord Fitzroy?" Harry asked quietly, showing infinite self-control.

"I thought you might wish that, and have here an order for the Provost-Martial in whose custody he is. Pray do not thank me. I wish I could have done more for you. But the Marquis is like the nether mill-stone. He refuses positively to pardon. Do not, I beg, entertain any false hopes, and impress that, painful as it must be, upon your mother."

They had fitted up a small building on the outskirts of Oyarzun as a temporary prison. There was a sergeant's guard near at hand, and a sentry at the door, and the Assistant Provost, who was in charge of the place, recognizing the Staff-officer in his cocked hat and voluminous cloak, bowed before the order signed "Wellington," and at once admitted him.

"Captain Oldham to see the prisoner Crouch, alone. Certainly, sir, step this way," and unbolting a door ushered in the visitor.

"Rudolph. Don't you know me? It is I, Harry."

The figure that lay half-blotted out in the far off shadowy corner, rose with the stiff slow movement of one benumbed or half-asleep, and rubbing his heavy eyelids, staggered to his feet to come within the radius of the lantern light.

"Harry! Oh, Heaven! is this how we meet?" he groaned in a low, hoarse voice.

"It is no fault of mine we did not meet sooner. Why did you not send to me? You must have heard my name; but I, for my part, knew nothing of your being with the army."

"How come you to know now? I wish you had left it so. I wanted to go out of the world without recognition, as Crouch the deserter, in these mountebank clothes."

He was still in the uniform of a Frenchman—dark green with an edging of yellow, and epaulettes of coarse yellow worsted.

"What brings you here?" he went on. "Is it to preach at me, to upbraid me as you did so often in the old days? You should have left me to bear my shame alone, my good and virtuous Harry."

His brother laid one hand affectionately on Rudolph's shoulder and took the other in his, saying quietly:

"Rudolph, the mater is here; in Spain, at Passages only a few miles off."

"Hurrah!" shouted the prisoner with a sudden outburst of frantic hysterical joy. He caught at the news as a certainty that now his life would be spared.

"Hurrah! I shall be pardoned. She will see to that, dear, darling, old mother. And you, Harry, it is good of you to be the first to tell me this. When shall I be released? Will they send me back to the Rangers? I swore I would never be a soldier again under that upstart Whittingham. It was he who drove me to desert. Let me go to some other regiment, and I will serve honestly and faithfully to the end of the war."

"Rudolph, the mater has brought sad news. Our father is dead——"

"And I am Lord Oldham. Aha! Now I know I am safe. They could never shoot me, a peer of the realm—it would be absurd. Lord Wellington would not dare."

"You must not trust too much to that, Rudolph. They tell me he is determined to stop desertion, he intends that every deserter shall suffer——"

"Death or such other punishment as by a general Court-Martial may be awarded. I know the jargon. But psha! That cannot apply to me. Lord Wellington would never do it; not if he knows. But does he? Harry, are you playing fairly? You would gain much—everything by my death."

"I will not condescend to answer that, Rudolph. Even if I were so dastardly a cur as to think of it, I could not possibly conceal your new rank. The mater has already applied to Lord Wellington for your discharge."

"She knows then?"

"Not your present situation, and that I have been sent for to—to—break it to her."

Harry's faltering words were too full of ominous meaning to be misunderstood. His brother caught at his hands convulsively, stared into his face with passionate inquiry, then breaking away threw himself upon the ground in a frenzy of grief.

"Come Rudolph," said Harry Oldham at length, "the case may not be quite hopeless, I see a chance, I can at least save your life I believe."

The condemned man looked up gloomily and unintelligently, little encouraged. But when Harry threw off his heavy cloak, and held it out with one hand, offering him his glazed cocked hat with the other, Rudolph understood.

"Escape! Are you in earnest? Do not trifle with me in Heaven's name."

"Yes. Are you prepared to face the risk?"

"There should be no risk; the disguise is perfect. I shall surely get past unless they examine me, and they would not suspect a Staff-officer."

He pulled the hat over his eyes, drew the great cloak around him, and made for the door.

Harry watched him with a grim smile, believing, half-expecting, that his brother would go without a word. But Rudolph remembered and paused, looking first at the door wistfully then at his brother.

"No, Harry, I ought not, I cannot accept this sacrifice. I will stand my ground. It is of my own making—this. You shall not bear the burthen which is mine."

"Nonsense! What can they do to me? Try me, cashier me, that will be the worst. I do not risk my life, and yours will be saved. If I fail in my duty to my cloth, it is to serve the head of our house."

"You should be Lord Oldham, not I, Harry. You are the best, noblest, truest of men."

"Come, lad, time presses. Hurry away. You will find my horse outside. Mount and ride down to the coast, it is a straight road to Passages. If any of the picquets or patrols try to interfere, remember the parole "Fairfax," countersign "Durham," and say you are Captain Oldham. Go straight on board the brigantine Flaming Sword, and ask for the mater. She expects me and would far rather see you. Now, Rudolph, go."

"May God bless you, Harry, for this. I will take my life at your hands, and as Heaven is above will never forget the obligation."

Then he passed out, erect and fearless, in his borrowed plumes, out into the night air and rode away, a free man.

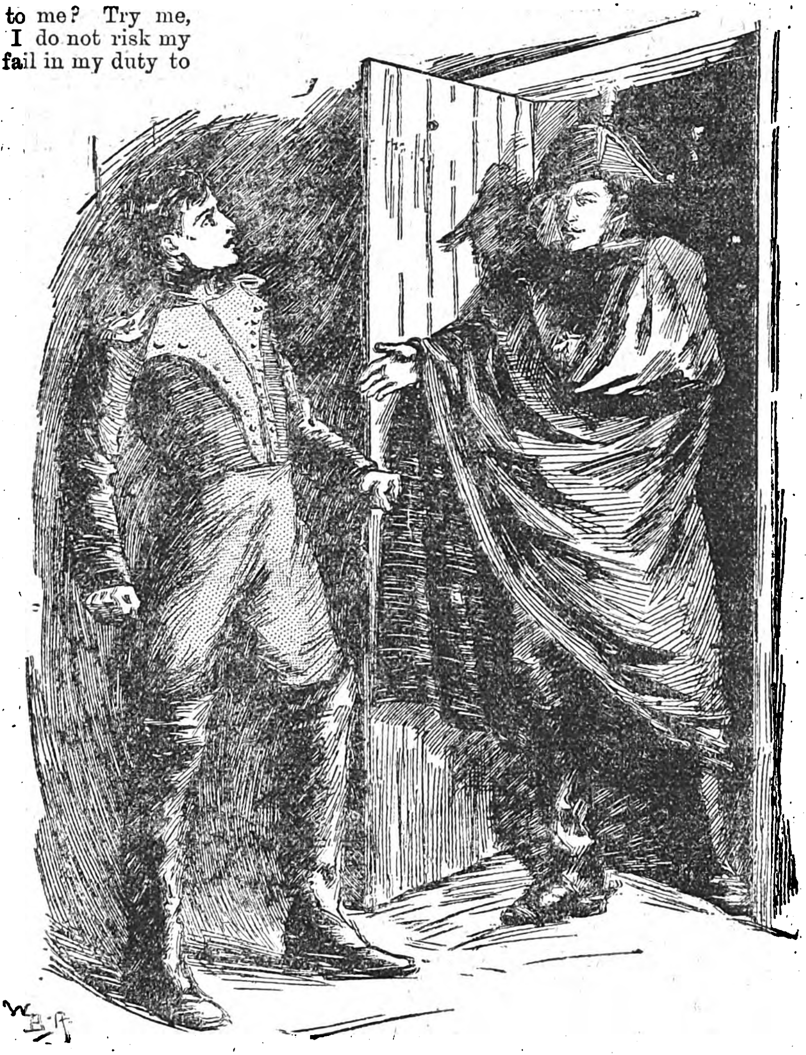
Two or three hours later the anchor watch of the brigantine heard the hail, "Flaming Sword ahoy!" in good, clear English, and the ship was presently boarded by an officer who asked for Lady Oldham. Someone took him aft towards the cuddy, where, having sent in his name, Captain Oldham, he waited, and waited, as it seemed an age.

At last a slim form in loose drapery crept out of the cabin door, and came towards him, at first slowly, shyly, and then, under some sudden, overmastering impulse, rushed forward, and fell upon his neck with a torrent of tears.



"Rudolph, don't you know me?"

"Oh, Harry, Harry, my darling!" she moaned, as she kissed and fondled him. "Dearest sweetheart, can you forgive me? I cannot forgive myself, for I have always cared for you. It was her doing. I was misled; she told me what was false to put me against you, and force me to take Rudolph, whom I hated. But you were my love, my first and only love——"

It was not exactly the greeting that Rudolph Oldham expected, but he made no movement, gave no sign.

"But she will not see you, Harry. Your mother is quite implacable. I have argued and argued with her. She wants Rudolph, only Rudolph, and until he comes——"

"He has come, Ethel, but he wishes he had stayed away," said the other bitterly as he drew aside the folds of his cloak. "Perhaps you will let the mater know as there is much to settle. The night is drawing on, and I should be far from this by dawn. I have only just escaped—thanks to Harry."

But the girl, crushed with shame and surprise, stood there, wild-eyed and agape muttering indistinct words.

"What does it mean? Escape? Where? Why? How?"

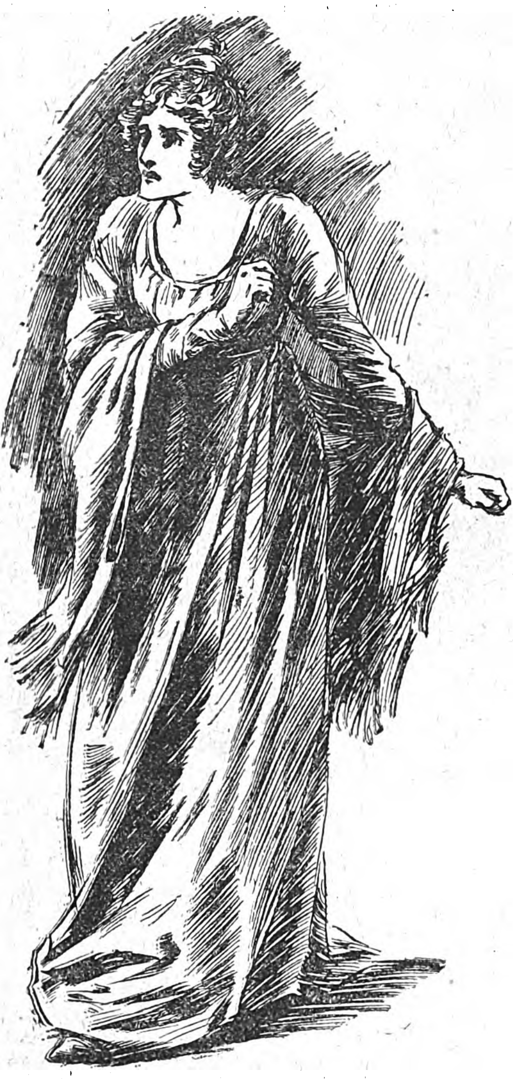
Then Rudolph in a few brief words told his story, never sparing himself, and doing rich justice to his brother's devotion.

Meanwhile Ethel Hayter had recovered herself somewhat, and touched by her lover's chivalry and the near peril it entailed, she could think only of Harry. It was an occasion that changes woman's nature at one stroke. The soft, shrinking girl had developed all at once into a tigress, fierce and terrible, and she broke into fierce reproaching.

"And you were mean enough to accept this sacrifice? You, Rudolph, Lord Oldham, whose forbears were gentlemen of honour and courage, who served the Sovereign and State faithfully, you who have been a traitor to your colours, you whose life was forfeited and justly, you have stooped to take it at the price of your brother's dishonour? Faugh!"

Lord Oldham, with eyes downcast, and wincing as though his shoulders were being whipped, made no attempt at excuse.

"But it shall not serve you. You shall get no further. I myself will put the pursuers on your track. I will give you up—I will——"



The girl broke into fierce reproaching.

"What is all this?" asked a fresh voice, and Lady Oldham appeared upon the deck. "Do you still insist, Harry Oldham, upon forcing yourself on my presence—Heaven! Rudolph!"

"Mater dear, I cannot waste time," said the newly recovered son, tearing himself from her fond embrace after he had hurriedly explained all.

"I am still in great peril. I may be retaken at any moment, and if I am, Heaven help me, it will be all over with me then. This is my only chance, I must make the most of it. Can you not hide me, here, anywhere, until I get a passage to England, in the first craft that sails?"

"Yes, yes, we will all go home together by the first opportunity," said Lady Oldham, gleefully.

"I tell you, Rudolph Oldham, you shall not go scot free," broke in Ethel, hysterically. "I will give the alarm, call any passing boat, send word on shore, do anything to prevent it."

"Are you mad, girl?" cried Lady Oldham. "Are you lost to all sense of shame? Go into the cabin, instantly, go, before we carry you there by force."

"No, mother, let her be," Rudolph interposed quickly. "She takes Harry's part; it is natural; she likes him and loathes me. He has acted like a hero, while I—I—my conduct has been dirty and despicable. I cannot blame her, but I will not trust her. Give me money—all you can spare, and let me be gone. I will get back to shore and make shift somehow in some new disguise. God bless you, mater; we shall meet again soon. And you, Ethel, do not think too hardly of me."

* * * * *

Captain Oldham was immediately placed under close arrest when his connivance in the condemned deserter's escape became known. Lord Wellington read through the lines, seeing the true reason, and in his secret heart would have forgiven Harry; but openly he swore that an officer guilty of such a heinous breach of duty must assuredly be sent before a general Court-Martial. But now active operations were about to be resumed; he was on the point of invading France by forcing Soult's strongly fortified line on the river Bidassoa, and Harry Oldham was left to languish in durance until there was a little leisure to deal with him.

Wellington's plans were still uncertain when his scouting officers brought in some important information. They had picked up a loafer in the locality, half-sailor, half-fisherman, who knew the lay of the land, and who declared there were fords in existence along the mouth of the river. He knew them, these narrow stretches of firm, hard sand, left at low water, and could pilot any number of men safely across. There was risk in such a movement, but the gain would be great, and to attack on this side unobserved meant turning the French flank. Was it feasible and safe? Lord Wellington summoned the man to his presence.

"Who and what are you?" he asked in English, when the man was brought before him, and was surprised to find that this nondescript creature spoke the language fluently.

"Is that necessary, my lord? I have done many things, I ran away from an English ship last. But I can guide the troops, I swear it, for I have often crossed those sands; surely my name is immaterial."

"I do not always trust those I do not know. However, I suppose you have a price. How much? You shall be paid handsomely."

"My terms are in this envelope, my lord. I beg that it may not be opened until the business is done, or I have met my death, for I ask not only to guide but to join the attacking columns. If I may have a musket and a red coat, I will promise not to disgrace it."

Lord Wellington looked at the man keenly for a moment, then with a brief "very well" ordered that the guide should be taken to General Cole, who was to be in chief command of the left columns.

This guide was Rudolph Oldham. On leaving the Flaming Sword he had wandered, disguised now as a seafaring man, along the coast consorting with the villagers, mostly fishermen, and seeking a chance of getting away to sea. In this way he learnt the secret of the fords and that the Bidasso was passable at low tide, and he took the information where he hoped it would be marketable.

History has already told how splendidly Wellington and his brave men crossed the river, stormed the French settlements, and carried them at the point of the bayonet. But there is no mention of the nameless guide who fell fighting in the ranks of the Royal Rangers who were the first up the slopes of the Sans Culottes Redoubt, where he met his death.

His was a hero's death, seen and admired by his officer, who reported all to General Cole, who, in turn, informed Lord Wellington on the following day of all the facts.

Lord Wellington asked the guide's name, and was reminded of the sealed envelope. He opened it, and was surprised to find the guide was Rudolph Oldham, and that the condition asked was the instant release of his brother, Captain Harry Oldham. He was released, and returned to England, and shortly afterwards married Ethel Hayter.

Magnetism of Death.

"Forward!"

The horses have a hard ride, and a moment ago all showed signs of weariness. They press forward now as eagerly as if food and rest were close at hand, and their demeanour soon convinces every old veteran that he will shortly smell powder. We are within half-a-mile of the timber when boom! boom! boom! go the guns of a battery under cover, and the shrieking shells explode over and above us.

"Left wheel—right wheel!" and down go the fences, and cavalry and infantry spread over the meadows, and form a line of battle. As fast as the troops come up they file to the right and left, and our batteries come up and reply to those along the edge of the forest. An exploding shell wipes out a set of fours among the horsemen. Four troopers and three horses go down, while the fourth horse escapes even a scratch. He gallops away to the rear, with stirrups flying, and no hand seeks his capture, but it is scarcely three minutes before he reappears. Ah! but he presents a fine sight now! With head and tail up, nostrils showing a bright red and eyes fairly glowing with enthusiasm, he dances along our front with all the grace of a thoroughbred.

Watch him! His head is turned to the enemy and the magnetism of death is strong upon him! He has but to gallop away to save his life, but he has no thought of doing so. A shell screams over him, and he flings his heels high up in the air. A solid shot tears up the earth across his path, and he rears up and paws the air. We are going to advance. As our skirmishers rush to the front they try to save the horse, but he defies them. We can hear his shrill neighs above the sound of the guns, and as the smoke lifts we see him galloping to and fro—wheeling, rearing—courting death on the field of battle. It comes as he suddenly halts and faces the foe. A solid shot strikes him fair in the chest, and bounding high in air with a shrill neigh he falls dead, and next moment a skirmisher is using his body as a cover!

Not at Home.

Mr. Minks: "That girl was decent enough to black the stoves before going, I see." Mrs. Minks: "No, I blacked them myself, and it's lucky I did." "Lucky?" "Yes, indeed. Mrs. de Fashion and Mrs. de Style called right in the midst of it, and so I just put a little more blacklead on my face and went to the door and told them I wasn't in. They said they would call again."

Poor Medicine.

A workman, while repairing one of the outer Venetian blinds of an aristocratic establishment, missed his footing and fell into the street. A crowd very quickly gathered together from all sides and raised him up, when it was found that he had received only a few slight contusions. Meanwhile one of the servants brought him a glass of water. Making a wry face, the man said: "Only water! From what height should I have to fall to get a glass of beer?"

A Very Pretty Name.

Some years ago a clergyman, in baptizing a baby, paused in the midst of the service to inquire the name of the infant, to which the mother replied: "Shady, sir, if you please." "Shady!" said the minister. "Then it's a boy, and you mean Shadrach, eh?" "No, please your reverence, it's a girl." "And pray," questioned the pastor, "how happened you to call the child by such a strange name?" "Why, sir," responded the woman, "if you must know, our name is Bower, and my husband said as how he should like her to be called Shady, because Shady Bower sounds so pretty."

From Experience.

A gentleman received a visit from an acquaintance, who asked him if he would kindly lend him a certain work he was anxious to see, and which he felt pretty certain his friend had in his library. "Yes," said the gentleman in question, "I have it. But I am sorry I can't lend it to you. I make it a rule never to lend books." "But why?" said the visitor. "Because no one ever returns them," replied the other. "And to show you how true this is, I would ask you to cast your eye over the shelves before you. You see there my library, containing 3,000 volumes. Well, they are all borrowed."

The Open Window.

Disagreeable Passenger (to commercial traveller sitting by open window): "Excuse me, sir, but that open window is very annoying." C. T. (pleasantly): "I'm very sorry, but I'm afraid you'll have to grin and bear it." D. P.: "I wish you would close it, sir." C. T.: "I would like to accommodate you, but I can't." D. P.: "Do you refuse to close that window, sir?" C. T.: "I certainly do." D. P.: "If you don't close it, I will." C. T.: "I'll bet you won't." D. P.: "If I go over there, I will." C. T.: "I'll give you odds you won't." D. P.: "I'll ask you once more, sir, will you close that window?" C. T.: "No, sir; I will not." D. P. (getting on his feet): "Then I will, sir." C. T.: "I would like to see you do it." D. P. (placing his hands on the objectionable window): "I'll show you whether I will or not, sir." C. T. (as disagreeable passenger tugs at window): "Why don't you close it?" D. P. (getting red in the face): "It appears—to be stuck." C. T.: "Of course it is. I tried to close it before you came in." And then the other passengers chuckled.

The Indiscretion of Mr. Brown.

"So you are in want of a young lady typist, are you?" said Mrs. Josiah Brown to her husband the other morning, as she served out to him his breakfast rations.

"Yes, my dear, that's so," he replied. "But how the— "

"How did I know?" she interrupted. "I have just seen your advertisement in this morning's paper. And I should like to know what you want with a lady typist. Goodness knows, there are enough men clerks out of work, without having a young woman frisking about your office. You won't get much work done when you get your lady clerk in. She'll be flirting with all the other clerks, and for all I know she'll be flirting with you."

"What nonsense you do talk, Clara. I find I must buy a typewriter to cope with my correspondence, and I can't afford to employ another man clerk, so I must engage a lady. I can secure a lady typist at a much lower wage than a male, and one is just as reliable as the other. And as for your talking about flirting with her, the sooner you get that tomfoolery out of your head, the better."

"So you think it's tomfoolery, do you, Josiah? Well, I don't. Perhaps you'll explain to me why you advertise for a young lady typist?"

"Because—er—er—because——"

"Because you like to have nice pleasant little chats with ladies when you are away from your wife—like you had last night, for instance."

"Last night, Clara! Whatever are you talking about?"

"Oh, yes! It's all very well for you to pretend to look innocent, but I should like to know what business you had over in Mrs. Paulton's garden last evening, chatting away to that hussy, Violet Paulton?"

"I suppose Jane has been telling you some cock-and-bull story," said Mr. Brown, looking a trifle uneasy.

"Oh, no, she hasn't," his wife replied. "It was somebody else who saw your goings-on."

"Oh, who was it then?" he inquired.

"Your wife."

"You! I thought you——"

"Yes—you thought I would not be home till late, but I came back earlier than I expected and was watching you from the bedroom window. And I suppose you thought as I was out, you would climb over the garden wall, and have a nice little chat with the hussy?"

"Bah!" he exclaimed angrily, taking up the newspaper.

"I want a better answer than that," said Mrs. Brown, snatching the paper from him.

"There's nothing to explain," he replied, with an air of injured innocence. "Miss Paulton had a little difficulty in turning off the garden hose, so I jumped over the garden wall, and did it for her."

"And how long did that take you, pray?"

"Well, about half-a-minute."

"But I saw you chatting to her for over a quarter of an hour. What on earth were you talking about?"

"Nothing in particular, my dear."

"Whatever it was, it appeared to be vastly amusing, as she was giggling like a young school-girl all the time. Oh, yes, Josiah, you can be extremely pleasant sometimes, especially when you are away from your wife. For a man of forty-five I think the way you carry on is disgraceful."

"Do for goodness' sake stop talking all this rubbish, Clara. But there—the clock is just striking nine, and if I stop to listen to you any longer, I shall miss my train."

* * * * *

When Mr. Brown reached his office he found a great pile of letters from lady applicants in answer to his advertisement. Before he had time to open any of them, his office-boy came into his sanctum and said that a young lady wished to see him.

"What's her name?" he asked.

"Miss Violet Paulton," the boy answered.

"Whatever can she want?" said Mr. Brown to himself, after he had directed the boy to show her in.

"I am so glad I have managed to catch you in," said the young lady, looking a perfect vision of loveliness.

"Has anything happened at home?" he asked, beginning to wonder whether his wife had been having a wordy war with the young lady about the incident of the previous evening.

"Oh, no! I have come about your advertisement," she replied.

"My advertisement!" he exclaimed. "Oh, I suppsoe you know of a young lady whom you wish to recommend, eh?"

"Yes—I am the young lady," she replied archly.

"You don't mean it surely, do you, Miss Paulton?"

"Yes I do—why not?"

"Well, I always thought——"

"I understand, Mr. Brown. You have always thought my mother and I were fairly well off, but I am sorry to say that is not so. In fact mother told me a few months ago that she really couldn't afford to let me remain at home idle any longer. So I learnt typing; and when I saw your advertisement this morning, I thought I had better come to see you at once about it?"

"I am sure you would suit me all right," said Mr. Brown, gallantly. "But I fancy the work here would be too hard for you. You ought to seek for some lighter occupation—say, for instance, as an amanuensis."

"I don't mind hard work," she replied, bravely. "Perhaps you could see your way to give me a trial."

"Yes, that wouldn't be a bad idea," he answered.

"Then can I come?" she asked, pleadingly.

"Well, I think I had better speak to Mrs. Brown about it first," he replied cautiously, suddenly remembering his wife's discourse that morning on young lady typists in general and Violet Paulton in particular.

"Speak to Mrs. Brown! Surely she has nothing to do with your business affairs," the young lady exclaimed in a tone of pretended surprise. She was fully aware that Mr. Brown had to do exactly what his wife told him, and that there would not be the slightest chance of her obtaining the post if Mrs. Brown had any voice in the matter.

"You must be joking, Mr. Brown, surely," she continued playfully. "I don't believe you would allow your wife to meddle with your office affairs."

This little piece of flattery pleased Mr. Brown mightily.

"No, of course I wouldn't," he replied with an air of bravado that would have astonished Mrs. Brown if she had been within hearing distance.

"I do wish you would let me come on Monday—say on trial for a week," pleaded the young lady.

"Very well then, you shall," he replied. "Come here on Monday morning at ten o'clock."

"Oh, thank you, Mr. Brown!" she cried, with real gratitude.

"But please understand, Miss Paulton, I give you the place on one condition."

"And what is that?"

"You mustn't let Mrs. Brown know I have engaged you. I will tell her myself later on. So please do not speak to anybody about it, except of course your mother."

Miss Paulton assented; and after Mr. Brown had explained to her the duties he required her to perform, she took her departure.

* * * * *

At the same time that the interview just related was being held, another interesting conversation was taking place between Mrs. Brown and Mrs. Paulton over the garden wall.

"It was very kind of your husband to help my daughter, Violet, with the hose last night," remarked Mrs. Paulton.

"M'yes!" Mrs. Brown replied indifferently.

"She has gone up to see your husband this morning."

"Gone up to see my husband!" exclaimed Mrs. Brown, quite unable to conceal her annoyance at the very idea of such a thing. "Whatever has she gone to see him about?"

"Can't you guess, Mrs. Brown?"

"No—I haven't the slightest idea. But I think my husband ought to have told me of this before he left this morning."

Mrs. Paulton was beginning to feel alarmed at the unpleasant attitude her neighbour was adopting.

"Your husband did not know beforehand that Violet was coming to see him," she replied meekly. "It's about the advertisement he put in this morning's paper for a lady typist. I was hoping that you might speak a word in her favour to your husband."

"Oh, yes, I'll speak to him about her. I'll call at his office this morning."

Mrs. Paulton, understanding this as a promise of help, thanked her neighbour warmly.

"She won't thank me to-night when she finds her daughter hasn't got the place," said Mrs. Brown to herself as she stepped indoors. "Oh, yes, I'll speak to him about the minx—especially if he has been brazen enough to engage her. I think I'll send him a wire so as to make sure of catching him in when I call."

Five minutes later a telegram was on its way to Mr. Brown, stating that she would call at noon that day.

"I wonder what she is coming about?" thought Mr. Brown to himself, as he read the telegram. "I suppose it's about this advertisement. I wish now I hadn't engaged Miss Paulton; but I haven't got the pluck to back out of it. Whatever will Clara say when she finds it out? She'll be sure to want to know whom I have engaged.

"Ha! ha!" he chuckled, after a few minutes deliberation; "I know what I'll do," and leaving his room he went upstairs to his housekeeper—a buxom lady of fifty summers.

"Mrs. Crummles, I suppose you haven't got such a thing as a photograph of yourself handy, have you?" he asked.

"Oh, yes I have, sir," she replied.

"I wish you would lend it to me for a little while," he said.

"You can have it; but, lor! sir, whatever can you want with my photo?" she asked.

Mr. Brown answered by slipping a half-crown into her hand, and promised her he would return the photograph within an hour.

"Ha! ha!" he again chuckled, as he returned to his room. "Clara does not know my housekeeper. I'll just show her this photograph, and when she thinks that this good woman is going to be my lady typist, it will put her clean off the scent."

"Yes, my dear," he said, to his wife half-an-hour later as he showed her the photograph. "That's the lady I have employed. I suppose you have no objection to my engaging her?"

"No, Josiah," she answered, quite taken aback with surprise.

"I thought my selection would meet with your approval," said he, feeling quite happy that his little ruse was likely to be successful.

"Did you have many applicants after the place?" she asked.

"I should think I did," he replied, showing her the batch of letters he had received."

"And was Miss Paulton one of them?"

"Er, er—yes! But how did you guess that?"

"I didn't guess it at all. Mrs. Paulton mentioned to me this morning that her daughter had gone to see you about the place. I suppose she didn't suit you?"

"I told her that the work was likely to be too hard for her," he replied, glad to be able to give a truthful if not a direct answer.

"Well, I am glad you had the good sense not to engage her," she said. "I really thought—— But whose voice is it I hear outside? Surely it's that minx, Violet Paulton. And why do you look so pale, Josiah? Have you been playing a trick on me about this photograph?"

At that moment the office boy came in.

"Was that Miss Paulton's voice I heard just now?" Mrs. Brown asked the lad.

"Yes, mum," the lad answered. "She wants to see Mr. Brown again."

"Just ask her in."

Then a happy thought occurred to her. "Wait a moment, boy. Do you know this lady?" she asked, showing the boy the photograph.

"Yes, mum," the boy answered promptly; "that's Mrs. Crummles, our housekeeper."

Mr. Brown, on hearing this, sank back in his chair and gasped.

"Oh, it's Mrs. Crummles, is it?" exclaimed Mrs. Brown, casting a withering glance at her husband.

"Yes, Clara," said Mr. Brown dejectedly. "You know everything now."

"Oh, no, I don't," she replied. "I want to know why Miss Paulton has come back to see you again. Boy, just ask her to come in?"

Violet Paulton came tripping into the room, smiling; but when she saw Mrs. Brown her countenance changed. She had really come back to ask, in the innocence of her heart, what colour blouse Mr. Brown would like her to wear in the office; but Mrs. Brown's presence caused her to feel rather puzzled what to say.

"I know all about your appointment as Mr. Brown's typist, Miss Paulton," commenced Mrs. Brown. "I suppose you have come back to ask him one or two more questions about it?"

"Yes, Mrs. Brown," replied the young lady, concluding for the moment that Mrs. Brown had approved of her appointment. "I came back because I quite forgot to ask Mr. Brown if he had any particular wish as to the sort of dress I should wear in the office."

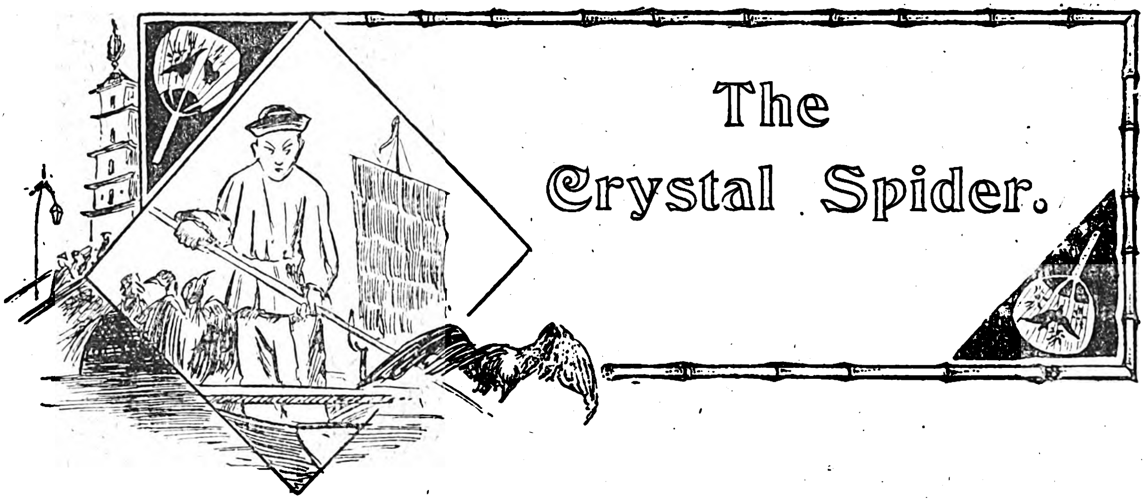
"I don't think you need trouble about that," said Mrs. Brown.

"I don't understand," said the young lady; but when she noticed the terror-stricken look on Mr. Brown's face, she guessed what was the matter.

"I will call in to-night and explain to you," replied Mrs. Brown. "I don't think I need detain you any longer now. I want to have a little talk alone with my husband."

Mrs. Brown's "little talk" lasted for quite a quarter of an hour, and, sad to relate, it was the warmest quarter of an hour poor Mr. Brown had ever experienced. What was said need not be recorded here; suffice to say that Mrs. Brown took upon herself to cancel Violet Paulton's appointment.

The post of typist to Mr. Brown is still vacant. No ladies need apply! Henry E. Cocks.



The Crystal Spider.

"It is of a veritabyll report and attested by so many learned, that there be nowe of wyse men none to gaynsaye it, that there be certain crystals which must not be worn upon ye person; for ye crystal hys frame hath a magnetick propertie that draweth whomsoe falleth into hys svasion into itself, in despyte of hys will, and ye thing becometh thereon a creature who liveth with ye life and ye spirite of ye body on which it has rested."

I remember when I first read that quaint sentence in Morryster. Perhaps there was something uncanny in it that attracted me, but I read it over and over until it was in my mind just as it is now, with all its quaint phrasing and old-time spelling. I was a geologist for the big stamp-mill people, and in a small way was something of a chemist, and crystals were my forte. I had spent much time in the study of them, and possessed possibly the finest private collection in the country. I had lately taken up a new line of research which sooner or later must fascinate one who studies the crystal formation deeply enough—this was the seeming vitality of certain crystal formations. I had come to reconstruct my theories of the inorganic, and to study the artifices which molecules of steel assume, and in the way in which iron grew "tired" with continued labour. This had brought me to the idea that metals, as well as men, possess life—a more elusive and subtle sort, but nevertheless life. This was my first step.

I had come now to distinguish that same effort in quartz. In my experiment I utilised one of the heaviest stamps of the mill, which, after hours, by concentrating the power which ran the entire plant, I could transform into a crusher, so nicely graduated that I could calculate its pressure almost to the pound. Here, month after month I put crystals under the huge plunger, and hour after hour, day after day, increased its weight, watching with my most delicate instruments the variation of structure which the molecules of crystal assumed to resist me, and to protect the substance which they form, from annihilation.

But this is not interesting except to scientists, and scientists will of course not be interested in what I am writing—in what is the real story I am telling. They will sneer at it, being scientists. So would I have done then!

One day the foreman in one of the drifts brought me a specimen of a crystal which I had never seen. At first glance it looked like a piece of bull-quartz which by some curious freak had found lodgment in a vein of schist. On closer examination, however, I detected a difference. Its molecular structure changed without stress and with extreme rapidity when exposed to different colours of light. I became greatly interested in this, and showed it to several experimenters like myself, who professed themselves unable to see anything in it, and, I think, put me down for a visionary. Finding this the case, I laid the crystal on the shelf of an open cabinet in my study, and finally forgot all about it.

It was there when Leila first came to me.

* * * * *

I can see her now when I close my eyes, as she first came into my dull rooms. I can hear her footsteps coming up past the guard in the corridor just outside—I can see her little golden head like the sun in a corner of this dark cell. I can feel her arms go around my neck as she tried to draw me from my book or my calculations.

One day I came in and found her bending over, looking at my forgotten crystal intently. She was so absorbed that she quite started when she heard my step. "What is there in that queer stone?" she cried.

I brought my glass and looked. Its transparent white had become a peculiar milky opalescence, and in its depths again I had the impression of vibration. "I held it in the hollow of my hand a minute ago," she said, "and I fancied that it moved. I almost dropped it."

I put the stone away and laughed at her, but as soon as she had gone out, I took it again and studied it. The opalescence I had noticed was fading, but it shifted fitfully. That night I told Leila my experiment with the coloured lights, and she would have me show her the same thing. We began to study the stone together. I found that I could get better results when she was with me. It was then it seemed to possess its greatest brilliancy. When I pored over it alone, its activity dulled, its shimmer died out. In those days I would not have sold that little crystal for any sum that I could think of, and I am sure that Leila would not have traded it for the biggest pearl on the neck of an Indian princess. Nothing would satisfy her finally, but that she must wear it.

I had a friend whose passion was the cutting of precious stones, and under my direction he carved from the fragment a spider. It was a beautiful piece of workmanship. I remember how delighted Leila was with it when I gave it to her on the first anniversary of our marriage. She wore it suspended from a fine gold chain from about her neck, and it lay against her breast.

Day by day it gained in beauty. The bewildering sense of movement beneath its polished surface became more noticeable than ever. It began to attract attention wherever we went. We could scarcely go out of an evening when its peculiarity did not attract the attention of some connoisseur or another who dogged with offers for it. I think it grew to be a sort of passion with both Leila and myself—a passion which did not demand the admiration of others—and to avoid annoyance she lengthened the chain and dropped the stone beneath the level of her corsage.

It was not very long after I had given her the white spider, that Leila's strange, baffling illness began. She had no disease—nothing that physicians could discover. But she suffered from curious attacks of giddiness, which came apparently without cause, and disappeared as they had come. It was long before I took fright, thinking that this was just a woman's weakness and would disappear in time. Instead of getting better, however, she became steadily worse, and her fainting spells became more frequent. She was dear to me—more dear to me than anything in the world.

I gave up my studies; I put on a substitute at the mills, and gave all my time to watching her. I brought experts from the city, and they shook their heads, prescribed, and went back again. But she showed no improvement, and one day later in the spring, the end came. I was away at the time, and was called home by a special messenger. It was the same old story, faintness and a fall, and inability to regain her strength again. Before I got home she had died, very quietly, and without recovering consciousness.

When I saw Leila lying still and white in the room where I had left her only a few hours before, I could scarcely believe that it was she. Her face was thin and drawn like that of one who had gone through a long illness.

It could not be my Leila—she with the round cheeks and smiling eyes—my dear little gold-girl! I think I was mad then, mad with the loss of her. As I looked at her the white spider lay brilliant in the rounded hollow of her neck. Every atom seemed to be dilating with motion. It was as though microscopic hosts were marshalling and counter-marching in elaborate evolutions in the stone, seen dimly through a half-opaque veil. Rays of light flickered across it. I drew the shade and hollowed my hands so no ray could fall on it, but down in the shadow it sparkled and scintillated and shone.

There seemed something uncanny about it. It maddened me that it should laugh while Leila, my love, my only one, lay there silent like that, and in my madness I snatched it from her, snapped the chain, and threw it against the wall, where it rattled and fell to the floor.

It was not till after they had taken Leila away that I thought of it again. Then I groped for it under a piece of furniture where it had rolled, and placed it on its shelf in the cabinet.

* * * * *

Helen Lylburn was the daughter of one of the mine superintendents, and I suppose I turned to her as any man turns to a woman when he needs comfort. I know she was nothing to me of what Leila had been, but she cared for me, and drew my mind away from itself, and tried to get me to live again. To take up life after a man has been so hurt is so very hard. It is easiest to bury one's self. But, after a time, I began to work again, and, to some extent, to forget. Perhaps it was mostly out of gratitude that I asked Helen to marry me—me, who was only a husk of what I had been and whose heart was in the ground! And there were those, no doubt, who thought that it was through pity that she did.

At any rate I brought her home one day to my rooms to take the empty place. Till we entered the little study with all my dusty books and cabinet, I had not realised what it meant! Then it came to me like a blow. The room was full of Leila. I saw her face in the mirror, I heard her sigh in every sound. The smell of her hair was in the window curtains. I started back with a horrible feeling that she had come to life and I had affronted her by bringing Helen where she was. It was a ghastly feeling and I felt the sweat come out in the palms of my hands.

Helen noticed it, I think, for she came to me and put her arms round my neck and kissed me. While her mouth lay on mine I heard a sound from the cabinet. I turned and saw that the white spider had rolled from the shelf and had fallen among a huddle of glass retorts beneath it.

Helen ran and picked it up. "Why, it's the stone charm your wi—you used to have," she said. "I used to hear so much about it!" Suddenly she dropped it with a little scream. "Oh!" she said, "how curious! It—it crawled in my hand!"

I laughed at her and put it back on its shelf: but Helen would not touch it or look at it again. As for me, I would not have parted with it for worlds. Every night I peered into it with my glass with fascinated interest.

Our bedroom adjoined my study, and when the warmer weather came on, we opened the folding doors between for the sake of air. One night I was awakened by a cry from Helen. She was sleeping, but moaning and tossing as though struggling with something. She was talking brokenly, too, and, raising myself on my elbow, I leant over her, trying to make out what she said. For a moment I caught nothing. Then she said quite distinctly, but in a voice of agony: "No—no! My husband! Not yours—any more! Jean—Jean!"

I stretched out my arm and touched her to wake her up. As I put my hand on her breast, it touched a hard, prickly substance which seemed to shrink from my clasp as I grasped it. I sprang out of bed, trembling and loathing, and struck a light, but I knew already what it was. I did not tell Helen. She was sobbing nervously when I crept back into bed, and I felt her awake and stirring all through the rest of the night.

I could scarcely look at the stone next day for the repugnance that possessed me, but by night the feeling had disappeared.

A fortnight after this occurrence, Helen and I were spending the day up on the mountain where one of the new shafts was being sunk. She complained of nausea, and I left her lying down in the overseer's shack while I sorted specimens. An hour or two later I was called in alarm. She was in a delirium when I got to her and I drove her straight down to the doctor's and thence home, the overseer's wife going with me all the way. After she was settled in bed, and had grown calmer, the woman brought me something wrapped in paper. It was an ornament, she said, that had dropped out of Helen's skirt when she undressed her. It was the white spider.

That night I brought out my needle drill and started the wheel and drilled a hole through the tip of one of its legs. In this I set a steel ring and through this I drove a wire staple, pinning it to the shelf of the cabinet. I watched it closely as the drill worked, going slowly so as not to shiver the crystal. When I had finished I blew the dust off the drill plate. It had collected in a spot of damp underneath the needle. I touched this with my finger. I swear to you it was blood.

I watched it for three nights and it lay there sparkling. Sometimes it was milky, and more often now a flush-rose, and lovely and iridescent. But its look was hateful to me—hateful, though I loved it. In some such way must a man love a woman whom he loves despite himself, knowing she hates him. The old madness of despair came back to me in these days—the longing for Leila, for her singing, and her whisper, and her yellow hair. And this was while Helen, my wife, lay asleep or waking in the next room.

The fourth night I slept, worn out. Even in my dreams, the uncouth horror of that thing chained to the shelf of the cabinet, was with me. I woke suddenly, wet with perspiration, feeling unable to breathe. Something smooth, leprous, tingling, was on my lips, sprawling on my beard. I screamed and dashed the thing away, and it struck stonily against the wainscotting.

Helen held me but I would not stay. Rage was in my soul, and shuddering, I threw on my outer clothes and seized it and rushed in the dark to the silent mills. I could feel that one of its legs was broken, and it seemed to stir and turn in my palm.

I reached the deserted stamp room and turned on the electric lights in my engine room. The huge crusher stood upright. With all my force I hurled the thing straight into the dark chamber below the plunger and pulled the lever that dropped the great hammer. It came down slowly, slowly, slowly. I could see the thing throb and sparkle just under the edge of the hammer. I saw it flash and dilate, startled as the steel nipped and held it—saw it shrink and shiver and cower. Then it cried out in a woman's voice: "Oh, Heaven, Jean, Jean!"

It did! I tell you I heard it! How did I know it was Leila, my little golden girl? I couldn't reach it, though I thrust my hands clear in to snatch it out, and the ponderous tons' weight came down on them. That is why, as you see, I have no fingers—why, I am writing this with a pen tied to a stub that was once a hand.

But, hands or no hands, they're afraid of me. They say I killed Helen, and the guards talk about it in whispers, but I hear them, I hear them!

MARY AND JOHN.

Mary Scott sat down to a cold supper. She had been working hard all day, copying an old picture. The baby was asleep on the sofa, but Mary was not thinking of him.

To-morrow was the fateful day at the prison. She thought of it with a shudder. The cold, forbidding, hateful place! But John was there.

"Oh, you poor fellow," groaned Mary, as she proceeded to wash the few dishes after putting away the eatables. "And you never harmed anybody in all your life. Heaven help us all! My poor boy! My poor boy!"

The woman sat down and folded her hands helplessly. She was not beautiful, perhaps not even pretty, with the exception of glorious eyes that of late were often dimmed by weeping. She occupied one room. It was large and simply furnished, but comfortable. One section was used for a studio. A curtain hung in shadow now, hiding the large bay window, but under it were her easel and painting things. Before her marriage she had been well-known as a copyist, and did good work for very small pay.

When she had married John, some three years before, he was bookkeeper for a large commercial firm, and the young couple had managed to save a little money. A cottage in the country, more than large enough for them, the free air of Heaven, the wild flowers painting the garden and grounds, fruit trees budding and blossoming, green hills on every side, the wide wealth of teeming nature, scattering beauty and grace in all directions—these were their surroundings. They were buying their little home.

John was a German by descent, but a British citizen by choice, possessing a burning love for the Union Jack. When his little lad had come his happiness had been complete. They could have asked nothing more, Mary and John, and both had seen only the brighter side of life.

Then the trial came. One of the company's employés was found on the morning of a holiday senseless from a brutal blow. Hundreds of pounds were missing, and suspicion pointed to John. The man who had been so cruelly dealt with died a week after without having given a sign. So John was arrested, and was now in the city gaol awaiting his trial.

She sold the furniture, the cottage was locked up, and with the little money they had saved she took a room in town. She set about finding work, and in that work put all her strength. The knowledge that John was innocent, in spite of the seeming sounds of guilt, buoyed her up. Some of her former employers gave her work. She knew that for the boy's sake she must keep up. So she nerved herself to labour, while the bright colours on her palette scorched her very sight, and she could have thrown the brush away and wept tears of blood.

But on this day she was to spend an hour with John. She rose early. The baby was washed and dressed and their frugal meal eaten, when there came a knock at the door.

Mary answered it, A showily-dressed woman stood there smiling. Mary both recoiled and was glad. She had known this woman before her marriage.

"I thought I'd come," said the visitor, her manner deferential, and at the same time friendly. "I've been where you are, you know. But you mustn't give up. I'm all right now, and very happy, as you may be in time."

"Yes," said Mary, "if I heard right, you married again."

"Oh, yes," was the reponse.

"And he—he," trembled Mary.

"Is still serving out his sentence. Why, you don't suppose I'd be tied for life to a criminal."

"But John is not!" Mary cried chokingly. She longed to fly—longed to tell the woman to leave her alone.

"Oh, not guilty, of course! They all say that. They'd be fools if they didn't. Mine was for forgery; yours for murder; both bad enough. Now, you keep up a good heart. If worse comes to worse, there's no need for you to die a daily death; there's no need."

"Oh, stop!" cried Mary, struggling no longer to suppress her sobs. "I would die rather than leave John. I would die a thousand deaths rather than marry again. He knows it, knows that I will follow him wherever he is sent, if only to see him and cheer him for an hour—or only a moment."

The woman recoiled before such terrible grief.

"It's time to go to—the prison," Mary said. "I can't afford to waste a moment," and with unmistakable coldness she sent the woman away. Then she sat down and dressed the baby, all the time cooing tender words in his unheeding ears of "papa's sweet" and "papa waiting to see his boy," and soon after that the prison doors shut upon her.

"Mary, you must cherish no hope," he said, as they parted. "I'm going to be a man to the end. I am innocent, Heaven and you know it. But the boy"—his lips quivered—"bring him up, Mary, to believe in his father's innocence," and he turned and hid his face.

The sentence was passed.

It was a gloomy day. It rained, hailed, blew—all the elements were at war. Mary held her own, she felt a wild longing to die then and there. She looked at the prisoner's face, clear, quiet, full of a lofty beauty she had never seen there before. "He will go straight to Heaven," she said, "while we—oh, Heaven! be merciful!" she cried.

When the sentence fell it was not death, but imprisonment for life.

A year passed. Mary was only a stone's throw from the prison to which John had been committed. She was industrious, and neither she nor the child had suffered.

"Baby," she said one night, "my left hand tells me I am going to get some news. And to-morrow we shall see papa." The baby took toddling steps now. He looked in her face and laughed while she spread out the evening paper.

"Baby, come here," she cried wildly. "Oh, my baby! I shall die of joy!"

She had read: "Jacob Steel, who died to-day at the Middlesex Hospital, made a confession in which he declared that he was the murderer of Andrew McComb, a clerk in the employ of Messrs. Stevens, Edwards and Co., and that the man John Scott, now imprisoned for that crime, is entirely innocent." Mrs. Denison.

SUMMARY:

ANDREA DE MANCINI, a nephew of Cardinal Mazarin, is found one day by the latter in the Palais Royal, Paris, in a state of intoxication. Gaston de Luynes, the narrator of this story, and fencing-master to de Mancini, is blamed by the Cardinal for allowing his nephew to get into such a condition, and is removed from his position of fencing-master.

Eugène de Canaples insults de Mancini and a duel is arranged, but the Cardinal hears of it and tells de Luynes that it must not take place. De Luynes realises that if he does not prevent it the Cardinal has power to do him great harm, and accordingly raises a quarrel with de Canaples which ends in a fight, de Canaples being severely wounded. The onlookers are enraged with de Luynes because he indiscreetly lets fall the fact that he raised this quarrel so as to prevent a duel between de Mancini and de Canaples, and he has to flee for his life. To escape his pursuers he springs on the step of a passing carriage, and the ladies inside let him shelter there for a time, but when he says that he has wounded de Canaples they order him to alight.

De Luynes then returns home to find a note awaiting him from de Marcini, who wants de Luynes to join him at Choisy, a few miles from Paris. De Luynes joins him there and learns that the Cardinal wishes de Mancini to marry a sister of Eugène de Canaples, which was the reason the duel arranged between them was not to take place. While the two men are at the inn the two ladies who had befriended de Luynes arrive, also a certain Armand de Malpertuis with whom de Luynes quarrels, and a duel is arranged between them.

"GENTLEMEN! Gentlemen!" cried St. Auban, thrusting himself between us. "Malpertuis, have the goodness to wait until one affair is concluded before you create a second one. Now, M. de Luynes, will you tell me whether M. de Mancini is here or not?"

"What if he should be?"

"You will be wise to withdraw; we shall be three to two."

"Three to two! Surely, Marquis, your reckoning is at fault. You cannot count the Vicomte there as one; his knees are knocking together. At best he is but a woman in man's clothes. As for your other friend, unless his height misleads me, he is but a boy. Therefore, Monsieur, you see that the advantage is with us. We are two men, opposed to a man, a woman, and a child, so that——"

"In Heaven's name, sir," cried St. Auban, again interposing himself betwixt me and the bellicose Malpertuis, "will you cease this foolishness? A word with you in private, M. de Luynes."

I permitted him to take me by the sleeve and lead me aside, marvelling the while what curb it was that he was setting upon his temper, and what wily motives he might have for adopting so conciliatory a tone.

With many generations to come the name of César de St. Auban must perforce be familiar as that of one of the greatest roysterers and most courtly libertines of the early days of Louis XIV., as well as that of a rabid anti-cardinalist and frondeur, and one of the earliest of that new cabal of nobility known as the petits-maîtres, whose leader the Prince of Conde was destined to become a few years later. He was a man of about my own age, that is to say, between thirty-two and thirty-three, and of my own frame, tall, spare, and active. On his florid, good-natured countenance was stamped his character of profligate. In dress he was courtly in the extreme. His doublet and surcoat were of wine-coloured velvet, richly laced, and he still affected the hanging sleeves of a fast disappearing fashion. Valuable lace filled the tops of his black boots, a valuable jewel glistened here and there upon his person, and one must needs have pronounced him a fop but for the strength and resoluteness of his bearing, and the long rapier that hung from his gold-embroidered baldrick. Such, in brief, is a portrait of the man who now confronted me, his fine blue eyes fixed upon my face, wherein, methinks, he read but little, search though he might.

"M. de Luynes," he murmured at last, "you appear to find entertainment in making enemies, and you do it wantonly."

"Have you brought me aside to instruct me in the art of making friends?"

"Possibly, M. de Luynes; and without intending an offence, permit me to remark that you need them."

"Mayhap. But I do not seek them."

"I have it in my heart to wish that you did; for I, M. de Luynes, seek to make a friend of you. Nay, do not smile in that unbelieving fashion. I have long esteemed you for those very qualities of dauntlessness and defiance which have brought you so rich a crop of hatred. If you doubt my words, perhaps you will recall my attitude towards you in the horse-market yesterday, and let that speak. Without wishing to remind you of a service done, I may yet mention that I stood betwixt you and the mob that sought to avenge my friend Canaples. He was my friend; you stood there, as indeed you have always stood, in the attitude of a foe. You wounded Canaples, maltreated Vilmorin, defied me, and yet but for my intervention, sir, you had been torn to pieces."

"All this, I grant, is very true, Monsieur," I made reply, with deep suspicion in my soul. "Yet, pardon me if I confess that to me it proves no more than that you acted as a generous enemy. Pardon my bluntness also, but what profit do you look to make from gaining my friendship?"

"You are frank, Monsieur," he said, colouring slightly; "I will be none the less so. I am a frondeur, an anti-cardinalist. In a word, I am a gentleman and a Frenchman."

An interloping foreigner, miserly, mean-souled, and jesuitical, springs up, weans himself into the graces of a foolish, impetuous, wilful queen, and climbs the ladder which she holds for him to the highest position in France. I allude to Mazarin; this Cardinal who is not a priest, this minister of France who is not a Frenchman, this belittler of nobles who is not a gentleman."

"Have a care, Monsieur——"

"One moment, M. de Luynes. This adventurer, not content with the millions which his avaricious talons have dragged from the people for his own benefit, seeks by means of illustrious alliances to enrich a pack of beggarly nieces and nephews that he has rescued from the squalor of their Sicilian homes to bring hither. His nieces, the Mancinis and Martinozzis, he is marrying to dukes and princes. 'Tis not nice to witness, but 'tis the affair of the men who wed them. In seeking, however, to marry his nephew Andrea to one of the greatest heiresses in France he goes too far. Yvonne de Canaples is for some noble countryman of her own—there are many suitors to her hand—and for no nephew of Giulio Mazarini. Her brother Eugène himself thinks thus, and therein, M. de Luynes, you have the real motive of the quarrel which he provoked with Andrea, and which, had you not interfered, could have had but one ending."

"Why do you tell me all this, Monsieur?" I inquired coldly, betraying none of the amazement his last words gave birth to.

"So that you may know the true position of affairs, and, knowing it, see the course which the name you bear must bid you follow. Because Canaples failed am I here to-day. I had not counted upon meeting you, but since I have met you, I have set the truth before you, confident that you will now withdraw from an affair to which no real interest can bind you, leaving matters to pursue their course."

He eyed me, methought, almost anxiously from under his brows, as he awaited my reply. It was briefer than he looked for.

"You have wasted time, Monsieur."

"How? You persist?"

"Yes. I persist. Yet for the Cardinal I care nothing. Mazarin has dismissed me from his service unjustly and unpaid. He has forbidden me his nephew's company. In fact, did he know of my presence here with M. de Mancini, he would probably carry out his threat to hang me."

"Heaven!" cried St. Auban, "you are mad if that be so. France is divided into two parties, cardinalists and anti-cardinalists. You, sir, without belonging to either stand alone, an enemy to both. Your attitude is preposterous!"

"Nay, sir, not alone. There is Andrea de Mancini. The boy is my only friend in a world of enemies. I am growing fond of him, Monsieur, and I will stand by him while my arm can wield a sword, in all that may advance his fortunes and his happiness. That, Monsieur, is my last word."

"Do not forget, M. de Luynes," he said, his suaveness all departed of a sudden, and his tone full of menace and acidity, "do not forget that when a wall cannot be scaled it may be broken through."

"Aye, Monsieur; but many of those who break through stand in danger of being crushed by the falling stones," I answered, entering into the spirit of his allegory.

"There are many ways of striking," he said.

"And many ways of being struck," I retorted, with a sneer.

Our words grew sinister, our eyes waxed fiery, and more might have followed had not the door leading to the staircase opened at that moment to admit Andrea himself. He came, elegant in dress and figure, with a smile upon his handsome young face, whose noble features gave the lie to St. Auban's assertion that he had been drawn from a squalid Sicilian home. Such faces are not bred in squalor.

In utter ignorance of the cabal against him, he greeted St. Auban, who was well known to him, with a graceful bow, and also Vilmorin, who stood in the doorway with Malpertuis, and who at the sight of de Mancini grew visibly ill at ease. In coming to Choisy the Vicomte had clearly expected to do no more than second St. Auban in the duel which he thought to see forced upon Andrea. He now realised that if a fight there was, he might, by his presence, be forced into it. Malpertuis looked fierce and tugged at his moustachios, whilst his companions returned Andrea's salutation—St. Auban gravely, and Vilmorin hesitatingly.

"Ha, Gaston," said the boy, advancing towards me, "our host tells me that two ladies who have been shipwrecked here wish to do me the honour of occupying my apartments for an hour or so. Ha! there they are," he added, as the two girls came suddenly forward. Then bowing, "Mesdames, I am enchanted to set the poor room at your disposal for as long as it may please you to honour it."

As the ladies, of whose appearance St. Auban had been unaware, appeared before us, I shot a glance at the Marquis, and from the start he gave upon beholding them, I saw that things were as I had suspected.

Before they could reply to Andrea, St. Auban suddenly advanced.

"Mesdemoiselles," quoth he, "forgive me if in this miserable light I did not earlier discover your presence and offer you my services. I do so now, with the hope that you will honour me by making use of them."

"Thank you, M. de St. Auban," replied the dark-haired one, whom I guessed to be none other than Yvonne de Canaples herself, "but since this gentleman so gallantly cedes his apartments to us, all our needs are satisfied. It would be churlish to refuse that which is so graciously proffered."

Her tone was cold in the extreme, as also was the inclination of the head wherewith she favoured the Marquis. In arrant contrast were the pretty words of thanks she addressed to Andrea, who stood by, blushing like a girl; and a fearful scowl did this contrast draw from St. Aubyn, a scowl that lasted until, escorted by the landlord, the two ladies had withdrawn.

There was an awkward pause when they were gone, and methought, from the look on St. Aubyn's face, that he was about to provoke a fight, after all. Not so, however; for after staring at us like a clown whilst one might count a dozen, he turned and strode to the door, calling for his horse and those of his companions.

"Au revoir, M. de Luynes," he said significantly as he got into the saddle.

"Au revoir, M. de Luynes," said also Malpertuis, coming close up to me. "We shall meet again, believe me."

"Pray Heaven that we may not, if you would die in your bed," I answered mockingly. "Adieu!"

CHAPTER VI.

Of How Andrea Became Lovesick.

With what fictions I could call to mind did I put off Andrea's questions touching the peculiar fashion of St.

Auban's leave-taking. Tell him the truth and expose to him the situation whereof he was himself the unconscious centre I dared not, lest his high-spirited impetuosity should cause him to take into his own hands the reins of the affair, and thus drive himself into irreparable disaster.

Andrea himself showed scant concern, however, and was luckily content with my hurriedly invented explanations; his thoughts had suddenly found occupation in another and a gentler theme than the ill-humour of men, and presently his tongue betrayed it when he drew the conversation to the ladies to whom he had resigned his apartments.

"Heavens, Gaston," he burst out, "she is a lovely maid! Saw you ever a bonnier?"

"Indeed she is very beautiful," I answered, laughing to myself at the thought of how little he dreamt that it was of Yvonne St. Albaret de Canaples that he spoke, and not minded for the while to enlighten him.

"If she be as kind and gentle as she is beautiful, Gaston, well—Uncle Giulio's plans are likely to suffer shipwreck. I shall not leave Choisy until I have spoken to her; in fact, I shall not leave until she leaves."

"Nevertheless we shall still be able to set out, as we had projected, after dining; for in an hour, or two at most, they will proceed on their journey."

He was silent for some moments, then, "To the deuce with the Cardinal's plans," quoth he, banging his fist on the table. "I shall not go to Blois."

"Pooh! Why not?"

"Why not?" He halted for a moment, then in a meandering tone, "You have read, perchance, in story-books," he said, "of love being born from the first meeting of two pairs of eyes, as a spark is born of flint and steel, and you may have laughed at the conceit, as I have laughed at it. But laugh no more, Gaston; for I who stand before you am one who has experienced this thing which poets tell of, and which hitherto I have held in ridicule. I will not go to Blois, because—because—well, because I intend to go where she goes."

"Then, dear lad, you will go to Blois. You will go to Blois, if not as a dutiful nephew, resigned to obey his reverend uncle's wishes, at least because Fate forces you to follow a pair of eyes that have—hum, what was it you said you did?"

"Do you say that she is going to Blois? How do you know?"

"Eh? How do I know? Oh, I heard her servant speaking with the hostler."

"So much the better, then; for thus if his Eminence gets news of my whereabouts, the news will not awaken his ever-ready suspicions. Heavens! How beautiful she is! Noted you her eyes, her skin? And what hair, de Luynes! Like threads of gold!"

"Like threads of gold?" I echoed. "You are dreaming, boy. Oh, yes, yes! I understand. You are speaking of the fair-haired chit that was with her."

He eyed me in amazement.

"'Tis you whose thoughts are wandering to that lanky, nose-in-the-air madame who accompanied her."

I began a laugh that I broke off suddenly as I realised that it was not Yvonne, after all, who had imprisoned his wits. The Cardinal's plans were indeed like to miscarry if he persisted thus.

"But 'twas the nose-in-the-air madame, as you call her, with whom you spoke."

"Aye, but it was the golden-haired lady that held my gaze. Pshaw! Who would mention them in a breath?"

"Who, indeed?" said I, but with a different meaning.

Thereafter, seeing him listless, I suggested a turn in the village to stretch our limbs before dining. But he would have none of it; and when I pressed the point with sound reasoning, touching the benefits which health may cull from exercise, he grew petulant as a wayward child. She might descend whilst he was absent. Indeed, she might require some slight service that lay, perchance, in his power to render her. What an opportunity would he not lose were he abroad? She might even depart before we returned, and than that no greater calamity could just then befall him. No, he would not stir a foot from the inn. A fig for exercise. To the deuce with health. Who sought an appetite? Not he. He wished for no appetite—could contrive no base and vulgar appetite for food whilst his soul, he swore, was being consumed by the overwhelming, all-effacing appetite to behold her.

Such meandering fools are most of us at nineteen, when the heart is young—a flawless mirror, ready to hold the image of the first fair maid that looks into it through our eyes, and as ready—Heaven knows—to relinquish it when the subject is withdrawn.

But I, who was not nineteen, and the mirror of whose heart—to pursue my metaphor—was dulled, warped, and cracked with much ill-usage, grew sick of the boy's enthusiasm and the monotony of a conversation which I could divert into no other channel from that upon which it had been started by a little slip of a girl with hair of gold and sapphire eyes—I use Andrea's words. And so I rose, and bidding him take root in the tavern if so it pleased his fancy, I left him there.

Wrapped in my cloak, for the air was raw and damp, I strode aimlessly along, revolving in my mind what had befallen at the Connêtable that morning, and speculating upon the issue that this quaint affair might have. In matters of love, or rather, of matrimony, which is not quite the same thing, opposition is common enough. But the opposers are usually members of either of the interested families. Now the families—that is to say, the heads of the families—being agreed, and even anxious to bring about the union of Yvonne de Canaples and Andrea de Mancini, it was something new to have a cabal of persons who from motives of principle, as St. Auban had it, should oppose the alliance so relentlessly as to even resort to violence if no other means occurred to them. It seemed vastly probable that Andrea would be disposed of by a knife in the back, and more than probable that a like fate would be reserved for me, since I had constituted myself his guardian angel. For my own part, however, I had a pronounced distaste to ending my days in so unostentatious a fashion. I had also a notion that I should prove an exceedingly difficult person to assassinate, and that those who sought to slip a knife into me would find my hide peculiarly tough, and my hand peculiarly ready to return the compliment.

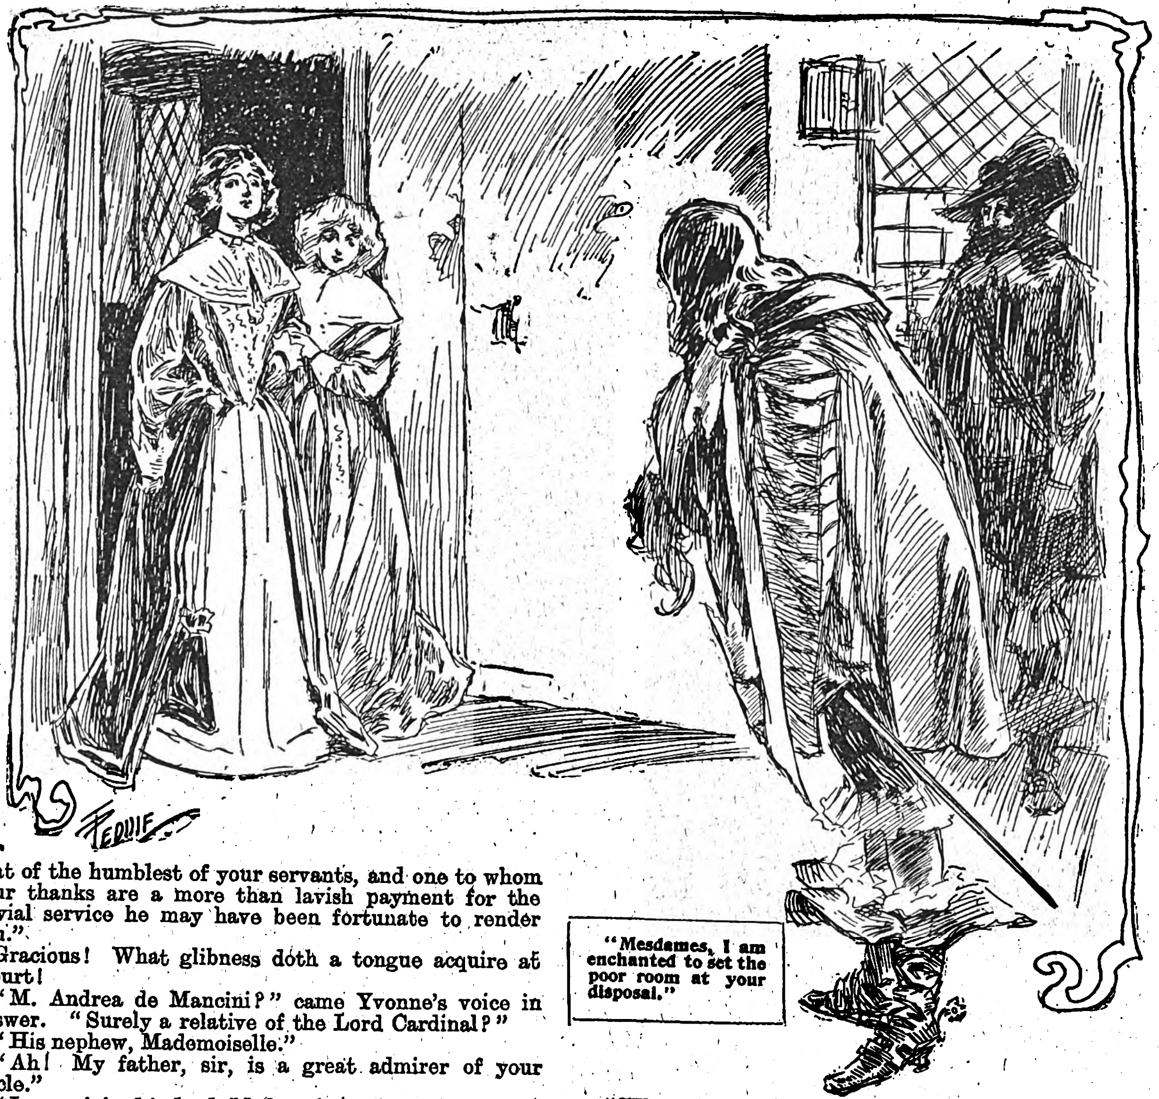
So deeply did I sink into ponderings of this character that it was not until two hours afterwards that I again found myself drawing near the Connêtable.

I reached the inn to find by the door a coach, and by that coach Andrea; he stood bareheaded, despite the cold, conversing, with all outward semblances of profound respect, with those within it.

So engrossed was he and so ecstatic that my approach went unheeded; and when presently I noted that the coach was Mademoiselle de Canaples', I ceased to wonder at the boy's unconsciousness of what took place around him. Clearly the farrier had been found at last, and the horse shod afresh during my absence. Loath to interrupt so pretty a scene, I waited, aloof, until these farewells should be completed, and whilst I waited there came to me from the carriage a sweet, musical voice that was not Yvonne's.

"May we not learn at least, Monsieur, the name of the gentleman to whose courtesy we are indebted for having spent the last two hours without discomfort?"

"My name, Mademoiselle, is Andrea de Mancini,



"Mesdames, I am enchanted to set the poor room at your disposal."

that of the humblest of your servants, and one to whom your thanks are a more than lavish payment for the trivial service he may have been fortunate to render you."

Gracious! What glibness doth a tongue acquire at Court!

"M. Andrea de Mancini?" came Yvonne's voice in answer. "Surely a relative of the Lord Cardinal?"

"His nephew, Mademoiselle."

"Ah! My father, sir, is a great admirer of your uncle."

"I am rejoiced indeed, Mademoiselle," replied Andrea with a bow, as though the compliment had been paid to him. "Am I indiscreet in asking the name of Monsieur your father?"

"Indiscreet! Nay, Monsieur. You have a right to learn the name of those who are under an obligation to you. My father is the Chevalier de Canaples, of whom it is possible that you have heard. I am Yvonne de Canaples, of whom it is unlikely that you should have heard, and this is my sister Geneviève, whom a like obscurity envelops."

The boy's lips moved, but no sound came from them, whilst his cheeks went white and red by turns. His courtliness of a moment ago had vanished, and he stood sheepish and awkward as a clown. At length he so far mastered himself as to bow and make a sign to the coachman, who thereupon gathered up his reins.

"You are going presumably to Blois," he stammered with a nervous laugh, as if the journey were a humorous proceeding.

"Yes, Monsieur," answered Geneviève, "we are going home."

"Why, then it is possible that we shall meet again. I, too, am travelling in that direction. Au revoir, Mesdemoiselles!"

The whip cracked, the coach began to move, and the creaking of its wheels drowned, so far as I was concerned, the female voices that answered his farewell.

I drew near and laid my hand on Andrea's shoulder; at the touch he started like one awakened suddenly and looked up.

"Ah, you are returned, Gaston."

"To find that you have made a discovery, and are overwhelmed by your error."

"My error?"

"Yes; that of falling in love with the wrong one. Alas! It is but one of those ironical jests wherewith Fate amuses herself at every step of our lives. Had you fallen in love with Yvonne, and it passes my understanding why you did not, everything would have gone smoothly with your wooing. Unfortunately you have a preference for fair hair——"

"Have done," he interrupted peevishly. "What does it signify? To the deuce with Mazarin's plans!"

"So you said this morning."

"Yes, when I did not even dream her name was Canaples."

"Nevertheless she is the wrong Canaples."

"For my uncle, but, good heavens, sir, 'tis I who am to wed, and I shall wed as my heart bids me."

"Hum! And Mazarin?"

"Faugh!" he answered, with an expressive shrug.

"Well, since you are resolved, let us dine."

"I have no appetite."

"Let us dine notwithstanding. Eat you must if you would live; and unless you live—think of it!— you'll never reach Blois."

"Gaston, you are laughing at me. I do not wish to eat."

I surveyed him gravely, with my arms akimbo.

"Can love so expand the heart of man that it fills even his stomach? Well, well, if you will not eat, at least have the grace to bear me company at table. Come, Andrea," and I took his arm, "let us ascend to that chamber which she has but quitted. Who can tell but that we shall find there some token of her recent presence? If nothing more, at least the air will be pervaded by the perfume she affected, and since you scorn the humble food of man, you can dine on that."

He smiled despite himself as I drew him towards the staircase.

"Scoffer!" quoth he. "Your callous soul knows naught of love."

"Whereas you have had three hours' experience. Heavens! You shall instruct me in the gentle art."

Alas for these perfumes upon which I had proposed that he should feast himself. If any the beautiful Geneviève had left behind her, they had been smothered in the vulgar yet appetising odour of the steaming ragoût that occupied the table.

I prevailed at length upon the love-lorn boy to take some food, but I could not lead him to talk of ought save Geneviève de Canaples. Presently he took to chiding me for the deliberateness wherewith I ate, and betrayed thereby his impatience to be in the saddle and after her. I argued that whilst she saw him not she might think of him. But the argument, though sound, availed me little, and in the end I was forced, for all that I am a man accustomed to please myself, to hurriedly end my repast and pronounce myself ready to start.

As Andrea had with him some store of baggage, since his sojourn at Blois was like to be of some duration, he travelled in a coach. Into this coach, then, we climbed, he and I. His valet Silvio occupied the seat beside the coachman, whilst my stalwart Michelot rode behind, leading my horse by the bridle. In this fashion we set out, and ere long the silence of my thoughtful companion, the monotonous rumbling of the vehicle, and, most important of factors, the good dinner that I had consumed, bred in me a torpor that soon became a sleep.

From a dream, that bound hand and foot, I was being dragged by St. Auban and Malpertuis before the Cardinal, I awakened with a start to find that we were clattering already through the streets of Etrechy; so that whilst I had slept we had covered some six leagues. Twilight had already set in, and Andrea lay idly back in the carriage, holding a book which it was growing too dark to read, and between the leaves of which he had slipped his forefinger to mark the place where he had paused. His eyes met mine as I looked round and he smiled.

"I should not have thought, Gaston," he said, "that a man with so seared a conscience could have slept thus soundly."

"I have not slept soundly," I grumbled, recalling my dream.

"You have slept long at least."

"Out of self-protection, so that I might not hear the name of Geneviève Canaples. 'Tis a sweet name, but you render it monotonous."

He laughed good-humouredly.

"Have you never loved, Gaston?"

"Often."

"Ah! But I mean did you never conceive a great passion?"

"Hundreds, boy."

"But never such a one as mine."

"Assuredly not; for the world has never seen its fellow. Be good enough to pull the cord, you Cupid incarnate. I wish to alight."

"You wish to alight? Why?"

"Because I am sick of love. I am going to ride a while with Michelot whilst you dream of her coral lips, her sapphire eyes, and what other gems constitute her wondrous personality."

Two minutes later I was in the saddle, riding with Michelot in the wake of the carriage. As I have already sought to indicate in these pages, Michelot was as much my friend as my servant. It is therefore no more than natural that I should communicate to him my fears touching what might come of the machinations of St. Auban, Vilmorin, and even, perchance, of that little firebrand Malpertuis.

Night fell while we talked, and at last the lights of Etampes, where we proposed to lie, peeped at us from a distance, and food and warmth.

It was eight o'clock when we reached the town, and a few moments later we rattled into the courtyard of the Hôtel de l'Epée.

Andrea was out of temper to learn that Mesdemoiselles de Canaples had reached the place two hours earlier, taken fresh horses, and proceeded on their journey, intending to reach Monnerville that night. He was even mad enough to propose that we should follow their example; but my sober arguments prevailed, and at Etampes we stayed till morning.

Andrea withdrew early. But I, having chanced upon a certain M. de la Vrillière, a courtier of Vilmorin's stamp, with whom I had some slight acquaintance, and his purse being heavier than his wits, I spent a passing profitable evening in his company. This pretty gentleman hailed my advent with a delight that amazed me, and suggested that we should throw a main together to kill time. The dice were found, and so clumsily did he use them that in half-an-hour, playing for beggarly crowns, he had lost twenty pistoles. Next he lost his temper, and with an oath pitched the cubes into the fire, swearing that they were toys for children, and that I must grant him his revenge with cards. The cards were furnished us, and with a fortune that varied little we played lansquenet until long past midnight. The fire died out in the grate, and the air grew chill, until at last, with a violent sneeze, de la Vrillière protested that he would play no more.

Cursing himself for the unluckiest being alive, the fool bade me good night, and left me seventy pistoles richer than when I had met him.

CHAPTER VII.

THE CHATEAU DE CANAPLES.

DESPITE the strenuous efforts which Andrea compelled us to put forth, we did not again come up with Mesdemoiselles de Canaples, who, in truth, must have travelled with greater speed than ladies are wont to.

This circumstance bred much discomfort in Andrea's bosom, for in it he read that his Geneviève thought not of him as he of her, else, knowing that he followed the same roads, she would have retarded their progress so that he might overtake them. Thus argued he, when on the following night, which was that of Friday, we lay at Orleans. But when, towards noon on Saturday, our journey ended with our arrival at Blois, he went so far as to conclude that she had hastened on expressly to avoid him. Now, from what I had seen of Mademoiselle Yvonne, methought I might hazard a guess that she it was who commanded in these, and haply too in other matters, and that the manner of their journey had been such as was best attuned to her wishes.

With such an argument did I strive to appease Andrea's doubts, but all in vain; which is indeed no matter for astonishment, for to reason with a man in love is to reason with one who knows no reason.

After a brief halt at the Lys de France, at which hostelry I hired myself a room, we set out for the Château de Canaples, which is situated on the left bank of the Loire, at a distance of about half-a-league from Blois, in the direction of Tours.

We cut a brave enough figure as we rode down the Rue Vieille attended by our servants, and many a rustic Blasiois stopped to gape at us, to nudge his companion, and point us out, whispering the word "Paris."

I had donned my grey velvet doublet, deeming the occasion worthy of it, whilst Andrea wore a handsome suit of black, with gold lace, which for elegance it would have been difficult to surpass. An air of pensiveness added interest to his handsome face and courtly figure, and methought that Geneviève must be hard to please if she fell not a victim to his wooing.

We proceeded along the road bordering the Loire, a road of rare beauty at any other season of the year, but now bare of foliage, grey, bleak, and sullen as the clouds overhead, and as cold to the eye as was the sharp wind to the flesh. As we rode I fell to thinking of what my reception at the Château de Canaples was like to be, and almost to regret that I had permitted Andrea to persuade me to accompany him. Long ago I had known the Chevalier de Canaples, and for all the disparity of our ages—for he counted twice my years, we had been friends and comrades. That, however, was ten years ago, in the old days when I owned something more than the name of de Luynes. To-day I appeared before him as a ruined adventurer, a soldier of fortune, a ruffler, a duellist who had almost slain his son in a brawl whose details might be known to him, but not its origin. Seeing me in the company of Andrea de Mancini he might—who could say?—even deem me one of those parasites who cling to young men of fortune so that they may live at their expense. That the daughter would have formed such a conceit of me I was assured; it but remained to me with what countenance the father would greet me.

From such speculations I was at length aroused by our arrival at the gates of the Canaples park. Seeing them wide open, we rode between the two massive columns of granite, each surmounted by a couchant lion holding the escutcheon of the Canaples, and proceeded at an ambling pace up the avenue. Through the naked trees the château became discernible, a brave old castle that once had been the stronghold of a feudal race long dead. Grey it was, and attuned that day to the rest of the grey landscape. But at its base the ivy grew thick and green, and here and there long streaks of it crept up almost to the battlements, whilst in one place it had gone higher yet, and clothed one of the quaint old turrets. A moat there had once been, but this was now filled up and arranged into little mounds that became flower-beds in summer.

Resigning our horses to the keeping of our servants, we followed the grave butler who had received us. He led us across the spacious hall, which had all the appearance of an armory, and up the regal staircase of polished oak on to a landing wide and lofty. Here, turning to the left, he opened a door and desired us to give ourselves the trouble of awaiting the Chevalier. We entered a handsome room, hung in costly Dutch tapestry and richly furnished, yet with a sobriety of colour almost puritanical. It contained many long windows which overlooked a broad terrace, inclosed in a grey stone balustrade, from which some half-dozen steps led to a garden below. Beyond that ran the swift waters of the Loire, and beyond that again, in the distance, we beheld the famous Château de Chambord, built in the days of the first Francis.

I had but remarked these details when the door again opened, to admit a short, slender man, in whose black hair and beard the hand of time had scattered but little of that white dust that marks its passage. His face was pale, thin, and wrinkled, and his grey eyes had a nervous, restless look that dwelt not long on anything.

"Welcome to Canaples, M. de Mancini!" he exclaimed, as he hurried forward, with a smile so winning that his countenance appeared transfigured by it. "Welcome most cordially! We had not hoped that you would arrive so soon, but fortunately my daughters, to whom you appear to have been of service at Choisy, warned me that you were journeying hither. Your apartments, therefore, are prepared for you, and we hope you will honor Canaples by long remaining a guest."

Andrea thanked him becomingly.

"In truth," he added, "my departure from Paris was somewhat sudden, but I have a letter here from Monseigneur my uncle which explains the matter."

"No explanation is needed, my dear Andrea," replied the old nobleman, abandoning the formalities that had marked his welcoming speech. "How left you my Lord Cardinal?" he asked as he took the letter.

"In excellent health, but somewhat harassed, I fear, by the affairs of state."

"Ah, yes, yes. But stay. You are not alone." And Canaples' grey eyes shot an almost furtive glance of inquiry in my direction. A second glance followed the first, and the Chevalier's brows were knit. Then he came a step nearer, scanning my face.

"Surely, surely, Monsieur," he exclaimed before Andrea had time to answer him, "were you not at Rocroi?"

"Your memory flatters me, Monsieur," I replied with a laugh. "I was indeed at Rocroi, captain in the regiment of light horse whereof you were Mestre de Champ."

"His name," said Andrea, "is Gaston de Luynes, my very dear friend, counsellor, and, I might almost say, protector."

"Heavens, yes! Gaston de Luynes!" he ejaculated, seizing my hand in an affectionate grip. "But how have you fared since Rocroi was fought? For a soldier of such promise, one might have predicted great things in ten years."

"Alas, Monsieur! I was dismissed the service after Senlac."

"Dismissed the service!"

"Pah!" I laughed, not without bitterness, "'tis a long story and an ugly one, divided 'twixt the dice-box, the bottle, and the scabbard. Ten years ago I was a promising young captain, ardent and ambitious. To-day I am a broken ruffler, unrecognized by my family, a man without hope, without ambition, almost without honor."

I know not what it was that impelled me to speak thus. Haply the wish that, since soon he must learn to what depths Gaston de Luynes had sunk, he should at least learn it from my own lips at the outset.

He shuddered at my concluding words, and had not Andrea at that moment put his arm affectionately upon my shoulder, and declared me the bravest fellow and truest friend in all the world, 'tis possible that the Chevalier de Canaples would have sought an excuse to be rid of me. Such men as he seek not the acquaintance of such men as I.

SEEN YOUR PHOTO IN SHORT STORIES?

IF SO, YOU WILL GET £5.

HERE IS THE SCHEME.

We have in our possession a considerable number of photographs of men, women, and children of all grades of society secured for us by our agents, who have scoured the United Kingdom for this special purpose.

Each week we publish five of these portraits, and to each of the persons thus represented we dispatch the sum of £5, on his or her forwarding a claim on a post-card addressed to PORTRAIT DEPARTMENT, "SHORT STORIES," Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Although the persons whose portraits will appear in this competition are quite unknown to us personally, we have their names and addresses in our possession, and, therefore, a claim can be settled at once, without risk of fraud. Already twenty-three claims have been paid since the competition started.

Is your portrait here? If so, drop us a post-card, and get £5.

All claims in connection with the portraits below must reach the address already given above by Tuesday next, December 31st.

Full names and addresses of the correct claimants this week appear on page 863.

HOW TO MAKE A CLAIM FOR A £5 NOTE.

Simply write on a post-card these words:

> The Portrait No.......... (here put number of portrait) in the current number of SHORT STORIES is mine. Please forward a £5 note.
> (Name and full address.)

Persons represented must claim for themselves. Claims made by other people on their behalf will be ignored.

The Entertaining of the Chief.

It was quite obvious, when Tom came home on Monday from the City, that something was wrong. He had never before forgotten to kiss Elsie, in all their three months of married life. He looked round the tiny dining-room, with its oppressively new furniture, as if it annoyed him; he straightened a picture on the wall, and then went and looked with disparaging criticism at the Japanese umbrella in the fireplace.

"I wish we'd bought the other one—the silk thing that held photographs," he said irritably.

"But it was so very much dearer!" pleaded Elsie, with quivering lips.

Tom went and gazed up at an old-fashioned Parian figure on a plush bracket. "Can't you take that hideous thing away?" he demanded.

"Oh, Tom! It was Aunt Selina's present, and she has been so kind to us!" protested Elsie. "She comes in nearly every day, you know, and I wouldn't hurt her feelings for the world. It's not so very ugly. Besides, no one sees it who matters. I put it in here instead of in the drawing-room, on purpose."

Tom muttered as if he were unconvinced. He turned up his nose at the supper, which Elsie had provided with such anxious reference to his likes and dislikes; he pronounced the bread stale, and found fault with the butter, and altogether goaded his small wife to the point of distraction. When the good-humoured little servant banged the door cheerfully behind her he gave a melodramatic start and frown, and turned upon Elsie almost savagely.

"Can't you teach that girl to behave like other people's servants?" he exclaimed.

"Oh, Tom, she's such a good girl, and means so well!" quavered Elsie. "And—oh, Tom, what is the matter with you to-night?"

The sight of two tears trickling forlornly down her pink cheeks brought the erring husband to his senses instantaneously. He dashed round the table, consoling and apologising in a breath, and calling himself all the hard names that occurred to him; but Elsie, though well pleased at this turn of affairs, could not be happy until the mystery was solved. "Tom, you must tell me!" she implored. "Something awful has happened!"

"No, indeed, darling!" Tom hastened to reassure her. "It's only that the chief——"

Elsie sat up with a gasp, and clasped her hands. "Tom! You—you haven't got the—the sack?"

"Oh, no. He's kind enough to be very pleased with me just now. In fact, we went up in the same train this morning, and he was so affable that he asked if he might come and see us—said he'd no idea that I lived here, and that Mrs. Soames would like to make your acquaintance.

"Oh, Tom! They're not really coming?" protested Elsie, with a horrified face.

"Of course, I had to say that you would be delighted," said Tom remorsefully.

"But, oh, Tom! Just think of what they're used to at home—champagne, and things," said Elsie, with distracted vagueness. "I shan't know what to give them to eat; and Bertha always does what you don't expect. Just remember when we had the Vicarage people and the Holmses to tea!"

"She served salt with the strawberries—I remember!" said Tom, groaning.

"I really can't entertain the chief and Mrs. Soames!" cried Elsie, frantically. Oh, can't you say that I've got influenza or something?"

"But I told him you were very well; and I've asked them, you see," said Tom, staring guiltily at the ground.

"You didn't fix a day?" screamed Elsie.

"He said that they had only Tuesday free," Tom replied desperately.

Elsie wrung her hands. They needn't have chosen Bertha's night out!" she wailed. "She'll be offended if I ask her to change it, and then everything will go wrong!"

Tom was smitten with deep remorse.

"Oh, Elsie, don't cry!" he exclaimed desperately. "Of course I'll tell them not to come if you feel like that about it. I'll write to-night—it doesn't matter if the chief is offended. Oh, don't, darling! I'd rather leave the office altogether than see you so uspset."

His repentance was so alarming that Elsie had to become consoler in her turn. She would be able to manage, she assured him, drying her eyes. Bertha should be bribed into peace, and all would yet be well—and, after all, the entertainment would soon be over.

"Are they very critical sort of people, Tom?" she inquired fearfully.

"Oh, dear no!" cried Tom. "The chief's awfully good-natured and easy to please—everyone likes him."

"And Mrs. Soames?" Elsie asked, somewhat reassured. But of her Tom had no such encouraging report to give. He knew almost nothing about her, he protested. Further questioned, he owned that people called her stiff; and it was finally dragged from him that a fellow-clerk who had the pleasure of her acquaintance, had remarked that he would rather talk to an iceberg than to Mrs. Soames. Poor Elsie sat appalled; and Tom began to realise the full magnitude of his sins.

"Oh, Tom, you will be sure to come home in good time?" she implored; and Tom promised fervently, conscious that it was the least atonement he could make.

Elsie found her work cut out for her. First and most important of all, she had to soothe the injured Bertha—who could only meet her "friend" on Tuesday nights—with the hopeful assurance that the dreaded visitors would leave too early to be any hindrance. She ransacked the suburb for delicacies, bought flowers with reckless extravagance, and scorched her pretty face over the kitchen fire in the concoction of scones and other mysteries. By three o'clock her path had cleared before her. All was well in train, Bertha's good-humour was restored, and she had been drilled in the minutest points of etiquette. Elsie donned her best frock, and sat expectant in the drawing-room, looking complacently round on her flowers, and wishing that her face were not so hot. She hoped fervently that Tom would be in time; it was not often that he could leave the office early. Elsie had forgotten, in her agitation, to ask what time the formidable guests might be expected, but it would surely be beneath their dignity to come before four o'clock. Her preparations were so far complete that she could allow herself a little rest. With a thankful thought that in two hours' time all would be over, and she and Tom left once more in peace, she installed herself on the drawing-room sofa—carefully, with due regard to her best frock—and prepared to be found elegantly at ease over a book. She had not found time to sit down all day, and a rest was very welcome—so much so, in fact, that five minutes later the book dropped from her hand, and she fell asleep.

An indefinite interval passed before the door opened and Bertha's injured face presented itself.

"If you please, m'm, what time might you be expecting of 'em?"

Elsie sprang up, only half-awake.

"I don't know exactly, Bertha," she said apologetically. "I don't think they will come before four——"

"Seeing as how it's half-past five now——" said Bertha, with a grim pause.

"Half-past five!" Elsie exclaimed. "Impossible!" But she looked at the clock, and found that it was true. Mistress and maid faced each other with dawning smiles of relief.

"They can't be coming," said Elsie.

"What about my hevening, please, m'm?" said Bertha.

"Help me to put the things away, and you can go this minute!" cried Elsie blissfully. Even the sight of her wasted extravagance could not dim her joy. The best tea-service was merrily stowed away, the silver cream-jug locked up, and the store of cakes relegated to the larder. In an amazingly short time Bertha was banging the garden gate behind her, while Elsie tripped upstairs to change into her oldest and least exacting summer muslin. When she heard the little gate clang, she ran out to welcome her erring husband with free forgiveness.

"Well—have they come?" were Tom's first words.

"Come? No!" said Elsie, with a long sigh of relief. "Oh, I'm so glad, Tom! But I do wish you could have let me know that they weren't coming, for I was expecting them for hours."

"Not coming? But they are coming!" cried Tom. "You didn't expect them yet, did you?"

"Why, what time did you ask them?" cried Elsie.

"I said half-past seven, of course. We always have supper at half-past seven, don't we?"

Elsie sat down on the stairs, and began to laugh hysterically. "I never dreamt of your asking them to supper!" she cried. "Of course, I thought you said tea."

"But we always have our friends to supper," said Tom, blankly. "How could I get home in time for tea? You never objected to my asking Jack Bowles, or Sidney, or the Mastersons."

At this climax of masculine obtuseness, Elsie's sorely-tried temper gave way.

"Oh, can't you see that it isn't the same thing at all?" she cried, wringing her hands. "Can't you understand that I wanted to have everything specially nice for Mr. and Mrs. Soames? And I'd taken such trouble, and I had a really lovely tea!"

"I'm sure we always have everything very nice," protested Tom. "Oh, don't worry, little woman! It will be all right."

Elsie stood up with an angry sob.

"How can it be all right," she said, "when I've got my very oldest frock on, and there's no time to change, and Bertha's out, and there's nothing in the world for supper but liver and bacon?"

"Oh, I say!" cried Tom, dismayed at last.

"I ordered the very vulgarest supper I possibly could," sobbed Elsie, "because I thought it would be such a relief after entertaining them."

The gate clanged.

"There they are!" exclaimed Tom, frantically. "Good heavens! Elsie, don't cry! What in the world are we to do?"

"You must open the door," said Elsie, drying her eyes in a dark corner.

The door was open, the dreaded guests had entered; and Elsie's heart sank to the lowest depths at sight of Mrs. Soames, who was a tall lady of majestic presence, with an aquiline nose and a deep voice. Tom was feverishly murmuring something about "My wife," and Elsie came forward, trembling, to be introduced, and to invite Mrs. Soames into the drawing-room, while Tom helped his chief to take off his coat. An awful silence reigned in both drawing-room and hall, while host and hostess cast desperately about for apologies.

"There is nothing wrong, I hope? No mistake?" said Mrs. Soames, stiffly. "We certainly understood your husband to say Tuesday."

Elsie looked at the imposing figure sitting opposite, resplendent in rustling silks, and fully appreciated a certain comparison respecting icebergs.

"Oh, I don't know what to say, Mrs. Soames!" she began desperately. "You see, I understood my husband to say that he had asked you to tea, not to supper—it was not in the least his fault!"—with frantic loyalty. "And I'm so dreadfully sorry and ashamed. I don't know what you will think of us! You see, I gave up all expectation of your coming after six o'clock, and I let our maid go out. And—and I had such a nice tea for you," sobbed poor Elsie incoherently; "and—and there's nothing whatever for supper but—but liver and bacon!"

"How very unexpected, and how very nice!" said Mrs. Soames. Her voice certainly shook a good deal, as if with suppressed laughter, but it was so kind that Elsie looked up in amazement. "I'll tell you a secret, my dear," continued the majestic lady. "You needn't apologise in the least for your supper, for my husband and I like nothing better, only—you won't tell anyone, will you?—only I am so dreadfully afraid of my cook, that I never dare to ask for it!"

Elsie gasped, and was speechless.

"You'll let me help you to get supper ready, won't you?" pleaded Mrs. Soames, quite eagerly. "Ah, you don't know what a lucky girl you are, my dear! You can't think how dull it is to be afraid to do anything for yourself because your servants will think it undignified. You will let me take off my bonnet and help, won't you?"

"Of course, if you really would like to——" began Elsie confusedly.

"I would like it of all things!" cried Mrs. Soames. She ran out into the hall, looking ten years younger. "Come, Philip!" she cried to her astonished husband. "Mrs. Sargent is very kindly going to let me help her with the supper, and I've no doubt Mr. Sargent can find something for you to do. We can imagine ourselves back in Larkspur Terrace, can't we?"

"Heaven knows, I often wish we were!" said the chief fervently, his lined face brightening, as he entered into the spirit of the thing with amazing promptness. When Elsie came down again, bringing one formidable visitor, bonnetless, and enveloped in a large apron, she found the other briskly uncorking bottled beer under Tom's directions, as one to the manner born.

The Adventures of an Actress.

XXI.—A FAREWELL APPEARANCE.

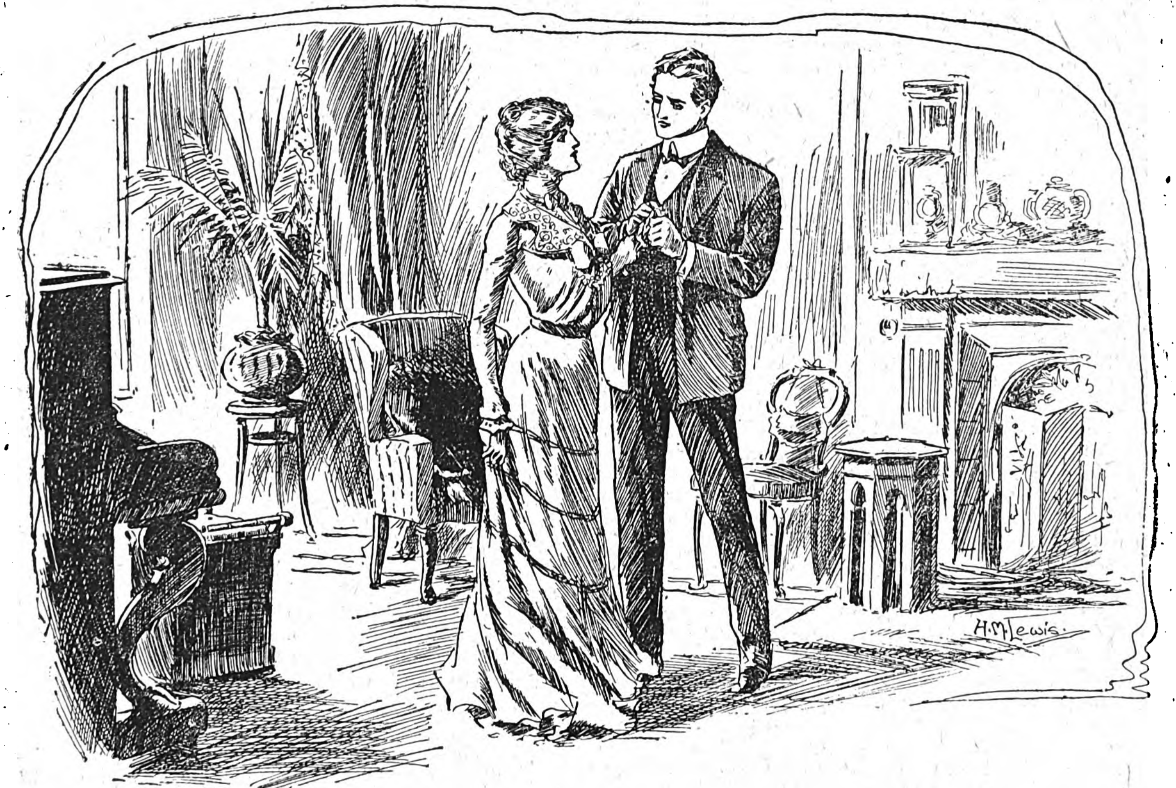
By DONOVAN MART.

CHAPTER I.

It was Christmas week. In a miserable London eating house, in an obscure quarter of the great metropolis, a man was seated, alone, upon his face a scowl that rendered it so sinister as to single him out as a being who had but little reason for being on good terms with his surroundings.

His clothes were shabby, upon his chin was a thick stubble, the moustache that disguised his mouth drooped untidily over his upper lip, his cheeks were pale. Yet he had no one to blame but himself for his present position. Only a few months before he had held a high position among his fellows, with the means and qualifications of gentle birth, and a fine old family name to aid him in enjoying his wealth.

"So this is where my endeavours have landed me ?" he said bitterly. "This is the end of my plans—a wretched Soho restaurant, deprived of my wealth, with detectives at my heels, and all for the sake of a woman ! This is how you've won Hazel Harlow, Horace Caldecott !" The frown upon his face deepened. "Curse it all !" he muttered ; "what is there left for me ? I've sworn I'll have my desires, and now if ever a man was in a hopeless plight I am he. And yet I love her—love her with all my heart and soul, although she has been responsible for bringing me to my present miserable state. What is there left for me to do ? Shall I make one last attempt to retrieve the past or shall I cut myself adrift from everything before it is too late ?" He took a deep draught at a glass of absinthe at his elbow.



"There's one thing that makes me a bit nervous," she said in a low voice.

The pungent liquor seemed to fire his brain anew. Wild thoughts began to crowd into his mind, thoughts that brought with them a hundred fanciful pictures. And always he saw before him a woman's face, gazing at him with big blue eyes, the vision of the girl, for love of whom he had sacrificed everything; aye, even his honour and his sense of right.

"To think that at this moment Hazel Harlow is in London; that she may, for all I know, be within a short distance of this very place. And yet she was never farther from me than now. Again, what is there left for me to do? Shall I own myself beaten, or shall I make one final effort to retrieve the mistakes of the past? The Good Samaritan Company is at the Coronet Theatre this week. If only I could get hold of some money. I wonder if old Moss would help me"—then his face changed—"why I don't believe the old Jew knows that I've come a cropper. Perhaps I could bounce him for a hundred or two. If I could, well—I'd have a last fling. And who knows? The fact of it being such a desperate venture might spell success; might be the means of putting Hazel in my power for ever. I'll go and see Moss at once," and draining the last drops of his drink, he left the restaurant, with seething brain, already occupied with the nucleus of a diabolical plan.

He pulled the soft felt slouch hat he was wearing well over his eyes as he issued into the publicity of the open streets, taking care, moreover, to avoid as much as possible the main thoroughfares, alive with Christmas shoppers.

At last, after much devious threading of side streets, he crossed Holborn and turned down a narrow court that debouched from the main thoroughfare.

A little way down the alley was a door that opened into a small mean dwelling, and upon which was a brass plate, that bore the simple legend: "Samuel Moss," without further clue to the identity or business of the occupier.

A peculiar knock upon the door with the brass knocker that depended therefrom, brought, in a few moments, an answer to Caldecott's summons in the person of an old, white-bearded man, of unmistakable Semitic appearance, and with a greasy skull-cap upon his bald head.

The Jew peered warily into the face of his visitor, who said in a low voice:

"Good-day, Emmanuel, I don't suppose you expected to see me to-day!"

The old Hebrew made no verbal answer to this greeting, but merely made a sign to Caldecott to enter. This the latter did with alacrity.

Moss led the way into a dingy little office, the only furniture of which was a plain pedestal writing-desk, a safe in one corner of the room, and a couple of rather dilapidated chairs, on one of which he motioned his visitor to be seated.

"And now," he said, in a husky voice, "to what am I indebted to Mr. Horace Caldecott for a visit?"

"The same old game, Emmanuel," answered the other with forced gaiety. "I am once more masquerading. You know me of old, my friend, so that you surely need not be surprised at seeing me in my present seedy get-up?

"Many a time in the old days I used to come to you, Emmanuel, when I wanted a frolic, and I've come to you again. I want a disguise and I want a small loan. There's a big thing on, and I want to be in it. And you know perfectly well that there's no fence in London who is a better hand at getting rid of contraband booty than Emmanuel Moss. I shan't tell you any more, but you know me. Isn't that so?"

Little did the old Jew know the true state of Caldecott's mind as he spoke, or that a mighty flood of apprehension was beating against the light-toned barrier of his inner consciousness. For despite the easy voice in which he uttered his wishes, he was all the time a prey to the fear that Moss knew the real state of his affairs, was perfectly conscious that this man was indeed in desperate straits. Caldecott was trading on a past intimacy, on the days when he had had intimate and nefarious dealings with the rascally old Hebrew.

Judge of his heart-felt relief then, when Moss replied:

"So this is the true explanation of why you have been keeping so much in the background, Mr. Caldecott. I was wondering what had become of you. What sort of disguise do you want, and how much money?"

The battle had been won without a blow! Caldecott rubbed his hands together metaphorically as he realised that the old rascal had no idea of how matters really stood. The crimes of his past double life, when he had presented the side of a gentleman at large to the world in general as a cloak to his association with all the by-ways of crime, stood him in good stead now. For had it not been due to this that he had been able to hoodwink the astute old Israelite.

And as the result of his visit to Moss, in a comparatively short time he was enabled to issue out into the glare of publicity a new man, his real personality disguised by the cunning transformation due to Moss. He was a a portly whiskered city merchant. Aye, and more, he had money in his pocket.

CHAPTER II.

"CAN I have a word with you?"

The man addressed turned round sharply, to be confronted by a tall, well-dressed individual, with whose face and figure he was totally unfamiliar.

"Believe me, I don't wish you any harm," went on the stranger, "but I know that you have a small part in the piece now being played at the Coronet, the Good Samaritan, and it is in connection with that that I want a few moments' quiet conversation. I assure you that if you will accede to my request and hear what I have to say, it will be to your benefit."

The theatre had just been closed for the night, and the following meeting had taken place in the High Street, Notting Hill. The 'super's' curiosity was aroused. He was on his homeward way, but that did not matter. It could make no difference if he postponed his return for awhile. And besides his curiosity was aroused to hear what this unknown man could possibly have to say to him, that would be to his advantage.

"All right," he answered carelessly, "where shall we go?"

The other led the way to a small restaurant that was close at hand, and there the pair found a private room and some supper ordered by the stranger.

As soon as they had refreshed themselves, the latter pulled out his cigar case, and offered it to the other.

"We can talk so much better over a cigar," he said, "Mr. —" "Hall" finished the actor.

"Hall, thank you. My own name is, well, let us say Jones, for it doesn't matter one way or the other. Well, now, Mr. Hall, are you game to earn twenty pounds as the price of helping me to indulge in a little harmless frolic?"

Now, as all the world knows, the earnings of a supernumary character in a travelling theatrical company can never be called excessive, and £20 represented to Mark Hall the equivalent of a good many weeks salary.

There was a gleam in his eye as he replied: "I don't mind earning twenty quid so long as I don't burn my fingers in doing so."

"And you need not be afraid of that," returned the other, "for your part will only be a tacit one. I am a journalist, and desirous of playing a part for one night in your piece. Now, if you will let me assume your personality, for one night only, mind you, I'll pay you the twenty pounds to-night."

"Yes, that's right enough. "cried the actor, "but, in the first place, how are you going to pass yourself off as me? And how are you going to do my business? A man doesn't make himself an actor in five minutes," this last with an assumption of almost ludicrous dignity, considering that his own part in the Good Samaritan was nothing more than a 'walk on.'

The other smiled. "Oh, that is all right," he said airily," a little coaching from you, and I shall do perfectly well. Then don't you see we could change places just before the play begins. You could be seen at the theatre as usual, and then could slip out and let me take up your part. The make-up will help me to pass muster, and I've seen the piece a good many times, so that I know more or less what to do. We're both about the same height, you and I. The thing is really as easy as A B C so long as you don't go back on me."

Hall was silent for a few minutes. It certainly did seem a very easy way of earning twenty pounds, and he could see nothing very extraordinary about the request. Journalists were always doing curious things. And even if his part in the proceeding were to be discovered, he was doing nothing criminal. And twenty pounds was a sum of money worth running some risk for. It was Christmas-time, and there was a certain girl in a rival company, also a super, who would be very glad of a present. The more Hall pondered over the affair, the more he resolved to accede to the stranger's request.

"All right," he said, at last, "I'll consent. Suppose we say Friday night. I shall have time to coach you in what you are to do by then. And I promise you it won't be my fault if we're found out."

"That's the way to look at things," retorted the other with a smile. "We shan't be found out. Don't you be afraid of that. You give me your [address and I'll come round and see you to-morrow morning. Then we can fix up details." He put his hand to his pocket, and drew forth a fat pocket-book.

"Here's your fee," he said, with a smile, handing the other two ten pound notes. "You can't say I'm not a man of my word. I reckon that will come in handy at Christmas-time, eh?"

The other stammered out his thanks. Such promptitude in paying an account was a thing utterly new to all his instincts, probably because, like the majority of his kind, he so rarely had any chance of paying, or, indeed, incurring easily such a sum.

But if Mark Hall could have seen what was passing in "Jones'" mind, while he conversed so glibly, he would have had genuine cause to regret the part that he had offered to take in the affair in question.

And as "Jones" strolled along the quiet streets of Bayswater, he murmured to himself: "So far so good, Horace Caldecott, though there's still a good deal to be done. If I can only fix up the other matter as easily,

TRIUMPHANT SUCCESS OF THE "RUSSELL" TREATMENT FOR THE CURE OF CORPULENCY.

Read what the "Illustrated Sporting and Dramatic News," in its issue of November 16th, says:—

NOTHING succeeds like success, says the ancient dictum; and, since the first success of the "Russell" treatment some twenty odd years ago, the triumphs of this marvellous system for the permanent reduction of corpulency have increased by leaps and bounds. For two reasons. In the first place, it is a scientific and rational treatment, necessitating no inconvenience, no discomfort, no distressing restrictions. In the second place, everyone who has tried it has been eager to recommend it to his or her stout acquaintances, because, not only is it pleasant, harmless, and easy, but it goes to the root of the evil, and brings about lasting beneficial results. By this is meant that when, after a course of the treatment, normal symmetrical proportions are regained, there is very little fear of the adipose tissue re-forming, and the treatment may therefore be definitely abandoned. How different is this from the many other so-called systems for the eradication of obesity! As a general rule, such systems not only involve extreme measures as to dietary restrictions, excessive exercise, abnormal purging and sweating, but as soon as they are dropped the fat formation re-commences, and the whole process of elimination of the adipose has to be gone through again. If our stout readers desire to inform themselves thoroughly as to the various treatments for the suppression of obesity, and as to the causes and the threatened dangers of corpulency, we cannot do better than recommend to their notice a very remarkable treatise by Mr. F. Cecil Russell, the originator of the aforementioned "Russell" treatment. This admirable book of 256 pages, which is entitled "Corpulency and the Cure," contains everything one could possibly wish to know on the subject. It treats of scientific matters without the hard scientific terminology usual in such books; it is so eminently lucid and clear that anyone may understand it without trouble. Mr. Russell, after dealing exhaustively with the causes and the cure of obesity, and the various methods of treatment hitherto employed, gives us the recipe of the compound that forms the basis of his own treatment. From this it will be seen that none but harmless vegetable ingredients are employed. Ensuite, Mr. Russell presents about a thousand extracts from grateful letters received from patients who have permanently benefited by the "Russell" régime. We find that the average reduction is about 2lbs. per diem, commencing within twenty-four hours of starting the treatment; but Mr. Russell's more modest claim is a decrease of fat averaging from ½lb. to 2lbs. per day until normal weight and size are reached. We cordially recommend "Corpulency and the Cure" to our stout friends. For a gratis copy they have simply to send two penny stamps (for postage) to Mr. F. Cecil Russell, Woburn House, Store Street, Bedford Square, London, W.C., and they will receive a copy per return, under plain, sealed envelope.

I ought to stand a very fair chance of success. And I shall at least have had a fling for my money, or I suppose I ought to say Emmanuel Moss'."

CHAPTER III.

"And to think that to-morrow night I make my farewell appearance on any public stage," said Hazel Harlow, looking tenderly into her lover's face, "I can hardly believe it, and to think of all that has happened since I ran away from Honeycote only a few short months ago—I can hardly believe I am the same girl."

"But you don't regret it, Hazel, dearest," cried Eric Monteith, "I mean that you don't regret saying good-bye to the stage. Is the prospect for the future so dark that —" but Hazel put her hand over the young man's mouth.

"Don't fish for compliments, Eric," she said gaily.

Then her voice changed. "There's one thing that makes me a bit nervous," she said in a low voice, "and that is that we have heard nothing of Horace Caldecott for so long. I can't help thinking that we shall hear of him again."

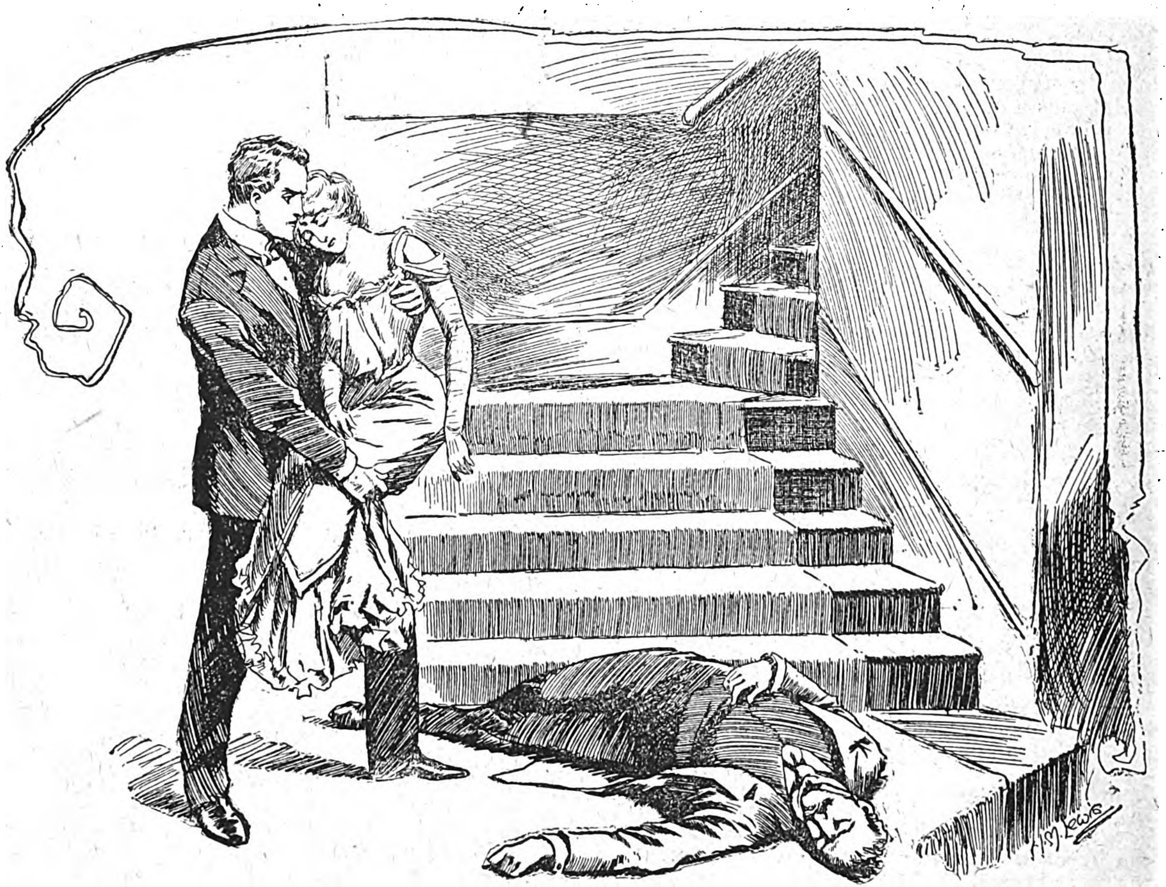
Eric's face darkened as he folded his sweetheart in his arms, with a fond embrace.

"Next week, Hazel," he said softly, "and we shall be man and wife. Not all the Horace Caldecotts in the world can hurt us then. So keep a brave heart, sweetest, and rest content in the prospect of the happy life that awaits us. Now that Alice, my dear sister, is on the high road to convalescence, I feel that there need be little fear or ground for foreboding. And think, we shall be off on our honeymoon in a few days, away to the sunny south and forgetfulness of all the sorrows we have experienced."

Such cheery optimism was infectious, and Hazel's forebodings vanished before the glow of Eric's whole-hearted devotion.

It really seemed as if the end of her troubles was in sight.

The end of the week was indeed to see a change in the organisation of the Good Samaritan Company. To begin with, both Hazel and Eric were to bid good-bye for ever to the profession that they had both graced for so short a time, while Raymond Venables, the manager of the Company, was to be wedded to Hazel's bosom friend, Jenny Lovelace, and Venables had promised his future wife that he would give up touring, and settle down in London.



"At last," he muttered to himself, "at last, oh my enemy! And this time there shall be no mistake."

Financially, the tour had been exceptionally successful, a fact due in no small measure to the undoubted charms and histrionic talents of Hazel Harlow.

And so in due sequence Friday night came and there remained but one more night upon which the Company would all meet together upon the boards.

And there was one member of the Company who viewed the farewell performance, but one, with no slight feelings of apprehension, Mark Hall the "super."

True to his compact with the mysterious Jones, he had coached the would-be actor with the utmost care, and had gone thoroughly into the details that were to change the two men's personalities for one night.

The train was ready for firing. The explosion was to be far greater than Hall ever dreamt of for one single instant.

As for Caldecott, he had left no stone unturned that might militate towards the success of the desperate scheme he had evolved for the attainment of his sinister purpose.

Hall had appeared as usual at the theatre that night. He had always been a man who had held somewhat aloof from the rest of his fellow-actors. Hence he was considered of small account, and it is exceedingly unlikely that either Hazel or Eric would have known what he looked like off the stage. And as he had merely to walk on with the rest of the crowd such a nonentity as he could not hope for much recognition from spectators or players.

He did not appear at all upon the stage until the second act, and then only for a few moments, so that it was perfectly easy for him to slip away and notify to the expectant Caldecott that the coast was clear for his enterprise. And the latter had been at great pains to make himself up to resemble as closely as possible the man whose identity he was assuming.

More than that, it had been necessary for Caldecott, in accordance with the plan that he had worked out, to make himself thoroughly conversant with the interior of the theatre, so far as was concerned with the stage portion of the building.

He knew the play well, for he had often seen it from the auditorium, and now with the aid he had received from Hall, he felt himself perfectly competent to carry out the deception he had in view. It was not that part of the plot that was troubling him, but whether another side of it would turn out to be equally as easy of accomplishment as he hoped.

All went well at first. He slipped in in the place of Hall, and took up his position in the wings, taking good care to remain as much as possible in shadow. And here the taciturn reputation of Hall stood him in good stead. He remained unnoticed and unmolested.

At last the second act drew to a close, and with it the time for the perpetration of his scheme drew near.

He had chosen a time when Hazel was standing alone by the wings on the right of the stage, with the rest of the principal performers on the other side, waiting for the cue that was to send them trooping on in a body. He himself was standing in a recess only a few yards away from the unsuspecting actress.

There were but two people on the stage itself, one of these Jenny Lovelace, the other the villain of the piece. The cue for the general onrush was a cry from Jenny as the villain sprang towards her saying: "You shall answer for that with your life!"

The cry was given, the words spoken. Then an amazing thing happened. With startling rapidity a great darkness fell over the whole theatre, as though the electric light had suddenly been cut off all over the building, as was indeed the case.

Caldecott leapt forward. Before Hazel could utter a cry she felt strong arms around her. A handkerchief steeped in chloroform was laid over her face. A burning kiss was imprinted upon her lips, and swinging her off her feet the desperate villain dashed for the head of the stairs, close at hand, leading down to the street below.

As can be well imagined, the sudden darkness was responsible for something approaching a panic among the audience. On every hand startled cries rang out.

Eric's first feeling had been for Hazel. He had of course no suspicions that the catastrophe was traceable to anything more than one of those untoward accidents that will happen under the best regulated conditions. The instinct was merely the natural one that everybody has, to be near the person you care most for in the world, in any moment of danger.

He dashed across the stage. "Hazel," he cried, "are you there?"

There was no answer. He groped his way to the wings where she had been standing. Still he heard nothing. A sudden fear clutched at his heart. He dashed towards the head of the stairway down which Caldecott had a moment or so before disappeared. A feeble gas-jet flared on the staircase.

Suddenly he saw something that sent the blood to his cheeks. It was a lace handkerchief, lying upon a step. He recognised it in an instant as having been one that he had himself purchased for his lover.

He tore down the stairs, at lightning speed, to almost fall headlong upon the figure of a man with a girl in his arms, Hazel, and apparently lifeless.

With a cry of rage he sprang at the unknown abductor who let his living burden slip from his grasp, to turn round with a snarl like that of a wild beast, to receive Eric's fist delivered with crashing force in his face. He dropped like a log, beside the body of the girl, stunned by the force of the blow.

One glance at the man's face and the truth came home to Monteith.

"At last," he muttered to himself, "at last, O my enemy! And this time there shall be no mistake."

* * * * *

So died the last attempt of Horace Caldecott to abduct the girl whom he had already harassed with such relentless persecution.

The whole black business was revealed at the trial of the scoundrel. He had, so it turned out, bribed the man in charge of the electric lighting installation in the theatre to sever the wires that fed the globes in the building with the needful current, and just at the one period in the play when his desperate scheme might have a chance of success. It was only by a mere hair's-breadth that his foul plot had been rendered useless. For outside the theatre was a carriage, the driver of which was in his pay, into which he could have bundled the hapless victim of his base passions, and driven off to goodness knows what lair.

Hazel Harlow is Hazel Monteith now, and has said good-bye to the stage for ever. All her troubles are at an end.

Horace Caldecott, who was identified with other crimes almost blacker than those he had perpetrated to gain Hazel Harlow as his wife, received a long term of penal servitude as his rich reward.

And so with this knowledge let us say farewell to Hazel Harlow.

Short Stories That . . . . . . Make You Laugh.

We devote every week space in Short Stories to pithy, humorous anecdotes similar to those which appear in these columns. To those readers who submit storyettes which are used, a six shilling novel will be awarded. The anecdotes may be either original or selected; in the latter case, the source MUST be stated. Attempts must reach the Storyette Editor, Short Stories Office, Henrietta Street, Strand, London, W.C., by Monday, December 30th. Post-cards only, please.

Solving the Problem.

George: "Women are still pushing their way into all the industries." Jack: "That's so. I have just been discharged to make way for a woman." "You have? Well! well! What are you going to do now?" "I am trying to marry the woman."

Still the Boards.

"I don't believe in opposing the preferences of a son in the matter of choosing a profession," said an indulgent father. "Nor I," said another father. "Has your son chosen his profession?" "Well, in a way." "What is it?" "Why, he was stage-struck, and insisted that he was 'born for the boards,' as he expressed it; and so I apprenticed him to a carpenter!"

Couldn't Want More.

Jones (to house agent): "I thought you said there was a charming view from the front windows? Why, there are only houses to be seen." House agent: "So there is a charming view, sir. In the house opposite lives the most beautiful widow you ever clapped eyes on, and she's always at the window."

A Good Cure.

"My husband is so poetic!" said one lady to another in a tram car the other day. "Have you ever tried rubbin' his jints with hartshorn liniment, mum?" interrupted a woman with a market basket at her feet, who was sitting at her elbow and overheard the remark. "That will straighten him out as quick as anything I know of, if he ain't got it too bad."

Wasted Energy.

First Reporter (big daily paper): "What's the matter?" Second Reporter: "I worked for two mortal hours over that lost child, and spent about five shillings for sweets and toys, trying to coax him to tell what his name was, so I could take him to his parents and write it up. Thought I'd get about a column of affecting scenes out of it." "Didn't you succeed?" "Yes; he told finally." "Then what are you grumbling about?" "He's my own son."

The Dutchman's Dodge.

"What is the meaning of that red line above the fourth storey of your house?" asked a stranger of a farmer in Holland. "That is a water mark. That mark shows how high the water was during a great overflow about a year ago." "Impossible. If the water had been that high the whole town would have been swept away." "The water was never that high. It only came up to the first storey window, but the boys rubbed the mark out three or four times, so I put it up there, where they can't get at it. It takes a smart man to circumvent these boys."

Something Missing.

"Are you disappointed in your Christmas gifts, Willie?" asked his mother. "N-no," he answered, dubiously, "I'm not exactly disappointed, but I don't see anything here that I can make a noise with."

Hard to Please.

Papa: "My daughter tells me, sir, that you kissed her forcibly last night. What have you to say for yourself?" Harry: "I'm sure nobody regrets the occurrence more than I do." Papa and Daughter together: "Sir!"

A Financial Genius.

Father: "I hope you are doing well in the financial world, my boy?" Son: "Yes, father; I made three thousand last year, but if I have good luck this year I shall make a cool fifty thousand." "You have great business ability, Jack. It is a legitimate speculation, I suppose?" "Oh, yes; Miss Hendrick is going to answer me to-night."

The Wisdom of Experience.

Experienced Traveller (at railway restaurant): "When did that man at the other table give his order?" Waiter: "'Bout ten minutes ago, sir." "What did he order?" "Beefsteak and onions, sir." "How much did he pay you?" "Sixpence, sir." "Well, here's a shilling. Cook another steak and bring me his." "Yes, sir."

No Excuse.

A member of a volunteer fire-brigade did not appear at the scene of the conflagration until after the fire was under control. The chief of the fire department reproached him bitterly for his neglect of duty. "It's not my fault," replied the fireman, "I live a long distance from the fire." "That's no excuse, you must move nearer to the next fire."

He'd Seen Them Before.

Mrs. De Flatte: "Boy, did you see a stray pug dog anywhere?" Smart Boy: "Yes'm. I just saw one bein' chewed up by a big bull-dog, an' I saw another bein' tied to a tin can, and I saw another bein' chopped up fer sausages an'——" Mrs. De Flatte (clutching at a railing for support): "Oo! Horrors! I'd give a guinea to get my little Fido safely back." Smart Boy: "All right, mum. You wait here half-a-minute."

PHOTO COMPETITION.

Four correct claims have been received in connection with the photo competition this week, and £5 notes have been sent to the following:

The Brain Gymnasium.

In these competitions a prize of £1 1s. will be awarded each week to the competitor whose attempt we receive giving the correct solution of all the puzzles. If more than one is absolutely correct the prize of £1 1s. will be given to the first correct attempt dealt with.

If no lists of absolutely correct solutions are sent in, the first prize will be awarded to the competitor whose attempt is first dealt with showing the fewest mistakes.

Each week we shall award, in addition to the above, either ten of our gold-plated pencil-cases or ten popular novels, to be distributed amongst the competitors whose attempts are absolutely correct and have failed to win the first prize, or, if no complete lists of correct solutions are received, to those whose attempts show the fewest mistakes.

Write all your solutions on one side only of the paper, putting the number against each. Post the batch in an envelope marked "Brain Gymnasium," to reach the Editor, Short Stories, 18 Henrietta Street, London, W.C., by first post on Monday, January 6th, 1902.

Readers are invited to submit puzzles, acrostics, conundrums, word-squares, etc., for publication on this page. A gold-plated pencil-case will be given to each reader whose attempts are used. All attempts must be vouched for as original, and, of course, it is distinctly understood that the sender of a puzzle must neither compete in the competition nor divulge to anyone the solution. Any reader found infringing this rule will be severely dealt with.

GEOGRAPHICAL PUZZLE.

There was once a young lady named (town in Australia), who expected a friend named (city in Italy). The day arrived when (city in Italy) was to come. She wore a dark (mountains in the United States) dress, and a (sea off the eastern coast of Africa) (an island south of England). She carried a (country of Africa) purse, and wore a long (county in United States). She brought (town in Australia) a ring, with a (river in U.S.A.) in, and a (mountain in U.S.A.) stone. (Town in Australia) thought she would give a party for (city in Italy). As she invited a number of her friends, (city in Italy) could play the (mountains in South America) very nicely, so she was asked to play, after which refreshments were served, which consisted of (country in Europe), (islands in Oceanica), (city in Austria), bread, tinned (river in America), (first half of a city in Italy) of mutton, and (first half of an island north-west of Europe) cream. After this she was presented with some vases made of the finest (city in Germany) (town near London). When they were going, the (mountains in Africa) was shining, and the (other mountains in Africa) was so deep they could scarcely wade through. She at last said (cape off Greenland) and returned home.

CONSTIPATION and HEADACHE ENDED

By the use of BILE BEANS.

DOUBLE CURE AT LEICESTER.

Investigation by a "BIRMINGHAM TELEGRAPH" reporter.

The marvellous curative properties of Bile Beans for Biliousness are once again demonstrated by a double cure recently effected in a pretty suburb of Leicester. Mrs. E. Haxton, of 45 Overton Road, and her daughter, Miss Haxton, are the fortunate couple; and they have told their story to a Birmingham Telegraph reporter. "For about two years," said Miss Haxton, "I endured excruciating pains in the head. First of all a violent pain would shoot to the top of my head, just as if I had received a severe blow. Then it seemed to extend over the whole of my body, so as to put me into fearful agony. I used to have a nice fresh colour, but the pain took it all away, until my face became ghastly and almost bloodless.

"Every time these attacks came on it was just as though I were going to have a fit. My lips turned blue, and my mother got quite frightened, for she was unable to relieve me. On a night, before I had been long asleep, the pains would awaken me, and I should have to sit up in bed. I dare not lie down again. Sometimes I have been afraid to go to bed at all, and would sit up in a chair all night rather than do so. I tried all sorts of means to secure relief, but in vain. A leading Leicester doctor said it was nervous exhaustion, and gave me medicine, but it did me no good, and I had to take brandy to keep me on my feet.

"The pain also affected my eyes, and I was afraid I should have to give up my situation. Things were at a crisis when my mother had a few Bile Beans given her. I took a dose, and when I perceived they did me good I went in for a proper course. The pains in the head soon troubled me less, and I began to get a good night's rest as a regular thing. Now they have disappeared completely, my eyesight is all right again, and, thanks solely to Bile Beans, I am better in health and spirits than I have been for a long time past."

Mrs. Haxton added her testimony to the following effect. She said: "I was a great sufferer from constipation, sickness, and indigestion. My meals were followed by a most disagreeable nausea and feeling of fulness, which was hard to bear. The Beans had a most beneficial result, putting my bowels into thoroughly good order. The attacks of indigestion grew fewer and fewer, until now I have become a stranger to that complaint, and I eat heartily, and have none of the disagreeable after-effects I used to have.

"My daughter, too, is completely cured. So delighted are we with the Beans that we are recommending them everywhere. They are a wonderful medicine, and everybody should know of them."

BILE BEANS FOR BILIOUSNESS

Have been found an undoubted cure for Headache, Influenza, Costiveness, Piles, Liver Trouble, Bad Breath, Rheumatism, Colds, Liver Chill, Indigestion, Dizziness, Buzzing in the Head, Fulness After Eating, Constipation, Debility, Anæmia, Female Ailments, Pimples, and a host of other ailments that owe their origin to defective bile flow, assimilation, and digestion. They will also be of great service in Nervous Disorders, Loss of Appetite, Shortness of Breath, Blotches on the Skin, Scrofula, Insomnia, and Troubled Sleep. They act quickly in restoring females to health, and for a general aperient and tonic remedy they are almost unequalled. Bile Beans are obtainable of all Chemists, or Post Free, if this paper is mentioned, from THE BILE BEAN MANUFACTURING COMPANY, 119 and 120 London Wall, London, E.C., on receipt of price, 1/1½ and 2/9 large box, containing three times small size; three large boxes 7/6, or six for 14/-.

WARNING.

Bile Beans are NOT sold LOOSE, being put up in sealed boxes only. All others are fraudulent imitations, and you are warned not to accept any but the genuine.
